

EQUITY AND TRUSTS

EIGHTH EDITION

ALASTAIR HUDSON

Equity and Trusts

Eighth Edition

Alastair Hudson's Equity and Trusts is an ideal textbook for undergraduate courses on the law of trusts and equitable remedies. It provides a clear, current and comprehensive account of the subject through which the author's enthusiasm and expertise shine through, helping to bring to life an area of the law which students often find challenging.

Fully updated and revised, this Eighth Edition contains an analysis of Jones v Kernott and trusts of homes; a new treatment of dishonest assistance and unconscionable receipt; a full treatment of the law on super-injunctions; coverage of all of the trusts law cases precipitated by the collapse of Lehman Brothers; a reflection on women and equity and the politics of trusts law; a new treatment of the Hastings-Bass principle as set out in Pitt v Holt; analysis of over 200 new cases; the Charities Act 2011 and the Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 2009.

Equity and Trusts provides the most comprehensive and up-to-date coverage of the law of Equity and Trusts, as well as a lively and thoughtful account of the issues raised by it. This book has been cited as being authoritative in the courts of numerous countries.

The eighth edition is supported by a companion website which includes:

- over 50 short podcast lectures by the author discussing and clarifying key topics from within the book, which cover an entire course;
- a set of brief videos which provide context and bring to life selected key topics;
- an introductory video presentation from the author introducing the viewer to the subject of Equity and Trusts and to the book in particular.

Review of a previous edition:

'One of the book's great strengths is its clear exposition of some very difficult areas of the law, moving seamlessly from points that puzzle students to points that puzzle practitioners. Other strengths are the breadth of its approach, the fact that it is extremely up to date, the freshness and vividness of its approach and its willingness to place equity in a wider context . . . The student will enjoy a clear, lively and challenging account of the subject matter. The practitioner will find the book well worth consulting for its clear exposition of the basic principles and of their application in difficult areas.' – New Law Journal.

Alastair Hudson is Professor of Equity & Finance Law at the University of Southampton, and of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister. He is a National Teaching Fellow, Fellow of the Higher Education Academy, Fellow of the Royal Society of Arts, and was voted UK Law Teacher of the Year.

This page intentionally left blank

Equity and Trusts

Eighth Edition

Alastair Hudson

LLB LLM PhD (Lond.)

Professor of Equity & Finance Law

University of Southampton

National Teaching Fellow

Fellow of the Royal Society of Arts

Fellow of the Higher Education Academy

Of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister

Eighth edition published 2015
by Routledge
2 Park Square, Milton Park, Abingdon, Oxon OX14 4RN

and by Routledge
711 Third Avenue, New York, NY 10017

Routledge is an imprint of the Taylor & Francis Group, an informa business

© 2015 Alastair Hudson

The right of Alastair Hudson to be identified as author of this work has been asserted by him in accordance with sections 77 and 78 of the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988.

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reprinted or reproduced or utilised in any form or by any electronic, mechanical, or other means, now known or hereafter invented, including photocopying and recording, or in any information storage or retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publishers.

Trademark notice: Product or corporate names may be trademarks or registered trademarks, and are used only for identification and explanation without intent to infringe.

First edition published by Cavendish Publishing in 1999
Seventh edition published by Routledge in 2013

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data

Hudson, Alastair, author.

Equity and trusts / Alastair Hudson.—Eighth edition.

pages cm

ISBN 978-0-415-83688-3 (hardback)—ISBN 978-0-415-83687-6 (pbk)—

ISBN 978-1-315-77441-1 (ebk) 1. Equity—England. 2. Trusts and trustees—England. I. Title.

KD674.H83 2014

346.42'004—dc23

2014007882

ISBN: 978-0-415-83688-3 (hbk)

ISBN: 978-0-415-83687-6 (pbk)

ISBN: 978-1-315-77441-1 (ebk)

Typeset in Times
by RefineCatch Limited, Bungay, Suffolk

Preface

Equity is a fascinating and subtle area of law; the law of trusts is by turns a technically progressive, practical and theoretically complex topic. This book constitutes a comprehensive analysis of both equity and the law of trusts, suitable for undergraduate and postgraduate courses, and (as suggested by reviews of the previous edition) it is widely used by legal practitioners and has been cited in the courts of several jurisdictions.

This subject has everything: birth, life, greed, sex, lies, truth, conscience, bitterness, vengeance and death – and then what comes after death. The rules of equity, and in particular the trust, are the ways in which English law deals with so many of these things. This book is meant to teach students and others interested in this subject, and to deal forthrightly with the issues which this subject raises: both subtle technical issues and contextual, social issues. To say that it is a teaching aid does not mean that it is not intended to be an academic or scholarly book. On the contrary I have had two aims in writing it: to explain the law of trusts in an accessible way and also to address all of the major academic debates that currently surround the complex principles of equity and the law of trusts. It explains the concepts by using easy-to-understand examples from real life, together with my ‘cognitive reinforcement’ teaching technique, and detailed analyses of the key cases and principles.

Important information for the student reader: how to read this book

It is important that you read this Preface before you start reading the rest of the text. It is then very important that you read the first two chapters, which will explain the vital underpinnings for the whole of the rest of the book.

This book has been written in a way that is slightly different from other trusts textbooks. Each chapter and each individual section begins with an overview of the relevant legal principles in that area. These summaries serve as a shorthand note of the discussion that follows. Importantly, they will give an outline of the subject matter to come. The secret to reading textbooks and cases is to know what the core legal principles are before you start to read. Without that knowledge you will find it very hard to understand the detail of the discussion. In this book each major principle is illustrated with a factual example to show how the ordinary world is understood through a trusts law analysis. That way, the discussion that follows will make more sense and the major issues will stand out more clearly.

After the summary, the remainder of the section will explain how those principles work. Those sections will be designed as problem-solving discussions – examining the real-life issues which have led to development of the law of trusts and the principles of equity.

Discussion will be primarily of the most significant cases, set against accounts of the academic analysis of each subject.

Equity and trusts is a topic in which it is possible for a student to score very high marks in essays and examinations because there are a number of very sophisticated ideas bound up in it. If you deal with them well, you will shine. Therefore, importantly for you, this text and its two companion websites include discussion of all of the major academic and judicial debates in the area (with a few more besides): there are podcasts on each individual topic, and full lectures online too. These ideas are usually considered towards the end of each chapter after the basic material has been explained at the outset. A glossary of essential terms is also supplied, which may prove useful in those dark early days.

The significance of the painting on the cover of this book

The painting on the cover of the paperback edition of this book depicts a young woman, clearly in some distress, consulting a lawyer. The painting is set in the late 18th century. While the woman is in full flow telling her story to the older man, he is clearly unsure whether or not to believe her, or at the very least is readying himself to disagree with her. The young clerk who is leaving by a door at the left of the painting appears to have stopped in mid-stride, surprised at what the young woman is saying. At the time, women's position under English law was tenuous. Indeed, it was often only through trusts (as discussed in Chapter 2 of this book) that it was possible to protect women both against arrangements which tended to prioritise men and against the dangers of having their property taken from them by unscrupulous husbands because (at that time) any property belonging to a woman would ordinarily pass to her husband on marriage. Only a trust could ensure that a woman could maintain the use of that property after her marriage. In Jane Austen novels, the young women who were threatened with losing their homes when their fathers died (and the house passed to the next male heir in their extended family) could only have been protected by differently drafted trusts. So, this painting depicts the difficulty which a young woman would have both in protecting herself and in finding lawyers who were enlightened enough to fight for their rights. A trust could be the protector for a young woman, by making it impossible for her home to be taken away from her; or it could be the device which condemned her to penury, by allocating the ownership of her home to other people.

The structure of the book

Part 1 is essential background material for the student reader, as it considers the fundamental principles of equity and explains the basic structure of the trust. No student of this subject will get far without a sure understanding of this basic material. Part 2 considers the nature of express trusts and the formalities necessary for their creation, which form the basis of all courses on express trusts law.

Part 3 considers the administration of express trusts and the responsibilities imposed on trustees by case law and by statute. The global financial crisis and the collapse of the US investment bank Lehman Brothers has given rise to a large amount of important case law on the certainties necessary to create a trust. As the author of The Law of Finance, it has been possible for me to synthesise the discussion of these fascinating but complex new cases with the relevant principles of financial practice and financial regulation. There continues to be a detailed discussion of the fiduciary duties of trustees, including significant developments in the decision of the Supreme Court in Pitt v Holt, and also on the rights of beneficiaries to information from trustees.

Part 4 analyses resulting trusts, constructive trusts, equitable estoppel and the nature of fiduciary liabilities: these areas are central to the study of trusts law and also pivotal in the scholarly debates about equity, trusts and unjust enrichment. There has been a large amount of new case law, particularly in relation to the treatment of bribes and commercial joint ventures.

Part 5 considers the interaction of principles of trusts law and proprietary estoppel with equitable principles of unconscionability and family law in relation to the acquisition of rights in the home. Chapter 15 has been extensively updated to account for the decision of the Supreme Court in Jones v Kernott and its impact on the interpretation of the decision of House of Lords in Stack v Dowden and previous case law. This is one of the most dynamic areas of equity and trusts: the discussion sets out a categorisation of the various streams of case law, before considering in detail the particular problems raised by equitable estoppel, relationship breakdown, human rights law and philosophical models of social justice.

Part 6 contains three chapters which consider the variety of claims available in relation to breach of trust: whether brought against trustees in person, or against persons who have unconscionably and knowingly received trust property or dishonestly assisted in a breach of trust, or to trace proprietary rights in equity or at common law. The chapter on dishonest assistance and unconscionable receipt has been completely re-cast to account for the burgeoning case law in this area, and to consider some of the fascinating theoretical and practical questions which it raises.

Part 7 considers the way in which commercial people use trusts and other equitable principles such as the floating charge and mortgages in their transactions. There is also a discussion of themes in international trusts law which casts new light on the English case law principles. From this discussion emerges an account of the uncomfortable assimilation of general equitable doctrine into commercial activities juxtaposed with commerce's enthusiastic acceptance of some techniques found in express trusts and equitable charges.

Part 8 considers the welfare uses of trusts. The chapter on Charities has been rewritten in large part to account for the Charities Act 2011. That Act was passed just after the previous edition was submitted and therefore its treatment in the last edition was a little rough around the edges. The interaction between the old case law, which remains in force, and the new categories of 'charitable purpose' promises to be a fascinating area for the future.

Part 9 considers the established categories of equitable remedies – specific performance, injunctions, rescission, rectification and set-off for undue influence – as well as a comprehensive round-up of less conspicuous equitable remedies, including subrogation, account, equitable damages, remedies for breach of trust, and the appointment of receivers. Many of these equitable doctrines and remedies are frequently overlooked in the calls made by restitution lawyers to 'replace equity' with principles of unjust enrichment. What emerges from this discussion is a demonstration of equity at its purest: discretionary, imaginative and always in flux. For the first time there is a comprehensive discussion of the equitable doctrine of confidence and of the law relating to the award of super-injunctions.

Part 10 sets out in two short essays a compilation of the main themes of the book. First, a consideration of the theoretical underpinnings of the law of property as put to work in the context of trusts and equity; then the final chapter of the book considers the theoretical nature of equity and also examines the various meanings associated with the important term 'conscience' in this context. It has always been my aim to make this a progressive book as well as a comprehensive textbook: it is in these final chapters that I set out to achieve that goal most obviously.

Two companion websites – containing updates on all important cases

A library of further materials can be found at <http://www.alastairhudson.com/trustslaw>, including extended essays on the nature of express trusts, of restitution of unjust enrichment, and of trusts implied by law, as well as essays on unit trusts, co-operatives and public interest trusts. That site has developed a large number of casenotes on new decisions reached by English and other courts between editions of this book. It also contains a number of short podcasts on issues of particular concern to students in examinations, videos explaining some knotty problems of trusts law, and issues which are of particular academic interest. All of my undergraduate lectures and many other podcasts besides are available free of charge on that website too. My publishers maintain a companion website (www.routledge.com/cw/hudson) for purchasers of this book which is also updated periodically to account for new developments in equity and trusts: that website will continue to grow with essays, casenotes and commentaries on this and other areas of law and legal theory. This new edition aims to update the book to account for important decisions in the Supreme Court in Pitt v Holt, in Jones v Kernott and in Lehman Brothers v CRC; and many other key cases besides, including FHR European Ventures v Mankarious, Armstrong v Winnington and Independent Trustee Services v GP Noble and Morris. Otherwise, the law is stated as it was at the various times when the various chapters were written between February 2012 and February 2014. References to nearly 250 new cases have been included since the sixth edition of this book, making it one of the most comprehensive treatments of this topic in print today. Updates on later developments will be made available on-line, as described before, in the form of documents and podcasts. Consequently, this book will remain as up-to-date as possible.

From Routledge, I would like to thank Fiona Briden for her ever-professional and always good-humoured help in the preparation of this book, and also Damian Mitchell for a thousand kindnesses. There are other people I would like to thank for help and comradeship which, while not necessarily directly connected to this book, were essential to its completion in many other ways: in no particular order but with boundless thanks Prof Geraint Thomas and Dr Helena Howe. As this book aims to show, nothing is perfect but thinking can make it seem so.

Alastair Hudson

Guide to the Companion Website

Visit the Equity and Trusts Companion Website at <http://www.routledge.com/cw/udson>, and the author's own website <http://www.alastairhudson.com/>, to discover a comprehensive range of resources designed to enhance the learning experience for students of equity and trusts.

RESOURCES

Podcasts

Listen to a comprehensive series of short podcasts by the author covering an entire equity and trusts law course, discussing and clarifying key topics from the book, together with updating podcasts.

Essays

A range of essays discuss new developments and provide pathways into further research.

Video introduction

Familiarise yourself with equity and trusts through the author's introductory video presentation.

Vodcasts

Short videos in which the author explains some of the more complex issues arising in trusts law so that they make sense.

Documentaries

See key topics brought to life through a set of brief video documentaries filmed on location.

Additional material

Access Chapter 23 on ‘Mortgages, charges and taking security’ and Chapter 24 on ‘Occupational pension funds’ alongside further additional material.

Explore further

Access a link to the author’s own site which features up-to-date casenotes, further reading and research essays on various areas of law with commentary and feedback for help in developing essay-writing skills as well as guidance for taking effective lecture notes.

Updates

Keep up to date with the latest developments in equity and trusts by reading the author’s updates to the text on-line.

Outline contents

Preface	v
Guide to the companion website	ix
Glossary	xx
Table of cases	xxiii
Table of legislation	lxxii
PART 1 Fundamentals of equity and trusts	I
1 Introduction – the nature of equity	3
2 Understanding the trust	44
PART 2 Express trusts	85
3 Certainty in the creation of express trusts	87
4 The rights of beneficiaries and the beneficiary principle	179
5 Formalities in the creation of express trusts	240
6 Secret trusts	300
7 Essay – The nature of express trusts	327
PART 3 Administration of trusts	337
8 The duties of trustees	339
9 The investment of trusts	425
10 The powers of trustees and the variation of trusts	471
PART 4 Trusts implied by law	497
11 Resulting trusts	499
12 Constructive trusts	546
13 Equitable estoppel	651
14 Essay – Thinking about the law on fiduciaries	686
PART 5 Equity, trusts and the home	699
15 Trusts of homes	701
16 Trusts of land	801
17 Essay – Family law, human rights law and equity	829

PART 6 Breach of trust and related equitable claims	851
18 Breach of trust	853
19 Tracing	887
20 The liability of strangers to account for involvement in a breach of trust	953
PART 7 Commercial uses of trusts	1035
21 Commerce, international trusts law and dealing with property	1037
22 Quistclose trusts	1062
23 Mortgages, charges and taking security	1093
PART 8 Welfare uses of trusts	1095
24 Occupational pension funds	1097
25 Charities	1098
PART 9 Equitable remedies	1169
26 Specific performance	1171
27 Injunctions and confidences	1184
28 Rescission and rectification	1233
29 Doctrine of notice and undue influence	1246
30 Miscellaneous equitable remedies	1275
PART 10 Theoretical questions relating to equity and trusts	1289
31 The nature of property in equity and trusts	1291
32 Equity, chaos and social complexity	1306
Bibliography	1324
Index	1338

Detailed Contents

Preface	v
Guide to the companion website	ix
Glossary	xx
Table of cases	xxiii
Table of legislation	lxxii

PART I

Fundamentals of equity and trusts I

1 Introduction – the nature of equity 3

- 1.1 The foundations of equity* 4
- 1.2 The birth of equity* 16
- 1.3 Understanding equity* 22
- 1.4 The core equitable principles* 28
- 1.5 Placing equity in context* 36

2 Understanding the trust 44

- 2.1 The birth of the trust* 45
- 2.2 The definition of a trust* 47
- 2.3 Express trusts – the magic triangle* 51
- 2.4 Fundamentals of the law of trusts* 61
- 2.5 The benefits and uses of trusts* 66
- 2.6 The distinction between trusts and other legal concepts* 70
- 2.7 Sociological issues in equity and trusts* 73

PART 2

Express trusts 85

3 Certainty in the creation of express trusts 87

- 3.1 Introduction* 89
- 3.2 The three certainties* 91
- 3.3 Certainty of intention* 92

3.4	Certainty of subject matter	116
3.5	Certainty of objects	145
4	The rights of beneficiaries and the beneficiary principle	179
4.1	The nature of the rights of beneficiaries in the trust fund	181
4.2	The beneficiary principle	197
4.3	Unincorporated associations	220
5	Formalities in the creation of express trusts	240
5.1	Specific formalities in the creation of trusts	242
5.2	The proper constitution of a trust	245
5.3	Exceptions to the rules of formality	250
5.4	Improperly constituted trusts and imperfect gifts	253
5.5	Perfecting imperfect gifts	265
5.6	Covenants and promises to create a settlement over after-acquired property	269
5.7	Disposition of equitable interests	280
6	Secret trusts	300
6.1	Introduction	301
6.2	Fully secret trusts	307
6.3	Half-secret trusts	312
6.4	General principles	314
6.5	The probate doctrine of incorporation by reference	319
6.6	Categorising the secret trust	320
7	Essay – The nature of express trusts	327
7.1	The bases of express trusts	327
7.2	Different trends in the cases	331
PART 3
Administration of trusts		337
8	The duties of trustees	339
8.1	Introduction	341
8.2	The office of trustee	342
8.3	The general duties of trustees	353
8.4	The trustees' duty to provide information and to account to the beneficiaries	392
8.5	Limitation of the trustees' duties	407
8.6	Control of the trustees	420

9	The investment of trusts	425
9.1	The use of trusts as investment vehicles	426
9.2	Introduction to the principles of the Trustee Act 2000	428
9.3	The general power of investment	433
9.4	The trustees' standard of care when making investments	434
9.5	The process of making investment decisions	438
9.6	Case law on the trustees' duties in the investment of trusts	443
9.7	Express investment powers	453
9.8	Trustees as authorised persons under the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000	455
9.9	Breach of trust and investment	462
9.10	The selection and management of particular types of investment	467
10	The powers of trustees and the variation of trusts	471
10.1	General powers of trustees	472
10.2	Powers of maintenance and advancement	473
10.3	Delegation of trustees' duties	479
10.4	Variation of trusts	484
10.5	Limits on the exercise of powers	496
PART 4
	Trusts implied by law	497
11	Resulting trusts	499
11.1	Introduction – what is a resulting trust?	500
11.2	Automatic resulting trusts	508
11.3	Quistclose trusts	514
11.4	Presumed resulting trusts	517
11.5	Mistake and resulting trust	542
12	Constructive trusts	546
12.1	Introduction	549
12.2	Constructive trusts at large	553
12.3	Unconscionable dealings with property	558
12.4	Profits from unlawful acts	569
12.5	Fiduciary making unauthorised profits	598
12.6	Constructive trusts and agreements relating to property	529
12.7	Voluntary assumption of liability	637
12.8	Trustees de son tort and intermeddlers as constructive trustees	642
12.9	Personal liability to account as a constructive trustee	644
12.10	Issues with constructive trusts	646

13	Equitable estoppel	651
13.1	Introduction	651
13.2	A single doctrine of estoppel?	652
13.3	Proprietary estoppel	655
13.4	Estoppel licences: from contract to property rights	680
13.5	Promissory estoppel	682
13.6	Other forms of estoppel in commercial contexts	683
13.7	In conclusion	684
14	Essay – Thinking about the law on fiduciaries	686
14.1	The role of the fiduciary	686
14.2	A question of definition	686
14.3	Established categories of fiduciary relationship	687
14.4	The advantages of remedies based on fiduciary responsibility	690
14.5	Scope for the development of new categories?	692
14.6	Conclusions – the traditional context	697
PART 5
	Equity, trusts and the home	699
15	Trusts of homes	701
15.1	Introduction	704
15.2	Express trusts of homes	710
15.3	Resulting trusts and the emergence of common intention	711
15.4	Constructive trusts – acquisition of equitable interests by conduct or agreement	717
15.5	The balance sheet approach	731
15.6	The family assets approach	740
15.7	Proprietary estoppel	744
15.8	The unconscionability approach	753
15.9	The principles in Stack v Dowden and Jones v Kernott	764
15.10	Different approaches elsewhere in the Commonwealth	789
15.11	Trends in the academic discussion of trusts of homes	793
16	Trusts of land	801
16.1	Introduction	801
16.2	Trusts of land	802
16.3	Concurrent ownership of land	827
17	Essay – Family law, human rights law and equity	829
17.1	Introduction	829
17.2	Human rights law and equity	831
17.3	Principles of human rights law	835
17.4	Family law and the law of the home	839
17.5	Social justice and rights in the home	844

PART 6
Breach of trust and related equitable claims	851
18 Breach of trust	853
18.1 Introduction	854
18.2 The basis of liability for breach of trust	856
18.3 Remedies for breach of trust	865
18.4 Defences to liability for breach of trust	880
18.5 Allocating claims	885
19 Tracing	887
19.1 Tracing – understanding the nature of the claim	889
19.2 Common law tracing	895
19.3 Equitable tracing	899
19.4 Equitable tracing into mixed funds	904
19.5 Loss of the right to trace	916
19.6 Claiming: trusts and remedies	920
19.7 Defences	934
19.8 Issues with tracing	949
20 The liability of strangers to account for involvement in a breach of trust	953
20.1 Introduction	955
20.2 Dishonest assistance	961
20.3 Unconscionable receipt	1006
20.4 Defences	1023
20.5 The particular question of liability to account in corporate contexts	1024
20.6 The personal remedy in Re Diplock	1030
20.7 Questions as to the nature of the liability of strangers	1031
PART 7
Commercial uses of trusts	1035
21 Commerce, international trusts law and dealing with property	1037
21.1 Introduction	1037
21.2 Equity and commerce	1039
22 Quistclose trusts	1062
22.1 Introduction	1063
22.2 Retention of title and pledge	1064
22.3 The fundamentals of Quistclose trusts	1066
22.4 Categorising the Quistclose trust	1070
23 Mortgages, charges and taking security	1093

PART 8
Welfare uses of trusts	1095
24 Occupational pension funds	1097
25 Charities	1098
25.1 Introduction	1100
25.2 The special features of charities	1108
25.3 Factors which may negate a finding of charitable status: the need for a charitable intention, but no political purposes	1112
25.4 Relief and prevention of poverty	1117
25.5 Trusts for the advancement of education	1126
25.6 Trusts for religious purposes	1135
25.7 Other purposes beneficial to the community	1143
25.8 The new categories of charitable purpose under the Charities Act 2011	1148
25.9 Cy-près doctrine	1157
25.10 The regulation of charities	1166
25.11 A brief survey of the public benefit test in the law of charities	1167
PART 9
Equitable remedies	1169
26 Specific performance	1171
26.1 The nature of specific performance	1172
26.2 Contracts where specific performance is available	1173
26.3 Contracts where specific performance is unavailable	1175
26.4 Defences to a claim for specific performance	1179
27 Injunctions and confidences	1184
27.1 Nature of injunctions	1186
27.2 Classification of injunctions	1191
27.3 Interim injunctions	1192
27.4 Freezing injunctions	1195
27.5 Search orders	1198
27.6 Interaction with the common law	1200
27.7 The equitable doctrine of confidence	1201
27.8 Super-injunctions and the tort of misuse of private information	1215
28 Rescission and rectification	1233
28.1 Introduction	1233
28.2 Rescission	1234
28.3 Rectification	1241

29	Doctrine of notice and undue influence	1246
29.1	The doctrine of notice	1247
29.2	Undue influence	1249
29.3	Misrepresentation and equitable wrongs	1255
29.4	Setting mortgages aside – the principle in Barclays Bank v O’Brien	1256
30	Miscellaneous equitable remedies	1275
30.1	Introduction	1275
30.2	Account	1276
30.3	Specific restitution	1278
30.4	Equitable compensation	1279
30.5	Equitable damages	1279
30.6	Compound interest	1280
30.7	Subrogation	1281
30.8	Receivers	1285
30.9	Delivery and cancellation of documents	1286
30.10	Equitable doctrines modifying existing rights	1286
30.11	Mere equities	1287
30.12	Mutual benefit and burden	1288
PART 10
	Theoretical questions relating to equity and trusts	1289
31	The nature of property in equity and trusts	1291
31.1	Questions of property as they apply to trusts	1291
31.2	Theories of property in law	1295
31.3	The distinction between equity and restitution of unjust enrichment	1304
32	Equity, chaos and social complexity	1306
32.1	Mapping the social role of equity	1306
32.2	The legal notion of conscience	1309
32.3	Social complexity	1313
32.4	Equity and chaos	1315
32.5	Equity, culture and politics	1318
32.6	The goals of equity	1321
32.7	In conclusion	1322
	Bibliography	1324
	Index	1338

Glossary

Equity and trusts law is a language. Therefore, it is important for you to understand its vocabulary. This is a glossary of some of the main terms which arise in the early days of an equity and trusts course, especially in the older cases, together with appropriate cross-references to the text that follows where particularly important terms are considered in some detail.

Absolute title ownership of all of the property rights, legal and equitable, in property.

Administrator the person who administers the estate of someone who died without making a will.

Beneficial interest a synonym for ‘equitable interest’.

Beneficiary as discussed in para 2.3.4, the person (or people) for whose benefit property is held on trust, such that they have the equitable interest in that property. The nature of the rights of beneficiaries is discussed in Chapter 4 in detail.

Bequest a gift made under a will.

Certainty of intention the requirement, considered in Chapter 3, that the settlor intended to create a trust, as opposed to something else. The court may infer the existence of an express trust from the circumstances: there is no obligation for the settlor to use any specific form of words nor to use writing to create a trust in all circumstances.

Certainty of objects the requirement, considered in Chapter 3, that the beneficiaries of a trust or power must be sufficiently certain.

Certainty of subject matter the requirement, considered in Chapter 3, that the property comprising the trust fund is sufficiently certain, i.e. that it must be separately identifiable from other property.

Cestui que trust a Latin synonym for ‘beneficiary’.

Chose in action a form of intangible property, such as a debt, which constitutes an item of property in itself formed of the rights and obligations created between two (or more) parties.

Constructive trust a trust created by operation of law (rather than by the conscious intention of the parties) when a person has knowledge of some factor affecting their conscience in relation to property, considered in Chapter 12.

Declaration of trust the action performed by a settlor in creating a trust. In relation to some kinds of property, there are formalities for a proper declaration of trust; see Chapter 5. In relation to most property the settlor needs only to manifest an intention to create a trust.

Deed a formal document signed and delivered as a deed (s 1 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989) required, for example, to create a valid will (s 9 of the Wills Act 1837) and to effect a valid conveyance of land (s 53 of the Law of Property Act 1925).

Devise a bequest, usually concerning land.

Equitable interest a right in property classically recognised by the courts of equity.

Equity as discussed in section 1.1 and thereafter, a system of rules developed to counter-balance the rigours of statute and common law by the Courts of Chancery so as to allow for fairness in individual cases. It is a legal technique based on ensuring the good conscience of the individual defendant.

Executor a fiduciary under a will trust. (The feminine form is ‘executrix’.)

Express trust a trust created voluntarily by a settlor such that a trustee holds property on trust for a beneficiary or beneficiaries.

Injunction an equitable remedy either requiring or precluding some action, considered in Chapter 27.

Intellectual property copyright, patent and trade marks, being forms of chose in action constituting intangible property.

Inter vivos some relation, such as a trust, taking effect while the settlor is alive. Literally, it is Latin for ‘between living people’.

Legal title the property rights acquired by a trustee which enable that trustee to manage and administer the trust fund for the benefit of the beneficiaries.

Legatee a beneficiary under a will.

Next of kin a person specified under the intestacy rules as being a deceased’s nearest relative for the purposes of distributing the estate of a person who has died intestate.

Personal property property other than land and intellectual property, such as chattels. Sometimes referred to as ‘personalty’.

Personal representative one who is appointed to administer a deceased’s estate.

Real property land; referred to as ‘real property’ because historically to acquire rights in land one had to bring a ‘real action’; technically ‘real property’ does not include leases.

Rectification an equitable remedy affecting an alteration to a contractual document to give effect to the parties’ true intentions, considered in Chapter 28.

Rescission an equitable remedy rendering void a contract, considered in Chapter 28.

Restitution either the common law process of restoring specific property to its original owner, or more generally the contested principle of effecting restitution of unjust enrichment by way, inter alia, of subtracting that enrichment from the defendant.

Resulting trust a trust arising to return an equitable interest in property automatically to its original owner where no trust has been created, or a trust arising in favour of a person who has contributed to the purchase price of property, as considered in Chapter 11.

Settlement a synonym for trust in most circumstances, with a technical meaning in relation to the law of taxation and under the now-repealed Settled Land Act 1925. Family settlements were the way in which wealthy families organised the ownership and use of property down the generations, and were often created on the marriage of family members.

Settlor one who creates an express trust.

Specific performance an equitable remedy enforcing the intention of the parties to a contract, considered in Chapter 26.

Subrogation an equitable remedy permitting a person to sue on obligations originally owed to another person where the court considers it just to do so, considered in Chapter 30.

- Testamentary taking effect after death, such as a trust, for example, coming into effect by means of a will after a person's death.
- Testator one who creates a will, a settlor of will trusts. (The feminine form is 'testatrix'.)
- Tracing the process of identifying and recovering either specific or substitute property transferred in breach of trust, prior to the imposition of an equitable remedy to recover that property or its substitute, considered in Chapter 19.
- Trust defined in full in para 2.2.1, an equitable institution arising so as to require a trustee to hold property for the benefit of a beneficiary, or beneficiaries, arising either expressly at the instigation of a settlor or being implied by a court as a resulting trust or as a constructive trust.
- Trustee a fiduciary who holds property on trust for the benefit of a beneficiary or beneficiaries.
- Unjust enrichment an alternative explanation of some equitable claims and remedies; a doctrine which achieves restitution by means of the subtraction of an unjust enrichment which the defendant has acquired at the claimant's expense.
- Vesting property transferring property rights to a person.
- Volunteer one who receives property or a benefit without giving consideration for it.
- Will an attested document which provides for the manner in which the testator's property is to be divided on death, created in accordance with statute.

Table of cases

A v A & St George Trustees Ltd [2007] 2 FLR 467	493
A and W, Re , (Minors) (Residence Order: Leave to Apply) [1992] Fam 182, CA	842
A v B (1997) (unreported) 23 May (Family Division)	819
A Trust Ltd, Re [2008] WTLR 377	479
AAH Pharmaceuticals v Birdi [2011] EWHC 1625 (Ch)	975
Abacus Trust v Barr [2003] EWHC 114 (Ch); [2003] Ch 409; [2003] 2 WLR 1362; [2003] 1 All ER 763	378, 379, 380, 382, 386, 387, 388, 390
Abbey Malvern Wells v Ministry of Local Government and Planning [1951] Ch 728	1125, 1127, 1129
Abbey National v Cann [1991] 1 AC 56; [1990] 2 WLR 833	796, 1248
Abbey National v Moss [1994] 1 FLR 307	848
Abbey National v Stringer [2006] EWCA Civ 338	722, 728, 1253, 1267
Abbott v Abbott [2007] UKPC 53; [2008] 1 FLR 1451	777
Abbott v Fraser (1874) LR 6 PC	1149
Abbott Fund, Re Trusts of the [1900] 2 Ch 326	212, 511
Abbott v Richardson [2006] EWHC 1291 (Ch)	1254
Aberconway's Settlement, Re [1953] Ch 647	206
Aberdeen Railway Co v Blaikie Brothers (1854) 1 Macq 461	372, 599, 601, 621, 628, 629
Abernethy v Hutchinson (1825) 3 LJ Ch 209	1206
Abou-Rahmah and Others v Abacha and Others [2006] EWCA Civ 1492; [2007] Bus LR 220; [2007] 1 All ER (Comm) 827; [2005] EWHC 2662 (QB); [2006] 1 All ER (Comm) 247; [2006] 1 Lloyd's Rep 483	564, 962, 964, 966, 967, 972, 981, 987–90, 991, 992, 993, 998, 1020, 1069, 1082
Abrahams v Trustee in Bankruptcy of Abrahams (1999) The Times , 26 July	527
Abrahams' Will Trusts, Re [1969] 1 Ch 463	387
Adair v Shaw (1803) Sch & Lef 243	858
Adam and Company International Trustees Ltd v Theodore Goddard (2000) The Times , 17 March	350
Adams and Kensington Vestry, Re (1884) 27 Ch D 394	106–7, 108, 114, 115
Adamson v B & L Cleaning Services [1995] IRLR 193	695
Adderley v Dixon (1824) 1 Sim & St 607	1174
Adelaide Partnerships Ltd v Danison [2011] All ER (D) 01 (Mar)	996
Adlard, Re [1954] Ch 29	249
AEG Unit Trust Managers Ltd's Deed, Re [1957] Ch 415	192
Aerostar Maintenance International Ltd v Wilson [2010] EWHC 2032 (Ch)	962, 964, 998–9
Afovos, The [1980] 2 Lloyd's Rep 469	1042
AG Securities v Vaughan [1990] 1 AC 417	539
Agip (Africa) v Jackson [1990] Ch 265; [1991] Ch 547	427, 645, 892, 896, 897, 902–3, 954, 959, 962, 966, 1007, 1013, 1029
Agricultural Mortgage Corporation plc v Woodward [1995] 1 BCLC 1; [1994] BCC 692; (1995) 70 P & CR 53	196, 538

Ahmed & Co, Re [2006] EWHC 480 (Ch)	95
Ahmed v Kendrick (1988) 56 P & CR 120	827, 847, 848
Air Jamaica Ltd v Charlton [1999] 1 WLR 1399, PC	236, 500, 513
Akhtar v Arif [2006] EWHC 2726 (Ch)	756
Al Khudairi v Abbey Brokers Ltd [2010] EWHC 1486 (Ch); [2010] PNLR 32	962, 966, 967
Albert (Prince) v Strange (1849) 41 ER 1171	1202–5, 1213, 1216, 1229
Aldrich v Cooper (1803) 8 Ves 382	1283
Alexander v Alexander (1755) 2 Ves Sen 640	496
Ali v Al-Basri [2004] EWHC 2608	1022
Ali & Fahd v Moneim [1989] 2 All ER 404	1196
Allan v Rea Bros Trustees Ltd [2002] EWCA Civ 85; (2002) 4 ITELR 627	909, 926
Allcard v Skinner (1887) 36 Ch D 145	1251, 1253, 1254, 1262
Allen, Re [1953] Ch 810	157, 162, 165, 166, 172, 173
Allen, Re [1968] Ch 126; [1967] 3 All ER 15	153
Allen v Distillers Co (Biochemicals) Ltd [1974] QB 384	63, 485
Allen v Hyatt (1914) 30 TLR 444	613
Alliance and Leicester plc v Slayford (2000) The Times , 19 December	1273
Allied Business and Financial Consultants Ltd, Re [2009] 2 BCLC 666	621
Allied Carpets Group plc v Nethercott [2001] BCC 81	553
Allied Irish Bank v Byrne [1995] 1 FCR 430	1272
Alsop Wilkinson v Neary [1995] 1 All ER 431	403
Aluminium Industrie Vaassen BV v Romalpa Aluminium Ltd [1976] 1 WLR 676	517, 1064, 1072, 1078
Amalgamated Investments & Property Co Ltd (In Liquidation) v Texas Commerce International Bank Ltd [1982] 1 QB 84	652–5, 659, 661, 683
American Cyanamid v Ethicon Ltd [1975] AC 396; [1975] 1 All ER 502, HL	1193, 1194, 1308
American Leaf Blending Co Sdn Bhd v Director General of Inland Revenue [1979] AC 676	456, 457
Ames' Settlement, Re [1964] Ch 217	510, 511
Ammala v Sarimaa (1993) 17 Fam LR 529	792
AMP v Barker [2001] PLR 77	387
Andrews v Ramsay & Co [1903] 2 KB 635, DC	579
Andrew's Trust, Re [1905] 2 Ch 48	212
Androma Pty Ltd, Re [1987] 2 Qd R 134	248, 274
Anfield (UK) Ltd v Bank of Scotland plc [2010] EWHC 2374; [2011] 1 WLR 2414	1282
Anglo-American Asphalt Co v Crowley Russell & Co [1945] 2 All ER 324	1277
Anker-Peterson v Anker-Peterson (1991) LS Gaz 32	454
Annabel's (Berkley Square) Ltd v Revenue and Customs Commissioners [2009] EWCA Civ 361; [2009] 4 All ER 55	100–1, 1070
Anson v Anson [1953] 1 QB 636	528
Anstis, Re ; Morgan v Chetwynd (1886) 31 Ch D 596	33, 249
Ansys Inc v Lim [2001] ECDR 34	572
Anthony v Donges [1998] 2 FLR 775	117
Anton Piller KG v Manufacturing Processes Ltd [1976] Ch 55	1196, 1198, 1199
Apax Global Payment and Technologies Ltd v Morina [2011] All ER (D) 185 v Jun)	962
Applicant No 11949/86 v United Kingdom (1988) 10 EHRR 149	838
Archer-Shee v Garland [1931] AC 212	184
Argyll (Duchess of) v Duke of Argyll [1967] Ch 302	1203, 1207, 1208, 1210
Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241; [1997] 2 All ER 705	90, 341, 343, 356, 362, 364, 403, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 432, 437, 438, 464, 618, 689, 856, 881, 882, 1000, 1046, 1047, 1049
Armory v Delamire (1723) 1 Str 505	1281
Armstrong DLW GmbH v Winnington Networks Ltd [2012] 3 WLR 835	590, 1022
Artistic Upholstery Ltd v Art Forma (Furniture) Ltd [1999] 4 All ER 277	227, 235
Arun DC v First Secretary of State [2007] 1 WLR 523	1312
Ashburn Anstalt v Arnold [1989] 1 Ch 1; [1988] 2 WLR 706	553, 681

Ashby v Blackwell (1765) Eden 299	366, 857
Ashby v Kilduff [2010] EWHC 2034 (Ch)	674
Ashe v Mumford (2000) The Times , 15 November	733
Assicurazioni Generali SPA v Arab Insurance Group: Practice Note [2003] 1 WLR 577	824
Associated Alloys Pty v CAN (2000) 71 Aus LR 568	118
Astor's Settlement Trusts, Re [1952] Ch 532; [1952] 1 All ER 1069	198, 201, 205
Atkinson v Burt (1989) 12 Fam LR 800	792
Attenborough v Solomon [1913] AC 76	72
Attorney-General v Alford (1885) 4 D & GM 843	1281
Attorney-General v Blake (Jonathan Cape Ltd third party) [2001] AC 268; [2000] 4 All ER 385, HL; affirming on other grounds [1998] 1 All ER 833, CA; reversing [1997] Ch 84, Ch D	577, 688, 691, 1278
Attorney-General v Bunce (1868) LR 6 Eq 563	1141
Attorney-General (City of London v 1790) 3 Bro CC 121	1162
Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Humphrey's Estate (Queen's Gardens) Ltd [1987] 1 AC 114, PC	659, 682
Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324; [1994] 1 All ER 1; [1993] 3 WLR 1143	7, 28, 50, 368, 547, 548, 549, 550, 570, 572–5, 576, 577, 578, 579, 581, 582, 583, 585, 586, 589, 590, 591, 596, 597, 602, 610, 611, 625, 647, 688, 690, 691, 693, 796, 855, 866, 893, 924, 925, 949, 951, 952, 1276
Attorney-General for the Bahamas v Royal Trust Co [1986] 1 WLR 1001	1113, 1147
Attorney-General for the Cayman Islands v Wahr-Hansen [2000] 3 All ER 642, HL	1156
Attorney-General for Zambia v Meer Care & Desai & Others [2007] EWHC 952 (Ch); [2008] EWCA Civ 1007	962, 964, 972, 991, 994–5
Attorney-General v Glegg (1738) 1 Atk 356	353
Attorney-General v Guardian Newspapers Ltd (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109	688, 1214, 1224
Attorney-General v Ironmongers' Co (1834) 2 My & K 526	1160
Attorney-General v Leicester Corp (1844) 7 Beav 176; (1844) 49 ER 1031	963
Attorney-General v National Provincial and Union Bank of England [1924] AC 262	1113
Attorney-General v Price (1810) 17 Ves 371	1125
Attorney-General v Ross [1986] 1 WLR 252; [1985] 3 All ER 334	1116, 1129
Attorney-General v Shrewsbury Corp (1843) 6 Beav 220	1146
Attorney-General v Wilson (1840) Cr & Ph 1	864
Attorney-General's Reference (No 1 of 1985) [1986] QB 491	591
Australian Elizabethan Theatre Trust, Re (1991) 102 ALR 681	1075
Avis v Turner [2007] EWCA Civ 748; [2008] Ch 218; [2007] 4 All ER 1103; [2008] 2 WLR 1, CA	824
Avon County Council v Howlett [1983] 1 WLR 605	684, 944, 945
Ayerst v Jenkins (1873) LR 16 Eq 275	530, 532
Aylesford (Earl of) v Morris (1873) 87 Cr App 484	1286
Azam v Iqbal [2007] EWHC 2025; [2008] Bus LR 168	103
B, Re (Child: Property Transfer) [1999] 2 FLR 418	740
B v B (Ancillary Relief) [2010] 2 FLR 887	493
Bacon v Camphausen (1888) 58 LT 851	864
Baden (No 2), Re [1973] Ch 9	88, 157, 164, 167, 173, 176, 177
Baden v Société Générale pour Favoriser le Développement du Commerce et de l'Industrie en France SA [1992] 4 All ER 161; [1993] 1 WLR 509	548, 1011, 1013, 1014, 1017, 1023
Bahin v Hughes (1886) 31 Ch D 390	862
Baillie, Re (1886) 2 TLR 660	323
Bainbrigge v Browne (1881) 18 Ch D 188	1253
Baird v Baird [1990] 2 AC 548; [1990] 2 All ER 300	282
Baird Textiles Holdings Ltd v Marks & Spencer plc [2002] 1 All ER (Comm) 737	407
Baird v Queens Moat Houses (2001) (unreported) 17 May	867
Baker v Archer-Shee [1927] AC 844	68, 69, 192

Baker v Baker (1993) 25 HLR 408	326, 334, 659, 660, 670, 671, 673, 681, 703, 751, 846, 1279
Baker v Baker [2008] 2 FLR 767	641
Baker v JE Clark & Co (Transport) UK Ltd [2006] EWCA Civ 464	413
Baker v Willoughby [1970] AC 467	864
Balkanbank v Taher [1994] 4 All ER 239	1197
Balkin v Peck (1998) 1 ITLER 717	353
Ball v Storie (1823) 1 Sim & St 210	1243
Balston v Headline Filters Ltd [1990] FSR 385	615, 625
Banco Exterior Internacional v Mann [1995] 1 All ER 936	1247, 1256, 1266, 1267, 1270
Banfield, Re [1968] 2 All ER 276	1142
Bank Mellī Iran v Samādī-rad [1993] 2 FLR 367	1272
Bank of America v Arnell [1999] Lloyd's Rep Bank 399	1019
Bank of Boroda v Rayarel [1995] 2 FLR 376	1266
Bank of Credit and Commerce International (BCCI) v Aboody [1990] QB 923; [1992] 4 All ER 955, CA	1250, 1251, 1258, 1262
Bank of Credit and Commerce International (BCCI) v Akindele [2000] 3 WLR 1423; [2001] Ch 437	797, 937, 954, 956, 1009, 1010, 1012, 1020, 1022
Bank of Credit and Commerce International (BCCI) v Ali [2000] 3 All ER 51	420, 617, 624, 881
Bank of Credit and Commerce International (BCCI) (No. 8), Re ; Morris v Rayner Enterprises Inc, Bank of Credit and Commerce International SA (No. 8) [1995] Ch 46; [1998] AC 214; [1997] 4 All ER 568, HL	124, 132, 196, 930
Bank of Credit and Commerce International (BCCI) (No. 9), Re [1994] 3 All ER 764	1196, 1198
Bank of Cyprus v Markou [1999] 2 All ER 707	1272
Bank of Ireland Home Mortgages Ltd v Bell [2001] 2 All ER (Comm) 920	825
Bank of Ireland v Pexxnet Ltd [2010] EWHC 1872	592
Bank of New Zealand v New Zealand Guardian Trust Co Ltd [1999] 1 NZLR 664; [2000] 2 LRC 357	404, 858
Bank of Scotland v A Ltd [2001] 3 All ER 58; [2001] All ER (D) 81; (2001) The Times , 6 February	1015, 1028, 1195
Bank of Scotland v Bennett [1997] 1 FLR 801	1262, 1263
Bank of Tokyo-Mitsubishi Ltd v Baskan Gida [2004] EWHC 945 (Ch); [2004] 2 Lloyd's Rep 395	1008, 1013
Bank Tejarat v Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation (CI) Ltd [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep 239	896
Bankers Trust Co v Namdar [1997] EGCS 20	819, 820
Bankers Trust Co v Shapira [1980] 1 WLR 1274	590, 903
Bankers Trust v Dharmala [1996] CLC 252	437
Banks v Sutton (1732) 2 P Wms 700	32
Banner Homes Group plc v Luff Development Ltd [2000] Ch 372; [2000] 2 WLR 772	559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 635
Bannerman v White (1861) 10 CB 844	1236
Bannister v Bannister [1948] 2 All ER 133; [1948] WN 261	252, 592, 707
Banque Belge pour l'Étranger v Hambrouck [1921] 1 KB 321	591, 896
Banque Financière de la Cité v Parc (Battersea) Limited [1999] 1 AC 221; [1998] 1 All ER 737	1281–3
Barbados Trust Co Ltd v Bank of Zambia [2006] EWHC 222 (Comm); [2006] 1 Lloyd's Rep 723	129
Barca v Mears [2004] All ER (D) 153	825
Barclays Bank v Boulter [1999] 1 WLR 1919, HL	1264
Barclays Bank v Coleman [2000] 1 All ER 385; [2001] 1 QB 20	1247, 1256, 1263
Barclays Bank v Eustice [1995] 1 WLR 1238	196
Barclays Bank v Hendricks [1996] 1 FLR 258	819, 820
Barclays Bank v Khaira [1993] 1 FLR 343	721
Barclays Bank v O'Brien [1994] 1 AC 180; [1993] 3 WLR 786, HL; [1993] 4 All ER 417, CA 36	597, 741, 834, 847, 849, 1180, 1237, 1246–50, 1252, 1253, 1255–67, 1273, 1274

Barclays Bank v Quistclose Investments Ltd [1970] AC 567; [1968] 3 All ER 655; [1968] 3 WLR 1097, HL; affirming Quistclose Investments v Rolls Razor Ltd (In Liquidation) [1968] Ch 538; [1968] 2 WLR 477, CA; reversing [1967] Ch 910; [1967] 1 All ER 862, Ch D	329, 502–4, 508, 514–17, 1062–4, 1066–92
Barclays Bank v Rivett [1999] 1 FLR 730	1260
Barclays Bank v Simms [1980] QB 677	916
Barclays Bank v Thomson [1997] 4 All ER 816	847, 1270
Barclays Bank v Zaroovabli [1997] Ch 321	664
Barclays Mercantile Business Finance Ltd v Mawson [2004] UKHL 51; [2005] 1 AC 684; [2005] 1 All ER 97	69, 111, 1112
Barker, Re (1898) 77 LT 712	883
Barlow, Re [1979] 1 WLR 278	153–4, 157, 162, 164, 165, 166, 169, 176, 177, 1165
Barlow Clowes International Ltd (in liquidation) and Others v Vaughan and Others [1992] 4 All ER 22; [1992] BCLC 910	237, 427, 889, 892, 895, 913, 914, 915, 1249
Barlow Clowes International Ltd (in liquidation) v Eurotrust International Ltd [2005] UKPC 37; [2006] 1 WLR 1476; [2006] 1 All ER 333	645, 962, 964, 966, 973, 981–2, 983, 984–5, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 993, 995, 998, 999, 1001
Barlow's Will Trusts, Re [1979] 1 WLR 278	40
Barnes v Addy (1874) 9 Ch App 244	50, 58, 643, 955, 963, 965, 968, 981, 1014, 1034, 1041
Barnett v Semenyuk [2008] 2 P&CR DG 18	541
Barney, Re [1892] 2 Ch 265	555, 643
Baron Investments (Holdings) Ltd (In Liquidation) [2000] 1 BCLC 272	407
Barracrough v Mell [2005] EWHC 3387 (Ch); [2006] WTLR 203	409, 413, 883
Barrett v Barrett [2008] EWHC 1061 (Ch); [2008] BPIR 817	535, 537
Barros Mattos v MacDaniels Ltd [2004] 3 All ER 299; [2004] EWHC 1188 (Ch)	937, 938, 1024
Barrowcliff, Re [1927] SASR 147	589
Bartlett v Barclays Bank Trust Co Ltd [1980] Ch 515; [1980] 1 All ER 139	361, 365, 446, 449, 451, 467, 468, 469, 858, 876
Bartlett & Others v Barclays Bank Trust Co Ltd (No 2) [1980] 2 All ER 92; [1980] Ch 513, Ch D	872
Barton's Trusts, Re (1868) LR 5 Eq 238	358, 361
Basham (Deceased), Re [1987] 1 All ER 405; [1986] 1 WLR 1498	251, 268, 298, 326, 334, 656–8, 660–2, 664, 667–70, 679, 703, 745, 747, 748, 750, 757, 846
Bateman's Will Trusts, Re [1970] 1 WLR 1463	310, 313
Bates (Thomas) & Sons Ltd v Wyndham's (Lingerie) Ltd [1981] 1 WLR 503; [1981] 1 All ER 1079, CA	667, 1243
Bath and Wells Diocesan Board of Finance v Jenkinson (2000) The Times , 6 September	1158
Bathurst (Countess) v Kleinwort Benson (Channel Islands) Trustees Ltd [2007] WTLR 959, Royal Court of Guernsey	402
Baumgartner v Baumgartner [1988] Conv 259; (1988) 62 ALJR 29; (1987) 164 CLR 137	791, 792
Bawden v Bawden [1997] EWCA Civ 2664	660
Bax, Ex p (1751) 2 Ves Sen 388	1277
Baxendale v Bennet (1878) 3 QBD 578	652
Baybut v Eccle Riggs Country Park Ltd [2006] All ER (D) 161	553
Baynes Clarke v Corless [2009] EWHC 1636 (Ch)	562–3
Beale v Trinkler [2008] NSWSC 347; 11 ITEL 53	628
Beatty v London Spiritualistic Alliance Ltd [1923] All ER Rep 49	1133
Beaumont v Olivier (1864) 4 Ch App 309	1130
Beckenham MC Ltd v Centrallex Ltd [2004] 2 BCLC 764; [2004] BPIR 1112	541
Beddoe, In Re [1893] 1 Ch 547	402, 931

Bedson v Bedson [1965] 2 QB 666	742
Bell v Bell (1995) 19 Fam LR 690	792
Bell v Lever Bros [1932] AC 161	1237, 1238
Bellamy and Metropolitan Board of Works, Re (1883) 24 Ch D 387	353
Bell's Indenture, Re [1980] 1 WLR 1217	643, 980
Belmont Finance Corporation v Williams Furniture Ltd and Others (No 2) [1980] 1 All ER 393	594, 1010, 1020
Belmont Park Investments Pty Ltd v BNY Corporate Trustee Services Ltd [2011] UKSC 38; [2011] 3 WLR 521	106, 132, 196, 918
Beloved Wilkes Charity, Re (1851) 3 Mac & G 440	400, 422, 1048
Ben Hashem v Al Shayif [2009] 1 FLR 115	492, 493
Beningfield v Baxter (1886) 12 App Cas 167	1253
Benjamin, Re [1902] 1 Ch 723	174, 175, 366
Bennet v Bennet (1879) 10 Ch D 474	500, 506, 517, 519, 520, 696
Bennett, Ex p (1805) 10 Ves 381	371
Bennett, Re [1896] 1 Ch 778	352, 364
Bennett, Re [1960] 2 AC 310	1113
Berens, Re [1888] WN 95	422
Berkley v Earl Poulett (1977) 242 EG 39	632, 634
Berkley v Hardy (1826) 5 B & C 355	72
Bernard v Josephs [1982] Ch 391	731, 733, 739, 742, 797, 814
Bernstein, Re [1925] Ch 12	931
Berryland Books Ltd v BK Books Ltd [2009] 2 BCLC 709	621
Best, Re [1904] 2 Ch 354	1113
Besterman's Will Trusts, Re (1980) The Times , 21 January	1128
Bestrustees v Stuart [2001] PLR 283	388
Beswick v Beswick [1968] AC 58	71, 274, 275, 1177, 1189
Betafence v Veys [2006] EWHC 999 (Ch); [2006] All ER (D) 91 (May)	389, 391
Bhander v Barclays (1997/98) 1 OFLR 497	398
Bhullar v Bhullar [2003] 2 BCLC 241; [2003] EWCA Civ 424	580, 599, 601, 603, 605
Bindra v Chopra [2008] EWHC 1715	710, 765
Binions v Evans [1972] Ch 359	592
Birch v Blagrove (1755) Amb 264	544
Birch v Curtis [2002] 2 FLR 847	638, 641
Birch v Treasury Solicitor [1951] Ch 298	265
Birmingham and District Land Co v L & NW Railway (1888) 40 Ch D 268	682
Birmingham Midshires Mortgage Services Ltd v Sabherwal (2000) 80 P & CR 256	675, 1288
Birmingham v Renfrew (1937) 57 CLR 666	639, 641, 642
Biscoe v Jackson (1887) 35 Ch D 460	1122, 1158–9
Bishop, Re [1965] Ch 450	527
Bishopsgate Investment Management v Homan [1995] 1 WLR 31, HL; [1994] 3 WLR 1270; [1995] Ch 211; [1995] 1 All ER 347, CA.	427, 590, 903, 917, 932, 1301
Bishopsgate v Maxwell [1993] Ch 1	951
Biss, Re [1903] 2 Ch 40	369, 370, 599
BJ v MJ (Financial Remedy: Overseas Trust) [2011] EWHC 2708 (Fam)	492
Black v Davies [2004] EWHC 1464 (QB)	1281
Black v S Freedman & Co (1910) 12 CLR 105	590
Blacklocks v JB Developments (Godalming) Ltd [1982] Ch 183	543, 1288
Blackwell v Blackwell [1929] AC 318	4, 34, 301, 306, 312, 313, 315, 324, 325
Blair v Duncan [1902] AC 37	1113
Blair v Vallyly [2000] WTLR 615	600
Blake, Re (1885) 29 Ch D 913	422
Blothway v Baron Cawley [1976] AC 397	168, 172
Blausten v IRC [1972] Ch 256	171, 172
Blue Sky One Ltd v Blue Airways LLC [2009] EWHC 3314 (Comm)	502
Bluestone Chemicals Ltd (In Liquidation) [1999] 4 All ER 684	278, 1042

Blyth v Fladgate [1891] 1 Ch 337.....	643, 864
BNY Corporate Trustee Services Ltd v Euroisail-UK 2007–3BL [2011] 1 WLR 2524.....	195
Boardman v Mosman (1799) 1 Bro CC 68.....	348, 863
Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46; [1966] 3 All ER 721; [1966] 3 WLR 1009, HL.....	14, 45, 50, 56, 276, 367, 368, 369, 371, 376, 405, 444, 548, 550, 564, 574, 576, 578, 579, 583, 591, 599, 600–1, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610–11, 612, 617, 618, 619, 621, 623, 624, 625, 627, 643, 647, 687, 690, 691, 855, 871, 1025, 1048, 1202, 1211, 1276–8
Bogg v Raper (1998) The Times , 22 April; (1998/99) 1 ITEL 267....	408, 410, 412, 415, 419, 881
Bolkiah (Prince Jefri) v KPMG [1999] 2 AC 222; [1999] 1 All ER 517.....	367, 369, 376, 405, 406, 407, 628, 688, 1211
Bond Worth Ltd, Re [1980] Ch 228.....	931
Bonham v Blake Laphorn Linell [2006] EWHC 2513 (Ch); [2007] WTLR 189.....	403
Boodle Hatfield & Co v British Films Ltd [1986] PCC 176.....	1284
Booth v Beresford (1993) 17 Fam LR 147.....	792
Booth v Booth (1838) 1 Beav 125.....	880
Boots the Chemist Ltd v Street [1983] EGD 251.....	1287
Boscawen v Bajwa [1996] 1 WLR 328; [1995] 4 All ER 769.....	57, 427, 865, 888, 889, 893, 894, 895, 900–1, 916, 920, 931, 950, 1076, 1282–4
Boston Deep Sea Fishing Co Ltd v Ansell (1888) 39 Ch D 339.....	579, 627, 695
Bouch, Re (1885) 29 Ch D 635.....	360
Boulting v Association of Cinematograph, Television and Allied Technicians [1963] 2 QB 606.....	374
Bourne v Keane [1919] AC 815.....	213, 214
Boustany v Pigott (1995) 95 P & CR 298.....	597
Bowden, Re [1936] Ch 71.....	249
Bowes, Re [1896] 1 Ch 507.....	184, 206, 212, 819
Bowles v Rogers (1800) 31 ER 957.....	930
Bowman v Secular Society Ltd [1917] AC 406.....	49, 57, 64, 180, 181, 197, 198, 207, 219, 1115
Box, Brown & Jacobs v Barclays Bank [1998] Lloyds Rep Bank 185.....	568, 591, 594, 595, 916
Boyce v Boyce (1849) 16 Sim 476.....	125
Boyes, Re (1884) 26 Ch D 531.....	309–11
Bracken Partners Ltd v Gutteridge [2004] 1 BCLC 377.....	894, 897
Bradberry, Re [1943] Ch 35.....	31
Bradbury, Re ; Re Robinson [1951] Ch 198.....	1121
Braithwaite v Attorney-General [1909] 1 Ch 510.....	513
Brandon v Robinson (1811) 18 Ves 429.....	186, 194
Brauch, Re [1978] 1 Ch 316.....	456
Bray v Ford [1896] AC 44.....	368–9, 574, 598–9, 601, 604, 606
Brazil (Federal Republic of) and the Municipality of Sao Paulo v Durant International Corporation and Kildare Finance Limited [2012] JRC 211.....	586
Brazzill v Willoughby [2009] EWHC 1633 (Ch); [2010] 1 BCLC 673.....	101, 103, 863
Breadner v Granville-Grossman [2001] Ch 523; [2000] 4 All ER 705; [2006] WTLR 411.....	55, 73, 151, 380, 403, 423
Breakspear v Ackland [2008] 3 WLR 698.....	402, 1212
Breen v Williams (1996) 70 ALJR 772.....	695
Bremner, Re [1999] 1 FLR 912.....	822, 823
Brice v Stokes (1805) 11 Ves 319.....	348, 361, 863, 880
Bridgman v Green (1755) 24 Beav 382.....	569
Brightlingsea Haven Ltd v Morris [2008] EWHC 1928 (QB).....	677
Brikom Investments Ltd v Carr [1979] QB 467.....	682
Brinks Ltd (Formerly Brinks Mat Ltd) v Abu Saleh and Others (No 3) [1999] CLC 133.....	576, 962, 978–9, 987
Brinnand v Ewens [1987] 2 EGLR 67.....	681

Bristol and West Building Society v Henning [1985] 1 WLR 778.....	1248, 1249
Bristol and West Building Society v Mothew [1998] Ch 1; [1996] 4 All ER 698	45, 56, 375, 404, 595, 688, 867, 869, 873
Britannia Building Society v Pugh [1997] 2 FLR 7	1262
British Coal Corp v British Coal Staff Superannuation Scheme Trustees Ltd [1993] PLR 303.....	370, 371
British Eagle International Airlines Ltd v Cie Nationale Air France [1975] 1 WLR 758	918
British Midland Tool Ltd v Midland International Tooling Ltd [2003] 2 BCLC 523	615
British School of Egyptian Archaeology, Re [1954] 1 All ER 887.....	1130
Brockbank, Re [1948] 1 All ER 287	421
Brogden, Re (1886) 38 Ch D 546	860, 877
Bromage v Genning (1617) 1 Rolle 368; (1617) 81 ER 538	29
Brooke Bond & Co Ltd's Trust Deed, Re [1963] Ch 357	370
Brooking v Maudslay, Son & Field (1888) 38 Ch D 636	1244
Brooks v Brooks [1996] 1 AC 375	495
Brooks' Settlement Trusts: Lloyds Bank Ltd v Tillard, Re [1939] 1 Ch 993; [1939] 3 All ER 920	58, 59, 64, 73, 128, 170, 190, 241, 247–9, 254, 265, 269–71, 275, 276, 279, 280, 287, 293, 298, 421, 504, 505
Broome v Monck (1805) 10 Ves 597; 32 ER 976	632
Brown, Re [1954] Ch 39	192, 194
Brown v Bennett [1999] 1 BCLC 649; [1999] BCC 525	962, 966, 1025
Brown v Brown (1993) 31 NSWLR 582	520
Brown v Gould [1972] Ch 53	165
Brown v IRC [1965] AC 244	369, 687
Brown & Root Technology v Sun Alliance and London Assurance Co [1996] Ch 51.....	260
Browne of Madingley (Lord) v Associated Newspapers Ltd [2008] QB 103; [2007] EWCA Civ 295	1227, 1228
Brunswick (Duke of) v King of Hanover (1848) 2 HLC 1	33
Bruton v Quadrant Housing Trust [2000] 1 AC 406.....	849
Bryant v Hickley [1894] 1 Ch 324	476
Bryant v Law Society [2009] 1 WLR 163	1001
Brydges v Branfill (1842) 12 Sim 369	980
Bryson v Bryant (1992) 29 NSWLR 188	792
Buckley v Gross (1863) 3 B & S 566	899
Buckley v United Kingdom (1997) 23 EHRR 101.....	838
Bucks Constabulary Widows' and Orphans' Fund Friendly Society, Re ; Thompson v Holdsworth [1978] 1 WLR 641; [1978] 2 All ER 571, Ch D.....	235, 236, 239, 512, 513
Bucks Constabulary Widows' and Orphans' Fund Friendly Society (No 2), Re ; Thompson v Holdsworth [1979] 1 WLR 936; [1979] 1 All ER 623, Ch D	235, 236, 238, 239, 512, 513
Buckton, Re [1907] 2 Ch 406	422
Budgett, Re [1894] 2 Ch 557	1277
Buggs v Buggs [2003] EWHC 1538 (Ch)	725
Bull v Bull [1955] 1 QB 234	731, 813, 814
Bullock v Bullock (1886) 56 LJ Ch 221	361
Bunting v Sargent (1879) 13 Ch D 330	1141
Burdick v Garrick (1870) LR 5 Ch App 233	1281
Burgess v Burgess [1996] 2 FLR 34.....	1199
Burgess v Rawnsley [1975] Ch 429	827
Burnand v Rodocanachi (1882) 7 App Cas 333	1282, 1283
Burns v Burns [1984] Ch 317; [1984] 1 All ER 244	525, 668, 705, 715, 727, 742, 794
Burrell v Burrell [2005] EWHC 245; [2005] All ER (D) 351	380, 381, 382, 386, 388
Burrell v Burrell's Trustee 1915 SC 333.....	373, 629
Burrough v Philcox (1840) 5 My & Cr 72	73
Burroughs-Fowler, Re [1916] 2 Ch 251	193

Burrows and Burrows v Sharpe (1991) 23 HLR 82	671, 681
Burrows v Walls (1855) 5 De GM & G 233	403
Bursill v Tanner (1885) 16 QBD 1	398
Burston Finance Ltd v Speirway Ltd [1974] 3 All ER 735; [1974] 1 WLR 1648	1284
Burton v Gray (1873) 8 Ch App 932	1244
Burton's Settlements, Re [1955] Ch 82	170, 249
Busch v Truitt (1945) LA No 19256, 27 November	122
Butler v Butler (1875) 5 Ch D 554; affirmed on appeal (1877) 7 Ch D 116, CA	864
Butler v Croft (1973) 27 P & CR 1	1240
Butler Machine Tool Co Ltd v Ex-Cell-O Corporation (England) Ltd [1979] 1 WLR 401	70
Butlin's Settlement Trusts, Re [1976] 1 Ch 251	98, 144, 348, 862, 1243, 1244
Butterworth, Re ; ex p Russell (1882) 19 Ch D 588	196, 538, 539
Button v Phelps [2006] EWHC 53 (Ch)	559, 561, 606
Buxton v Buxton (1835) 1 My & Cr 80	355, 357
Byford v Butler [2003] EWHC 1267 (Ch); [2004] 2 FCR 454; [2004] 1 FLR 56	733
Byrnes and another v Kendle [2011] HCA 26, 14 ITELR 299	92
C v C [2004] EWHC 742 (Fam); [2004] Fam 141	492
Cabburn, Re (1882) 46 LT 848	422
Cade (JE) & Son, Re [1992] BCLC 213	1059
Cadogan Petroleum plc v Tolly [2011] EWHC 2286	581, 582
Caerphilly Colliery Co, Re ; Pearson's Case (1877) 5 Ch D 336	574
Caffrey v Darby (1801) 6 Ves 487; [1775–1802] All ER Rep 505	865, 867, 872
Calkin v IRC [1984] 1 NZLR 1	457
Calloway, Re [1956] Ch 559	588
Caltex Singapore Pte v BP Shipping Ltd [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep 286	836
Calverley v Green (1984) 155 CLR 242	525, 713, 791
Cambridge Nutrition Ltd v British Broadcasting Association [1990] 3 All ER 523	1194
Cameron, Re [1999] 3 WLR 394	519
Campbell Discount Co Ltd v Bridge [1961] 1 QB 445	697
Campbell v Griffin [2001] EWCA Civ 990; [2001] WTLR 981	669, 670, 673, 678
Campbell v MGN [2004] UKHL 22; [2004] 2 AC 457; [2004] 2 All ER 995	42, 1212, 1214, 1215, 1219, 1221, 1223–8
Campbell v Walker (1800) 5 Ves 678	371, 373
Campden Hill Ltd (Chakrani) [2005] EWHC 911 (Ch)	918, 938
Canada and Dominion Sugar Company Limited v Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Ltd [1947] AC 46	652
Canadian Aero Service Ltd v O'Malley (1973) 40 DLR (3d) 371	612, 688
Cannon v Hartley [1949] Ch 213	242, 270, 272–4, 279, 1175, 1176, 1179
Canson Enterprises Ltd v Boughton & Co (1991) 85 DLR (4th) 129	881
Canterbury v Spence (1972) 464 F 2d 772	695
Cantrave Ltd v Lloyds Bank [2000] 4 All ER 473	1285
Caring Together Ltd v in liquidation) v Bauso [2006] EWHC 2345 (Ch)	1004
Carlton v Goodman [2002] 2 FLR 259	728
Carlton v Halestrap (1988) 4 BCC 538	620
Carr v Bower Cotton [2002] EWCA Civ 1788	962
Carreras Rothmans Ltd v Freeman Mathews Treasure Ltd [1985] 1 Ch 207; [1985] 1 All ER 155	504, 516, 930, 1076, 1089
Carr-Glyn v Frearsons [1999] Ch 326	874
Carter v Wake (1877) 4 Ch D 605	1065
Carvel (Thomas and Agnes) Foundation v Carvel [2007] EWHC 1314 (Ch); [2007] 4 All ER 81	639
Carver v Duncan [1985] AC 1082	353, 364
Carville v Westbury (1990) 102 Fed LR 223	792
Castanho v Brown & Root (UK) Ltd [1981] AC 557	1197
Castellain v Preston (1883) 11 QBD 380	1282

Castle Phillips Finance v Piddington (1995) 70 P & CR 592	1247, 1256, 1272, 1273
Caswell v Putnam (120 NY 154)	122, 125
Catholic Care v Charity Commission [2010] 4 All ER 1041	1159
Cattley v Pollard [2006] EWHC 3130 (Ch)	966
Counce v Counce [1969] 1 WLR 286	76, 518, 714
Cavendish Browne, Re [1916] WN 341	250
Cawdor (Lord) v Lewis (1835) 1 Y & C Ex 427	670, 682
CDE v MGN Ltd [2010] EWHC 3308 (QB)	1226
Celsteel Ltd v Alton House Holdings Ltd [1986] 1 WLR 512	1192
Celtic Extraction Ltd (In Liquidation), Re ; Re Bluestone Chemicals (In Liquidation) [1999] 4 All ER 684; [2000] 2 WLR 991	129, 278, 1022, 1042
Central London Property Trust Ltd v High Trees House Ltd [1947] KB 130	275, 682
Central Newbury Car Auctions Ltd v Unity Finance Ltd [1957] 1 QB 371	683
Chalmer v Bradley (1819) 1 J & W 51	374, 629
Chan v Zacharia (1984) 154 CLR 178	367, 605
Chang v Registrar of Titles (1976) 137 CLR 177	633, 635
Channel Tunnel Group Ltd v Balfour Beatty Construction Ltd [1993] AC 334	1197
Chapman, Re , Cocks v Chapman [1896] 2 Ch 763; [1895–9] All ER Rep 1104; (1895) 72 LT 66	411, 423
Chapman v Browne (1801) 6 Ves 404	468
Chapman v Browne [1902] 1 Ch 785	882
Chapman v Chapman [1954] AC 429; [1954] 2 WLR 723	294, 474, 485
Chapman's Settlement Trusts (No 2), Re [1959] 1 WLR 372	490
Charge Card Services Ltd, Re [1987] Ch 150; [1989] Ch 497 CA	930
Charitable Corporation v Sutton (1742) 2 Atk 400	864
Charles v Federal Commissioner of Taxation (1954) 90 CLR 598	191
Charman v Charman (No 1) [2005] EWCA Civ 1606; [2006] 2 FLR 422, CA	493, 1051
Charman v Charman (No 4) [2007] EWCA Civ 501; [2007] 1 FLR 1250, CA	492, 493
Charter plc and another (City Index Ltd [2006] EWHC 2508 (Ch); [2007] 1 WLR 26; [2008] 2 WLR 950	564, 954, 956, 1007, 1008, 1011, 1020, 1021, 1022
Charter v Trevelyan (1844) 11 Cl & F 714	1241
Chase Manhattan Bank NA v Israel-British Bank (London) Ltd [1981] 1 Ch 105; [1980] 2 WLR 202; [1979] 3 All ER 1025	50, 427, 543, 555, 556, 558, 568, 915, 927, 1308
Chattock v Miller (1878) 8 Ch D 177	561, 564
Chaudhary v Yavuz [2011] EWCA Civ 1314	252
Cheese v Thomas [1994] 1 WLR 129	1262
Cheltenham and Gloucester plc v Appleyard [2004] EWCA Civ 291	1282, 1283
Cherney v Newman [2011] EWHC 2156 (Ch)	859
Chess (Oscar) v Williams [1957] 1 WLR 370	1237
Chhokar v Chhokar [1984] FLR 313	742
Chichester Diocesan Board of Finance v Simpson [1944] AC 341, HL	510, 511, 901, 1113, 1160
Childers v Childers (1857) 1 De G & J 482	544
Chillingworth v Chambers [1896] 1 Ch 685	884
Chinn v Collins [1981] AC 533; [1981] 2 WLR 14	290, 296, 297, 299, 631, 637
Chirkinian v Larcom Trustees Ltd [2006] EWHC 1917; [2006] WTLR 1523	360
Choithram (T) International SA v Pagarani [2001] 1 WLR 1; [2001] 2 All ER 491	118, 260–3, 538
Christ's College, Cambridge (1757) 1 Wm Bl 90	1126
Christ's Hospital v Grainger (1849) 1 Mac & G 460	1110
Church of Scientology v Kaufman [1973] RPC 635	1137
Church of the New Faith v Commissioner of Pay-roll Tax [1982–1983] 154 CLR 120	1138
Churchill v Roach [2002] EWHC 3230; [2004] 3 FCR 744	722
Cia de Seguros Imperio v Heath (REBX) Ltd [2001] 1 WLR 112	886
CIBC v Pitt [1994] 1 AC 200; [1993] 4 All ER 433; [1993] 3 WLR 802	1247, 1253, 1256, 1257, 1259–64
CIR v Marine Steam Turbine Co Ltd [1920] 1 KB 193	457
Ciro Citterio Menswear plc (In Administration), Re [2002] 2 All ER 717	595

Citizens' Bank of Louisiana v First National Bank of New Orleans (1873) LR 6 HL 352	652
Citro, Re [1991] Ch 142	802, 803, 820, 822, 823, 825, 842
City Equitable Fire Insurance Co Ltd, Re [1925] Ch 407; [1924] All ER Rep 485; [1931] All ER Rep 484	412, 414, 469, 483
City of London Building Society v Flegg [1988] AC 54	27, 215, 710, 796, 827, 838
Claffin v Claffin 20 NE 454 (1889).	186
Clarion Ltd v National Provident Institution [2000] 2 All ER 265; [2000] 1 WLR 1888	1237, 1256
Clark Boyce v Mouat [1994] 1 AC 428	367
Clark v Cutland [2003] 4 All ER 733; [2003] EWCA Civ 810	909
Clark (Mary) Homes Trustees v Anderson [1904] 2 KB 745	1120
Clarke, Re ; Clarke v Clarke [1901] 2 Ch 110.	211
Clarke, Re [1923] 2 Ch 407	1120, 1161
Clarke v Dickson (1859) EB & E 148	1240
Clarke v Meadus [2010] EWHC 3117 (Ch)	649, 676
Clarke v Ormonde (1821) Jac 108	398
Clarkson v Davies [1923] AC 100	980
Cloughton v Charalamabous [1999] 1 FLR 740	822, 823
Clay v Clay [2001] WTLR 393.	629
Clayton v Ramsden [1943] AC 320	168, 169
Clayton's Case (1816) 1 Mer 572.	889, 892, 912, 913, 914, 915
Cleadon, Re [1939] Ch 286.	1283
Cleaver, Re [1981] 1 WLR 939.	324, 641, 642
Cleaver v Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association [1892] 1 QB 147	569, 588
Clef Aquitaine SARL v Laporte Minerals (Barrow) Ltd [2002] QB 488.	1281
Clelland v Clelland [1945] 3 DLR 664, BCCA	543
Close Invoice Finance Ltd v Abaowa [2010] EWHC 1920 (QB)	526
Clough v Bond (1838) 3 My & Cr 490; (1838) 8 LJ Ch 51; (1838) 2 Jur 958; (1838) 40 ER 1016	57, 64, 65, 353, 354, 356, 365, 404, 430, 856, 857, 865, 867, 871, 872
Clough v Lambert (1839) 10 Sim 174; (1839) 59 ER 579	250
Clough v London and North Western Railway (1871) LR 7 Ex Ch 26	1241
Clough Mill v Martin [1984] 3 All ER 982; [1985] 1 WLR 111	109–10, 115, 131, 329, 929, 1064
CMS Dolphin Ltd v Simonet [2001] 2 BCLC 704.	598, 610, 615, 622
Coates, Re [1955] Ch 495.	165, 173
Coatsworth v Johnson (1886) 54 LT 520	31
Cobbe v Yeoman's Row Management Ltd [2008] 1 WLR 1752; [2006] EWCA Civ 1139, CA; reversing in part [2005] EWHC 1755 (Ch), Ch D; affirming [2005] All ER (D) 406 (Feb), Ch D	42, 559, 561–2, 563, 566, 652, 655, 657, 663, 664, 671–3, 676–80
Cobbetts LLP v Hodge [2009] EWHC 786 (Ch); [2010] 1 BCLC 30	606, 628
Cochrane's Settlement Trusts, Re [1955] Ch 309	510
Cockburn's WT, Re [1957] 3 WLR 212	347
Cocks v Manners (1871) LR 12 Eq 574	204, 1141
Coco v AN Clark (Engineers) [1969] RPC 41	404, 406, 1202, 1209–14
Cohen, Re [1973] 1 WLR 415	1125
Cohen & Moore v IRC [1933] 2 KB 126; [1933] All ER 950, KBD	282, 293
Cohen v Roche [1927] 1 KB 169	1177
Colbeam Palmer v Stock Affiliates Pty Ltd (1968) 122 CLR 25	1277
Colebrook's Conveyance, Re [1972] 1 WLR 1397.	1287
Coles v Bradley (1804) 9 Ves 234	374
Coles v Trecothick (1804) 9 Ves 234	373, 629
Collier v Collier [2002] EWCA Civ 1097; [2002] BPIR 1057.	530, 535, 537
Collings v Lee (2001) 82 P & CR 27	593, 594, 596
Collins, Re (1886) 32 Ch D 229	474
Collins (Philip) Ltd v Davis [2000] 3 All ER 808	655, 939, 940

Combe v Combe [1951] 2 KB 215	275, 682
Comiskey v Bowring-Hanbury [1905] AC 84	107, 108
Commerzbank AG v IMB Morgan plc [2004] EWHC 2771 (Ch); [2005] 1 Lloyd's Rep 298	593, 913, 914
Commerzbank AG v Price [2003] EWCA Civ 1633	938, 943
Commission for New Towns v Cooper [1995] Ch 259	667, 1243
Commissioners for the Purposes of Income Tax v Pemsel [1891] AC 531; [1891–4] All ER Rep 28	1103–4, 1133, 1143, 1144
Commissioners of Inland Revenue v White (1980) 55 TC 651	1128
Compagnie Noga D'Importation et D'Exportation v Abacha [2004] EWHC 2601 (Comm)	1007
Compton, Re [1945] Ch 123	1107, 1118, 1119, 1132, 1167, 1168
Connolly, Re [1910] 1 Ch 219	108
Conservative Association v Burrell [1982] 2 All ER 1; [1982] 1 WLR 520	207, 221, 229, 231–93
Consterdine v Consterdine (1862) 31 Beav 330	348, 863
Consul Development Pty Ltd v DPC Estates Pty Ltd (1975) 132 CLR 373	1025
Conway v Fenton (1888) 40 Ch D 512	486
Cook, Re [1965] Ch 902	270, 276–8, 280
Cook v Deeks [1916] 1 AC 554	613
Cook v Fountain (1676) 3 Swan 585	37, 39
Cooke v Head [1972] 1 WLR 518	740
Coomber, Re [1911] 1 Ch 723	404, 1251
Coombes v Smith [1986] 1 WLR 808	657, 659, 664, 668, 669, 719, 724, 1318
Cooper, Re [2005] EWHC 2389	1254
Cooper (Colin), Re [1939] Ch 811, CA	315
Cooper v Joel (1859) 1 De GF & J 240	1286
Cooper v Martin (1867) LR 3 Ch App 47	423
Cooper v Phibbs (1867) LR 2 HL 149	1237
Cooper v PRG Power Ltd (in creditors' voluntary liquidation) [2008] EWHC 498 (Ch); [2008] 2 All ER (Comm) 964; [2008] BCC 588; [2008] All ER (D) 211 (Mar), Ch D	1081, 1091
Co-operative Bank v Tipper [1996] 4 All ER 366	654
Co-operative Insurance v Argyll Stores (Holdings) Ltd [1998] AC 1; [1997] 3 All ER 297	1172, 1178
Corbyn, Re [1941] Ch 400	1147
Coregrange Ltd, Re [1984] BCLC 453	633
Corin v Patton (1990) 169 CLR 540	260
Corporacion Nacional del Cobre de Chile v Interglobal Inc (2003) 5 ITELR 744; [2002] CILR 298	573
Corporacion Nacional del Cobre de Chile v Sogemin Metals Ltd [1997] 1 WLR 1396	548, 549, 881, 957
Coslett Contractors Ltd, Re [1998] Ch 495	929, 930
Costa and Duppe Properties Pty Ltd v Duppe [1986] VR 90	192
Costello v Costello [1996] 1 FLR	721
Cotman v Brougham [1918] AC 514	177
Cottam, Re [1955] 3 All ER 704	1121, 1125, 1129
Coulthard v Disco Mix Club Ltd [1999] 2 All ER 457; [2000] 1 WLR 707	404, 886, 980
Coulthurst's Will Trusts, Re [1951] Ch 661	1121
County National Westminster Bank v Barton (1999) The Times , 29 July	1235
Cowan de Groot Properties Ltd v Eagle Trust plc [1992] 4 All ER 700	1028
Cowan v Scargill [1985] Ch 270	91, 357, 361, 362, 363, 365, 434, 443, 444, 445, 446, 449, 450, 451, 905
Cowcher v Cowcher [1972] 1 WLR 425	715, 718, 719, 733
Cowin, Re (1886) 33 Ch D 179	395, 398, 403
Cox v Barnard (1850) 8 Hare 510	250
Cox v Jones [2004] 3 FCR 693; [2004] EWHC 1486 (Ch)	80, 735, 759–61, 778, 783
Coxen, Re [1948] Ch 747	165, 169, 170, 174, 1113, 1161

CPT Custodian Pty Ltd v Commissioner of State Revenue [2005] HCA 53	182, 191
Crabb v Arun District Council [1976] Ch 179	268, 334, 653, 660, 664, 671, 674, 675, 678, 679, 683, 703, 745, 747, 763, 798
Cracknell v Cracknell [1971] P 356	742
Craddock Brothers v Hunt [1923] 2 Ch 136, CA	543, 1242
Craddock v Scottish Provident Institution (1893) 69 LT 380; affirmed at (1894) 70 LT 718, CA	930
Crane v Hegeman-Harris Co Inc [1939] 1 All ER 662	1242
Crantrave Ltd v Lloyds Bank plc [2000] QBD 917; [2000] 4 All ER 472	1283
Craven's Estate, Re [1937] Ch 431	454
Crawley Borough Council v Ure [1996] QB 13; [1996] 1 All ER 724	809
Craythorne v Swinburne (1807) 14 Ves 160	1283
Cream Holdings Ltd v Banerjee [2005] 1 AC 253; [2004] UKHL 44	1226
Credit Lyonnais Bank Nederland NV v Export Credits Guarantee Department [2000] 1 AC 486	980
Credit Lyonnais Nederland NV v Burch [1996] NPC 99	1253, 1262
Credit Suisse Fides Trust v Cuoghi [1997] 3 All ER 724	1198
Crippen, In the Estate of [1911] P 108	587, 588
Crisp v Mullings (1976) 239 EG 119	726
Criterion Properties Ltd v Stratford UK Properties [2003] 1 WLR 218, CA	1012, 1020, 1022, 1025
Crittenden v The Estate of Charles Albert Bayliss [2005] EWCA Civ 1425	934
Crompton & Co Ltd, Re [1914] 1 Ch 954	1285
Crossco No 4 Unlimited v Jolan Ltd [2011] EWCA Civ 1619	563
Crossley v Crossley [2005] EWCA Civ 1581	713, 755
Crowden v Aldridge [1993] 1 WLR 433; [1993] 3 All ER 603	281
Crowe v Stevedoring Employees Retirement Fund [2003] PLR 343	393, 399, 400
Crown Dilmun v Sutton [2004] 1 BCLC 468; [2004] EWHC 52 (Ch)	620, 1022, 1025
Crown Forestry Rental Trust, Re ; Latimer v Commissioner of Inland Revenue [2004] 4 All ER 558; [2004] STC 923	1078
CTB v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2011] EWHC 1232 (QB); [2011] EWCA Civ 42; [2011] 2 FCR 95	1219, 1220, 1225, 1227
Cuckmere Brick v Mutual Finance Ltd [1971] Ch 949	693
Cuddee v Rutter (1720) 5 Vin Abr 538	1177
Cumberland Consolidated Holdings Ltd v Ireland [1946] KB 264	634
Cummins v Perkins [1899] 1 Ch 16	1285
Cundy v Lindsay (1878) 3 App Cas 459	1237
Cunnack v Edwards [1896] 2 Ch 679	513
Curley v Parkes [2004] All ER (D) 344	712
Curtis v Curtis [2011] EWCA Civ 1602	1253
Curtis v Lukin (1842) 5 Beav 147	186
Curtis v Pullbrook [2011] EWHC 167 (Ch); [2011] 1 BCLC 638	263
Custodian Pty Ltd v Commissioner of State Revenue [2005] HCA 53	182, 191
D (A Child) v O [2004] 3 All ER 780	486
D & C Builders v Rees [1966] 2 QB 617	682
D v D [2011] 2 FLR 29	493
D v NSPCC [1978] AC 171	1152
Dacre, Re ; Whitaker v Dacre [1916] 1 Ch 344	863
Dairy Containers Ltd v New Zealand Bank Ltd [1995] 2 NZLR 30	864, 885
Dale, Re [1994] Ch 31	640
Daly v Sydney Stock Exchange Ltd (1986) 160 CLR 371	594, 951
Damon Compania Naviera SA v Hapag-Lloyd International SA [1985] 1 WLR 435	1239
Daniel v Drew [2005] WTLR 807	349
Danish Bacon Co Ltd Staff Pension Fund Trusts, Re [1971] 1 WLR 248; [1971] 1 All ER 485	281
Daraydan Holdings Ltd v Solland International Ltd [2004] EWHC 622 (Ch)	572, 577, 578, 579, 586, 594, 611

Darlington Borough Council v Wiltshier Northern Ltd [1995] 1 WLR 68	274
Dart v Dart [1996] 2 FLR 286	848
Davenport v Bishop (1843) 2 Y & C Ch Cas 451	250
David, Re (1889) 43 Ch D 27	1149
Davies (Paul) Pty Ltd v Davies [1983] 1 NSWLR 440	922
Davis, Re [1902] 1 Ch 876	1158, 1159
Davis v Duke of Marlborough (1819) 2 Swan 108	1244, 1286
Davis v Johnson [1979] AC 264	848
Davis v Richards and Wallington Industries Ltd [1990] 1 WLR 1511	236, 513
Dawson (Deceased), Re ; Union Fidelity Trustee Co Ltd v Perpetual Trustees Co Ltd [1966] 2 NSW 211; 84 WN 399, NSW SC	463, 858, 872, 873
de Bruyne v de Bruyne [2010] EWCA Civ 519	776
De Carteret, Re [1933] Ch 103	1120
De Mattos v Gibson (1858) 4 G & J 276; (1858) 45 ER 108	1064
De Vigier v IRC [1964] 2 All ER 907	354
Dean, Re (1889) 41 Ch D 552	213, 214
Deare, Re (1895) 11 TLR 183	463
Debtor, Re , ex p Debtor (No 490 of 1935) [1936] Ch 237	457
Delamere's Settlement Trusts, Re [1984] 1 WLR 813	475
Delius, Re [1957] Ch 299	1127
Den Haag Trust, Re (1998) 1 OFLR 495	404
Denley's Will Trusts, Re ; Holman v HH Martyn & Co Ltd [1969] 1 Ch 373; [1968] 3 All ER 65	64, 91, 108, 180, 198, 199, 202, 204–8, 210–12, 219, 225, 226, 231, 233, 234, 331, 332, 1054, 1165
Dennis v MacDonald [1981] 1 WLR 810	843
Densham, Re [1975] 1 WLR 1519; [1975] 3 All ER 726	521, 748
Dent v Dent [1996] 1 All ER 659	671, 721
Derby & Co v Weldon (Nos 3 and 4) [1990] Ch 65	1196, 1198
Derksen v Pillar [2002] All ER (D) 261	966, 1032
Derry v Peek (1889) 14 App Cas 337	35, 1180, 1235
Detmold, Re (1889) 40 Ch D 585	194
Devaynes v Robinson (1855) 20 Beav 42	398
Dewar v Dewar [1975] 1 WLR 1532	711
Dewar v Mintoft [1912] 2 KB 373	1239
Dextra Bank and Trust Company Ltd v Bank of Jamaica [2002] 1 All ER (Comm) 193	937, 941, 942, 943
DHN Food Distributors Ltd v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council [1976] 1 WLR 852; [1976] 3 All ER 462	292
Dillwyn v Llewelyn (1862) 4 De GF & J 517	671, 681
Dimes v Scott (1828) 4 Russ 195	876
Dingle v Turner [1972] AC 601	1107, 1117–19, 1120, 1123, 1124, 1131, 1134–5, 1143, 1145, 1146, 1167
Diplock's Estate, Re ; Diplock v Wintle [1948] Ch 465	38, 57, 865, 888, 892, 900, 901, 902, 907, 911, 923, 925, 926, 927, 949, 958, 1012, 1030, 1285
Dixon, Re (1826) 2 GL & J 114	348, 862
Dodds v Tuke (1884) 25 Ch D 617	353
Dodsworth v Dodsworth (1973) 228 EG 1115	671, 681
Dominion Students' Hall Trusts, Re [1947] Ch 183	1162
Donald v Ntuli [2010] EWCA Civ 1276	1223, 1224, 1227, 1228, 1230
Donaldson v Smith [2006] All ER (D) 293 (May); [2007] WTLR 421	383, 387
Donohoe v Ingram [2006] BPIR 417	824, 825
Dornford v Dornford (1806) 12 Ves 127	858
Doughty, Re [1947] Ch 263	361
Douglas, Re (1887) 35 Ch D 472	1153
Douglas v Hello! Ltd [2001] QB 967; [2001] 2 All ER 289, CA; [2001] EMLR 199	404, 1209

Douglas v Hello! Ltd (No 3) [2006] QB 125	1207, 1215
Downshire, Re [1953] Ch 218	494
Dowse v Gorton [1891] AC 190	351, 1283
Doyle v Blake (1804) 2 Sch & Lef 231	344
DPP v Jones [1999] 2 All ER 257	836
DPR Futures Ltd, In Re [1989] 1 WLR 778	903
Drake v Whipp [1996] 1 FLR 826	726, 737, 740, 756
Draper's Conveyance, Re [1969] 1 Ch 486	827
Drewe's Settlement, Re ; Drewe v Westminster Bank Ltd [1966] 1 WLR 1518	490
Drummond, Re [1914] 2 Ch 90	211
Du Preez Ltd v Kaupthing Singer & Friedlander (Isle of Man) Ltd [2011] WTLR 559; (2010) 12 ITELRL 943	1069
Dubai Aluminium Company Ltd v Alawi [2002] EWHC 2051 (Comm)	577
Dubai Aluminium Company Ltd v Salaam (Livingstone, third parties) [2002] UKHL 48; [2002] 3 WLR 1913; [2003] 1 All ER 97, HL; reversing [2001] QB 133; [2000] 3 WLR 910, CA; reversing in part [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep 415 (QBD)	50, 51, 58, 548, 549, 644, 645, 646, 864, 885, 956, 957, 958, 961, 962, 964, 965, 979–80, 981, 992, 995
Dubai Bank Ltd v Galadari [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep 120	1196
Duckitt v Pensions Ombudsman [2000] OPLR 167	408
Duckwari plc, Re [1999] Ch 253; [1998] 2 BCLC 315	613
Dudley (Lord) v Dudley (Lady) (1705) Prec Ch 241	4, 5, 15
Dufour v Pereira (1769) 1 Dick 419	638, 641
Dugdale, Re (1888) 38 Ch D 176	192, 194
Duggan v Governor of Full Sutton Prison [2003] 2 All ER 678	95
Dunbar Bank v Nadeem [1997] 2 All ER 253; [1998] 3 All ER 874, CA	1247, 1256, 1273
Duncan v Worrall (1822) 10 Price 31	1244
Duncruft v Albrecht (1841) 12 Sim 189	1177
Dunlop, Re [1984] NI 408	1146
Dunne v Byrne [1912] AC 407	203, 1141
Dupree's Deed Trusts, Re [1945] Ch 16	1129
Dyer v Dyer (1788) 2 Cox Eq Cas 92	48, 50, 500, 502, 524, 531, 630, 703, 711, 716, 730, 732, 735, 796
Dyson Technology Ltd (Curtis [2010] EWHC 3289 (Ch)	962, 966, 1013
Eades, Re [1920] 2 Ch 353	1113
Eagle Trust v SBC Securities Ltd [1993] 1 WLR 484; [1992] 4 All ER 488	1020, 1030
Eagle Trust (SBC Securities Ltd v No 2) [1996] 1 BCLC 121	1014
Eastern Capital Futures Ltd, Re [1989] BCLC 371	914
Eastern Distributors Ltd v Goldring [1957] 2 QB 600	683
Eastgate, Re [1905] 1 KB 465	1241
Eastwood v Lever (1863) 4 De GJ & S 114	1280
Eaton v Buchanan [1911] AC 253	423
Eaves v Hickson (1861) 30 Beav 136; (1861) 7 Jur NS 1301	366, 857, 963
Ebrahimi v Westbourne Galleries [1972] 2 All ER 492; [1973] AC 360	1059
Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England v North Eastern Railway Co (1877) 4 Ch D 845	420, 881
Eden, Re [1957] 2 All ER 430	174
Edge v Pensions Ombudsman [1998] Ch 512; [2000] Ch 602; [1999] 4 All ER 546	359, 380
Edwards v Meyrick (1842) 2 Hare 60	374, 629
Edwards' Will Trusts, Re [1948] Ch 440	302, 303
Egana v Normore ¹⁰ ITELRL 813	790
Eglin v Sanderson (1862) 3 Giff 434	404
88 Berkley Road, Re [1971] Ch 648	827

El Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings [1994] 2 All ER 689; [1994] 1 BCLC 464; [1994] BCC 143, CA; Reversing [1993] 3 All ER 717; [1993] BCLC 735; [1993] BCC 698, Ch D	543, 645, 892, 893, 895, 896, 897, 913, 920, 928, 951, 954, 1006, 1007, 1008, 1015, 1018–19, 1025
Elitestone Ltd v Morris (1995) 73 P & CR 259	681
Elithorn v Poulter [2008] EWCA Civ 1364	80–1, 526
Ellenborough, Re [1903] 1 Ch 697	249
Elliott v Pensions Ombudsman [1998] OPLR 21	408
Ellis, Re [1908] WN 215	398
Ellse v Hill-Pickford [2006] EWHC 3293 (Ch)	1265
Elsen v Elsen [2011] BCCA 314; 14 ITEL 133	501
Emery's Investment Trust, Re [1959] Ch 410	532
Emmanuel v Emmanuel [1982] 1 WLR 669	1199
Emmet's Estate, Re (1881) 17 Ch D 142	393
Endacott, Re [1960] Ch 232; [1959] 3 All ER 562	198, 202, 205, 213, 214, 1153
England's Settlement Trusts, Re [1918] 1 Ch 24	355, 357
English v Dedham Vale Properties [1978] 1 WLR 93	643
Equiticorp Industries Group Ltd v The Crown [1998] 2 NZLR 485	609
Equity Home Loans v Prestidge [1992] 1 All ER 909	1273, 1274
Erlanger v New Sombrero Phosphate Co (1878) 3 App Cas 1218	688, 1240
Ernest v Vivian (1863) 33 LJ Ch 513	1287
Errington v Errington [1952] 1 QB 290	681
Essery v Cowlard (1884) 26 Ch D 191	510
Estlin, Re (1903) 72 LJ Ch 687	1125, 1129
Euroactividade AG v Moeller (2001) unreported, 1 February	938
Evans, Re (Deceased) [1999] 2 All ER 777	882
Evans v Benyon (1888) 37 Ch D 329	884
Evans v Evans [1989] 1 FLR 351	587
Evans v Hayward [1995] 2 FLR 511	721, 733
Evans Marshall & Co Ltd v Bertola SA [1973] 1 WLR 349	1194
Eves v Eves [1975] 1 WLR 1338	724, 729, 740, 763
Evroy v Nicholas (1733) 2 Eq Ca Abr 488	31
EVTR, Re [1987] BCLC 646	1069
Ewing v Orr Ewing (No 1) (1883) 9 App Cas 34	33
Exchange Securities & Commodities Ltd, Re [1988] Ch 46	653, 660
Experience Hendrix LLC v PPX Enterprises Inc [2003] EWCA Civ 323; [2003] 1 All ER (Comm) 830; [2003] EMLR 513	600, 1278
Eyre, Re (1883) 49 LT 259	420
F v F (Clean Break: Balance of Fairness) [2003] 1 FLR 847	742
Fairclough v Swan Brewery [1912] AC 565	14, 1043
Falcke v Gray (1859) 4 Drew 651	1175
Faraker, Re [1912] 2 Ch 488	1159
Farepak Food and Gifts Ltd, Re [2006] EWHC 3272 (Ch); [2007] 2 BCLC 1; [2006] All ER (D) 265 (Dec)	97–9, 144, 568, 569, 648–9, 1067, 1069, 1090
Farepak Food and Gifts Ltd (in liquidation), Re ; Power and another (joint liquidators of Farepak Food and Gifts Ltd) v Revenue and Customs Commissioners and another [2009] EWHC 2580 (Ch); [2010] 1 BCLC 444	99
Farmer v Dean (1863) 32 Beav 327	373
Farquharson Bros & Co v King & Co [1902] AC 325	683
Farrar v Farrars Ltd (1888) 40 Ch D 395	368
Favor Easy Management Ltd v Wu [2011] EWHC 2017 (Ch)	783
Fawcett v Whitehouse (1829) 1 Russ & M 132; 39 ER 51	574
Feldman (David) Charitable Foundation, Re (1987) 58 OR (2d) 626	447
Felton v Callis [1969] 1 QB 200	1245

Fenwicke v Clarke (1862) 4 De GF & J 240	30
Ferguson v Wilson (1866) LR 2 Ch App 77	1280
Ferraby v Hobson (1847) 2 PH 255	373, 629
FHR European Ventures LLP v Mankarious [2011] EWHC 2308 (Ch); [2013] 3 WLR 466	570, 580, 601
Figgis, Re [1969] 1 Ch 123	527, 528
Filby v Mortgage Express (No 2) Ltd [2004] EWCA Civ 759	894
Finch v Finch (1808) 15 Ves Jr 43	526
Finers v Miro [1991] 1 WLR 35	1016
Finger's WT, Re [1972] 1 Ch 286	1159
Fiona Trust & Holding Corporation v Privalov [2010] EWHC 3199 (Comm)	962, 972, 997
First National Bank plc v Achampong [2004] 1 FCR 17	825
First National Bank plc v Thompson [1996] Ch 231	684
First National Security v Hegerty [1985] QB 850	847, 848
Fitzwilliam v IRC [1993] STC 502	111
Fletcher v Ashburner (1779) 1 Bro CC 497	1286
Fletcher v Fletcher (1844) 4 Hare 67	34, 64, 242, 250, 270, 278–80, 332, 393
Fletcher v Green (1864) 33 Beav 426	463, 876
Flower and Metropolitan Board of Works, Re (1884) 27 Ch D 592	353
Flower v Pretchel (1934) 159 LT 491	352
Foley v Hill (1848) 2 HL Cas 28, 9 ER 1002	102, 132, 1069, 1080
Forbes (Alexander) Trustee Services Ltd v Halliwell [2003] EWHC 1685 (Ch); [2003] Pens LR 269	408
Ford, Re [1922] 2 Ch 519	318
Foreman v Kingstone [2004] 1 NZLR 841	393, 399
Fortex Group Ltd v MacIntosh [1998] 3 NZLR 171	548, 549, 957
Foskett v McKeown [2001] 1 AC 102; [2000] 3 All ER 97	590, 844, 891, 892, 894, 895, 902, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 920, 922, 926, 927, 928, 933, 949, 950, 1278
Foss v Harbottle (1843) 2 Hare 461	1057
Foster v Bryant [2007] Bus LR 1565	618, 619, 621
Foster v Reeves [1892] 2 QB 255	33
4 Eng Ltd v Harper [2009] EWHC 2633 (Ch)	541
Four Maids Ltd v Dudley Marshall Ltd [1957] Ch 317	693
Fourie v Le Roux [2007] UKHL 1	1197
Fowkes v Pascoe (1875) 10 Ch App Cas 343	500, 523, 527
Fowler v Barron [2008] EWCA Civ 377; 11 ITELR 198	765
Fox, Walker & Co, Re ; ex p Bishop (1880) 15 Ch D 400, CA	1283
Framlington Group plc v Anderson [1995] BCC 611	607
Fraser v Byas (1895) 11 TLR 481	1065
Fraser v Oystertec [2004] EWHC 2225 (Ch)	1007
Frawley v Neill (1999) The Times , 5 April	31
Free v Hindle (1827) 2 Sim 7	1285
Freeland, Re [1952] Ch 110	267
Freeman v Cooke (1848) 2 Ex Ch 654	683
Freeman's ST, Re (1887) 37 Ch D 148	350
Freeston's Charity, Re [1978] Ch 741; [1978] 1 WLR 741	494, 884
Freevale Ltd v Metrostore (Holdings) Ltd [1984] 1 All ER 495	633
Freme's Contract, Re [1895] 2 Ch 256	422
French Caledonia Travel Service Pty Ltd, Re (2003) 204 ALR 353	913
Friends Provident Life Office v Hillier Parker May and Rowden [1997] QB 85; [1995] 4 All ER 260	863, 938
Frith (Cartland v 1865) 2 Hem & M 417; v 1865) 71 ER 525	910
Fry, Re [1946] Ch 312	259
Fry v Fry (1859) 27 Beav 144	355, 858
Fryer, Re (1857) 3 K & J 317	880

Fuller v Evans [2000] 1 All ER 636	53, 272
Fuller v Strum [2002] 1 WLR 1097	642
Fulton v Andrew (1875) LR 7 HL 448	642
Funnell v Stewart [1996] 1 WLR 288	1103, 1127
Furniss v Dawson [1984] AC 473; [1984] 2 WLR 226	69, 111, 529, 1112
Futter v Futter [2011] EWCA Civ 197; [2011] 3 WLR 19	378, 380, 383, 385
Fyffes Group Ltd v Templeman [2000] 2 Lloyd's Rep 643	577, 1004
Fyler v Fyler (1841) 3 Beav 550; 49 ER 1031	963
G v G [1985] 1 WLR 647	824
Gafford v Graham [1999] 41 EG 157	1190
Gallaher v Gallaher [2004] EWHC 42; [2005] All ER (D) 177	382
Galmerrow Securities Ltd v National Westminster Bank plc [2002] WTLR 125	376, 406, 432, 451, 464, 881, 883
Gansloser's WT, Re [1952] Ch 30	167
Gardner, Re [1923] 2 Ch 230	319
Gardner v Rowe (1828) 4 Russ 578	253
Gardom, Re [1914] 1 Ch 662	1121
Garland, ex p (1803) 10 Ves 110	352
Garnac Grain Co Inc v HMF Faure and Fairclough Ltd [1968] AC 1130	72
Garnett, Re (1885) 31 Ch D 1	884
Garthshore v Chalie (1804) 10 Ves 1	1287
Gartside v IRC [1968] AC 553	59, 188–90
Gascoigne v Gascoigne [1918] 1 KB 223	530, 534
Gee v Pritchard (1818) 2 Swan 402	38, 39, 1206
General Communications Ltd v Development Finance Corporation of New Zealand Ltd [1990] 3 NZLR 406	1069, 1075
General Mediterranean Holdings v Patel [1999] 3 All ER 673	836
German Mining Co, Re (1854) 4 De GM&G 19	352
Gertsch v Aspasia (2000) 2 ITEL 342	931
Gess, Re [1942] Ch 37	367
Gestetner, Re [1953] 2 WLR 1033	151, 153, 165, 171
Ghana Commercial Bank v C (1997) The Times , 3 March	590
Gibbard, Re [1966] 1 All ER 273	165, 166
Gibbon v Mitchell [1990] 1 WLR 1304	383, 391
Gibbons v Nelsons [2000] PNL 734	874
Gibson v South American Stores [1950] Ch 177	1125
Gilbey v Rush [1906] 1 Ch 11	387
Giles (CH) and Co Ltd v Morris [1972] 1 WLR 307	1176
Giles v Rind [2002] 4 All ER 977; [2003] 1 BCLC 1	417
Gilhiespie v Burdis (1943) 169 LT 91	1242
Gill v Woodall [2011] 3 WLR 85	642
Gillett v Holt [2001] Ch 210; [2000] 2 All ER 289	14, 241, 251, 275, 651, 655, 657, 661–4, 666–70, 673, 678, 679, 699, 703, 745, 747, 1268
Gillies v Keogh [1989] 2 NZLR 327	813
Gillingham Bus Disaster Fund, Re [1958] Ch 300	213, 511
Gilmour v Coats [1949] 1 All ER 848; [1949] AC 426	1133, 1136, 1140–1, 1142
Girl's Public Day School Trust, Re [1951] Ch 400	1127
Gisborne v Gisborne (1877) 2 App Cas 300	423
Gissing v Gissing [1971] AC 884; [1970] 3 WLR 255; [1970] 2 All ER 780	32, 521, 525, 531, 564, 630, 649, 704, 715–16, 717, 718, 719, 723, 727, 730, 740, 741, 742, 758, 759, 768, 773, 779, 789, 798, 799, 800
Giumelli v Giumelli [1999] HCA 10	713, 737, 793

GKN Bolts & Nuts Ltd etc Works Sports and Social Club, Re [1982] 1 WLR 774	237, 238, 513
Glasse v Woolgar and Roberts (No 2) (1897) 41 SJ 573	1177
Glazier v Australian Men's Health (No 2) [2001] NSW SC 6	403, 463
Glen Dimplex Home Appliances Ltd v Smith [2011] EWHC 3392 (Ch)	593
Global Marine Drillships Ltd v Landmark Solicitors LLP [2011] EWHC 2685 (Ch); [2011] 44 LS Gaz R 20, Ch D	1068
Global Trader Europe Ltd (in liquidation), Re ; Milner and another (liquidators of Global Trader Europe Ltd) v Crawford-Brunt and others [2009] EWHC 602 (Ch); [2009] 2 BCLC 18	132, 133–5, 195
Glyn's WT, Re (1950) 66 TLR 510	1121
Godden v Merthyr Tydfil Housing Association [1997] NPC 1	675
Godwin's Settlement, Re (1918) 87 LJ Ch 645	355, 357
Golay Morris v Bridgewater and Others, Re [1965] 1 WLR 969	125
Gold v Hill [1999] 1 FLR 54	281
Goldcorp Exchange Ltd, Re [1995] 1 AC 74; [1994] 3 WLR 199	49, 88, 110, 117, 118–19, 121, 123, 124, 126, 127, 128, 132, 134, 136, 139, 143, 195, 276, 315, 336, 427, 555, 796, 929, 932, 951, 1038, 1065, 1302
Goldsworthy v Brickell [1987] Ch 378	1251, 1261
Gonin, Re [1979] Ch 16	266, 267
Gonthier v Orange Contract Scaffolding Ltd [2003] EWCA Civ 873	667, 676
Goodchild (by his litigation friend) v Bradbury [2006] All ER (D) 247	1268
Goodchild (deceased), Re ; Goodchild v Goodchild [1996] 1 WLR 694	641, 642
Goode Durrant Administration v Biddulph [1994] 2 FLR 551; (1994) 26 HLR 626	1262, 1272
Goodman v Gallant [1986] Fam106; [1986] 1 FLR 513	676, 710, 726, 802
Good's Will Trusts, Re [1950] 2 All ER 653	1158
Goodwin v NGN Ltd [2011] EWHC 1437 (QB)	1228
Goose v Wilson Sandford & Co [1998] EWCA Civ 245	962
Gordon v Gordon (1821) 3 Swans 400	1236
Gore and Snell v Carpenter (1990) 60 P & CR 456	827
Gorman, Re [1990] 1 WLR 616; [1990] 2 FLR 284	710, 742, 823, 827
Gosling v Gosling (1859) John 265	185
Goss v Chilcott [1997] 2 All ER 110; [1996] AC 788	885
Gough v Smith [1872] WN 18	348, 863, 880
Goulding v James [1997] 2 All ER 239	192, 487, 488
Gouldsworth v Knights (1843) 11 M & W 337	348, 863
Government Insurance Office (NSW) v KA Reed Services Pty Ltd [1988] VR 829	1288
Governors of St Thomas's Hospital v Richardson [1910] 1 KB 271	353
Grace, Ex p (1799) 1 Bos & P 376	601
Graf v Hope Building Corporation 254 NY 1 (1930)	29
Graigola Merthyr Co Ltd v Swansea Corporation [1929] AC 344	1192
Grainge v Wilberforce (1889) 5 TLR 436	48, 292
Gramsci (Antonio) Shipping Corporation v Recoletos Ltd [2010] All ER (D) 241	593
Grant v Edwards [1986] Ch 638; [1986] 2 All ER 426	561, 668, 669, 685, 712, 719, 723, 724, 727, 729, 730, 742, 746, 755, 759, 762, 763, 771, 772, 798
Grant's Will Trusts, Re [1979] 3 All ER 359; [1980] 1 WLR 360	180, 207, 208, 210, 212, 219, 221, 224, 225, 230, 231
Gray v Barr [1971] 2 QB 554	587
Gray v Perpetual Trustee Company [1928] AC 391	641
Greasley v Cooke [1980] 1 WLR 1306	669, 671, 749, 750
Greaves, Re [1954] Ch 434	162
Green, Re [1951] Ch 158	641
Green v Cobham [2002] STC 820	386, 390
Green v Ekins (1742) 2 Atk 473	477
Green v Lord Somerleyton [2004] 1 P & CR 520	1288

Green v Russell [1959] 2 QB 226	63
Green v Spicer (1830) 1 Russ & M 395	183
Greene King plc v Stanley [2002] BPIR 491	1247, 1252
Greenwood v Bennett [1973] QB 195	899
Gregory v Gregory (1821) Jac 631	373, 629
Gregson v HAE Trustees Ltd [2008] EWHC 1006 (Ch); [2008] 2 BCLC 542	864
Gresley v Saunders (1522) Spelman Rep 22–31	47
Grey v IRC [1960] AC 1	40, 108, 242, 281–3, 286, 289, 291, 293, 294, 297, 298, 331–3, 335, 489
Griffin, Re, ex p Board of Trade (1890) 60 LJ QB 235	457
Griffith, Re [1904] 1 Ch 807	353
Griffiths v Cork [2007] EWHC 1827 (Ch); 10 ITELR 313	776
Griffiths v Williams (1977) 248 EG 947	669, 671
Grimaldi v Chameleon Mining NL (No 2) [2012] FCAFC 6	586
Grindal v Hooper (2000) The Times , 8 February	819, 820
Grove-Grady, Re [1929] 1 Ch 557	1153
Groves v Groves (1829) 3 Y & J 163	532
Grupo Toras v Al-Sabah (2000) unreported, 2 November, CA	957, 1033
Guerin v The Queen [1984] 2 SCR 335; (1984) 13 DLR (4th) 321	452
Guild v IRC [1992] 2 AC 310	1108, 1112, 1113, 1155, 1157, 1160–1, 1167
Guinness Mahon v Kensington & Chelsea RLBC [1998] 2 All ER 272	427
Guinness plc v Saunders [1990] 2 AC 667; [1990] 2 WLR 324; [1990] 1 All ER 652	31, 595, 627
Gulbenkian's Settlement Trusts, Re [1968] Ch 785, HL; [1968] Ch 126; [1967] 3 All ER 15, CA	49, 88, 89, 146, 150, 151, 152, 153–4, 155, 157–60, 164, 165, 166, 167, 173, 177, 190
Gwembe Valley Development Co v Koshy (No 3) [2003] EWCA Civ 1048; [2004] 1 BCLC 131	410, 416, 608, 868
Gwyon, Re [1930] 1 Ch 255	1122
Gyhon, Re (1885) 29 Ch D 834	422
H (Deceased), Re [1990] 1 FLR 441	587
H v M [2004] 2 FLR 16	725
H v R [1996] 1 NZLR 299	687
Habana Ltd v Kaupthing Singer & Friedlander (Isle of Man) Ltd [2011] WTLR 275; (2009–10) 12 ITELR 736	1069
Habib Bank Ltd v Habib Bank AG (Zurich) [1981] 2 All ER 650; [1981] 1 WLR 1265, CA	30, 657, 659, 759
Habib Bank Ltd v Tufail [2006] EWCA Civ 374	1260
Hadley v Baxendale (1854) 9 Ex 341	1281
Hagger, Re [1930] 2 Ch 190	640
Hain's Settlement, Re [1961] 1 All ER 848	172
Halifax Building Society v Thomas [1996] Ch 217	577, 595, 596, 951
Halifax Mortgage Services Ltd v Stepsky [1996] Ch 1; [1996] 2 All ER 277	1247, 1256, 1270, 1271
Hall v Hall (1868) LR 1 P & D 481	1254
Hall v Palmer (1844) 3 Hare 532	271
Hallett's Estate, Re (1880) 13 Ch D 696	24, 38, 905, 906, 910
Hallows v Lloyd (1888) 39 Ch D 686	354
Halsall v Brizell [1957] Ch 169	1288
Hamar v Pensions Ombudsman [1996] PLR 1	393, 394
Hambleton's Will Trusts, Re [1960] 1 WLR 82	294, 489
Hamilton, Re [1895] 2 Ch 370	107, 108
Hammersmith & Fulham LBC v Alexander-David [2009] EWCA Civ 259; [2009] 3 All ER 1098; [2010] Ch 272	812
Hammond v Mitchell [1991] 1 WLR 1127	703, 740, 742, 743–4, 757, 843
Hammonds v Barclay (1802) 2 East 227	930

Hanbury v Kirkland (1829) 3 Sim 265	880
Hanchett-Stamford v Attorney-General [2008] EWHC 330 (Ch); [2008] 4 All ER 323	234, 1116, 1148, 1153
Hancock Family Memorial Foundation Ltd v Porteous [2000] WTLR 1113 (Sup Ct (WA))	609
Hancock v Watson [1902] AC 14	129, 130, 178, 512
Handyside v United Kingdom (1976) 1 EHRR 737	839
Hansen v Barker-Benfield [2006] EWHC 1119 (Ch)	597
Harari's Settled Trusts, Re [1949] 1 All ER 430	453, 454
Harding, Re [2008] 2 WLR 361	1114
Hardoon v Belilios [1901] AC 118	353
Hardwicke, Re ; ex p Hubbard (1886) 17 QBD 690	1065
Hare Trust, Re (2001) 4 ITELR 288	422
Harland v Trigg (1782) 1 Bro CC 142	118
Harman v Glencross [1986] Fam 81	823
Harmer v Pearson (1993) 16 Fam LR 596	792
Harpur's Will Trusts, Re ; Haller v Attorney-General [1962] Ch 78; [1961] 3 All ER 588	206
Harries v Church Commissioners [1992] 1 WLR 1241	434
Harrington v Bennett [2000] BPIR 630	822
Harris v Digital Pulse Pty Ltd (2003) 56 NSWLR 298	877
Harris v Goddard [1983] 1 WLR 1203	827
Harris v Kent [2007] EWHC 463 (Ch)	867
Harrison, Re [1918] 2 Ch 59	528
Harrison (JJ) (Properties) Ltd v Harrison [2002] 1 BCLC 162; [2001] WTLR 1327	593, 594, 596, 958
Harrods Ltd v Lemon [1931] 1 KB 157	406
Harrow LBC v Qazi [2003] UKHL 43; [2004] 1 AC 983	825
Hartigan Nominees v Rydge (1992) 29 NSWLR 405	394, 400, 401, 402
Hartog v Colin & Shields [1939] 2 All ER 566	1237, 1238
Harvard Securities Ltd, Re [1997] 2 BCLC 369	88, 117, 121, 122–3, 143
Harvey, Re [1941] 3 All ER 284	1163
Harvey v Cooke (1827) 4 Russ 34	1236
Harwood, Re [1936] Ch 285	1159
Harwood v Harwood [1991] 2 FLR 274	710, 711, 726, 843
Hassall v Smither (1806) 12 Ves 119	515, 1066
Hastings-Bass, Re [1975] Ch 25; [1974] 2 WLR 904; [1974] 2 All ER 193	377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 386, 387, 388, 398, 423, 424, 432, 809
Haugesund Kommune v Depfa ACS Bank [2011] 1 All ER 190; [2010] EWCA Civ 579; [2010] All ER (D) 273 (May), CA	557, 884, 885, 936
Hawkesley v May [1956] 1 QB 304	355, 393, 403
Hay's Settlement Trusts, Re [1981] 3 All ER 786	146, 147, 148, 151, 160, 161, 162, 170, 171, 172, 177, 394, 421
Hazell v Hammersmith and Fulham [1992] 2 AC 1; [1991] 2 WLR 372; [1991] 1 All ER 543	1039, 1239
Hazell v Hazell [1972] 1 WLR 301	740
HCK China Investments Ltd v Solar Honest Ltd (1999) 165 ALR 680	60
Healy v Howlett & Sons [1917] 1 KB 337	127
Heane v Rogers (1829) 9 B & C 576	683
Hearn v Younger [2002] WTLR 1317	387, 388, 670
Heath v Rydley (1614) Cro Jac 335; (1614) 79 ER 286	29
Hedley Byrne v Heller [1964] AC 465	1255
Heilbut Symons & Co v Buckleton [1913] AC 30	1236
Heinl (Wolfgang Herbert) v Jyske Bank [1999] Lloyd's Rep Bank 511	548, 549, 957, 1019, 1028
Helena Housing Ltd v Revenue and Customs Commissioners [2011] STC 1307, TCC	1124
Hemmens v Wilson Browne [1994] 2 FLR 101	843
Henderson v Merrett Syndicates [1995] 2 AC 145	689, 813
Henderson v Williams [1895] 1 QB 521	683

Herbert v Doyle [2010] EWCA Civ 1095.....	564, 676
Heseltine v Heseltine [1971] 1 WLR 342.....	748
Hetherington, Re [1990] Ch 1.....	1107, 1108, 1112, 1113, 1141, 1167
Heyworth's Contingent Reversionary Interest, Re [1956] Ch 364.....	476
Hibberson v George (1989) 12 Fam LR 725.....	792
Hill v Hill [1897] 1 QB 483.....	108
Hill v Langley (1988) The Times , 28 January.....	373
Hill v Permanent Trustee Co of NSW [1930] AC 720.....	361
Hill v Spread Trustee Co Ltd [2005] EWHC 336 (Ch); [2006] WTLR 1009.....	196, 541
Hillas & Co v Arcos Ltd (1932) 147 LT 503.....	172
Hillier, Re [1954] 1 WLR 9; affirmed in part [1954] 1 WLR 700.....	511
Hillsdown plc v Pensions Ombudsman [1997] 1 All ER 862.....	1014
Hilton, Re [1909] 2 Ch 548.....	348, 862
Hilton v Barker Booth & Eastwood [2005] 1 WLR 567; [2005] UKHL 8.....	874
Hirachand Punanchand v Temple [1911] 2 KB 330.....	277
Hirschfield v McGrath [2011] EWHC 249 (QB).....	1207
Hirschhorn v Evans (Barclays Bank garnishees) [1938] 2 KB 801.....	102
Hiscox v Outhwaite (No 1) [1992] 1 AC 562.....	652
Hitch v Stone [2001] STC 214.....	111
Hivac Ltd v Park Royal Scientific Investments Ltd [1946] Ch 169.....	692, 695
HMRC v Peter Clay Discretionary Trust [2009] 2 WLR 1353.....	364
Hoare v Hoare (1886) 56 LT 147.....	1142
Hobday v Peters (No 3) (1860) 28 Beav 603.....	872
Hoblyn v Hoblyn (1889) 41 Ch D 200.....	1243
Hobourn Aero Components Ltd's Air Raids Disaster Fund, Re [1946] Ch 194.....	1146
Hodges, Re (1878) 7 Ch D 754.....	423
Hodgson v Marks [1971] 2 WLR 1267; [1971] Ch 892.....	250, 251, 523, 524
Hoffmann La Roche & Co v Secretary of State for Trade and Industry [1973] AC 295; [1973] 3 All ER 945, CA.....	1193, 1194
Holburne, Re (1885) 53 LT 212; (1885) 1 TLR 517.....	1127, 1149
Holden, Re [1935] WN 52.....	366
Holder v Holder [1968] Ch 353; [1968] 1 All ER 669; [1968] 2 WLR 237.....	370, 371, 372, 373, 629, 869, 884
Holding and Management Ltd v Property Holding and Investment Trust plc [1989] 1 WLR 1313.....	351
Holgate, Re (1971) unreported.....	587
Holiday Inns Inc v Broadhead (1974) 232 EG 951.....	671, 672
Holland, Re [1914] 2 Ch 595.....	496
Hollandia, The [1982] QB 872.....	836
Holliday, Re [1981] 2 WLR 996.....	820, 823
Hollis v Rolfe [2008] EWHC 1747 (Ch).....	707
Holman v Howes [2007] EWCA Civ 877; [2007] BPIR 1085.....	765, 775
Holman v Johnson (1775) 1 Cowp 341; 98 ER 1120.....	530, 532, 937
Holmden's Settlement Trusts, Re [1968] AC 689; [1968] 1 All ER 148, HL.....	487, 488
Holmes, Re [2005] 1 All ER 490.....	1302
Holmes v Dring (1788) 2 Cox Eq Cas 1.....	433, 450, 472
Holt's Settlement Trusts, Re ; Wilson v Holt [1969] 1 Ch 100.....	182, 293, 294, 295, 297, 298, 487–90
Home Office v Ayres [1992] ICR 175.....	940
Honywood v Bennett (1675) Nottingham Rep (73 Selden Society) 214.....	39
Hooper, Re [1932] 1 Ch 38.....	199, 213, 214, 216
Hooper's 1949 Settlement, Re (1955) 34 ATC 3.....	174
Hopgood v Brown [1955] 1 WLR 213.....	670
Hopkins, Re [1965] Ch 699.....	1127, 1128
Horcal v Gatland [1983] IRLR 459.....	695
Horley Town FC, Re [2006] EWHC 2386 (Ch).....	230, 237, 238

Horn v Commercial Acceptances Ltd [2011] EWHC 1757 (Ch)	581, 582
Hosegood v Pedler (1879) 66 LJ QB 18	352
Hosking v Michaelides [2006] BPIR 1196; [2004] All ER (D) 147 (May)	728, 822
Houghton v Fayers [2000] 1 BCLC 571	548
Houldsworth, Ex p (1838) 4 Bing NC 386	398
Houston v Burns [1918] AC 337	1113
Howes v Bishop [1909] 2 KB 390	1252
Hubbard v Vosper [1972] 2 QB 84	1137
Hughes v Metropolitan Railway Co (1877) 2 App Cas 439	275, 288, 298, 682
Huguenin v Baseley (1807) 14 Ves Jun 273	318, 1253
Hummeltenberg, Re [1923] 1 Ch 237	1103, 1127, 1133
Humphreys v Humphreys [2004] EWHC 2201 (Ch)	597
Hungerfords v Walker (1989) 171 CLR 125	1281
Hunt v Luck [1902] 1 Ch 428	1248
Hunt v Soady [2007] EWCA Civ 366	665
Hunter v Babbage [1994] 2 FLR 806	827
Hunter v Moss [1994] 1 WLR 452, CA; affirming [1993] 1 WLR 934	88, 117, 121, 122, 123, 124, 126, 133, 141, 142, 143, 290, 327
Hunter v Senate Support Services Ltd [2004] EWHC 1085	387, 388
Hunt-Foulston v Furber (1876) 3 Ch D 285	192
Huntingford v Hobbs [1993] 1 FLR 736; [1993] 1 FCR 45	630, 703, 711, 712, 713, 725, 726, 733, 735–7, 738, 739, 766, 772, 797, 814
Hurst, Re (1892) 67 LT 96	355
Hurstanger Ltd v Wilson [2007] EWCA Civ 299; [2007] 1 WLR 2351	579–80
Hussey v Palmer [1972] 1 WLR 1286	740
Hutcheson v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2011] EWCA Civ 808	1224
Hutchinson and Tenant, Re (1878) 8 Ch D 540	108
Hutton v Watling [1948] Ch 398, CA; [1948] Ch 26, Ch D	71, 1176
Hyett v Stanley [2003] EWCA Civ 942; [2004] 1 FLR 394; [2003] 3 FCR 253; [2004] Fam Law 23	723, 727
Hyman v Hyman [1929] AC 601	843
Ibrahim v Barclays Bank [2011] EWHC 1897 (Ch)	885, 931
IDC Group v Clark (1992) 65 P & CR 179	565
Ideal Bedding Co Ltd v Holland [1907] 2 Ch 157	1244
Illingworth v Houldsworth [1904] AC 355	929
Imageview Management Ltd v Jack [2009] Bus LR 1034	579, 626–7
Imerman v Tchenguiz [2011] 2 WLR 592	1204, 1207, 1213, 1214
Imobilari Pty Ltd v Opes Prime Stockbroking Ltd [2008] FCA 1920; (2009) 252 ALR 41	1014
Imperial Foods Pension Scheme, Re [1986] 1 WLR 717	386
In Plus Group Ltd v Pyke [2002] 2 BCLC 201	367, 616, 618, 619, 621
Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales (ICLR) v Attorney-General [1972] Ch 73	1103, 1107, 1112, 1125, 1130, 1144, 1145
Independent Schools Council (Charity Commission [2012] 2 WLR 100; [2012] 1 All ER 127; [2011] UKTT 421 v TCC)	1133–4
Independent Trustee Services Ltd v GP Noble and Morris [2012] EWCA Civ 195; [2012] WLR (D) 55	946–8
Independent Trustee Services Ltd v GP Noble Trustees Ltd [2010] EWHC 1653 (Ch)	962, 994, 1012
Indian Oil Corp Ltd v Greenstone Shipping SA [1987] 3 All ER 893	899
Industrial Development Consultants Ltd (IDC) v Cooley [1972] 1 WLR 443	369, 607–8, 614, 619, 620
Ingram v IRC [1985] STC 835	69
International Corona Resources Ltd v LAC Minerals Ltd (1989) 2 SCR 574	695, 697
Inwards v Baker [1965] 2 QB 29	669, 670, 681
IRC v Baddeley [1955] AC 572	1146, 1147, 1155
IRC v Bernstein [1961] Ch 399	472

IRC v Broadway Cottages Trust [1955] 2 WLR 552; [1955] Ch 20	88, 89, 146, 149, 150, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 177, 178
IRC v Educational Grants Association (EGA) [1967] Ch 123	1131, 1132
IRC v Eversden (exors of Greenstock, decd) [2003] EWCA Civ 672; [2003] STC 822, CA; affirmng [2003] 75 Tax Cas 340; [2002] STC 1109, Ch D; affirmng [2002] STC (SCD) 39, SCD	712, 810, 811
IRC v Glasgow City Police Athletic Association [1953] AC 380	1155
IRC v Hashmi [2002] EWCA Civ 981; [2002] 2 BCLC 488; [2002] BCC 943	540, 541
IRC v McMullen [1981] AC 1	1126, 1129, 1156
IRC v Society for the Relief of Widows and Orphans of Medical Men (1926) 11 TC 1	1125
Ironmongers' Co v Attorney-General (1844) 10 Cl & F 908	1162
Irvine v Sullivan (1869) LR 8 Eq 673	318
Irving, Re (1975) 66 DLR (3d) 387	491
Isaac v Isaac [2004] All ER (D) 71	410, 416
Island Export Finance Ltd v Umunna [1986] BCC 460	615, 619
Item Software (UK) Ltd v Fassihi [2002] EWHC 3116 (Ch); [2003] 2 BCLC 1	608
Ives (ER) Investment Ltd v High [1967] 2 QB 379	798, 1288, 1291
Ivin v Blake [1995] 1 FLR 70	50, 725, 727, 729, 740, 741, 792
Jackson, Re (1882) 21 Ch D 786	486
Jackson v Bell [2001] EWCA Civ 387	825
Jacubs v Rylance (1874) LR 17 Eq 341	352
Jafari-Fini v Skillglass Ltd [2007] EWCA Civ 261	1026
Jaffray v Marshall [1994] 1 All ER 143; [1993] 1 WLR 1289	861, 875–7
Jaggard v Sawyer [1995] 1 WLR 269; [1995] 2 All ER 189	4, 5, 1188–91, 1200, 1201, 1280
James, Ex p (1803) 8 Ves 337	371
James, Re [1935] Ch 449	266
James v Thomas [2007] EWCA Civ 1212; [2007] 3 FCR 696; [2008] 1 FLR 1598	775
James v United Kingdom (1986) 8 EHRR 123	837, 839
James v Williams [1999] 3 All ER 309; [1999] 3 WLR 451	550, 551, 646
Jefferys v Jefferys (1841) Cr & Ph 138	270, 273, 1176
Jeffrey v Gretton [2011] WTLR 809	861
Jenkin's WT, Re [1966] Ch 249	1159
Jennings v Rice [2003] 1 P & CR 100; [2002] EWCA Civ 159	41, 42, 657, 660, 661, 666, 668–70, 672, 673, 678–80, 704, 747, 754, 758–9, 767, 788
Jerome v Kelly [2004] 2 All ER 835; [2004] UKHL 25	547, 558, 633, 634, 635, 636, 647
Jervis v White (1802) 7 Ves 413	1244
JIH v Newsgroup Newspapers Ltd [2011] EWCA Civ 42; [2011] 2 FCR 95	1219, 1220
Joel, Re [1943] Ch 311	475
John v George and Walton (1996) 71 P & CR 375	652, 657, 664
John v John [1898] 2 Ch 573	1285
John's Assignment Trusts, Re [1970] 1 WLR 955	742
Johns v Johns [2004] NZCA 42, [2005] WTLR 529	187
Johnson, Re (1880) 15 Ch D 548	352
Johnson, Re [1939] 2 All ER 458	108
Johnson v Agnew [1980] AC 367	1239
Johnson v Gore-Wood & Co (No. 1) [2002] AC 1; [2001] 2 WLR 72; [2001] 1 All ER 481; [2001] BCC 820	417, 654
Johnson v R [1904] AC 817	1281
Johnson v Shippen (1703) 2 Ld Raym 982	930
Johnston v Swann (1818) 3 Madd 457	1147
Jones, Re [1931] 1 Ch 375	809
Jones, Re [1942] Ch 238	303
Jones, Re [1953] Ch 125	170
Jones v Badley (1868) 3 Ch App 362	4, 306
Jones v Challenger [1961] 1 QB 176	802, 803, 824

Jones v De Marchant (1916) 28 DLR 561	907, 908
Jones (FC) (A Firm) & Sons v Jones [1996] 3 WLR 703; [1996] 4 All ER 721; [1997] Ch 159	590, 865, 888, 891, 892, 894, 897–8, 899, 904, 958
Jones v Higgins (1866) LR 2 Eq 538	343
Jones v Jones [1972] 1 WLR 1269	495
Jones v Jones [1977] 1 WLR 438	669
Jones v Kernott [2011] UKSC 53; [2011] 2 WLR 1121; [2011] 3 FCR 495, SC; reversing [2010] EWCA Civ 578; [2010] 1 WLR 2401, CA	41, 42, 80, 519, 521, 564, 702, 706, 707–8, 709, 711, 739, 764, 765, 769, 770, 771, 773, 774, 777–84, 786, 787, 788, 789, 799, 827
Jones v Lenthal (1669) 1 Ch Cas 154	31
Jones v Lock (1865) 1 Ch App 25	94–5, 255
Jones v Maynard [1951] Ch 572	15, 32, 42, 527
Jones v Stones [1999] 1 WLR 1739	657, 681
Jones v Williams (1767) Amb 651	1133, 1134
Jorden v Money (1854) 5 HLC 185; (1854) 10 ER 866; [1843–60] All ER Rep 350	654, 655, 683, 944
Joscelyne v Nissen [1970] 2 QB 86	1242
Joseph's Will Trusts, Re [1959] 1 WLR 1019	294, 489
JSC BTA Bank v Solodchenko [2010] EWCA Civ 1436; [2011] 1 WLR 886	1196
JT Developments v Quinn (1990) 62 P & CR 33	664
Judd v Brown [1998] 2 FLR 360	822, 823
K (Deceased), Re [1986] Ch 180	587, 588, 589
K v H (Child Maintenance) [1993] 2 FLR 61	842
Kais v Turvey (1994) 17 Fam LR 498	792
Kasperbauer v Griffith [2000] 1 WTLR 333	637
Kastner v Jason [2004] EWCA Civ 1599	664
Kasumu v Baba-Egbe [1956] AC 539	1244
Kaupthing Singer & Friedlander Ltd (No 2), In re , joined with Mills v HSBC Trustee (CI) Ltd [2011] UKSC 48; [2011] Bus LR 1644	106
Kaye v Zeital [2010] EWCA Civ 159; [2010] 2 BCLC 1	263
Kayford Ltd, Re [1975] 1 WLR 279; [1975] 1 All ER 604	48, 49, 66–7, 94, 96–7, 99, 101, 105, 243, 275, 568, 1044, 1045, 1084, 1091
Kay's Settlement, Re [1939] Ch 329	270, 276, 277, 280
Kean v McDonald [2006] All ER (D) 348	722, 777
Keech v Sandford (1726) Sel Cas Ch 61; (1726) 2 Eq Cas Abr 741	45, 48, 50, 56, 267, 368, 369, 371, 372, 574, 598, 599, 600, 601, 603, 606, 613, 620, 624, 628, 690
Keen, Re [1937] Ch 236	310, 313, 317–19, 321
Keen v Stuckley (1721) Gilb Rep 155; (1721) 25 ER 109	1044
Keenaway v Thompson [1981] QB 88	1280
Kellaway v Johnson (1842) 5 Beav 319	860
Kellwark Properties Ltd v Waller [2002] EWCA Civ 1078; [2002] 48 EG 142	664
Kelly v Cooper [1993] AC 205	367
Kemp v Burn (1863) 4 Giff 348	403
Kemp v Kemp (1801) 5 Ves 849; (1795) 5 Ves 849; (1795) 31 ER 891	32, 146
Kenney v Wexham (1822) 6 Madd 355	1177
Kent & Sussex Sawmills Ltd, In re [1947] Ch 177	930
Keren Kayemeth Le Jisroel Ltd v IRC [1931] 2 KB 465	1136
Kerr v Baranow (2007) BCSC 1863; 10 ITEL 763	776
Khoo Tek Keong v Ch'ng Joo Tuan Neoh [1934] AC 529	450
Kilcarne Holdings Ltd v Targetfollow (Birmingham) Ltd [2004] EWHC 2547 (Ch); [2005] EWCA Civ 1355	559, 560, 561, 597, 675
Killen v Rennie [2005] NSWCA 392	793
Killey v Clough [1996] NPC 38	726

Kinane v Mackie-Conteh [2005] EWCA Civ 45; [2005] 2 P & CR D9; affirming [2004] EWHC 998 (Ch); [2004] 19 EGCS 164	632, 667, 675
King, Re [1923] 1 Ch 243	1160
King (Don) Productions Inc v Warren [1998] 2 All ER 608; affirmed [2000] Ch 291; [1999] 2 All ER 218, CA	96, 99–100, 113, 129, 270, 278, 280, 367, 1042
King v Jackson [1998] 1 EGLR 30	676
Kingdon v Castleman (1877) 46 LJ Ch 448	872
Kings v Bultitude [2010] EWHC 1795 (Ch)	1164
King’s WT, Re [1964] Ch 542; [1964] 1 All ER 833	72
Kingsnorth Finance v Tizard [1986] 2 All ER 54, Ch D	1248, 1259
Kirker v Ridley [2008] All ER (D) 179	559, 562
KJH v HGF [2010] EWHC 3064 (QB)	1227
Kleinwort Benson v Birmingham CC [1996] 4 All ER 733, CA	645, 889, 945
Kleinwort Benson v Lincoln City Council [1998] 4 All ER 511; [1998] 3 WLR 1097	545, 951, 1182, 1239
Kleinwort Benson v Sandwell BC [1994] 4 All ER 890	427, 676
Kleinwort Benson v South Tyneside MBC [1994] 4 All ER 972	427
Kleinwort’s Settlements, Re [1951] 2 TLR 91	361
Klug v Klug [1918] 2 Ch 67	400, 423
Knight v Boughton (1840) 11 Cl & Fin 513	49, 88, 89
Knight v Knight (1840) 3 Beav 148	8, 49, 88, 89, 92, 332
Knightsbridge Estates Trust v Byrne [1938] Ch 741	1043
Knott v Cottee (1852) 16 Beav 77; 16 Jur 752	404, 857
Knowles v Knowles [2008] UKPC 30	661
Koch Shipping Inc v Richards Butler (A Firm) [2002] EWCA Civ 1280; [2002] 2 All ER (Comm) 957	407
Koepler, Re [1984] 2 WLR 973	1112
Koeplers WT, Re [1986] Ch 423	1116, 1127
Koettgen’s Will Trusts, Re [1954] Ch 252	1131, 1132, 1168
Kok Hoong v Leong Cheong Kweng Mines Ltd [1964] AC 993	675
Kolb’s Will Trusts, Re [1962] Ch 531	125
Koulias v Makris [2005] All ER (D) 352	722
Kowalczyk v Kowalczyk [1973] 1 WLR 930	727
Krasner v Dennison [2000] 3 All ER 234	278
Kubianga v Ekpenyoung [2002] EWHC 1567 (Ch); [2002] 2 BCLC 597; [2003] BPIR 623	540
Kuddas v Chief Constable of Leicestershire [2002] 2 AC 122	877
Kuwait Oil Tanker Co SAK v Al Bader (No 3) (1999) The Independent , 11 January	592
Kyriakides v Pippas [2004] EWHC 646 (Ch); [2004] 2 P & CR D10	713
Lace v Chantler [1944] 1 All ER 305, CA	215
Lacey, Ex p (1802) 6 Ves 625	371, 372, 373, 374, 628
Lacey v Hill (1872) LR 8 Ch App 441	1277
Lagunas Nitrate Co v Lagunas Syndicate [1899] 2 Ch 392	1240
Laing (JW) Trust, Re [1984] Ch 143	1163
Lake v Bayliss [1974] 1 WLR 1073	632
Lalani v Crump [2007] EWHC 47	723
Lambert v Lambert [2002] EWCA Civ 1685	743
Lambert v Lewis [1982] AC 225	70
Lampitt v Poole Borough Council [1991] 2 QB 545	863
Lands Allotment Co, Re [1894] 1 Ch 616	613
Lane v Dighton (1762) Amb 409	544
Larner v Fawcett [1950] 2 All ER 727	930
Larner v London County Council [1949] 2 KB 683	936
Lashmar, Re (1891) 1 Ch D 258	48, 242, 292, 298

Laskar v Laskar [2008] EWCA Civ 347; [2008] 2 FLR 589	707, 776, 777
Lassence v Tierney (1849) 1 Mac & G 551	130
Lau Siew Kim v Yeo Guan Chye Terence and Another [2007] SGCA 54; [2008] 4 LRC 587	776
Lavelle v Lavelle [2004] EWCA Civ 223	519, 713
Lavery v Pursell (1888) 39 Ch D 508	1280
Law Debenture Trust Corporation plc v Elektrim Finance NV [2005] EWHC 1999 (Ch); [2005] All ER (D) 73 (Sep), Ch D; [2006] EWHC 1305 (Ch); [2006] All ER (D) 97 (Jun)	129, 875
Law Society of England and Wales v Habitable Concepts Ltd [2010] EWHC 1449 (Ch)	962, 1012
Law Society of England and Wales v Isaac [2010] EWHC 1670 (Ch)	962
Law Society of Upper Canada v Toronto Dominion Bank (1998) 169 DLR v 4th 353 v Ont Ca)	917
Layton v Martin [1986] 1 FLR 171; [1986] 2 FLR 227	747, 843
Lazard Bros and Co Ltd v Fairfield Properties Co (Mayfair) Ltd (1977) 121 SJ 793	1182
Le Cras v Perpetual Trustee Co Ltd; Far West Children's Health Scheme v Perpetual Trustee Co Ltd [1967] 3 All ER 915	1134
Le Foe v Le Foe [2001] 2 FLR 970	743
Leaf v International Galleries [1950] 2 KB 86	1241
Leahy v Attorney-General for New South Wales [1959] AC 457; [1959] 2 WLR 722	40, 64, 108, 180, 198–200, 202–6, 208–11, 219, 226, 229, 230, 233, 331–3, 1136, 1141
Leake v Bruzzi [1974] 1 WLR 1528	742
Learoyd v Whiteley (1887) 12 App Cas 727	347, 361, 423, 436, 438, 446, 449, 450
Lebon v Aqua Salt Co Ltd [2009] UKPC 2; [2009] 1 BCLC 549	968, 1026
Lechmere v Lady Lechmere (1735) 2 Eq Cas Abr 499; (1735) Cas temp Talb 80	1287
Ledger-Beadell v Peach [2006] All ER (D) 245	721
Lee v Futurist Developments Ltd [2010] EWHC 2764 (Ch); [2011] 1 BCLC 653	867
Leedham v Chawner (1858) 4 K & J 458	352
Leeds CC v Price [2006] UKHL 10; [2006] 2 WLR 570	825
Leeds (Duke of) v Lord Amherst (1843) 12 Sim 459; 60 ER 178	1277
Leek, Re [1967] Ch 1061; [1969] 1 Ch 563	161, 177
Leggatt v National Westminster Bank [2000] All ER (D) 1458 CA	1247, 1261
Lehman Bros International (Europe) (No 2), Re [2009] EWHC 3228 (Ch); [2010] EWHC 47 (Ch); [2010] 2 BCLC 301	133, 135–6, 917
Lehman Brothers International (Europe) (In Administration), Re [2011] EWCA Civ 1544	140–2
Lehman Brothers International (Europe) (in administration) v CRC Credit Fund Ltd, Re [2010] EWCA Civ 917	132, 136–40
Lemos v Coutts (Cayman) Ltd (2006–07) 9 ITEL 616	187
Lemos v Coutts & Co (1992) Cayman Islands ILR 460	401
Lennox Industries (Canada) Ltd v The Queen (1987) 34 DLR 297	590
Lepine, Re [1892] 1 Ch 210	357
Lepton's Charity, Re [1972] Ch 276	1162
Leslie Engineering Co, Re [1976] 1 WLR 292	1030
Letherbrow, Re [1935] WN 34	366
Letterstedt v Broers (1884) 9 App Cas 371	350
Leuty v Hillas (1858) 2 De GF & J 110	543
Lewis, Re [1904] 2 Ch 656	393
Lewis, Re [1955] Ch 104	1121, 1145
Lewis v Great Western Rly Co (1877) 3 QBD 195; [1874–80] All ER Rep Ext 1793	412
Lewis v Nobbs (1878) 8 Ch D 591	355
Lewis's of Leicester Ltd, Re [1995] 1 BCLC 428	100, 913
Liberty Mutual Assurance Co (UK) Ltd v Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation plc [2001] All ER (D) 72	1281
Lickbarrow v Mason (1787) 2 TR 63	683

1 Table of Cases

Life Association of Scotland v Siddal (1861) 3 De GF & J 58	1241
Liggett (B) (Liverpool) Ltd v Barclays Bank Ltd [1928] 1 KB 48	1283
Liggett v Kensington [1993] 1 NZLR 257	127
Lightfoot v Lightfoot-Brown [2004] EWCA 840; [2004] All ER (D) 92; [2005] All ER (D) 115	722, 760
Lillington, Re [1952] 2 All ER 184	265
Lim Teng Huan v Ang Swee Chuan [1992] 1 WLR 113	269, 273, 326, 335, 653, 656, 659, 746, 749, 750
Lind, Re [1915] 2 Ch 345	128, 248, 274
Lindsay, Re [1904] 2 Ch 785	864
Lindsay v Woodfull [2004] 2 BCLC 131	613
Lingard v Bromley (1812) 1 V & B 114	864
Linsley, Re [1904] 2 Ch 785	404
Lipinski's Will Trusts, Re [1976] Ch 235	180, 199, 206–11, 219, 223, 224, 230, 231, 233, 331, 332, 1153, 1165
Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale [1991] 2 AC 548; [1991] 3 WLR 10, HL	41, 590, 645, 889, 893, 896, 935, 937, 938, 939, 940, 942, 948, 954, 959, 1023, 1278
Lipman v Lipman (1989) 13 Fam LR 1	792
Lissimore v Downing [2003] 2 FLR 308	665, 666, 669, 745
Lister v Stubbs (1890) 45 Ch D 1	570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 577, 582, 583, 584, 586, 591
Lloyd v Dugdale [2002] 2 P & CR 13	565, 724
Lloyd v Pickering [2004] EWHC 1513 (Ch)	631
Lloyds Bank v Bundy [1975] QB 326	631, 1251, 1268
Lloyds Bank v Byrne (1991) 23 HLR 472; [1993] 1 FLR 369	820, 825, 842, 847, 848
Lloyds Bank v Carrick [1996] 4 All ER 630, CA	633, 657, 659, 681
Lloyds Bank v Duker [1987] 3 All ER 193	185
Lloyds Bank v Independent Insurance Co Ltd [1999] 2 WLR 986, CA	916, 919, 938, 940
Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1991] 1 AC 107; [1990] 2 WLR 865; [1990] 1 All ER 1111, HL	50, 525, 531, 544, 558, 561, 564, 630, 647, 668, 669, 703, 704, 705, 709, 710, 716, 718, 719–25, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 737, 741, 742, 744, 753, 754, 755, 757, 758, 760, 761, 762, 763, 765, 768, 769, 771, 772, 774, 776, 777, 786, 793, 794, 796, 797, 798, 799, 820, 840, 841, 843, 845
Lloyds Trust Instruments, Re (unreported, 24 June 1970)	165
Lock plc v Beswick [1989] 1 WLR 1268	1200
Lock v Westpac Banking Corp [1991] PLR 167	386
Lockhart v Reilly (1857) 25 LJ Ch 697	864
Lodge v National Union Investment Co Ltd [1907] 1 Ch 300	31, 1244
Lofthouse, Re (1885) 29 Ch D 921	476
Lokumal v Lotte Shipping [1985] Lloyd's Rep 28	655
London and Blackwall Railway Co v Cross (1886) 31 Ch D 354	1189
London and Regional Investments Ltd v TBI plc [2002] EWCA Civ 355; [2002] All ER (D) 369	560, 561
London and South Western Railway Co v Gomm (1882) 20 Ch D 562	297
London Hospital Medical College v IRC [1976] 1 WLR 613; [1976] 2 All ER 113	1126, 1129
London Joint Stock Bank Ltd v Macmillan [1918] AC 777	653, 660
London Wine Co (Shippers) Ltd, Re [1986] PCC 121	49, 88, 89, 116, 117, 118, 120, 122, 123
Londonderry's Settlement, Re [1965] Ch 918; [1965] 2 WLR 229; [1964] 3 All ER 855	393, 396, 397, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 1212
Lonrho Exports Ltd v Export Credits Guarantee Department [1999] CL 158	60, 1040
Lonrho plc v Fayed (No 2) [1991] 4 All ER 961; [1992] 1 WLR 1	344, 552, 592, 594–5, 951
Lopes, Re [1931] 2 Ch 130	1130, 1153
Lord and Fullerton's Contract, Re [1986] 1 Ch 228	420
Low v Bouverie [1891] 3 Ch 82	1235

Lowson v Coombs [1999] Ch 373; [1999] 1 FLR 799	535, 537
Lucking's Will Trusts, Re [1968] 1 WLR 866	467
Luke v South Kensington Hotel Co (1879) 11 Ch D 121	348, 862
Luo v The Estate of Hui (2007) 11 ITELR 218	725
Lupton v White, White v Lupton (1808) 15 Ves 432; [1803–13] All ER Rep 336	907, 908, 934
Lyall v Edwards (1861) 6 H & N 337; (1861) 158 ER 139	420, 624, 881
Lyell v Kennedy (1889) 14 App Cas 437	643
Lyle-Meller v A Lewis & Co [1956] 1 WLR 29	653, 660, 661
Lysaght, Re [1966] 1 Ch 191	1162
Lysaght v Edwards (1876) 2 Ch D 499	296, 547, 558, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636
Lysus v Prowsa Developments Ltd [1982] 1 WLR 1044	34, 241, 252, 565
M v B (Ancillary Proceedings: Lump Sum) [1998] 1 FLR 53, CA	842
M (K) v M (H) (1993) 96 DLR (4th) 449	687
Mabo v Queensland (No 2) (1992) 175 CLR 1	697
McCausland v Duncan Lawrie Ltd [1997] 1 WLR 38	676
M'Cormack v M'Cormack (1877) 1 LR Ir 119	1242
McCormick v Grogan (1869) LR 4 HL 82	4, 34, 306, 308, 317, 320
McDonald v Horn [1995] 1 All ER 961	422
McDowell v Hirschfield Lipson & Rumney and Smith [1992] 2 FLR 126	827
Macduff, Re ; Macduff v Macduff [1895–9] All ER Rep 154; [1896] 2 Ch 451	1113, 1134
Macedo v Stroud [1922] 2 AC 330	271
M'Fadden v Jenkyns (1842) 12 LJ Ch 146	88, 241, 243, 246, 332
MacFarlane v MacFarlane [1972] NILR 59	740, 741
McGeorge, Re [1963] 2 WLR 767	478
McGovern v Attorney-General [1982] 2 WLR 222; [1982] Ch 321	1116, 1127, 1128
McGrath v Wallis [1995] 2 FLR 114	527
McGuane v Welch [2008] EWCA Civ 785	561, 669, 671
McGuckian v IRC [1997] STC 908	111
McHardy v Warren [1994] 2 FLR 338	703, 712, 718, 721, 738–9, 740, 741
McIlkenny v Chief Constable of the West Midlands [1980] 1 QB 283	654
McInerney v McDonald (1992) 93 DLR (4th) 415	687, 695
McIntosh v Great Western Railway Co (1850) 2 Mac & G 74; 42 ER 29	1277
MacJordan Construction Ltd v Brookmount Erostin Ltd [1992] BCLC 350	88, 117, 120, 121, 124, 132, 133, 142, 143, 427, 921, 1087, 1088
Mackenzie v Coulson (1869) LR 8 Eq 368	1242
McKenzie v McKenzie [2003] EWHC 601	725
Mackreth v Symmons (1808) 15 Ves 329; 33 ER 778	931
McLurcan v McLurcan (1897) 77 LT 474	631
McMaster v Byrne [1952] 1 All ER 1363	687
Macmillan v Bishopsgate (No 3) [1996] 1 WLR 387	427, 1015
Macnamara v Jones (1784) 2 Dick 587	351
MacNiven v Westmoreland Investments Ltd [2001] STC 327	111
McPhail v Doulton [1971] AC 424; [1970] 2 WLR 1110	32, 49, 88, 89, 146, 155–7, 158, 159, 160, 164, 167, 169, 174, 176, 177, 423, 424
Madden v Quirk [1989] 1 WLR 702	864
Maddock, Re [1902] 2 Ch 220	315
Maersk Air Ltd v Expeditors International (UK) Ltd [2003] 1 Lloyd's Rep 491	937
Magenta Finance & Trading Co v Savings and Investment Bank (In Liquidation) [1985] Fin LR 237	1069
Magnus v Queensland National Bank (1888) 37 Ch D 466	860
Maguire v Makaronis (1997) 144 ALR 729	687
Maharaj v Shand [1986] AC 898	669
Mahoney v Purnell [1996] 3 All ER 61	1240, 1263

Malcolm v O’Callaghan (1837) 3 Myl & Cr 52	351
Malik v Bank of Credit and Commerce International [1997] 3 All ER 1	420, 881
Mallott v Wilson [1903] 2 Ch 494	315, 483
Malory Enterprises Ltd v Cheshire Homes Ltd [2002] Ch 216	1288
Manifest Shipping Co Ltd v Uni-Polaris Insurance Co Ltd [2003] 1 AC 469	985, 1013
Manisty’s Settlement, Re [1974] Ch 17; [1973] 2 All ER 1203	146, 170, 171, 172
Mann v Coutts & Co [2003] EWHC 2138; [2004] 1 CLC 301	102
Manolakaki v Constantinides [2004] EWHC 749	962, 978, 1028
Mara v Browne [1896] 1 Ch 199	643, 646, 980, 1056
Mareva Compania Naviera SA v International Bulk Carriers SA [1975] 2 Lloyd’s Rep 509	1195
Margaretta Ltd, Re ; Freeman v Customs and Excise [2005] All ER (D) 262 (Feb)	1078
Mariette, Re [1915] 2 Ch 284	1129
Markel International Insurance Co Ltd v Higgins [2009] EWCA Civ 790	962, 972
Markel International Insurance Co Ltd v Surety Guarantee Consultants Ltd [2008] EWHC 1135 (Comm)	611, 962, 964, 994, 995–6
Marks & Spencer plc v Freshfield Bruckhaus Deringer [2004] 3 All ER 773; [2004] EWHC 1337 (Ch)	405, 407, 688, 1205
Markwell’s Case (1872) 21 WR 135	366
Marquis-Antle Spousal Trust v R 2009 TCC 465; 12 ITELR 314	110, 257
Marshall, Re [1914] 1 Ch 192	358
Marshall v Crutwell (1875) LR 20 Eq 328	527, 528
Marshall’s WT, Re [1945] Ch 217	63
Martin, Re (1977) 121 SJ 828	1124
Martin v Myers [2004] EWHC 1947 (Ch)	550, 553
Martineau v Kitchling (1872) LR 7 QB 436	127
Maryon-Wilson’s Estate, Re [1912] 1 Ch 55	454
Mascall v Mascall (1984) 50 P & CR 119	260, 264
Mason v Fairbrother [1983] 2 All ER 1078	486
Massingberd’s Settlement, Re (1890) 63 LT 296	57, 404, 462, 857, 860, 867, 871
Matharu v Matharu [1994] 2 FLR 597; (1994) 68 P & CR 93	657, 659
Mayo, Re [1943] Ch 302	824
MCP Pension Trustees Ltd v AON Pension Trustees Ltd [2010] EWCA Civ 377; [2011] 1 All ER (Comm) 228	1016
Medforth v Blake [2000] Ch 86	57, 937
Meek v Bennie [1940] NZLR 1	391
Memory Corporation plc v Sidhu (No 2) [2000] 1 WLR 1443	1196
Mengel’s Will Trusts, Re [1962] Ch 791	1286
MEP v Rothschild Trust Cayman Limited (Cause Nos 128 of 2009 and 576 of 2005)	494
Mercedes Benz AG v Leiduck [1996] AC 284	29, 577, 1187
Meridian Global Funds Management Asia Ltd v Securities Commission [1995] 3 All ER 918; [1995] 2 BCLC 116	968, 1026
Metropolitan Bank v Heiron (1880) 5 Ex D 319	575
Mettoy Pension Trustees Ltd v Evans, Re [1990] 1 WLR 1587; [1991] 2 All ER 513	162, 163, 171, 378, 379, 381, 383, 384, 388, 390, 424
Meyers, Re [1951] Ch 534	1159
Midland Bank v Cooke [1995] 4 All ER 562; [1996] 1 FCR 442	32, 80, 631, 703, 716, 718, 726, 728, 738, 740, 741, 742, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 771, 780, 788, 794, 797, 798, 814, 843, 846
Midland Bank v Dobson [1986] 1 FLR 171	724, 748
Midland Bank v Greene [1994] 2 FLR 827	1247, 1256, 1273
Midland Bank v Massey [1995] 1 All ER 929	1247, 1256, 1266, 1269
Midland Bank v Serter [1995] 1 FLR 367	1269, 1270
Midland Bank Trust Co v Green [1981] AC 513; [1981] 2 WLR 28	565, 592, 848, 849, 1248
Midland Bank Trustee (Jersey) Ltd v Federated Pension Services Ltd [1996] PLR 179; [1995] JLR 352	410, 414

Midland Bank v Wyatt [1997] 1 BCLC 242; [1995] 1 FLR 697; [1995] 3 FCR 11	32, 52, 110–11, 112, 194, 195, 196, 373, 537–41, 629
Millar v Hornsby (2000) 3 ITELR 81	399
Miller v Miller: Macfarlane v Macfarlane [2006] UKHL 24; [2006] 2 AC 618; [2006] 3 All ER 1; [2006] 2 WLR 1287, HL	492, 493, 840
Miller v Stapleton [1996] 2 All ER 449	394
Miller v Sutherland (1991) 14 Fam LR 416	792
Miller’s Deed Trusts, Re (1978) 75 LS Gaz 454	871, 874
Mills, Re [1930] 1 Ch 654	162
Mills v Sports Direct Retail Ltd, Re Kaupthing Singer Friedlander [2010] EWHC 1072 (Ch); [2010] 2 BCLC 143	100, 103–6, 281
Milltown (Earl of) v Stewart (1837) 3 My & Cr 18	1244
Milroy v Lord (1862) 4 De GF & J 264	32, 34, 49, 64, 71, 73, 92, 114, 185, 241, 245, 246, 255–8, 262, 264, 270, 322, 324, 329, 332, 335, 567
Ministry of Health v Simpson [1951] AC 251	1030
Minwalla v Minwalla [2004] EWHC 2823 (Fam); [2004] 7 ITELR 457	112, 539, 1057
Mirza v Mirza [2009] 2 FCR 12	775
Mitchell v Homfray (1881) 8 QBD 587	1253
MNB v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2011] EWHC 528 (QB)	1227
Mollo v Mollo [2000] WTLR 227	630
Monaghan CC v Vaughan [1948] IR 306	667
Mond v Hyde [1999] QB 1097	355
Monetary Fund v Hashim (1994) The Times , 11 October	864, 885
Monk, Re [1927] 2 Ch 197	1125
Montagu, Re ; Derbshire v Montagu [1897] 2 Ch 8; 66 LJ Ch 539; 13 TLR 397	486
Montagu’s Settlement Trust, Re ; Duke of Manchester v National Westminster Bank [1987] Ch 264; [1987] 2 WLR 1196	5, 51, 460, 548, 855, 954, 955, 969, 1010, 1012, 1014, 1016, 1022, 1023, 1249, 1276
Moon v Franklin [1996] BPIR 196	540
Moore v M’Glynn (1894) 1 IR 74	350
Moore v Williamson [2011] EWHC 672 (Ch); [2011] 2 P&CR DG9	93
Moorgate Mercantile Co Ltd v Twitching [1977] AC 890, HL; [1976] 1 QB 225, CA	653, 661
Morgan Grenfell & Co v Welwyn Hatfield DC [1995] 1 All ER 1	456, 457
Morice v Bishop of Durham (1805) 10 Ves 522; [1803] All ER Rep 451 (LC); affirming (1804) 9 Ves 399	49, 57, 64, 89, 91, 145, 146, 175, 180, 197, 198, 219, 324, 342, 421, 511, 1054, 1113, 1144
Morison v Moat (1851) 9 Hare 241	1213
Morley v Loughman [1893] 1 Ch 736	1251
Morley v Morley (1678) 2 Cas	70
Morris (deceased), In Re [1971] P 62	642
Morris v Morris [1982] 1 NSWLR 61	671
Morris v Morris [2008] EWCA Civ 257	765, 775
Mortgage Corporation v Shaire [2001] Ch 743; [2001] 4 All ER 364; [2000] 1 FLR 973	819, 820, 825, 826
Moses v Macferlan (1760) 2 Burr 1005	558
Moss, Re [1949] 1 All ER 495	1153
Moss v Cooper (1861) 4 LT 790; (1861) 1 J & H 352	310, 311
Mossop v Mossop [1989] Fam 77	843
Motivex Ltd v Bulfield [1988] BCLC 104	370
Mountford (Lord) v Lord Cardogan (1810) 17 Ves 485	858
Mountney v Treharne [2002] EWCA Civ 1174; [2002] BPIR 1126	631
Moyle v Moyle (1831) 2 Russ & M 710	355, 357
MT Realisations Ltd v Digital Equipment Co Ltd [2003] 2 BCLC 117	1008

Muckleston v Brown (1801) 6 Ves 52	530, 531
Muller, Re [1953] NZLR 879	544
Mulligan, Re [1998] 1 NZLR 481	864, 885
Multi Guarantee Co Ltd, Re [1987] BCLC 257	100, 105
Multiservice Bookbinding v Marden [1979] Ch 84	1043
Mundy v Brown [2011] EWHC 377 (Ch)	1084
Munton, Re [1927] 1 Ch 262	348, 863, 880
Murad v Al-Saraj [2004] EWHC 1235 (Ch); [2005] EWCA Civ 939	559, 564, 605, 618, 621
Murawski's WT, Re [1971] 2 All ER 328	1153
Murphy v Gooch [2007] 3 FCR 96	733
Murphy v Murphy [1999] 1 WLR 282	187, 394, 399
Murray v Express Newspapers [2009] Ch 481	1223, 1224, 1226
Murray v Parker (1854) 19 Beav 305	1242
Muschinski v Dodds (1985) 160 CLR 583	845
Mussoorie Bank v Raynor (1882) 7 App Cas 321	108
Nant-y-glo & Blaina Ironworks Co v Grave (1878) 12 Ch D 738	875
Nanwa Gold Mines Ltd, Re [1955] 3 All ER 219; [1955] 1 WLR 1080	97
Napier (Lord) and Ettrick v RF Kershaw Ltd [1993] AC 713	1283
National Anti-Vivisection Society v IRC [1940] AC 31	1114, 1115, 1116, 1149, 1151
National Funds Assurance Co, Re (1878) 10 Ch D 118	38
National Permanent Benefit Building Society, ex p Williamson, Re (1869) 5 Ch App 309	1282
National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth [1965] AC 1175; [1965] 3 WLR 1; sub nom National Provincial Bank v Hastings Car Mart Ltd [1965] 2 All ER 472	76–7, 843, 1288
National Westminster Bank plc v Amin [2002] 1 FLR 735	1267
National Westminster Bank plc v Breeds [2001] All ER (D) 5	1271
National Westminster Bank plc v Jones [2001] 1 BCLC 98	539
National Westminster Bank plc v Morgan [1985] AC 686	1251, 1261, 1262
National Westminster Bank plc v Somer International (UK) Ltd [2001] Lloyd's Rep Bank 263; [2002] QB 1286, CA	684, 889, 944, 948
Natural Extracts Pty Ltd v Stoller (1997) 24 ACSR 110	1025
Neal, Re (1966) 110 SJ 549	1124
Neale v Willis (1968) 110 SJ 521	592
Neary v Dean of Westminster [1999] IRLR 288	688
Nel v Kean [2003] WTLR 501	1253
Nelson, Re [1928] Ch 920	59, 184, 185, 188
Nelson v Rye [1996] 1 WLR 1378	31
Nessom v Clarkson (1845) 4 Hare 97	31
Nestlé v Barclays Bank [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep 658	567–8, 568–9
Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [2000] WTLR 795	395, 432, 438, 440, 447, 448, 450, 451
Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc (No 2) [1993] 1 WLR 1260; [1994] 1 All ER 118	354, 357, 359, 362, 444, 449, 450, 452, 453, 463, 469, 861, 871, 874, 876, 880, 883, 1048
Neville Estates v Madden [1962] Ch 832	228, 231, 235, 1141
Neville v Wilson [1997] Ch 144; [1996] 3 WLR 460; [1996] 3 All ER 171	36, 50, 242, 296, 297, 299, 488, 631, 632, 637, 1174, 1279
New, Re [1901] 2 Ch 534	485, 486
New York Breweries Co Ltd v Attorney-General [1899] AC 62	366
New Zealand Netherlands Society 'Oranje' Inc v Kuys [1973] 1 WLR 1126; [1973] 2 All ER 1222	606, 614
Newbigging v Adam (1886) 34 Ch D 582	1240
Newgate Stud Co v Penfold [2004] EWHC 2993 (Ch)	370, 372, 410, 416

Newlon Housing Trust v Alsulaimen [1999] 1 AC 313; [1998] 4 All ER 1	281
Newton v Askew (1848) 11 Beav 145	403
NGN Staff Pension Plan Trustees Ltd v Simmons [1994] OPLR 1	393
NHS Pensions v Beechinor [1997] OPLR 99	394
Niagara Mechanical Services International Ltd (in administration), Re [2001] BCC 393	1081
Nicholls v Lan [2006] EWHC 1255 (Ch); [2007] 1 FLR 744; [2006] All ER (D) 16 (Jun)	822–5
Nimmo v Westpac Banking Corporation [1993] 3 NZLR 218	896
Niru Battery Manufacturing Co v Milestone Trading Ltd [2004] 2 WLR 1415; [2004] 1 Lloyd's Rep 344; [2003] EWCA Civ 1446; [2002] EWHC 1425 (Comm); [2002] All ER (Comm) 705	593, 936, 937, 940, 944, 1012, 1020, 1022, 1313
Nixon v Nixon [1969] 1 WLR 1676	525, 715, 728, 742
Niyazi's WT, Re [1978] 1 WLR 910	1122
Nocton v Lord Ashburton [1914] AC 932	57, 367, 462, 687, 854, 865, 866, 872
Norberg v Wyrinb (1992) 92 DLR (4th) 449	695
Norfolk's (Duke of) Settlement Trusts, In Re [1979] Ch 37; [1982] Ch 61	352, 408
Norman v Federal Commissioner of Taxation (1963) 109 CLR 9	128, 247
North Devon and West Somerset Relief Fund, Re [1953] 1 WLR 1260	1162
Northern Developments Holdings Ltd, Re (1978) (unreported) 6 October	1069, 1092
Nottage, Re (1885) 2 Ch D 649; [1895] 2 Ch D 517	202, 1129, 1150
Nottingham University v Fishel [2000] IRLR 471	688
Oakes, Re [1917] 1 Ch 230	1285
Oakes v Turquand (1867) LR 2 HL 325	1241
Oates v Stimson [2006] EWCA Civ 548	729, 762
Oatway, Re [1903] 2 Ch 356	906, 910
O'Connor v Spaight (1804) 1 Sch & Lef 305	1277
Ocular Sciences Ltd v Aspect Vision Care Ltd [1997] RPC 289	577
Odessa, The [1916] 1 AC 145	1065
Ogden, Re [1933] Ch 678	204
Ojje Trust, Re [1993] CILR 348	398
Oldham, Re [1925] Ch 75	641
Oldham Borough Council v Attorney-General [1993] Ch 210	1163
Olins v Walters [2009] 2 WLR 1	639, 640
Oliver v Bank of England [1902] 1 Ch 610	654
Oliver v Court (1820) 8 Price 127	880
Omar Family Trust, Re [2000] WTLR 713	422
O'Neill v Phillips [1999] 2 All ER 961	1057–8, 1059
Onions v Cohen (1865) 2 H & M 354	1244
Ontario Securities Commission, Re (1985) 30 DLR v 4d) 30	912, 913
Oppenheim v Tobacco Securities Trust Co Ltd [1951] AC 297; [1951] 1 All ER 31	40, 1106, 1108, 1118, 1119, 1131, 1133, 1135, 1146, 1167
Orakpo v Manson Investments Ltd [1978] AC 95; [1997] 1 WLR 347	1283
Ord v Upton [2000] Ch 352	551
Orgee v Orgee (1997) unreported, 5 November	659
O'Rourke v Darbishire [1920] AC 581	393, 394, 396, 397, 398, 399
Osoba, Re [1979] 2 All ER 393	212, 511
Ottaway v Norman [1972] Ch 698; [1972] 2 WLR 50	34, 301, 307–9, 312, 324, 326, 642
Ottoy v Grundy [2003] EWCA Civ 1176; [2003] WTLR 1253	760, 798
Oughtred v IRC [1960] AC 206	242, 295–7, 299, 331, 631, 637
Outram v Academy Plastics [2000] PLR 283	394
Owen v Homan (1853) 4 HLC 997	1285
Owen v Wilkinson (1858) 5 CB (NS) 526	526
Owens, Re (1882) 47 LT 61	472
Oxford v Provan (1868) 5 Moo PC (NS) 150	31

Oxford's (Earl of) Case (1615) 1 Ch Rep 1; (1615) 21 ER 484	4, 5, 7, 10, 13, 14, 17, 22, 29, 35, 37, 63, 181, 328, 550, 647, 650, 1304
Oxley, Re [1914] 1 Ch 604	351
Oxley v Hiscock [2004] 3 All ER 703	704, 709, 721, 723, 727, 755, 756, 758, 761, 762, 765, 767, 768, 769, 771, 773, 774, 780, 788, 798, 799
Packe, Re [1918] 1 Ch 437	1158
Page, Re [1893] 1 Ch 304	403
Paine v Meller (1801) 6 Ves 349; 31 ER 1088	632, 634
Painter v Hutchison [2007] EWHC 758 (Ch); [2008] BPIR 170	535, 537, 710
Pakistan v Zadari [2006] EWHC 2411 (Comm); [2006] All ER (D) 79 (Oct)	580
Palette Shoes Pty Ltd v Krohn (1937) 58 CLR 1	248, 274
Palk v Mortgage Services Funding plc [1993] 2 WLR 415	693
Pallant v Morgan [1953] Ch 43; [1952] 2 All ER 951	559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564
Palmer v Blue Circle Southern Cement Ltd [2001] RLR 137	938
Palmer (Deceased), Re [1994] 2 FLR 609	827
Palmer v Jones (1862) 1 Ven 144	872, 876
Palmer v Locke (1880) 15 Ch D 294	162
Palmer v Simmonds (1854) 2 Drew 221	118, 130
Panatown Ltd v Alfred McAlpine Construction Ltd [2000] 4 All ER 97	274
Papamichael v National Westminster Bank plc [2003] EWHC 164 (Comm); [2003] 1 Lloyd's Rep 341	1011
Papanicola v Fagan [2008] EWHC 3348 (Ch); [2008] BPIR 320	541
Paradise Motor Company Ltd, Re [1968] 1 WLR 1125; [1968] 2 All ER 625	281, 520
Paragon Finance plc v DB Thakerar & Co [1999] 1 All ER 400	50, 547, 550, 565, 596, 886, 980
Parinv (Hatfield) Ltd v IRC [1998] STC 305	296
Parker v McKenna (1874) 10 Ch App 96	370, 371
Parker v Taswell (1858) 27 LJ Ch 812	295, 632
Parkin, Re [1892] 3 Ch 510	250
Parkin v Thorold (1852) 16 Beav 59	32
Partington v Reynolds (1858) 4 Drew 253	404
Partridge v Equity Trustees Executors and Agency Co Ltd (1947) 75 CLR 149	473
Partridge v Partridge [1894] 1 Ch 351	30
Pascoe v Turner [1979] 2 All ER 945; [1979] 1 WLR 431	80, 268, 326, 334, 653, 656, 658, 660, 668–71, 681, 750, 751, 757, 796
Pass v Dundas (1880) 43 LT 665	409
Passee v Passee [1988] 1 FLR 263	731
Paton v British Pregnancy Advisory Service Trustees [1979] QB 276	1190
Patten, Re [1929] 2 Ch 276	1129, 1150
Paul v Constance [1977] 1 WLR 527	32, 48, 49, 70, 88, 89, 90, 93–4, 95, 102, 113, 137, 243, 251, 255, 329, 429, 1045, 1075, 1085
Paul v Paul (1882) 20 Ch D 742	52, 89, 198, 245, 249, 270, 272, 279, 335, 393, 484, 510, 1047
Pauling's Settlement Trusts, Re [1964] Ch 303; [1964] 3 WLR 742; [1962] 1 WLR 86	448, 478, 884
Pavlou (a bankrupt), Re [1993] 3 All ER 955; [1993] 1 WLR 1046; [1993] 2 FLR 751	733, 742, 827
Payling's WT, Re [1969] 1 WLR 1595	1124
Peake v Highfield (1826) 1 Russ 559	1244, 1286
Pearce v Lloyds Bank plc [2001] EWCA Civ 1097	938, 942
Pechar, Re [1969] NZLR 574	589
Pecore v Pecore [2007] WTLR 1591, Supreme Court of Canada	520

Peczenik's Settlement Trusts, Re [1964] 1 WLR 720	454
Peek v Gurney (1873) LR 6 HL 377	306, 592, 1180, 1235
Peekay Intermark Ltd v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd [2005] EWHC 830 (Comm); reversed at [2006] EWCA Civ 386	104
Peffer v Rigg [1977] 1 WLR 285	565–6, 592, 848, 849
Peggs v Lamb [1994] Ch 172	1163
Penn v Bristol and West Building Society [1995] 2 FLR 938	827, 848
Penn v Lord Baltimore (1750) 1 Ves Sen 444	181
Pennington v Waine [2002] 1 WLR 2075; [2002] 2 BCLC 448	260–3, 564
Percival v Wright [1902] 2 Ch 421	613
Performing Rights Society v London Theatre [1924] AC 1	128
Perpetual Trustees WA Ltd v Darvell [2002] WTLR 1349	448
Perrins v Bellamy [1899] 1 Ch 797; [1898] 2 Ch 519	417, 883
Perrins v Holland [2011] 2 WLR 1086	642
Perry v National Provincial Bank [1910] 1 Ch 464	1247
Peso Silver Mines Ltd v Cropper (1966) 58 DLR (2d) 1, Supreme Court of Canada	614
Peter v Beblow (1993) 101 DLR (4th) 621	790, 846
Peters (BA) plc (in administration), Re ; Moriarty v Atkinson [2009] BPIR 248; [2010] 1 BCLC 142; [2008] EWCA Civ 1604; [2011] WTLR 1661, CA	861, 917
Petit v Smith (1695) 1 P Wms 7	31
Petrotrade Inc v Smith [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep 486	576
Pettingall v Pettingall (1842) 11 LJ Ch 176	213
Pettitt v Pettitt [1970] AC 777; [1969] 2 WLR 966	32, 521, 525, 564, 710, 713, 714, 717, 729, 731, 741, 743, 768, 769, 770, 773, 774, 777, 789, 800, 843, 849
Pettkus v Becker (1980) 117 DLR (3d) 257	790, 793
Peyman v Lanjani [1985] Ch 457	1241
Phelps v Prothero (1855) 7 De GM & G 722; 44 ER 280	1280
Phillips v Phillips (1852) 9 Hare 471; 68 ER 596	1277
Pickard v Sears (1837) 6 A & E 469	683
Pierson v Garnet (1786) 2 Bro CC 226	118
Pilcher v Rawlins (1872) LR 7 Ch App 259	57, 642, 888, 890, 891
Pilkington v IRC [1964] AC 612	476, 478
Pilkington's Will Trusts, Re [1961] Ch 466	387
Pini v Roncoroni [1892] 1 Ch 633	1285
Pinion, Re [1965] Ch 85	1127
Pink Floyd Music Ltd v EMI Records Ltd [2010] EWCA Civ 0794	1230
Pink v Lawrence (1978) 36 P & CR 98	711, 726
Pitt v Holt [2011] EWCA Civ 197; [2011] 3 WLR 19; [2011] STC 809; [2013] UKSC 26	377–9, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391
Pitt v PHH Asset Management Ltd [1993] 4 All ER 961, CA	843
Pittortou, Re [1985] 1 WLR 58	823
Plimmer v Mayor of Wellington; also reported as Plimmer v City of Wellington Corporation (1884) 9 App Cas 699; [1881–5] All ER Rep Ext 1320	670–2, 675, 682
Plumptre's Marriage Settlement, Re [1910] 1 Ch 609	33, 250
PNC Telecom plc v Thomas (No 2) [2008] 2 BCLC 95	621
Polly Peck International v Nadir (No 2) [1992] 4 All ER 769; [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep 238; [1992] NLJR 675, CA; reversing [1993] BCLC 187, Ch D	14, 51, 548, 550, 644, 645, 893, 986, 1007, 1008, 1014, 1015–16, 1020, 1022, 1029, 1030
Popely v Heltfield Properties Ltd [2005] All ER (D) 287	559, 722
Posner v Scott-Lewis [1987] Ch 25	1178
Postlethwaite, Re (1888) 60 LT 514	373
Poulton's WT, Re [1987] 1 WLR 795	167
Powell v Benney [2007] EWCA Civ 1283	561, 669

Powell v United Kingdom (1987) 9 EHRR 241	838
Power's WT, Re [1951] Ch 1074	453
Powlett (Earl) v Herbert (1791) 1 Ves 297	880
Practice Direction [1994] 4 All ER 52	1198
President of India v La Pintada Compania Navigacion SA [1985] AC 104; [1984] 2 All ER 733	1281
Price, Re [1943] Ch 422	211
Price v Leeds CC [2005] EWCA Civ 289	825
Pridean Ltd v Forest Taverns Ltd (1996) 75 P & CR 447	561, 672
Primlake Ltd v Matthews [2006] EWHC 1227 (Ch)	960
Prudential Assurance Co v London Residuary Body [1992] 2 AC 388; [1992] 3 All ER 504	848
Prudential Assurance Co v Newman Industries Ltd (No 2) [1982] Ch 204; [1982] 1 All ER 354, CA	861
Pryce, Re [1917] 1 Ch 234	242, 270, 276, 277, 280
Public Trustee v Smith [2008] NSWSC 397, 10 ITELR 1018, Supreme Court New South Wales	112
Pugh's Will Trusts, Re [1967] 3 All ER 337	318
Pullan v Koe [1913] 1 Ch 9	270, 272–4, 279
Pumfrey, Re (1882) 22 Ch D 255	351, 354
Pusey v Pusey (1684) 1 Vern 273; 23 ER 465	1279
Q v Q [2008] EWHC 1874 (Fam); [2009] 1 P & CR D12 (also sub nom S v R)	535, 537
Qayyum v Hameed [2009] EWCA Civ 352; [2009] 3 FCR 545	562, 677
Quadrant Visual Communications v Hutchison Telephone [1993] BCLC 442	31
Quarter Master UK Ltd v Pyke [2005] 1 BCLC 245	615
Queensbury (Duke of) v Shebbeare (1758) 2 Eden 329	1205, 1206
Queensland Mines v Hudson (1977) 18 ALR 1	369, 607, 608, 609, 614, 623
R and S, In Re [2011] JRC 117	378, 385
R (Associated Newspapers Ltd) v The Right Honourable Lord Justice Leveson [2012] EWHC 57 (Admin); [2012] All ER (D) 101 (Jan)	1216
R v Attorney-General (2003) unreported; 17 March (Privy Council Appeal 61 of 2002)	1252, 1253
R v Chief National Insurance Commissioner ex p Connor [1981] 1 QB 758	588
R v Clowes (No 2) [1994] 2 All ER 316	142
R (Coke-Wallis) v Institute of Chartered Accountants [2011] 2 WLR 103	654
R v Common Professional Examinations Board, ex p Mealing-McCleod (2000) The Times , 2 May	515
R v Crayden [1978] 1 WLR 604	457
R v De Berenger (1814) 3 M & S 66	460
R v District Auditors ex p West Yorkshire CC (1985) 26 RVR 24	176
R v Ghosh [1982] 2 All ER 689; [1982] QB 1053	969, 975, 986, 1001
R v Governor of Pentonville Prison ex p Tarling (1978) 70 Cr App R 77, HL	591
R (Hodkin) v Registrar General of Births, Marriages and Deaths [2013] UKSC 77	1139
R v North & East Devon Health Authority, ex p Coughlan [2000] 3 All ER 850	1321
R v Preddy [1996] AC 815	896, 1302
R v Registrar General, ex p Segerdal [1970] 2 QB 697	1139
R v Seymour (Edward) [1983] AC 493	587
Rabaiotti's Settlements, In Re [2000] WTLR 953, Jersey Royal Court	402
Racal Group Services v Ashmore [1995] STC 1151	1242
Raffaele v Raffaele [1962] WAR 29	670
Raja v Lloyd's TSB Bank plc (2000) The Times , 16 May	886
Rakusen v Ellis Munday & Clarke [1912] 1 Ch 831; [1911–13] All ER Rep 813	405
Ralli's Will Trusts, Re [1964] 1 Ch 288; [1964] 2 WLR 144	58, 64, 128, 163, 248, 249, 269–71, 270, 276, 279, 335, 393, 399, 421
Ramsay v IRC [1981] STC 174; [1982] AC 300	69, 111, 1112

Ramsden v Dyson (1866) LR 1 HL 129	655, 656, 658, 664, 679, 681
Ramskill v Edwards (1885) 31 Ch D 100	864
Ramzan v Brookwide Ltd [2011] EWCA Civ 985	873
Randal v Cochran (1748) 1 Ves Sen 98	1283
Randall v Errington (1805) 10 Ves 423	371
Ranieri v Miles [1981] AC 1050	32
Rann v Hughes (1778) 7 TR 350, 4 Bro PC 27	70
Raval, Re [1998] 2 FLR 718	822, 823
Rawe v Chichester (1773) Amb 715	601
Raybould, Re [1900] 1 Ch 199	352
Rayner v Preston (1881) 18 Ch D 1	632, 634, 635
Reading v Attorney-General [1951] 1 All ER 617	576, 585, 688, 691
Reading v R [1949] 2 KB 232	375
Recher's Will Trusts, Re [1972] Ch 524; [1971] 3 WLR 321; [1971] 3 All ER 401	180, 206, 227, 228, 231–3, 331
Redgrave v Hurd (1881) 20 Ch D 1	1235, 1272
Redland Bricks Ltd v Morris [1970] AC 652	1191
Rees, Re [1950] Ch 284, CA	318
Regal (Hastings) Ltd v Gulliver [1942] 1 All ER 378; [1967] 2 AC 134n	370, 574, 602, 608, 614, 615, 616, 619–20, 621, 690, 691, 695
Registered Securities, Re [1991] 1 NZLR 545	912
Reibl v Hughes (1980) 114 DLR (3d) 1	695
Reid's Trustees v IRC (1926) 14 TC 512	69
Renton v Youngman (1995) 19 Fam LR 450	792
Resch's Will Trusts, Re [1967] 1 All ER 915	1121, 1129, 1146, 1155
Revel v Watkinson (1748) 27 ER 912	477
Revenue & Customs Commissioners v Trustees of the Peter Clay Discretionary Trust [2008] 2 WLR 1052	352
Reynolds, Re ; Official Assignee v Wilson [2007] NZCA 122; (2007–08) 10 ITELR 1064, NZ, CA	112, 504
RGST Settlement Trust, Re ; Ridgwell v Ridgwell [2007] EWHC 2666 (Ch); [2008] STC 1883, Ch D	490
Rhodes v Macalister (1923) 29 Com Cas 19, CA	579, 627
Rhone v Stephens [1994] 2 AC 310; (1993) 67 P & CR 9	1288, 1298
Richards v Delbridge (1874) LR 18 Eq 11	95, 114, 255
Richards v Mackay [1990] 1 OTR 1	345
Richardson v Shaw 209 US 365 (1908)	122
Richerson, Re [1892] 1 Ch 379	1286
Richstar Enterprises Pty Ltd v Carey (No 6) [2006] FCA 814	187–9
Ridgwell v Ridgwell [2008] WTLR 527	487
Ridsdel, Re [1947] Ch 597	473
Rimmer v Rimmer [1952] 2 All ER 863	527
Riordan v Banon (1876) LR 10 Eq 469	313
Riverlate Properties Ltd v Paul [1975] Ch 133	667, 1181, 1237, 1243
RJW & SJW v The Guardian Newspaper & Person or Persons Unknown (Claim No HQ09); Terry v Persons Unknown (The Trafigua case) [2010] EWHC 119 (QB); [2010] 1 FCR 659	1217, 1218, 1231
Roberts, Re [1946] Ch 1	519
Roberts (A) & Co Ltd v Leicestershire CC [1961] Ch 555	667, 1243
Roberts v Roberts (1818) Dan 143	530, 532
Roberts v Roberts [1905] 1 Ch 704	1236
Robinson, Re [1921] 2 Ch 332	1162
Robinson v Ommanney (1883) 23 Ch D 285	641
Robinson v Pett (1734) 3 Peere Wms 249	343, 376
Robinson v Reeve [2002] EWHC 1179 (Ch)	630

Robinson v Robinson (1851) 1 De GM & G 247	453
Rochefoucauld v Boustead [1897] 1 Ch 196	4, 8, 9, 28, 34–6, 241, 252, 253, 264, 301, 320, 327, 373, 524, 547, 565, 592, 629, 684, 1250, 1313
Rockbrook Ltd v Khan [2006] EWHC 101 (Ch)	1018
Rodway v Landy [2001] Ch 703; [2001] EWCA Civ 471	809–11
Rogers, Re (1891) 8 Morr 243	1071, 1080, 1081
Roger's Question, Re [1948] 1 All ER 328	731
Rolls v Miller (1884) 27 Ch D 71	457
Roscoe v Winder [1915] 1 Ch 62	888, 904, 916, 918
Rose, Re ; Midland Bank Executor and Trustee Co v Rose [1949] Ch 78	258–60
Rose (decd), Re ; Rose v IRC [1952] Ch 499; [1952] 1 All ER 1221	257–65, 285, 335, 484, 566–7
Rose (Frederick E) (London) Ltd v William H Pim Jnr & Co Ltd [1953] 2 QB 450	1242
Rose v Watson (1864) 10 HL Cas 672	931
Rosmanis v Jurewitsch (1970) 70 SR (NSW) 407	589
Rothmere Farms Pty Ltd v Belgravia Pty Ltd (1999) 2 ITEL 159	881
Rowan v Dann (1992) 64 P & CR 202	31
Rowe v Prance [1999] 2 FLR 787	646, 740
Rowley v Ginnever [1897] 2 Ch 503	351
Rowntree (Joseph) Memorial Trust Housing Association Ltd v Attorney-General [1983] 1 All ER 288	1121, 1122, 1123–4, 1125, 1129, 1144, 1145, 1146, 1155
Roy v Roy [1996] 1 FLR 541, CA	726
Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge [1998] 4 All ER 705 CA	1246, 1256, 1267
Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No 2) [2002] AC 773; [2001] 4 All ER 449	1247, 1251, 1254, 1256, 1261, 1263–5, 1267, 1269
Royal Bristol and Permanent Building Society v Bomash (1887) 35 Ch D 390	634, 966
Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 3 All ER 97; [1995] 2 AC 378	33, 50, 51, 58, 410, 417, 436, 460, 469, 548, 549, 550, 593, 643, 645, 647, 667, 695, 796, 855, 893, 954, 955, 957, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 967, 968, 969, 970–4, 975, 977, 978, 980, 984, 985, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 994, 995, 998, 999–1000, 1002, 1019, 1024, 1025, 1027, 1028, 1030, 1031, 1032, 1033, 1243, 1276
Royal Choral Society v IRC [1943] 2 All ER 101	1126
Royal College of Nursing v St Marylebone Corporation [1959] 3 All ER 663	1130
Royal College of Surgeons v National Provincial Bank [1952] AC 631	1130
Russell v Wakefield Waterworks Co (1875) LR 20 Eq 474	594, 596
Russell-Cooke Trust Co v Prentis [2003] 2 All ER 478	913, 914
Ryall v Ryall (1739) 1 Atk 59	544
Ryan v Macmath (1789) 3 Bro CC 15	1244
Ryan v Mutual Tontine Westminster Chambers Association [1893] 1 Ch 116	1178
Ryder v Bickerton (1743) 3 Swan 30n	403
Rymer, Re [1895] 1 Ch 19	1158
S, Re [2006] WTLR 1461	491
S (A Child) (Identification: Restrictions on Publication), Re [2004] UKHL 47; [2005] 1 AC 593; [2004] 4 All ER 687, HL	1221, 1222, 1228
S v R [2008] EWHC 1874 (Fam); [2009] 1 P & CR D12 (also sub nom Q v Q)	665, 748
S v S [2006] EWHC 2892 (Fam)	675
Sahota v Bains [2006] EWHC 131 (Ch)	297
Sainsbury (J) plc v O'Connor (Inspector of Taxes) [1991] STC 318	634
Salomon v A Salomon & Co Ltd [1897] AC 22	13, 196, 215, 221, 332, 613, 725
Saltman Engineering Co Ltd v Campbell Engineering Co Ltd (1948) 65 RPC 203	1208–10
Salisbury v Denton (1857) 3 K & J 529	1161

Samad v Thompson [2008] EWHC 2809 (Ch)	776
Sammur v Manzi [2008] UKPC 58; [2009] 1 WLR 1834	148
Samuel v Jarrah Timber Corp [1904] AC 323	712
Sandeman & Sons v Tyzack and Branfoot Steamship Co Ltd [1913] AC 680; [1911–13] All ER Rep 1013	907, 908, 934
Sanders v Buckley [2006] All ER (D) 307 (Dec)	1264
Sanders v Sanders (1881) 19 Ch D 373	29
Sanders' WT, Re [1954] Ch 265	1122
Sanderson v Walker (1807) 13 Ves 601	374, 629
Sanderson's Trust, Re (1857) 3 K & J 497	194
Sansom v Gardner [2009] EWHC 3369 (QB)	520
Sanwa Australia Finance Ltd v Finchill Pty Ltd [2001] NSWCA 466	938
Sargeant v National Westminster Bank (1990) 61 P & CR 518	372, 374
Satnam Investments Ltd v Dunlop Heywood & Co Ltd [1999] 3 All ER 652	603, 1017–18, 1025
Satterthwaite's WT, Re [1966] 1 WLR 277	1159
Saunders v Vautier (1841) 4 Beav 115; (1841) Cr & Ph 240	20, 57, 58, 59, 64, 71, 91, 147, 180–90, 192, 193, 197, 202, 207, 209, 212, 219, 224, 225, 245, 261, 262, 272, 293, 294, 298, 332, 335, 349, 421, 480, 484, 485, 488, 489, 512 515, 595, 711, 805, 819, 1052, 1054, 1087, 1293, 1298, 1300
Savile v Savile (1721) 1 P Wms 745; (1721) 24 ER 596	1044
Savill v Goodall [1993] 1 FLR 755	720
Saxone Shoe Co Ltd's Trust Deed, Re [1962] 2 All ER 904	174
Sayer, Re [1957] Ch 423	172
Scandinavian Trading Tanker Company AB v Flota Petrolera Ecuatoriana [1983] QB 549; [1983] 2 WLR 248	682, 1041
Scarlsbrick, Re [1951] Ch 622	1124, 1125
Schmidt v Rosewood Trust Ltd [2003] 2 AC 709; [2003] 2 WLR 1442; [2003] 3 All ER 76; [2003] UKPC 26	41, 146, 171, 190, 191, 393, 394, 395, 397, 398, 399, 401, 402, 403, 421, 1051, 1052
Schmidt (Walter J) & Co, Re , 298 F 314, 316 v 1923).	913
Schneider, Re (1906) 22 TLR 223	423
Schobelt v Barber [1967] 59 DLR (2d) 519 (Ont)	589
Schuppan (No 2), Re [1997] 1 BCLC 256	540
Scientific Investment Pension Plan Trusts, Re [1999] Ch 53	193, 194
Scotney v Lomer (1886) 29 Ch D 535	864
Scott v Federal Commissioner of Taxation (No 2) (1966) ALJR 265	112, 1057
Scott v National Trust [1998] 2 All ER 705	380
Scott v Scott [1913] AC 417	77, 1229
Scott v Scott (1963) 109 CLR 649	905
Scottish Burial Reform and Cremation Society v Glasgow City Council [1968] AC 138	1103, 1144, 1146
Scottish Equitable v Derby [2001] 3 All ER 818, CA; affirming [2000] 3 All ER 793, QBD	655, 684, 889, 935, 939, 944
Scottish & Newcastle plc v Lancashire Mortgage Corporation Ltd [2007] EWCA Civ 684	676
Scribes West Ltd v Relsa Anstalt [2004] EWCA Civ 1744	566
Seager v Copydex Ltd [1967] 1 WLR 923; (1967) RPC 349; [1967] 2 All ER 415	1208, 1209
Seb Trygg Holding Aktiebolag v Manches [2005] EWHC 35 (Comm)	1013
Second East Dulwich etc Building Society, Re (1899) 68 LJ Ch 196	883
Secretary of State for Justice v Topland Group plc [2011] EWHC 983 (QB)	962, 997
Seddon v Commercial Salt Co Ltd [1925] Ch 187	29
Sefton v Tophams Ltd [1965] Ch 1140	1279
Segelman, Re [1995] 3 All ER 676	1125
Seifert v Pensions Ombudsman [1997] 4 All ER 947	408
Sekhon v Alissa [1989] 2 FLR 94	525, 529

Selangor United Rubber Estates Ltd v Craddock (No 3) [1968] 1 WLR 1555; [1968] 2 All ER 1073	597, 646, 960, 965, 981
Selby-Walker, Re [1949] 2 All ER 178	477
Sellack v Harris (1708) 2 Eq Ca Ab 46	304, 316
Sempra Metals Ltd v IRC [2005] EWCA Civ 389; [2008] Bus LR 49; [2007] 3 WLR 354	557, 893, 1281
Sen v Headley [1991] Ch 425; [1991] 2 WLR 1312	241, 266
Sendo International Ltd (In Administration) [2006] EWHC 2935 (Ch); [2007] 1 BCLC 141	67
Series 5 Software v Clarke [1996] 1 All ER 853	1194
Serious Fraud Office v Lexi Holdings plc [2008] EWCA Crim 1443; [2009] 1 All ER 586	907
Shaker v Al-Bedrawi [2003] Ch 350; [2002] 4 All ER 835	861
Shalson v Mimran [2003] WTLR 1165	595
Shalson v Russo [2003] EWHC 1637 (Ch); [2005] Ch 281	568, 591, 595, 894, 1081
Sharman's Will Trusts, Re [1942] Ch 311	344
Sharpe (A Bankrupt), Re [1980] 1 WLR 219	671, 739, 745, 748, 750
Shaw, Re [1958] 1 All ER 245; [1957] 1 WLR 729	201, 1127–8
Shaw v Cates [1909] 1 Ch 389	468
Shaw v Foster (1872) LR 5 HL 321	632, 633, 634, 635
Shaw v Halifax Corp [1915] 2 KB 170	1120
Shaw's WT, Re [1952] Ch 163	1127
Shelfer v City of London Electric Lighting Co [1895] 1 Ch 287	1188, 1201, 1280
Shelley v Shelley (1868) LR 6 Eq 540	107
Shephard v Cartwright [1955] AC 431	529
Sheppard v Thompson (2001) unreported, 3 December	913
Shiloh Spinners v Harding [1973] AC 691	1287
Shirley (Edwin) Productions v Workspace Management Ltd [2001] 2 EGLR 16	564
Shovelar v Lane [2011] EWCA Civ 802; [2011] 4 All ER 669	638
Sick and Funeral Society of St John's Sunday School, Golcar, Re [1973] Ch 51	236, 238
Sidaway v Governors of Bethlem Royal Hospital [1984] 1 QB 515	695, 697
Siebe Gorman v Barclays Bank [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep 142	929
Sieff v Fox [2005] EWHC 1312 (Ch); [2005] 1 WLR 3811; [2005] 3 All ER 693	378, 382, 389, 390
Sigsworth, Re [1935] 1 Ch 89	587, 588
Silkstone and Haigh Moor Coal Co v Edey [1900] 1 Ch 167	368, 373
Simpson v Bathurst (1869) LR 5 Ch App 193	398
Simpson v Lord Howden (1837) 3 My & Cr 97	1244
Simpson v Simpson [1992] 1 FLR 601	511
Sinclair v Brougham [1914] AC 398	557
Sinclair Investment Holdings SA v Versailles Trade Finance Ltd (No 1) [2004] EWHC 2169 (Ch); [2004] All ER (D) 158 (Sep), Ch D	548, 594, 595
Sinclair Investment Holdings SA v Versailles Trade Finance Ltd (No 2) [2006] EWHC 573 v Ch)	1005
Sinclair Investment Holdings SA v Versailles Trade Finance Ltd (No 3) [2007] EWHC 915 (Ch); 10 ITELR 58; [2007] All ER (D) 283 (Apr), Ch D	598, 610–11, 1005
Sinclair Investments (UK) Ltd v Versailles Trade Finance Ltd (in administration) [2011] EWCA Civ 347; [2011] All ER (D) 321 (Mar); [2011] 3 WLR 1153, CA; affirming [2010] EWHC 1614 (Ch); [2010] All ER (D) 10 (Jul), Ch D	570, 572, 580–4, 585, 586, 587
Sinclair v Sinclair [2009] EWHC 926 (Ch)	662, 746
Sindall (William) v Cambridgeshire County Council [1994] 1 WLR 1016	1235
Siskina, The [1979] AC 210	1197
Skyparks Group plc v Marks [2001] WTLR 607	814, 823
Slamon v Planchon [2004] 4 All ER 407; [2004] EWCA Civ 799	93
Sledmore v Dalby (1996) 72 P & CR 196	660, 670, 681
Sleebush v Gordon [2004] All ER (D) 148	671

Slevin, Re [1891] 2 Ch 236	1160
Smart, In the Goods of [1902] P 238	303
Smelter Corporation of Ireland Ltd v O'Driscoll [1977] IR 305	1236
Smith, Re ; Public Trustee v Aspinall [1928] Ch 915, Ch D	59, 184, 186, 188, 189
Smith, Re (1902) 71 LJ Ch 411	366, 857
Smith, Re [1914] 1 Ch 937	204
Smith v Anderson (1880) 15 Ch D 247	63, 457, 613
Smith v Bolden (1863) 33 Beav 262	366
Smith v Clay (1767) 3 Bro CC 639	30
Smith v Cooper [2010] EWCA Civ 722	1254
Smith v Dale (1881) 18 Ch D 516	351
Smith v Jeyes (1841) 4 Beav 503	1285
Smith v Jones [1954] 2 All ER 823	1287
Smith v Kay (1859) 7 HLC 750	1251
Smith New Court v Scrimgeour Vickers [1997] AC 254	548, 549, 957
Smith's Estate, Re [1937] Ch 636	352
Smithson v Hamilton [2008] 1 WLR 1453; [2007] EWHC 2900 (Ch); [2008] 1 All ER 1216	383, 391
Snook v London and West Riding Investments Ltd [1967] 2 QB 786; [1967] 1 All ER 516	111, 112, 539, 1057
Snowden, Re [1979] 2 WLR 658; [1979] 2 All ER 172	306, 308, 317, 321, 323
Soar v Ashwell [1893] 2 QB 390	549, 643, 966
Société Italo-Belge v Palm and Vegetable Oils [1982] 1 All ER 19	682
Softcorp Holdings Pty Ltd v Commissioner of Stamps (1987) 18 ATR 813	192
Sohal's WT, Re [1958] 1 WLR 1243	1152
Solle v Butcher [1950] 2 QB 505; [1949] 2 All ER 1107	1238, 1256
Somerset, Re [1894] 1 Ch 231	434
Somerset (Duke of) v Cookson (1735) 3 P Wms 390; 24 ER 1114	1279
Somes, Re [1896] 1 Ch 250	162
South African Territories Ltd v Wallington [1898] AC 309	275, 1177
South Carolina Insurance Co v Assurantie NV [1987] 1 AC 24	1197
South Place Ethical Society, Re [1980] 3 All ER 918	1135, 1136, 1140, 1142, 1145, 1155
South Tyneside Metropolitan Borough Council v Svenska International plc [1995] 1 All ER 545	938, 941–2
South Western General Property Co Ltd v Marton (1982) 263 EG 1090	1236
Southampton City Council v Southampton Median Mosque Trust Ltd [2010] EWHC 2376 (Ch)	878
Southgate v Sutton [2009] EWHC 3270 (Ch); [2011] EWCA Civ 637	454, 478, 493, 494
Soutzos v Asombang [2010] EWHC 842 (Ch); [2010] BPIR 960	111, 1069
Sowden v Sowden (1785) 1 Bro CC 582	33, 1287
Space Investments Ltd v Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce Trust Co (Bahamas) Ltd [1986] 3 All ER 75; [1986] 1 WLR 1072	917, 932, 1301
Sparfax v Dommatt (1972) The Times , 14 July	167, 173
Speight v Gaunt (1883) 22 Ch D 727; (1883) 9 App Cas 1	347, 361, 365, 449, 450, 468, 482, 1048
Spellson v George (1992) 26 NSWLR 666	884
Spence, Re [1949] WN 237	313, 318
Spence, Re [1979] Ch 483	1159
Spence v Crawford [1939] 3 All ER 271	1240
Spencer's Case, Re (1583) 5 Co Rep 16	1297
Spencer's Will Trusts, Re (1887) 57 LT 519	318
Sphere Drake Insurance Ltd v Euro International Underwriting Ltd [2003] EWHC 1636 (Comm)	1028
Spiller v Maude (1881) 32 Ch D 158	1121

Sporrong v Sweden (1982) 5 EHRR 35	837, 839
Sprange v Barnard (1789) 2 Bro CC 585	118, 130, 163
Sprange v Lee [1908] 1 Ch 424	32
Spread Trustee Ltd v Hutcheson [2010] WTLR 315, Guernsey Court of Appeal	409, 412, 414
Springett v Dashwood (1860) 2 Giff 521	403
Springette v Defoe (1992) 24 HLR 552; [1992] 2 FLR 388	525, 703, 718, 721, 733, 734, 735, 738, 741, 755, 761, 766, 778
SR v CR [2009] 2 FLR 1083	493
Stack v Dowden [2007] UKHL 17; [2007] 2 AC 432; [2007] 2 WLR 831; [2007] 2 All ER 929; [2007] 2 FCR 280; [2007] 1 FLR 1858, HL; affirming [2005] EWCA Civ 855; [2006] 1 FLR 254, CA	41, 42, 80, 500, 521, 522, 630, 674, 703, 704, 706–7, 708, 709, 711, 723, 726, 733, 739, 755, 764–77, 779, 780, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 799
Staden v Jones [2008] EWCA Civ 936; [2008] 2 FLR 1931	707
Stafford (Earl of), Re [1980] Ch 28	473
Stainbank v Fenning (1851) 11 CB 51	930
Stainbank v Shepard (1853) 13 CB 418	930
Stallion (Porntip) v Albert Stallion Holdings [2009] EWHC 1950 (Ch); [2010] 1 FCR 145	673, 674, 751–2
Standard Bank London Ltd v The Bank of Tokyo Ltd [1995] 2 Lloyd’s Rep 169	938
Standard Chartered Bank v Pakistan National Shipping Corp [2003] 1 AC 959	1025
Stanley v IRC [1994] 1 KB 255	476
Stannard v Fisons Pension Trust Ltd [1991] PLR 225	386, 388, 424
Staplyton Fletcher Ltd, Re [1994] 1 WLR 1181	120, 127
Starglade v Nash [2010] EWCA Civ 1314	962, 964, 972, 991, 993, 996–8
State Bank of New South Wales v Swiss Bank Corporation (1995) 39 NSWLR 350	940
Statek Corp v Alford [2008] EWHC 32	968
Stead, Re [1900] 1 Ch 237	318
Steedman v Frigidaire Corp [1932] WN 248	1240
Steed’s Will Trusts, Re [1960] Ch 407	487
Stein v Blake [1996] 1 AC 243, HL	124, 196
Stent v Baillie (1724) 2 P Wms 217	1044
Stephens v Avery [1988] Ch 449	1203
Stephenson v Barclays Bank Trust Co Ltd [1975] 1 All ER 625; [1975] 1 WLR 882	45, 185, 357, 358
Stewart, Re [1908] 2 Ch 251	266
Stibbe, Re (1946) 175 LT 198	1287
Stimson’s Will Trusts, Re (1970)	1159
Stockert v Geddes (2000) 80 P & CR 11	630
Stoekert (Helga) v Margie Geddes [2004] UKPC 54	94
Stokes v Anderson [1991] 1 FLR 391	730, 755, 797
Stokes v Mardner [2011] EWHC 1179 (QB)	111
Stone v Hoskins [1905] P 194	641
Stone & Rolls Ltd v Moore Stephens [2008] Bus LR 1579	1026
Stoneleigh Finance Ltd v Phillips [1965] 2 QB 537	539
Stott v Milne (1884) 25 Ch D 710	352, 353
Stowe and Devereaux Holdings Pty Ltd v Stowe (1995) 19 Fam LR 409	792
Strakosch, Re [1949] Ch 529	1151
Stratheden, Re [1895] 3 Ch 265	1147
Street v Mountford [1985] 2 WLR 877; [1985] AC 809	111, 373, 629, 812
Strong v Bird (1874) LR 18 Eq 315	241, 265–7, 336
Stuart, Re [1897] 2 Ch 583	883
Stuart v Armourguard Security [1996] NZLR 484	400
Stuart-Hutcheson v Spread Trustee Co Ltd [2002] WTLR 1213	399

Stucley, Re [1906] 1 Ch 67	930
Sudbrook Trading Estate Ltd v Eggleton [1983] 1 AC 444	1173
Suffolk v Lawrence (1884) 32 WR 899	422
Sugden v Crosland (1856) 3 Sm & G 192; 65 ER 620	574
Sullivan v Henderson [1973] 1 WLR 333	1177
Sumitomo Bank v Tahir [1993] 1 SLR 735	573
Sutcliffe v Lloyd [2007] EWCA Civ 153	667, 672
Suttill v Graham [1977] 1 WLR 819	742
Sutton, Re (1885) 28 Ch D 464	1113
Sutton v Sutton [1984] Ch 184; [1984] 1 All ER 168; [1984] 2 WLR 146, Ch D	843
Swain v Law Society [1983] 1 AC 598, HL; Reversing [1981] 3 All ER 797, CA	108, 150, 687
Swallow Securities Ltd v Isenberg [1985] 1 EGLR 132	657
Swift v Dairywise Farms [2000] 1 All ER 320	129, 278, 1042
Swindle v Harrison [1997] 4 All ER 705	858, 867, 869, 1278
Swiss Bank Corporation v Lloyds Bank Ltd [1982] AC 584; [1980] 2 All ER 419, CA; [1982] AC 584; [1981] 2 All ER 449, HL	930
Sybron Corporation v Rochem Ltd [1984] Ch 112	688
Synge v Synge [1894] 1 QB 466	250
Tabor v Brooks (1878) 10 Ch D 273	423
Tai Hing Cotton Mill Ltd v Kamsing Factory [1979] AC 95	70
Tailby v Official Receiver (1888) 13 App Cas 523	128, 248, 273
Talbot v Earl of Radnor (1834) 3 My & K 252	422
Talbott v Duke of Shrewsbury (1714) Prec Ch 394	1287
Tang v Capacious Investments Ltd [1996] 1 AC 514; [1996] 1 All ER 193	869, 885, 934, 958
Tanner v Tanner [1975] 1 WLR 1346	843
Tappenden v Artus [1964] 2 QB 185	931
Target Holdings Ltd v Redfern [1996] 1 AC 421; [1995] 3 WLR 352; [1995] 3 All ER 785	8, 27, 45, 53, 56, 57, 65, 71, 147, 181, 349, 366, 379, 382, 392, 404, 427, 433, 439, 440, 444, 462, 612, 644, 796, 854–61, 855, 865–74, 876–81, 885, 891, 893, 895, 906, 910, 920, 956, 957, 962, 1006, 1021, 1032, 1042–3, 1076, 1276–9
Tarleton v Hornby (1835) 1 Y & C Ex 333	864
Tatham v Drummond (1864) 4 De GJ & Sm 484	1153
Tayeb v HSBC Bank plc [2004] 4 All ER 1024	1028
Taylor, Re [1940] Ch 481	211
Taylor v Davies [1920] AC 636	980
Taylor Fashions Ltd v Liverpool Victoria Trustee Co Ltd [1982] 1 QB 133; [1981] 2 WLR 576	653, 657–61, 664, 678, 681, 703, 747, 759
Taylor v Midland Bank Trust Co [1999] All ER (D) 831; (2000) 2 ITELR 439; [2002] WTLR 95	408, 411, 415, 970
Taylor v Neate (1888) 39 Ch D 538	1285
Taylor v Plumer (1815) 3 M & S 562	892, 898
Taylor v Taylor (1910) 10 CLR 218	1134
Tebbs v Carpenter (1816) 1 Madd 290	355, 357
Tempest, Re (1866) 1 Ch 485	350, 357
Tempest v Lord Camoys (1882) 21 Ch D 571	421
Templeton Insurance Ltd v Penningtons Solicitors LLP [2006] EWHC 685 (Ch)	1068, 1070, 1075
Templiss Properties v Hyams [1999] EGCS 60	667, 1243
Terrapin Ltd v Builders' Supply Co (Hayes) Ltd [1960] RPC 128	1209
Tesco Stores v Pook [2003] EWHC 823 (Ch)	577
Tesco Supermarkets v Natrass [1972] AC 153	1024
Thames Cruises Ltd v George Wheeler Launches Ltd [2003] EWHC 3093 (Ch); [2003] All ER (D) 285 (Dec)	560

Thames Guaranty v Campbell [1985] QB 210	848
Third Chandris Shipping Corp v Unimarine SA [1979] QB 645	1196, 1197
Thomas, Re [1930] 1 Ch 194	495
Thomas v Fuller-Brown [1988] 1 FLR 237	748
Thomas v Howell (1874) LR 18 Eq 198	1149
Thomas v Pearce [2000] FSR 718	957
Thomas v Thomas [1995] 2 FLR 668	492, 493
Thompson, Re [1934] 1 Ch 342	214
Thompson v Finch (1856) 8 De GM & G 560; (1856) 22 Beav 316	864, 880
Thompson v Whitmore (1860) 1 John & H 268	1243
Thompson's Settlement, Re [1985] 2 All ER 720; [1986] Ch 99	367, 370, 372
Thompson's Trustee in Bankruptcy v Heaton [1974] 1 WLR 605	368
Thorner v Curtis [2008] WTLR 155	663
Thorner v Major [2009] 1 WLR 776; [2009] UKHL 18	42, 562, 649, 652, 655, 663, 664, 673, 674, 676, 677, 680, 709, 746, 747, 752, 776
Thornton v Howe (1862) 31 Beav 14	203, 1140
Thorpe v Fasey [1949] Ch 649	1240
Thorpe v Revenue and Customs Commissioners [2009] EWHC 611 (Ch)	383
Three Professional Trustees v Infant Prospective Beneficiary [2007] EWHC 1922 (Ch); [2007] WTLR 1631	403
Thurstan v Nottingham Permanent Benefit Building Society [1902] 1 Ch 1; [1903] AC 6	1284
Tierney v King [1983] 2 Qd R 580	394, 400
Tiger v Barclays Bank Ltd [1952] 1 All ER 85	354
Tilley's Will Trusts, Re ; Burgin v Croad [1967] Ch 1179; [1967] 2 All ER 303	905, 907, 920, 922
Tillott, Re [1892] 1 Ch 86	395, 403
Times Newspapers Ltd v MGN Ltd [1993] EMLR 443	1228
Tinker v Tinker [1970] P 136; [1970] 2 WLR 331	520, 521, 532
Tinsley v Milligan [1994] 1 AC 340; [1993] 3 All ER 65; [1993] 3 WLR 126, HL; affirming [1992] Ch 310, CA	15, 31, 41, 57, 500, 530–3, 535, 537, 542, 544, 711, 712, 757, 843, 845, 846, 937, 938, 1189
Tipping v Clarke (1848) 2 Hare 383; 4 Burr 2379	1205
Tito v Waddell (No 2) [1977] Ch 106; [1977] 3 All ER 129, Ch D	56, 95, 185, 248, 267, 367, 370, 372, 373, 374, 393, 628, 629, 1178, 1288
TL v ML [2006] 1 FLR 1263	493
Tollemache, Re [1903] 1 Ch 457	486
Toovey v Milne (1819) 2 B & Ald 687; (1819) 106 ER 512	1066
Torrance v Bolton (1872) LR 8 Ch App 118	1256
Towers v Premier Waste Ltd [2011] EWCA Civ 923; [2011] IRLR 73	621
Townley v Sherbourne (1633) Bridg 35; (1633) 2 W & TLC (9th edn) 577	348, 863, 880
Trafford's Settlement, Re [1985] Ch 34	189
Travis v Illingworth [1968] WN 206	351
Tribe v Tribe [1995] 4 All ER 236; [1995] 3 WLR 913; [1995] 2 FLR 966	500, 507, 533–5, 537, 542
Trowbridge v Trowbridge [2003] 2 FLR 231; [2004] FCR 79; [2003] BPIR 258	540, 541, 731
Trustee of the Property of Jan Yngre Pehrsson (A Bankrupt), Re (1999) 2 ITELR 230	566
Trustee Solutions Ltd v Dubery [2006] EWHC 1426 (Ch)	654
Trustees of The British Museum v Attorney-General [1984] 1 WLR 418	454
Trustees of The British Museum v White (1826) 2 Sim & St 594	1127, 1149
Trusts of Leeds City Brewery Ltd's Debenture Stock Trust Deed, Re , Leeds City Brewery Ltd v Platts [1925] Ch 532n	412, 414
T's Settlement Trusts, Re [1964] Ch 158	487, 491
TSB Bank v Camfield [1995] 1 WLR 430; [1995] 1 All ER 951	1234, 1247, 1256, 1271–3
Tse Kwong Lam v Wong Chit Sen [1983] 3 All ER 54	368
TSE v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2011] EWHC 1308 (QB)	1220

Tuck's Settlement Trusts, Re [1978] Ch 49; [1978] 2 WLR 411	168, 170, 177
Tulk v Moxhay (1848) 18 LJ Cl 88	1291
Turkington, Re [1937] 4 All ER 501	211
Turner, Re [1897] 1 Ch 536	864
Turner v Jacob [2006] EWHC 1317 (Ch)	665, 745, 754, 755, 759
Turner v Turner (1880) 14 Ch D 829	420, 881
Turner v Turner (1978) 122 SJ 696, CA	421, 423
Turner v Turner [1984] Ch 100	391
21st Century Logistics Ltd (in liquidation) v Madysen Ltd [2004] EWHC 231 (QB); [2004] STC 1535	535, 537
Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley [1999] Lloyd's Rep Bank 438; [2002] UKHL 12; [2002] 2 AC 164; [2002] 2 WLR 802; [2002] 2 All ER 377; [2000] WTLR 525	50, 51, 58, 70, 100, 105, 417, 515, 517, 548, 549, 593, 595, 596, 645, 667, 957, 962, 964, 965, 966, 968, 973, 975, 976, 977, 980, 981, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 991, 993, 996, 997, 998, 1000, 1001, 1014, 1019, 1020, 1063, 1068, 1070, 1071, 1074, 1075, 1076, 1078–82, 1084, 1085, 1092, 1243
Tyler, Re [1967] 3 All ER 389	318
Tyrrrell v Bank of London (1862) 10 HL Cas 26; 11 ER 934	574
Ultraframe v UK) Ltd v Fielding [2005] EWHC 1638 (Ch); [2005] All ER (D) 397	367, 615, 616, 895, 916, 933, 958, 962, 981, 1004, 1017
Underwood v Stevens (1816) 1 Mer 712	355
Ungarian v Lesnoff [1990] Ch 206	721
United Bank of Kuwait v Sahib [1997] Ch 107; [1995] 2 All ER 973	296, 676, 843
United Grand Lodge of Ancient Free and Accepted Masons of England v Holborn Borough Council [1957] 3 All ER 281	1137
United Mizrahi Bank Ltd v Doherty [1998] 1 WLR 435	1015
United Pan-Europe Communications NV v Deutsche Bank [2000] 2 BCLC 461	606
United Scientific Holdings Ltd v Burnley Borough Council [1978] AC 904	1182
United States of America v Dollfus Mieg et Cie SA [1952] AC 318	33
Universal Thermosensors Ltd v Hibben [1992] 3 All ER 257	1199
Universe Tankships Inc of Monrovia v International Transport Workers Federation [1983] 1 AC 366; [1982] 2 All ER 67	227
University of London v Yarrow (1857) 21 JP 596	1153
Up Yaws, The [2007] EWHC 210 (Admlty); [2007] 2 FLR 444	776
Urquhart v Macpherson (1878) 3 App Cas 831	1240
Uzinterimpex JSC v Standard Bank plc [2008] EWCA Civ 819; [2008] Bus LR 1762	1009, 1019
Vacuum Oil Co Pty Ltd v Wiltshire (1945) 72 CLR 319	351
Vajpeyi v Yusaf [2003] EWHC 2339 (Ch)	527
Van Laetham v Brooker [2005] EWHC 1478 (Ch); [2006] 2 FLR 495; [2006] 1 FCR 697	560, 662, 668, 729, 759, 762, 763, 798
Vandepitte v Preferred Accident Insurance Corporation of New York [1933] AC 70 (PC)	129
Vandervell v IRC [1967] 2 AC 291; [1967] 2 WLR 87, HL; [1966] Ch 261, CA	29, 35, 48, 50, 125, 242, 260, 277, 280, 284–91, 293, 297, 298, 312, 331, 484, 500, 503–5, 509, 510, 517, 529, 879, 1052
Vandervell Trustees Ltd v White [1971] AC 912; [1970] 3 WLR 452, HL	287–91
Vandervell's Trusts (No 2), Re ; White v Vandervell Trustees Ltd [1974] Ch 269; [1974] 1 All ER 47; [1974] 3 WLR 256, CA	59, 287–91, 293, 298, 501, 503, 505–7, 524
Varsani v Jesani [1998] 3 All ER 273	1164
Vatcher v Paull [1915] AC 372	496

Verge v Somerville [1924] AC 496.....	1145
Vernon WT, Re [1972] Ch 300.....	1159
Verrall, Re [1916] 1 Ch 100.....	1153
Verrall v Great Yarmouth Borough Council [1981] QB 202.....	1174, 1178
Versailles Trade Finance Ltd v Artagent Ltd [2004] All ER (D) 318.....	1008
Vestey's Settlement, Re [1951] Ch 209.....	387, 476
Vickers v Bell (1864) 4 De GJ & S 274.....	343
Vickery, Re ; Vickery v Stephens [1931] 1 Ch 572; [1931] All ER Rep 562.....	411, 412, 469, 482, 483, 880
Vinogradoff, Re [1935] WN 68.....	522, 523, 544
Voyce v Voyce (1991) 62 P & CR 290.....	681
Vyse v Foster (1872) 8 Ch App 309; affirmed (1874) LR 7 HL 318.....	352, 463, 877
W v B (1863) 32 Beav 574.....	1286
W v M [2011] EWHC 1197 (COP); [2011] 4 All ER 1295, CA.....	1221
Wachtel v Wachtel [1973] Fam 72.....	740
Wadlow v Samuel (No 1) [2006] EWHC 1492 (QB).....	1265
Wadlow v Samuel (No 2) [2007] EWCA Civ 155; [2007] All ER (D) 370 (Feb).....	1265, 1269
Wait, Re [1927] 1 Ch 606.....	123, 127
Wakelin v Read [2000] EWCA Civ 82.....	962
Walker v Boyle [1982] 1 WLR 495.....	1236
Walker v Hall [1984] FLR 126.....	710, 712, 726, 755, 766
Walker Properties Investments (Brighton) Ltd v Walker (1947) 177 LT 204.....	1242
Walker v Stones [2001] QB 902; [2000] 4 All ER 412.....	356, 410, 411, 417, 418, 554, 861, 881, 882, 974, 975, 977, 990, 1000, 1046, 1049
Wall, Re (1889) 42 Ch D 510.....	1121
Wall v Bright (1820) 1 Jac & W 494.....	632
Wallace v Shoa Leasing (Singapore) PTE Ltd, Re Japan Leasing [2000] WTLR 301; [1999] BPIR 911.....	572
Wallace's Settlements, Re [1968] 1 WLR 711.....	490
Wallersteiner v Moir (No 2) [1975] QB 373; [1975] 1 All ER 849.....	404, 1281
Wallgrave v Tebbs (1855) 25 LJ Ch 241.....	307, 310, 311, 313, 319, 325
Walsh v Lonsdale (1882) 21 Ch D 9.....	22, 32, 36, 72, 119, 239, 295–7, 299, 631, 632, 637
Walsh v Singh [2009] EWHC 3219 (Ch); [2010] 1 FCR 177.....	662
Walton Stores v Maher (1988) 62 ALJR 110; (1988) 164 CLR 387.....	326, 656, 659, 749, 797
Walton v Walton [1994] CA Transcript No 479 (unreported).....	664, 746
Ward v Brunt [2000] WTLR 731.....	548, 600, 609, 883
Ward-Smith v Jebb (1964) 108 SJ 919.....	883
Warman International Ltd v Dwyer (1995) 182 CLR 544.....	1277
Warren v Gurney [1944] 2 All ER 472.....	529
Wasserberg, Re [1915] 1 Ch 195.....	265
Waterman v Waterman [1989] 1 FLR 380.....	842
Watkins, Re [1953] 1 WLR 1323.....	366
Watts v Storey (1983) 134 NLJ 631; [1983] CA Transcript 319.....	668
Wayling v Jones (1993) 69 P & CR 170.....	656, 659, 661 664, 668, 669, 703, 747, 750, 757, 792, 843
Webb, Re (1890) 63 LT 545.....	352
Webb v O'Doherty (1991) The Times , 11 February.....	1116
Webb v Rose (1732) 4 Burr 2330.....	1206
Webster v Cecil (1861) 30 Beav 62.....	1237
Wedgwood, Re [1915] 1 Ch 113.....	1147, 1152, 1153
Wedgwood v Adams (1843) 6 Beav 600.....	1280
Weekes Settlement, Re [1897] 1 Ch 289.....	73
Weeks v Tybald (1605) Noy 11.....	70

Weir v Van Tromp (1900) 16 TLR 531.....	1244
Weir's Settlement Trusts, Re [1971] Ch 145.....	189
Weller v Kerr (1866) LR 1 Sc&D 11.....	420
Wellesly v Wellesly (1828) 2 Bli (NS) 124.....	477
Welsh Irish Ferries Ltd, In Re [1986] Ch 471.....	930
Wenlock v River Dee Co (1887) 19 QBD 155.....	1285
Wentworth v Wentworth [1900] AC 163.....	355
West Sussex Constabulary's Widows, Children and Benevolent (1930) Fund Trusts, Re ; Barnett v Ketteringham [1971] Ch 1; [1970] 1 All ER 542.....	234, 238, 239, 508, 512, 513
Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669; [1996] 2 WLR 802; [1996] 2 All ER 961, HL; reversing [1994] 4 All ER 890; [1994] 1 WLR 938, CA; reversing in part [1994] 4 All ER 890, QBD.....	7–9, 27, 28, 33, 35, 41, 47, 48, 49, 50, 57, 60–1, 64, 73, 88, 113, 117, 124, 125, 147, 182, 234, 235, 239, 250, 251, 253, 263, 264, 273, 276, 281, 293, 297, 325, 326, 328, 329, 341, 347, 427, 470, 500, 501, 503–5, 507, 508, 512, 513, 516, 523, 524, 543, 544, 547, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 555, 556, 557, 558, 567, 568, 569, 586, 590, 592, 593, 595, 596, 605, 645, 647, 649, 650, 676, 703, 704, 712, 717, 719, 749, 753, 759, 763, 772, 796, 797, 833, 838, 878, 888, 889, 890, 891, 893, 895, 899, 905, 916, 919, 920, 923, 924, 925, 927, 928, 933, 935, 945, 946, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 958, 960, 961, 1003, 1004, 1005, 1009, 1012, 1023, 1039, 1040, 1041, 1042, 1043, 1049, 1060, 1070, 1071, 1073, 1074, 1077, 1079, 1088–90, 1189, 1234, 1239, 1248, 1278, 1281, 1288, 1292, 1301, 1303–5, 1308
Western Fish Products Ltd v Penwith District Council [1981] 2 All ER 204.....	681
Westminster Bank Ltd v Hilton (1926) 43 TLR 124.....	102
Westminster Bank Ltd v Lee [1956] Ch 7.....	1288
Weston's Settlement, Re [1969] 1 Ch 223.....	490, 491
Wetherspoon v JD plc v Van de Berg & Co Ltd [2009] EWHC 639 (Ch).....	962, 994
Whaley v Whaley [2011] EWCA Civ 617.....	492, 493
Whelpdale v Cookson (1747) 1 Ves Sen 9.....	372
Whitaker, Re [1901] 1 Chap 9.....	124
White, Re [1893] 2 Ch 41.....	1141
White v Jones [1995] 2 AC 207.....	41, 45, 874
White v Shortall [2006] NSWSC 1379.....	123, 124, 133, 137, 142
White v White (1798–1804) 5 Ves 554.....	884
White v White [2000] 2 FLR 981; [2001] 1 AC 596; [2001] 1 WLR 481.....	493, 729, 740, 794, 840, 1013
White v Williams [2010] EWHC 940 (Ch).....	1164
White v Withers LLP [2009] 1 FLR 383.....	1207, 1215
Whitehead, Re [1948] NZLR 1066.....	671
Whitehead's WT, Re [1971] 1 WLR 833.....	346
Whitely, Re [1910] 1 Ch 600.....	348, 862
Whiteside v Whiteside [1950] Ch 65.....	1242
Whitley v Delaney [1914] AC 132.....	667
Whittaker v Kinnear [2011] EWHC (QB) 1479.....	676
Wight v Olswang (1999) The Times , 18 May.....	408, 415
Wight v Olswang (No 2) [2000] WTLR 783; (1999/2000) 2 ITELR 693.....	410, 412, 881
Wiles v Gresham (1854) 2 Drew 258.....	463
Wilkes v Allington [1931] 2 Ch 104.....	265
Wilkins v Hogg (1861) 31 LJ Ch 41.....	409
Williams, Re (1877) 5 Ch D 735.....	107, 108, 318

Williams, Re [1933] Ch 244	318
Williams v Bayley (1866) LR 1 HL 200	1251
Williams & Glyn's Bank v Boland [1981] AC 487	794, 826, 843
Williams v Hensman (1861) 1 J & H 544; (1861) 70 ER 860	827
Williams v Kershaw (1835) 5 Cl & F 111	1113
Williams v Lawrence [2011] EWHC 2001 (Ch); [2011] WTLR 1455	776
Williams v Parris [2008] EWCA Civ 1147	776, 777
Williams v Roffey Bros & Nicholls (Contractors) Ltd [1991] 1 QB 1	683
Williams v Singer [1921] 1 AC 65	69
Williams' Trustees v IRC [1947] AC 447; [1947] 1 All ER 513	128, 1133, 1147, 1155
Williams Will Trusts, Re (2000) 2 ITELR 313	882
Williams v Williams (1863) 32 Beav 370	544
Williamson v Codrington (1750) Belts Supp 215	250
Williamson v Sheikh [2008] EWCA Civ 990	722
Willis v Willis [1986] 1 EGLR 62	667
Wilmot v Barber (1880) 15 Ch D 96	653, 656, 657, 659, 664
Wilson, Re [1913] 1 Ch 314	1158–9
Wilson v Barnes (1886) 38 Ch D 507	1160
Wilson v Law Debenture Trust Corp plc [1995] 2 All ER 337	400, 403
Wilson v Northampton and Banbury Junction Railway Co (1874) 9 Ch App 279	1172
Wilson v Truelove [2003] WTLR 609	654
Wilson v Wilson (1854) 5 HLC 40	1242
Wilson v Wilson [1969] 1 WLR 1470	726
Winchelsea's (Earl of) Policy Trusts, Re (1888) 39 Ch D 168	351
Windeler v Whitehall [1990] FLR 505	843
Wingrove v Wingrove (1885) 11 PD 81; 50 JP 56	1254
Winkworth v Edward Baron Development Co Ltd [1986] 1 WLR 1512; [1987] 1 All ER 114	525, 731
Wokingham Fire Brigade Trusts, Re [1951] Ch 373	1147, 1154, 1155
Wolverhampton Corp v Emmons [1901] 1 KB 515	1179
Wood, Re [1894] 3 Ch 381	200
Wood, Re [1949] 1 All ER 1100	200, 211
Woodland v Woodland [1991] Fam Law 470, CA	265
Woodland-Ferrari v UCL Group Retirement Benefits Scheme [2002] EWHC 1354 (Ch); [2003] Ch 115	408, 411, 962
Woolwich Equitable Building Society v IRC (No 2) [1993] AC 573; [1992] 3 WLR 366; [1992] 3 All ER 737	41
Worby v Rosser [2000] PNLR 140	874
World Group Europe Holdings plc v Bettina Vossberg (2004) August 7, First Hall, Civil Court, Malta; Onor. Cuschieri	58
Worrall v Harford (1802) 8 Ves 4	351
Wragg, Re [1919] 2 Ch 58	434, 453
Wrexham AFC Ltd v Crucialmove Ltd [2006] EWCA Civ 237; [2008] 1 BCLC 508	112, 564, 593, 605
Wright, Re [1920] 1 Ch 108	161, 162
Wright, Re [1954] Ch 347	1160
Wright v Gater [2011] EWHC 2881 (Ch) [2012] 1 WLR 802	490
Wright v Johnson (1999) (unreported) 2 November, CA	826
Wright v Morgan [1926] AC 788	371, 372
Wright's WT, Re (1857) 3 K & J 419	170
Wrotham Park v Parkside Homes [1974] 1 WLR 798	1201
Wyndham v Egremont [2009] EWHC 2076 (Ch); 12 ITELR 461	489
Wynne v Callender (1826) 1 Russ 293	1244, 1286
Wynne v Hawkins (1782) 1 Bro CC 142	118
Wynne v Humbertson (1858) 27 Beav 421	398
Wynne v Tempest (1897) 13 TLR 360	883

X v X (Y and Z Intervening) [2002] 1 FLR 508	938
XJA v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2010] EWHC 3174 (QB)	1227
Yates, Re ; Carman v Yates [2004] All ER (D) 373	539, 540
Yaxley v Gotts [2000] Ch 162; [2000] 1 All ER 711; [1999] 3 WLR 1221	4, 241, 264, 275, 336, 559, 651, 655, 675, 676, 726, 759, 763, 797, 843, 1313
Yeap Cheah Neo v Ong (1875) LR 6 PC 381	1142
Yorkshire Bank v Tinsley [2004] 3 All ER 463; [2004] EWCA Civ 816; [2004] 1 WLR 2380	1257, 1269
Yorkshire Railway Wagon Co v Maclure (1882) 21 Ch D 309	539
Youell v Bland Welch & Co Ltd [1990] 2 Lloyd's Rep 423	682
Young, Re [1951] NZLR 70; [1951] Ch 344	313, 1121
Young v Cloud (1874) LR 18 Eq 634	355
Young v Robson Rhodes (A Firm) [1999] 3 All ER 524	407
Young v Sealey [1949] Ch 278	528
Younghusband v Gisborne (1846) 15 LJ Ch 355; (1844) 1 Col 400	183, 194
Yugraneft v Abramovich [2008] EWHC 2613 (Comm); [2008] All ER (Comm) 299	574, 966, 1004
Z Ltd v A-Z [1992] QB 558	1195
Zandfavid v BCCI [1996] 1 WLR 1420	1273
Zeiss (Carl) Stiftung v Herbert Smith and Co (No 2) [1969] 2 Ch 276	550, 646

Table of legislation

Statutes

Act of Union 1707	16	Charities Act 2011	1099, 1100, 1101
Administration of Justice Act 1925	302		1102, 1103, 1104, 1105,
s 33	1286		1106, 1108, 1117, 1124,
s 45	1286		1135, 1136, 1137, 1138,
s 48(1)	367		1143, 1144, 1147, 1148,
Administration of Justice Act 1982			1151, 1153, 1157, 1167
s 20	1243	Part 6	1158, 1161
Administration of Justice Act 1985		s 1	1104
s 9	479	s 1(1)	1104
s 48(1)	367	s 1(2)	1105
Adoption Act 1976	842	s 2(1)	1104
Animal Welfare Act 2006	1154	s 2(1)(b)	1106, 1125, 1140
Appellate Jurisdiction Act 1876	22	s 3(1)	1104, 1106, 1116, 1143, 1147, 1149
Banking (Special Provisions) Act 2008	101	s 3(1)(a)	1117, 1123, 1124
Bankruptcy Act 1914	897	s 3(1)(e)	1149
Chancery Amendment Act 1858 (Lord Cairn's Act)	1200	s 3(1)(h)	1149
s 2	1200, 1280	s 3(1)(m)	1148
Charitable Trusts (Validation) Act 1954	1113	s 3(1)(m)(i)	1106, 1140, 1148, 1149
Charitable Uses Act 1601		s 3(2)(a)	1137
(Statute of Elizabeth)	1121	s 3(2)(a)(i)–(ii)	1137
Preamble	1102, 1103, 1105, 1121, 1126, 1143, 1144, 1152	s 3(2)(b)	1148
Charities Act 1960	1101, 1144, 1157, 1158, 1161	s 3(2)(c)	1149
s 38(4)	1103	s 3(3)	1106
Charities Act 1993	1101, 1157, 1165	s 4(2)	1126
s 74–s 75	1165	s 4(3)	1117, 1124, 1126, 1131
Charities Act 2006	1101, 1102, 1104, 1121, 1134, 1136, 1143, 1153	s 4(4)	1126
s 2(1)(b)	1131	s 5	1106, 1147, 1150, 1155, 1156
s 2(2)(g)	231	s 5(2)	1157
s 2(2)(m)	1143	s 13–s 16	1166
s 2(3)(a)(ii)	1136	s 29	1166
s 2(4)(a)	1143	s 61	1158, 1161, 1166
s 2(8)	1143	s 62	1161
s 3(2)(a)(i)	1137	s 62(1)(a)(i)–(ii)	1162
		s 62(1)(b)	1162
		s 62(1)(c)–(d)	1163
		s 62(1)(e)	1163
		s 62(1)(e)(iii)	1163
		s 62(3)	1163
		s 63	1164, 1165
		s 69	1166
		s 76	1166
		s 315	1166

Child Trust Funds Act 2004	100	Equality Act 2006	1159
s 1	817, 820	Equality Act 2010	519, 714
s 4	100	s 198–s 199	519
Children Act 1989	808, 820	Family Law Act 1996	495, 770,
s 1	828, 839, 842, 843, 846	815, 828, 839, 841, 842, 843
s 8	842, 847	Pt IV	814, 815
Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978	863	s 15	366, 815
s 1(1)	863	s 30	847
s 2(1)–(2)	864	s 33	815, 816
s 6(1)	863	s 62(2)	841, 843
s 7(2)	863	s 63	841, 843
Companies Act 1985	221, 265	Sched 2
s 330	595	para 1–para 2	366
Companies Act 2006	586, 614,	para 5	366
621, 622, 624, 625,		Family Law (Scotland) Act 2006
1058, 1059		s 27(3)	767
s 170	586, 609, 1058	Finance Act 1986
s 170(1)	624	s 102	69
s 170(3)	586, 624, 1058	Finance Act 1995	70
s 170(4)	586, 587, 624, 1058	Finance Act 2006	69
s 171–s 174	624	Financial Services Act 1986
s 175	620, 624, 625, 1058	s 63	456
s 175(1)–(4)	625	Financial Services Act 2012	455
s 175(5)–(6)	625, 626	Financial Services and Markets
s 175(7)	625	Act 2000	356, 429, 434,
s 176	624, 1058	455, 456, 457, 459,
s 176(1)–(4)	587	460, 461, 467, 1027,
s 177	624, 625, 1058	1047, 1049
s 178	625, 1058	Part I	433
s 197	595	s 1	428
s 260	1058	s 2(2)	455
s 260(3)	1058	s 19	455
s 750	418	s 21	455
s 994	604, 1058	s 22	434
Constitutional Reform Act 2005	18	s 22(1)–(2)	456
Consumer Credit Act 1974		s 23	455
s 137	1043	s 26	455
Contracts (Rights of Third Parties)		s 118(1)	459
Act 1999	269, 270, 274–6, 279	s 118(2)(a)–(b)	459
s 1	274, 275	s 118(2)(c)	460
Conveyancing Act 1881		s 118(3)	459
s 52	420	s 118(10)	459
Criminal Justice Act 1993		s 119	460
Part V	461	s 237	191
s 52	461	s 253	356, 418
Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964		s 397	460
s 1	587	s 397(1)(a)–(c)	460
Domestic Proceedings and Magistrates’		s 402	461
Courts Act 1978	842	s 419	456
Domestic Violence and Matrimonial		Sched 2	456
Proceedings Act 1976	842, 848	Part II	434
Education Reform Act 1988	804	Forfeiture Act 1982	589
Enduring Powers of Attorney Act 1985	806	Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977	828
		Housing Act 1996	812, 828

Human Rights Act 1998	698, 830, 832, 835, 836, 1186, 1212, 1229	Law of Property Act 1925	215, 232 801, 803, 804, 818
s 2	837	s 2	808
s 3(1)	835	s 21	366
s 3(2)(b)	835	s 26(3)	421, 808
s 4(2)	835	s 27	366, 808, 826
s 4(6)	835	s 28	804
Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988		s 30	802, 817, 818, 820, 822, 824–6
Pt XV	70	s 40	1180
s 660(2)	70	s 47	634
s 660G	70	s 52	268
s 686(1)	69	s 53	268, 296
s 686(1A)	69	s 53(1)	284, 292, 299, 524
s 687	69	s 53(1)(b)	88, 93, 241 243, 246, 253, 524, 702, 710, 711, 720
s 832(1)	69	s 53(1)(c)	104, 280–2, 284–6, 289–95, 298, 333, 488, 637
s 840	479	s 53(2)	48, 246, 250, 296, 297, 320, 323–5, 553, 567, 711, 720
Inheritance (Provision for Family and Dependants) Act 1975	847	s 60(3)	523
Insolvency Act 1986	538, 816, 1088	s 63	1287
s 122	1058, 1059	s 101	1285
s 123	195	s 103	693, 930
s 281	411	s 109	1285
s 335A	822, 825, 826	s 155	420
s 335A(1)–(3)	821	s 155(1)	420
s 335A(5)–(6)	816	s 156	420
s 336	814	s 175	477, 478
s 336(1)	814	Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989	676, 684, 1180
s 336(2)	815	s 1	92
s 336(4)–(5)	815	s 2	247, 558, 632, 634, 675–57, 720, 797, 1179
s 337(1)	815	s 2(1)	520, 843, 1180
s 337(2)	815	Leasehold and Urban Development Act 1993
s 337(2)(a)	815	s 10	93
s 337(2)(a)(ii)	816	Leasehold Reform Act 1967	837, 838
s 337(2)(b)	816	Limitation Act 1980	550
s 338	816	Lord Cairn's Act see Chancery Amendment Act 1858
s 339	195, 1088	Magna Carta 1297	45
s 340	1088	Married Women's Property Act 1882	714, 794
s 423	112, 143, 193–6, 538–40, 542, 585, 1088	s 17	713, 774
s 423(1)	540, 541	Matrimonial and Family Proceedings Act 1984	842
s 423(1)(a)	540	Matrimonial Causes Act 1973	492, 495, 842
s 423(1)(c)	540	s 23	728
s 423(2)	540	s 24	281, 366
s 423(2)(a)–(b)	540	s 24(1)(c)–(d)	495
s 423(3)	541	s 25	848
s 423(3)(a)	541	s 25(1)	728, 842
Land Charges Act 1972	468	s 25(2)	728
Land Registration Act 1925		s 25A	742
s 70(1)(g)	523, 524, 594, 719, 826
Land Registration Act 2002	634, 1288
s 116	1288
Sched 3	826
para 2	719
para 2(c)	1288

Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970		Recognition of Trusts Act 1987	1050
s 37	728	Recreational Charities Act 1958	1147, 1148, 1150, 1155, 1156, 1157
Mental Health Act 1983	345, 495	s 1	1155
s 96	495	s 1(1)	1156, 1157
s 96(1)(d)	495	s 1(2)	1157
Miners' Welfare Act 1952	1157	s 1(2)(a)	1156
Misrepresentation Act 1967		s 1(2)(b)(i)–(ii)	1156
s 1	1180, 1235	s 2	1157
s 2	1280	Rent Act 1977	828
s 2(2)	1236, 1240	Sale of Goods Act 1979	128
s 3	1236	s 16	127
Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act 1888	311, 1103	s 20A	127
National Health Services Act 1977	811	s 20A(1)	127
Partnership Act 1890	99, 687	s 20A(2)	128
s 1	99, 560, 613	s 20B	127
Pensions Act 1995	623, 1047	s 41	931
s 33	356, 418	Sale of Goods (Amendment) Act 1995	127, 1038
Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 1964	180, 197, 200, 201, 205, 214, 216, 226	s 1(3)	127
s 1	216	Senior Courts Act 1981
s 3	180, 216	s 37(1)	1187, 1190, 1198
s 3(3)	216	s 50	4, 1183, 1200, 1280
s 4(4)	216	Settled Land Act 1925	478, 495, 721, 803, 804
Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 2009	201, 214, 215, 217, 218	s 64(1)	495
s 1	217	Statute of Elizabeth see Charitable Uses Act 1601
s 1(1)–(6)	217	Statute of Frauds 1677	301, 306, 320, 331, 684
s 2(2)–(5)	217	Statute of Mortmain see Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act 1888
s 3(3)	201	Statute of Wills 1540	306, 320
s 5(1)–(2)	217	Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873	5, 6, 19, 21, 22, 40, 1279
s 6–s 8	218	s 24–s 25	22
s 18	218	Terrorism Act 2000	460
Places of Worship Registration Act 1855	1139, 1140	Theft Act 1968	591, 1302
Powers of Attorneys Act 1971		s 5(3)	591
s 5	366	s 15A	1302
Proceeds of Crime Act 2002	460, 461, 584, 590, 592	s 22	590
s 6	592	Theft (Amendment) Act 1996	1302
s 7(1)	592	Trustee Act 1925	91, 345, 354, 356, 806
s 327	460	s 8	468
s 328	461	s 8(1)(a)–(c)	468
s 329(1)	461	s 9	468, 806
s 330–s 332	461	s 14(1)	472
s 340(3)	461	s 15(1)	472
Sched 2	592	s 18	483
Protection from Eviction Act 1977	828	s 19	436, 466
Public Trustee Act 1906	481	s 23	482, 483
Race Relations Act 1976		s 25	481
s 34(1)	1114	s 30	411, 483, 824
		s 30(1)	348, 863, 880
		s 30(2)	931

s 31	473–5, 477	s 7(3)	429, 433
s 31(1)	473–5	s 8(1)	443
s 31(1)(i)	474–6	s 8(1)(c)	811
s 31(1)(ii)	474, 476	s 8(3)	443, 804
s 31(2)	475	s 9	429, 443
s 32	387, 473, 477, 478	s 10	443
s 32(1)	477	s 11	348, 351, 863
s 32(1)(a)–(c)	478	s 11(1)–(3)	480
s 33	194, 441, 478	s 12(1)	480
s 36	345	s 12(3)	480
s 36(1)	345, 346, 349, 350	s 13	480
s 36(2)	345	s 14(1)	480
s 36(4)	345	s 15(1)	480
s 36(6)–(7)	345	s 15(2)–(3)	481
s 36(9)	345	s 15(4)–(5)	480
s 37	346	s 16(1)	481
s 37(2)	346	s 17(1)	481
s 38	346	s 18(1)	481
s 39	349	s 19(1)–(3)	479
s 40(1)	347	s 19(4)	480
s 40(4)	347	s 20	480
s 41	346, 350	s 22	429
s 53	477, 479, 494	s 22(1)	482
s 57	441, 454, 493–5	s 22(4)	482
s 57(1)	494	s 23(1)	482
s 61	366, 430, 432, 882, 883	s 28(1)–(2)	350, 351
s 69	356	s 28(5)–(6)	351
s 69(2)	345, 472	s 29(2)–(3)	350
Trustee Act 2000	90,	s 30	350
91, 354, 356, 362, 363, 364, 365, 408, 414,		s 31(1)	351
415, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 433,		s 31(1)(b)	351
434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 443, 447,		s 31(2)	351
451, 453, 454, 464, 466, 468, 472, 480–2,		s 32	350
623, 804–6, 856		s 36–s 37	428
s 1	362, 363, 434	Sched 1	363
s 1(1)	416, 431, 434, 436, 472, 805	para 1	435, 466
s 1(1)(a)	363, 435	para 1(b)	365, 438
s 1(1)(b)	435	para 2	436, 466
s 1(2)	434	para 3	436, 466, 482
s 2	363, 435, 466	para 5	436, 466
s 3	356, 434	para 7	356, 429, 435, 466
s 3(1)	431, 433	Trustee Delegation Act 1999	426
s 3(2)	435, 466	s 5	481
s 3(3)	431, 433	s 5(7)	481
s 4	429, 431, 435, 466	Trustee Investment Act 1961	365, 429, 433
s 4(1)	365, 438, 623	s 6	447
s 4(2)	439, 623	Trusts of Land and Appointment of s 4(2)(a)	439	Trustees Act 1996	247, 801–10,
s 4(2)(b)	440	813, 814, 821, 824–6
s 5	431, 435, 441, 466	s 1(1)(a)	803
s 5(1)	365, 441	s 1(2)(a)–(b)	803
s 5(2)	441, 442	s 1(3)	804
s 5(3)	442	s 3	803, 1286
s 5(4)	441, 442	s 6	804, 805
s 6	431	s 6(1)	804
s 6(1)	365, 433	s 6(2)	805

s 6(2)(a)–(b)	805	Welfare Reform and Pensions Act 1999
s 6(3)	805	s 14(3)	193
s 6(3)(a)–(c)	805	Wills Act 1837	34, 301–3, 305, 306, 308, 311, 313–15, 321–3, 327, 522, 638
s 6(5)–(8)	804	s 9	243, 302, 305, 638
s 6(9)	805	s 15	314
s 8	805	Secondary legislation
s 8(1)–(2)	806	Civil Procedure Rules 1981
s 9	806	(SI 1988/3132)	422, 1231
s 9(1)	806, 826	r 39.2	1230
s 9(2)	807	Equality Act (Sexual Orientation) Regulations
s 9(3)	806	2007 (SI 2007/1263)	1159
s 9(5)	806	reg 18	1159
s 9(7)–(8)	806	Financial Collateral Arrangements (No 2)
s 10(1)	807, 826	Regulations 2003 (SI 2003 No 3226)
s 10(3)	808	reg 4(2)	104, 281
s 11	421, 808	Financial Services and Markets Act
s 11(1)	808	(Regulated Activities) Order 2001
s 11(3)	808	(SI 2001/544)	456, 457, 458
s 12	810, 811, 813, 814	Art 25	457
s 12(1)(a)–(b)	813, 814	Art 37	457
s 13	811, 813, 814	Art 40	457
s 13(1)	811	Art 45	457
s 13(1)(a)–(b)	811	Art 53	458
s 13(2)	811	Art 66	457
s 13(4)(a)–(c)	811	Art 66(1)–(5)	457
s 14	802, 813, 814, 817, 818, 820–2, 824–6, 842	Art 66(6)–(7)	458
s 14(1)	817	FSA Client Asset Sourcebook (CASS)	132, 134–5, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141
s 14(2)	808, 809, 818, 820	FSA Conduct of Business Rules	439, 1028
s 14(2)(a)	818, 824	FSA Conduct of Business Sourcebook
s 14(2)(b)	818	(COBS)	437, 458, 1029
s 14(3)–(4)	817	FSA Market Conduct Sourcebook Instrument
s 15	817, 818, 820–2, 824, 825	2001 (MAR 1)	460
s 15(1)	818	FSA Money Laundering Sourcebook	461
s 15(1)(a)–(b)	819	Homelessness (Priority Need for s 15(1)(c)	820	Accommodation) (England) Order 2002
s 15(1)(d)	824, 848	(SI 2002/2051)
s 15(4)	821	Art 3	812
s 19	346, 350	Intestacy Rules	304, 307, 311, 316, 319
s 22(1)–(3)	807	JCT 500 Construction Industry Contract	1040
Sched 1	812	Money Laundering Regulations 2007
para 1	812	(SI 2007/2157)	461
para 1(1)(b)	812	Perpetuities and Accumulations
Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977	414	Act 2009 (Commencement) Order 2010
Universities and Colleges Estates		(SI 2010/37)	215
Act 1925	804	Prison Rules 1999 (SI 1999/728)
Variations of Trusts Act 1958	293, 294, 298, 346, 441, 454, 484, 486–9, 491, 493–5	r 43(3)	95
s 1(1)	486–8	European legislation
s 1(1)(a)	486	European Convention on the Protection of s 1(1)(b)	486, 487	Human Rights and Fundamental s 1(1)(c)	487	Freedoms 1950	698, 830, 834, 835, 836
s 1(1)(d)	487, 488

Art 6	459	International legislation
Art 8	825, 837, 838, 1207, 1217, 1223, 1224, 1227, 1228	Cayman Islands
Art 8(1)–(2).....	1223	Special Trusts (Alternative Regime) Law 1997.....	1053
Art 10	1217, 1223–7	s 7(1).....	1053
Art 10(1)–(2).....	1223	Trusts Law (2001 Revision)
First Protocol.....	234, 839	Part VII	1053
Art 1	839	s 100(1).....	1053, 1054
Hague Convention on the Law Applicable to Trusts on their Recognition 1985.....	60, 1050, 1051	s 100(2).....	1053
Art 6	1050	s 102(b).....	1053
Art 7	1051	France
Art 16	1051	Civil Code.....	23
Hague Visby Rules	1040	Germany
Hamburg Rules	1040	Civil Code.....	23
Markets in Financial Instruments Directive (MiFID) 2004/39/EC	135, 138, 139, 458	Italy
Art 19(1).....	458, 1029	Civil Code.....	23
Art 19(4).....	458	South Africa
Art 21	458	Constitution.....	838
Third Money Laundering Directive 2005/60/EC.....	461	United States of America
		Constitution.....	5

Part 1

Fundamentals of equity and trusts

This page intentionally left blank

Introduction – the nature of equity

1.1 THE FOUNDATIONS OF EQUITY	4
1.1.1 The nature of equity	4
1.1.2 The scope of this book: equity and trusts	7
1.1.3 Equity and trusts are based on conscience	8
1.1.4 The many senses of conscience	9
1.1.5 Concepts of equity in ancient Greek philosophy	11
1.1.6 Kant’s notion of equity	13
1.1.7 Equity as a moral virtue	15
1.2 THE BIRTH OF EQUITY	16
1.2.1 The development of two systems: common law and equity	16
1.2.2 The continuing distinction between equity and common law	19
1.2.3 The impact of the distinction between common law and equity	19
1.2.4 The Judicature Act 1873	21
1.3 UNDERSTANDING EQUITY	22
1.3.1 Equity: an ethical construct	22
1.3.2 Equity acts in personam	23
1.3.3 The nature of equity: paradox and cool jazz	24
1.3.4 Roots in trade and in the family	26
1.4 THE CORE EQUITABLE PRINCIPLES	28
1.4.1 Equity will not suffer a wrong to be without a remedy	29
1.4.2 Equity follows the law – but not slavishly or always	29
1.4.3 Where there is equal equity, the law shall prevail	30
1.4.4 Where the equities are equal, the first in time shall prevail	30
1.4.5 Delay defeats equities	30
1.4.6 He who seeks equity must do equity	31
1.4.7 He who comes to equity must come with clean hands	31
1.4.8 Equality is equity	31
1.4.9 Equity looks to the intent rather than to the form	32
1.4.10 Equity looks on as done that which ought to have been done	32
1.4.11 Equity imputes an intention to fulfil an obligation	33
1.4.12 Equity acts in personam	33
1.4.13 Equity will not permit statute or common law to be used as an engine of fraud	34

- 1.4.14 Equity will not permit a person who is trustee of property to take benefit from that property as though a beneficiary 34
- 1.4.15 Equity will not assist a volunteer 34
- 1.4.16 Equity abhors a vacuum 35
- 1.4.17 A trust operates on the conscience of the legal owner of property 35
- 1.4.18 Equity and fraud 35

1.5 PLACING EQUITY IN CONTEXT

36

- 1.5.1 The development of equity over time under the steerage of different judges 36
- 1.5.2 Equity in a broader context 42

1.1 THE FOUNDATIONS OF EQUITY

1.1.1 The nature of equity

Equity is the means by which a system of law balances out the need for certainty in rule-making with the need to achieve fair results in individual circumstances. An expression which has been commonly used to describe the way in which equity functions is that equity ‘mitigates the rigour of the common law’ so that the letter of the law is not applied in so strict a way that it may cause injustice in individual cases.¹ English equity does this by examining the conscience of the individual defendant.² Equity, then, is that part of English private law which seeks either to prevent any benefit accruing to a defendant as a result of some unconscionable conduct or to compensate any loss suffered by a claimant which results from some unconscionable conduct, and which also seeks to ensure that common law and statutory rules are not manipulated unconscionably. At its broadest, equity appears to imbue the courts with a general discretion to disapply statutory or common law rules whenever good conscience requires it;³ however, in practice, modern equity is comprised mainly

1 Earl of Oxford’s Case (1615) 1 Ch Rep 1, per Lord Ellesmere LC: ‘to soften and mollify the extremity of the law’; Lord Dudley v Lady Dudley (1705) Prec Ch 241, 244, per Lord Cowper, LC: ‘Equity is no part of the law, but a moral virtue which qualifies, moderates and reforms the rigour, hardness and edge of the law.’ In Samuel Johnson’s dictionary (first published in 1755), the ‘chancery’ is described as being ‘The court of equity and conscience, moderating the rigour of other courts, that are tied to the letter of the law’: this definition quotes the jurist Cowell’s own definition in The Interpreter, a legal glossary of the time. Also, considered below, St German explained that ‘equytie is ordeyned . . . to temper and myttygate the rygoure of the lawe’ (1528–31), quoted in Plucknett and Barton (eds), ‘St German’s Doctor and Student’ 91 Selden Society, London, 1974, 97. See also Lord Kaims’ treatise Principles of Equity, 3rd ed, Edinburgh: Bell and Creech, 1778, 41 which uses the same expressions. See below the discussion of Aristotle’s notion of equity at para 1.1.5 in relation to the rectification of legislation by equity.

2 Earl of Oxford’s Case (1615) 1 Ch Rep 1.

3 This broad use of equity is rare in modern equitable practice, as we shall consider in this chapter and elsewhere throughout this book. See, for example, the discussion of Jaggard v Sawyer [1995] 1 WLR 269; [1995] 2 All ER 189 (para 27.1.1) where the Court of Appeal preferred to apply precedent closely rather than consider themselves to have a broad discretion to act as they saw fit under the terms of the Supreme Court Act 1981, s 50 which purported to permit them to grant interim injunctions in general terms. However, doctrines such as the principle that equity will not permit statute to be used as an engine of fraud (Rochefoucauld v Boustead [1897] 1 Ch 196: see para 1.4.13), the doctrine of secret trust (McCormick v Grogan (1869) LR 4 HL 82; Jones v Badley (1868) 3 Ch App 362; Blackwell v Blackwell [1929] AC 318: see para 6.1.4 below) and the doctrine of equitable estoppel (Yaxley v Gotts [2000] Ch 162: see para 13.1) operate expressly in contravention of the terms of Acts of Parliament with the general intention that no benefit be taken nor any loss suffered as a result of some unconscionable conduct.

of substantive and procedural principles which only permit the courts a limited amount of discretion.⁴

There are three different ways of understanding equity's role as part of the English legal system.⁵ First, equity can be understood as the means by which English law ensures that the strict application of a common law or a statutory rule does not result in any unfairness when applied in a specific case. To this extent equity is a form of natural justice,⁶ which means that it has a moral basis.⁷ Equity's particular moral purpose was described by Lord Ellesmere in the *Earl of Oxford's Case*⁸ as being to 'correct men's consciences for frauds, breach of trusts, wrongs and oppressions . . . and to soften and mollify the extremity of the law'.⁹ This is a moral purpose in that it both prevents a defendant from taking unconscionable advantage of a situation and also in that it prevents the law from inadvertently permitting an unconscionable result. Secondly, equity can be considered, in its formal sense, as constituting the collection of substantive principles developed over the centuries by the Courts of Equity, principally the Court of Chancery,¹⁰ to judge people's consciences.¹¹ In this sense, equity should be understood as being a code of technical, substantive rules and not simply as a reservoir of general, moral principles.¹² Thirdly, equity can be understood as comprising the procedural rules and forms of action developed by the Courts of Chancery over the centuries under the authority of the Lord Chancellor.¹³ The main equitable principles are considered in

- 4 See, for example, the discussion of Jaggard v Sawyer [1995] 1 WLR 269, [1995] 2 All ER 189 (see para 27.1.1 below) which indicates the courts' reluctance to consider its powers to be broad discretionary powers even if their enactment by statute might suggest that they are capable of being applied in such a way.
- 5 In the final chapter of this book we will consider how other disciplines in the social sciences use the notion of equity in different senses.
- 6 Lord Dudley v Lady Dudley (1705) Prec Ch 241, 244, per Lord Cowper. See, in similar vein, Story, 1839, 1, drawing a parallel with the natural justice understood in Justinian's Pandects. The approach of seeing a Roman root to these ideas is rejected by Professor Maitland (1936, 6). Perhaps Professor Story's preparedness to identify a Romanic similarity between the natural justice root to equity and 'ius' in the Roman sense used by Justinian is founded on American lawyers' affection for that sort of natural justice which is set out in the US Constitution.
- 7 See McGhee, 2005, paras 1–01 and 1–03, who identifies the moral base of equity while also considering the need for the legal conceptualisation of such moral notions as being based on specific principles. See also Spry, 2001, 1, who advances the proposition that 'equitable principles have above all a distinctive ethical quality, reflecting as they do the prevention of unconscionable conduct'.
- 8 (1615) 1 Ch Rep 1.
- 9 As St German described this underlying purpose: ' . . . in some cases it is good and even necessary to leue the wordis of the law and to folowe that reason and Justyce requyreth and to that intent equitye is ordeyned that is to say to temper and mytygate the rygoure of the lawe', quoted in Plucknett and Barton (eds), 'St German's Doctor and Student' 91 Selden Society, London, 1974, 97. Or, to attempt a translation of my own into a more modern, English-legal vernacular: ' . . . in some cases it is good and even necessary to deviate from the strict letter of the law and [instead] to follow what reason and justice require – which is the purpose for which equity is ordained – that is to temper and mitigate the rigour of statute and the common law'.
- 10 While we will focus on the Courts of Chancery as constituting the most significant Courts of Equity in this book, there were other courts (which are of no importance to the modern legal system) which also operated on equitable principles. After the Judicature Act 1873, the old courts of chancery were replaced by the High Court of Justice, although it could be said that the spirit of the old courts of chancery lived on in the Chancery Division of the High Court which was created by that Act.
- 11 Earl of Oxford's Case (1615) 1 Ch Rep 1.
- 12 The tendency to think of equity in terms of general principles as opposed to technical devices and strict case law rules was criticised by Vice-Chancellor Megarry in Re Montagu's Settlement [1987] Ch 264.
- 13 To emphasise the distinction between the second and third aspects of equity: the second aspect relates to substantive legal rules (such as the trust) whereas the third aspect relates to procedural rules and devices (such as interim injunctions).

section 1.4 below. It should be noted that these second and third aspects of equity differ from the apparent breadth of the first in that they constitute technical rules of law rather than abstract philosophical principles. It is common for English and Australian writers on equity to focus on these latter senses of equity in preference to a consideration of more philosophical notions of natural justice theory; although, it is suggested, an appreciation of these philosophical underpinnings is important if equity is to be understood as a collection of coherent principles and not simply as a ragbag of different doctrines.¹⁴

In all legal systems the following problem arises: how can we create general common law or statutory rules without treating some individual circumstances unjustly? In the context of the English legal system it is equity which performs this balancing act when set against the rigidity of the common law. In this regard, the work of the German philosopher Hegel has generated the following definition of equity:

Equity involves a departure from formal rights owing to moral or other considerations and is concerned primarily with the content of the lawsuit. A court of equity, however, comes to mean a court which decides in a single case without insisting on the formalities of a legal process¹⁵ or, in particular, on the objective evidence which the letter of the law may require.¹⁶ Further, it decides on the merits of the single case as a unique one, not with a view to disposing of it in such a way as to create a binding legal precedent for the future.¹⁷

Hegel was one of the foremost philosophers of the last 200 years, not a lawyer, but this definition of the activities of equity in its legal sense is nevertheless particularly useful because it shows us how equity permits the achievement of ‘fair’ or ‘just’ results in situations in which the literal application of statute or common law might otherwise lead to unfairness or injustice. As mentioned, this summary should be treated with some caution because he wrote as a German philosopher rather than as an English lawyer; and yet, Hegel captures the fact that the court is concerned only with the merits of the case between the claimant and the defendant, and not necessarily with the broader context of the law. In this way the court can focus on reaching the best result in the circumstances even where a literal application of statute or common law might seem to require a different result.¹⁸ Despite this ostensible flexibility, this book will consider some areas in which equity generally (and the trust in particular) seem to have become rigid institutions more akin to contract than to the underlying spirit of equity which treats each case as a unique one.¹⁹

14 This is the approach preferred by Professor Maitland in his lectures on ‘Equity’ published originally in 1909 and then revised posthumously in 1936 (see Maitland, 1936, 1). See also Loughlan, 2003, 3; Meagher, Heydon and Leeming, 2002, 3. Professor Martin distinguishes between the ‘wide sense’ of equity as opposed to its narrower ‘legal meaning’ where the legal meaning refers to the substantive principles applied and administered by the Courts of Chancery before 1873, in Hanbury and Martin’s Modern Equity, 16th edn, 2001, London: Sweet & Maxwell, 3 (hereafter ‘Martin, 2001’). Professor Pettit prefers a history of the courts of chancery and an analysis of the Judicature Act 1873 to an abstract definition of the term ‘equity’, Equity and the Law of Trusts, 9th edn, 2001, London: Butterworths (hereafter ‘Pettit, 2001’). See, however, the approach taken by the current author of Snell’s Equity, John McGhee QC, considered at fn 7 above, which is more in tune with the discussion in this book.

15 English equity, however, is also concerned with procedural and interlocutory matters.

16 See, for example, breach of trust in relation to which common law notions of causation play no part.

17 Hegel, 1821, 142, para 223.

18 Cf Dworkin, 1986.

19 See the discussion in Chapter 7 below.

The underlying argument of this book is that there is a need to understand the elegant simplicity of equity at the same time as the legal system is asked to consider questions asked of it by an ever more complex society. We shall see this development, for example, when we consider how equity allocates rights in the home between members of the same family.²⁰ That will require us to resist the siren call of those who argue for ever more formalistic tests for doctrines like the trust²¹ which were originally formed in the grand tradition of equity by the Courts of Chancery. It has been said that certainty is the hallmark of every effective legal system,²² but it is also true to say that chaos and complexity are the common characteristic of every problem which confronts such a legal system. People only go to court when their problems have become too difficult for them to sort out on their own. Therefore, I would suggest that equity's flexibility is important in ensuring that the law retains sufficient suppleness to cope with the social developments over which the court is asked to sit in judgment.

Equity and trusts are interesting subjects precisely because their inherent fluidity has enabled them to regenerate themselves regularly over time and yet their technical sophistication has provided lawyers with a range of techniques with which to achieve their clients' goals in a variety of circumstances. The fundamental principles of equity are part of a philosophical tradition which is identifiable in the thoughts of the ancient Greeks.²³ Nevertheless, it should be remembered that the English Courts of Equity have never expressly acknowledged that they are operating on any one philosophical basis, although, as will emerge throughout this book, it may appear that they do have such grand aspirations hidden within their judgments.²⁴ The development of equity through the cases has been far more pragmatic than that.

1.1.2 The scope of this book: equity and trusts

This book considers both the general doctrines and remedies which form part of equity, and more particularly the law of trusts. The general principles of equity are founded on the maxims which are considered in section 1.4 of this chapter. These maxims have informed the creation of equity over the centuries and continue to be important.²⁵ The principal equitable doctrine is that equity acts in personam on the conscience of the defendant, which means that the main focus of a Court of Equity is to consider whether or not the individual defendant has acted in good conscience.²⁶ The law of trusts was born out of equity's focus 20 See Chapter 15 and Chapter 17, which consider the flexibility of modern family law and human rights law when measured against the rigidity of much of property law.

21 Birks, 1989:1, 85; Beatson, 1991; Honoré, 2003, 15 et seq.

22 Eg, Oakley, 1997, 27.

23 See Thomas, 1976, 506. This tradition is considered in greater detail below and in Chapter 32.

24 A word on terminology. It is usual to refer to the jurisdiction of the courts of equity in the capitalised form 'Equity'; whereas the ideas which make up the principles of equity are often referred to instead in the lower case as 'equity', a usage which also appears in other social science. In this book the capitalised usage will be reserved for mention only of the system of courts making up the equitable jurisdiction. However, I will more generally use only the lower case to refer both to the jurisdiction, to the ideas which that jurisdiction has generated and also the general notion of equity as broadly akin to 'fairness' or 'just treatment' (as discussed in greater detail in the text).

25 See, for example, the continued significance of doctrines of conscience in the House of Lords in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington [1996] AC 669 and the maxim that equity looks upon as done that which ought to have been done in the Privy Council in Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324.

26 Earl of Oxford's Case (1615) 1 Ch Rep 1.

on acting on conscience,²⁷ but the subsequent development of trusts law has reflected the increasing use of trusts in commercial transactions in which certainty has been considered to be an important requirement.²⁸ As a result, the ostensible flexibility of equity was displaced first by the development of the doctrine of precedent governing the application of equitable maxims and latterly by the increasing certainty required of doctrines like the trust. So, this book considers the law of trusts in great depth in recognition of the central importance of trusts in English law over the centuries. The remainder of the book is concerned with the other equitable doctrines and with understanding the trust as being a part of the equitable canon. Therefore, this chapter considers equitable maxims in the abstract before the next chapter introduces the trust concept.

1.1.3 Equity and trusts are based on conscience

As explained in the preceding paragraph, the most significant equitable doctrine is the trust, which forms the principal focus of this book: our focus will therefore divide between the law of trusts on the one hand and general equitable principles and remedies on the other. The most important case in relation to the development of equity and the trust in recent years was arguably that in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC,²⁹ in which Lord Browne-Wilkinson addressed two main issues, aside from dealing with the appeal before him. First, he set out his version of the core principles of the law of trusts.³⁰ Secondly, he set about re-establishing traditional notions of equity as being at the heart of English trusts law. As opposed to the new principle of unjust enrichment developed (principally) by Lord Goff and a group of academics centred primarily in Oxford,³¹ Lord Browne-Wilkinson has re-asserted a traditional understanding of the trust as being based on the conscience of the person who acts as trustee.³² So, in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC, his Lordship went back to basics with the first of his ‘Relevant Principles of Trust Law’:

- (i) Equity operates on the conscience of the owner of the legal interest. In the case of a trust, the conscience of the legal owner requires him to carry out the purposes for which the property was vested in him (express or implied trust) or which the law imposes on him by reason of his unconscionable conduct (constructive trust).³³

As we shall see, the basis of the trust (and indeed the whole of equity) is concerned with regulating the conscience of a person where the common law might otherwise allow that person to act unconscionably but in accordance with the letter of the law.³⁴ Suppose, for example, that

27 Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

28 In relation to the increasing commercialisation of trusts law, see, for example, the discussion of Target Holdings v Redfern [1996] 1 AC 421 in para 21.2.2. As to the importance of certainty in the ordinary law of trusts see Chapter 3 generally and the authorities following Knight v Knight (1840) 3 Beav 148 discussed in that chapter.

29 [1996] AC 669.

30 See section 2.4.

31 See the work of Professor Peter Birks (in particular his Introduction to the Law of Restitution (1989) and Unjust Enrichment (2003)) and the literature which it has spawned.

32 This debate is considered in depth later in this book and summarised in Chapter 32. Alternatively you may choose to consult the essay at www.alastairhudson.com/trusts/restitution of unjust enrichment.

33 [1996] AC 669; [1996] 2 All ER 961, 988.

34 Rochefoucauld v Boustead [1897] 1 Ch 196: on which see para 1.4.13.

a defendant is permitted by a statutory provision, or a rule of common law, to receive a payment of money as a result of being red-headed. If the defendant had worn a red wig to fool the payer into thinking that she fell within the category of red-headed people, the common law might permit the defendant to keep the money on a literal interpretation of the rule. However, equity would prevent the defendant from manipulating that statute for fraudulent purposes on the basis that to allow the defendant to do so would be unconscionable.³⁵ *Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC*³⁶ re-asserts this basic principle of good conscience.³⁷ A substantial part of the argument of this book is that it is only the traditional equitable notion of focusing on the conscience of the defendant which can make trusts law coherent.³⁸

1.1.4 The many senses of conscience

Conscience in equity

The task of establishing a meaning for the term ‘conscience’ will be, as we shall see throughout the course of this book, an interesting one. The genesis of the term ‘conscience’ in this context is in the early statements of the English jurists that the Courts of Equity were courts of conscience³⁹ and, more significantly, that the Lord Chancellor was the keeper of the monarch’s conscience. The post of Lord Chancellor was frequently referred to as the position of ‘Lord Keeper’⁴⁰ and, by way of example, Sir Christopher Hatton⁴¹ in particular was known during his time in the position as being ‘the Keeper of the Queen’s Conscience’ during a part of the reign of Elizabeth I. In other words, the rules of equity are historically taken to be the application of the monarch’s personal power to dispense justice and to ensure that good conscience was enforced in that way. As is discussed in Chapter 32,⁴² these Lords Chancellor were bishops and therefore the ‘conscience’ with which they were concerned was more a religious conscience than a legal conscience until the beginning of the 17th century.⁴³ The conscience which concerns equity now is a secular idea of conscience.

While Lord Browne-Wilkinson has stated the law as it exists today in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC,⁴⁴ there are many reasons to comment on, and even criticise, that decision and the direction in which the substantive law has been pointed.⁴⁵ As will be explored below, there may be a number of contexts in which this standard of ‘conscience’ will not be easy to apply in all contexts. In particular, it is unclear whether or not a single standard can be created which will cater, for example, both for commercial cases involving cross-border financial transactions and for family cases involving rights to the home. If his 35 Ibid, exemplifying the principle that equity will prevent statute being used as an engine of fraud, discussed at para 1.4.13.

36 [1996] AC 669.

37 This author has considered that case in detail in another book: Hudson, 1999:1. Many of the themes in that book are rehearsed in this one.

38 See the essay which comprises Chapter 32 of this book in this regard.

39 As noted by Meagher, Gummow and Lehane, 2002, 3.

40 Thomas, 1976, 506.

41 Lord Chancellor from 1587–1591.

42 See in particular the discussion of the term ‘conscience’ in section 32.2.

43 The Lord Keeper appointed by James I was the first non-ecclesiastic: Thomas, 1976, 506.

44 [1996] AC 669.

45 Hudson, 1999:1.

Lordship did not intend to create a single standard but rather to erect a concept which will be applied differently in different contexts, it is not always immediately clear on what intellectual bases those different notions of conscience are to be constructed. This book seeks to explain how this jurisdiction of conscience should be understood today and how it operates in practice.

Nevertheless, the underpinning concept of that judgment is that equity is concerned with acting on the conscience of a defendant on a case-by-case basis.⁴⁶ That means equity is an ethical response which English courts will deploy in circumstances in which other legal rules would otherwise allow a defendant to act unconscionably. Equity will turn to the many claims and remedies considered in this book to address the rights and wrongs of such cases. One of the more sophisticated instruments in equity's armoury is the trust, which will form the main focus of this book and which is introduced in detail in Chapter 2.⁴⁷

The idea of a conscience in general terms

Much of the confusion about the idea of conscience among modern commentators is based on two phenomena. First, those commentators tend to prefer a form of law which is rigid and laid out in a clear framework, even though it is the experience of every legal system that factual situations will always be generated which defy those tight rules and which instead require the courts to reach just conclusions in exceptional cases. What those commentators overlook is how equity operates in reliance both on 'high-level principles' (i.e. general principles which supply the general goals which the law is seeking to achieve, rather than detailed rules) and also on detailed rules which have been developed by centuries of precedent. Their caricature of equity as something which is entirely discretionary is simply a caricature. Second, those commentators fail to understand what a conscience is. Their assumption is that a conscience is an entirely random and entirely subjective phenomenon which is unique to each individual mind. That is not the view of psychiatrists or psychoanalysts. For example, Freud⁴⁸ and Jung⁴⁹ both conceived of the conscience as something which sits outside the conscious mind and calls the conscious mind to account. It is also a staple of English literature. Shakespeare's character The Fool in King Lear is the equivalent of a court jester, but that character was an important part of central European literature (from which Shakespeare borrowed) in that The Fool did not simply tell jokes or sing songs but rather acted as the King's conscience by telling him when he had acted foolishly or immorally or contrary to "nature". Importantly, this conscience is a separate person from the King himself: this was a metaphor for the way in which the conscience exists outside the conscious mind. If you think about how you experience your conscience, it is something which comes to you unbidden and which nags at you. You have no conscious control over the things which do or do not bother your conscience. The conscience is something which is formed objectively in large part, even if you experience it subjectively (after all, hopefully, no one can hear you wrestling with your conscience). The word 'conscience' is an amalgam of 'con' and 'science': literally, 46 As exemplified by Earl of Oxford's Case (1615) 1 Ch Rep 1.

47 Trusts fall into two types: express trusts (deliberately created for a variety of reasons which will be considered below) and trusts implied by law (comprising constructive trusts and resulting trusts which are imposed by the court on the basis of principles considered below). See para 2.2.3 below.

48 Freud, 1923 and 1930.

49 Jung, 1927.

‘knowledge with’, or rather knowledge of oneself with oneself. The conscience is experienced subjectively but it is generally understood as being formed objectively. From birth, through childhood and through one’s adulthood, we all receive messages constantly about right and wrong from parents, schoolteachers, the media, the legal system, society at large, and so on. The conscience is the product of all of these objective stimuli being internalised so as to produce the individual conscience which we then experience as something deep within our own minds. But the fact that the conscience comes from objective stimuli – that is, from outside the mind – means that it is an entirely coherent proposition that the courts are entitled to judge the contents of a person’s conscience. If the contents of the conscience come from the outside world, then it is appropriate for the courts to identify what one’s conscience should have prompted one to do and to judge each individual defendant accordingly.

A good example of this arising in the law is the discussion of ‘dishonesty’ in Chapter 20, where the courts have struggled to decide whether they may objectively decide what a person should have done or whether the individual must be shown to have understood that their behaviour was dishonest. If it was accepted that the conscience which underpins equity is objectively constituted (and only subjectively situated) then it would be entirely appropriate to use an objective concept of what the defendant should have done in the circumstances. This idea of the nature of the conscience is explored in Chapter 32 in detail.⁵⁰

1.1.5 Concepts of equity in ancient Greek philosophy

Professor Maitland, in lectures originally published early in the 20th century,⁵¹ would have had us believe that equity is founded on ‘ancient English elements’ and rejected the idea that equity was taken from Roman law.⁵² In truth, the provenance of the English courts of equity is a mixture of ecclesiastical law and a body of law which, as Maitland suggested, developed in terms of a line of precedent from 1557 onwards.⁵³ It seems that that is the most appropriate date because that is when the common law courts and the courts of equity began to diverge most clearly when the common law judges rejected Lord Chancellor Thomas More’s offer to rein in his frequent issue of injunctions against decisions of common law courts if they would ‘mitigate the rigour of the common law’. Before that time, there was some suggestion that the idea of conscience could be found even in the common law, as suggested by the remark ‘conscience is aequum et bonum, which is the basis of every law’,⁵⁴ even in the ancient common law. Nevertheless, the common law courts and the courts of equity began to diverge markedly from the mid-16th century onwards. However, the basis of equity as a counterpoint to the common law is not an idea which should be considered to be simply English. There are echoes of it in the ancient Greek philosophers when, as Douzinas tells us: ‘Aristotle argued that equity, epieikeia, is the rectification of legal justice nomos in so far as the law is defective. Laws are general but “the raw material of human behaviour” is such that it is often impossible to pronounce in general terms’.⁵⁵

50 See section 32.2.

51 These lectures were published in 1909 and exist now as Maitland, 1936 in a posthumous second edition.

52 Maitland, 1936, 6.

53 Ibid., 8.

54 Reported at Bro Abr Estates pl 78, cited by Baker, 2002, 107.

55 Extracts from Aristotle, Ethics, taken from Douzinas, 2000, 42.

Aristotle's Ethics described equity in the following terms:

For equity, though superior to justice,⁵⁶ is still just . . . justice and equity coincide, and although both are good, equity is superior. What causes the difficulty is the fact that equity is just, but not what is legally just: it is a rectification of legal justice.⁵⁷

In this way, Aristotle considered that equity provides a better form of justice⁵⁸ because it provides for a more specific judgment as to right and wrong in individual cases which rectifies any errors or similar unfairness which the common law or statute would otherwise have made. The superiority of equity, on Aristotle's account, emerges in the following passage which continues on from the last quoted passage:

The explanation of this is that all law is universal,⁵⁹ and there are some things about which it is not possible to pronounce rightly in general terms; therefore in cases where it is necessary to make a general pronouncement, but impossible to do so rightly, the law takes account of the majority of cases, though not unaware that in this way errors are made . . . So when the law states a general rule, and a case arises under this that is exceptional, then it is right, where the legislator⁶⁰ owing to the generality of his language has erred in not covering that case, to correct the omission by a ruling such as the legislator himself would have given if he had been present there, and as he would have enacted if he had been aware of the circumstances.⁶¹

It is worth noting that Aristotle refers only to the role of a legislator here, and not to judge-made law in a common law system like that in England and Wales. However, the core point transfers perfectly well: if the common law or a statute has failed to anticipate a particular situation or if it would produce unfairness or allow unconscionability to persist without a remedy, then equity will intervene to correct that universal rule. Aristotle refers to these as 'errors' in the law, which is perhaps simply redolent of a different time when there was nothing like the volume of law nor the breadth of legal rights among all citizens which we see today. Modern society is simply far more complex than Aristotle could ever have imagined; so much so that equity is all the more essential in the modern world. Thus, equity exists to rectify what would otherwise be errors in the application of the law to factual situations in which the judges who developed common law principles or the legislators who created statutes could not have intended. It should be noted that English judges do not quote Aristotle as 56 The concept of justice in the work of Aristotle is too complex to consider here. In short, it divides between various forms of justice: justice in distribution, justice in rectification, justice in exchange and mean justice. On these categories of justice see Bostock, 2000; Leyden, 1985. Equity is presented in Aristotle's work as a flexible counterpoint to these formalistic attitudes to justice.

57 Aristotle, 1955, 198, para 1137a17, x.

58 A philosophically loaded term in the Aristotelian tradition but here limited to the context of legal justice as provided for by common law and statute.

59 That is, law aims to set down general principles and not to deal with individual cases.

60 Or judge, for our purposes. It is important to note that Aristotle was thinking about statutes as opposed to judge-made law, although his entire concept of equity assumes the presence of a judicial interpreter of those rules.

61 Aristotle, 1955, 198, para 1137a17, x.

an authority but for the early judges in courts of equity it can be expected that knowledge of Aristotle would have been a part of their education and therefore that those judges are more likely to have had ideas like Aristotle's as part of the warp and weft of their attitudes to law. For example, Lord Ellesmere held the following in the Earl of Oxford's Case: 'men's actions are so diverse and infinite that it is impossible to make a general law which may aptly meet with every particular and not fail in some circumstances'.⁶² This, it is suggested, is almost identical to the passages quoted from Aristotle immediately above. Therefore, it would seem reasonable to argue that Aristotle's ideas have been one of the philosophical ingredients in the casserole that is equity.

What will be important in this discussion will be the extent to which equity can be concerned to achieve justice, or whether there is some context of 'justice' (as Aristotle suggests) which is outside the purview of equity. So it is that we will consider whether equity can be remodelled so as to achieve justice (in the terms that that concept is conceived by ancient philosophers like Plato and Aristotle)⁶³ or in terms of social justice as conceived by modern social theorists. Within this debate are potentially competing claims by human rights law and equity to constitute the principles on which the legal system will attempt to provide for fairness in litigation and in the dissemination of socially agreed norms.

1.1.6 Kant's notion of equity

The philosopher Immanuel Kant presented the following notion of equity (or 'aequitas') in his The Metaphysics of Morals:⁶⁴

Equity (considered objectively) is in no way a basis for merely calling upon another to fulfil an ethical duty (to be benevolent and kind). One who demands something on this basis stands instead upon his right, except that he does not have the conditions that a judge needs in order to determine by how much or in what way his claim could be satisfied. Suppose that the terms on which a trading company was formed were that the partners should share equally in the profits,⁶⁵ but that one partner nevertheless did more than the others and so lost more when the company met with reverses. By equity he can demand more from the company than merely an equal share with the others. In accordance with proper (strict) right, however, his demand would be refused; for if one thinks of a judge in this case, he would have no definite particulars (data) to enable him to decide how much is due by the contract.

62 (1615) 1 Ch Rep 1, at 6.

63 See Morrison, 1995.

64 Kant, 1996, 390, para 6:234. Kant lived between 1724 and 1804. The Metaphysics of Morals was published in two parts in 1797, having been in preparation since about 1765. The reference here is to the most easily accessible version of this work in print at the time of writing. The emphases in the quoted passages are taken from the original.

65 It should be noted that the form of company considered is the joint stock company which existed also in English law, before the decision in Salomon v A Salomon & Co Ltd [1897] AC 22, whereby the members of the company were partners and the company's property was held on trust for the members as beneficiaries by the directors of the company: see Hudson, 2000:1, 107.

This conception of equity does not equate entirely with equity in English law.⁶⁶ English equity does operate by means of judicial diktat so as to require a defendant to act in good conscience and either to refrain from exercising some common law right or to grant some equitable right to the claimant. However, in the example set out by Kant in the passage quoted above, there is no reason to suppose that in legal terms there would be any requirement on the other partners to this trading venture to grant the claimant any greater right than he had agreed to by way of contract. Importantly, in this sense, English equity is not concerned to act fairly between people in the sense that everybody must be left entirely happy and have suffered no loss. It will not seek to be ‘fair’ in the general sense of that word, but instead will tend to deal only with limited categories of act: that is, those acts which are considered in this book. English equity is concerned to ensure that there has been no unconscionable behaviour but, for example, there is nothing legally unconscionable in making a profit from someone else’s foolishness or naivety, provided that there has neither been any fraud nor undue influence exercised over that naive fool. Importantly, equity also acts on the basis of the doctrine of precedent, in particular in relation to the law on express trusts (as considered in the next chapter). Therefore, the idea of conscience which we will identify with English equity is one which is commercially aware and which may act differently in cases involving ordinary people acting in their private capacities as opposed to cases involving business people acting at arm’s length from one another.⁶⁷

So, English equity is not a general means by which people can protest that they have simply lost money or had their hopes dashed if there has not been any action by the defendant which the courts would consider to be blameworthy or unconscionable. What the substantive principles of equity may allow is a claim based on a form of unconscionable behaviour which English equity does recognise. So, for example, a valid claim recognised by the courts might be one brought by a claimant who was induced to invest in a business venture in reliance on a representation made to her by the other partners,⁶⁸ or if the other partners made a secret profit from the venture not disclosed to the claimant.⁶⁹ In this sense, in accordance with Aristotle’s view of equity, the equitable court of conscience takes priority over the strict rules of a common law court.⁷⁰

66 Kant also has a peculiar notion of equity as ‘a princess who cannot speak’. This odd idea merges two themes which happen to recur in equity theory in England. First, that there is something ‘feminine’ about a form of legal thinking which reacts to circumstances by using high-level principles like ‘conscience’. Second, the idea that equity reacts to circumstances where there is unfairness but cannot establish legal doctrines positively in itself. This second idea does not reflect English equity at all: equity has created the injunction, the trust, proprietary estoppel, the charge and many other positive, substantive legal doctrines which are considered in this book. Otherwise, this idea of equity as a princess is more arresting than meaningful.

67 See, for example, the discussion of equity of redemption of mortgages where ordinary people are protected against oppressive contractual devices imposed on them by banks and other mortgagees (Fairclough v Swan Brewery [1912] AC 565) or, on a different note, the avoidance of liability by a defendant based on its commercial status (Polly Peck International v Nadir (No 2) [1992] 4 All ER 769).

68 This may give rise to a claim in proprietary estoppel: see Chapter 13, especially Gillett v Holt [2000] 2 All ER 289.

69 This may give rise to a claim in constructive trust: see Chapter 12, especially Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46.

70 Compare, in this regard, the equitable maxim that equity follows the law (in para 1.4.2) and the principle derived from Earl of Oxford’s Case (1615) 1 Ch Rep 1 that equity may nevertheless override common law principles.

1.1.7 Equity as a moral virtue

The general principles of equity, in applying the letter of the law to the circumstances of individual citizens, pre-date the medieval Lords Chancellor through whose offices the various claims and actions applied in the modern Courts of Chancery were developed. It is important to recall that neither Aristotle nor Hegel are authorities in English law, nor have their ideas tended to be cited generally or directly by English judges as legal authorities.⁷¹ However, they do provide an intellectual framework into which many approaches to equity can be placed. Study of the philosophy of the ancient Greeks was long a part of the intellectual furniture of the educated classes in England. Therefore, it should come as no surprise that there is some similarity between the writings of Aristotle on justice and the principles developed by the English judiciary over the centuries, even if one does not cite the other explicitly. Consider, for example, the following description of equity provided in 1705 by Lord Chancellor Cowper:

Now equity is no part of the [common] law, but a moral virtue, which qualifies, moderates, and reforms the rigour, hardness, and edge of the law, and is an universal truth; it does also assist the law where it is defective and weak in the constitution (which is the life of the law) and defends the law from crafty evasions, delusions, and new subtleties, invented and contrived to evade and delude the common law, whereby such as have undoubted right are made remediless: and this is the office of equity, to support and protect the common law from shifts and crafty contrivances against the justice of the law. Equity therefore does not destroy the law, nor create it, but assist it.⁷²

What is significant about this description of equity is that it considers equity itself to be a moral virtue. This is similar in tone to Aristotle's approach to equity as a means of preventing any unfairness which might otherwise result from the rigid application of formal legal rules. Perhaps it could be observed that Lord Cowper was speaking in a different age from that in which Lord Nottingham began the formulation of the more technically-minded equity which we know today.⁷³ However, it should not be forgotten that for many equity jurists, the assertion that its principles are 'an universal truth' is a very significant part of the legal concept of equity.⁷⁴

Equity has a long tradition: this book will aim to highlight its remnants in its modern application. The text which follows will consider the modern uses of equity and in particular the core principles of equity to which modern courts still have recourse. The important first task is to consider the birth of those principles of equity before anything else will make any sense.

⁷¹ Cf Jones v Maynard [1951] Ch 572, 575, per Vaisey J, considering Plato's notion of equality; see para 1.4.8.

⁷² Lord Dudley v Lady Dudley (1705) Prec Ch 241, 244, per Lord Cowper LC. The same passage is cited similarly in Snell's Equity, 2, although attributed to Sir Nathan Wright LK.

⁷³ A good example of this tension is the discussion of the speeches of Lords Browne-Wilkinson and Goff in Tinsley v Milligan [1994] 1 AC 340, considered in detail in para 11.4.6, where the former grants an equitable interest in property on a purely technical basis whereas the latter sought to deny such an interest on the basis that the claimant had committed immoral acts and therefore should not be granted equity's aid.

⁷⁴ See, for example, a range of writers including Lord Kaimis, Principles of Equity, 1778, 41; I Spry, 2001, 1; and McGhee, 2005, paras 1–01 and 1–03.

1.2 THE BIRTH OF EQUITY

1.2.1 The development of two systems: common law and equity

It is impossible to understand any part of English law without understanding English history first. Even the geographic jurisdiction covered by this discussion is the result of history. The genesis of English polity and the structure of its legal system are generally understood to be the result of the Norman invasion of 1066 by which William I seized control of the entire kingdom. The composition of that kingdom had itself been the result of hundreds of years of consolidation of warring tribes. The development of England and Wales as a single legal jurisdiction results from hundreds of years of wars of conquest fought by the insurgent English against the Welsh. Scotland retained its own, distinct legal system despite the Act of Union of 1707. Now, the history of any part of English law is always subject to debate because documentary proof of these matters is difficult to find. Professor Story, in his 19th century American history of equity,⁷⁵ describes the court of equity as being ‘an original and fundamental court, as ancient as the kingdom itself’.⁷⁶ The role of a ‘chancellor’ is identified in the Roman law tradition as a form of secretary or chief scribe, and as an official used by the Saxon kings in England, and also across the Catholic church in the Roman tradition.⁷⁷ However, for present purposes, nothing will be gained by casting our historical net too broadly – instead, I shall begin with the events of the 11th century which are generally taken in our understanding of English law and equity as constituting a sufficiently significant breaking point in the historical chain.

The Norman Conquest is therefore vitally important. It forms the point in time at which the Normans introduced an entirely new legal system to England. This law was common to the whole of the kingdom. Arguably, it was the first time that the kingdom had had such a single legal system.⁷⁸ Hence the term ‘common law’ was coined to mean this new system of legal principle created by the English courts which was common to the entire realm, rather than being a patchwork of tribal customs applied unevenly. It is thought that the term ‘common law’ itself derives from the ecclesiastical term ‘ius commune’ which was used to describe the law administered by the Catholic church.⁷⁹

Henry II created the courts of King’s Bench to hear matters otherwise brought before the Crown. From these early, medieval courts the principles of the common law began.⁸⁰ Rights were founded and obligations created as a result of the decisions of these early courts. There remained, however, a right to petition the King directly if it was thought that the decision of the common law court was unfair or unjust. So, for example, a tenant of land who was unjustly dealt with in the court of his local lord could seek a remedy directly from the King if he was unsatisfied with the decision of the court. For the monarchy this provided an important safeguard against the power of these courts by reserving the ultimate control over the administration of justice to the person of the monarch. However, the proliferation of suits

75 Story, Equity Jurisprudence, 1st edn, 1835; 13th edn, 1886.

76 Quoting Lord Hobart, ibid., para 40.

77 Ibid.

78 ‘Arguably’ in the sense that some would point to King Alfred as having been the first to attempt to introduce a single system of law to much of England.

79 Maitland, 1936, 2.

80 It has been suggested also that the Lords Chancellor sat on the earliest common law courts, and so the jurisdiction of Courts of Chancery was as ancient as any other.

that were brought directly before the King eventually required the creation of a separate mechanism for hearing them. Otherwise the King would be permanently diverted from important matters like war, hunting and effecting felicitous marriages. It should also be remembered that, for these Norman kings, England was a distraction from their main business of protecting their lands in what is now France and elsewhere in Europe.

During the medieval period the position of Lord Chancellor was created, among other things, to hear those petitions which would otherwise have been taken directly to the monarch. The medieval Lord Chancellor was empowered to issue royal writs on behalf of the Crown through the use of the Great Seal, but gradually acquired power to hear petitions directly during the 13th and 14th centuries. As a result the Lord Chancellor's discretion broadened, until some lawyers began to comment that it had begun to place too much power in the hands of one person.⁸¹ It is also interesting to note that the courts of equity did not necessarily concern themselves with strict legal rules at all but instead concerned themselves with inquiring specifically into the defendant's conscience: so, for example, Fortescue CJ declared in 1452 that '[w]e are to argue conscience here, not the law'.⁸² Selden is reputed to have said: 'Equity is a roguish thing. For [common] law we have a measure . . . equity is according to the conscience of him that is Chancellor, and as that is longer or narrower, so is equity. 'Tis all one as if they should make the standard for the measure a Chancellor's foot.'⁸³ This statement implied that Lords Chancellor were thought to ignore precedent and to decide what judgments to make entirely in accordance with their own caprice. The Courts of Chancery were typically comprised only of the Lord Chancellor and his assistant, the Master of the Rolls, until 1813 when the first Vice-Chancellor was appointed.⁸⁴ Since that time the rules of equity, and in particular the rules relating to the law of trusts, have become far more rigidified⁸⁵ – a tendency which will be considered in detail in this book.⁸⁶

The Lord Chancellor was a politician first and foremost. In truth, before Robert Walpole became the first Prime Minister in 1741, it was the Lord Chancellor who would have been considered the 'prime minister' to the Crown.⁸⁷ It was the Lord Chancellor who would summon defendants to appear before him to justify their behaviour. This jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor, which was hotly contested, arose from the range of writs which he would serve even after a court of common law had given judgment: in fact, the Lord Chancellor would be concerned to ensure that the individual defendant had behaved properly and would not be seeking to overturn any rule of the common law. Nevertheless, by the time of James I it was required that the King intercede to decree once and for all that it was the Courts of Equity which took priority.⁸⁸ The early Lords Chancellor were all clerics: that is, they were bishops who were Keepers of the King's Conscience.⁸⁹ Latterly, the Lords Chancellor were secular appointments, some of whom were attracted to the post by the profits which were available to 81 For an account of the sort of issues which the office of Lord Chancellor created at this time see Thomas, 1976, 506.

82 Mitch 31 Hen VI, Fitz Abr, Subpena, pl 23, cited by Baker, 2002, 108.

83 Table Talk of John Selden, 1927.

84 There were no official, methodical law reports of Chancery cases before 1557: Maitland, 1936, 8.

85 Croft, 1989, 29.

86 See in particular Chapter 7.

87 Meagher, Heydon and Leeming, 2002, 3.

88 Earl of Oxford's Case (1615) Ch Rep 1.

89 Thomas, 1976.

the less scrupulous holders of the post. Indeed the Georgian Lords Chancellor used to charge for the award of the positions of Master in the Courts of Chancery. The Earl of Macclesfield, when Lord Chancellor, was convicted by the House of Lords of embezzling court funds in the early 18th century.⁹⁰ We should not allow the irony of a person who sat as the sole judge in the court of conscience accepting ‘presents’,⁹¹ either from litigants or from people who wished to sit as judges, to escape us. By today’s standards the courts in this period were very corrupt.

The writs that the Lord Chancellor served were processed by his administrative department known as the Chancery.⁹² The Chancery was therefore simply an administrative department concerned with dealing with petitions sent to it by Parliament⁹³ and with sending out the monarch’s writs under seal.⁹⁴ Over time, the Lord Chancellor personally began to hear all of the petitions which would ordinarily have been brought before the monarch. From this beginning, the role of the Chancellor expanded, particularly in the person of Cardinal Wolsey in the reign of Henry VIII. The Chancery emerged as a force in parallel to the Court of Star Chamber⁹⁵ particularly during those dark, intolerant days in English history surrounding the Reformation:⁹⁶ the former concerned with ordinary equity, and the latter with ‘criminal equity’.⁹⁷ In time, the number of petitions brought before the Lord Chancellor became so numerous that a separate system of courts was created to hear those cases: the Courts of Chancery. It is thought that the Chancery was so called because its first room had a latticed partition known as a ‘cancelli’ – hence, after some minor adaptation of pronunciation and spelling, the term ‘chancery’ emerged.⁹⁸ Another explanation suggested by Coke was that it derived from the term ‘cancellarius’ relating to the cancellation of the King’s letters patent.⁹⁹ It was in these Courts of Chancery that the principles of equity were developed. The position of Lord Chancellor has encompassed the constitutionally confusing roles of House of Lords judge, politically-appointed Cabinet minister and speaker of the House of Lords. This position has changed with the creation of the Supreme Court by means of the Constitutional Reform Act 2005. These changes have had no effect on the substance of equity.

90 See eg, Hibbert, 1957, 126.

91 As Baker refers to these payments: Baker, 2002.

92 These writs were subject to a subpoena which meant, quite literally, that the defendant was called to appear on pain of suffering a financial penalty for non-appearance.

93 In existence between 1485 and 1641 sitting in permanent session – unlike Parliament – and comprising both the Privy Council and the Chief Justices: thereby constituting the most important power base in the country and used to police the opinions and activities of the seditious or the otherwise untrustworthy.

94 In Hale’s account, this was the beginning of the Chancery jurisdiction: see Story, 1886, para 42.

95 Baker, 2002, 101.

96 Any number of standard historical works will explain the level of religious intolerance and persecution of individuals through the reigns particularly of Henry VIII, Mary I and Elizabeth I. The Star Chamber seems to have commenced its activities some time between 1347 and 1487. The name ‘star chamber’ arose because this group sat in a chamber in Westminster with stars on the ceiling – hence ‘star chamber’. At the outset this group dealt both with state matters and with pleas for justice. Its membership was the same as the monarch’s Privy Council for most of its history. It is most (in)famous, however, for its activities in the early seventeenth century (most particularly in the 1630s) in persecuting alleged traitors and insurgents, both in trying and in executing them.

97 Maitland, 1936, 19, explaining that, fraud apart, Chancery took no interest in criminal matters, whereas Star Chamber had jurisdiction over many criminal and seditious practices.

98 Holland, 1945, 17.

99 Although, in truth, many courts gave effect to principles which will be defined as equitable in this book (ie, to promote fairness) outside the Courts of Chancery even before 1875: Meagher, Heydon and Leeming, 2002, 5.

1.2.2 The continuing distinction between equity and common law

In order to understand English law at the beginning of the new millennium it is vitally important to understand that there used to be two completely distinct sets of courts in England, and therefore two completely distinct systems of law: common law and Equity.¹⁰⁰ This position continued until the enactment of the Judicature Act 1873 which removed the need to sue in common law courts for a common law remedy, and so forth. However, even though the physical separation of the two codes of principles into separate systems of courts was removed in 1873, the intellectual separation of the principles remains.

The distinction between equity and the common law was both practically and intellectually significant before the Judicature Act 1873. Before that Act came into full effect in 1875 it was necessary for a litigant to decide whether her claim related to common law or to equity. To select the wrong jurisdiction would mean that the claim would be thrown out and sent to the other court. So, if a claim for an equitable remedy were brought before a common law court, that common law court would dismiss the claim and the claimant would be required to go to the Court of Equity instead. This problem is explained in Charles Dickens's Bleak House in the following way: 'Equity sends questions to Law, Law sends questions back to Equity; Law finds it can't do this, Equity finds it can't do that; neither can so much as say it can't do anything, without this solicitor instructing and this counsel appearing . . .' And so it was that the litigant trudged disconsolately between the various courts seeking someone who could deliver judgment on her claim. The result of the Judicature Act 1873 was that the practical distinction between common law and equity disappeared. However, it is vitally important to understand that the intellectual distinction remains. As considered below, there remains a division between certain claims and remedies which are available only at common law, and other claims and remedies available only in equity.

The principles of equity remain subject to their own logic, and common law claims to their own logic, even though all courts are now empowered to apply both systems of rules. In practice, the Chancery Division of the High Court will still hear matters primarily relating to trusts and property law, whereas the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court will hear traditionally common law issues such as the interpretation of contracts or matters concerning the law of tort. The reason for this allocation of responsibility has to do with the expertise of the judges in each field, but it has resulted in the perpetuation of particular modes of thought in the different divisions of the High Court.

The key point to take from this discussion is that nothing will make sense unless we understand that there is an important distinction to be made between, on the one hand, common law and, on the other, equity. The two systems operate in parallel but must not be confused one with the other.

1.2.3 The impact of the distinction between common law and equity

The main result of the distinction between common law and equity is that each has distinct claims and distinct remedies. Common law is the system which is able to award cash damages for loss. This is the pre-eminent common law remedy, for example in cases concerning breach of contract or the tort of negligence. On the other hand, a claimant seeking an injunction must rely on equity because the injunction is an equitable remedy awarded at the court's discretion, in line with the specific principles considered in Chapter 31.

100 Story, 1886, para 40.

Suppose the following set of facts. Arthur enters into a contract with Sunderland Association Football Club (SAFC) to deliver five footballs to SAFC each Saturday morning before a home game, in return for payment of £1,000 in advance each month. Suppose that SAFC paid £1,000 in advance for delivery in August, but Arthur then refused to make the delivery. Suppose then that SAFC was required to spend an extra £1,000 to acquire those footballs from another supplier. SAFC have two issues to be resolved. First, SAFC will wish to recover from Arthur the £1,000 spent on acquiring footballs from the alternative supplier. Secondly, SAFC will wish to force Arthur to carry out its contractual undertaking or to repay the £1,000 paid in advance.

The first issue is resolved by a common law claim for damages to recover the £1,000 lost in acquiring alternative footballs.

The second issue, however, will be resolved by a claim for specific performance (an equitable remedy) of the contractual obligation to supply footballs. The second claim will be at the discretion of the court. If Arthur had gone into insolvency, it would be unreasonable, and legally probably impossible depending on the administration of the insolvency, to force Arthur to perform the contract. Alternatively, if it could be shown that both parties had been operating under a mistake as to the number of footballs to be provided, it might be that a court would think it unfair to enforce the contract. In such a situation, the equitable jurisdiction gives the court the discretion to award another remedy, even though the ordinary law of contract would suggest that the contract must be enforced once it is validly created. Equity may decide to order the contract void on grounds of mistake instead and thus rescind it.¹⁰¹

Therefore, it is necessary to make a distinction between common law and equity. The division might be rendered diagrammatically as shown in the table below. The detail of the available remedies is considered below and variously through this book. What is apparent from this list is that it is only in equity that it is possible to receive tailor-made awards of specific performance or rescission in relation to contracts, or to take effective control over property. The common law is organised principally around awards of money in relation to loss by means of damages, or recovery of specific, identifiable property by means of common law tracing, and the common law claim of 'money had and received' in relation to specifically identifiable payments of money. Therefore, the common law is concerned with return of particular property or with making good loss, unlike the more complex claims and remedies which are available in equity.

Common law

Examples of claims:

Breach of contract
Negligence Fraud

Equity

Breach of trust
Tracing property
Claiming property on insolvency

Examples of remedies and responses available:

Damages
Common law tracing

Compensation
Equitable tracing

101 As considered in section 11.5.

Money had and received	Specific performance
	Injunction
	Rescission
	Rectification
	Imposition of constructive trust
	Imposition of resulting trust
	Subrogation
	Account
	Lien
	Charge (fixed and floating)
	Specific restitution

The impression we might take from this list is that equity is much more creative than the common law. The principal common law remedy is the award of damages, whereas equity has created many more remedies and doctrines.

1.2.4 The Judicature Act 1873

It is worth observing that before 1813 there was only one full judge for chancery matters: that was the Lord Chancellor. Consequently, it could take an enormously long time for a case to be heard before that one judge. The Lord Chancellor was assisted by the Master of the Rolls, who in time acquired judicial status.¹⁰² It was only early in the 19th century that the weight of cases waiting to be heard by these two people led to the appointment of a Vice-Chancellor for the first time, and later to the appointment of two Vice-Chancellors. Through this passage of time, however, the popular conception of equity – and one which accords with the reality – was that the chancery courts were expensive and caused extraordinary delays. Charles Dickens's novel Bleak House was in part a polemic against the antiquated workings of the chancery courts, with its opening metaphor which presented those courts as being clouded in a dense fog, and an exploration of the hardship which endless chancery procedures caused to those people whose homes and wealth were dependent upon judicial decisions. It should also be recalled, as outlined above, that Lord Macclesfield was convicted of embezzlement while acting as Lord Chancellor and Lord Bacon was also found to have accepted 'presents' (which today we would consider to be bribes) in office.¹⁰³ So, the reputation of the chancery courts was far from spotless.

By 1873 pressure had built to change the court structure.¹⁰⁴ Two particular objectives were pursued: one to fuse equity and common law, and the second to reorganise the courts. Whereas there had previously been many different courts operating separately from one another (including probate courts, the Queen's Bench common law courts, and so on), the High Court was organised into a single court but with a number of divisions specialising in different areas: such as the Chancery Division, the Queen's Bench Division, and so on.

¹⁰² That is, the Master of the Rolls appeared at first to have been merely a clerk, later a judge in chancery matters, and after 1873 a presiding judge within the new Court of Appeal.

¹⁰³ Bribes of this sort were taken from people wishing judicial office for themselves or some salaried post in the gift of the Lord Chancellor. It is more difficult to divine from the sources whether or not presents were also received from litigants. These were, nevertheless, criminal acts even at that time.

¹⁰⁴ A very full account of this history is presented by Meagher, Gummow and Lehane, 2002, 41 et seq.

Briefly put, the fusion of common law and equity took the shape of permitting any court to award common law remedies or equitable remedies without the need to petition one particular court or another.¹⁰⁵ Instead proceedings were simply begun in the High Court. Similarly, the Court of Appeal became a single court (albeit with many judges) as opposed to having a separate Court of Appeal solely for equity matters. The Appellate Jurisdiction Act 1876 retained a right of appeal to the House of Lords. Significantly section 25 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873 provided:

Generally, in all matters not hereinbefore particularly mentioned in which there is any conflict or variance between the rules of equity and the rules of common law with reference to the same matter, the rules of equity shall prevail.

Thus the principles of equity prevail over the principles of common law. The decision in the Earl of Oxford's Case thus received a statutory form. So, in cases like *Walsh v Lonsdale*¹⁰⁶ where there was a clash between a failure to comply with a common law rule as to the proper creation of a lease (which would have held the lease to be unenforceable) and the equitable doctrine of specific performance of contracts, it was held that the equitable principle of specific performance would give effect to the agreement to provide a lease.

The passage of this legislation was not without its own perturbations. This fusion of common law and equity raised concerns from many equity practitioners. Previously, practitioners and judges before the chancery courts had been specialists in equity. Now, or so the argument ran, there would be practitioners and judges dealing with the culturally different principles of equity who had only previously been trained in common law. Such people referred to this process of fusion of common law and equity as being, in truth, a confusion of common law with equity. Whether or not that has turned out to be the case can only be established from a study of the materials in this book. There has not, it is suggested, been any obvious step-change between the rigidification of the principles of equity under Lord Eldon and the decisions reached after the 1873 Act. Equity clearly functions now on the basis of the doctrine of precedent, but that is not due in particular to the 1873 Act. As considered below the intellectual sophistication necessary to reach judgments on the basis of conscience on a case-by-case basis and yet in accordance with general principles has emerged in the late 20th century and at the beginning of the 21st century, as considered at the end of the next section.

1.3 UNDERSTANDING EQUITY

1.3.1 Equity: an ethical construct

At its root, equity is concerned to prevent a defendant from acting unconscionably (literally, contrary to conscience) in circumstances in which the common law would otherwise allow the defendant to do so. To put that point another way, the courts will intervene to stop a fraudster, shyster or wrongdoer from taking advantage of the rights of another person. I rather like the term 'shyster' because it is vague enough to cover a broad range of people, ¹⁰⁵ Judicature Act 1873, s 24.

¹⁰⁶ (1882) 21 Ch D 9.

from those who may be deliberately committing fraud, to those who are not acting entirely honestly without being fraudulent, and even to cover those who are carelessly acting in a way which would do harm to others. In each case, the shyster is acting in a way which we would consider to be unconscionable. So we will use the term ‘shyster’ for present purposes to cover the perpetrators of all of those various activities.

Equity is therefore interfering to protect some underlying right of the victim either because of a contract with the shyster, or because the shyster has control over some property which is rightfully the victim’s, or because we can assume that the actions of the shyster will affect the victim in the future in some way. In any of these cases, equity will attempt to intervene to stop the shyster from acting unconscionably. It will then impose a remedy which both prevents the shyster’s wrongdoing and compensates the victim for any consequential loss.

Aside from the discussion of the manner in which this form of claim and remedy operates, there is a question as to the underlying purpose behind this code of principles. Evidently, there is an ethical programme at work here. Most civil code jurisdictions (such as France, Italy and Germany) have a different division in their jurisprudence which is aimed at reaching the same results. Typically on the model suggested by Roman law, they will divide between cases to do with consensual actions (akin to English contract), cases to do with wrongs (akin to English torts) and cases to do with unjustified enrichment. It is this final category which operates as a rough comparator to equity. To prevent unconscionable behaviour there is a catch-all category which enables a claimant to claim that something which would otherwise appear lawful on its face should nevertheless be declared void on account of some factor like fraud, mistake or misrepresentation. This distinction is the root of the ideological conflict between traditional trusts law and the law of restitution, considered in detail in the essays at the end of this book.¹⁰⁷

1.3.2 Equity acts in personam

The core of the equitable jurisdiction is the principle that it acts in personam. That means that a Court of Equity is concerned to prevent any given individual from acting unconscionably. The Court of Equity is therefore making an order, based on the facts of an individual case, to prevent that particular defendant from continuing to act unconscionably. If that person does not refrain, she will be in contempt of court. The order, though, is addressed to that person in respect of the particular issue complained of. It is best thought of as a form of judicial control of that particular person’s conscience.¹⁰⁸

The study of equity is concerned with the isolation of the principles upon which judges in particular cases seek to exercise their discretion. It is a complex task to find common threads between different cases in which judges are reaching decisions on the basis of the particular facts before them. Therefore, it is always important for the student to read the leading cases and the anomalous cases in the law reports to understand the reasons why judges have reached particular conclusions.

¹⁰⁷ Section 31.3.

¹⁰⁸ The distinction between an in personam and an in rem action in this context is that an action in personam in equity binds only the particular defendant, whereas an action in rem would bind any successors in title or assignees from the defendant (other than the bona fide purchaser for value of any property at issue).

1.3.3 The nature of equity: paradox and cool jazz

The paradox at the heart of equity

Equity is paradoxical: it appears to grant the courts a large discretion to address unconscionability while at the same time it is governed by the doctrine of precedent. (This idea is explored in detail in Chapter 7.) Different doctrines within equity operate differently. For example, express trusts (considered in Part 2) are organised by reference to principles of certainty and the sort of rules which will be familiar from contract law; whereas doctrines like injunctions or equitable estoppel are avowedly open-textured and flexible. Nevertheless, both types of equitable doctrine are predicated on the doctrine of precedent and central principles identified by the higher courts (or occasionally by statute). Some commentators find these different aspects of equity difficult to understand. The truth is that equity is like cool jazz.

Equity is like cool jazz

In Time magazine,¹⁰⁹ a review of The Dave Brubeck Five described their brand of ‘cool’ jazz in the following terms:

It is tremendously complex, but free. It flows along, improvising constantly but yet it is held together by a firm pattern. . . . The essence is the tension between improvisation and order; between freedom and discipline.

It seems to me that this is an ideal description of equity at its finest. Equity exhibits a tension between order and flexibility. To its denigrators, equity is disorganised, chaotic and unprincipled; to its adherents it exhibits clear patterns in compliance with subtle but meaningful principles. The adherents have simply understood the field better than its denigrators – they have understood the subtlety of its method. As Lord Jessel MR explained in Re Hallett's Estate,¹¹⁰ equity is not beyond child-bearing: meaning that it is capable of creating new doctrines and, consequently, that it is capable of meeting new challenges in new ways. This is evident in the growth of doctrines such as constructive trusts and proprietary estoppel in recent years, and the invention of completely new doctrines such as the super-injunction. Each appears to operate entirely freely but in truth each is bound by clear principles which operate sensibly in practice.

The outcome, it is suggested, is like improvised jazz: a combination of ideas and techniques into a comprehensive whole, exhibiting both an order which is bound together by a particular kind of intellectual rigour and yet a freedom which is appropriate to the moment. Improvised jazz is not a completely random collection of notes played on a whim. Instead, jazz musicians respond to a firm pattern and to established musical understandings so as to create new expressions of their art in any given situation. Equity is similar. It is not simply a collection of random judicial pronouncements, but rather it is a body of jurisprudence which is organised around a nuanced and subtle application of a central principle of ‘conscience’.

¹⁰⁹ ‘The Man on Cloud No.7’, Time, 8 November 1954.

¹¹⁰ (1880) 13 Ch D 696.

In consequence, it is tremendously complex because it is built on centuries of case law; but it is free in that the courts are able to generate new doctrines and to adapt or apply old ones when the circumstances or social norms require. In that sense it improvises constantly, but its use of case law precedent and the careful application of principle to individual circumstances ensures that it is held together by a firm pattern. Throughout a study of this subject, you will sense a tension between different judges, between different commentators and between different cases such that there will be innovation and improvisation in some circumstances, and rigid adherence to precedent in others. Understanding rules which are strictly adhered to (such as certainty of subject matter and certainty of objects in Chapter 3) and rules which permit fluidity (such as equitable estoppel, for the most part, in Chapter 13) is part of coming to understand the subject.

When one listens to good jazz, there is a large amount of freedom. Often some musicians hold a tight rhythm while other musicians are free to experiment and to follow their technically proficient impulses. In so doing, they are following established understandings of how the music works or using pre-existing musical phrases. So, by way of example, in Miles Davis's album Sketches of Spain,¹¹¹ Davis and his fellow musicians took their inspiration from well-known Spanish folk music and blended it into their jazz compositions. The recorded work was built on their own patterns and on the patterns of specific pieces of Spanish folk music, but so that Davis and others could improvise in ways which were in keeping with that general context. Miles Davis did not simply play random notes. Rather, years of practice and many long hours of those musicians playing together meant that they developed a musical language in which their improvisation could operate both coherently and fluently. That album was the third in a sequence which those musicians had produced for Columbia Records. There was improvisation but it was built on a musical language which they had developed; just as equity may appear to improvise but it is built on a legal language which has been developed by means of centuries of jurisprudence.

The same is true of language itself. In Chapter 7, I suggest that equity is very like the English language. For a non-native speaker, English appears to be a confusing series of idioms with very few formalised grammatical rules or taxonomies in the form of declensions and conjugations, unlike many continental European languages, for example. However, for a native English speaker, when someone breaks the subtle and numerous grammatical rules which actually do exist then that jars against the ear.¹¹² Non-native speakers can sometimes sling English idioms together randomly, and it is only the natural reticence of the English which stops them from interrupting and issuing a correction. The native English speaker assimilates the rules that do exist from birth, and similarly comes to absorb the more nuanced rules of good English from childhood. Equity is much the same. While on its surface it may appear to be less ordered than the common law,¹¹³ in truth it is comprised of many principles and rules which will be closely observed by an equity specialist. In that sense it is quintessentially English, just like the English language.

111 Miles Davis, Sketches of Spain, Columbia Records, 1960.

112 Assuming that speaker is not a footballer, or in any way associated with professional football.

113 Although, it is suggested, the supposed orderliness of the common law is much over-hyped (consider the law on mistake in contract law, for example); and complaints about equity being disordered are usually made by those who have not immersed themselves in the culture of the subject sufficiently well.

1.3.4 Roots in trade and in the family

So the question arises: where do the morals underpinning equity come from? They are not morals in an avowedly political, or even an explicitly philosophical sense.¹¹⁴ Rather, judges are generally careful to talk about ‘legal principle’ as though it were some arena of thought divorced from politics, philosophy and all of the other paraphernalia with which human beings seek to impose order on a chaotic world. Equity, and the trust in particular, has been developed primarily in relation to two contexts: trade and the family.

Trade and equity

The history of the city of London stands as a useful mirror to the development of equity. Having been abandoned when Boudicca razed the Roman city to the ground, it was the Saxons’ development of London (or Lyndwyche) as a trading port which saw the city grow in importance again. The Tudors, and in particular Henry VIII, were instrumental in promoting trade between England’s capital city and other trading ports. London continues to flourish as a financial and commercial centre today due in no small part to the experience in such matters of the legal system and its personnel.

Consequently, the common law developed to regulate commercial transactions and so forth. At the same time, equity was required to develop to provide a means of resolving disputes which arose out of that commercial activity but which the common law was not able to manage. Therefore, many of the core principles of equity (considered immediately below) concerned the avoidance of transactions procured by means of fraud and so forth. The minimisation of fraud has remained a key principle of equity. It has also ensured that equity is less well-developed in areas which do not involve fraud or something akin to it. Much of the more difficult case law in the 1990s considered in detail in this book is founded on situations involving mistakes and misrepresentations which were not properly capable of being described as fraudulent. Equity has had more difficulty in applying its principles to morally ambiguous cases than to straightforward circumstances involving good old-fashioned lying and deceit. Indeed, when considering modern banking transactions it is very difficult to know whether or not a banker who knowingly makes a large profit from the inexperience or dim-wittedness of her counterparty ought to be considered to have acted unconscionably. It is far easier to find that she has acted in bad conscience if she can be proved to have lied rather than simply to have engaged in lawful but sharp business practice. However, this is probably just a result of the world having become more complex than any defect in equity.

The family and equity

The other context in which these rules have developed is that of the family. Much of the history of English law has seen one rule for the rich and another for the poor. Quite literally, there were once different courts for rich people and for poor people, so that the working class would not come to know of the imperfections in the characters of their supposed social betters. Many would say that the limited availability of legal aid and the high cost of court proceedings means that, even in the 21st century, there is effectively one law for the rich and another for the rest.¹¹⁵

114 Even though the roots of equity have been traced to major philosophical systems in section 1.1 above.

115 See Hudson, 1999:2, for a discussion of the modern context of these issues.

It was these well-to-do families, the principal focus of Jane Austen novels like Pride and Prejudice, who sought to use trusts and equity to organise succession to their family fortunes. Typically, wealthy families would arrange marriages between their offspring and then create family trusts to administer the property and dowries of each party to the marriage. The rules of the law of trusts therefore developed as a part of equity to administer these situations.

The House of Lords has raised the question in recent cases as to whether the existing principles of equity and trusts are suitable to cope with the broad variety of life in the modern world. As Lord Browne-Wilkinson expressed his view in Target Holdings v Redferns:¹¹⁶

In the modern world the trust has become a valuable device in commercial and financial dealings. The fundamental principles of equity apply as much to such trusts as they do to the traditional trusts in relation to which those principles were originally formulated. But in my judgment it is important, if the trust is not to be rendered commercially useless, to distinguish between the basic principles of trust law and those specialist rules developed in relation to traditional trusts which are applicable only to such trusts and the rationale of which has no application to trusts of quite a different kind.

Similarly, Lord Woolf advocated ‘a new test’ in his speech in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC,¹¹⁷ with the aim of recognising the very particular commercial intentions of the parties to cross-border financial transactions in comparison with the concerns of the litigants in early cases involving trusts law which were typically concerned with family property. The question does have to be asked how well a single stream of equitable principles copes with all of the many kinds of issues which are brought before the courts, ranging from domestic disputes as to ownership of the family home to the resolution of very complex, international banking disputes. Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Target Holdings v Redferns suggested that rules concerning breach of trust, which were developed in relation to family trusts, may be inadequate to deal with commercial situations. This is not a line of thought which has arisen in many subsequent cases but it is nevertheless an important issue for the operation of equity.

Teleological morals – whose conscience?

So where does this moral code of equity come from? The answer is that it has been developed in England in accordance with the doctrine of precedent primarily as a judicial support for open markets and to enforce the wishes of the owners of property who wish to create trusts over them by policing the behaviour of trustees. That bald statement will require justification throughout this book. As outlined at the beginning of this chapter, Lord Browne-Wilkinson in *Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC*¹¹⁸ underlined the focus of the trust on the conscience of the particular defendant in each case, or, more accurately, on the conscionability of that person’s actions. It is important to note that in other cases, such as City of London BS v Flegg,¹¹⁹ there are situations in which overarching policy concerns, such as the need to protect a viable market in property which favours the interests

116 [1996] 1 AC 421, 475.

117 [1996] AC 669.

118 Ibid.

119 [1988] AC 54.

of mortgagees, should take priority over the equitable property interests of those who live in such property. Therefore, the moral premises of equity and of property law are typically focused on their end-point: that is, on the practical results of any decision. The application of the applicable remedies therefore see the courts applying backwards from those results, in many cases such that the courts seem to be identifying the conclusion which they want to reach and thinking backwards (or, teleologically) from that point.¹²⁰ In considering the rules that populate this book, it is important to bear in mind the ideology on which these ideas are founded.

1.4 THE CORE EQUITABLE PRINCIPLES

Equity is based on a series of fundamental principles, which are reproduced here. As drafted they may appear to be a collection of vague ethical statements, some more lyrical than others. The twelve propositions set out below are culled, as a list, primarily from Snell's Equity.¹²¹ At first blush, it is obvious that they are too vague to be meaningful in the abstract. They do not assert any particular view of the world other than that people should behave reasonably towards one another – hardly an alarming proposition in itself. They are rather like the Ten Commandments both in that they are capable of many interpretations and in that they constitute moral prescriptions for the values according to which people should behave. But they are not to be dismissed as merely lyrical pronouncements, because they are still applied by the courts. More to the point, it is entirely appropriate that our law should have a bedrock of morality in the form of these high-level principles.

Those principles are as follows:

- (a) Equity will not suffer a wrong to be without a remedy.
- (b) Equity follows the law.
- (c) Where there is equal equity, the law shall prevail.
- (d) Where the equities are equal, the first in time shall prevail.
- (e) Delay defeats equities.
- (f) He who seeks equity must do equity.
- (g) He who comes to equity must come with clean hands.
- (h) Equality is equity.
- (i) Equity looks to the intent rather than to the form.
- (j) Equity looks on as done that which ought to have been done.
- (k) Equity imputes an intention to fulfil an obligation.
- (l) Equity acts in personam.

I would also add to that list five further principles which cut to the heart of equity:

- (m) Equity will not permit statute or common law to be used as an engine of fraud.¹²²
- (n) Equity will not permit a person who is trustee of property to take a benefit from that property qua trustee.¹²³

120 Eg, Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324, [1993] 3 WLR 1143.

121 Baker and Langan, 1990, 27; McGhee, 2000, 27.

122 Eg, see the discussion in Rochefoucauld v Boustead below at para 1.4.18.

123 Eg, see the discussion of Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC in Chapter 12.

- (o) Equity will not assist a volunteer.¹²⁴
- (p) Equity abhors a vacuum.¹²⁵
- (q) A trust operates on the conscience of the legal owner of property.

It is worth considering each of these principles, briefly, in turn. The text which follows will highlight these principles in greater detail.

1.4.1 Equity will not suffer a wrong to be without a remedy

The following principle is at the very heart of equity: where the common law or statute do not provide for the remedying of a wrong, it is equity which intercedes to ensure that a fair result is reached.¹²⁶ In that sense, equity will not allow a wrong to be committed without there being some sort of remedy to address it. Hence, the scope for the courts to apply flexible doctrines like injunctions in any circumstance in which it is necessary to do justice between the parties.¹²⁷ Equity will intervene in circumstances in which there is no apparent remedy but where the court is of the view that justice demands that there be some remedy made available to the complainant.¹²⁸ Under a trust, as we shall see below, a beneficiary has no right at common law to have the terms of the trust enforced, but the court will nevertheless require the trustee to carry out those terms to prevent her committing what would be in effect a wrong against that beneficiary.

1.4.2 Equity follows the law – but not slavishly or always¹²⁹

With the introduction of the system of petitioning the Lord Chancellor and the steady development of procedures by which applications could be made formally to the Court of Chancery, there was conflict between the courts of common law and the courts of Equity. That each set of courts applied its own rules in studied ignorance of the rules of the other is indicative of this conflict. Consequently it would have been possible for a court of common law and a Court of Equity to have come to completely different decisions on the merits of the very same case. Therefore, the question arose as to the priority which should be given to each subject in different circumstances.

It is significant that ever since the personal intervention of James I in the Earl of Oxford's Case,¹³⁰ the principles of equity have overruled common law rules. At this time Sir Edmund Coke had argued that common law must take priority over equity.¹³¹ That is possibly a useful ¹²⁴ Eg, see the discussion in Chapter 5.

¹²⁵ Which is quite possibly why the Chancery courts are so dirty! Eg, see the discussion of Vandervell v IRC in Chapter 5.

¹²⁶ Eg, Sanders v Sanders (1881) 19 Ch D 373, 381.

¹²⁷ Mercedes Benz AG v Leiduck [1996] AC 284, at 308, per Lord Nicholls.

¹²⁸ Seddon v Commercial Salt Co Ltd [1925] Ch 187.

¹²⁹ Graf v Hope Building Corp 254 NY 1, 9 (1930), per Cardozo CJ.

¹³⁰ (1615) 1 Ch Rep 1; (1615) 21 ER 485.

¹³¹ See Heath v Rydley (1614) Cro Jac 335, (1614) 79 ER 286; Bromage v Genning (1617) 1 Rolle 368, (1617) 81 ER 540.

isolation of language: the common law has ‘rules’ which are applied in *rigor juris*¹³² more mechanically than the ‘principles’ of equity, which are necessarily principles governing the standard and quality of behaviour in a more subtle and context-specific way than abstract legal rules. It is, after all, the very purpose of equity that it enables fairness and principle to outweigh rigid rules in appropriate circumstances.

However, equity will be bound to follow statutes in all circumstances. Given the history of equity as a counterpoint to the common law, it will not typically refuse to be bound by rules of common law unless there is some unconscionability in applying a particular common law rule. For example, general common law rules, such as the rule that only parties to a contract will be bound by that contract, will be observed by equity. This principle that statute will be obeyed does not give the common law supremacy over equity in general terms – rather equity will have priority over non-statutory common law rules, as discussed below.

1.4.3 Where there is equal equity, the law shall prevail

In a situation in which there is no clear distinction to be drawn between parties as to which of them has the better claim in equity, the common law principle which best fits the case is applied. In that sense, where the equitable doctrines produce an equal result, then the common law prevails. So, in circumstances where two people have both purported to purchase goods from a fraudulent vendor of those goods for the same price, neither of them would have a better claim to the goods in equity. Therefore, the ordinary common law rules of commercial law would be applied in that context.

1.4.4 Where the equities are equal, the first in time shall prevail

Time is important to equity, reflecting, perhaps, its commercial element. Where two claimants have equally strong cases, equity will favour the person who acquired their rights first. In that sense, the first in time prevails. Thus, if two equitable mortgagees each seek to enforce their security rights under the mortgage ahead of the other mortgagee, the court will give priority to the person who had created their mortgage first.

1.4.5 Delay defeats equities

Another example of the importance of time in equity is the principle relating to delay. It is said that ‘delay defeats equity’ in the sense that too much delay will prevent access to an equitable remedy. The underpinning of the principle is that if a claimant allows too much time to elapse between the facts giving rise to her claim and the service of proceedings to protect that claim, the court will not protect her rights.¹³³ This doctrine of not allowing an equitable remedy where there has been unconscionable delay is known as ‘laches’.¹³⁴ Some 132 An excellent expression for which I am grateful to Meagher, Heydon and Leeming, 2002, 6, where those authors also record the view of common lawyers that they had decided that they ‘must not allow conscience to prevent your doing law’, thus illustrating the divide between the common law mentality and the equitable mentality culled in large part from the ecclesiastics who served as Lords Chancellor.

133 Smith v Clay (1767) 3 Bro CC 639; Fenwicke v Clarke (1862) 4 De GF & J 240.

134 Partridge v Partridge [1894] 1 Ch 351, 359; Habib Bank Ltd v Habib Bank AG (Zurich) [1981] 1 WLR 1265.

modern cases have suggested that this doctrine should work on the basis of deciding where the balance of good conscience lies in the light of the delay.¹³⁵ Clearly, in any case it will depend on the circumstances how much time has to elapse before the court will decide that there has been too much of a delay.

1.4.6 He who seeks equity must do equity

Another theme in the general principles of equity is that a claimant will not receive the court's support unless she has acted entirely fairly herself. Therefore, in relation to injunctions, for example, the court will award an injunction to an applicant during litigation only where that would be fair to the respondent and where the applicant herself undertakes to carry out her own obligations under any court judgment. A Court of Equity will not act in favour of someone who has, for example, committed an illegal act.¹³⁶

1.4.7 He who comes to equity must come with clean hands

Equity requires that a claimant comes to equity 'with clean hands' in the sense that that person must not have acted improperly or unconscionably if she is seeking an equitable remedy. As a development of the preceding principle of fairness, an applicant for an equitable remedy will not receive that remedy where she has not acted equitably herself.¹³⁷ So, for example, an applicant will not be entitled to an order for specific performance of a lease if that applicant is already in breach of a material term of that lease.¹³⁸ The principle means that you cannot act hypocritically to ask for equitable relief when you are not acting equitably yourself. It is important to look only to the 'clean hands' of the applicant; the court will not necessarily try to ascertain which of the parties has the cleaner hands before deciding whether or not to award equitable relief.

1.4.8 Equality is equity

Typically, in relation to claims to specific property, where two people have equal claims to that property, equity will order an equal division of title in that property between the claimants in furtherance of an ancient principle that 'equity did delight in equality'.¹³⁹ In that sense, the touchstone of equity is equality between the parties. In common with the discussion of Aristotle's view of justice and equity, Vaisey J has considered the doctrine of 135 Nelson v Rye [1996] 1 WLR 1378; Frawley v Neill (1999) The Times, 5 April.

136 Nessom v Clarkson (1845) 4 Hare 97; Oxford v Provand (1868) 5 Moo PC (NS) 150; Lodge v National Union Investment Co Ltd [1907] 1 Ch 300. Cf Tinsley v Milligan [1994] 1 AC 340; Rowan v Dann (1992) 64 P & CR 202.

137 Jones v Lenthal (1669) 1 Ch Cas 154; Evroy v Nicholas (1733) 2 Eq Ca Abr 488; Quadrant Visual Communications v Hutchison Telephone [1993] BCLC 442: that maxim cannot be excluded by agreement of the parties. Halliwell has misread this footnote to suggest that Jones v Lenthal is being used here as authority for the maxim that he who comes to equity must come with clean hands, whereas it is intended only to refer to authority for the proposition that equitable remedies may be denied to those who have acted inequitably, as is suggested in the text as written: Halliwell, (2004) Conv 439, 442. The identification of that case as a founding influence over this doctrine emerges, eg from Snell, 2005, 98.

138 Coatsworth v Johnson (1886) 54 LT 520; Guinness v Saunders [1990] 2 WLR 324.

139 Petit v Smith (1695) 1 P Wms 7, 9, per Lord Somers LC; see also Re Bradberry [1943] Ch 35, 40.

‘equality is equity’ in the following way: ‘I think that the principle which applies here is Plato’s definition of equality as a “sort of justice”: if you cannot find any other, equality is the proper basis.’¹⁴⁰

One early example of this principle in action was in the case of Kemp v Kemp,¹⁴¹ in which the court could not divine from the terms of the trust which beneficiary was intended to take which interest and therefore resolved to divide the property equally between them. This principle has been extended in the case of trusts relating to homes by the Court of Appeal to mean that on the breakdown of long-standing marriages, where the parties have dealt with their affairs as though they are sharing all of the benefits and burdens, the parties will receive equal title in the family home.¹⁴² However, it should be noted that the courts will typically seek to give effect to a trust settlor’s intentions rather than simply divide property equally if at all possible, because in many situations equal division may be the last thing which the owner of property intended.¹⁴³

1.4.9 Equity looks to the intent rather than to the form

It is a common principle of English law that the courts will seek to look through any artifice and give effect to the substance of any transaction rather than merely to its surface appearance.¹⁴⁴ In this sense, equity will consider the parties’ intentions and not simply the form which any documents may have taken. Equity will not ignore formalities altogether – for example, in relation to the law of express trusts, equity is particularly astute to observe formalities¹⁴⁵ – but it will not observe unnecessary formalities.¹⁴⁶ As we shall see in Chapter 4, even where the parties do not use the expression ‘trust’ the courts will give effect to something which is in substance a trust as a trust,¹⁴⁷ and will strike down supposed trusts which are merely shams.¹⁴⁸

1.4.10 Equity looks on as done that which ought to have been done

One of the key techniques deployed by the courts in recent years has been the principle that equity will consider that something has been done if the court believes that it ought to have been done.¹⁴⁹ In that sense, ‘equity looks upon as done that which ought to have been done’. One of the older examples of this principle is that in Walsh v Lonsdale,¹⁵⁰ where a binding contract to grant a lease was deemed to create an equitable lease, even though the formal requirements to create a valid common law lease had not been observed. The rationale behind equity finding that there was a lease which could be effective was the principle

140 Jones v Maynard [1951] Ch 572, 575.

141 (1795) 5 Ves 849; (1795) 31 ER 891.

142 See Midland Bank v Cooke [1995] 4 All ER 562.

143 See, eg, McPhail v Douulton [1970] 2 WLR 1110; Pettitt v Pettitt [1970] AC 777; Gissing v Gissing [1971] AC 886.

144 Parkin v Thorold (1852) 16 Beav 59; Midland Bank v Wyatt [1995] 1 FLR 697.

145 Milroy v Lord (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

146 Sprange v Lee [1908] 1 Ch 424; Ranieri v Miles [1981] AC 1050.

147 See Paul v Constance [1977] 1 WLR 527.

148 Midland Bank v Wyatt [1995] 1 FLR 697.

149 Although the principle dates back at least to Banks v Sutton (1732) 2 P Wms 700, 715.

150 (1882) 21 Ch D 9.

that the landlord was bound by specific performance to carry out his obligations under the contract and to grant a formally valid lease to the tenant. Therefore, it was held that the landlord ought to have granted such a lease. In the eyes of equity, then, the grant of the lease was something which ought to have been done and which could therefore be deemed (in equity) to have been done, with the result that a lease was created by equity.¹⁵¹

1.4.11 Equity imputes an intention to fulfil an obligation

This doctrine assumes an intention in a person bound by an obligation to carry out that obligation, such that acts not strictly required by the obligation may be deemed to be in performance of the obligation.¹⁵² For example, if a deceased woman had owed a money debt to a man before her death, and left money to that man in her will, equity would presume that the money left in the will was left in satisfaction of the debt owed to that man. This presumption could be rebutted by some cogent evidence to the contrary, for example, that the money legacy had been promised long before the debt arose.

1.4.12 Equity acts in personam

As was considered above, it is a key feature of equity that it acts in personam.¹⁵³ This is an idea which will be explored in greater detail in Chapter 12 on constructive trusts.¹⁵⁴ This jurisdiction will operate on the individual defendant whether that individual is within or outwith the English jurisdiction. As Lord Selbourne stated the matter:

The courts of Equity in England are, and always have been, courts of conscience, operating in personam and not in rem; and in the exercise of this personal jurisdiction they have always been accustomed to compel the performance of contracts and trusts as to subjects which were not . . . within their jurisdiction.¹⁵⁵

The focus of a Court of Equity in making a judgment is to act on the conscience of the particular defendant involved in the particular case before it. Therefore, equity is acting against that particular person and not seeking, in theory, to set down general rules as to the manner in which the common law should deal with similar cases in the future. Of course, over the centuries, the courts have come to adopt specific practices and rules of precedent as to the manner in which equitable principles will be imposed, just as common law rules have developed by means of the application of the doctrine of precedent. This topic will, in effect, occupy us for much of the remainder of this book.

151 Re Anstis (1886) 31 Ch D 596; Foster v Reeves [1892] 2 QB 255; Re Plumtre's Marriage Settlement [1910] 1 Ch 609.

152 Sowden v Sowden (1785) 1 Bro CC 582.

153 See para 1.3.2 above.

154 In relation to personal liability to account for breach of trust (Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378) as well as in relation to the general jurisdiction of equity to police a person's conscience (Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669).

155 Ewing v Orr Ewing (No 1) (1883) 9 App Cas 34, 40. Cf Duke of Brunswick v King of Hanover (1848) 2 HLC 1; United States of America v Dollfus Mieg et Cie SA [1952] AC 318.

1.4.13 Equity will not permit statute or common law to be used as an engine of fraud

Equity will not allow a defendant to use a statutory principle so as to effect a fraud in relation to someone else. Slightly more lyrically, equity will not permit statute to be used as an engine of fraud. While this principle is not strictly part of the list of equitable principles which is reproduced in the classic books such as Snell's Equity,¹⁵⁶ or Modern Equity,¹⁵⁷ it does appear to form the basis for a number of cases in equity (particularly in the 19th century).¹⁵⁸ It is a good explanation of the general operation of equity in relation to common law and statute. Whereas equity will not usually contradict common law or statute (it is said), it will act in personam against the conscience of a defendant to prevent that defendant from taking inequitable advantage of another person.

The best example is probably the secret trust, considered in Chapter 6 below. Secret trusts arise in situations in which a person making a will has sought to create a trust without recording that intention or the terms of the trust in the will (hence the expression 'secret trust').¹⁵⁹ The Wills Act 1837 requires that the will be treated as containing all of the terms by which the deceased's estate is to be distributed. However, where one of the deceased's personal representatives (who was informed of that secret trust by the deceased person) seeks to ignore the terms of the secret trust by relying on the strict application of the Wills Act, equity will prevent that person from perpetrating what is effectively a fraud on the intended beneficiary of the property under the secret trust.¹⁶⁰

1.4.14 Equity will not permit a person who is trustee of property to take benefit from that property as though a beneficiary

As considered in detail below, a trust is created by transferring the common law title in property to a trustee to hold that property on trust for identified beneficiaries.¹⁶¹ A further fundamental principle of equity is that even though the trustee is recognised as being the 'owner' of the trust property by common law, the trustee is not to be permitted to take all of the rights in the property in her capacity as trustee. Rather, a trustee is required to hold the trust property on trust for the beneficiaries under the terms of the trust. This technique of both enabling and forcing one person to hold property for another person is a unique feature of English law (and of systems derived from English law).

1.4.15 Equity will not assist a volunteer

The principle that equity will not assist a volunteer occurs frequently in this book. In line with the commercial roots of many of these doctrines, equity will not assist a person who has given no consideration for the benefits which she is claiming. Therefore, someone who is the intended recipient of a gift, for example, will not have a failed gift completed by equity interpreting the incomplete gift to be a trust or some other equitable structure.¹⁶² As will 156 Most recent edition by McGhee, 2000; 1st edn by Edmund Henry Turner Snell, 1868.

157 Most recent edition by Martin, 1997; 1st edn by Hanbury, 1935.

158 Rochevoucauld v Boustead [1897] 1 Ch 196; Lyus v Prowsa Developments Ltd [1982] 1 WLR 1044.

159 Blackwell v Blackwell [1929] AC 318; Ottaway v Norman [1972] 2 WLR 50.

160 McCormick v Grogan (1869) LR 4 HL 82.

161 Fletcher v Fletcher (1844) 4 Hare 67.

162 Milroy v Lord (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

emerge from the discussion of trusts law in Chapter 2, beneficiaries under trusts are the only category of true volunteers who acquire the protection of equity exceptionally if a trust has been created.

1.4.16 Equity abhors a vacuum

In considering rights to property, equity will not allow there to be some property rights which are not owned by some identifiable person.¹⁶³ Thus, a trustee must hold property on trust for identifiable beneficiaries, or else there is no valid trust. Similarly, it is generally considered at English law that no person can simply abandon their rights in property – rather, that person retains those proprietary rights until they are transferred to another person. To do otherwise would be to create a vacuum in the ownership of property. The doctrine of resulting trusts can be understood as operating on this basis by ordering that property rights without an owner are deemed to ‘result back’ to the person who was their last owner.¹⁶⁴

1.4.17 A trust operates on the conscience of the legal owner of property

The most significant of the equitable doctrines is the trust, under which a beneficiary is able to assert equitable rights to particular property and thus control the way in which the common law owner of that property is entitled to deal with it. The trust is considered in the next chapter. As will emerge, the key tenets of the trust are that the legal owner of property will be obliged to hold it on trust for any persons beneficially entitled to it where good conscience so requires: this can be due to an express declaration of trust, or to the imposition of a trust implied by law by the courts.¹⁶⁵ This principle is in line with the earliest reported cases on equity which were concerned to ‘correct men’s consciences’, as will emerge in the next chapter.¹⁶⁶

1.4.18 Equity and fraud

It would not be an exaggeration to suggest that many of the principles of equity are aimed at the avoidance of fraud, or the avoidance of the results of fraud. Many of the doctrines considered in this book will be orientated around the avoidance of fraud, whether by trustees, or in the doctrine in *Rochevoucauld v Boustead*¹⁶⁷ (considered in detail in Chapter 5), or in the operation of secret trusts (considered in Chapter 6). Lord Browne-Wilkinson in *Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC*¹⁶⁸ set out his view that the operation of the trust centres on the prevention of any unconscionable (as opposed to strictly ‘fraudulent’) act or omission. The notion of fraud here is different from that under, for example, the tort of deceit.¹⁶⁹ This indicates the increasing breadth of equitable doctrine beyond the category simply of straightforward fraud. Fraud remains difficult to prove, attracting a high standard

163 Vandervell v IRC [1967] 2 AC 291, HL.

164 Ibid.

165 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

166 Earl of Oxford’s Case (1615) 1 Ch Rep 1, per Lord Ellesmere.

167 [1897] 1 Ch 196.

168 [1996] AC 669.

169 Derry v Peek (1889) 14 App Cas 337.

of proof, and many actions which we may consider worthy of censure will not necessarily be fraudulent. So equity developed the canons of so-called ‘constructive fraud’ to cover situations in which there was not normal fraud but there were acts tantamount to fraud – an example of which is the exertion of undue influence on a person to procure their agreement to a contract.¹⁷⁰

Nevertheless, the doctrine in *Rochefoucauld v Boustead*¹⁷¹ is instructive in this regard. The doctrine is simply stated: statute and common law shall not be used as an engine for fraud. For example, if a rule of the common law were to state that no transfers of lollipops were to take place after 1 January 2001, but I knew full well that I had entered into a binding contract with X under which X paid me £1,000 on 31 December 2000 so that I would transfer my lollipop to him, it would be a fraud on X for me to seek to rely on the statute to allow me to keep my lollipop and X’s £1,000. Under another principle of equity, the equitable interest in that lollipop would transfer automatically to X at the moment at which our contract was formed.¹⁷² In these ways equity precludes me from relying on the fruits of my dastardly behaviour even though the common law or statute may permit me to do so. Equity operates to achieve a higher form of justice than that sought by the common law in individual cases. What is important is to understand the philosophy which underpins the activation of equity in such circumstances. That discussion is introduced in the following section.

1.5 PLACING EQUITY IN CONTEXT

1.5.1 The development of equity over time under the steering of different judges

There are two general approaches to equity as a subject, as will emerge during the course of this book. The first view, typically held by those who have been schooled in the practice of chancery courts, is that equity possesses a laudable flexibility predicated on an understanding of equity’s subtle principles: people who subscribe to this view consider that equitable discretion is a positive thing. The second view, typically held by those who have been schooled in the common law tradition rather than equity, is that equity’s flexibility can lead to irrational and random decision-making and that equity would be better if it was reorganised so as to make it more akin to common law with its more rigid and more predictable rules. It is suggested that neither of these views has any complete claim to truth and that both of these views suggest mere caricatures of equity and of common law whereas in truth, both doctrines have elements of rigidity and elements of flexibility. As will emerge through this book, there are many principles of trusts law which resemble rigid common law doctrines – for example the requirements of certainty in the creation of an express trust – and there are others which appear to be based on broad judicial discretion but which are in truth predicated on a detailed understanding of the underlying principles – for example in areas such as equitable estoppel and common intention constructive trusts. A very clear history of equity is presented by Professor Baker¹⁷³ and an excellent, if older, history presented by Professor 170 Barclays Bank v O’Brien [1993] 4 All ER 417, considered in Chapter 20.

171 [1897] 1 Ch 196.

172 Walsh v Lonsdale (1882) 21 Ch D 9. See now Neville v Wilson [1997] Ch 144, which explains this principle on the basis of constructive trust.

173 Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History, 4th edn, Butterworths LexisNexis, 2002.

Story.¹⁷⁴ What follows here is a potted account of some of that history which will give us a flavour of the background to the discussion to follow in this book.

Through equity's history, then, there have been judges who have been enthusiasts for a broadly discretionary equity and judges who have scorned it. The most obvious example of this division of opinion arose in the *Earl of Oxford's Case*¹⁷⁵ which is the first case in the official reports of chancery cases. In that case there was a debate between Coke, the great common lawyer and chief justice of the King's Bench, and Lord Ellesmere, the then Lord Chancellor, as to whether it was the common law courts or the courts of equity which should take priority if both wanted to deliver judgments which contradicted one another. Coke had, for example, taken to releasing prisoners who had been committed by the Lord Chancellor for contempt of injunctions by using the old doctrine of habeus corpus. It was decided by King James I that it was the courts of equity which should take priority, and so Lord Ellesmere delivered his seminal judgment in that case (as quoted in para 1.1) to the effect that the purpose of equity is 'to correct men's consciences'. It is important to note that it required the King's intervention to decide which of the two legal jurisdictions was to take priority.

It was, of course, an odd situation which had permitted two streams of courts to exist in parallel, and therefore in conflict, in the first place. A part of the conflict between the King and the common law courts for some centuries had been whether or not the monarch was entitled to introduce new jurisdictions, such as the ever-expanding jurisdiction of equity and of the court of Star Chamber, or even to intervene in judicial decisions directly. Therefore, the primacy of equity over common law was not simply a technical legal question, it was also a matter of political controversy. It would be the equivalent now of the Queen seeking to reverse a decision of the Court of Appeal or seeking to direct the Court of Appeal which decision to reach: it would be unthinkable in a democratic society and would precipitate a constitutional crisis. Back in the early seventeenth century, at a time when the Catholic King James I¹⁷⁶ had succeeded the Protestant Elizabeth I to the throne – all part of an age-old and bloody conflict between Protestant and Catholic, and only a generation before the religious and political conflict that precipitated the English Civil War – it was a matter of tremendous significance that the common law judges were considered to be subordinate to the decisions of the monarch's principal minister, the Lord Chancellor.

After these overtly political events, the history of equity thereafter could be explained as being a history of the differing attitudes of different judges, some of whom were equity enthusiasts and some of whom were equity sceptics.

Sir Heneage Finch, better known as Lord Chancellor Lord Nottingham, is generally credited with bringing a large amount of orderliness to equity in the 17th century.¹⁷⁷ For example, it was Lord Nottingham who developed the principles of perpetuities which prevented devices like trusts from existing in perpetuity: importantly Lord Nottingham's developments simplified the law on perpetuities which previously had been caught between various different types of 'contingency'. The two volumes of Lord Nottingham's Chancery cases, 174 Story, Equity Jurisprudence, originally published in 1835; references are to the 13th edn in four volumes by Bigelow (ed) in 1886, taken from a reprint by Beard Books, 2006.

175 (1615) 1 Ch Rep 1.

176 While James I, later in his reign as King of England, persecuted Catholics, he was born to a Catholic mother, Mary, and was christened and raised as such.

177 Eg, Cook v Fountain (1676) 3 Swan 585.

published by the Selden Society, are a record of one man's determination to regularise the disparate principles of earlier courts. This work was continued by Lord Hardwicke and Lord Eldon, as subsequent Lords Chancellor. Lord Eldon, for example, pronounced that:

The doctrines of this court ought to be as well settled, and made as uniform almost as those of the common law, laying down fixed principles, but taking care that they are to be applied according to the circumstances of each case. I cannot agree that the doctrines of this court are to be changed with every succeeding judge. Nothing would inflict on me greater pain, in quitting this place, than the recollection that I had done anything to justify the reproach that the equity of this court varies like the Chancellor's foot.¹⁷⁸

This line of thought can be seen right the way into the 20th century where it was regularly suggested that the courts would only activate equitable doctrines if they could be shown to be predicated on clear authority and not simply because they appeared to be 'just' or 'right' or 'conscionable'.¹⁷⁹ As is considered below, there is a suggestion that at the end of the 20th century and in the 21st century equity's heritage as a reservoir of good conscience is nevertheless being reclaimed. However, for present purposes we shall concentrate on equity in the post-Elizabethan period, that is from the 17th century onwards.

At this time there was no systematic reporting of court decisions like there is now.¹⁸⁰ Different court reporters could produce very different accounts of what a judge had said in the course of his judgment. There were very few books on law – and there were certainly many, many fewer books than are available now, and the books which were available were not as painstakingly referenced and researched as modern books. It is thought that the first book concentrating solely on equity was Francis's Maxims of Equity published in 1727. Consequently, it was difficult for legal principles to develop systematically. Principles therefore developed by reference to vague maxims and half-remembered remarks of earlier judges – indeed it might be a criticism of some legal historians that they attribute too much intellectual prowess to some ancient judges whose decisions often contained little internal consistency and even less relation to early cases. Therefore, the work of someone like Lord Nottingham in seeking to regularise legal principle was very significant. Today, of course, we have electronic databases giving access to every decision that is reached by the High Court, no matter how trivial in the grander scheme of things, and there are many textbooks which have organised and categorised the law into readily comprehensible categories. How things have changed.

Nevertheless, equity is constantly in flux, and constantly being developed. On the question of the level of reverence which we should accord to ancient precedents, Sir George Jessel MR in the Court of Appeal in 1880 said the following:¹⁸¹

It must not be forgotten that the rules of Courts of Equity are not, like the rules of the Common Law, supposed to have been established from time immemorial. It is perfectly 178 Gee v Pritchard (1818) 2 Swans 402, 414.

179 Re Diplock [1948] Ch 465, 481. See Lord Jessel MR in Re National Funds Assurance Co (1878) 10 Ch D 118, 128: 'This court is not, as I have often said, a Court of Conscience, but a Court of Law'; meaning that courts of equity were bound by principles and precedent just like the common law courts.

180 Although in 1617 Lord Chancellor Bacon did appoint an official reporter to sit at his feet so as to record his judgments.

181 Re Hallett's Estate (1880) 13 Ch D 696.

well known that they have been established from time to time – altered, improved and refined from time to time. . . . We can name the Chancellors who first invented them, and state the date when they were first introduced into Equity jurisprudence; and, therefore in cases of this kind, the older precedents in Equity are of very little value. The doctrines are progressive, refined, and improved: and if we want to know what the rules of Equity are, we must look, of course, rather to the more modern than the more ancient cases.

So, here we have a call not to fixate on the heritage theme-park nature of some equity scholarship – instead we must have a gimlet-eyed focus on the modern applications of principle. Nevertheless, tracing some of the fundamental doctrines of equity, such as the notion of conscience, can only be done satisfactorily if one has an eye to history.

As for the ostensibly broad notion of ‘conscience’, back in the 17th century Lord Nottingham preferred to think of it as being a technical question. In *Cook v Fountain*¹⁸² Lord Nottingham held that:

With such a conscience as is only naturalis et interna,¹⁸³ this court has nothing to do; the conscience by which I am to proceed is merely civilis et politica,¹⁸⁴ and tied to certain measures: and it is infinitely better for the public that a trust, security, or agreement, which is wholly secret, should miscarry, than that men should lose their estates by the mere fancy and imagination of a chancellor.¹⁸⁵

So, the idea of conscience was still in play but it was not a ‘conscience’ as that term was ordinarily understood; instead the form of conscience with which Lord Nottingham was concerned was a conscience that is a strictly legal and civil concept as opposed to a religious, moral or philosophical notion. This determined march towards regularisation of equity was very different from the attitudes of judges from earlier centuries who had concerned themselves solely with inquiring into the defendant’s conscience, such that Fortescue CJ had declared in 1452 that ‘[w]e are to argue conscience here, not the law’.¹⁸⁶ So, Lord Nottingham held that a contract would not be rectified where it would be conscionable to do so because it was ‘binding in conscience but not in equity’: meaning that the two ideas, a general moral conscience and the technical rules of equity, were different things.¹⁸⁷

Later judges also took as their goal the corraling of equity into more rigid rules. So, Lord Eldon hoped that he had introduced order and predictability to equity in his work as Lord Chancellor.¹⁸⁸ Indeed, many of the principles which we shall consider in detail in Part 2 of 182 (1676) 3 Swan 585, 600.

183 That is, ‘arising naturally’ and ‘internal’.

184 That is, concerning ‘civil law matters’ and ‘political matters’.

185 This is a reference to Selden’s jibe that the principles of equity in their application seemed to change from Chancellor to Chancellor much as the length of his foot would vary from Chancellor to Chancellor: Table Talk of John Selden, ed Pollock, 1927, 43.

186 Mitch 31 Hen VI, Fitz Abr, Subpena, pl 23, cited by Baker, 2002, 108. It should be noted that this opinion was not without its dissenters, however. Many judges in chancery courts considered themselves to be operating on the basis of precedent and in accordance with legal principle as opposed to functioning on a purely case-by-case basis. See the dicta of Blackstone J quoted by Story, 1886, para 18.

187 Honywood v Bennett (1675) Nottingham Rep (73 Selden Society) 214.

188 Gee v Pritchard (1818) 2 Swan 402, 414.

this book relating to the formation of express trusts are still based on decisions of Lord Eldon and the judges of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, such as Turner LJ, in the early 19th century.

At the end of the 19th century, as was discussed in the preceding section, the Judicature Act 1873 rang enormous changes in the interaction between equity and common law. As Professor Maitland explained matters in his lectures (published posthumously)¹⁸⁹ by this time it could not be thought that equity and the common law were antagonistic to one another because equity was dependent upon the existence of common law – in effect, without common law rules on which to pass comment there would not have been equity. One is tempted to respond ‘up to a point, Lord Copper’.¹⁹⁰ The history of equity and common law had been forged precisely by the determination of equity to establish itself as a competing jurisdiction within England and Wales, as discussed above, and not simply to carry on as the common law’s shadow. In the modern era perhaps we could consider equity in this fashion. Even in the modern era, however, there are substantive doctrines like the trust, proprietary estoppel, injunctions, and so forth which are based solely on equity and which are not in any way parasitic on the common law – rather, they exist in their own right.

The first 60 or 70 years of the 20th century saw one trend (arguably among others) towards great rigidity in decision-making. Judges like Viscount Simonds, many of whose judgments we shall study in great detail in Chapters 3, 4 and 5,¹⁹¹ were primarily concerned to interpret trusts literally and to invalidate trusts which had been imperfectly drafted. Trusts law in particular hardened into a system of rules which were reminiscent of the rigidity of the common law. This tendency is considered in detail in the essay that comprises Chapter 7.

However, the late 20th century also saw a liberalising tendency in the decisions of Lord Denning as he dominated the large flow of cases through the Court of Appeal, in his role as Master of the Rolls with the power to decide which cases he heard himself and which judges sat alongside him on the three person panel. When I studied law in the late 1980s and early 1990s many of the then recent decisions I was called upon to read were reversals of Lord Denning’s liberalising doctrines such as ‘the deserted wife’s equity’, promissory estoppel, and the proprietary effect of contractual licences. Lord Denning was perhaps one of the clearest examples of a ‘pure equity’ judge in that he was concerned to achieve ‘fair’ results no matter what the strict legal rules would seem to have required.

Lord Browne-Wilkinson has been presented already in this chapter as the modern judge who reclaimed and re-expressed the place of conscience at the centre of trusts law – a concept which will sustain much of this book. There were other judges who had referred back to trusts law’s reliance on conscience from time to time but at the time that Lord Browne-Wilkinson gave judgment there had been a number of contradictory academic and judicial currents which had suggested different ideas, such as the Romanic idea of restitution of unjust enrichment. However, when we consider the full range of Lord Browne-Wilkinson’s judgments in the field of equity – such as his decision in the High Court in *Re Barlow*¹⁹² and 189 Maitland, 1936.

190 This expression is used by a newspaper editor in Evelyn Waugh’s satirical novel Scoop in which that editor dare not disagree explicitly with the newspaper’s proprietor, Lord Copper, and so instead of saying ‘no’ to his patron, the newspaper editor says ‘up to a point, Lord Copper’.

191 For example, Grey v IRC [1960] AC 1; Leahy v Att-Gen NSW [1959] AC 457; Oppenheim v Tobacco Securities [1951] AC 297.

192 [1979] 1 WLR 278.

in the House of Lords in *Tinsley v Milligan*¹⁹³ – it emerges that he was no woolly-minded moralist, but that he was a pragmatist and, in Tinsley v Milligan, a careful technical thinker when identifying the source of a claimant's rights as opposed to denying that person a proprietary right because she was coincidentally involved in a criminal act which related at one remove to that property.

By contrast, Lord Goff gave a dissenting speech in Tinsley v Milligan which took the moral high line by suggesting that that claimant could not acquire any equitable rights in property which she had paid for because she had also committed a criminal offence: thus giving effect to an ancient equitable principle that one may not have an equitable remedy if one has acted unconscionably oneself. This view of Lord Goff's was ironic because it was Lord Goff's book, titled The Law of Restitution and published first in 1966 with Gareth Jones, which had begun a movement in English law which ultimately argued for a change in direction away from traditional ideas of equity.¹⁹⁴ Lord Goff can be identified in his judgments with a concern to achieve 'justice' in the broadest possible sense, for example in his dissenting speech in *Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington*¹⁹⁵ and in Tinsley v Milligan or his speech in White v Jones;¹⁹⁶ in fact Lord Goff can be understood as having been by inclination an old-fashioned equity lawyer. By contrast again, it was Lord Millett who began to fly the flag for the modish principle of restitution of unjust enrichment in the House of Lords, picking up on all of the significant academic trends in the areas of this book which relate to trusts implied by law and breach of trust. The effect of this principle would have been to introduce even greater rigidity to those areas of equity which, even in the modern era, are still typified by their flexibility.

Among judges more recently at the time of writing it is a group of judges whose most prominent member is Lord Walker who are turning the clock backwards towards ideas of giving judgment so as to avoid unconscionability. So, for example, the development of proprietary estoppel by Walker LJ in *Jennings v Rice*¹⁹⁷ has signalled a return to courts awarding rights in property or to compensation on the basis that that is conscionable. The tendency to understand courts as having a general discretion to make orders, for example requiring disclosure of information relating to a trust fund, has appeared in Lord Walker's judgment in Schmidt v Rosewood.¹⁹⁸ His Lordship's judgments in *Stack v Dowden*¹⁹⁹ and *Jones v Kernott*²⁰⁰ have tended towards confusion rather than rationalisation. His judgments

193 [1994] 1 AC 340.

194 Unjust enrichment seeks to displace equity with a more rigid and much more limited and unimaginative system of doctrines. It is suggested in Chapter 31 of this book that restitution on grounds of unjust enrichment operates as a possible explanation of some equitable institutions but does not account for the whole range of equitable remedies present in English law. Unjust enrichment is concerned to isolate an enrichment in the hands of the defendant, to decide whether or not it is unjustly received, and then to reverse that enrichment if it is unjust. The House of Lords accepted the existence of a principle of unjust enrichment in Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale [1991] 2 AC 548 and in Woolwich Equitable Building Society v IRC (No 2) [1993] AC 573, but the scope for the operation of that principle has been greatly restricted by the decision of the majority of the House of Lords in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

195 [1996] AC 669.

196 [1995] 1 AC 207.

197 [2003] 1 P&CR 100, [2003] EWCA Civ 159.

198 [2003] 3 All ER 76.

199 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831.

200 [2011] UKSC 53, [2011] 3 WLR 1121, [2011] 3 FCR 495.

in relation to proprietary estoppel in *Cobbe v Yeoman's Row*²⁰¹ and *Thorner v Major*²⁰² were contradictory in many senses in that the former was very restrictive of the doctrine and latter much more traditional. However, what has disappeared almost completely in his Lordship's judgments on trusts law is any reference to 'unconscionability', a concept which was central to cases like Jennings v Rice.

The presence of the former family law academic, Baroness Hale, in the House of Lords is also an intriguing presence for the future. Thus far, her judgments have been somewhat more restrained than her academic writing – which is something of a shame. Her judgment in relation to rights in the home in *Stack v Dowden*²⁰³ caused more confusion rather than the conceptual revolution it hoped to precipitate; with the result that another judgment was required in *Jones v Kernott*²⁰⁴ to conduct some undiscussed overruling of detailed elements of Stack v Dowden and the introduction of a new concept of 'fairness', again without explanation. So much was hoped for from this country's first female judge in the highest court, particularly when she was a well-known former academic too. These cases are discussed in Chapter 15. Her judgment in *Campbell v MGN*²⁰⁵ in relation to super-injunctions was thoughtful and lively – suggesting a new kind of judge on the bench.

1.5.2 Equity in a broader context

The most honest approach is to accept that equity, in its English, legal sense, no longer has any single intellectual core in the form of a code or philosophy. Rather, it is something which must be observed in and assembled from the decisions of the Courts of Chancery down the ages: a stream of thought which has been resistant in the main to abstract philosophising. In this sense it does not have an intellectual pedigree of the sort which can be assembled for human rights thinking or for human rights law. Equity is not divined from philosophical foundations; rather, equity is found in the law reports, albeit derived on the basis of case law precedent and the principles set out earlier in this chapter. While that is true of equity up to now, this book will suggest that that is not sufficient for the future. In the notion of conscience mentioned frequently in Chancery decisions by judges like Lord Browne-Wilkinson, it is possible to detect broad parallels with the ideas of Plato²⁰⁶ and Aristotle.²⁰⁷ Consequently, it is by reference to this idea of conscience that it might be possible to manufacture an underlying philosophy for equity. The notion of conscience is itself one which can be traced into much ethical philosophy, as I attempt to do in Chapter 32, and it is in that soil that intellectual roots sufficient to cope with the challenges of the 21st century might yet be grown.²⁰⁸ As yet the courts have been reluctant to explain what is meant by conscience, or how we might understand it as informing all of the principles of equity. Rather equity is currently comprised of its history rather than any particular ideas.

The outlines of equity's historical roots have been considered in this chapter. In truth, those historical foundations have much to do with an understanding of equity as merely a

201 [2008] 1 WLR 1752.

202 [2009] 1 WLR 776.

203 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831.

204 [2011] UKSC 53, [2011] 3 WLR 1121, [2011] 3 FCR 495.

205 [2004] 2 AC 457.

206 Eg, Jones v Maynard [1951] Ch 572, 575, per Vaisey J.

207 See section 1.1.

208 See section 32.1.

reservation of power to the Crown, at the time when Henry II created a new court system, which subsequently devolved in practice to the Lord Chancellor. At the time of writing, the discussion of equity in all of the books has moved beyond any need to consider the ambit of monarchical power – only essays on constitutional law consider the continuing significance of the Royal Prerogative. And yet there is a need to understand the intellectual core of equity as being grounded in this royal power. In searching for any historical core to this jurisdiction we encounter the disputes about the comparative power of the ecclesiastics and the secular lawyers.²⁰⁹ The creation of the post of Lord Chancellor and the rise of the Tudor Lords Chancellor have everything to do with political expediency and nothing to do with an early Enlightenment drive for a humanist management of claims for effective social justice; although today we would prefer to model our equity on the latter.

There is another paradox in equity. On the one hand we can be confident that equity exists so as to dispense Solomon's justice where the common law or statute would act in some way unfairly. On the other hand we might be nervous of equity as a means of permitting judicial legislation beyond the democratic control of Parliament. We are right to be concerned when such norms are developed by an unaccountable and powerful judiciary, even though we may consider many of their judgments to be perfectly desirable in their own contexts. It is in relation to equity that Ronald Dworkin's idealised judge Hercules would have most difficulty putting his integrity to work in finding the 'right answer'.²¹⁰ Any suggestion that the solution to questions of justice and equity can be decided by reference to some matrix of rule-application is doomed either to failure or to the generation of injustice. But for Hercules, equity does offer the possibility of being sufficiently free to reach the 'right' conclusion, and so to do justice between the parties to any particular case in the broadest possible sense.

As considered above, the roots of equity-type thinking are to be found in Aristotle's and Plato's discussions of justice.²¹¹ What we are left with by Aristotle's determination, that circumstances must decide the appropriate rule and that concrete rules cannot always be set out in advance and then applied without pause for reflection, is that the justice of a decision can be evaluated only after the decision is made. As such, equity becomes a conversation in which the judgment is one communication within a larger discourse as to the shape of justice in society.

For this writer, equity is the place in which our society should discuss the ways in which we will provide procedural justice through the courts, as well as in the political system which generates statutory rights before they come to law. Equity should be concerned to ensure equality of outcome in individual cases so that there is fairness between litigants (applied more broadly through the legal system's web of advice and informal dispute resolution outside courts). Equity has a significant procedural role to play in ensuring that the application of legal rules in individual cases does not allow unfairness. To adopt the words of the great Welsh socialist Aneurin Bevan, equity as a tool of social justice will enable us to ensure that 'the apparently enlightened principle of "the greatest good for the greatest number" cannot excuse indifference to individual suffering'.²¹² Equity forces us to consider the plight of the individual in this complex world and to save that individual from being caught up in the legal machine or exposed to irremediable suffering.

209 Thomas, 1976, 506.

210 Dworkin, 1986.

211 See section 1.1 above.

212 Bevan (1952), 1978.

Understanding the trust

2.1	THE BIRTH OF THE TRUST	45
2.2	THE DEFINITION OF A TRUST	47
2.2.1	The definition of a trust	47
2.2.2	The mechanisms by which the different forms of trust come into existence	48
2.2.3	The different types of trust	48
2.2.4	The structure of the rest of this chapter	51
2.3	EXPRESS TRUSTS – THE MAGIC TRIANGLE	51
2.3.1	How the express trust is structured	51
2.3.2	The settlor	52
2.3.3	The trustee	52
2.3.4	The beneficiary	57
2.3.5	Distinguishing between ‘people’ and ‘legal capacities’	59
2.3.6	The distinction between the trust and civil law concepts of ownership	60
2.3.7	The use of trusts by English families through history	60
2.4	FUNDAMENTALS OF THE LAW OF TRUSTS	61
2.4.1	The core principles of the trust	61
2.4.2	The trust imposes equitable obligations on the conscience of the trustee	62
2.4.3	For the beneficiary trusts create proprietary rights in the trust property and personal rights against the trustees	64
2.5	THE BENEFITS AND USES OF TRUSTS	66
2.5.1	Owning property but not owning property	66
2.5.2	Taxation of trusts	68
2.6	THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN TRUSTS AND OTHER LEGAL CONCEPTS	70
2.6.1	Contract	70
2.6.2	Bailment	71
2.6.3	Agency	72
2.6.4	Gift	72
2.6.5	Powers	73

2.7 SOCIOLOGICAL ISSUES IN EQUITY AND TRUSTS73

- 2.7.1 Introduction 73
- 2.7.2 Women and trusts law 74
- 2.7.3 A politics of trusts law 81

2.1 THE BIRTH OF THE TRUST

The trust is both the most important part of equity¹ and the greatest and most distinctive achievement performed by Englishmen in the field of jurisprudence,² according to the legal historian and equity specialist Professor Maitland. Whether or not that is true, the trust has certainly become a peculiarly English way of thinking. The trust concept, whether created deliberately by ordinary people or used by a court to remedy unconscionable behaviour, is one of the fundamental techniques with which English lawyers analyse the world. Its current form is an accident of English history and as much a part of that history as kings and queens, Magna Carta and the Gunpowder Plot.

The trust performs a very simple trick: it enables more than one person to have rights in the same property simultaneously. The trick is simple but it has complex ramifications. In short, the trust permits a division in the ownership of the trust property between a trustee and a beneficiary so that the trustee is compelled to act entirely in the best interests of the beneficiary in relation to the management of whatever property is held on trust.³

I will tell you the story of how the trust was born as it was first told to me: I think it is the best way of understanding the trust at this stage, although it is worth bearing in mind that it is impossible to prove when the first trust was created because it seems to have developed out of legal practice, but it certainly did not emerge from anything as obvious as a statute or a single judicial decision. The story goes like this. The earliest example of the trust occurred at the time of the early religious wars fought in the 12th century when Christian noblemen from Europe travelled to the Middle East on ‘crusades’.⁴ Typically, the crusader⁵ would be away from England for some years and therefore needed to have his land tended in his absence.⁶ It was essential that the person who was left in charge could exercise all of the powers of the legal owner of that land, such as deciding who would farm which part of the land and collecting taxes. However, the crusader wanted to ensure that he would be able to recover all of his rights of ownership when he returned from the war. Consequently, the idea

1 Maitland, 1936, 23.

2 Ibid, 129.

3 See section 2.5: including the extensive obligations of a fiduciary as described in White v Jones [1995] 1 AC 207 and Bristol & West Building Society v Mothew [1998] Ch 1, such as the duty not to make secret profits (Keech v Sandford (1726) Sel Cas Ch 61; Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46); the duty to act fairly between all of the beneficiaries (Stephenson v Barclays Bank Trust Co Ltd [1975] 1 All ER 625); and the duty to account to the beneficiaries for any loss stemming from a breach of trust (Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421).

4 This is the basis on which Professor Maitland explained the basis of the ‘use’ and latterly its successor concept the ‘trust’: Maitland, Collected Papers, vol ii, 403. See also Pollock and Maitland, 1895, 228; Holdsworth, 1945, 407 et seq. See also the very useful summary in Cheshire and Burn, 2000, 42 et seq.

5 An unfortunate word but nevertheless the word historians still use when describing this particular conflict.

6 Students of English history will know that at this time the crown of England was held in common with other lands by the Dukes of Aquitaine and therefore, even without the crusades, the people who were the ultimate owners of land in England spent most of their time outside the country in any event.

of split ownership of the property emerged, whereby the crusader was treated as the owner of the land by the courts of equity and the person left in charge was treated by the common law courts as being owner of the land.⁷ Therefore, two categories of people had different types of right in the same property at the same time. So, the crusader had property rights which were only recognised by the courts of equity (and so that person had an ‘equitable interest’ in the land), whereas the person who looked after the land had rights which were recognised by the common law courts (and so that person is described as having ‘legal title’).

There are other stories about how the trust first came into existence, which may be linked to the one I was told. History is in truth a selection between different accounts of the past. One account locates the earliest trusts as being created for Franciscan monks. Franciscan monks took a vow of poverty and therefore could not own property. Consequently, if anyone wanted to give money to the order of Franciscan monks or to monks in a particular monastery it was necessary for someone else to hold that property for the benefit of the monks. It was important to ensure that the monks would have the use of the property and that this third party would not be allowed to take the property for herself: hence imposing the obligations of trusteeship on the person who held the property. Another account of the source of the trust places it in the Middle East in the ‘waqf’, a device which was used within Muslim families to provide for property to be held by one family member for the benefit of other family members who required charity.⁸ It has been plausibly suggested that either the European crusaders⁹ or the Franciscan monks brought this idea back to Europe with them.¹⁰ An idea which has a pleasing circularity with my initial story of the European crusader whom we might believe learned of the waqf when in the Middle East. Indeed, it seems that the trust was found in many European countries like Italy before those countries adopted civil codes which obliterated their traces.¹¹ Yet another story starts with the fact that English law knew the ‘use’ before it knew the ‘trust’ – that much is accepted fact – and that the trust more specifically was developed by conveyancing lawyers in the seventeenth century around the time of the English Civil War in the 1640s to ensure that land would not be appropriated or misapplied by binding its trustees as to given courses of action over time. Indeed all of this seems at odds with the determination of historians at the turn of the 20th century that there was something quintessentially English about the trust.¹²

Whichever story is to be preferred they each have two common themes: first, more than one person has rights in the same property simultaneously but in such a way that one person is required to deal with the property entirely for the benefit of the other person; and, secondly, these trusts were developed by practical people trying to deal with practical problems, as opposed to being created by a legislator or a judge setting out all of the appropriate principles

7 Therefore, you might find it useful to think of the first breach of trust as having been the abuses wrought on the kingdom by King John when Richard the Lionheart left the kingdom in the care of his brother, John. Many of the fundamental principles of trusts law can therefore be illustrated by watching those Robin Hood films in which Richard the Lionheart eventually returns from captivity in Austria to reclaim his proprietary rights over his kingdom from his brother, eg, The Adventures of Robin Hood, starring Errol Flynn. It has been suggested that these crusaders may have developed the trust out of the Islamic waqf, which was a form of charitable institution used within families to support family members: see, eg, Lim, 2001.

8 See, eg, Lim, 2001.

9 Moffat, 1999, 26.

10 See Lim, 2001, 56.

11 Lupoi, 2000, 368.

12 See Maitland, 1936, 1. See section 32.5.2 on this point.

in advance. In truth in trusts law we have always been reacting to circumstance: every case and every statute has been seeking to order and to regularise whatever has already been done in practice. The purpose of books like this is to explain how these principles fit together and also how they should be understood as working in the future.

As we shall see later in this chapter, this division of ownership enables a large number of complex commercial and non-commercial uses of property to be carried on, ranging from the creation of pension funds and explaining ownership of the home through to taking security in international financial transactions and constructing sophisticated tax avoidance schemes. First, however, we shall set out a definition of the trust and then consider the various types of trust.

2.2 THE DEFINITION OF A TRUST

2.2.1 The definition of a trust

The following definition of a trust is given in Thomas and Hudson's The Law of Trusts:¹³

The essence of a trust is the imposition of an equitable obligation on a person who is the legal owner of property (a trustee) which requires that person to act in good conscience when dealing with that property in favour of any person (the beneficiary) who has a beneficial interest recognised by equity in the property.¹⁴ The trustee is said to 'hold the property on trust' for the beneficiary. There are four significant elements to the trust: that it is equitable, that it provides the beneficiary with rights in property, that it also imposes obligations on the trustee, and that those obligations are fiduciary in nature.

Trusts are enforced by equity and therefore the beneficiary is said to have an 'equitable interest' in the trust property (sometimes this right in a beneficiary is referred to as a 'beneficial interest'), whereas the trustee will be treated by the common law as holding the 'legal title' in the trust property, thus enabling the trustee to deal with the trust property so as to achieve the objectives of the trust.¹⁵ In general terms we can observe that a trustee is the officer under a trust who is obliged to carry out the terms of the trust and who owes strict fiduciary duties of the utmost good faith to the beneficiaries.¹⁶ The mechanics of the trust are 13 Thomas and Hudson, 2010, para 1.01. Footnotes within this quotation are footnotes from the original text. In that book, from pages 1 through 26, Thomas and Hudson analyse the effects of this definition in greater detail than is necessary at this stage of this book.

14 The nature of this form of 'conscience' has been the subject of scholarly debate for centuries. For jurists such as St German and for Sir Thomas More conscience bound the Lord Chancellor to follow the rules set out in the common law and conscience bound a trustee not simply to follow his own conscience but rather conscience bound a trustee to observe the wishes of his beneficiary (see, for example, Gresley v Saunders (1522) Spelman Rep 22–23). However, as the notion of conscience is rendered by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669, there is a suggestion of a greater subjectivity in that a person will only be subject to the duties of a trustee if he knows of the matter which is said to affect his conscience: see para 27.01 in this regard in relation to constructive trusts arising on the basis of conscience.

15 The distinction between equity and common law was considered in Chapter 1, in section 1.2.

16 These fiduciary obligations are considered in detail in Part 3 of this book. The idea of good conscience requiring a trustee to act in the best interests of the beneficiary appears to have been present in Gresley v Saunders (1522) Spelman Rep 22–31.

considered in detail in section 2.3 below. Before that, however, we will turn our attention to consider the different forms of trust and how the different forms of trust come into existence.

2.2.2 The mechanisms by which the different forms of trust come into existence

The mechanisms by which trusts come into existence are described by Thomas and Hudson in The Law of Trusts in the following fashion:¹⁷

A trust comes into existence either by virtue of having been established expressly by a person (the settlor) who was the absolute owner of property¹⁸ before the creation of the trust (an express trust); or by virtue of some action of the settlor which the court interprets to have been sufficient to create a trust but which the settlor himself did not know was a trust (an implied [express] trust);¹⁹ or by operation of law either to resolve some dispute as to ownership of property where the creation of an express trust has failed (an automatic resulting trust)²⁰ or to recognise the proprietary rights of one who has contributed to the purchase price of property (a purchase price resulting trust);²¹ or by operation of law to prevent the legal owner of property from seeking unconscionably to deny the rights of those who have equitable interests in that property (a constructive trust).²²

These various forms of trust are outlined in the next section; however, it will take much of the rest of this book to consider how they function in detail.

2.2.3 The different types of trust

There are four principal types of trust:²³ express trusts; resulting trusts; constructive trusts; and implied trusts, although implied trusts are rarely applied today.²⁴ We will focus in this short section on the three most significant types of trust in modern trusts practice: express 17 Thomas and Hudson, 2010, para 1.02. The footnotes in the quotation are footnotes from the original.

18 Such that the 'property' in question is best understood to be 'rights in property' and need not be absolute title in the property. Thus, a lease over land may itself be the subject matter of a trust even though it is not the largest property right in that land (Keech v Sandford (1726) Sel Cas Ch 61). An equitable interest in a trust may itself be the subject matter of a trust (Re Lashmar (1891) 1 Ch 258; Grainge v Wilberforce (1889) 5 TLR 436).

19 Re Kayford [1975] 1 WLR 279; Paul v Constance [1977] 1 WLR 527.

20 Vandervell v IRC [1967] 2 AC 291.

21 Dyer v Dyer (1788) 2 Cox Eq Cas 92.

22 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

23 As suggested by Law of Property Act 1925, s 53(2).

24 That the fourth category of 'implied trusts' exists is suggested by its mention in s 53(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925 but that category is suggested to be an empty one for the most part unless the suggestion made by Thomas and Hudson, 2010, para 1.20 (as mentioned in this book in para 2.2.2 above) to the effect that 'implied trusts' should be taken to constitute express trusts which are created unknowingly by a settlor as in Paul v Constance [1977] 1 WLR 527, is adopted by the courts. Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669 referred to 'implied trusts'. This is an expression which is problematic in English law with some taking it simply to refer to 'resulting trusts' (which are considered in Chapter 11), while others feel that it ought to refer both to constructive and resulting trusts (an area which is dubbed in this book 'trusts implied by law' as opposed to 'implied trusts'). What was meant by this class of trusts was unsure when Sir Arthur Underhill wrote A Practical and Concise Manual of the Law Relating to Private Trusts and Trustees, 3rd edn, Butterworths, 1889, 12, suggesting that an 'implied trust' might be any of the categories just mentioned.

trusts, resulting trusts and constructive trusts. The most significant distinction between them is that express trusts can be created deliberately by a settlor (as considered in Part 2 of this book), whereas resulting and constructive trusts are implied by a court in appropriate circumstances (as considered in Part 4 Trusts Implied by Law of this book). Later in this chapter we will also draw some distinctions between trusts on the basis of the types of powers which they give to their trustees, and by reference to the purpose behind their creation. For the moment we will consider the three, principal types of trust.

Express trusts

Express trusts are trusts which are declared intentionally by the settlor.²⁵ Typically, the settlor will intend to settle specific property on trust for clearly identifiable beneficiaries, to be held by appointed trustees according to terms set out by the settlor.²⁶ However, there are situations in which the settlor might intend her actions without knowing that a lawyer would define those actions as constituting the creation of a trust.²⁷ For example, a settlor may intend both of her children to have equal access to the money left in her will without knowing that a lawyer would say she had thereby created a trust over that money in favour of her children. In such situations the court will find that an express trust has been created (as considered in Chapter 3).²⁸ It is necessary that the trust property is sufficiently identifiable²⁹ and that there is no uncertainty as to the identity of the beneficiaries (as considered in Chapter 3).³⁰ Similarly, legal title in the trust property must be transferred to the trustees before the trust can be effective.³¹ These issues are considered in greater detail in Part 2 generally. In particular, Part 2 considers the possible distinctions between various forms of express trusts. Express trusts created under a formal instrument were also known as ‘settlements’, which was the source of the term ‘settlor’.

Resulting trusts

Resulting trusts are implied by the court – they are not created intentionally by the settlor.³² Resulting trusts arise in two situations, in the wake of the decision of the House of Lords in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC.³³ First, where the settlor has transferred the legal title in property to a trustee but has failed to identify the person(s) who will take the equitable interest in the trust property, that part of the equitable interest which has not been settled on trust for an identified beneficiary will be held by the trustee on resulting

25 Re Kayford [1975] 1 WLR 279; Paul v Constance [1977] 1 WLR 527.

26 Morice v Bishop of Durham (1805) 10 Ves 522; Milroy v Lord (1862) 4 De GF & J 264; Bowman v Secular Society Ltd [1917] AC 406.

27 Paul v Constance [1977] 1 WLR 527.

28 Ibid.

29 Re London Wine Co (Shippers) Ltd [1986] PCC 121; Re Goldcorp Exchange Ltd [1995] 1 AC 74; Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

30 Morice v Bishop of Durham (1805) 10 Ves 522; Knight v Knight (1840) 3 Beav 148; Knight v Boughton (1840) 11 Cl & Fin 513; Re Gulbenkian [1968] Ch 126; McPhail v Doulton [1970] 2 WLR 1110.

31 Milroy v Lord (1862) 4 De GF&J 264.

32 Cf comments made by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669 to the effect that resulting trusts come into effect as a result of the common intention of the parties, an idea confronted at para 11.1.3 in this book.

33 [1996] AC 669.

trust for the settlor.³⁴ The underpinning of this form of resulting trust is that where the equitable interest in property is not vested in another person, that equitable interest will ‘jump back’ to the settlor. This is an extension of the equitable principle that there cannot be a vacuum in the equitable interest in property.

Secondly, where a person contributes to the purchase price of property, that person acquires an equitable interest in the property.³⁵ The size of the equitable interest will be equal to the size of the contribution in proportion to the total purchase price of the property. Therefore, if a person contributes £20,000 to the purchase of an asset which cost £100,000, that person would acquire an equitable interest equal to one-fifth of the value of that property on resulting trust principles. Resulting trusts are considered in detail in Chapter 11.

Constructive trusts

A constructive trust arises by operation of law.³⁶ In circumstances in which a defendant has acted unconscionably, for example, in keeping a payment which she knows was paid to her by mistake, the court will consider the defendant to be a constructive trustee.³⁷ In the case of unconscionable receipt of property, the defendant will hold that property on constructive trust for the person properly entitled in equity to that property.³⁸ Therefore, if Dipali has retained money paid to her under a mistake, from the moment that Dipali is aware that the payment was made mistakenly, she will be treated by the court as being a trustee of that money.³⁹ Dipali will therefore hold the money on constructive trust for the payer as beneficiary.⁴⁰

There are other contexts in which the courts will analyse a situation as giving rise to a constructive trust. In relation to family homes, as discussed in Chapter 15 of this book, where two or more people come to an arrangement as to the ownership of their home (possibly by allocation of responsibility for the mortgage, or as a result of more general conversations between themselves) the English courts will typically impose a constructive trust on those parties to give effect to their common intention.⁴¹

Other examples of the constructive trust are considered in more detail in Chapter 12 of this book.⁴² There are situations in which a constructive trust will impose a liability on a defendant not to hold specific property on trust, but rather will impose an obligation to pay money to the other person.⁴³ These remedies are dubbed ‘personal liability to account’ and

34 Vandervell v IRC [1967] 2 AC 291, HL.

35 Dyer v Dyer (1788) 2 Cox Eq Cas 92.

36 On which see section 12.1.

37 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669; Paragon Finance plc v DB Thakerar & Co [1999] 1 All ER 400.

38 Ibid.

39 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669, particularly as explaining the decision in Chase Manhattan Bank NA v Israel-British Bank (London) Ltd [1981] 1 Ch 105.

40 Ibid.

41 Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1991] 1 AC 107, [1990] 1 All ER 1111; Ivin v Blake [1995] 1 FLR 70.

42 In particular, constructive trusts in relation to fiduciaries earning secret profits (Keech v Sandford (1726) Sel Cas Ch 61; Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46) or receiving bribes (Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324, [1993] 3 WLR 1143) or forming contracts to transfer property (Neville v Wilson [1997] Ch 144).

43 In particular, the claims for personal liability for knowing receipt of property in breach of trust or dishonest assistance in a breach of trust, as considered in Chapter 20: Barnes v Addy (1874) 9 Ch App 244; Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378; Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley [2002] 2 AC 164, [2002] 2 All ER 377; Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [2002] 3 WLR 1913.

deal with situations in which the defendant has received trust property knowing it has been transferred away in breach of trust,⁴⁴ or has dishonestly assisted in the breach of trust.⁴⁵ The defendant, by definition, will not have that trust property still under her control (or else a constructive trust would be imposed directly over that property). Rather, the defendant's obligation is to make good the loss suffered by the trust.⁴⁶

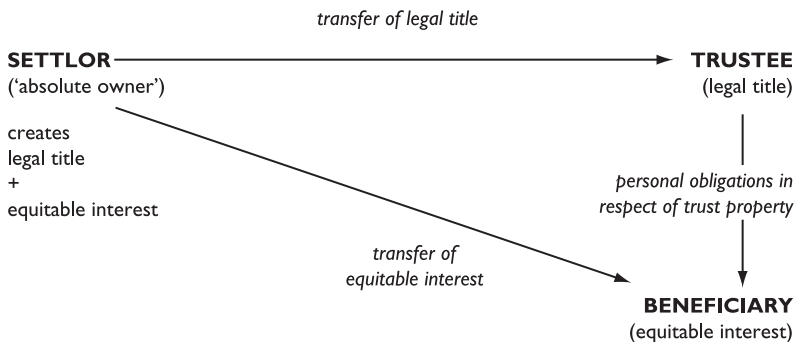

2.2.4 The structure of the rest of this chapter

In this chapter we will first consider the structure of express trusts in detail in section 2.3, including an overview of the various sub-categories of express trusts. This analysis will throw some light on the various people who participate in a trust and the nature of their respective rights and obligations. Then we will return to the fundamental principles of trusts law in section 2.4 which apply to resulting and constructive trusts as well as to express trusts. Then we consider the benefits and uses of trusts in section 2.5, varying between their commercial and their domestic uses. Finally we will distinguish the trust from other legal concepts in section 2.6.

2.3 EXPRESS TRUSTS – THE MAGIC TRIANGLE

2.3.1 How the express trust is structured

A description of an express trust might run as follows: a trust is created when the absolute owner of property (the settlor) passes the legal title in that property to a person (the trustee) to hold that property on trust for the benefit of another person (the beneficiary) in accordance with terms set out by the settlor. There are three legal capacities to bear in mind in the creation of a trust: the settlor, the trustee, and the beneficiary. These three capacities form the 'magic triangle'. The 'magic triangle' looks like this:

44 Re Montagu [1987] Ch 264; Polly Peck International v Nadir (No 2) [1992] 4 All ER 769.

45 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378; Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley [2002] 2 AC 164, [2002] 2 All ER 377; Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [2002] 3 WLR 1913.

46 Ibid.

2.3.2 The settlor

In the magic triangle, before the creation of an express trust, the settlor holds absolute title⁴⁷ in the property which is to be settled on trust. If the settlor does not hold the absolute title in the property rights which are to be settled on trust, then the settlor is incapable of creating a valid trust over them. The formalities for a valid declaration of trust are set out in Chapter 5. Provided that a trust has been validly declared, the legal title must be transferred to the trustees, as considered in Chapter 5.⁴⁸ The beneficiary acquires the equitable interest in the trust fund at that time.

Once a trust has been validly declared, the settlor ceases to have any active role in the trust.⁴⁹ A trust may be created entirely orally or it may be created by means of a carefully drafted trust instrument, as considered in Chapter 3. For example, if a settlor declared a trust over property just before her marriage in favour of herself, her husband and any prospective children, if the marriage failed, the settlor would not be entitled in her capacity as settlor to unwind the trust and recover the trust property.⁵⁰ Once a trust has been created, it remains inviolate. The only possible exception to this rule would be if the settlor were to reserve to herself some specific authority under the terms of the trust to unwind the trust, whether acting as trustee or enjoying the property as a beneficiary. The precise terms of the trust will be decisive, unless those terms transgress any rule of public policy.⁵¹ In any event, it is likely that in such a situation, the person who acted as settlor would then reserve rights as a form of trustee rather than as settlor.

2.3.3 The trustee

On creation of a trust, the legal title in the trust property must be vested in the trustee and the property rights making up the trust fund must be held by the trustee on trust for the beneficiaries. Take the example of a trust created over a fund of £1,000 held in a current bank account. The legal title in that bank account will be vested in the trustee. In practice, this means that the trustee's name appears on the cheque book, the trustee is empowered to authorise transfers of any money held in that account, the trustee has a contract with the bank as to the administration of the bank account, it is the trustee who would sue the bank for any negligence in the handling of the account, and so forth. The trustee has all of the common law rights in the bank account. Any litigation between the trust and third persons is conducted by the trustee as legal titleholder in the trust property.

Therefore, in the remainder of this book we shall refer to the trustee as the 'legal owner' of property. This is a technical use of the term 'legal owner' which means that the trustee is vested with all of the common law rights (that is, the 'legal title') in the property. It is not being used in opposition to the colloquial use of the word 'illegal'.

However, the most important feature of the trust is that the trustee is not entitled to assert personal, beneficial ownership in the trust property. Rather, it is the beneficiary who has all 47 That is, all of the rights of ownership in the property: all the legal and all the equitable rights potentially held in that property.

48 See section 5.1 below.

49 Paul v Paul (1882) 20 Ch D 742.

50 Ibid.

51 Such as defrauding creditors: Midland Bank v Wyatt [1995] 1 FLR 697.

of the beneficial title in property, as considered immediately below. Therefore, suppose that Susan dies leaving a will which appoints Tabitha to hold a house on trust as trustee for her children. Tabitha will be the person whose name appears on the legal title to the property at the Land Registry. However, Tabitha would not be entitled to sell the property and keep the money for herself beneficially. Rather, she would be required to hold the sale proceeds on trust for the beneficiaries. In that sense, it is not her property.

Two important points arise. First, a practical point. It will always be important to consider the precise terms of the trust. As will become apparent throughout this book, the courts will tend to look very closely at the precise written terms of a trust or at the verbal expression of the settlor's intentions.⁵² Therefore if, in the example above, Tabitha was required to hold the house on trust so that Susan's children could live there until the youngest of them reached the age of 18, Tabitha would be committing a breach of trust by selling the property before the child reached the age of 18. Consequently, not only would Tabitha hold the sale proceeds of the house on trust for the children, but she would also be required to pay compensation to the trust to make good any loss suffered by the trust fund from the breach of trust.⁵³ However, if the terms of the trust gave Tabitha a discretionary power to sell whenever Tabitha chose, then Tabitha would not have committed a breach of trust, prima facie, in selling the house.

Secondly, the trustee is required to hold the original trust property, or any substitute property, on trust for the beneficiaries. Therefore, unless there is something expressly to the contrary on the terms of the trust, a trust does not simply attach to specific property and that property only. Rather, the trust attaches to bundles of property rights which may be transferred from one piece of property to another. Suppose a trust with a defined purpose of maintaining a house for the beneficiaries with a power for the trustees to sell that house if the beneficiaries wish to move elsewhere. At the outset the original house is held on trust. When the house is sold, the trust attaches instead to the sale proceeds and then to the second house which is bought with that money. If the trust attached rigidly to one piece of property, it would be impossible for the beneficiaries to acquire rights in the second house because those rights would be stuck to the first house. In truth, a trust attaches to property rights and to value, not permanently to specific property. In this way a trustee can deal legitimately with the trust property by buying and selling it, and so on. This idea is considered in more detail below at para 3.4.3. What is important to bear in mind is that the particular property which makes up the trust fund from time to time may change; it is the trust fund in whatever form at any particular time which the trustees are required to hold on trust.

The precise obligations on the trustee are therefore to be found in the trust document itself. However, there are more general obligations on the trustee imposed by the general law of trusts. These issues are considered in more detail in Part 3 Administration of Trusts. Among the issues to be considered are the amount of information which trustees are required to give to beneficiaries, the manner in which the trust fund should be invested while it is being held on trust, the appointment or retirement of trustees, and the termination of the trust. As may have become apparent by now, much will depend upon the nature and terms of the trust. However, the most important types of express trusts are considered next.

52 Fuller v Evans [2000] 1 All ER 636.

53 Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421, considered in Chapter 18.

Bare trust

A bare trust arises where the trustees hold property on trust for a single, absolutely entitled beneficiary. The beneficiary therefore owns the entire equitable interest in the trust fund. That means that the trustee has no discretion nor any obligation other than the stewardship of the trust property on behalf of that beneficiary. The beneficiary herself must not be subject to any contingency or encumbrance which will interfere with her equitable interest in the property. She will hold 100% of the possible equitable interest in that property. The trustee in such a situation is generally referred to as being a ‘nominee’; that is, one who holds property in the name of another.⁵⁴

Fixed trust

A fixed trust refers to the situation in which the trustees hold property on trust for a certain, defined list of beneficiaries. An example of such a class of beneficiaries would be: ‘on trust for my two children Anna and Bertha.’ The ‘fixed’ nature of the trust refers then to the fixed list of people who can benefit from the trust. The role of trustee is comparatively straightforward in this situation because the trustee is required simply to perform the terms of the trust slavishly.⁵⁵ The trustee has no meaningful discretion in the operation of such a trust.

Discretionary trust power and mere power of appointment

The settlor may want to give the trustees the flexibility to cope with unexpected future events by giving them some discretion. So, a discretionary trust gives some discretion to the trustee as to the manner in which property is to be distributed and/or the people to whom that property is to be distributed. Suppose a situation in which a settlor has three adult children and wishes to require that the trustees use as much of a fund of money as they may think appropriate to help whichever one of the children earns the least money in any given calendar year. The trustee has discretion to distribute the amount of money necessary to make good the child’s lack of funds. The role of trustee is therefore more complicated than in respect of the fixed trust because the trustee is required to exercise some discretion, always ensuring that such exercise of her discretion remains permitted within the terms of the trust.⁵⁶ Suppose the settlor set aside a fund of money ‘such that my trustee shall pay £5,000 per year out of that fund to whichever of my children has the greatest need of it’. In such a situation, the trustee is compelled to make the payment because of the inclusion of the word ‘shall’, but she has discretion as to which child will receive it.⁵⁷

Alternatively, a settlor may decide that a trustee is to have a power of appointment between a number of potential beneficiaries so that the trustees are only required to make a payment out of a trust fund if they consider it to be appropriate. That means that the trustee is empowered to decide which people from among an identified class of beneficiaries are entitled to

54 See para 3.5.6 below.

55 See para 3.5.5 below.

56 See para 3.5.4 below.

57 The issue in such situations will often be whether or not the ambit of the trustee’s discretion has been identified with sufficient certainty.

take absolute title in any property which is appointed to them by the trustees. Suppose then that the settlor sets aside a fund 'to be held on trust by Trustee with a power to appoint the sum of £10,000 to whichever of the Sunderland AFC first team has performed most consistently throughout the current season'. The trustee therefore has discretion to choose which of the identified class is to receive absolute title in that £10,000 per season, but unlike a discretionary trust power, the power of appointment does not require that any payment be made unless the trustee considers it to be necessary: because the trustee has a power to appoint that money, she will not be obliged to do so if she considers it inappropriate.⁵⁸ (The rights of beneficiaries in relation to discretionary trusts and powers of appointment differ from the rights of beneficiaries under bare trusts in the manner discussed in section 4.1.4 below, but those issues are not important at present.)

Accumulation and maintenance trust

A settlor may seek to create an endowment trust from which, for example, the needs and living expenses of the settlor's children are to be provided. Consequently, the principal responsibility of the trustee is to invest the trust property and then to apply it according to the needs identified in the terms of the trust. The beneficiaries have rights against the trustees to have the trust performed in accordance with the terms of the trust and to have property advanced for their benefit at the time identified in the trust (subject to any discretion vested in the trustees).

The significance of the trustees' powers and obligations being fiduciary in nature

The trustee is possessed of both powers and obligations, as just discussed. By 'powers' are meant a range of abilities and capacities set out in the terms of the trust possibly to hold the trust fund, to invest the trust fund in specified investments, to exercise their discretion between certain classes of beneficiaries and so forth.⁵⁹ By 'obligations' are meant duties contained in the terms of the trust which the trustee is compelled to carry out. It would be possible to invest a person with powers without that person necessarily being a trustee. It would be possible for one person to have rights and obligations in relation to property without necessarily being a trustee.

The trustee is a form of what English lawyers term a 'fiduciary'. The expression 'fiduciary' is a difficult one to define with precision – a little like an elephant, we think we will know one when we see one, but we may have some difficulty in defining it in the abstract.⁶⁰ It is perhaps easier to list the four classic examples of fiduciaries: a trustee in relation to the beneficiaries; a company director in relation to the company; an agent in relation to the 58 Breadner v Granville-Grossman [2000] 4 All ER 705.

59 Thomas, 1998.

60 For example, the comedian Eddie Izzard defined an elephant as being 'an upside-down squirrel' in his Definite Article show.

principal; and a business partner in relation to other partners.⁶¹ One commonly used definition of a fiduciary office was given by Millett LJ:⁶²

A fiduciary is someone who has undertaken to act for or on behalf of another in a particular matter in circumstances which give rise to a relationship of trust and confidence. The distinguishing obligation of a fiduciary is the obligation of loyalty. The principal is entitled to the single-minded loyalty of his fiduciary. The core liability has several facets. A fiduciary must act in good faith; he must not make a profit out of his trust; he must not place himself in a position where his duty and his interest may conflict; he may not act for his own benefit or the benefit of a third person without the informed consent of his principal. This is not intended to be an exhaustive list, but it is sufficient to indicate the nature of fiduciary obligations. They are the defining characteristics of the fiduciary.

Therefore, we know that the obligations of acting in a fiduciary capacity arise in circumstances in which one person has undertaken to act loyally in the affairs of another. The clearest example of a fiduciary is a trustee who owes duties not to take any unauthorised profit from her office of trustee, not to permit any conflict of interest between her own affairs and those of the trust, to act with impartiality among all of the beneficiaries to a trust, and so forth.⁶³ These obligations are discussed in detail in Chapter 8.

Broadly then, a fiduciary is one who owes legal duties of loyalty and utmost good faith in relation to another person. Yet, whether a fiduciary obligation exists in any specific set of circumstances is not always an easy question to answer.⁶⁴ In relation to a trustee carrying on trust business, once that trust is properly constituted, there will necessarily be a fiduciary relationship between trustee and beneficiary. The effect of there being a fiduciary relationship will be that the fiduciary will owe the beneficiary a range of obligations of good faith⁶⁵ and potential obligations to make good any loss suffered by the beneficiary:⁶⁶ it is an onerous role, as considered in Part 6 of this book, Breach of Trust and Related Equitable Claims. In other contexts it is less easy to know how far any fiduciary obligations will extend. Suppose that the trustee and the beneficiary leave a trust meeting and emerge into the open air. The beneficiary starts to cross the road unaware of the danger of oncoming traffic. At that point in time any obligation which the trustee owes to the beneficiary to pull her back onto the kerb is not a fiduciary duty. We may think that one human being owes another human being some indefinable, quasi-moral obligation to try to save her in such a situation, but whatever form that obligation may or may not take, it is not a fiduciary obligation. Similarly, a solicitor will 61 See the analysis of the concept of 'fiduciary' in the essay which comprises Chapter 14.

62 Bristol & West Building Society v Mothew [1998] Ch 1 at 18, per Millett LJ.

63 All of these principles are considered in Chapter 8 and more generally in Part 3 of this book.

64 For a discussion of this concept, see Chapter 14 of this book.

65 See the various expressions of these principles in Keech v Sandford (1726) Sel Cas Ch 61 and Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46 relating to the obligations not to make secret profits nor to permit conflicts of interest; and Tito v Waddell (No 2) [1977] Ch 106 concerning the self-dealing and fair-dealing principles relating to trustees dealing on their own account with the trust property.

66 Target Holdings v Redfems [1996] 1 AC 421 concerning the obligations of the trustees to account to beneficiaries in relation to any breach of trust causing loss to the beneficiaries.

typically owe fiduciary duties towards a client in relation to the conduct of the client's legal affairs but not in relation to the client's choice of socks. Alternatively, a doctor may occupy a fiduciary position in relation to a patient's medical treatment but not in relation to the patient's choice of financial investments. It is all a matter of context.⁶⁷

Therefore, as we will see, it will be necessary to examine the precise terms of any trust to decide what form of obligation is owed by the trustee in particular circumstances. In Chapter 3 we will consider the need for the settlor to make the identities of the beneficiaries sufficiently certain. In considering the tests for certainty of beneficiaries it will be necessary to distinguish between powers which are given to people in their personal capacities and powers which are given to people in fiduciary capacities. In Chapters 4 and 5 we will analyse the different rights of beneficiaries and the various mechanisms for constituting a trust respectively, each of which will require us to analyse closely the precise terms of any given trust. The particular fiduciary duties of the trustee in normal circumstances are considered in detail in Chapter 8. The ramifications of the breach of a fiduciary duty are considered in detail in Chapter 18.

2.3.4 The beneficiary

The rights of the beneficiary, as has emerged from the preceding discussion, will depend on the specific terms and nature of the trust. The beneficiary will always have a right to compel the trustees to carry out the terms of the trust. It is a necessary part of the law of trusts that there be some person for whose benefit the court can decree performance of the trust.⁶⁸ Furthermore, the beneficiary has proprietary rights in the trust property.⁶⁹ Thus, the beneficiary's equitable interest is a right in property. That property right forms part of the beneficiary's estate; but it does not form part of the trustee's personal estate. This has the important result that if a trustee were to go into insolvency, then the trust property would remain the beneficiary's property and would not fall to be distributed among the trustee's creditors. Therefore, trusts provide protection against an insolvency for their beneficiaries. If the trust property should be lost as a result of some breach of trust, then the beneficiary also has a right against the trustee personally to compensate the beneficiary's loss.⁷⁰ This right to equitable compensation operates over-and-above the beneficiary's proprietary rights.⁷¹ The beneficiary's proprietary rights also permit her to trace after her property and to assert rights over any property by which the original trust property has been substituted⁷² and against any 67 See the analysis of the concept of 'fiduciary' in the essay which comprises Chapter 14.

68 Morice v Bishop of Durham (1805) 10 Ves 522; Bowman v Secular Society Ltd [1917] AC 406, 441 by Lord Parker, as considered in Chapter 4 below. Cf Medforth v Blake [2000] Ch 86.

69 Saunders v Vautier (1841) 4 Beav 115; Tinsley v Milligan [1994] 1 AC 340, 371. The proprietary nature of these rights are discussed in detail in section 4.1.

70 Clough v Bond (1838) 3 My & Cr 490; Re Massingberd's Settlement (1890) 63 LT 296; Nocton v Lord Ashburton [1914] AC 932; Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421. Breach of trust is considered in Chapter 18.

71 Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421.

72 Pilcher v Rawlins (1872) LR 7 Ch App 259; Re Diplock's Estate [1948] Ch 465; Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669; Boscawen v Bajwa [1996] 1 WLR 328. The law of tracing is considered in Chapter 19.

people who participated in the breach of trust despite not being trustees.⁷³ Therefore, as we shall see in the course of this book, the beneficiary has a range of remedies available to her which will enable her to protect her rights under the trust.

Given these general propositions, beneficiaries will nevertheless occupy subtly different positions depending upon the terms of the trust under which they take their particular interests. The foregoing discussion of the varying types of trusts indicates not only that the precise obligations of the trustees will differ from case to case, but also that the rights of the beneficiaries will vary in quality.

The most important distinction will be between vested rights and rights which remain contingent on some eventuality provided for under the terms of the trust. Under a mere power of appointment, the beneficiary will have no vested rights in any property until the trustee exercises her power of appointment in favour of that beneficiary.⁷⁴ The right of the beneficiary is merely an unenforceable hope (or spes) that the trustee will decide to exercise her power in favour of that beneficiary.⁷⁵ A power of appointment does not give the beneficiary any right in the money: all that the beneficiary has is an unenforceable hope that the holder of the power will choose to benefit her. Under a discretionary trust, however, the beneficiary will not acquire a vested right in any particular property under the trust until the trustees' discretion is exercised in her favour – but significantly under a discretionary trust, the beneficiary will acquire a personal right in common with the other beneficiaries to ensure that the trustees observe the terms of the trust. A beneficiary under a discretionary trust has a right to require the trustees to consider her case fairly: that in itself constitutes some right in the trust property.⁷⁶ To decide which is which, the trusts lawyer is required to construe the words used by the settlor carefully: this point is considered in section 4.1.4.

It is important to note that beyond that personal claim against the trustee, the beneficiary will not have rights to any specific property under a discretionary trust before the trustee has exercised her discretion. This should be compared with a bare trust, under which the beneficiary will have equitable proprietary rights in the trust property from the moment at which the trust is created. This is simply because in a bare trust there is only one beneficiary; whereas in a discretionary trust there will be more than one person potentially with a right in the trust property. Under a bare trust there is no interest to compete with that of the bare beneficiary, therefore the right of the beneficiary is deemed to be vested in the trust fund itself. Similarly, where trust property is held 'on trust for A for life, remainder to B', it is A who will have a vested proprietary interest in the trust fund and a right to receive the income from the trust fund, whereas B will acquire a right to ensure that the trustees respect her rights to the property after A's death but no vested interest until A's death.

The most important principle in defining the nature of the beneficiary's entitlement is that set out in Saunders v Vautier.⁷⁷ A beneficiary who is absolutely entitled and sui juris (that is,

73 Barnes v Addy (1874) 9 Ch App 244; Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378; Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley [2002] 2 AC 164; [2002] 2 All ER 377; Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [2002] 3 WLR 1913. The law on personal liability to account for participation in a breach of trust is considered in Chapter 20.

74 Re Brooks' ST [1939] 1 Ch 993.

75 Ibid. This passage was cited with approval and formed the basis of the decision in World Group Europe Holdings plc v Bettina Vossberg (2004) August 7, First Hall, Civil Court, Malta; Onor. Cuschieri.

76 Re Ralli's WT [1964] 2 WLR 144.

77 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

over 18 and not otherwise incapacitated) will be able to direct the trustees to deliver up the trust property to that beneficiary so that the beneficiary becomes absolutely entitled to it. Therefore, the beneficiary's greatest possible right is to be able to take control of this trust fund and to direct the manner in which the trustee is able to deal with it. However, in relation to discretionary trusts, for example, it is a difficult question to know whether or not the beneficiaries will be able to exercise such a power precisely before any identified property is appointed to them. This question is considered in detail in para 4.1.2. On the one hand, if there is a possibility either that there may be further members of the class of beneficiaries added in the future or if the trustees have a power to retain trust property, then the beneficiaries could not be said to have rights commensurate with the Saunders v Vautier principle;⁷⁸ by contrast, on the other hand, if the terms of the trust instrument mean that no further people can be added to the class of beneficiaries and if the trustees are required to exhaust the trust property, then the beneficiaries will be entitled to act together and so exercise Saunders v Vautier rights.⁷⁹ As will be clear by this stage, everything will depend upon the precise terms of any trust instrument.

Aside from the power given by Saunders v Vautier, the right which the beneficiary will have, even under a discretionary trust, is a right to compel the trustee to carry out her obligations in accordance with the terms of the trust. Significantly, this does not mean that the beneficiaries can direct the trustee as to which decisions to make nor the substance of those decisions, but rather that the beneficiaries are entitled to ask the court to police the manner in which those decisions are made, as considered in Chapter 8.

2.3.5 Distinguishing between 'people' and 'legal capacities'

It is important to distinguish between the human beings (or companies) involved in the formation of a trust and the capacities which those people occupy. The same human being can occupy a variety of different capacities in relation to the same trust. An example will make the point clear. It is possible that Sally, the absolute owner of shares in SAFC plc, may decide that she wishes to create a trust over those shares for the benefit of her immediate family. Therefore, Sally might declare that she will hold those shares on trust herself, as sole trustee, in favour of herself, her husband and her children. Therefore, Sally would be settlor, trustee and one of the beneficiaries. This is perfectly possible. It is vital, however, to remember that Sally acts in three different capacities simultaneously: settlor, trustee and beneficiary. Do not confuse the person involved with the capacity which they occupy from time to time.⁸⁰ This is a difficulty which even courts experience occasionally.⁸¹ One person may be trustee and beneficiary, but in trusts law it is important to think of such an individual as two people – one a trustee and the other a beneficiary.

The only situation which would not be legally possible in trusts law would be that in which Sally held as sole trustee for herself as sole beneficiary. This is not possible because Sally would therefore hold all of the proprietary rights in the shares, and therefore should be considered still 78 Gartside v IRC [1968] AC 553, 606 per Lord Reid, 617 per Lord Wilberforce.

79 Re Smith [1928] Ch 915; Re Nelson (note) [1928] Ch 920.

80 Re Brooks' ST [1939] 1 Ch 993.

81 Eg, Re Vandervell's Trusts (No 2) [1974] 3 WLR 256.

to be the absolute owner of those shares without the need to consider issues of trust at all. Suppose Albert is the absolute owner of a car which he settles on trust for his benefit as absolutely entitled beneficiary: it would be a nonsense to suggest that such a trust was created, because in truth Albert has retained all of the rights in the car and therefore remains its absolute owner. It would, however, be possible for Albert to declare that he held the car on trust as the sole trustee for the benefit of himself and his children as beneficiaries because Albert would not then hold the whole of the equitable interest: part of it would be held by his children.

2.3.6 The distinction between the trust and civil law concepts of ownership

The trust is not naturally a part of the jurisprudence of civil code jurisdictions.⁸² Before the trust was developed in English law, there was an institution known as the ‘use’. This expression ‘use’ derives from the Latin ‘ad opus’ meaning property held ‘on behalf of’ another person.⁸³ This was the principal difference between Roman law (or ‘civilian’) systems used in continental Europe (like those in France or Germany) and that developed in England: civilian systems recognised only one person as having outright ownership (or, ‘dominium’) over property and all other people as having merely personal claims against the owner of that property.⁸⁴ Consequently, for a civilian lawyer, the distinction between rights in rem and rights in personam would mean that a right in rem was a claim to be the owner of land, whereas a right in personam would be a purely personal claim against the owner of the land claiming damages or perhaps some right to access the land in some way. That means that the holder of a right in personam in civilian legal systems has a claim against the owner of property, but no claim against the property itself.

By contrast, the English law of trusts recognises that while there will be some person who is the owner at common law of property, it may be that equity requires that common law owner to hold that land for the benefit of some other person. In effect, the English law of trusts accepts that there may be a right for someone other than the common law owner in the property itself. Therefore, a beneficiary is able to assert rights against the trustee or any third person in relation to the property. At the same time, however, the trustee has legal title over the trust property and so can deal with the property in a way which enables her to carry out the terms of the trust. Consequently, as will emerge during this chapter and Part 2 of this book, the law of trusts recognises that one person, the trustee, is the common law owner of property but is required to hold that property on behalf of a beneficiary or a number of beneficiaries who are treated by equity as having rights in that property.

2.3.7 The use of trusts by English families through history

The painting on the cover of the seventh edition of this book was part of Hogarth’s Marriage à la Mode series, which depicted the aftermath of a patriarch amending the family settlement

82 Since the creation of the Hague Trusts Convention, however, a number of signatory states have adopted the trust into their jurisprudence: see para 21.2.5, which considers the recognition of trusts. It is only through this Convention that such jurisdictions have accepted the trust and that is why the text refers to the trust not being ‘naturally’ a part of such systems of law; although see Lupoi, 2000, 267 in relation to Italian law.

83 Maitland, 1936, 24.

84 Ibid.

so as to account for the marriage of his stupid son to the daughter of a rich merchant. The characters in the paintings squandered their wealth and died in poverty – exactly the sort of thing which family settlements were intended to avoid. The wealth of aristocratic and wealthy families in England was tied up in family settlements (which were trusts) which settled the rights of ownership and use of the various items of property belonging to a family: whether houses, money, income from investments, chattels and so on. It was common to create a ‘fee tail’ arrangement whereby property passed to the eldest male heir such that daughters would be effectively disinherited on the patriarch’s death if they had not married.

This was the principal driving factor behind the plots of Jane Austen’s novels Pride and Prejudice and Sense and Sensibility because the young women would lose their homes when their fathers died because they were bound by a fee tail arrangement which would pass the houses and chattels to male relatives on their deaths. Consequently, the race is on through those novels for the young women to find rich husbands to save them from penury. In Dickens’s novels there are many similar arrangements: in Bleak House, for example, the Jarndyce children are anxiously waiting for the result of litigation in the case of Jarndyce v Jarndyce to know what interests they will have under a will and its related trusts created by a deceased relative. Family settlements became a way of protecting women in such families from the fate which almost befell Anne Elliott in Persuasion where a gold-digging young man tries to win her hand in marriage because property law at the time meant that he would then become the absolute owner of all of his wife’s property. The only way of protecting wives from having their property passed absolutely to their husbands (because wives at the time became ‘the shadows of their husbands’ on marriage) was to provide that other people had rights under trust in that same property. Thus, an unscrupulous husband could not assert ownership of it because his wife did not herself have unencumbered ownership of it.

The fortunes of the wealthy in England and Wales were also dependent generally on the honesty of their trustees. We shall see in Part 6 of this book that the law on breach of trust is weighted heavily in favour of protecting the beneficiaries under a trust from the risk of losing their property as those people typically had no property other than the land and money left to them by their ancestors. Consequently, it is impossible to underestimate the social importance of the early decisions on family settlements which underpin so much of the law in the first six parts of this book. While other concerns have come into play latterly (such as the growth of pension funds and investment funds based on trust law, and the use of constructive trusts in international banking law cases), the roots of trusts law are in the determination of judges drawn from this same social class to protect the integrity of trusts funds and the families who literally depended on them.

2.4 FUNDAMENTALS OF THE LAW OF TRUSTS

2.4.1 The core principles of the trust

The most important judicial statement of the core principles of trusts law in recent times was made by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC,⁸⁵ when his Lordship sought to set out the framework upon which the trust operates:

85 [1996] 2 All ER 961, 988; see also HCK China Investments Ltd v Solar Honest Ltd (1999) 165 ALR 680; Lonrho Exports Ltd v Export Credits Guarantee Department [1999] CL 158.

The Relevant Principles of Trust Law:

- (i) Equity operates on the conscience of the owner of the legal interest. In the case of a trust, the conscience of the legal owner requires him to carry out the purposes for which the property was vested in him (express or implied trust) or which the law imposes on him by reason of his unconscionable conduct (constructive trust).
- (ii) Since the equitable jurisdiction to enforce trusts depends upon the conscience of the holder of the legal interest being affected, he cannot be a trustee of the property if and so long as he is ignorant of the facts alleged to affect his conscience . . .
- (iii) In order to establish a trust there must be identifiable trust property . . .
- (iv) Once a trust is established, as from the date of its establishment the beneficiary has, in equity, a proprietary interest in the trust property, which proprietary interest will be enforceable in equity against any subsequent holder of the property (whether the original property or substituted property into which it can be traced) other than a purchaser for value of the legal interest without notice.

Four things emerge from these dicta, and were set out in the definition of trusts set out in para 2.2.1. Each is considered in turn in the following paragraphs.⁸⁶ The main points arising from Lord Browne-Wilkinson's words can be broken down as set out in the following sections.

2.4.2 The trust imposes equitable obligations on the conscience of the trustee

First, the source of the trustees' obligations are found in equity requiring that they act in good conscience whether as a result of a settlor having created an express trust, thus obliging the trustee to obey the terms of the trust in good conscience, or else a court having considered it appropriate to impose a trust in circumstances in which the trustee would otherwise have been permitted to act unconscionably. As has already been said,⁸⁷ equity acts in personam and thus operates on the conscience of the defendant.⁸⁸ The explanation of the trust as an equitable institution is that the trustee receives property in circumstances in which 86 Aside from these dicta being the clearest statement in the decided cases of the nature of the trust, it is important to understand that much of what Lord Browne-Wilkinson says in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC (and in other decisions), about resulting trusts and constructive trusts in particular, is considered to be slightly heretical by some slightly heretical commentators, eg, Birks, 1996 and Chambers, 1997. This book will take issue with some of the things that are said by the various commentators, particularly in Parts 4 and 6 (Trusts Implied by Law and Breach of Trust and Related Equitable Claims). So, before we launch into the analysis, one word of advice for the student reader. It is important to understand that different people have different points of view about the law. Nothing should be taken as being absolute truth. One must differentiate between those areas of the law of trusts on which there is concrete authority and those areas where there remains debate. At the next level, you must try to come to terms with those issues on which academics and judges disagree either with decided case law or with other academics and judges. The flexibility and fluidity of the application of the principles of trusts law is both the joy and the difficulty associated with the study of this subject.

87 See para 2.2.1 for a definition of the trust as acting on the conscience of the trustee, and para 1.4.12 above for the manner in which equity operates in personam.

88 Thomas Lewin, in the first edition of his seminal work A Practical Treatise on the Law of Trusts and Trustees, Maxwell, 1837 identified the birth of the trust as being in the avoidance of fraud by Chancery courts, and on page 2 that 'the parents of the trust were Fraud and Fear, and a court of conscience was the Nurse'.

it would be against conscience for her to refuse to be bound by the terms of that trust. The trust can take one of two forms:

- (a) It might be an express trust under which a settlor has consciously and deliberately created a trust. In such circumstances, equity would not permit a trustee to seek to act in contravention of the terms of such a trust or to act more generally in bad conscience.
- (b) Alternatively, the trust might be one imposed by the courts, instead of by a settlor, because it is considered that it would be unconscionable to allow a person who has acquired common law rights in property to continue to control that property without some judicial action being taken against her. Thus, Lord Browne-Wilkinson refers to these constructive trusts as being imposed on a person ‘by reason of his unconscionable conduct’. Such a person has the role of ‘trusteeship’ imposed on her by the court, thus creating the obligations of trustee and beneficiary between that person and others.

As was considered in Chapter 1, it is a core feature of equity that it acts in personam against the defendant in the sense of judging whether or not she has acted in good conscience.⁸⁹ This is particularly so in relation to the trustee in a trust relationship.

Another well-known definition of a trust is that set out in Underhill and Hayton on Trusts and Trustees in the following terms:

A trust is an equitable obligation, binding a person (called a trustee) to deal with property owned⁹⁰ by him (called trust property, being distinguished from his private property) for the benefit of persons (called beneficiaries or, in old cases, cestuis que trust), of whom he may himself be one, and any one of whom may enforce the obligation.⁹¹

From this definition, just as with the definition given by Thomas and Hudson above,⁹² it is clear that the obligation is equitable. The obligation of conscience is not apparent on the terms of Underhill and Hayton’s definition, unlike Thomas and Hudson’s definition and the ⁸⁹ The Earl of Oxford’s Case (1615) 1 Ch Rep 1.

⁹⁰ Interestingly, Professor David Hayton in a recent edition of Underhill and Hayton, 2002, 5, explains that he has altered Sir Arthur Underhill’s definition of the trust slightly to recognise that the trustee is an owner of the legal title in trust property (on which see Smith v Anderson (1880) 15 Ch D 247 at 275, per James LJ) and not simply a person who has the trust property under his control: a person may have control of the trust property as a bailee or depositary for that property without having any legal title in it. The definition in previous editions had read: ‘A trust is an equitable obligation, binding on a person (who is called a trustee) to deal with property over which he has control (called trust property, being distinguished from his private property) for the benefit of persons (called beneficiaries or, in old cases, cestuis que trust), of whom he may himself be one, and any one of whom may enforce the obligation.’

⁹¹ Underhill and Hayton, 2002, 3; cited with approval in Re Marshall’s WT [1945] Ch 217, at 219; Green v Russell [1959] 2 QB 226, at 241. Professor Pettit adds to the end of this definition the following: ‘. . . or for a charitable purpose, which may be enforced at the instance of the Attorney-General, or for some other purpose permitted by law though unenforceable’: Pettit, 2001, 25. The suggestion in Snell’s Equity suggesting that there is no satisfactory definition of a trust was cited with approval in Allen v Distillers Company (Biochemicals) Ltd [1974] QB 384, as to which see the previous edition of Snell’s Equity, 2000, 394, which it is suggested is unsatisfactorily defeatist.

⁹² Reproduced at para 2.2.1 above.

discussion in Chapter 1 of this book which would suggest that the notion of conscience is necessarily bound up in the concept of an 'equitable obligation'.⁹³

What can also be observed about trusts, however, is that the importance which they have acquired over the centuries has caused the courts to develop a number of strict principles surrounding the manner in which they are created and operated, as is considered in detail in Parts 2 and 3 of this book. This tendency towards increased rigidity of principle – which will become apparent when we consider the requirements of certainty in Chapter 3 and of formalities in Chapter 5 – might suggest a movement away from a general notion of conscience as underpinning the trust. In truth the idea of conscience still governs the obligations of trustees even though it may appear to have been submerged at times behind the requirements of certainty and formality. This development emerges more clearly in the next paragraph.

2.4.3 For the beneficiary trusts create proprietary rights in the trust property and personal rights against the trustees

A trust must take effect over property in favour of a beneficiary

The trust is built on a combination of property law rules and personal obligations. First let us consider the proprietary aspects of the trust. As Lord Browne-Wilkinson held in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC that '... in order to establish a trust there must be identifiable trust property'.⁹⁴ Thus, if a settlor purported to create a trust without having any rights in the trust property at the time of purporting to create that trust, there would be no valid trust created.⁹⁵ Once a trust is created, the trustee is required to hold the identified trust property on trust for the identified beneficiaries.⁹⁶ The trustee may not take any beneficial interest in the trust property,⁹⁷ unless the trustee is also a part of the class of beneficiaries in that particular trust, and must obey the terms of the trust.⁹⁸ The beneficiaries in their turn have proprietary rights in the trust property,⁹⁹ as is considered in detail in Chapter 4. Furthermore, if there is no beneficiary for whose benefit the property is held on trust, then the purported trust will simply not be valid.¹⁰⁰ Therefore, property law will deal with the manner in which the trust fund is treated.

Secondly, however, the manner in which the trustee is required to behave in relation to the beneficiaries in the exercise of her fiduciary duties is a matter concerning a system of 93 On this point, see also Thomas and Hudson, 2004, 14.

94 See para 2.4.1 above.

95 Re Brooks' Settlement Trusts [1939] 1 Ch 993. See also Re Ralli's Will Trusts [1964] 1 Ch 288 and the discussion in this book at section 5.3.

96 See Milroy v Lord (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

97 See, eg, Fletcher v Fletcher (1844) 4 Hare 67, where a trustee sought to take beneficially a fund of money bequeathed to him with the intention that he was to have held it for the settlor's son, even though the trust in favour of the son did not appear prima facie to be valid.

98 Clough v Bond (1838) 3 My & Cr 490, 496.

99 Saunders v Vautier (1841) 4 Beav 115.

100 Morice v Bishop of Durham (1804) 9 Ves 399; Bowman v Secular Society Ltd [1917] AC 406; Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW [1959] AC 457. This precise form of wording, it is suggested, would be accepted even by Goff J in Re Denley [1969] 1 Ch 373 who was otherwise prepared to accept merely that there be some person with locus standi to enforce the trustees' obligations with only an indirect right to take some use or enjoyment from the trust property.

personal, equitable obligations. The obligations are equitable in that it is equity which recognises the rights of the beneficiaries. These obligations will stem from the proprietary rights of the beneficiaries in the trust property but go further than simply imposing proprietary obligations on the trustees. If the beneficiaries' rights were simply attached to the trust property, then if the trust fund were lost, the beneficiaries would similarly lose all of their rights. Therefore, to protect the beneficiaries' rights, the trustees are also taken to owe personal obligations to the beneficiaries to account to the beneficiaries for the value of the trust property in the event that the trustees commit some breach of trust.¹⁰¹ This has the effect that the trustees are personally liable to pay into the trust fund an amount equal to any loss suffered by the trust, as considered in Chapter 18.¹⁰² This obligation is over and above any rights of the trustees to specific recovery of the trust property¹⁰³ or to trace its value into the hands of third parties.¹⁰⁴ The distinction between personal and proprietary obligations is considered in greater detail next.

The division between property rights and personal obligations

The beneficiary under a trust will have rights in property (or, 'rights in rem') provided that she is validly a beneficiary with some rights vested in her at the material time. In English law, if the defendant owes only a personal obligation to the claimant (or, a 'right in personam') then the defendant will be liable either to pay damages at common law (in the form of a breach of contract or a tort) or to pay some equitable compensation in equity to the claimant (for example in relation to a breach of trust) in the event that that obligation is breached.¹⁰⁵ However, if the claimant can demonstrate a right in some property controlled by the defendant then the claimant can require that that specific property is delivered up in satisfaction of some breach of duty.¹⁰⁶

This is the root of the distinction, for example, between being a secured or an unsecured creditor. Suppose that Anne has entered into a contract with Bridget which imposes fiduciary (or trustee-like) obligations on Bridget. Anne runs the risk that Bridget will go into insolvency such that if Bridget has breached that fiduciary obligation to Anne, Anne will not be able to recover any financial compensation from the insolvent Bridget. However, if Anne had some proprietary rights under a trust in property over which Bridget was trustee, then Anne could seize that property in satisfaction of the breach of obligation committed by Bridget without the need to concern herself with the insolvency.

The trust, whether express or implied, will grant proprietary rights to the beneficiary. Significantly, rights in property entitle the beneficial owner to title to the property regardless of the value of that property. Therefore, it is also preferable to retain title in property which is likely to increase in value instead of relying on Bridget's undertaking to pay damages under a personal claim. Conversely, if the property is likely to decrease in value, then it would be preferable to recover monetary compensation equal to the beneficiaries' loss 101 Clough v Bond (1838) 3 My & Cr 490; Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421.

102 Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421.

103 Ibid.

104 See the discussion of the law of tracing in Chapter 19.

105 Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421.

106 Ibid.

measured at a level before the property decreases in value.¹⁰⁷ The trust therefore grants property rights in relation to obligations which would be considered to be merely personal obligations by common law.

The notion of the trust as a form of personal obligation on the trustee is considered in the following section. For the purposes of this discussion, it is important to consider the manner in which trusts purport to create proprietary rights in the beneficiary.

2.5 THE BENEFITS AND USES OF TRUSTS

Having outlined the nature of the trust, it is worth considering the reasons why settlors would choose to create trusts in the first place, before moving on to consider the detailed business of creating a legally valid trust.

2.5.1 Owning property but not owning property

The genius of the trust is that it enables one person, the trustee, to control property while vesting all of the ultimate entitlement to that property in another person, the beneficiary.

Family business

For people writing their wills, the trust device enables the appointment of executors who take the deceased's property as trustees of it until they carry out the obligations imposed on them under the will. Therefore, quite literally, it enables a person who cannot deal with their own property once they are dead to appoint another person to do it on their behalf. More to the point, the persons who are intended to benefit ultimately from this property are able to exercise control by means of the law of trusts over the trustees to ensure that the settlor's intentions are carried through effectively.

As considered already, the trust enables families to organise the distribution of property between family members. Complex family settlements enable rights in property to be settled for generations into the future (subject to what is said in Chapter 4 about the rules on perpetuities). Thus, large estates can be divided between children and the rights to each can be organised. The trustees are responsible for carrying out the terms of such a settlement. The beneficiaries are able to control their own rights and duties by suing the trustees to comply with the specific obligations set out in the settlement.

Commercial uses

The other primary use for the trust is to facilitate commercial transactions. A straightforward example of the commercial use of a trust was in the case of Re Kayford,¹⁰⁸ in which a mail order business took payment in advance from its customers before sending them the goods which they had ordered. Importantly, the customers' money was held in a bank account separately from the other money held by the company. The company went into insolvency 107 See section 18.3.6 generally in relation to the valuation of property.

108 [1975] 1 WLR 279.

and the question arose as to the ownership of the advance payments held in the bank account, which had been received from customers who had not received the goods they had ordered. The court held that a trust had been created over those advance payments in favour of the customers who had made pre-payments without receiving their goods.¹⁰⁹

In commercial terms, this therefore becomes a core technique in taking security in a transaction. Where one party is concerned about the ability of the other party to perform its obligations, any property (including money) which is to be passed as part of the transaction can be held on trust until such time as both parties' contractual obligations have been performed.

Suppose the following set of facts. Choc Ltd is a company organised under English law, and resident in England, which manufactures 'Magic' chocolate bars. Each Magic bar requires sugar. Choc Ltd has decided to acquire sugar from Cuba, a corporation organised under Cuban law and resident in Cuba which grows and refines sugar. Choc Ltd is attracted by Cuba's competitive prices. The parties agree that Cuba will deliver x tons of sugar to England each month for £100,000. However, neither party has dealt with the other before. Choc Ltd bears the risk that Cuba will not deliver the sugar at all, or that the quality of the sugar would not be as specified in the contract. Cuba bears the risk that Choc Ltd will not pay £100,000 each month as per the contract, even though the sugar has been shipped from Cuba.

The parties might compromise on the following structure. Briefly put, a third party trustee will hold the property rights in both the money and the sugar until both are satisfied that the other party to the contract has performed its obligations as it is required to do under the contract. Cuba would insist that Cuba retains property rights in the sugar until the payment of £100,000 is made to it. Choc Ltd would insist that it retains title in its money until a quantity of suitable sugar has been delivered to it. The parties would therefore declare a single trust, with an independent third party to act as trustee. The trust fund would be made up each month of x tons of sugar and also of £100,000. The terms of the trust would be that the sugar would be held on trust for Cuba if Choc Ltd failed to make payment, but that it would be held on trust for Choc Ltd if payment was made. Similarly, the £100,000 would be held on trust for Choc Ltd until a suitable quantity and quality of sugar was delivered to Choc Ltd, at which time the equitable interest in the £100,000 would be transferred to Cuba absolutely.

This transaction is illustrated in the diagram below:

109 For example, in Sendo International Ltd (In Administration) [2006] EWHC 2935 (Ch), [2007] 1 BCLC 141 trusts were used to hold property for the benefit of two classes of creditors when a company went into insolvency. Those trusts were useful devices to manage the insolvent company's property while the administration of that insolvency was worked through.

The trust operates as a pivotal technique in the structure of many commercial transactions. Concerns about a counterparty's creditworthiness can be controlled by taking the equitable interest in property under a trust structure as indicated above. If the one party to the contract does not perform (that is, if Cuba does not deliver suitable sugar), the other party can recover the property which it transferred to the trust (that is, Choc Ltd can recover the £100,000 it had transferred to the trustee). It is common for parties to a contract, neither of whom has any connection with England and Wales, to use the English trust law structure to control their credit risk concerns.¹¹⁰

A central intellectual technique

The trust has become an important part of the way in which English lawyers look at property law. The proliferation of resulting and constructive trusts considered in Part 4 is evidence of the ubiquity of the trust. In any situation in which property is held by one person where it is considered improper for that person to assert unencumbered beneficial ownership of it, the cry will go up from English lawyers that the property must be considered to be held on trust. As this book progresses, the trust will emerge as the most common form of equity in action in a very broad variety of contexts.

2.5.2 Taxation of trusts

Trusts as a means of tax avoidance

One of the more common uses of the trust is as a means of tax avoidance. As considered above, the trust enables one person (the settlor) to have property held by another (the trustee) for the benefit of some other person (the beneficiary). Suppose that the property involved is a bundle of valuable shares which are expected to generate a large dividend annually. The shareholder will be liable to tax on those dividends. However, if those shares were transferred to a trustee to be held on trust for herself, the shareholder might then be able to say 'I do not have legal title in those shares and therefore I should not be liable to tax payable on any dividends paid in respect of those shares'.

As considered below, the modern law of taxation will tax the beneficial owner of the shares and therefore the shareholder would be liable to tax.¹¹¹ However, the shareholder/settlor may then be a good deal more cunning. The beneficiary may name other persons as beneficiaries and therefore claim to have no rights to the shares. Those beneficiaries might be the settlor's own children (who would probably not have other taxable income) or a company controlled by the settlor. Other common schemes involve using trustees resident in other tax jurisdictions where little or no tax is payable (such as the Cayman Islands or the British Virgin Islands) to raise an argument that the trust ought not to be liable to UK taxation in any event.

Tax statutes have become increasingly complex in recent years to combat these transparent attempts to avoid liability to UK tax. The flexibility afforded by the trust means that 110 For a discussion of how this might work in relation to financial contracts, see Hudson, 2002, 413.

111 Baker v Archer-Shee [1927] AC 844.

the ingenuity of lawyers practising in the field of taxation can be applied to construct ever more sophisticated structures to avoid the letter of the law. In response to this tax avoidance industry, HM Revenue and Customs has adopted the approach of promoting legislation that is targeted at very specific forms of avoidance. The more effective approach appears to be that developed by the courts to ignore any ‘artificial steps’ in such tax avoidance structures, so that the true substance of the transaction can be taxed without the sham devices of a tax avoidance scheme, which in itself can be thought of as an equitable doctrine.¹¹² However, there is nothing per se to prevent a person from ordering her own affairs in a way which reduces her liability to tax.¹¹³

Principles in the taxation of trusts

The difficulty with reference to the taxation of trusts is that there is more than one person with proprietary rights in the trust fund. This short section does not attempt to do more than outline some of the main principles involved in the taxation of trusts. Readers with a more specific interest are directed to books dealing with the taxation of trusts.¹¹⁴

The general principle is that it is the trustee who must account for any taxable income deriving from the trust property.¹¹⁵ There are those who doubt that this authority does create quite such an all-embracing principle.¹¹⁶ Where the trust is a bare trust (that is, a trustee holds as bare nominee for a single beneficiary absolutely), it is the beneficiary who is liable for taxable income generated by that trust.¹¹⁷ It is suggested that this latter decision must be correct, otherwise a taxpayer liable to higher rate income tax would simply be able to create a number of trusts, each receiving a portion of the income belonging beneficially to the taxpayer but so that those portions fell below the threshold for payment of higher rate tax.

Different rules apply to accumulation and discretionary trusts. A special rate of tax is applicable to trusts under ss 686(1) and (1A) and also s 832(1) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act (TA) 1988. The creation of settlements in which the settlor retains some equitable interest (however small) will typically be caught by anti-avoidance legislation. Therefore, where the settlor retains a benefit under such a discretionary or accumulation trust, the taxpayer will be liable for any difference between the rate of tax applicable to trusts and the taxpayer’s own effective rate of tax.¹¹⁸ Similarly, under inheritance tax rules, where a taxpayer makes a gift with a reservation of some benefit in that gift to herself, tax will be chargeable on the taxpayer’s estate.¹¹⁹ This is because the legislation assumes that a settlor who retains some interest for herself is doing so for the purposes of tax avoidance and that she is in fact intended to take the entire benefit ultimately. The Finance Act 2006 introduced 112 Ramsay v IRC [1982] AC 300; Furniss v Dawson [1984] 2 WLR 226. See most recently on the developing restriction of this doctrine in the unanimous decision of the House of Lords in Barclays Mercantile Business Finance Ltd v Mawson [2004] UKHL 51 to the effect that this principle is predominantly a principle of statutory interpretation dividing between technical and commercial uses of language.

113 See perhaps Ingram v IRC [1985] STC 835.

114 Thomas, 1981; Shipwright and Keeling, 1998; Tiley, 2001.

115 Williams v Singer [1921] 1 AC 65, per Viscount Cave.

116 Reid’s Trustees v IRC (1926) 14 TC 512; Shipwright and Keeling, 1998, 401 et seq.

117 Baker v Archer-Shee [1927] AC 844.

118 TA 1988, s 687.

119 Finance Act 1986, s 102.

a new regime for inheritance tax over settlements. The reader is referred to the detailed, specialist literature on that topic.¹²⁰

In the Finance Act 1995, a broad range of tax avoidance rules were introduced in relation to settlements by addition to Pt XV of the TA 1988. These provisions consolidated the piecemeal anti-avoidance legislation passed in connection with settlements hitherto. Within the technical tax term ‘settlement’ for this purpose fell ‘any disposition, trust, covenant, agreement, arrangement or transfer of assets’.¹²¹ The underlying intention of these provisions was to prevent tax avoidance in situations in which a settlor seeks to retain some benefit to herself under a settlement.¹²² The tax position in relation to non-resident trusts is particularly complex and not within the compass of this book.¹²³

2.6 THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN TRUSTS AND OTHER LEGAL CONCEPTS

The trust bears similarities to, and important distinctions from, other structures recognised by English law. Like the structures considered below, a trust does not have legal personality (that is, it does not exist independently like a human being or a company). Rather, there are formalities to be complied with so that it is possible to identify the structure as being a trust rather than something else.

2.6.1 Contract

A contract is a bilateral agreement (resulting from an offer,¹²⁴ an acceptance of that offer,¹²⁵ and consideration passing between the parties¹²⁶). An express trust arises from the unilateral act of the settlor in declaring a trust.¹²⁷ There is no contract between settlor and trustee in ordinary circumstances. It will be the case that if a professional trustee is appointed (perhaps a bank or a solicitor), then the trustee will require payment from the settlor to act as trustee. In such circumstances there will be a trust and also a contract between settlor and trustee. However, the contract does not form a part of the trust – rather, it is collateral to it.¹²⁸

A contract creates personal obligations between the two contracting parties. Those parties can therefore sue one another for damages for breach of contract,¹²⁹ or can sue for specific 120 See Venables, 2006.

121 TA 1988, s 660G.

122 Ibid, s 660(2).

123 See Venables, 1999, generally.

124 Weeks v Tybald (1605) Noy 11; Lambert v Lewis [1982] AC 225. See on the distinction between a contract of loan and a trust Morley v Morley (1678) 2 Cas in Ch 2, per Lord Nottingham; and Twinsectra v Yardley [2002] 2 WLR 802, 821, per Lord Millett.

125 Butler Machine Tool Co Ltd v Ex-Cell-O Corporation (England) Ltd [1979] 1 WLR 401.

126 Rann v Hughes (1778) 7 TR 350, 4 Bro PC 27.

127 Paul v Constance [1977] 1 WLR 527.

128 See the discussion at para 8.5.5.

129 Tai Hing Cotton Mill Ltd v Kamsing Factory [1979] AC 95.

performance to require that the contract be carried out.¹³⁰ The rights to damages arise in common law from the very existence of the contract. A contract also requires consideration, whereas a trust requires no consideration.¹³¹

In relation to a trust, there are personal obligations between trustee and beneficiary in relation to the treatment of the trust fund and the performance of the trustee's obligations under the trust.¹³² The trustee will be liable to the beneficiary both to reinstate the trust fund and for compensation if there is any breach of trust.¹³³ The beneficiary is also entitled to require the trustee to carry out her obligations.¹³⁴

Prima facie, then, there are some similarities in form between the trust and the contract in terms of the existence of personal obligations between parties. Nevertheless, there are three significant distinctions between contracts and trusts. First, a trust creates proprietary rights in favour of the beneficiaries and is therefore not restricted to personal claims for compensation.¹³⁵ Secondly, the obligations which arise in a contract are created by the common intention of the parties, whereas the trust obligations arise because equity acts on the conscience of the trustee (in relation to express trusts because a settlor has declared a trust). Thirdly, trusts impose fiduciary obligations in relation to specific property whereas contracts ordinarily do not.¹³⁶

2.6.2 Bailment

The important element of the trust is that property is held by the trustee for the benefit of the beneficiary whereby the beneficiary acquires an equitable interest in the trust property. Therefore, a division occurs when the settlor declares the trust between legal and equitable title. That structure forms a useful comparison with the law of bailment – again a property law rule. In bailment, a person delivers property into the control of another person on the understanding that the property is to be returned to its owner. Thus, in a theatre, a member of the audience may leave a coat with the cloakroom attendant during the performance. There is no transfer of property rights. Rather, the theatre becomes bailee of the coat during the performance, on the understanding that physical possession of the coat is to be returned at the end of the performance. This may form part of the contract for the acquisition of the theatre ticket, or be the subject of a separate contract requiring payment for each garment left at the cloakroom, or it may be a purely gratuitous service offered by the theatre.¹³⁷

Whatever form the bailment takes, it is essentially different from a trust in that a trustee acquires common law property rights in the trust fund. That the trustee acquires these property rights is essential to the functioning of the trust.¹³⁸ A bailee of property does not acquire any property rights in the objects put into her control.

130 Hutton v Watling [1948] Ch 26. Cf Beswick v Beswick [1968] AC 58.

131 See Underhill, 1889, p 3.

132 Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421.

133 Ibid.

134 Beneficiaries who are absolutely entitled to the trust property, and acting sui juris, are empowered to direct the trustees to deliver the trust property to them: Saunders v Vautier (1841) 4 Beav 115.

135 Saunders v Vautier (1841) 4 Beav 115, considered at section 4.1 in detail.

136 With the notable exceptions of contracts of agency and partnership.

137 For a radical restructuring of this topic see McMeel, 'On the redundancy of the concept of bailment', in Hudson, 2004:5.

138 Milroy v Lord (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

2.6.3 Agency

In an agency relationship, a principal instructs an agent to act on behalf of the principal.¹³⁹ This agency can take a number of commercial forms. Its legal form is that of a contract between principal and agent that the agent can act on behalf of the principal to effect a specific range of transactions. A typical commercial example would be a principal who bred thoroughbred horses instructing an agent 'to conduct a search for new horses in Yorkshire'. Such an agent would typically be empowered to acquire horses of a specified quality on behalf of the principal. The agent will therefore enter into contracts of purchase for such horses. The contract between principal and agent would then require the agent to buy that property for the principal.

The trust bears some superficial similarities to this agency arrangement. At first blush a trustee may appear to operate as a form of agent, dealing with the legal title in property according to the terms of the trust. However, there is not necessarily a contract between settlor and trustee,¹⁴⁰ nor between trustee and beneficiary. Furthermore, in an agency arrangement, a principal would not ordinarily acquire equitable interests in property acquired by the agent in the way that a beneficiary under a trust acquires equitable interests once the declaration of trust takes effect.¹⁴¹ It may, however, be possible for the principal to assert that the contract of agency would transfer equitable rights by means of specific performance.¹⁴²

The most significant similarity between trustee and agent is in relation to the fiduciary obligations created by each office. Trustees and agents owe fiduciary duties to the beneficiaries and principals respectively, precluding them from making unauthorised profits from their arrangements and so forth.¹⁴³ However, the most significant difference is that an agency arrangement is based primarily on the common law of contract, albeit imposing fiduciary obligations, whereas a trust relies on equitable control of the conscience of the common law owner of the trust property.

2.6.4 Gift

A gift involves the outright transfer of property rights in an item of property from an absolute owner of those rights to a volunteer (that is, someone who has given no consideration for the transfer). The recipient (or donee) becomes absolute owner of that property as a result of the transfer.

In some senses the beneficiary appears to occupy a similar position in relation to a trust in that the settlor transfers absolute title in property by dividing between the legal title vested in the trustee and the equitable interest vested in the beneficiary. In that sense, the settlor has transferred all of the property rights away from herself *qua*¹⁴⁴ settlor. The beneficiary is not required (by the general law of trusts) to have given consideration for that transfer. In that 139 Whether expressly by deed (Berkley v Hardy (1826) 5 B & C 355) or by inference from the circumstances (Garnac Grain Co Inc v HMF Faure and Fairclough Ltd [1968] AC 1130).

140 See the discussion of Langbein, 1995 at para 21.2.3.

141 See generally Attenborough v Solomon [1913] AC 76; Re King's WT [1964] Ch 542, [1964] 1 All ER 833.

142 Walsh v Lonsdale (1882) 21 Ch D 9.

143 On which see the discussion of fiduciary responsibility comprising Chapter 14.

144 That is, 'in the capacity of' settlor.

sense the beneficiary is a volunteer. One of the core equitable principles already considered is that equity will not assist a volunteer.¹⁴⁵

However, the significant difference between a gift and a trust is that only legal title in the trust property is assigned to the trustee on the basis that that person is required to deal with the property for the benefit of the beneficiary.¹⁴⁶ In short, equity is acting on the conscience of the trustee in her treatment of the trust fund, rather than seeking to benefit a beneficiary.¹⁴⁷ By contrast, the beneficiary takes only an equitable interest in the property. Neither the trustee nor the beneficiary becomes the absolute owner of the trust property, unlike the recipient of a gift, who does become absolute owner of the property which comprised the gift. Furthermore, as we shall learn in later discussion,¹⁴⁸ if a donor intends to make a gift of property, then she will not be entitled to rely on the law of trusts to validate that transfer if it fails to take effect as a gift.¹⁴⁹ Therefore, the courts have established a clear distinction between these gifts and trusts.

2.6.5 Powers

Powers give the rightholder an ability to perform some action in the sense that the rightholder has a discretion. For example, a power such that ‘Xena may pay £1,000’ to whichever of a given class of people ‘has the most need of it’ would enable Xena to advance the money if she chose to do so, but would not compel any money to be paid at all. By contrast, a trust creates an obligation which the trustee is obliged to follow.¹⁵⁰ Therefore, a power creates a right but no obligation to perform a given act, whereas a trust imposes an obligation (albeit occasionally involving some discretion). There is one category of what is now understood to be a trust¹⁵¹ which does grant the trustee some discretion as to the manner in which her trust obligations are to be performed: these are discretionary trusts (as considered above at para 2.3.3). In such situations, the trustee has a choice of actions open to her but she is obliged to carry out that choice, unlike a mere power.¹⁵² For example, ‘Xena shall pay £1,000 to whichever of the beneficiaries has the greatest need of it’ would oblige Xena to make the payment of £1,000, but with some discretion as to which beneficiary is to receive the money. The distinction between powers and trusts of this sort is considered in detail in section 3.5 below.

2.7 SOCIOLOGICAL ISSUES IN EQUITY AND TRUSTS

2.7.1 Introduction

This section is intended to throw a light on the role which trusts law has played in the treatment of women in our society over the centuries, and the role which international trusts law

145 See para 1.4.15 above.

146 Re Brooks’ ST [1939] 1 Ch 993.

147 Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

148 See section 5.1.

149 Milroy v Lord (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

150 Breadner v Granville-Grossman [2001] Ch 523, 540, [2000] 4 All ER 705, 719, per Park J.

151 These powers were once known as ‘powers in the form of a trust’.

152 Burrough v Philcox (1840) 5 My & Cr 72; Re Weekes Settlement [1897] 1 Ch 289.

(and its use to avoid regulatory oversight and to avoid taxation) plays in our modern geopolitical culture.¹⁵³ It is all too easy to consider trusts law as simply a parade of legal rules which are politically neutral. In truth, all law has complex effects in terms of gender, race, class and sex. A full sociology of trusts law has yet to be attempted. Nevertheless, what can be understood about trusts law is that it has tended to be designed for the benefit of the moneyed classes historically; albeit that the doctrine of constructive trusts is expanding today in ways which apply to commercial and non-commercial situations in different ways.

In the modern world economy, the same trusts models in various jurisdictions allow legitimate investments to be made (with pension funds being based on ordinary trusts principles at root) as well as enabling criminal organisations to shield their activities and to avoid regulatory oversight. Speaking at a conference in Sicily on the uses of trusts, I was struck by the attitude of a young judge whose job was to investigate Mafia crimes. He was constantly under threat of attack and had an armed guard. From his perspective, the danger which trusts posed in Sicily was as a means for criminal organisations to conceal their assets by holding them on trusts which would not need to publish accounts nor to disclose the identity of their beneficiaries, and which could be relocated without difficulty to other countries. In a time of economic austerity in most of the North Atlantic jurisdictions after the financial crisis of 2007–09, one of the principal uses of trusts is to hold the assets of rich individuals in so-called ‘tax havens’ where little or no tax is levied on them. The trusts statutes of those jurisdictions are designed specifically to attract overseas investors. However, these secretive trusts structures are not only used by tax avoiders: they are also used by criminal and terrorist organisations to fund their activities and to launder their money. Many of those jurisdictions have, historically, refused to share information with the regulatory authorities of other states so as to enable those criminal and terrorist organisations to be monitored. In recent years there have been initiatives which have sought to open up those jurisdictions but it is too early yet to assess how successful those initiatives will be in practice.

The treatment of women by equity and by trusts law – by turns positively and negatively – has long been a contested issue.¹⁵⁴ It is difficult sometimes from a vantage point in the 21st century, with its continued disadvantaging of women in many contexts, to comprehend some of the extraordinary legal principles which disadvantaged women in previous ages: but many of those rules were still in operation in the case law in the 1960’s and 1970’s. It is this treatment of women by English property and marriage law, and the contested idea that trusts law and equity might have operated to help them, which are considered first.

2.7.2 Women and trusts law

Introduction

This discussion is not intended to be a complete analysis of the interaction of equity and trusts law and the rights of women. Instead it is intended simply to give some context for the discussion of the core principles of trusts law (which are based mainly on 19th-century cases) so that our analysis of those cases will not overlook the extraordinary way in which English law has treated women. As mentioned above, it is all too easy to consider trusts law 153 See Alastair Hudson, Great Debates in Equity & Trusts, 2014, Ch.5 for a further discussion of these issues.

154 On this subject generally, see the excellent essays in S Scott-Hunt and H Lim (ed), Feminist Perspectives on Equity and Trusts, Cavendish, 2001; and AS Hudson, Great Debates in Equity & Trusts, op cit., Ch.12.

as simply a collection of rules which have no political context. A useful starting point would be to observe that trusts law was designed for the benefit of the upper classes historically. As Dicey put it, the daughters of the rich enjoyed for the most part the consideration and protection of equity; the daughters of the poor suffered under the severity and injustice of the common law.¹⁵⁵

What Dicey meant was that women in rich families could potentially have the protection of family trusts (in the form of complex ‘settlements’) which provided for their maintenance and income, if their settlor was thoughtful enough to have provided for them; whereas women in poor families would not have the benefit of trusts at all because they were poor and therefore could not afford the advice of expensive trusts lawyers, and in any event because their families had no property to settle on trust.¹⁵⁶ However, as we shall consider below, it is not entirely clear that equity, trusts law or property law generally did operate entirely for the benefit of women in all circumstances.¹⁵⁷ So, this section is concerned simply to identify some themes in the way in which equity, trusts law and the position of women over the centuries have interacted.

The limited rights of married women to property and other things

From our vantage point in the 21st century, it would be easy to think of 18th- and 19th-century trusts law as being a distant time with different concepts from our own; but that would be to overlook something important about equity and trusts. It is sometimes said that equity was the protector of women, and at one time there could have been some truth in this in the sense that the equity contained the possibility of protecting women against the (frankly) peculiar ways in which English property law and marriage law treated women.¹⁵⁸ Even in the 21st century, doctrines like proprietary estoppel may be the only way in which women may acquire rights in their homes if they have not been able to purchase those homes due to unequal treatment in the workplace leaving them with low wages, or having taken a career break to have children having interrupted their ability to contribute to the mortgage. In that sense, the sort of flexible, conscience-based doctrines which are discussed in this book may grant those women property rights, albeit that those rights depend problematically on the generosity of judges and not on any pre-existing property right. The argument runs that equity is the mechanism in English law which (before our modern divorce and child law was created) bore the burden of protecting women.

By way of illustration, let us begin with the law governing the ownership of marital property in earlier centuries. If you were to read the Jane Austen novel Persuasion, you will find 155 Dicey, Law and Opinton in England, quoted in Crane, 1965, 254.

156 EM Forster expressed a similar idea in Howards End to the effect that to trust is ‘a luxury in which only the wealthy can indulge; the poor cannot afford it’.

157 See Auchmuty, 2001.

158 If we assume that our focus is on women from wealthy families and therefore accept that we are focusing on the bourgeoisie and the aristocracy in this discussion, then we must still acknowledge that those women only appeared to be wealthy and comfortable.

that the heroine, Anne Elliot, falls prey to a fortune-hunting suitor who is ostensibly wealthy, honourable and attentive. In truth, his goal is to marry her for her money because, at that time, when a couple married, all of the wife's property would become her husband's property. The metaphor which was used at the time was that the wife became 'the shadow of her husband'. That seemingly innocuous idea in the Christian marriage concept that husband and wife become 'one flesh' takes on a very disturbing dimension when you realise that metaphorically the wife's flesh is taken to merge into her husband's so that she effectively disappears. The revered feminist theorist Simone Weil began her essay 'Human Personality' with the celebrated idea that:

'You do not interest me.' No person can say these words to another without committing a cruelty and offending against justice.¹⁵⁹

This, in effect, was the impact of much English law in this area on women. The very fact that married women became merely the shadows of their husbands meant that they ceased to exist at all.¹⁶⁰ In Weil's terms it is as though the woman is of no interest to the law. Consequently, the law commits the cruelty of saying that those women are of no interest in that they are denied the protection of law against their husbands. Their property rights evaporated as soon as they married. This is a part of the reason that a wedding is treated with such significance in old novels and films because it marked such a significant change in a woman's life. Married women had their property rights protected, after a fashion, by the Married Women's Property Act 1882; but the idea of a wife being the shadow of her husband was still haunting cases like *Caunce v Caunce*¹⁶¹ in 1969. Even in a decision of the House of Lords in 1965 in *National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth*¹⁶² the rights of wives were described by Lord Wilberforce by beginning with the following peculiarly old-fashioned concepts:

For though the wife had (apart from dower) no proprietary interest at law or in equity, in her husband's property, she had certain rights against her husband by virtue of her status of marriage . . . a wife acquired the right to two things: the right of cohabitation with her husband and the right to support according to her husband's estate and condition. She could obtain against him, from the ecclesiastical courts, an order for restitution of conjugal rights which, in its usual form, ordered him to take her home and receive her as his wife and render conjugal rights – an order which could be enforced by attachment for non-obedience . . . her rights were not rights in rem, nor were they related to any particular property; they were purely personal rights against her husband, enforceable

159 Weil, 1950, at 70.

160 It was observed by the legal historian Coke that in relation to a married man there were three types of people who had no rights against him: his wife, his children and his servants. Instead the man bore the seigniorial obligations of 'the master' in relation to those people. Until things changed in the early 20th century, what we now call employment law was formerly known as the law on 'master and servant'.

161 [1969] 1 WLR 286.

162 [1965] AC 1175, [1965] 3 WLR 1, sub nom National Provincial Bank v Hastings Car Mart Ltd [1965] 2 All ER 472. The same case is referred to by different names in different law reports. In essence, the husband here used the company as a cypher for himself in an attempt to defeat his wife's claims to the family home.

by proceedings against his person, which he could satisfy by rendering her conjugal rights, i.e. by living with her and supporting her in a suitable home.¹⁶³

The English are the perfect nation to have developed sexual innuendo as an art form¹⁶⁴ in that they often appear to be talking about sex when they are not (e.g. ‘satisfy by rendering her conjugal rights’ actually means providing her with a home), and they generally try to appear not to be talking about sex when they are. The ecclesiastical courts would in essence order that a marriage be consummated as well as that the wife be provided with an appropriate home: in essence, the court would order that the couple have sex. In Scott v Scott,¹⁶⁵ for example, a divorce was ordered on the basis that the wife was proved still to be a virgin after the marriage on the basis of a medical examination. Otherwise, conjugal rights were ‘enforceable by proceedings against his person’, which sounds like a euphemism for something. The wife had no rights in property; but rather only the earthier rights to be ‘received as a wife’. Quite who should be receiving whom is unclear here. The significant point is that the place and nature of women was treated as being merely a maternal, sexual vessel and a property-less person who needed to be supported by her husband.

Attitudes to women among judges even in the late 20th century

While that may sound like a relic from the middle ages which was being used to begin an analysis of the modern law in the 1960s, the following idea from Lord Denning (quoted in greater detail in Chapter 15) is instructive. It is to be remembered that it was Lord Denning who strove to develop the ‘deserted wife’s equity’ in the 1960s; albeit that it is difficult to know whether to celebrate him for seeking to improve the lot of women, or whether to criticise him for being interested only in married women and then for treating them as weak creatures in need of protection instead of being in need of rights. Therefore, one of the principal judges who was striving to protect wives from mistreatment by their husbands when they separated nevertheless had ante-deluvian attitudes to women. The following passage comes from a book of his memoirs published in 1980 which presents a view of women which subordinates them to men, and which carries the imprimatur of the principles of ecclesiastical law which informed National Provincial Bank and thus carries more than a whiff of the old religion:

No matter how you may dispute and argue, you cannot alter the fact that women are different from men. The principal task in life of women is to bear and rear children: and it is a task which occupies the best years of their lives. The man’s part in bringing up the children is no doubt as important as hers, but of necessity he cannot devote so much time to it. He is physically the stronger and she the weaker. He is temperamentally the more aggressive and she the more submissive. It is he who takes the initiative and she who responds . . .¹⁶⁶

163 [1965] 3 WLR 1, at 31.

164 As a German character in Blackadder Goes Forth remarked: ‘For us, the lavatory is a mundane and functional item. For you [the British], it is the basis of an entire culture’.

165 [1913] AC 417.

166 Denning, The Due Process of Law, 1980 at p 194.

There is really nothing to be added to that. It suggests a male judiciary, even when seeking to protect women, which nevertheless fails to understand that they are adult human beings and not merely simpering baby factories. As the poet Philip Larkin pointed out, the sexual revolution and a profound revolution in British society began in the 1960s:

Sexual intercourse began
In nineteen sixty-three
(Which was rather late for me)
Between the end of the Chatterley ban
And the Beatles' first LP.¹⁶⁷

And yet even in 1965 the rights of women in their own homes (let alone the workplace and so on) were being considered in the peculiar fashion outlined above.¹⁶⁸

Trusts sometimes denying rights to women and sometimes protecting women, and the novels of Jane Austen

If one were to go back in time again to the novels of Jane Austen (again, by way of illustration of the condition of women in the 18th and the early 19th century), the protagonists in Pride and Prejudice and in Sense and Sensibility are young women from genteel families who must find rich husbands because when their fathers die it is provided in the trusts which govern their entire families' lives that their home, the capital which produces their income and most of their chattels will pass to a specified male relative. The ancient device of an 'entailed' estate meant that when family settlements were created it was typically provided that the principal assets in the trust fund would pass down the male line. These were social norms which diminished the importance of women, which had hardened into legal techniques used widely in practice. It is difficult to read the opening chapters of either of those great Austen novels without a lump in the throat as one realises what the settlor has done to future generations of women in his family.¹⁶⁹ All of the plot of those novels spring from that idea of women being considered to be unworthy of receiving the family property by the settlors of their family settlements.

And yet, while settlements might exclude women in many circumstances, it was the marriage settlement which came to the protection of married women. If property was settled on trust for the woman and also for other people in remainder, then it was not 'her' property and as such it could not be seized by her husband on their marriage. In Austen's Persuasion (considered above), if Anne Elliot had had her property settled on her during her life and then to other people in remainder, it would have been impossible for any future husband to have 167 Larkin, 'Annus Mirabilis', 1974. The 'Chatterley ban' is a reference to the lifting of a ban on the DH Lawrence novel Lady Chatterley's Lover (originally published privately in Italy in 1928) which had previously been considered to have been obscene. Needless to say, sales of that novel in the wake of the ban being lifted were remarkable.

168 Admittedly, Larkin is not the best vehicle for arguing for a more enlightened understanding of the rights of women; but those lines do give a flavour of the history of the time and the changing social mores to which they bore witness.

169 The settlement in Pride and Prejudice is described in Chapter 7 of that book; that in Sense and Sensibility is described in Chapter 1 of that book.

taken that property from her because it would have continued to be held on trust. The husband would only have been able to take any payments of income which the trustees advanced to her. To avoid that problem, the trustees could have been given a discretion as to the amounts which would be forwarded to Anne and as to the form in which property would be forwarded to Anne. The flexibility of the trust device meant that it could be used to protect women as well. If property was settled on trust for that woman then she would not be entitled to take it for herself, and therefore she could not pass it to her husband by operation of law: this meant that a settlor could ensure that his female descendants were protected from their husbands by locking their property into a settlement under the stewardship of a trustee. Of course, this meant that the woman was also dependent on the trustees and furthermore on the terms of the trust as set down by the settlor in the first place. Nevertheless, it protected them against the notorious stories of some husbands who would marry, take their wives' property and spend it on loose living (often with a mistress and living apart from their wives), before returning to the matrimonial home if the wife inherited any further money in the future.¹⁷⁰ The place of women in our society was extremely precarious, but the trust did offer the possibility of protecting them within the family, if the settlor and his advisors were sufficiently forward-thinking.

The changing morality of 18th-century England

Much popular culture at this time depicted women seeking to protect themselves from the precarious position in which they found themselves. Samuel Richardson's Pamela, or Virtue Rewarded, published in 1740, is sometimes claimed to be the first proper English novel (told in the form of a series of letters written by a young woman). It tells the tale of a virtuous young woman who resists the rapacious advances of her master before eventually marrying him and thus securing a good, virtuous life for herself. The morality of this story – which to a modern mind merely suggests that success for the virtuous young woman involves marrying a rich man who tried to assault her – is deeply troubling and at the same time is locked into a vision of 'Merrie Old England' as a society of patient virtues and happy endings. Exactly that sort of moral blindness affected property law, as rich husbands commonly took mistresses while property law allowed them to live off their rich wives' property.

There was some resistance to this sickly, rose-tinted vision of English society in the 18th century. In previous editions of this book we have considered the changing morality which the English artist Hogarth depicted in the paintings (part of the Marriage a la Mode sequence painted between 1743 and 1745) which adorned the covers of earlier editions of this book. Those paintings, presented a very modern tale of acquisition, infidelity and ultimately financial ruin. It was a popular moral theme of the time which also appeared in Henry Fielding's novel Shamela, which mocked Richardson's Pamela by depicting a very modern young woman, of low class but high spirits, who went in search of a fortune by ensnaring a rich man so that she and her children would benefit from a well-stocked marriage settlement. As Shamela put it herself, 'a settled settlement for me, and all my heirs, all my whole life-time, shall do the business'. All that Shamela wanted was to find a good marriage which would come with a good marriage settlement. While this does depict the young woman as a gold-digger, what it also suggests is that English culture offered two choices to women at a time when trusts law was beginning to be drawn together as a coherent set of principles: assuming they could avoid poverty, they were either required to be submissive wives or scheming gold-diggers. Other examples of the latter category in English literature were Defoe's Moll Flanders and, a little later in time, the feisty Becky Sharp in Thackeray's Vanity Fair, who flirted her way steadily upwards in society until her bluff was finally called.

¹⁷⁰ See Cretney, 2005.

Rights of women to the home

The issues considered in Chapter 15 in relation to trusts of homes are significant in that they have tended to demonstrate a particularly gendered approach to trusts law, until developments begun by Waite LJ in *Midland Bank v Cooke*¹⁷¹ took a more nuanced view of the situation. Cases as to the equitable ownership of the home between unmarried couples or home-sharers typically used to favour the breadwinner, who statistically would often have been a man.¹⁷² There were estoppel cases (such as *Pascoe v Turner*¹⁷³) or equitable cases (such as Midland Bank v Cooke or *Cox v Jones*¹⁷⁴) which saw value in women's contribution to the home other than the purely financial and which therefore relied both on 'undertaking a survey of the entire course of dealing between the parties' and on avoiding unconscionability. Things have begun to change, in no small part due to the flexibility offered by equity and trusts law. In more recent cases in front of the highest courts – in *Stack v Dowden*¹⁷⁵ and in *Jones v Kernott*¹⁷⁶ – it has been the women who have been the higher earners in the relationship. Lady Hale identified a need for a new generation to move away from the presumption in the old cases that if a man transferred property to his wife then it was to be assumed that his intention was to make a gift to her because a man's role was to 'maintain' his wife. Significantly, the recent cases have been looking into the entire course of dealing between the parties, and taking into account non-financial contributions, instead of looking simply at the money that was contributed to the original purchase price. Perhaps now the position of women who are not able to contribute financially to the home is being recognised as a result of those recent decisions. A more significant cause of change, however, might be the more general presence of women in the workforce, which has had a patchy effect and which has had complex impacts on issues like childcare.

Residual judicial attitudes to women

In spite of these developments, even in the 21st century, the conceptualisation of women by a mostly male judiciary can still be troubling on occasion. An otherwise unremarkable case (in that it tells us little about legal principle) which is discussed in Chapter 11 on resulting trusts is Elithorn v Poulter,¹⁷⁷ in which the claimant was referred to as 'Madeline' by Rimer LJ throughout the case – even though she paid the entire purchase price for a couple's house – while the defendant – who paid nothing in cash – was referred to throughout as 'Dr Elithorn'. This seems to reduce her by referring to her informally by her first name, while by

171 [1995] 4 All ER 562.

172 See, for example, the test set out by Lord Bridge in Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1991] 1 AC 107.

173 [1979] 1 WLR 431.

174 [2004] 3 FCR 693.

175 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831.

176 [2011] UKSC 53, [2011] 3 WLR 1121, [2011] 3 FCR 495.

177 [2008] EWCA Civ 1364.

comparison he is referred to formally by his surname and more particularly by reference to his highest university degree. Even more remarkably, it was held that the property should be deemed to be owned equally between them in spite of the fact that she had paid the entire purchase price up-front. The trial judge had found that Madeline had intended to make a loan to Dr Elithorn, and this was taken by the Court of Appeal to mean that Dr Elithorn should be deemed to have acquired a half-share in the house with that loan money. These sorts of differences in the treatment of parties to litigation require constant close attention. In many of the older cases on trusts of homes, there was a tendency to dismiss work which wives had performed in bringing up children and running the home as being simply the sort of work which was expected from women and which could therefore be dismissed. These sorts of gendered attitudes are something which needs to be exposed and criticised. There is still a large amount of work to be done on equity and trusts law in considering the sociology and the politics of that law as it functions in practice in the world.

2.7.3 A politics of trusts law

The use of trusts to avoid tax and regulation

As is considered in Chapter 4 and in Chapter 21, trusts are commonly used in practice to avoid liability to tax. In particular complex trust structures are used in so-called ‘offshore jurisdictions’ and ‘tax havens’ to shelter the money of the rich from taxation and to shelter the assets of international criminal enterprises from regulatory oversight. A politics of trusts law would have to account, ironically, for the way in which structures which are built on conscience are used to facilitate crime and to avoid taxation. There are trusts practitioners whose sole role is to help their clients to use trusts to avoid taxation and consequently to prevent hospitals from being built, schools from being fully staffed, and universities from being fully funded in their home jurisdictions. The attitude of clients seeking to shelter their assets can be summed up by the attitude of the haute bourgeois Forsyte family in John Galsworthy’s The Man of Property:

... no Forsyte had as yet died; they did not die; death being contrary to their principles, they took precautions against it, the instinctive precautions of highly vitalized persons who resent encroachments on their property.¹⁷⁸

What is particularly significant here is the resentment at the idea of encroachments on their property. Such encroachments would include the claims of Her Majesty’s Revenue and Customs before and after death,¹⁷⁹ ordinary creditors ranging from the greengrocer to significant trade creditors, other family members or former spouses, and for the super-rich in the modern world also law enforcement agencies and statutory regulators. The trust has long been the means by which the wealthy have sought to protect their property from outsiders, 178 J Galsworthy, The Man of Property, being Book 1 of The Forsyte Saga, Vol 1 of The Forsyte Chronicles (originally published by William Heineman, 1906; republished in Penguin Classics, 2001, p 12).

179 Similarly, in PG Wodehouse’s novels and stories about Bertie Wooster and his valet Jeeves, there is regularly the mood music of Bertie’s uncle, Tom Travers, protesting about the incursions of the Inland Revenue on his inherited wealth.

to invest their money profitably, and to minimise their liability to tax: all of these objectives being dependent on the flexibility of the trust concept.

Tax havens and their role in international crime

One example of this sort of trust is known as an ‘asset protection trust’. The expression ‘asset protection trust’ refers to a set of techniques which are used to put assets beyond the reach of creditors, taxing authorities, regulators and others so that they are ‘protected’ from those people. Commonly, clients seeking to use asset protection trusts are either resident in high tax jurisdictions (such as the UK or the USA) or they are seeking to avoid regulatory or governmental oversight. A trust is used in this context so that the beneficial ownership of the target assets, which might otherwise be at risk, is obscured or allocated in such a way that the claimants will not be able to seize or interfere with those assets. It is a key part of the nature of any ordinary trust that a single item of property can be subjected to the rights of a variety of different legal and equitable owners such that each one of those owners can have different qualities of right in relation to the same item of property. An asset protection trust relies heavily on the malleability of the trust device.

Governments in developed countries began to grow impatient with these tax havens both from the perspective of the cost to their own exchequers and also in the light of concerns about global terrorism and other international criminal activities. Consequently, many of these ‘tax havens’ were affected directly in recent years by a renewed focus on the fiscal and national security consequences in the developed world of the tax advantages offered to wealthy investors by financial service providers in these tax havens (often subsidiaries of large investment firms and banks). Of particular concern is that international terrorist and other criminal organisations use trusts and other products in these jurisdictions to fund their activities.

The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) has used four criteria to identify a ‘tax haven’. First, the levying of no or only nominal taxes. Second, a lack of transparency so as to prevent the open and consistent implementation of tax laws and the preparation of appropriate accounting information. Third, the absence of laws or administrative practices which prevent the giving of relevant information (about no tax or only nominal tax being levied) to the appropriate agencies of other governments or supra-national bodies. Fourth, the absence of any substantial activities being carried on in the tax haven itself by entities which have the protection of that jurisdiction’s laws (which in itself indicates that the jurisdiction is operating its practices solely to attract investment capital from those wishing to avoid regulatory oversight elsewhere).¹⁸⁰ The asset protection trust usually does nothing and the trustees may in reality be in London or New York, but the laws of that tax haven may permit the trust to be treated as though it is resident in that jurisdiction for tax and other purposes.

An important part of this development in the treatment of tax havens was the effect of two OECD reports. The first identified a list of thirty-eight ‘unco-operative tax havens’. Those jurisdictions were cajoled into changing their laws, and into beefing up their regulatory arrangements and so forth as a result. No jurisdiction wanted to be identified as being a haven for criminal and other activities because there were political consequences from being treated in that way. Many commentators doubt that these changes have had a significant impact on the use of these trusts in practice.¹⁸¹ The second report, which has been updated annually since 2000 under the title Towards Global Tax Co-operation,¹⁸² surveys the tax and trusts laws and the administrative practices of a growing number of jurisdictions, not just those which were considered to be transparent in relation to the assets and activities within their jurisdictions. Thirty-five jurisdictions¹⁸³ which were originally identified on the OECD list in 1998 as being ‘unco-operative tax havens’ have since given undertakings¹⁸⁴ to implement transparency standards and to engage in the exchange of information with other jurisdictions for tax purposes.¹⁸⁵ The other jurisdictions have negotiated different treatment with the OECD.

¹⁸⁰ This fourth criterion was dropped in 2001.

The impact on real people

The impact of using trusts to avoid tax and regulation is a reduction in the amount of money which is available to the public exchequer, an increase in ability of international criminal organisations to fund themselves secretly, and the consequent impact on social life in countries like the UK where hospitals cannot be funded, schools fall into disrepair, and the threat of terrorism dominates our politics.

However, the effect of trusts practice can be even more visceral and direct than that. For example, The Guardian newspaper ran a truly disturbing article on 17 October 2007, by Ashley Seager and James Lewis, under the headline ‘How top London law firms help vulture funds devour their prey’, accompanied by a genuinely frightening photograph of an emaciated child appearing to rest its head on the ground in fatigue while in the background a vulture sat on the bare earth watching. The article laid bare the way in which a particular kind of investment fund – so-called ‘vulture funds’¹⁸⁶ – invested in ‘distressed sovereign debt’,¹⁸⁷ particularly the debt of countries in equatorial Africa. Typically this would be extremely poor countries, like Zambia at the time, which needed the money for the poor and starving in their own countries but which were obliged to pay high rates of interest on their borrowings. This practice involved buying the bonds issued by countries which later announced that they could not make repayments on those bonds: the bonds are therefore very cheap indeed and investors are keen to off-load them. The buyers of these bonds then litigate aggressively to seek pay-outs on those bonds in the hope of realising more money than the purchase price of the bonds. It was by using anonymous trust fund structures that financial institutions would buy up the investors’ rights to those bonds. The net effect is that countries which are in real trouble – with people suffering from famine and disease – end up 181 See Hudson, 2011 on asset protection trusts.

182 Towards Global Tax Co-operation 2010, OECD Publishing, 2010.

183 An original group of 38 jurisdictions had previously been identified as being non-co-operative ‘tax havens’ by the OECD in 1998.

184 Albeit that four of those jurisdictions did not do so at first: Andorra, Liechtenstein, Liberia and Monaco; and three other jurisdictions have been removed from the list of unco-operative tax havens: Barbados, Maldives and Tonga.

185 See www.oecd.org.

186 Hence the vulture being used in the picture accompanying the article.

187 As explained in the text, that is borrowings by a country which announces it cannot make repayment.

spending money which should be spent on helping their poor and their sick on making repayments to vulture funds on these bonds. It really is the unacceptable face of capitalism.

Unregulated trusts in these circumstances can become the vehicles for visiting misery on real people. The absence of conscience in this sort of activity is clearly stark. That a vehicle created originally in a court of conscience could be used for this sort of activity would seem like something from an internet conspiracy theory, if it were not for the fact that there are people in the City of London, on Wall Street, in Paris, Frankfurt and Tokyo, calmly planning to do this sort of thing every day of the week. This was a rare journalistic account of something which one knows anecdotally is going on all the time. It serves as a useful introduction into the geopolitics behind even the most banal areas of trusts law.

Another important example of a rule with international significance within English trusts law is the law surrounding the ancient ‘beneficiary principle’, discussed in Chapter 4, where the issue of international trusts law is probed, as it is again in Chapter 21. The financial institutions which operate these trust funds argue that the technical ‘beneficiary principle’ should be jettisoned so as to make their tax avoidance activities easier to organise and to market. In essence, it is a technical rule of trusts law which stands between the tax avoiders resident in the UK and their goal of salting their property offshore beyond the reach of Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs. Consequently, there is a lobbying effort underway to convince English judges that this principle of trusts law should be changed. There have even been weekend conferences organised at which lowly textbook authors like myself have been encouraged by wealthy tax avoidance specialists from exotic offshore territories to argue against the continued existence of those rules. Before launching into a consideration of the law of trusts, as we do in earnest in the next chapter, it is important to understand the context in which trusts operate in practice in the real world, and to understand the political context in which this otherwise seemingly apolitical field of law operates.

Part 2

Express trusts

This page intentionally left blank

Certainty in the creation of express trusts

3.1 INTRODUCTION	89
3.1.1 The relationship of settlor, trustee and beneficiary	89
3.1.2 The settlor	89
3.1.3 The trustee	90
3.1.4 The beneficiary	91
3.2 THE THREE CERTAINTIES	91
3.3 CERTAINTY OF INTENTION	92
3.3.1 What form of intention?	92
3.3.2 Moral obligations or trusts?	106
3.3.3 Intention to create a trust, not something else	109
3.3.4 How to identify an intention to create an express trust	112
3.3.5 Analysing the possible interpretations of transfers of property	114
3.4 CERTAINTY OF SUBJECT MATTER	116
3.4.1 Introduction	116
3.4.2 The application of the orthodox approach	118
3.4.3 An exception for fungible or for intangible property?	120
3.4.4 Certainty of subject matter in testamentary and other trusts	129
3.4.5 Certainty of subject matter, insolvency and the law of finance	131
3.4.6 A question as to which property needs to be segregated	142
3.5 CERTAINTY OF OBJECTS	145
3.5.1 Introduction	145
3.5.2 Fixed trusts	149
3.5.3 Fiduciary mere powers: the power of appointment	150
3.5.4 Discretionary trust	155
3.5.5 Personal powers	160
3.5.6 Bare trusts	163
3.5.7 Understanding the different approaches in the cases	164
3.5.8 Some particular words and expressions causing uncertainty	165
3.5.9 Resolving the uncertainty: use of an expert or trustee discretion	167
3.5.10 The various forms of uncertainty	172
3.5.11 Conclusion	176

OVERVIEW

The main principles underlying this area of law are as follows:

*To create a valid trust, the terms of that trust must be sufficiently certain. There are three forms of certainty which the courts require: certainty of intention to create a trust; certainty as to the subject matter comprising the trust fund; and certainty of the beneficiaries (or 'objects') of the trust or power in question:*¹

- (a) The settlor's intention to create a trust, as opposed to something else, must be clear. There is no requirement to use a specific form of words when dealing with trusts over property² other than land.³ The court will be prepared to infer an intention to create a trust from the circumstances and the parties' conduct.⁴ The same principles apply in relation to domestic, private situations as in relation to the insolvencies of large financial institutions.
- (b) The trust fund must be identifiable.⁵ A trust in which the trust property is mixed with other property, so that it is impossible to identify precisely which property is held on trust, will be invalid.⁶ However, exceptionally, it may be that where the property is intangible property made up of identical units (such as ordinary shares of the same class), it may not be necessary to segregate the trust property from other property.⁷ This exception is doubted by many academics. Recent cases in the wake of the collapse of US investment bank Lehman Brothers have put these competing principles at centre-stage in the largest corporate insolvency in history.
- (c) To identify the beneficiaries, it is first necessary to identify the nature of the power which is being exercised. In relation to fiduciary mere powers and in relation to discretionary trusts, it is required that it is possible to say of any person claiming to be a beneficiary that that person is or is not a member of the class of beneficiaries.⁸ Some exceptional cases have taken the view that the trust may be valid where it is possible to say that a substantial number of people do or do not fall within the class of beneficiaries.⁹ In relation to a fixed trust, it is necessary to be able to draw up a complete list of all the beneficiaries.¹⁰ There appears to be a distinction between failure of a trust on grounds of uncertainty as to the concept used to identify the class of beneficiaries, problems of proving yourself to be a beneficiary, problems of locating beneficiaries and problems of administrative

1 Knight v Knight (1840) 3 Beav 148; Knight v Boughton (1840) 11 Cl & Fin 513.

2 M'Fadden v Jenkyns (1842) 12 LJ Ch 146.

3 Law of Property Act 1925, s 53(1)(b).

4 Paul v Constance [1977] 1 WLR 527.

5 Re London Wine Co (Shippers) Ltd [1986] PCC 121; MacJordan Construction Ltd v Brookmount Erostin Ltd [1992] BCLC 350; Re Goldcorp [1995] 1 AC 74; Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669; see section 3.4 below.

6 Ibid.

7 Hunter v Moss [1994] 1 WLR 452; Re Harvard Securities Ltd [1997] 2 BCLC 369.

8 Re Gulbenkian [1968] Ch 126; McPhail v Doulton [1970] 2 WLR 1110.

9 Re Baden (No 2) [1973] Ch 9.

10 IRC v Broadway Cottages Trust [1955] 2 WLR 552.

*unworkability*¹¹ – only the first and last categories appear to invalidate the trust necessarily. Personal powers, on the authorities, will not be void for lack of certainty of objects. The case law has dealt with a variety of words and expressions which commonly cause uncertainty, as considered in this chapter.

3.1 INTRODUCTION

When creating an express trust, it is important that the settlor act with sufficient certainty. There are three certainties required for the creation of a valid express trust.¹² The settlor must demonstrate a clear intention to create a trust as opposed to creating something else;¹³ the trust property must be sufficiently segregated from other property so that the trust fund is certain;¹⁴ and the people who are to benefit from the trust must also be identified with sufficient certainty.¹⁵ These forms of certainty are commonly referred to, respectively, as certainty of intention, certainty of subject matter and certainty of objects. Without such certainty, the trust will be held to be void. When considering express trusts – that is, situations in which the settlor intends to create a trust – we should recognise that there will be cases in which the court may analyse the actions of the settlor as evidencing an intention to create an express trust even though she might not have understood that that was what she was doing.¹⁶ Thus, when we talk about express trusts, we are concerned with any situation in which the settlor performs actions with an intention which equity will analyse as disclosing a sufficiently certain intention to create a trust.

3.1.1 The relationship of settlor, trustee and beneficiary

In the creation of an express trust, there is a relationship created between the three different capacities under the trust: settlor, trustee and beneficiary. This relationship has been considered already above in Chapter 2. The central question considered in this chapter is the certainty that is necessary before an express trust will be said to exist.

3.1.2 The settlor

The settlor does not have any further role to play in relation to the trust, in her capacity as settlor, once a valid trust has been created.¹⁷ Of course, that does not mean that the person who created the trust cannot have a role; rather, that person cannot have a role as settlor. So, the person who acted as settlor may also appoint herself to be one of the trustees of the trust. This is another reminder of the importance of distinguishing between the individuals involved and the precise capacities in which they are acting from time to time. The person who acted as settlor can therefore not have a further role as settlor once the trust has been created. That person's role may now only be in the capacity of a trustee or a beneficiary, or possibly both.

11 McPhail v Doulton [1970] 2 WLR 1110; see para 3.5.4 below.

12 Morice v Bishop of Durham (1805) 10 Ves 522, at 539, per Lord Eldon.

13 Knight v Knight (1840) 3 Beav 148; Knight v Boughton (1840) 11 Cl & Fin 513.

14 Re London Wine Co (Shippers) Ltd [1986] PCC 121.

15 IRC v Broadway Cottages Trust [1955] 2 WLR 552; Re Gulbenkian [1968] Ch 126; McPhail v Doulton [1970] 2 WLR 1110.

16 Paul v Constance [1977] 1 WLR 527 – as considered in section 3.3.

17 Paul v Paul (1882) 20 Ch D 742.

In considering whether or not a trust has been created, it is important to uncover an intention on the part of the settlor to create a trust. To that extent, the behaviour and the words of the settlor may continue to have significance after the date at which a trust is said to have been created because it may show what her intention had been. As has been said in Chapter 2 above, the settlor may choose to create a trust with professional legal advice perhaps as part of creating a will, or as part of a complex commercial transaction. This conscious decision to create a trust will be comparatively straightforward – this chapter will consider the necessary manifestation of intention in such circumstances. However, the more difficult cases are those in which a person deals with her property in ignorance of the law of trusts but where she performs actions which the law of trusts would define as being a declaration of trust. In such situations, the actions of the settlor will be unconscious as to their precise legal character. For example, a person may say ‘I intend this money to be as much yours as mine’, and therefore indicate to a court that she intends to create a trust even though she is ignorant that that would be the legal effect of her actions.¹⁸

3.1.3 The trustee

For the trustee, there is the problem of knowing whether or not a trust has been created so that she is subject to the fiduciary duties of a trustee. The essence of the rules on certainty considered below is that the court must be certain as to the nature of the trustee’s obligations so that the court is able to oversee them. As considered in Chapter 2 above, it is perfectly possible for a settlor to declare herself to be one of the trustees (or the sole trustee) of property of which she is also one of the beneficiaries. For example, if Anne wishes to declare a trust over money which she has won on the National Lottery for the benefit of herself and her family, it is possible for Anne to declare the trust (and therefore be settlor) such that she is sole trustee of the money for the benefit of herself and her children in equal shares.

In relation to a trust created as part of a complex commercial transaction, it will typically be the case that the trustees will be professionals (perhaps lawyers or accountants, or alternatively bankers) who are paid to act as trustees and who hold themselves out as having expertise in the management of trust money. In that situation, the precise terms of the trustees’ obligations will usually have been set out in a trust instrument.¹⁹ The trustees can therefore be very confident of what is expected of them. Unless there were some error in the drafting of the terms of the trust, it would be unusual for there to be much uncertainty in such a case.

However, where an ordinary member of the public, perhaps a grandmother, gives money to her son, saying ‘I want you to keep this money to buy my grandchildren a new bicycle each for Christmas’, the law may consider that to be a declaration of trust. The son would be deemed to be a trustee holding the money on the terms of a trust in favour of the grandchildren as beneficiaries. In such a situation, the son would not know what to do if, for example, one of the children was adamant that she did not want a bicycle but rather wanted a pair of in-line skates. Would the terms of the trust permit such a deviation from the grandmother’s express instructions? In such a situation, without a fully drafted trust there would be uncertainty as to the precise nature of the trustee’s obligations.

18 Paul v Constance [1977] 1 WLR 527.

19 Eg, Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241. See the discussion of Trustee Act 2000 in this context in Chapter 8.

Furthermore, the trustee would not know what he was supposed to do with the money between receiving it from the grandmother and buying the Christmas presents. Would he be obliged to invest the money and generate the best possible return for the grandchildren as beneficiaries? This would be the obligation on a trustee in ordinary circumstances,²⁰ but it is unclear whether that principle ought to apply in this particular circumstance. A well-drafted trust instrument will make all of this clear: whereas informally created trusts will leave such matters to the court's interpretation. The Trustee Act 1925 and the Trustee Act 2000, considered in Part 3 of this book, provide the obligations which will be implied in such circumstances. For the moment, however, we will focus on how trusts come into existence. (A 'trust instrument' is a document containing all the terms of a trust; although, as will be explained in Chapter 5, no written instrument is required to create an express trust in ordinary circumstances.)

Therefore, as we consider more and more examples of express trusts, we will ask ourselves about the nature of the obligations which are imposed on the trustees and whether those obligations should be identical in all circumstances. Usually the answer will be found by analysing the precise terms in which the settlor expressed her intention.

3.1.4 The beneficiary

For the beneficiary, it is similarly important to be certain as to the existence and the terms of the trust. The rights owned by the beneficiary are best understood as being both powers to control the use of the trust fund by the trustee²¹ and as constituting property rights in the trust fund under the principle in Saunders v Vautier.²² That principle entitles the beneficiaries under a trust, provided that they constitute the entire beneficial interest in the trust fund and that they are all sui juris (that is, of suitable age and competence to act), to call for the trust fund to be transferred to them absolutely. Clearly, this power is capable of being exercised only in circumstances in which it is possible to know who all of the beneficiaries are.²³ Nevertheless, this principle establishes that the beneficiaries do have proprietary rights in the trust fund itself, and not simply personal claims against the trustees.

Similarly, it is important that the trustees know the identity of the beneficiaries. For the courts, it is essential that the trust discloses both the identity of the beneficiaries and the terms on which those beneficiaries are entitled to take rights in the trust fund. Without such certainty, it would be impossible to control the conduct of the business of the trust.²⁴

3.2 THE THREE CERTAINTIES

There are three forms of certainty which the courts require for the creation of a valid express trust: certainty of intention to create a trust; certainty as to the subject matter comprising the trust fund; and certainty of the beneficiaries (or 'objects') of the trust.

²⁰ Cowan v Scargill [1985] Ch 270.

²¹ Morice v Bishop of Durham (1805) 10 Ves 522; Re Denley's Will Trusts [1969] 1 Ch 373.

²² (1841) 4 Beav 115.

²³ The ramifications of the rule in Saunders v Vautier are considered below at para 4.1.2.

²⁴ Section 3.5 below.

English law has a great affection for certainty: judges are concerned that the law promotes certainty in contracts, trusts and other dealings between persons. In terms of the trust specifically, the judges' concern is that the settlor makes her intention sufficiently certain so that the court will be able to direct the trustees how to act if there are problems with the administration of the trust. For the court to be able to make such directions, it is essential that it be certain:

- (a) that the settlor intended to create a trust ('certainty of intention');
- (b) which property is to comprise the trust fund ('certainty of subject matter'); and
- (c) who the beneficiaries are ('certainty of objects').²⁵

These forms of certainty are considered in turn in the sections which follow.

3.3 CERTAINTY OF INTENTION

It must be certain that the settlor intended to create a trust rather than to impose a merely moral obligation or to make a gift or do some other act which was not a trust. There is no requirement to use a specific form of words for trusts over personal property, although there are formalities for the creation of trusts over land. Therefore, given that there is no particular form of words which are to be used, the court will consider what the relevant parties' intentions were and will then find a trust if that satisfies those parties' intentions. The court will be prepared to infer an intention to create a trust from the circumstances of the case and from the parties' conduct. In short, if the owner of property demonstrates an intention either to share the beneficial ownership of property with some other person while remaining the owner at law of that property, or if the owner of property passes common law title in that property to some third party with the intention that beneficial ownership of it be held for some other person, then it is likely that there will be a trust inferred.

3.3.1 What form of intention?

Conscious creation of a trust

It is important that the settlor intends to create a trust as opposed to creating merely a gift or some other device.²⁶ The simplest manifestation of that intention would be for the settlor to take advice from a solicitor and sign a formal declaration of trust in the form of a deed.²⁷ Such a written manifestation of a trust is referred to as a 'trust instrument'. As considered in 25 Knight v Knight (1840) 3 Beav 148, per Lord Langdale.

26 Milroy v Lord (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

27 However, to remind ourselves that matters may be simple and that words may simply be taken to mean what they appear to mean on their face, the Australian High Court held in Byrnes and another v Kendle [2011] HCA 26, 14 ITEL R 299 that the use of the term 'trust' by a husband in dealing with the matrimonial home indicated that he had intended to create a trust over it to the effect that he and his wife were tenants in common of it in equity. In that case a husband was somewhat disingenuously contending that he had not intended to create a trust which would benefit his former wife when clearly he had been. Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, s 1.

Chapter 5, the creation of a written instrument will not be necessary in many cases,²⁸ but it does make it easy to prove that there is a trust.²⁹ A verbal expression of an intention to create a trust will be sufficient.³⁰ In such a situation, if the settlor consciously intended to create a trust, then there is no difficulty in establishing that there was sufficient certainty of intention.³¹ The more difficult situations are where a settlor unknowingly behaves in a way which might have created a trust, or where the settlor leaves her intention ambiguous in the terms of a will or other document.

Express trusts based on inference by the court

The best example of this difficult situation is Paul v Constance.³² Mr Constance left his wife to live with Mrs Paul. Constance received a court award of £950 for an injury suffered at work, subsequent to which Constance and Paul decided to set up a joint bank account. After visiting the bank, they were advised that the account should be set up in the name of Constance alone because the couple were not married. Therefore, Constance was the common law owner of the account. The £950 lump sum was paid into the account and formed the bulk of the money held in it. The couple also added joint bingo winnings to the account, and used some of the money to pay for a joint holiday. Importantly, evidence was also adduced at trial that Constance had said to Paul ‘this money is as much yours as mine’.

Constance died. His wife sought to claim that the bank account belonged entirely to her deceased husband and that it therefore passed to her as his widow under the Intestacy Rules. Paul argued that the money was held on trust by Constance, as legal owner of the bank account, for both Constance and Paul as beneficiaries. Therefore, Paul argued, the bank account should pass to her as sole surviving beneficiary. The litigation was therefore the staple of soap operas: the spurned wife fighting against the new lover.

The court held that Constance had declared a trust over the money in the bank account. The reasoning was that the words ‘the money is as much yours as mine’ manifested sufficient intention that Constance would hold the property on trust for them both. Furthermore, that the couple had treated the money in the account as joint money was taken to be evidence of the intention to create a trust.

An interesting point arises from this case as an example of the law of express trusts. The court held that the trust was an express trust even though, in the words of the court, Constance was a man of ‘unsophisticated character’ who did not know he was creating a trust. In other words, you can create an express trust without knowing that there is a legal concept of trust. Instead, the court will consider your conduct and your ‘real’ intention in deciding whether or not you can be taken to have intended the creation of something which the court would interpret as being a trust. As Scarman LJ said, the words Constance did use, that the money was 28 There are, however, statutory exceptions which do require signed writing to create a trust, as discussed in Chapter 5, such as trusts of land: Law of Property 1925, s 53(1)(b).

29 See section 5.1 below.

30 For a demonstration that a verbal statement will be sufficient to create a trust, see Moore v Williamson [2011] EWHC 672 (Ch), [2011] 2 P&CR DG25 in which verbal assurances that a trust would be created over half the equity in a business were held to be sufficient to create a trust.

31 See, eg, Slamon v Planchon [2004] 4 All ER 407, [2004] EWCA Civ 799, where a trust was expressly declared over a property, in relation to the Leasehold and Urban Development Act 1993, s 10.

32 [1977] 1 WLR 527.

as much hers as his, 'convey clearly a present declaration that the existing fund was as much the plaintiff's as his own'.³³

There are other cases which illustrate the English view that the court is uncovering an express trust rather than imposing a constructive trust. In Re Kayford,³⁴ a mail order company used to receive money from customers buying items from their catalogues before those items were sent to the customers. The customers therefore bore the risk that they had paid their money but that they might not receive the items for which they had paid. The mail order company realised that it was in danger of insolvency and therefore segregated all of its customer prepayments into a distinct bank account. Money was moved from that bank account only once the item had been sent to the customer. When the company did go into insolvency, the issue arose whether the money belonged to the company (and therefore would be distributed among the company's creditors) or whether it was held on trust for the customers (and therefore could be returned to them). The court held that the company's intention was to create a trust over the prepayments which had been manifested by transferring those prepayments into a separate bank account so as to shield them from the insolvency. This case illustrates the important role which the trust plays in protecting the beneficiary against the possibility of insolvency on the part of the trustee. The company, as legal owner of the bank account, was trustee. The customers were beneficiaries in the period between making a prepayment and receiving their items. Again, an express trust is uncovered from the parties' actions, without needing any conscious intention to create an express trust.

The finding of an intention to create a trust is based on the surrounding circumstances

In the previous section we saw that the court may infer the existence of sufficient certainty of intention to create an express trust from the circumstances, even if the parties involved were unaware that their actions would be interpreted by a court as suggesting an intention to create a trust. By extension from the previous discussion, the court may look at all the surrounding circumstances and decide that, on the facts, there is insufficient intention to create a trust. So, in Jones v Lock,³⁵ a father returned home from a business trip to Birmingham. He was scolded by his wife for not bringing back a present for his infant son. In what appears to have been a fit of pique, he went upstairs, wrote a cheque out in favour of himself as payee, came back downstairs, shouted 'Look you here, I give this to the baby', and thrust the cheque into the baby's hand. The issue arose whether there was a trust created over the cheque (or the money represented by the cheque) for the benefit of the baby. It was found that there had not been a perfect gift of the cheque (because it was made out in the father's name without having been endorsed in favour of the baby). The court held further that there was nothing to indicate an intention to create a trust of the cheque. Rather, the father's intention was either to make a gift, or simply to make a point to his wife (in which case he intended nothing at all). Lord Cranworth found that the argument for a trust was merely an attempt to circumvent the failure to make an effective gift by advancing an argument for a trust. Therefore, he held that this imperfect gift could not be made effective by other means and that there had been no intention to create a trust here.

33 An alternative approach, not used by the court in this case, could be that the court is imposing a constructive trust to prevent Paul being unjustly treated. This is closer to the way in which constructive trusts are used in the US, where they are seen as remedies to be used to reverse unjust enrichment. A US analysis of Paul v Constance might be that the wife would be unjustly enriched if Paul were denied her rights to the money in the bank account. (See the discussion in Chapter 31 and Helga Stoeckert v Margie Geddes [2004] UKPC 54.) Consequently, the US court could order the imposition of a constructive trust over the account to prevent any unconscionable denial of Mrs Paul's rights.

34 [1975] 1 WLR 279.

35 (1865) 1 Ch App 25.

This principle appears most clearly from the words of Jessel MR in Richards v Delbridge,³⁶ where he held that ‘If [a failed disposition] is intended to take effect by transfer [or ‘gift’], the court will not hold the intended transfer to operate as a declaration of trust, for then every imperfect instrument would be made effectual by being converted into a perfect trust’. In that case, a businessman decided to transfer his business outright to a member of his family and sought to demonstrate this intention by an endorsement on the lease over the business premises. The gift was never perfected and therefore it was argued unsuccessfully in favour of the proposed transferee that the business should be treated as having been held on trust for him. The court held that the failed gift would not be effected by means of inferring an intention to create a trust. Here the intention had been to make an outright transfer (or, a gift), and not a trust (whereby the businessman would have held the legal title and only passed the equitable interest to his relative).

The use of the word ‘trust’ in an instrument or in a statute will not necessarily mean that a court will deem that to be a trust;³⁷ although that will be a likely inference, particularly if one person is holding property for the benefit of another. Where the Law Society was obliged by statute to create a fund to hold moneys when exercising its regulatory powers over solicitors, it was held that this should be understood as constituting a trust over those funds for the Society’s statutory purposes and for the benefit of those entitled to the moneys.³⁸ This is the corollary of the principle in Paul v Constance: in that case it was found that even if the parties do not know what a ‘trust’ is, they may nevertheless be held to have created a trust if that is what a court would consider their intention to have meant; equally, just because parties do use the word ‘trust’ that does not mean that the court will necessarily find that they have created a trust if their true intention was really to do something else in legal terms. A close analysis of the circumstances of the case will be all-important. So, where r 43(3) of the Prison Rules 1999 obliges the governor of a prison to take all of a prisoner’s cash from her on incarceration in a prison, it has been held that this rule did not make the governor a trustee of that property for the benefit of that prisoner.³⁹ The rules, on a close reading of them, only required that the prisoner’s cash be paid into an account and credited to the prisoner: nothing in that wording suggested that the governor of the prison had the positive obligations of a trustee. Consequently, because there was no trust, the governor was not bound by any of the obligations usually incumbent on a trustee⁴⁰ to invest the trust property for the benefit of the beneficiary and so forth.⁴¹ Therefore, when one person is obliged to hold property for another, it will not always constitute that person a trustee, particularly if it is not the parties’ or the law’s intention that such a person be encumbered with the usual obligations imposed on a trustee.⁴²

36 (1874) LR 18 Eq 11.

37 Tito v Waddell (No 2) [1977] 1 Ch 106, 211, per Megarry V-C.

38 Re Ahmed & Co [2006] EWHC 480 (Ch).

39 Duggan v Governor of Full Sutton Prison [2003] 2 All ER 678.

40 See Chapter 8 generally in this regard.

41 This decision is interesting. It might have been held alternatively that the governor was a bare trustee for the prisoner so that the governor would not have been able to take any personal interest from the holding of cash.

42 The general duties imposed on a trustee are considered in Chapter 8.

The commercial context: whether or not there is sufficient certainty of intention

The courts will not only intervene to find the existence of an express trust in circumstances in which there are non-commercial people acting in their private capacities. While it may seem surprising, there are plenty of commercial situations in which the parties either do not turn their minds to the question whether or not there is an express trust declared over some property, or in which their commercial arrangements are so poorly constructed that it is impossible to know whether a trust was intended or not.⁴³ One example of the courts stepping in to decide whether the parties' intentions amounted to an intention to create an express trust is Re Kayford,⁴⁴ considered above,⁴⁵ in which case the parties' treatment of the property (segregating it into a separate bank account) led the court to decide that the best understanding of the company's intention was to declare a trust in favour of those customers who made prepayments. In that case Megarry J found that the parties' intention was to declare a trust over the money held in the separate bank account even though the parties did not explicitly declare a trust: rather, Megarry J analysed the circumstances and held that they disclosed something which a lawyer would consider to be an intention to create a trust.

The salient facts in Re Kayford, as explained by Megarry J, were these:⁴⁶

On 22nd November Monaco told the company that Monaco would have to go into liquidation unless it received further financial support. If this happened it would affect not only the company's ability to deliver the goods but also its solvency. The next day, 23 November, Mr Kay saw the company's accountants, who advised him to consult accountants specialising in matters of insolvency; and the same day Mr Wainwright of such a firm was consulted. He advised that a separate bank account should be opened by the company, to be called a 'Customers' Trust Deposit Account', and that all further moneys paid by customers for goods not yet delivered should be paid into this account and withdrawn only when the goods had been delivered. The object of doing this was so that if the company had to go into liquidation, these sums of money could and would be refunded to those who had paid them. This advice was accepted.

Megarry J considered that the question for him to answer was 'whether the money in the bank account . . . is held on trust for those who paid it, or whether it forms part of the general assets of the company'. As to the question of whether or not there would be any fraudulent preference under insolvency law, Megarry J held that: 'If one leaves on one side any case in which an insolvent company seeks to declare a trust in favour of creditors, one is concerned here with the question not of preferring creditors but of preventing those who pay money from becoming creditors, by making them beneficiaries under a trust.' As to the ease of finding the existence of an express trust in the circumstances, Megarry J held the following:

43 See eg Don King Productions Inc v Warren [2000] Ch 291.

44 [1975] 1 WLR 279.

45 See para 2.5.1 above. In OT Computers v First National Tricity Finance [2003] EWHC 1010 Pumfrey J held that where directors of a company, which later went into insolvency, had already created bank accounts with the purpose of paying money owed to suppliers into those accounts, then there was sufficient certainty to constitute a valid trust over those moneys held in those accounts, following Re Kayford.

46 [1975] 1 All ER 604, [1975] 1 WLR 279.

In *Re Nanwa Gold Mines Ltd*⁴⁷ the money was sent on the faith of a promise to keep it in a separate account, but there is nothing in that case or in any other authority that I know of to suggest that this is essential. I feel no doubt that here a trust was created. From the outset the advice (which was accepted) was to establish a trust account at the bank. The whole purpose of what was done was to ensure that the moneys remained in the beneficial ownership of those who sent them, and a trust is the obvious means of achieving this. No doubt the general rule is that if you send money to a company for goods which are not delivered, you are merely a creditor of the company unless a trust has been created. The sender may create a trust by using appropriate words when he sends the money (though I wonder how many do this, even if they are equity lawyers), or the company may do it by taking suitable steps on or before receiving the money. If either is done, the obligations in respect of the money are transformed from contract to property, from debt to trust. Payment into a separate bank account is a useful (though by no means conclusive) indication of an intention to create a trust, but of course there is nothing to prevent the company from binding itself by a trust even if there are no effective banking arrangements.

Thus all that was needed to establish an intention to create a trust was an intention to keep the beneficial ownership of the money for the benefit of the customer. The company receiving the money must take ‘suitable steps on or before receiving the money’ to establish a trust.

We come now to a somewhat unsatisfactory decision of the High Court just before Christmas 2006 on ostensibly similar facts: Re Farepak Food and Gifts Ltd.⁴⁸ This case dealt with a set of circumstances which were very similar to those in Re Kayford but the decision in Re Kayford was not cited before Mann J. Therefore, we must treat this decision with caution because it was decided per incuriam the judgment of Megarry J in Re Kayford, but it does nevertheless give us a different approach to the question of dealing with insolvent companies which purport to create a separate bank account for moneys received after the insolvency.

The Farepak litigation became, briefly, a cause célèbre in the British press in the lead-up to Christmas 2006. It was a Christmas story in which Scrooge seemed to win out, if you believe the tabloid account of the story.⁴⁹ The facts, briefly put, were as follows. Many thousands of low-income families participated in a Christmas fund whereby they contributed a few pounds each month throughout the calendar year so that they would have saved up a large amount by November to spend on Christmas presents, festive foodstuffs and so on. The Christmas food could be taken in the form of a Christmas hamper or presents provided by means of shopping vouchers. The Christmas fund was therefore a pool of shared moneys contributed by the various customers.⁵⁰ The Christmas fund was managed by a company, Farepak Food and Gifts

47 [1955] 3 All ER 219, [1955] 1 WLR 1080.

48 [2006] EWHC 3272 (Ch), [2007] 2 BCLC 1, [2006] All ER (D) 265 (Dec).

49 Much of the coverage in the Press centred on the question whether or not Farepak’s bankers should have made good many of the losses suffered by its customer but for which it was not responsible. It seemed that the Press expected that, in a fit of Christmas cheer, the bank would step in to repay its customer – and in turn its many ordinary customers – what it had lost. It is not ordinarily the case that banks – or moneylenders like Scrooge – operate as charities in this manner. Such turned out to be the case in this instance.

50 I shall refer to this arrangement as a ‘Christmas fund’ although in truth it was a business operated commercially but a number of questions arise as to the nature of this club.

Ltd (hereafter 'Farepak').⁵¹ Farepak went into insolvency. Farepak's directors decided to cease trading on 11 October 2006. Farepak went into insolvent administration on 13 October 2006. Before its insolvency, attempts were made to create a new bank account into which any further customer contributions to the Christmas fund would be paid so as to keep those further contributions separate from the other assets of Farepak. The principal question was whether or not these funds were to be deemed to be held on trust for the customers who contributed them. The background to the hearing of the case is interesting: the case was heard in one day before Mann J on 15 December and judgment was delivered on 18 December. It is important to note that this case came on as a matter of urgency before Mann J, with little time for the preparation of argument and little time for the delivery of judgment, because the parties' were seeking to have administration of this part of the Christmas fund decided before Christmas.⁵²

It was argued in front of Mann J that the pattern of behaviour by the directors of Farepak and their purported declaration of trust constituted an express trust. There were two issues on the facts: one referring to whether or not there was sufficient certainty as to the property which was to be held on trust⁵³ which is referred to below, and the other relating to difficulty of finding the existence of an intention to create an express trust in a context in which there was an insolvency. It is this second problem with which we are concerned here. On the facts of the case Mann J held that it would be 'an obstacle at a practical level'⁵⁴ to enforcing such an express trust because that trust would be to elevate the status of the customers who paid amounts into the fund after administration into preferred creditors.

Personally, I fail to see the difficulty. There are three questions here. First, was there an express trust created? If there was such a trust created, then the customers who paid into the fund after administration began were 'preferred creditors'⁵⁵ not because of some unfair advantage they were given after the event but because a valid trust had been created in their favour. The second question⁵⁶ was really whether or not there was any point of insolvency law which should avoid such an express trust which was created after the company had ceased trading. The third question – which might disallow the finding of an express trust – was whether or not there was sufficient certainty of subject matter and sufficient certainty of objects. That is, on the facts is it sufficiently clear which customers' money was paid into the Christmas fund after administration began? If not – either through evidential uncertainty of beneficiaries or evidential uncertainty of subject matter – then the trust would be void. But the avoidance of the trust would not be void simply because of some queasiness about 51 Farepak retained the services of a large number of agents throughout the country. These agents were ordinary members of the public who sought the custom, for the most part, of friends and work colleagues. Thus, for the most part, the ultimate customers were members of the public who paid their contributions to people who were usually their friends or work colleagues, who in turn acted as agents of Farepak. It was made clear by Mann J that these 'Agents', as they were referred to in the customers' agreements with Farepak, were Farepak's agents and were not acting as agents for the customers.

52 [2006] All ER (D) 265 (Dec), [7] and [8].

53 The principal problem on the facts, as held by Mann J, was that the bank account into which the moneys were paid was incorrectly identified on the face of the trust instrument. However, Mann J held that on the facts this was a situation in which the trust instrument should be rectified and the correct account substituted for the incorrect one: following Re Butlin [1976] Ch 251.

54 [2006] All ER (D) 265 (Dec), [52].

55 A 'preferred creditor' is someone who has a right to specific property in the possession or control of an insolvent person when that person goes into insolvency, and so that preferred (or, 'secured') creditor is entitled to take that property regardless of the insolvency proceedings.

56 At which Mann J was prodding in para 52 of his judgment.

converting these post-administration customers from unsecured to preferred creditors. Rather, if the express trust was validly created on 11 December, then all of the post-insolvency customers were preferred creditors by dint of being beneficiaries under an express trust at the moment they paid money to the company. There is no question of reclassifying them as preferred creditors: rather, the court would have been realising for the first time that they had been secured creditors ever since 11 December.

The most unsatisfactory factor here is the omission of any mention of Re Kayford which is the most valuable authority in relation to the existence of an express trust in situations such as this. Setting up a separate bank account, as in the Re Farepak case, achieves the creation of an express trust in the opinion of Megarry J in Re Kayford. Suitable steps in creating a trust may take the form of setting up a separate bank account coupled with an intention to create a trust: on the facts of the Re Farepak case there was such an intention clearly manifested by the declaration of trust as well as the creation of a separate bank account. Therefore, it is suggested that, on the authority of Re Kayford, an express trust should have been found in Re Farepak.⁵⁷

Another example of a question about certainty of intention was the case of Don King Productions Inc v Warren.⁵⁸ This case involved two famous boxing promoters. Don King was the leading boxing promoter in the USA and Frank Warren was the leading boxing promoter and manager in Europe. The two men formed a partnership agreement whereby they, and the companies which they controlled, agreed to exploit agreements with boxers in Europe for their mutual advantage. Under the terms of the 1890 Partnership Act and under the general English law on partnership, an ordinary partnership is not a separate legal person: rather, a partnership is a contractual agreement between persons to share profits and losses as part of a business enterprise.⁵⁹ Under the partnership agreements entered into in Don King v Warren, each partner was required to hold the benefit of any existing or future management agreements for the benefit of the partnership. Subsequently, one or more of the partners attempted to terminate the partnership agreement and sought to argue that certain management agreements did not fall to be included in the partnership property. The question arose whether the partners held the benefit of their management agreements on trust for the partnership.

For Frank Warren it was argued (on this point) that some of the management agreements were expressly provided not to be assignable and that the parties' intentions had not been to hold all agreements on trust for the partnership in any event, or certainly not after Warren's purported termination of the agreement. It was held by Lightman J at first instance that despite any particular provisions in the management contracts themselves, the intentions of the parties had been to hold the benefit derived from any such contracts on trust for the partnership. Thus, even though the contracts themselves were expressed to have been incapable of transfer (and so prima facie to have been incapable of forming the subject matter of a trust), it was held that any benefit received from them could be the subject matter of a trust 57 In a later case arising from the same facts, Re Farepak Food and Gifts Ltd (in liquidation); Power and another (joint liquidators of Farepak Food and Gifts Ltd) v Revenue and Customs Commissioners and another [2009] EWHC 2580 (Ch), [2010] 1 BCLC 444, it is taken by Warren J that Mann J in Re Farepak Food and Gifts Ltd [2006] EWHC 3272 (Ch) had imposed a constructive trust, whereas on a closer reading of his judgment he did not (see [2006] EWHC 3272 (Ch) at [43] and [44]): rather, Mann J clearly would have liked to have imposed a constructive trust but he felt that Nestlé Oy and the complexities of the case in front of him constrained him from doing that; he consciously 'regrets' the conclusion to which he is required to come in para [44].

58 [1998] 2 All ER 608, per Lightman J; affirmed [2000] Ch 291, CA.

59 Partnership Act 1890, s 1: that is, 'the relation which subsists between persons carrying on a business in common with a view of profit'.

and that this partnership arrangement evinced sufficient intention to create a trust. Lightman J made repeated reference to how poorly drafted the parties' agreements had been and how their frequent redrafting of their contracts had not made the position any clearer. This decision was affirmed in the Court of Appeal⁶⁰ – although that appeal focused primarily on questions of partnership law and less on questions of trusts. So, even in complex commercial situations, the court may infer an intention to create a trust.

The principle relating to certainty of intention applies to commercial and to non-commercial situations

Lord Millett summarised the principle relating to the identification of certainty of intention in the House of Lords in Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley:⁶¹

A settlor must, of course, possess the necessary intention to create a trust, but his subjective intentions are irrelevant. If he enters into arrangements which have the effect of creating a trust, it is not necessary that he should appreciate that they do so; it is sufficient that he intends to enter into them.

Consequently, the court will infer the existence of a trust if the circumstances are the sort of circumstances which the court would interpret as constituting a trust. Such trusts will be express trusts, even if the parties did not know that that was what they were creating.⁶² A little like a small child putting some food between two slices of bread: she may not know the word for what she has done, but she would nevertheless be taken by everyone else to have made a sandwich. This principle is true both of ordinary, day-to-day situations and complex, commercial situations.⁶³ Take the example of a tronc system for waiting staff tips in a restaurant.⁶⁴ A tronc system divides the tips evenly between the waiting staff. In *Annabel's (Berkley Square) Ltd v Revenue and Customs Commissioners*⁶⁵ a tronc system was operated whereby all cash tips left for waiting staff by customers were taken by a 'troncmaster', who was a senior member of the 60 Affirmed [2000] Ch 291, CA. See, interestingly, 'child trust funds' created by the Child Trust Funds Act 2004 which are themselves expressed to be incapable of transfer: ibid, s 4.

61 [2002] UKHL 12 at [71], [2002] 2 All ER 377 at [71], [2002] 2 AC 164. See also Mills v Sports Direct Retail Ltd, Re Kaupthing Singer Friedlander [2010] 2 BCLC 143, 158 adopting these dicta and those of Megarry J above. To the same end, in Re Multi Guarantee Co Ltd [1987] BCLC 257 at 266 Nourse LJ considered that this point turned on 'whether in substance a sufficient intention to create a trust was manifested by' the settlor.

62 This may seem counter-intuitive at first. After all, you might think, how can it be an 'express trust' if the parties did not know what they were doing would be called a trust by lawyers? The answer is that the parties were intending to do the things they did – in that sense the settlor's intentions were express intentions – and lawyers would place an interpretation on them to the effect that they constituted a trust.

63 Re Lewis's of Leicester Ltd [1995] 1 BCLC 428.

64 There are two ways of leaving tips in restaurants today: in cash, or by debit or credit card payment. Cash tips are passed into the tronc and divided up among the staff periodically in accordance with their entitlements, hours worked, etc. Some restaurant chains have taken to using the tips paid by way of payment card to pay part of the staff's wages (so as to meet minimum wage standards): importantly, those chains use these tips to offset the cost of their staff's contractual wage entitlements, not to pay them bonuses. Such tips are therefore not additional to the staff's wages but part of them in those restaurant chains. This is why it is important to ask your waiting staff whether they would prefer to have their tip in cash or paid by card: they will nearly always prefer to have it in cash so that they will be able to take it for themselves.

65 [2009] EWCA Civ 361, [2009] 4 All ER 55.

staff who was not acting on behalf of the employer but rather who held all of those cash tips before distributing them among the waiting staff periodically. An issue arose as to the nature of the troncmaster's duties when holding those cash tips before they were distributed. It was held that while the troncmaster held those cash tips he was holding them on trust for the other waiting staff. In essence, the troncmaster had legal title over those cash sums but they were held ultimately for the benefit of other staff, and therefore it was held that they were held on trust.

At the other end of the spectrum, in Brazzill v Willoughby,⁶⁶ Smith J considered the failure of the financial institution Kaupthing Singer Friedlander ('KSF'). This was one of a number of cases relating to failure of KSF. The old City of London merchant bank Singer Friedlander had been bought up by the Icelandic bank Kaupthing and transformed into 'KSF' before all of the booming Icelandic banks crashed in the global financial crisis of the autumn of 2008. Consequently, on the facts of this case, KSF would have been insolvent in October 2008 but for the support of the UK regulatory authorities.⁶⁷ KSF was regulated by the Financial Services Authority ('FSA') in the UK. The FSA had the power under the Banking (Special Provisions) Act 2008⁶⁸ to issue a 'supervisory order' to KSF, inter alia, to require KSF to set up an account with the Bank of England into which it would pay amounts to match any deposits made with it by its customers.⁶⁹ The purpose of this scheme was to ensure that there was money set aside to repay client deposits in case KSF did fail. Clause 2 of the supervisory order used the term 'trust' to describe this arrangement and the parties themselves also used the expression 'trust' to describe this arrangement; unfortunately the order did not make clear which deposits nor which customers were covered by this scheme and which were not. Issues arose as to whether or not there was in fact a trust in existence given this lack of clarity. It was held, following Re Kayford, that putting those sums into that account constituted a voluntary intention to create a trust on the part of KSF, even though it was made in accordance with the FSA's supervisory order.⁷⁰ Simply enough, setting aside funds in a separate account with the intention that they would be held for the benefit of identified

66 [2009] EWHC 1633 (Ch), [2010] 1 BCLC 673.

67 KSF was sold to ING, the Dutch bank, under the exercise of the statutory powers mentioned in the text. The statutory powers enabled the UK regulators to find a buyer for KSF and the reassurance offered by the statutory compensation scheme, which would reimburse any depositors who lost money, were both instrumental in keeping KSF from collapsing along with Kaupthing as a whole.

68 On which see Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, Sweet & Maxwell, 2009, 29–41.

69 Existing customers were protected by the Financial Services Compensation Scheme – on which see Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, Sweet & Maxwell, 2009, 9–58.

70 The facts of the case were more complex than the summary in the text, but there is no need to obscure the central point being made in the text about certainty of intention: this case did apply the principle in Re Kayford. There were two complicating factors. First, the supervisory order only required (in para 2(b)) equivalent amounts to be paid into that account and not the actual amounts themselves: it was held that there would be a trust over those equivalent amounts nevertheless. It is suggested that the FSA would have been better advised in requiring KSF to transfer the actual deposits received from customers into the Bank of England account so that there would have been no doubt as to which amounts were held on trust. Second, an issue arose on these facts as to some amounts (in excess of £140 million in total) which were not actually matched by payments into the Bank of England account: in practice, there was no issue on those amounts because the government took the view that it would recompense all depositors out of the Financial Services Compensation Scheme in any event. The confusion arose from the lack of clarity about which 'deposits' and which 'customers' were covered by the supervisory order. Smith J noted these shortcomings in the operation of the trust and the narrowness of the customer deposits which were actually matched by deposits in the trust account held with the Bank of England. This does not affect the main principle set out in the text and relate only to the extent of the trust on the facts of this case.

customers constituted a trust. Consequently, any sums paid into this account for identified customers were deemed to be held on trust. The simple point, therefore, was that an intention to set up a separate bank account for the benefit of customers will be taken to constitute a trust, and that such a trust will provide the beneficiaries with protection against the trustee going into insolvency. This complex commercial situation (it is hard to imagine one which could be more obviously commercial) was effectively decided by reference to the same concepts as were used at root in Paul v Constance.

Trusts over bank accounts

A number of issues arise in relation to the creation of trusts over the contents of bank accounts. It is not always the case that when one person receives another person's property there will be a trust. Importantly, it is a well-established principle of banking law that when a bank receives money from a customer and pays it into that customer's account, the bank receives an outright transfer of that money and so does not hold the deposited money on trust for the customer.⁷¹ In Foley v Hill Lord Cottenham LC described the interaction of banker and customer in the following terms:⁷²

[M]oney placed in the custody of a banker is, to all intents and purposes, the money of the banker, to do with it as he pleases; he is guilty of no breach of trust in employing it; he is not answerable to the principal if he puts it into jeopardy, if he engages in a hazardous speculation; he is not bound to keep it or deal with it as the property of his principal; but he is, of course, answerable for the amount [as a debt], because he has contracted, having received that money, to repay to the principal, when demanded, a sum equivalent to that paid into his hands.

A banker therefore owes only personal obligations to its customers (that is, its depositors) when it receives their deposits. In that sense, money transferred to a bank is an outright transfer of money to the bank.⁷³ This conclusion was based on the court's analysis of the ordinary intentions of the parties to a banking contract. It would require an express agreement between the bank and the customer for the bank to be understood to be acting as a trustee: banks often do act as trustees, but only through special subsidiaries and only in limited circumstances, but not in relation to ordinary bank accounts. Thus, the court will look at the circumstances and infer the existence or non-existence of an express trust from those circumstances. So, more recently, where a defendant accepted money from a client as part of a hawala system that was held to negate the possibility of a trust. A hawala system is a money transfer system whereby the defendant took absolute title in the client's money subject to a contractual obligation to pay an equivalent amount of money through one of his 71 Foley v Hill (1848) 2 HL Cas 28; see generally Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, Sweet & Maxwell, 2009, para 30–04.

72 (1848) 2 HL Cas 28, 9 ER 1002, 1005. See also Westminster Bank Ltd v Hilton (1926) 43 TLR 124, 126, per Lord Atkinson to the same effect, identifying also that the banker acts as the customer's agent in relation to the payment and collection of cheques.

73 Hirschhorn v Evans (Barclays Bank garnishees) [1938] 2 KB 801, 815, per Mackinnon LJ. So a bank operating an account on behalf of a Lloyds insurance syndicate would not hold those moneys on trust (without something more in the arrangement to require that analysis): Mann v Coutu & Co [2003] EWHC 2138, [2004] 1 CLC 301.

agents in another currency to a person nominated by the client.⁷⁴ It was held that the well-understood basis for such money transfer arrangements was that the defendant took absolute title in the money and pooled all of the client money together with the intention of using it for trade. Sullivan J held that this was not a trust precisely because no money was set aside to the client's account. Instead this was considered to be more akin to an ordinary bank account, as considered above. The customer's remedy against the banker is a remedy based on ordinary contract law, not based on trust law.

The intention to create a trust in Mills v Sportsdirect.com over share in financial transactions

In the wake of the global financial crisis which had begun in the summer of 2007, the claimant in *Mills v Sportsdirect.com Retail Ltd*⁷⁵ sought to establish that it had a proprietary interest under a trust against Kaupthing Singer & Friedlander ('KSF', the same entity as was at issue in Brazzill v Willoughby above) before KSF's holding company went into insolvency at precisely 14.21 hours on 8 October 2008.⁷⁶ In essence, it was held that the parties had intended to create a trust over shares which the claimant had transferred to the defendant as part of a larger transaction because those shares had been held in a separate account. Therefore, when the defendant went into insolvency, it was held that the claimant had equitable proprietary rights in those shares which were therefore protected against the insolvency.

In more detail, the facts were as follows. Mills was one of the administrators of KSF. The claimant, Sportsdirect.com Retail Ltd ('SD'), had entered into a 'repo' transaction with KSF. A repo can be thought of as being a means for a financial institution to acquire securities in a hurry if it needs them to complete a transaction with one of its own customers: ordinarily in a repo transaction, securities⁷⁷ would be transferred between the parties in exchange for cash, and then securities of the same type would be transferred back and the cash repaid a few days later.⁷⁸ This sort of transaction is used in financial markets to get

74 Azam v Iqbal [2007] EWHC 2025, [2008] Bus LR 168.

75 [2010] EWHC 1072 (Ch), [2010] 2 BCLC 143.

76 Kaupthing was one of the Icelandic banks which crashed during the global financial crisis which began in 2007. It had bought the long-standing English merchant bank Singer Friedlander and created KSF as a result. When Kaupthing crashed, a part of KSF was sold to ING Bank further to the Banking (Special Provisions) Act 2008 and the remainder was put into administration. A large amount of difficult litigation was put in train by this collapse. Mills is one of the administrators of KSF. The concept of 'administration' refers to a mechanism in insolvency law to keep an entity operative after it has strictly gone into insolvency so that the business can be sold off or otherwise turned to account.

77 Or, alternatively, it can be used the other way around as a sort of very short-term loan whereby the lender pays money to the borrower and in exchange the borrower transfers securities to the lender, and then the parties reverse their payments a few days later. The term 'securities', in this context, relates to financial instruments such as transferable shares and bonds traded on regulated markets like the London Stock Exchange.

78 The text attempts to simplify the facts. They were quite complex and turned on the nature of the financial products involved. The 'repo' was documented under a standard market agreement known as the Global Master Repurchase Agreement ('GMRA'). A repo, as discussed in Hudson's The Law of Finance, para 50–14, is a transaction which involves a seller transferring securities to a buyer in return for cash, with the seller agreeing in turn to repurchase securities of the same type at a specified price at a specified time in the future from the buyer. The point of this transaction is that the seller is able to acquire cash in exchange for a short-term transfer of the securities, and then to have replacement shares transferred to it later. Think of it as being like pawning your securities: you get money in the short term, but you have to buy your securities back at a pre-determined a hold of securities quickly or to get cash loans on a short-term basis.⁷⁹ The legal question is as to the rights which the seller has to the securities before they are transferred back to it. Ordinarily, the securities would be transferred outright between the parties without the seller retaining property rights over them. However, the transaction in Mills v Sportsdirect.com was structured slightly but significantly differently from an ordinary repo transaction because SD was concerned about the financial position of KSF.⁸⁰ The parties' representatives⁸¹ had agreed that, in this situation, SD would transfer shares outright to KSF and then KSF would pass legal title in those shares to a nominee, Sinjul Nominees Ltd, which would then hold the shares.⁸² The legal question was then as to the terms on which Sinjul held those shares: specifically, the question was whether or not a trust had been created with Sinjul as trustee in favour of SD. The terms of this transaction were discussed between the representatives of each party but it was unclear what the outcome of their discussion was before the parties transferred the shares.⁸³ The question for Lewison J was whether or not a trust had been effected over those shares in favour of SD. In essence, if this had been an ordinary repo, in which the seller retained no rights in the securities, then there would not have been a trust; but the specific feature of this transaction was that the shares had been price a few days later. These repo markets are thought to be very useful in financial practice because it provides 'liquidity' for investment banks and similar institutions in the sense that they can borrow money easily using their securities as collateral, or they can get securities easily if they need to conduct other transactions.

- 79 If a bank needs a short-term loan, it will sell securities in exchange for cash, and then buy the securities back at a contractually agreed date in the future. Alternatively, an investment may need securities of a specified kind to fulfil a transaction and so it will buy those securities from another firm on a short-term basis by means of a repo and then transfer back securities of the same type a few days later. The repo market is a short-term mechanism for banks to 'borrow' money or securities on a private basis off-exchange. Financial institutions operate many of their trading activities on a short-term basis in which using short-term devices of this sort appears to be more useful than long-term loans or the many formalities involved with trading on exchanges. The risk, of course, is that markets will move adversely during the transaction so that the cost of re-acquiring the securities rises or falls sharply. Occasionally, firms are caught out catastrophically in this way.
- 80 Importantly, in an ordinary repo transaction the seller does not receive back the very same securities which were transferred originally, but rather the seller receives back securities of the same type at the end of the transaction. This means that there is no trust ordinarily over the original securities which are transferred to the buyer because the other party is entitled to deal with those securities, provided that the buyer transfers back securities of the same type at the end of the transaction. This means that the seller does not retain proprietary rights in the shares which are transferred away in the first place. The repo in this instance was enhanced by a collateral agreement, which is simply a means of securing payment which is too complex for this discussion and unnecessary for the decision in this case: see Hudson, The Law of Finance, Chapter 45 generally for a description of collateral arrangements.
- 81 SD acted through a broker and other advisors, and KSF acted through its own traders and in-house professionals. The transaction was conducted at some speed and, as is common on trading floors, there were uncertainties about its terms during the negotiation process.
- 82 The effect of this holding by Sinjul was that Sinjul was only transferring equitable interests in the shares when they moved. Such dispositions of an equitable interest do not, however, require signed writing under s 53(1)(c) of the Law of Property Act 1925 because there is an exception in the case of collateral arrangements under Financial Collateral Arrangements (No 2) Regulations 2003, SI 2003/3226, reg 4(2).
- 83 It is common for traders acting on behalf of parties such as this to discuss the commercial terms of these sorts of transactions but for important legal details to be overlooked in the pressured environment of transacting. This sort of pressure is discussed in Chapter 8 of Hudson, The Law on Financial Derivatives, 2012 and in Hudson, The Law of Finance at para 17–26. See Peekay Intermark Ltd v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd [2005] EWHC 830 (Comm); reversed at [2006] EWCA Civ 386.

transferred into a specific account held by Sinjul which appeared to be intended beneficially for SD.⁸⁴

In deciding this case, Lewison J began with first principles. As already discussed, the most important case on the finding of a trust in circumstances in which a trust is said to exist in a case where the legal owner of property has gone into insolvency is the decision of Megarry J in *Re Kayford Ltd.*⁸⁵ Lewison J relied in particular on the following passage from the judgment of Megarry J:

The sender may create a trust by using appropriate words when he sends the money (though I wonder how many do this, even if they are equity lawyers), or the company may do it by taking suitable steps on or before receiving the money. If either is done, the obligations in respect of the money are transformed from contract to property, from debt to trust. Payment into a separate bank account is a useful (though by no means conclusive) indication of an intention to create a trust, but of course there is nothing to prevent the company from binding itself by a trust even if there are no effective banking arrangements.⁸⁶

It was considered by Lewison J to be important that KSF could be shown to have had an appropriate intention to create a trust when putting money aside in a separate account with Sinjul Nominees Ltd. Lewison J found on the facts that the understanding which was reached with the broker acting for SD with KSF was that (using the vague expressions used by the parties themselves) shares would be transferred into ‘SD’s box’ within the holdings held by Sinjul so that those shares would be ‘ringfenced’ and so that ‘you [SD] would own those shares outright’.⁸⁷ Under this repo transaction, SD was required to pay for this transfer of shares. SD was particularly keen that the shares were transferred away from KSF’s beneficial ownership. Lewison J concluded that when the broker and KSF agreed that payment would be made by SD for the shares, then their intention was that the shares would be segregated into a distinct account before payment was made for those shares.⁸⁸ It was understood that the purpose of this transaction was ‘to keep the shares out of the hands of KSF’s creditors’.⁸⁹ Therefore, Lewison J held that when all of these factors were taken together there was a trust over the shares at the time that these elements of the transaction

84 The factual details were a little more complicated than they have been presented in the text above for ease of reference. The shares were held in uncertificated form on the CREST system (which means that legal title in those shares was identified by an entry on an electronic register as opposed to being identified by the issue of a physical certificate). The logistical elements of the transaction were effected by means of numerous conversations between the traders and brokers involved. In essence, in the wake of the collapse of Lehman Brothers the brokers acting on behalf of SD were concerned to make sure that the shares were put beyond the reach of the creditors of KSF in the event that the ultimate holding company in Kaupthing bank went into insolvency along with other Icelandic banks.

85 [1975] 1 WLR 279.

86 [1975] 1 All ER 604 at 607, [1975] 1 WLR 279 at 282. See also Re Multi Guarantee Co Ltd [1987] BCLC 257 at 266, Nourse LJ; Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley [2002] UKHL 12 at [71], [2002] 2 All ER 377 at [71], [2002] 2 AC 164, per Lord Millett.

87 [2010] EWHC 1072 (Ch), [2010] 2 BCLC 143, para [59]. Of course under a trust, the beneficiary would not own the shares ‘outright’, but rather would own only an equitable interest in them.

88 [2010] EWHC 1072 (Ch), [2010] 2 BCLC 143, paras [63] and [73].

89 [2010] EWHC 1072 (Ch), [2010] 2 BCLC 143, para [63].

were complete.⁹⁰ The timing was critical given that the insolvency of the entity could be established with such precision.

3.3.2 Moral obligations or trusts?

Making the distinction

There is a subtle difference between merely imposing a moral obligation on a person who is the recipient of property such that a trust will not be created and imposing formal, fiduciary obligations on that person such that they become a trustee over that property. As was said at the start of this book, the trust is based on the court's control of the conscience of the trustee. However, it is possible for one person to impose a moral obligation on another person in relation to the use of property without that necessarily constituting a trust. For example, I may ask you to watch my car for a few minutes, with the words 'take very good care of it, I will hold you responsible for any damage to it', without meaning that you become a trustee of that car. All I want in this example is that you watch the car – I do not intend you to acquire any property rights in it nor to deal with it for anyone else's benefit – and therefore the only obligation I can have imposed on you is a merely moral obligation to watch the car as you promised to do.

It is possible, therefore, as part of making a gift to someone, that the donor will seek to impose a moral obligation on them. When a parent gives a child money to buy a book as a reward and says 'don't spend it all on sweets', that does not make the child a trustee of the money. Instead the child is under a moral (rather than a legal) obligation to use the money to buy a book. The expression generally used by the courts to distinguish between a declaration of a trust and a moral obligation is to define merely moral obligations as setting out 'precatory words'. Merely 'precatory words' do not create substantive trust obligations.

In short, the nature of the intention is to be inferred from all the circumstances. In Re Adams and Kensington Vestry,⁹¹ a testator left property to his wife (W) by will 'in full confidence that she would do what was right by his children'. It was argued on behalf of the children that the moral obligation imposed on W in the will created a trust. However, it was held that the property passed to W absolutely. The court interpreted the statement in the will to have added only a moral obligation on the wife to use the money in a way which would benefit the children and not to place her under an obligation to hold that money as trustee for the children. Where a statement is analysed as being merely a statement of wishes in this way, it will not have the force of a trust.

90 There are two problems with this judgment. First, what is not clear, as considered below in relation to certainty of subject matter, is whether the shares had been segregated for there to have been a trust, or whether under the terms of this understanding between the parties that there had been payment made before the trust took effect. Second, Lewison J ended his judgment by noting that no argument had been made before him as to whether or not this transaction constituted a breach of the insolvency law anti-deprivation principle (see the decision of the Supreme Court in Belmont Park Investments Pty Ltd v BNY Corporate Trustee Services Ltd [2011] UKSC 38, [2011] 3 WLR 521). In essence, during an insolvency, no unsecured creditor nor any other person is entitled to take assets away from the insolvent person so as to reduce the amount of property available to the unsecured creditors, unless a device such as a valid, pre-existing trust entitles assets to be moved in that fashion (in which case the beneficiaries of that trust would not be unsecured creditors.) Either of these problems might have meant that a trust was not found between the parties but they were not considered in detail. The Supreme Court considered another case claim in relation to just such an insolvency question in In re Kaupthing Singer & Friedlander Ltd (No 2), joined with Mills v HSBC Trustee (CI) Ltd, [2011] UKSC 48, [2011] Bus LR 1644.

91 (1884) 27 Ch D 394.

On the other hand, in Comiskey v Bowring-Hanbury,⁹² the testator left property by will to his wife subject to a provision for equal division amongst his nieces on his wife's death. The precise words of the bequest were that the property was left to the wife 'in full confidence that . . . she will devise it to one or more of my nieces as she may think fit'. Therefore, on the face of it, there would appear to be a merely moral obligation on the part of the wife to benefit the testator's nieces. However, it was held that there was an executory gift over the whole of his property which was intended to give those nieces some rights in that property under a trust. In part this was due to the fact that there was no property segregated from the rest of the testator's estate which could have been identified as being for the benefit of the nieces alone. Therefore, it was held that the wife should be prevented from dealing with that money as though she were entitled to it absolutely beneficially. Thus, the court found that the testator's intention was to give the nieces property rights from the moment that the will came into effect. Therefore, his wife did not take that property absolutely subject to a merely moral obligation to take care of her deceased husband's nieces; rather, she was subject to the obligations of a trustee and the property was held on trust for her for life and then in remainder to her nieces equally.

Identifying certainty of intention in the interpretation of wills

There has been a development in the attitude of the courts to the interpretation of words, particularly in relation to wills. In 1858, the estates of deceased persons began to be administered by the Courts of Chancery rather than by the ecclesiastical courts. In consequence, there was a change in judicial policy which sought to construe all testamentary gifts to be valid wherever possible, and therefore removed much of the problem of certainty of intention. However, subsequent judicial policy, including cases like *Re Adams and Kensington Vestry*⁹³ considered above, took the view that the court should examine the true intention of the testator and not simply imply an intention to create a trust in all circumstances where property was left other than as a straightforward gift.

In Re Hamilton,⁹⁴ Lindley LJ held that the approach taken by the court ought to be to 'take the will you have to construe and see what it means, and if you come to the conclusion that no trust was intended you say so . . .'. In other words: 'Don't simply assume there is a trust – look at the will and decide whether or not there is sufficient intention to create a trust.' This approach was approved in *Re Williams*⁹⁵ and in Comiskey v Bowring Hanbury.⁹⁶ It is suggested that the courts will adopt the approach set out by Lindley LJ in *Re Hamilton*⁹⁷ and consider each situation on its own terms and in its own context.

92 [1905] AC 84.

93 (1884) 27 Ch D 394.

94 [1895] 2 Ch 370.

95 (1877) 5 Ch D 735.

96 [1905] AC 84. This was doubted by Wynn-Parry J in Re Steele's WT [1948] 2 All ER 193 – the latter preferring the older approach of assuming a trust in general terms set out in Shelley v Shelley (1868) LR 6 Eq 540.

97 [1895] 2 Ch 370.

Even accepting that there has been a more interpretative approach adopted by the courts since Re Hamilton, it still may not be easy for the reader to isolate a clear distinction between the cases of *Re Adams and Kensington Vestry*⁹⁸ and *Comiskey v Bowring-Hanbury*⁹⁹ considered above. In relation to the law on express trusts, it is often the case that the final decision in the case will turn on two factors. First, a very close reading of the wording of a trust document: this is particularly true in older cases, leading up to the decisions of judges like Viscount Simonds in the 1950s.¹⁰⁰ After that time, many of the next generation of judges began to take a more purposive approach to interpreting trust documents. That means, they were more prepared to interpret documents in a way which made them valid rather than void. In cases involving testamentary trusts, the judges would often seek to maintain the validity of the trust because the settlor was no longer alive and therefore was incapable of rewriting the terms of the trust so as to make them valid.¹⁰¹ Second, a consideration of the circumstances surrounding the creation of the trust: in many situations, the settlor will not have made her intentions clear, and therefore the court may look at the more general situation of the parties. For example, if a testator had already made provision for a particular beneficiary in her will, the court may decide that a further provision could not have been intended to confer additional benefit on that person. It would be unusual for this second aid to construction to be applied completely in the absence of a close reading of the words of the trust.

In relation to the cases already mentioned of Re Adams and Kensington Vestry and Comiskey v Bowring-Hanbury, the court decided that in Adams, the testator intended to give the property entirely to his wife and trusted her to deal with it appropriately. A number of cases have taken expressions which provide that the recipient of a gift will take the property ‘in full confidence’ that it will be used for the benefit of another person to constitute a merely moral obligation.¹⁰² Similarly, instances suggesting that the testator ‘wishes or requests’ that something be done with the property by the recipient of the gift have not been held to constitute sufficient intention to declare a trust.¹⁰³ For a review of these cases, see Swain v Law Society.¹⁰⁴

On the other hand, in Comiskey, the court decided that the testator had intended his nieces to acquire some rights in his property from the moment of his death, or of making the will, rather than requiring them to rely on his widow – even though the bequest was couched in terms that the testator had ‘full confidence’ in his wife. And so it was that in Re Steele’s WT,¹⁰⁵ a trust was found to have been created based on a ‘request’ made by the testator of the legatee.

Perhaps one distinction between the two cases of *Adams*¹⁰⁶ and *Comiskey*¹⁰⁷ is a perception that a mother is more likely to ensure the well-being of her own children, and therefore

98 (1884) 27 Ch D 394.

99 [1905] AC 84.

100 See, for example, Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW [1959] AC 457; Grey v IRC [1960] AC 1.

101 This shift in attitude is considered in more detail in the discussion of cases like Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW [1959] AC 457 and Re Denley [1969] 1 Ch 373 in Chapter 4.

102 Re Adams (1884) 27 Ch D 394; Re Hutchinson and Tenant (1878) 8 Ch D 540; Mussoorie Bank v Raynor (1882) 7 App Cas 321; Re Williams (1877) 5 Ch D 735.

103 Re Hamilton [1895] 2 Ch 370; Hill v Hill [1897] 1 QB 483; Re Connolly [1910] 1 Ch 219; Re Johnson [1939] 2 All ER 458.

104 [1983] 1 AC 598.

105 [1948] 2 All ER 193.

106 (1884) 27 Ch D 394.

107 [1905] AC 84.

can be trusted to take the property absolutely beneficially whilst still providing for those children; whereas a widow might not be so concerned to see to the well-being of her deceased husband's nieces, preferring to care for some other family members instead. Often, the only real distinction between two cases (where it is not an obvious difference in principle or a question of very different factual situations) will be whether or not the court has been convinced by the witnesses during trial, or whether or not sufficient evidence could be brought before the court to prove a particular argument in a particular situation.

The law of trusts is frequently to do with the passions, greed and expectations of ordinary human beings. It cannot always be reduced to rigid legal principles. The beauty of equity lies in its ability to deal flexibly with such circumstances.

3.3.3 Intention to create a trust, not something else

Charges and trusts

As considered above, the primary commercial use of the trust is to allocate rights in property between commercial people as part of larger transactions. In many situations, it will be a difficult problem to decide whether it is a trust which has been created or merely some other form of quasi-proprietary right, like a charge. In Clough Mill v Martin,¹⁰⁸ that very problem arose. A manufacturer of yarn supplied a clothes manufacturer with yarn. The clothes manufacturer used the yarn to make clothes – that is, the yarn ceased to exist as yarn but rather became cloth which was incorporated into clothes. The supplier wanted security for the contractual payments to be made to it by the clothes manufacturer. Therefore, the supplier wanted to retain title in the yarn until it was used to create clothes, and then to have rights in the clothes themselves. That aim was incorporated into the contract between the parties. In this way, the supplier hoped that if the manufacturer went into insolvency, the supplier would be able to recover either the unused yarn or finished clothes up to the value of the contractual obligation which the clothes manufacturer owed to it.

Subsequently, the clothes manufacturer did go into insolvency without having made full payment to the supplier. The question arose whether or not the supplier could claim to have proprietary rights in the stock of clothes still held by the manufacturer. The supplier sought to rely on the term of the contract which gave it rights over those finished clothes – the main issue was whether the supplier's rights were as a beneficiary under a trust or in some other, lesser form. A number of analyses were possible. The supplier argued that the yarn and the clothes were held on trust for it until such time as it received payment. In effect, the supplier's argument was that the contract obliged the clothes manufacturer to recognise proprietary rights in the supplier over that yarn on trust. The problem with this argument on these facts was that because the property itself would change as new clothes were made and other clothes sold off during the course of the manufacturer's business, all the supplier could have was a floating charge over the stock of clothes, as opposed to a fixed right (as in a trust) over any particular clothes. A floating charge is a charge that has an identified value but which attaches only to a fluctuating pool of property and not to any particular item.¹⁰⁹ So, a floating charge would not give the supplier proprietary rights in any particular items, as a trust would have done, but only a right of an identified maximum value against the total stock of clothes.

108 [1984] 3 All ER 982.

109 See para 23.2.2 below.

It was held by Goff LJ on a close analysis of the contract between the parties that a mere charge was created because of the difficulty which would arise if more than one seller sought to assert a like right against the supplier. His Lordship meant that if more people brought claims than there was property to go round, the trust would have been meaningless because no claimant could have identified which property was held on trust for them alone. As considered below in relation to certainty of subject matter,¹¹⁰ it is important that the property which is to be held on trust is clearly identifiable and segregated from all other property.¹¹¹ By contrast, a floating charge does not attach to any specific property but rather takes effect over a range of property. Therefore, the intention of the parties as expressed in their contract on these facts was interpreted by the Court of Appeal to be an intention to create a charge over property rather than a trust. This case illustrates how the court will look at the circumstances and decide which analysis seems most appropriate.

Trust used as a sham device will not be a valid trust

When a purported trust is in fact a sham intended to achieve some ulterior purpose then that trust will not be valid. Sham trusts are used to avoid liability to tax by pretending that property is held on trust,¹¹² or frequently so as to attempt to put property beyond the reach of creditors in an insolvency. There are a number of cases considered in Chapter 11 on resulting trusts in which the absolute owners of property have sought to disguise their ownership of that property, perhaps to avoid creditors, by purportedly transferring it to other people with the intention of recovering the property in the future, perhaps when their creditors have given up the chase. Frequently, these have been unlawful attempts to put property beyond the reach of creditors – often by putting that property into the names of family members. (In Chapter 11, we will consider whether or not those property owners are entitled to recover their title in that property in circumstances in which the transfer was illegal.) In these cases, the parties purported to create a trust so as to shield their property from their creditors (contrary to insolvency law).

One such case which is an instructive example at this point is Midland Bank v Wyatt,¹¹³ in which Mr Wyatt sought to protect himself against the possibility of business failure by settling the family home on trust for the benefit of his wife and his daughter. In time Mr Wyatt's business went into insolvency owing money to the claimant bank. Mr Wyatt sought to rely on the purported declaration of trust. However, it transpired that neither his wife nor his daughter had been told of the trust. Significantly, when Mr Wyatt had separated

110 See para 3.4.1 below.

111 Re Goldcorp [1995] 1 AC 74.

112 So, in Canada in Marquis-Antle Spousal Trust v R 2009 TCC 465, 12 ITELR 314 a taxpayer concocted a complex scheme to avoid capital gains tax by purportedly creating a discretionary trust in Barbados into which shares would be passed before being sold to his wife who would in turn sell them to third parties. It was held that no valid trust was created because the structure in Barbados was being used solely as an agent and not as a genuine trust, in part because the legal title in the property was never vested in the trustee in Barbados, in part because documentation relating to the trust had been backdated for tax purposes, and because it was effectively a sham intended to avoid capital gains tax.

113 [1995] 1 FLR 697.

from his wife, his wife's solicitors had not been informed of the existence of the trust when calculating the wife's beneficial interest in property held under the divorce settlement. Therefore, the court held that the trust had been a sham, the sole purpose of which had been an attempt to put property beyond the reach of Mr Wyatt's creditors and not to organise the equitable interest in the family home.

Thus, it is possible that the courts will look behind the creation of a trust to see whether or not the trust is, in truth, a sham. Indeed, in the context of revenue law, the courts have long been prepared to look beyond 'artificial steps' in the organisation of people's affairs, whether in relation to trusts or otherwise so as to give effect to the substance of the transaction.¹¹⁴ Similarly, in land law, the courts will not give effect to terms in an occupation agreement which are a sham in that they seek to give the impression that the occupant has merely personal rights under a licence rather than proprietary rights under a lease.¹¹⁵ Therefore, the concept of disallowing shams is not at all unusual. In line with the fundamental tenets of equity, someone seeking to prove a trust must come to equity with clean hands, and also that equity looks to the parties' real intent and not merely to the form in which they have dressed up their transaction: consequently, a trust will not be enforced if it is in truth a sham.

In defining what is meant by a 'sham', Diplock LJ held in Snook v London and West Riding Investments Ltd that:

it means acts done or documents executed by the parties to the 'sham' which are intended by them to give to third parties or to the court the appearance of creating between the parties legal rights and obligations different from the actual legal rights and obligations (if any) which the parties intended to create . . . for acts or documents to be a 'sham', with whatever legal consequences follow from this, all the parties thereto must have a common intention that the acts or documents are not to create the legal rights or obligations which they give the appearance of creating. No unexpressed intentions of a 'shammer' affect the rights of a party whom he deceived.¹¹⁶

Therefore, a sham is a scheme of action which seeks to create the impression that the state of affairs is x whereas it is actually y.¹¹⁷ This is frequently done in relation to trusts by the creation of documentation which is not intended to have any real effect on the parties although its literal drafting suggests that the position is something else. So, in Hitch v Stone,¹¹⁸ Arden LJ observed that the court will not be limited to a simple reading of any documentation but rather will 'examine external evidence',¹¹⁹ and the court will also consider whether or not the parties subjectively intended to create different rights and obligations from those contained in the documentation.¹²⁰ Thus, if the parties signed two differently worded letters dealing 114 See the slew of recent cases on the general, meandering case law principles concerning tax avoidance, eg, Ramsay v IRC [1981] STC 174; Furniss v Dawson [1984] 2 WLR 226; Fitzwilliam v IRC [1993] STC 502; McGuckian v IRC [1997] STC 908; MacNiven v Westmoreland Investments Ltd [2001] STC 327; Barclays Mercantile Business Finance Ltd v Mawson [2004] UKHL 51.

115 Street v Mountford [1985] 2 WLR 877.

116 Snook v London and West Riding Investments Ltd [1967] 2 QB 786, 802.

117 Stokes v Mardner [2011] EWHC 1179 (QB); Soutzos v Asombang [2010] EWHC 842 (Ch), [2010] BPIR 960, Newey J.

118 [2001] STC 214.

119 Ibid., 229.

120 Ibid.

with exactly the same circumstances in two completely different ways, it would be inferred that the parties intended to use whichever of these pretences seemed more convenient from time to time and therefore that the entire arrangement constituted a sham.¹²¹ What is important is that the parties intended to deceive others, as opposed merely to having organised their affairs in an advantageous manner.¹²² therefore it will be a sham to pretend that a husband owns property when in fact the property is used entirely by the wife as part of her business activities so as to reduce her liability to tax, but it will not be a sham if property is settled on a discretionary trust but genuinely used and held as discretionary trust property even if it has a beneficial tax effect.

It has been held that for a bankrupt person to purport to have his family home settled on trust for other members of his family so as to put it beyond the reach of his creditors would be a sham trust and so invalid.¹²³ In cases in Australia and New Zealand a notion of ‘alter ego trusts’ has arisen where the settlor is able to replace the trustees and control the trust so it operates simply as an alter ego of the settlor: where that permits a sham to be carried on (for example, where the property is used de facto as though the absolute property of the settlor, while purporting to be held for the benefit of some other person) then the trust will be invalid.¹²⁴

What is not clear on the authorities is whether all of the parties to a transaction must realise that it is a sham,¹²⁵ or whether it is sufficient that only one of the parties knew that it was a sham and thus that the other parties were dupes.¹²⁶ It is suggested that it is sufficient that one controlling mind procures a sham transaction and uses other parties as dupes for there to be in fact a sham transaction.¹²⁷ In line with the core equitable principle that equity looks to the substance rather than the form, the courts will therefore ignore a sham transaction and give effect to the parties’ real intentions – this may involve the effective undoing of a trust.¹²⁸ As considered in Chapter 11 in relation to Midland Bank v Wyatt (as outlined above), this tendency is particularly marked in relation to insolvency where the defendant has sought to put property beyond the reach of her creditors.¹²⁹

3.3.4 How to identify an intention to create an express trust

The preceding discussion may have made the possibility of identifying an express trust seem further away than before. Whereas Chapter 2 presented the express trust as a simple matter of establishing three actors (settlor, trustee and beneficiary), the cases considered so far in 121 Minwalla v Minwalla [2004] 7 ITEL 457.

122 Scott v Federal Commissioner of Taxation (No 2) (1966) ALJR 265, 279, per Windeyer J.

123 Re Reynolds [2007] NZCA 122, 10 ITEL 1064, New Zealand Court of Appeal.

124 Ibid; Public Trustee v Smith [2008] NSWSC 397, 10 ITEL 1018, Supreme Court New South Wales.

125 Snook v London and West Riding Investments Ltd [1967] 2 QB 786, 802, per Diplock LJ.

126 Midland Bank v Wyatt [1995] 1 FLR 697.

127 In Wrexham AFC Ltd v Crucialmove Ltd [2006] EWCA Civ 237 the Court of Appeal appeared to support a doubt that a trust could be treated as a valid trust if it had been proved at trial to have been created in bad faith. In that case a small group of individuals had sought to use an insolvent football club as a front behind which they would acquire the freehold over the football ground from a brewery which owned it, and then through their control of the club they intended to develop the land for their own profit. They had purported to settle some of the club’s assets on trust to facilitate the fiction that they were acting throughout in the best interests of the club. This, it is suggested, is akin to a finding of a sham trust.

128 See para 1.4.9.

129 Eg, Insolvency Act 1986, s 423.

this chapter have demonstrated that it will often be difficult to know whether or not there is a trust at all. However, what we should do at this juncture is to pause and go back to first principles: a trust will be said to exist in situations in which it would be unconscionable for the legal owner of property to deny the rights of other people in that property.¹³⁰ From that central principle, this and the next section will draw together these cases.

Identifying an intention to create multiple rights in property

The decision in *Don King Productions v Warren*¹³¹ demonstrates two things. First, even in the most high-profile and complex of transactions, the parties and their legal advisors may well leave their intentions uncertain. In consequence, it will be a matter for the court to intercede and decide whether or not their true intention was the creation of a trust. The second point flows from the first: a trust will be declared to exist in circumstances in which property is held by one person but in such a way that other people were also intended to have rights over that property at the same time. For a trust to exist, one person must hold the legal title in the property (and so act as trustee) in circumstances in which it would be unconscionable for that person to deny that other people also have rights against the property, rather than purely against the legal owner personally (and so be beneficiaries).

So, in Paul v Constance,¹³² there was an express trust found where it was clear that Mrs Paul was intended to have rights against the money in the bank account at the same time as Mr Constance. Or, to put that another way, it would have been unconscionable for Mr Constance or his administrator on death to overlook Mrs Paul's rights in that money. In Don King,¹³³ the partners entered into a contract which pledged the benefit of their management contracts to the partnership. Those partnership contracts demonstrated an intention that while, for example, Mr Warren might have entered into a management contract with a boxer, it was intended that any benefit derived by Mr Warren from that management contract was to be held on trust for the partnership. Or, to return to first principles, it would have been unconscionable for Mr Warren to have denied the rights of the other partners in the fruits of any new management contract.

Intention to impose a merely moral obligation, not a trust

If the settlor's intention is an intention merely to impose a moral obligation on someone, this will not be sufficient to impose a trust over that person. In those cases in which a merely moral obligation has been found, as considered above, the courts analysed the nature of the promise made by the settlor in all the surrounding circumstances. The circumstances are all important. Clearly the court would look first at the precise terms of the will to discern the testator's intention. As we have seen in the cases considered above,¹³⁴ the courts will also look to surrounding factors outside the terms of any written instrument. For example, assume a situation in which a testator has died leaving children. If the children were infants at the time of death, the court would assume that their surviving parent would intend to do the best

130 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

131 [1998] 2 All ER 608, Lightman J; affirmed [2000] Ch 291, CA.

132 [1977] 1 WLR 527.

133 [1998] 2 All ER 608.

134 See para 3.3.1 above.

for them, and so would be content to treat the spouse as being the absolute owner of the testator's property. However, if the children were being left in the care of someone who was not their biological parent, it may be that the court would be more likely to read the testator's intention to be to vest the children themselves with rights in the property, so that their interests could be more effectively protected by deeming them to be beneficiaries under a trust. So, in situations in which, having heard all of the evidence and having read the terms of a will closely, the court decides that the testator intended his wife should take the property absolutely subject only to a moral obligation that she think about how best to benefit their children, there would not be a trust because there would be no intention that the children have any immediate proprietary rights in the deceased's estate.¹³⁵

Intention to make a gift, not a trust

If the absolute owner of property intends to make a gift of all of her rights in that property, then this intention cannot be interpreted to be an intention to create a trust. A gift is an outright transfer of all of the owner's rights in property to the donee such that the donee becomes the absolute owner of that property. By contrast, a trust requires that the legal title in the property is vested in trustees and the equitable interest in the beneficiaries. A trust may be created by the owner declaring herself to be the trustee of property for her children without the need to make any transfer of the legal title; rather, the declaration of trust automatically transfers the equitable interest to the beneficiaries, thus leaving only the legal title with the mother as trustee. As is considered in detail in Chapter 5,¹³⁶ an intention to create a gift which fails for some reason cannot be rescued by interpreting the owner's intention to have been a trust.¹³⁷ So, if Richie promises to make a gift of money to Eddie but then Richie changes his mind, Eddie will not be able to argue that Eddie should be deemed to have created a trust over that money on the grounds that it would be unconscionable to renege on his promise: because Richie intended to make a gift, Richie could not have demonstrated an intention to create a trust.¹³⁸

3.3.5 Analysing the possible interpretations of transfers of property

Having considered in general, analytical terms the distinctions between various forms of activity which will and which will not create a trust, it might be useful at this juncture to consider the most common interpretations of the situation in which property is transferred by one person to another with the intention of benefiting some third party. All of the analyses considered in this section have been examined earlier in this chapter: this section is merely intended to be a summary of them. There are five broad, possible constructions of the situation in which Ana has transferred property to Bartholomew with an obligation to make a payment to Christopher:

- (a) Bartholomew takes absolutely beneficially: that is, Bartholomew is deemed to have been the recipient of a gift such that Bartholomew takes absolute title in the property. This 135 Re Adams and Kensington Vestry (1884) 27 Ch D 394.

136 See para 5.3.1 below.

137 Milroy v Lord (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

138 Richards v Delbridge (1874) LR 18 Eq 11.

- situation might be like that in Re Adams and Kensington Vestry,¹³⁹ in which Ana left property to Bartholomew ‘in full confidence’ that Bartholomew would ensure Christopher’s well-being, but without imposing a trustee’s obligation on Bartholomew in relation to the property. No trust would be created.
- (b) Bartholomew takes subject to a charge: that is, Bartholomew has use of the property but is subject to Christopher’s right to seize that property if Bartholomew fails to make payment to Christopher. Such a charge could either be in relation to fixed property, or might be a floating charge over a pool of property. As with Clough Mill v Martin,¹⁴⁰ where there is no identified property which is segregated from other property and held solely for Christopher’s benefit, but rather where Christopher’s rights take effect over a large pool of property the contents of which differ from time to time, Christopher will have merely a floating charge over that pool of property. Alternatively, where Ana has lent money to Bartholomew to acquire a house for Bartholomew’s occupation, the right is more likely to be a fixed charge over the house such that Ana (or Christopher) can seize the house should Bartholomew fail to repay the loan.¹⁴¹ No trust would be created.
- (c) Trust in favour of Christopher: that is, Ana is deemed to have declared a trust in favour of Christopher, with Bartholomew acting as trustee of the property. Where Ana intends that Christopher is to acquire some proprietary rights against the trust property immediately on the declaration of the trust, there will be a trust created in Christopher’s favour. Alternatively, it may be that Ana has a demonstrable intention that Christopher acquire equitable proprietary rights against the property on the satisfaction of some contingency (such as reaching the age of 18), in which case, there will be a trust in favour of Christopher, with Christopher’s rights vesting on the satisfaction of the contingency. A trust would be created.
- (d) Bartholomew is under a personal obligation to Christopher: that is, Bartholomew may owe no fiduciary or trustee obligation to Christopher but bears some non-legal, moral responsibility towards Christopher in relation to the property. Alternatively, suppose that Ana and Christopher entered into a contract with Bartholomew such that Ana left property for safekeeping with Bartholomew before Christopher came to collect it.¹⁴² In such a situation, Bartholomew would owe an obligation under the contract with Ana and Christopher to deal with that property in accordance with the contract. Banks frequently act as custodians of valuable property for commercial people under their contracts – for example, collateral transactions under banking contracts.¹⁴³ This would be a personal obligation under contract rather than a proprietary obligation under a trust.
- (e) Creation of a condition subsequent that Bartholomew must pass to Christopher if Bartholomew fails to pay: that is, akin to an action for breach of contract, there is a contractual (or personal) obligation on Bartholomew to make a payment or transfer of property in the event that Bartholomew fails to perform the contract. It may be part of an agreement that Bartholomew will pass property to Christopher in the event that Bartholomew fails to pay. Again, this obligation would be a personal obligation rather than one based on trusts law.

139 (1884) 27 Ch D 394.

140 [1984] 3 All ER 982.

141 See section 23.1 below.

142 See also the discussion of bailment at para 2.6.2 above.

143 Hudson, 2006, Ch 12.

There is no quicker means of deciding which model is the most appropriate in any factual circumstances than working out which of the analyses fits the situation best – or test all five analyses and see which seems closest to the facts. So you will have to wrap a cold towel round your head and consider the parties' intentions (or read the terms of any written instrument if there is one) over and over until you can decide which interpretation is the most appropriate in the circumstances.

3.4 CERTAINTY OF SUBJECT MATTER

The trust fund must be identifiable. A trust in which the trust property is mixed with other property so that it is impossible to identify precisely which property is held on trust, will be invalid. However, it appears that where the property is intangible property made up of identical units (such as ordinary shares of the same class), it will not be necessary to segregate the trust property from other property. This exception is doubted by many commentators.

3.4.1 Introduction

The requirement of 'certainty of subject matter' is a requirement that the property which is intended to constitute the trust fund is segregated from all other property so that its identity is sufficiently certain. If the trust fund is not sufficiently segregated, with the result that there is no certainty of subject matter, then the trust will fail.¹⁴⁴ The problem of certainty of subject matter therefore relates to the problem of identifying the property that constitutes the trust fund. The trust is a combination of obligations between trustee and beneficiary, and of property rights in the trust fund. This conception of the trust was discussed in Chapter 2.¹⁴⁵ Therefore, it is important that if there are to be property rights and responsibilities over a trust fund, that fund must be identifiable, or else it would not be possible for the court to know which property is to be administered in accordance with the terms of the trust. So, the problem considered in this section of this chapter is the need to know precisely which property is intended to be subjected to the trust.

In most cases, it will be obvious what is meant when a testator says 'I leave my first edition copy of John Fowles's The Magus to be held on trust for my husband.' Assuming the testator had only one copy of that book, then both his intention to create a trust and the property which was intended to be held on trust will be obvious. This would not be so if he had more than one first edition copy of The Magus. If there were two copies of that book, and it was clear that the settlor only intended for one of them to be held on trust, then it would be necessary for the settlor to identify which copy was to be settled on trust and which copy was to remain absolutely her own. If the settlor failed to identify which copy was to be held on trust and which copy was to remain hers absolutely then there would be uncertainty as to which property was to be held on trust and therefore the trust would fail. So, it will be necessary for the settlor to demonstrate an intention to create a trust, and then also an intention to create a trust over specified property.

There may be more complicated circumstances than the examples involving The Magus which were just discussed. Suppose that the settlor has a large amount of money held in a single bank account which she wants to settle in part on trust for her children and in part for herself absolutely. If the settlor intended to create a trust for the benefit of her children and to hold her own money entirely separately, then this mixture of moneys in a single bank account would mean that the trust in favour of her children would be void for uncertainty of subject matter. Therefore, we have to consider how the settlor could resolve this uncertainty. The simplest approach in these circumstances would be as follows: the settlor would have to create a new bank account and pay into that new bank account only the money which is to be held on trust for her children: once that is done there will be sufficient certainty of subject matter, provided that no other money is mixed up in this account. An alternative approach in this situation would be to create one trust and to specify that it is the whole of the fund which is to be held on trust for the beneficiaries and for the settlor herself, and then give the trustee a power to select precisely which property is to be allocated to which beneficiary. There is nothing wrong with giving a trustee the power to select which property should be advanced to which beneficiary, provided that it is clear from the outset which property is to be held on trust and therefore over which property the trustee may exercise her powers as trustee. The imaginative use of trustee powers over a general fund will escape many of the problems of uncertainty of subject matter.

144 Re London Wine Co (Shippers) Ltd [1986] PCC 121; Re Goldcorp [1995] 1 AC 74.

145 See the discussion of these concepts in paras 2.4.2 and 2.4.3 above.

The difficulty arises when the settlor manifests an intention to create a trust and identifies the intended beneficiaries with sufficient precision, but nevertheless fails to identify which property is meant to be held on trust. Suppose a situation in which a settlor decided that he wished to hold on trust three of his collection of 12 vintage racing cars for the benefit of his grandchildren. In that situation, if the settlor failed to specify which three out of the total holding of 12 racing cars were to be held on trust, the trust would be invalid for uncertainty of subject matter because the trustees would not be able to know which three cars were to be held on trust.¹⁴⁶ Therefore, as a general rule, failure to segregate the intended trust property from all other property will lead the trust to be void.¹⁴⁷

Similarly, if the settlor wished to settle £30,000 on trust for his three grandchildren in equal shares, but did not identify which £30,000 out of his total fortune of £2 million was to form the trust fund, then the trust would also be void.¹⁴⁸ Interestingly, it is not necessary for the £30,000 itself to be divided into three separate parcels of £10,000 for each grandchild, because the trustees will hold the entire £30,000 for the three beneficiaries as joint tenants under a single trust provided that the fund of £30,000 is itself sufficiently certain. However, as will emerge below, it remains a contentious issue whether the same rule applies to intangible property as applies to tangible property.¹⁴⁹

The simplest example of this principle on the decided cases considering certainty of subject matter is *Re London Wine Co.*¹⁵⁰ In that case, creditors of a vintner's business sought to claim that their contracts for the purchase of wine ought to grant them proprietary rights in wine held in the vintner's cellars. However, Oliver J held that the creditors would only be entitled to assert proprietary claims as beneficiaries under a trust over any wine held in the cellar if each creditor could demonstrate that particular, identifiable bottles of wine had been 146 Re Goldcorp [1995] 1 AC 74; Anthony v Donges [1998] 2 FLR 775.

147 Re London Wine Co (Shippers) Ltd [1986] PCC 121; Re Goldcorp [1995] 1 AC 74.

148 MacJordan Construction Ltd v Brookmount Erostin Ltd [1992] BCLC 350; Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669, at para 3.4.3 below.

149 Hunter v Moss [1994] 1 WLR 452; Re Harvard Securities Ltd [1997] 2 BCLC 369.

150 Re London Wine Co (Shippers) Ltd [1986] PCC 121.

segregated from the general stock held in the cellar and held separately to their account. If so, those identifiable bottles of wine would be held on trust for the claimant. However, if that wine had not been so segregated (whether in breach of contract or not), there would not be any proprietary rights over any wine held in the cellar. On these facts there had been no such segregation and therefore there was no trust. This approach is referred to here as being ‘the orthodox approach’.

As Oliver J put the matter in Re London Wine:

I appreciate the point taken that the subject matter is a part of a homogenous mass so that specific identity is of as little importance as it is, for instance, in the case of money. Nevertheless, as it seems to me, to create a trust it must be possible to ascertain with certainty not only what the interest of the beneficiary is to be but to what property it is to attach.

His Lordship was therefore not careless in coming to this conclusion but rather acknowledged that property rights must attach to some property and may not simply exist in thin air.

Re London Wine draws on a line of old cases.¹⁵¹ By way of example, in Sprange v Barnard,¹⁵² a testatrix provided that property would be left to her husband to use absolutely but that ‘the remaining part of what is left, that he does not want for his own wants and use’ was to be held on defined trusts. It was held that this statement was too uncertain for the trust to take effect over any part of the property because the property was not sufficiently clearly identified by the expression ‘the remaining part of what is left’.¹⁵³ Similarly, in Palmer v Simmonds,¹⁵⁴ a testatrix left ‘the bulk of her estate’ on certain trusts. It was held that the subject matter of this trust was too uncertain by dint of the vagueness of the expression ‘the bulk’. For a trust to be valid, the settlor must make the subject matter of the trust certain.

3.4.2 The application of the orthodox approach

The London Wine case was followed in an appeal to the Privy Council in Re Goldcorp.¹⁵⁵ That case affirmed the principle that property must be separately identified before it can be held on a valid trust. The facts in Goldcorp appear to be complicated at the outset. However, they are easily laid out with a touch of simplification so as to illustrate the key principles. For the purposes of this discussion, there were three classes of claimant: that is important. The added complexity is the result of counsel for the complainants attempting to use a host of sophisticated, imaginative arguments to support their clients’ cases.

Re Goldcorp concerned a gold bullion exchange which went into insolvency. The exchange acted for clients in acquiring bullion for them. It also offered a further service in 151 Harland v Trigg (1782) 1 Bro CC 142; Wynne v Hawkins (1782) 1 Bro CC 142; Pierson v Garnet (1786) 2 Bro CC 226; Sprange v Barnard (1789) 2 Bro CC 585; Palmer v Simmonds (1854) 2 Drew 221; Choithram International SA v Pagarani [2001] 1 WLR 1.

152 (1789) 2 Bro CC 585.

153 However, rather than hold the entire bequest invalid, the rule in Hancock v Watson [1902] AC 14 (considered at para 3.4.4 below) was applied so as to uphold the validity of the gift in favour of the husband and merely invalidate the trust.

154 (1854) 2 Drew 221.

155 [1995] 1 AC 74; Associated Alloys Pty v CAN (2000) 71 Aus LR 568.

which it acted as depository for the bullion which clients asked it to buy. Typically, the exchange's standard-form contracts with its clients required the exchange to buy and hold physically all of the weight of bullion specified in the clients' orders, rather than merely acknowledging an obligation to acquire that bullion in the future should the buyer ask for delivery of the bullion.¹⁵⁶ Therefore, the exchange was contractually bound to hold the whole of any client order physically in its vaults. However, the exchange slipped into the practice which is common among financial institutions which fall into insolvency: it only took physical delivery of as much bullion as it usually needed to satisfy customers' day-to-day needs. It therefore broke its contracts by failing to buy all of the bullion in the order. When the exchange went into insolvency, it did not hold enough bullion to satisfy its clients' orders, even though it had taken their money.

The claimants were clients of the exchange who were seeking to demonstrate that bullion was held on trust for them as a result of their contracts with the exchange. In consequence, they sought to avoid the exchange's insolvency by having themselves accepted as being secured creditors under the trust.¹⁵⁷ The first category of claimants had proprietary rights in specifically identifiable holdings of bullion which the exchange had actually acquired physically to match its customers' orders. This class of claimant was successful in demonstrating that they had equitable proprietary rights in that particular bullion because that bullion had been segregated and was therefore identifiable. Segregation in this instance meant that the successful claimants' bullion was held physically apart from all other bullion within the vaults – whether in safety deposit boxes, or caged off separately in some other way from the bulk of unsegregated bullion held by the exchange. Those claimants satisfied the requirement of certainty of subject matter.

The second class of clients did not have their bullion segregated from the bulk of bullion held by the exchange. Therefore, they were not able to identify a particular stock of bullion in the vaults and show that it was held on trust for them. Rather, all they could show was a contractual entitlement to an amount of bullion bearing a specific monetary value but which was otherwise unidentifiable. This category of claimants did not satisfy the requirement of certainty of subject matter and therefore acquired no rights under a trust.

Counsel for the second class of clients attempted to raise a number of different arguments to support their contention that a trust had been created in favour of their own clients, all of which arguments failed for the same reason. First, they argued that the exchange had entered into contracts to provide a specific type and quantity of bullion, so that their clients acquired rights under the doctrine of specific performance against the exchange. Therefore, they contended, their clients ought to have received equitable rights in the bullion, akin to the doctrine in Walsh v Lonsdale.¹⁵⁸ However, Lord Mustill held that the property was nevertheless unidentifiable, and therefore there could be no equitable proprietary rights because there was no identifiable property to which they could have attached. Secondly, counsel argued 156 This is common practice: typically clients are only investing in bullion and so never take delivery of it because they intend to sell it as soon as its market price increases. Therefore, exchanges often take their clients' money, acknowledge that they owe the clients a given amount of bullion if delivery of it is ever requested, and hold only as much bullion as is needed on any normal trading day.

157 In terms of trusts law, a beneficiary under a trust will be a secured creditor of a trustee in the event that the trustee goes into bankruptcy. Such a secured creditor is entitled to have its property held separately from the remainder of the bankrupt's estate which is divided among the unsecured creditors.

158 (1882) 21 Ch D 9.

that there should have been proprietary estoppel rights on the basis that the exchange had represented to their clients that they would hold bullion for them, in reliance on which their clients had paid money. Again, Lord Mustill refused to apply the estoppel doctrine on the basis that there was no specific, segregated property over which those equitable proprietary rights could bite in any event.

The third category of claimant, an individual, highlights the rigid nature of this rule. He had placed an order to buy maple leaf gold coins – a rare form of coin of which the exchange would not usually carry a large stock. This customer, Mr Leggatt, made a large order for those coins and agreed that the exchange would keep them in its vault on safe deposit. There were, therefore, a handful of coins which the exchange ordinarily held, mixed in together with the large order of coins acquired for Mr Leggatt. The claimant could demonstrate that the exchange would not have bought the unusually large number of these coins for any other customer. Unfortunately for the client, those coins had not been separated from all the coins and bullion held by the exchange. Consequently, Mr Leggatt's coins were not identifiable as being the property belonging to Leggatt distinct from the exchange's other coins. Therefore, the logical conclusion is that the rule revolves not simply around it being logistically possible to identify the property, but rather that the property itself has actually been segregated for the purpose of subjecting it to the trust arrangement. Suppose I contract to buy 1,000 coins from an exchange which ordinarily holds six such coins: there would therefore be 1,006 of these coins in the exchange's vaults. If my 1,000 coins are mixed with the six coins, then there will not be sufficient certainty of subject matter for me to have an equitable interest under a trust in those coins. My 1,000 coins would need to be separated from the exchange's six coins for me to have such an equitable interest under a trust in the 1,000 coins.

3.4.3 An exception for fungible or for intangible property?

There is potentially a distinction in the foregoing principle between property which may be identified without segregation, and property which is entirely fungible (such as sugar or liquids) and therefore incapable of separate identification, or intangible (such as shares or patents).¹⁵⁹ In general terms, there is no reason why the orthodox approach considered above should not apply equally to intangible property as to tangible property. The principle in Re London Wine was also applied by the Court of Appeal in MacJordan Construction v Brookmount,¹⁶⁰ where a claim arose as to a trust over a bank account. In that case, under the terms of a construction contract, stage payments owing to a sub-contractor were to be paid on given dates.¹⁶¹ Amounts of money had been paid into one large bank account during the performance of the construction contract, but the stage payments owing to the sub-contractor had not been segregated from other amounts held in that account. It was argued on behalf of the sub-contractor that money owed to it ought to have been deemed to have been held on trust for it. It was held that for the formation of a valid trust over those moneys, it would have been necessary to segregate any money which was to be held on trust from other money in the bank account by paying that money into a new bank account.¹⁶² Therefore, it was held that a trust over intangible property in the form of money in a bank account would require segregation before it could be made subject to a trust.

159 Re Staplyton Fletcher Ltd [1994] 1 WLR 1181.

160 [1992] BCLC 350.

161 Given the size of the amounts payable under large construction contracts, rather than pay the entire sum either at the start or at the end, the amounts are paid periodically during the life of the contract.

While MacJordan would appear to speak for the orthodox approach, the decision of the Court of Appeal in *Hunter v Moss*¹⁶³ reached a different conclusion in relation to the formation of a trust over fungible, intangible property. In that case, an employee of a company was entitled to 50 shares out of 950 shares held by the employer under the employee's contract of employment. The employer did not transfer the shares to the employee, nor were any attempts made to identify those shares which were to be subject to the arrangement. The issue arose as to whether or not the employee could assert that he had proprietary rights over 50 shares. If we were to apply the rule in *Goldcorp*¹⁶⁴ to these facts, there would be no valid trust over the shares because it would be impossible to know which 50 shares out of the total holding of 950 shares were to be held on trust.

Dillon LJ took a different approach in Hunter from that set out in Goldcorp and held that there was a valid trust over the shares. There appear to have been two underlying motivations for this decision, beyond the detailed arguments considered below. The first was that the finding of a trust would enforce the terms of the employment contract between the parties; and the second was that it made no practical difference which 50 shares were subject to the trust given that there is no qualitative difference between one ordinary share and another ordinary share (provided those shares are of the same class and in the same company). In essence, the Court of Appeal appeared to hold that it was not necessary to segregate the property comprising the trust fund if the property was intangible property, like ordinary shares, with each unit being indistinguishable from another unit (an approach which was approved in *Re Harvard Securities Ltd*¹⁶⁵ following Hunter v Moss, considered below). There are three notable features of the judgment.

The first notable feature is the way in which Dillon LJ justified the theoretical possibility of creating trust rights over a collection of identical property. Dillon LJ cross-referred the rights of the claimant in *Hunter v Moss*¹⁶⁶ with the position of an executor on a testator's death. The point he made was that there was a situation in English law in which a trustee is entitled to enforce a trust over unsegregated property. That situation was the position of an executor holding property as trustee of a will trust. His Lordship explained that on the testator's death, the executor is required to distribute the property between the legatees, even if the testator had not indicated which beneficiary was required to acquire interests in which property; rather, it was argued that the executor is required to divide the general fund of property between the legatees. From this premise, Dillon LJ held that it was impossible to say that there was no situation in which the law permitted trusts over unsegregated property. Having established that the rule requiring segregation was not an absolute rule, Dillon LJ felt sufficiently empowered to find a trust on the facts before him.

The objection to this line of reasoning is that an executor occupies a very different position from an inter vivos trustee. The executor acquires legal title in all of the deceased's 162 However, it should be noted that on the facts of the case it was not established that there had been sufficient intention to create a trust in any event.

163 [1994] 1 WLR 452.

164 [1995] AC 74.

165 [1997] 2 BCLC 369.

166 [1994] 1 WLR 452.

property, with a power to make division of property in accordance with the terms of the will as the personal representative of the deceased, whereas the inter vivos trustee acquires nothing more than legal title in those assets which the settlor makes subject to the trust. The executor stands in the shoes of the deceased person with the power to distribute all the property attaching to the deceased's estate at death almost as though she were the deceased person – that is what it means to be an executor or a personal representative. In essence it is always known which property is to be dealt with under a will trust: that is, all of the testator's property. Therefore, it is open to the executor (in a situation in which the settlor is unable to resettle the property) to allocate title between items of property. The inter vivos trustee, on the other hand, is entitled to exercise the rights of legal title only over that property which is subject to the trust. That is the heart of the problem: the inter vivos trustee cannot know which property falls under her remit, whereas the executor knows that she has title in the whole of the property formerly vested in the testator, and so there cannot be uncertainty of subject matter in this instance.

The second notable feature of the decision in Hunter v Moss is the manner in which Dillon LJ distinguished Hunter from the London Wine case.¹⁶⁷ It is typically said that Dillon LJ sets out an express test that there is a difference between tangible and intangible property. In fact he does not make any such affirmative statement; rather, he distinguishes the London Wine line of cases so that he is entitled to uphold Moss's rights on the facts before him. It is the obvious conclusion to draw that Dillon LJ must have meant to make a distinction between tangible and intangible property.¹⁶⁸ However, it is difficult to see how far that distinction can extend – as considered below. What Dillon LJ actually held was that, after having considered Re London Wine, 'that case was concerned with the allocation of title in chattels whereas this case is concerned with a declaration of trust over shares'. In effect, the difference is between a question of property law as to who takes what rights in which chattels and a different question as to whether or not there has been a valid declaration of trust over shares. Admittedly Dillon LJ's meaning is somewhat elliptically expressed. However, his words are clearly not the same as setting out an explicit test that there must be a distinction made between tangible and intangible property.¹⁶⁹

There are cases in which a distinction has been made between tangible and intangible property. At first instance in Hunter v Moss,¹⁷⁰ Judge Rimer QC did refer to US decisions which held that there may be some forms of chattel like bushels of wheat which are in effect indistinguishable (and therefore which require no certainty of subject matter)¹⁷¹ and cases involving intangibles.¹⁷²

Among the English cases there has been one decision which has applied the rule apparently drawn from the Court of Appeal in Hunter v Moss that there is one rule for intangible property and another rule for tangible property: that is, the decision of Neuberger J in Re Harvard Securities (Holland v Newbury).¹⁷³ In Harvard Securities, a dealer in financial securities held securities as nominee for his clients. While the terms of the contracts suggested

167 [1986] PCC 121.

168 Although one might think that his Lordship was trying very hard not to make that the distinction.

169 Clarke, 1995; Martin, 1996.

170 [1993] 1 WLR 934.

171 Caswell v Putnam (120 NY 154).

172 Richardson v Shaw 209 US 365 (1908); Busch v Truitt (1945) LA No 19256, 27 November.

173 [1997] 2 BCLC 369.

that the dealer held the securities on bare trust for each of his clients, the securities were not numbered and were not segregated. In consequence, none of the clients was able to identify which securities were held on bare trust for which client. Neuberger J distinguished Re Wait,¹⁷⁴ *Re London Wine*¹⁷⁵ and *Re Goldcorp*¹⁷⁶ on the basis that those cases concerned chattels, and considered himself obliged by the doctrine of precedent to apply *Hunter v Moss*¹⁷⁷ because that case similarly concerned intangible securities. It was therefore held that the trusts were not invalid for uncertainty of subject matter because the securities were intangible property and therefore did not require segregation.

A further feature is to understand the legal principle for which Hunter could be said to be the law. It is the case that Hunter is a Court of Appeal authority for the proposition that there are circumstances in which it is not necessary to segregate property for it to be held validly on trust. By contrast, Goldcorp is persuasive authority only, being a decision of the Privy Council. However, Hunter appears to be an unsatisfactory authority.

In Australia, a decision of the Supreme Court of New South Wales in *White v Shortall*¹⁷⁸ explicitly rejected the approach taken by Dillon LJ in Hunter v Moss. In White v Shortall the parties entered into a contract whereby (amongst other things) the defendant was to declare a trust over a total holding of 1,500,000 shares such that the claimant would acquire an equitable interest in 222,000 of those shares. The argument was raised that, like Hunter v Moss, a distinct trust could take effect over just the 222,000 shares. There had been no segregation of those shares from the entire 1,500,000 shareholding. The court upheld the validity of the trust but explicitly disavowed the rationale in Hunter v Moss. Instead, the inference which the court took from the facts was that a single trust took effect over the entire holding of 1,500,000 shares such that the trustees had a power to elect which 222,000 shares out of that entire shareholding were to be treated as being held for the claimant. This avoided the problem of certainty of subject matter because the trust took effect over the identified fund of 1,500,000 shares, but there was no need to segregate out 222,000 shares under a separate trust if the trustees were to have a power to split off that number of shares from the valid trust fund: therefore, the claimant had an equitable interest in the large trust equal to 222,000 shares and the defendant was deemed to have an equitable interest equal to the remaining shares. In effect, the claimant and the defendant were treated as being beneficiaries under one trust in the ratio 1,500:222. (This idea is discussed in more detail below.)

The Supreme Court of New South Wales dismissed the arguments used by Dillon LJ in Hunter v Moss when purporting to justify granting a trust in that case. Dillon LJ sought to justify dispensing with the need for certainty of subject matter on the basis that most of the authorities had concerned chattels and on the basis that executors of a will trust do not know the property which they are to hold on trust and yet such trusts are valid. Neither argument holds water in that executors know that they hold on trust any property owned by the testator at the time of death, and that there is no reason in principle for distinguishing between tangible and intangible property except that it led conveniently to the answer Dillon LJ wanted to reach and only if one ignored the earlier decision of the Court of Appeal in

174 [1927] 1 Ch 606.

175 [1986] PCC 121.

176 [1995] AC 74.

177 [1994] 1 WLR 452.

178 [2006] NSWSC 1379.

MacJordan v Brookmount.¹⁷⁹ The judgment in Hunter v Moss is therefore a slender reed on which to base an argument that trusts over intangible property do not require certainty of subject matter. Doctrinally, it is suggested that the decision in Hunter v Moss is wrong and should not be relied upon; the alternative analysis in White v Shortall (if one wishes to elude Re Goldcorp) is more satisfying.

Problems with the approach in Hunter v Moss

There are a number of problems with the decision in Hunter v Moss. Three important issues arise. First, Hunter v Moss ignores the manner in which the logic of English property law requires that there be specific and identifiable property which is the subject of the property right.¹⁸⁰ Thus, when considering rights in an asset like a share which is held on a register, the property right involved is not the share (because that is a piece of property which is distinguishable from other shares) but the chose in action represented by the entry on the register (because that is a transferable right between the shareholder, the registry and the company).¹⁸¹ Effecting a trust over a chose in action makes segregation of the property a more abstract exercise than in relation to tangible property, but as a representation of title (such as an entry on a share register), being able to identify which property is held on trust and which property is not so held is no less important.

Secondly, it was open to the Court of Appeal to decide that there had been a valid trust created only because there were sufficient shares to satisfy the claim. The Court of Appeal could not have decided the same way on the facts of Goldcorp because there were more claims than there was property to satisfy them. If there is a distinction to be made between cases in which it would be valid to hold one trust valid despite insufficient segregation and another trust invalid on grounds of insufficient segregation, that distinction would be between cases where the legal owner of that property is solvent or insolvent, and not between tangible and intangible property. In the event that the legal owner of property is insolvent, a range of concerns to do with achieving justice between unsecured creditors arises. The pari passu principle beloved of insolvency lawyers¹⁸² requires that no unsecured creditor is advantaged ahead of any other unsecured creditor – equality is equity in that context. However, where the legal owner of property is solvent, it would be possible to argue that it does not matter whether or not the property is sufficiently segregated provided that there is some legal obligation between the parties whereby the legal owner is required to account to the claimant for some equitable interest in the property under contract or otherwise. Provided no other person's interests would be affected by such an equitable interest (such as in relation to the pari passu principle), then there is no harm in enforcing the trust. If the interests of another person were affected only as a result of the doctrine of notice, that is where the arrangement fails to acknowledge the existence of some pre-existing right in the property in some third party, that (it is suggested) is a question of breach of some other duty and not a question of certainty of subject matter.

179 [1992] BCLC 350.

180 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669, per Lord Browne-Wilkinson, expressly approving Re Goldcorp.

181 Hudson, 2000:1.

182 See perhaps Re Whitaker [1901] 1 Chap 9; Re BCCI (No 8) [1995] Ch 46; Stein v Blake [1996] 1 AC 243, HL.

Thirdly, it is difficult to see why there ought to be a specific rule for intangible property. It is possible for tangible property potentially to be subject to the same principle that applies to intangible property. The US case of *Caswell v Putnam*¹⁸³ points out that bushels of wheat are to all intents and purposes indistinguishable (provided that they are of the same weight and of roughly the same quality). With reference to other tangible property, for example, mass manufactured products in which one unit is unidentifiable from another unit of property, there is no reason to suggest that a different rule should be applied to them than is applied to intangible property. In relation to a fund of 1,000 ball bearings (that is, tangible and identical metal objects), it can make no more difference if any 500 are separated out than it would matter if 500 shares were separated out from a total holding of 1,000 shares. Therefore, the distinction made on the basis of tangible and intangible property is spurious. The better distinction (if one must be made) is that outlined above in relation to solvent and insolvent trustees.

Certainty of intention in relation to the property

There is the further question of distinguishing between problems caused by uncertainty as to the identity of the trust property itself and uncertainty as to which beneficiary is intended to have beneficial interests in which trust property. Where the settlor fails to make the beneficial interests plain, that property will be held on resulting trust for the settlor.¹⁸⁴

In two further cases, similar issues arose. In Re Golay Morris v Bridgewater and Others,¹⁸⁵ it was held that a provision that a 'reasonable income' be provided out of a fund could be held to be valid if one could make an objective measurement of what would constitute a reasonable income in any particular case. A contrary approach was shown in Re Kolb's Will Trusts,¹⁸⁶ in which the testator had directed trustees in his will to invest in 'blue chip' stocks. On these facts, Cross J held that insufficient power had been given to the trustees to decide what was meant by 'blue chip'. A possible distinction between Golay and Kolb might be to examine whether or not on the facts of any particular case the trustees have sufficient power to enable them to decide which property is intended to fall within the trust fund and which property should not.

Where the trust fails for uncertainty of subject matter, no trust will have been properly created because there was no fund of property ever impressed with a trust.¹⁸⁷ This latter proposition derives from the necessity that there be property over which the trust takes effect – where there is no such property, there can never be said to have been a trust at all. Where it is the identity of the beneficiaries which is uncertain, the trust fund may well be impressed with a trust and the trustee be subject to fiduciary obligations, but the settlor will receive the equitable interest in such property on resulting trust.¹⁸⁸

183 (120 NY 154).

184 Boyce v Boyce (1849) 16 Sim 476.

185 [1965] 1 WLR 969.

186 [1962] Ch 531.

187 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

188 Vandervell v IRC [1967] 2 AC 291, HL.

An explanation based on 'achieving equity'

One possible further distinction which could be drawn between Goldcorp and Hunter v Moss is that in Goldcorp the court was concerned solely with the allocation of property rights, whereas in Hunter v Moss the court was concerned to prevent the employer from benefiting from a breach of contract. In the former case, the court's principal concern was to administer the insolvency of the exchange by allocating property rights between the competing claimants. As such, an approach based on rigid certainty was appropriate because it was only possible to justify giving any claimant rights in property (and thus depriving other creditors of part of the money properly owed to them) if that claimant could have proved with certainty a right in the property claimed. In the latter case, the employer was contractually bound not only to pay a salary to the employee but also to transfer to that employee a given number of shares. Therefore, the court could have said that the employer in Hunter v Moss had not come to equity with clean hands – that is, that the employer should not have been entitled to rely upon the strict rules of certainty of trusts as a means of enabling him to commit a breach of contract.

Therefore, the approach in Hunter v Moss is probably best explained by seeing it as a case where the court failed to follow the prevailing precedent because it was concerned to do justice between the parties. That is very much within the spirit of equity as a means of reaching the 'right' result. The court in Goldcorp was similarly concerned to do justice between the parties, but that necessitated the rigid application of the prevailing orthodoxy because of the exchange's insolvency so that no one unsecured creditor should be advantaged over the other unsecured creditors. What is interesting here is that while the principles of trusts law are becoming ever more rigid and more akin to the rules of contract at common law, there is a substratum of equity at work which sees judges prepared to overlook the application of the rigid rules of trusts law when there is some more general issue of fairness between the parties at stake. It is almost as if the ancient principles of equity were needed to achieve fairness where the modern principles of trusts law produce unfairness. An example of the courts reaching back into those ancient principles, dusting them down and putting them to work in new contexts. A form of postmodernism in equity perhaps?¹⁸⁹

The approach in commercial law

The detail of the rules of commercial law and their interaction with the law of trusts are considered in Chapter 21. In outline terms it can be observed at this juncture that the approach which the law of sale of goods and the law of carriage of goods by sea take to rights in property is occasionally different from that under ordinary property law. Take, for example, a ship sailing from Calcutta carrying cotton for delivery in London at Tilbury Docks. The shipment will, typically, contain more cotton than is necessary for the seller to meet one buyer's order. It may be that the shipment contains cotton to meet the seller's obligations to three buyers. Under the law of carriage of goods by sea, a number of issues arise. The principal concern is as to which of the parties (seller, shipper, or buyer) bears the risk of the cotton being lost at sea or otherwise damaged before delivery to Tilbury Docks. Under 189 'Postmodernism' is defined by Jameson, 1991, to include a pastiche of older ideas or styles by adapting them to new situations or contexts, often ironically – particularly in relation to architecture.

general principles of the law of sale of goods, where a contract specifies that one party or the other bears the risk of a cargo being lost, then it is that person who shall bear the cost of replacing the value of the goods so as to give effect to her obligations under the contract of sale.¹⁹⁰ So, if the buyer takes the risk, then the buyer must pay the purchase price to the seller no matter what, and if the seller takes the risk, then the seller must still deliver goods of like kind at her own expense to the buyer.¹⁹¹

However, suppose that the shipment was lost and that the buyer's contract contained a provision that the cotton should be deemed to be held on trust for the buyer until delivered at Tilbury Docks. The issue faced by the buyer under ordinary principles of trusts law would be that the cotton contracted for is mixed with cotton intended for delivery to other people and therefore there would not be a valid trust over that cotton.

In general terms the approach of the case law to questions of the creation of trusts in commercial situations is the same as that for ordinary property situations. So, for example, in Re Wait,¹⁹² it was held that when the claimant had rights to 500 tons of wheat out of a total shipment of 1,000 tons carried from Oregon, that claimant had no proprietary rights to any 500 tons out of the total 1,000 tons held by the shipper at the time of his bankruptcy because no such 500 tons had been segregated and held to the claimant's order. In short, the claimant had only a contractual right at common law to be delivered 500 tons of wheat, but no equitable proprietary right in any identified 500 tons.

However, in cases like Re Staplyton,¹⁹³ there are clear distinctions drawn between rules of commercial law and norms of ordinary property law in relation to a store of wines kept in warehouses by a vintner for its customers but where those bottles of wine were not marked as being held for any particular customer. Following the decision in Re London Wine, there could have been no question that any customer took rights in any particular bottles of wine – rather, all customers should have had only the rights of unsecured creditors against the entire stock of wine. Nevertheless, in Re Staplyton, Judge Baker QC applied dicta in Wait and in *Liggett v Kensington*¹⁹⁴ to the effect that contracts to carry or store goods for another do not necessarily create equitable interests in such goods. But the judge applied s 16 of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 to find that the wine claimed by the plaintiff was sufficiently 'ascertainable' for the purposes of commercial law.

Therefore, the approach taken by the application of commercial law statute is different from the position under ordinary principles of the law of trusts. As a result of the Sale of Goods (Amendment) Act 1995, the effect of *Re Goldcorp*¹⁹⁵ would be nullified in relation to contracts for sale of goods. The 1995 Act created ss 20A and 20B of the Sale of Goods Act 1979.¹⁹⁶ In relation to a sale of a 'specified quantity of unascertained goods',¹⁹⁷ if the goods form part of a bulk which is itself identified and if the buyer has paid the full contractual price for those goods,¹⁹⁸ then 'property in an undivided share in the bulk is transferred to the 190 Martineau v Kitchling (1872) LR 7 QB 436, 454, per Blackburn J.

191 Eg, Healy v Howlett & Sons [1917] 1 KB 337.

192 [1927] 1 Ch 606.

193 [1994] 1 WLR 1181.

194 [1993] 1 NZLR 257.

195 [1995] AC 74.

196 Sale of Goods (Amendment) Act 1995, s 1(3).

197 Sale of Goods Act 1979, s 20A(1).

198 Ibid.

buyer¹⁹⁹ so that ‘the buyer becomes an owner in common of the bulk’.²⁰⁰ So, if three buyers were entitled to 100 tons each out of a shipment of 300 tons of cotton, then they would be deemed at common law to be owners as tenants in common of one-third of whatever cotton was held on board ship. That that cotton is held at common law means that there is no need for segregation of the property so as to give effect to a trust (because the beneficiaries’ rights under a trust would take effect in equity). Therefore, in relation to sales of goods (as with the contracts at the heart of the Goldcorp litigation), all of the purchasers would be deemed to be tenants in common in accordance with the proportionate size of their contractual entitlements by the 1979 Act. Therefore, the buyer would be able to rely on the 1979 Act to grant her a common law proprietary right in the cotton as a tenant in common with the other buyers who have rights against the entirety of the shipment. This principle, it is suggested, operates as a statutory exception to the general principles of the law of trusts and of the law of property.

The approaches of commercial law to these questions are considered further in Chapter 21.

The problem of after-acquired property

One further problem arises in relation to certainty of subject matter. That problem relates to the situation in which a person undertakes to create a trust on Day 1 on the basis that the trust fund will be property which will be acquired on Day 2. This issue is considered in detail in section 5.6. In short, the question as to whether or not there was a valid trust created on Day 1 would depend on whether or not the promisor had a vested right in the property purportedly settled on trust at the time of making the declaration on Day 1.²⁰¹ Allied to the question of whether or not a valid trust is created is the further question as to the identity of the property which is settled on the terms of the trust. In theory, such a trust is valid provided that the property can be identified (on the terms set out above in this section) and provided that the settlor had a sufficient proprietary right at the time of purporting to create the trust.²⁰²

New types of property: constituting trusts over non-transferable assets

It is a difficult question to know what will constitute ‘property’ capable of being held on trust in some circumstances. This interesting question as to the essential nature of ‘property’ versus ‘non-property’ is considered in detail in Chapter 31. It is often said that the key defining feature of property is that it can be transferred to another person.²⁰³ That thesis is no longer English law, however. To explain why this is the case will require a little background. It has become a feature of modern commercial life that people borrow money more than they used to, and that people frequently use their future cash flows as collateral when borrowing money. Indeed, information about anticipated, future cash flows are generally the best material which a bank and other commercial people have when deciding whether or not to enter into a transaction with someone: whether or not that person will have any money tomorrow

199 Ibid., s 20A(2).

200 Ibid.

201 Re Brooks’ ST [1939] 1 Ch 993; Re Ralli’s WT [1964] 2 WLR 144; Williams’ Trustees v IRC [1947] AC 447.

202 Tailby v Official Receiver (1888) 13 App Cas 523; Re Lind [1915] 2 Ch 345; Performing Rights Society v London Theatre [1924] AC 1; Norman v Federal Commissioner of Taxation (1963) 109 CLR 9.

203 See, for example, Penner, 1997, 105.

is a key part of their profitability in a fast-paced commercial world. Commercial people therefore like to be able to enter into transactions whereby they use their future cash flows as collateral. Indeed, this issue is connected to the issue considered in the previous paragraph, which is considered in greater detail in section 5.6.

In *Vandepitte v Preferred Accident Insurance Corporation of New York*²⁰⁴ the Privy Council accepted that when a father took out a motor insurance contract in his own name it would be possible for that contract to be held for the benefit of another person and for it to be held on trust, even though the terms of the contract limited rights to sue in the law of contract to the father alone. Therefore, the principle was accepted that the benefit of a contract may itself be property. There has been a slew of cases dealing with assets which are not transferable but which may nevertheless constitute property. This point was accepted in *Barbados Trust Co v Bank of Zambia*²⁰⁵ where a financial instrument provided that assets could only be transferred to given types of entity: even though the claimant was not one of those types of entity, it was nevertheless held possible for the benefits to be derived from that instrument to be capable of forming the subject matter of a trust in favour of that person.²⁰⁶

As considered earlier in this chapter, in Don King v Warren the cash flows which were expected to be earned from boxing promotion contracts could be the subject matter of a trust, even though the terms of the boxing promotion contracts provided that the contracts themselves could not be transferred to any other person. Therefore, the benefits of these contracts could be held on trust. Lightman J considered the principle in Vandepitte and in particular the argument that to find the existence of a valid trust over non-transferable assets would be to circumvent the contractual provision that the benefit not be transferred. Lightman J held that the court would be careful in its application to commercial cases but that such a property right was nevertheless possible. In *Swift v Dairywise*²⁰⁷ milk quotas which were non-transferable entitlements to sell milk were nevertheless found to give rise to benefits which themselves would constitute property. Similarly in *Re Celtic Extraction*²⁰⁸ government licences to do works and dispose of waste were also expressed to be non-transferable, but the benefits which derived from them were capable of constituting property.

3.4.4 Certainty of subject matter in testamentary and other trusts

By separating this section from the foregoing discussion it is not suggested that there are different principles operating in general terms for testamentary trusts and floating charges; rather, there are complex conclusions in this context which follow from the logic of the rule requiring certainty of subject matter which has been considered above. There are three possible results of a trust being found to be void for uncertainty of subject matter. First, the trust is completely void and the property is held for the settlor on resulting trust. Or, secondly, the rule in *Hancock v Watson*²⁰⁹ validates other parts of a will in spite of the invalidity of a particular trust power on grounds of uncertainty. Or, thirdly, the power is interpreted not 204 [1933] AC 70 (PC).

205 Barbados Trust Co Ltd v Bank of Zambia [2006] EWHC 222 (Comm), [2006] 1 Lloyd's Rep 723, para [58].

206 See also Law Debenture Trust Corporation v Elektrim Finance NV [2006] EWHC 1305 (Ch), [2006] All ER (D) 97 (Jun).

207 [2000] 1 All ER 320.

208 [1999] 4 All ER 684.

209 [1902] AC 14.

to be a trust power but rather some other form of power not subject to a requirement of certainty – such as a floating charge.

The rule in Hancock v Watson

The rule in Hancock v Watson,²¹⁰ derived from *Sprange v Barnard*²¹¹ and Lassence v Tierney,²¹² provides for a particular means of allocating property on death where a trust fails. The rule provides that in circumstances in which property has been left to a legatee as an absolute gift but subject to some trust which has failed, the legatee takes the property absolutely.

This proposition might be best illustrated by an example. Suppose that a testator had left ‘all my money to Brian absolutely but so that any money he does not need will be held on trust for my cousin Vinny’. In that situation, the testator has made an absolute gift of the money in favour of Brian but subject to a trust over a part of that money. On the terms of the trust in this example, the subject matter of the trust in favour of Vinny is too uncertain and will therefore be held to be void. It might have been expected that on failure of the trust the entire gift ought to fail and the property be held on resulting trust for the estate as part of the testator’s residuary estate. However, the rule in *Hancock v Watson*²¹³ enforces the absolute gift and merely avoids the trust power which was held invalid on grounds of uncertainty of subject matter: so Brian takes the sole beneficial interest in all of the money as legatee.

So, in the case of Sprange v Barnard,²¹⁴ a testatrix had left property to her husband ‘for his sole use’, subject only to a provision that ‘all that is remaining in the stock, that he has not necessary use for, to be divided equally between [named beneficiaries]’. It was held the trust power over ‘all that is remaining’ was void for uncertainty because it could not be known what was necessary for the husband’s use. Therefore, the husband took the property absolutely beneficially. Similarly, in Palmer v Simmonds,²¹⁵ a testatrix had left money to her husband for ‘his use and benefit’ subject to a trust to take effect on the husband’s death ‘to leave the bulk of my residuary estate’ to named relatives. This trust over ‘the bulk’ of the deceased wife’s estate was held void for uncertainty of subject matter. In consequence, the husband took his wife’s estate absolutely beneficially free from the trust. In both cases, the principle embodied subsequently in the rule in Hancock v Watson provided for the gifts to continue in effect, even though the trusts attached to them were held to have been void for uncertainty.

Floating charges

A purported trust in relation to ‘the remaining part of what is left’ has been held insufficient to support the finding of a valid trust over property, on the basis that it was insufficiently certain which property was being referred to.²¹⁶ The alternative analysis of such provisions

210 Ibid.

211 (1789) 2 Bro CC 585.

212 (1849) 1 Mac & G 551.

213 [1902] AC 14.

214 (1789) 2 Bro CC 585.

215 (1854) 2 Drew 221.

216 Sprange v Barnard (1789) 2 Bro CC 585; see para 23.2.2 below in relation to floating charges generally.

is then that they create a mere floating charge, such that the person seeking to enforce the arrangement would acquire only a right of a given value which related to a general pool of property without that right attaching to any particular part of it. Such a structure would be weaker than a proprietary trust right in the event of an insolvency because no identified property is held outside the insolvent person's estate in the insolvency proceedings.

The case of *Clough Mill v Martin*²¹⁷ has already been considered above in relation to the necessary intention to create a trust.²¹⁸ In that case, a supplier of yarn had entered into a contract with a clothes manufacturer under which the supplier was granted proprietary rights in any unused yarn and, significantly, in any clothes made with that yarn until it received payment from the clothes manufacturer. It was held by the Court of Appeal that there was insufficient intention to create a trust of any particular stock of clothing. In part, the court considered the fact that the identity of the property over which the supplier's proprietary rights were to have taken effect changed from time to time and that those proprietary rights took effect over a stock of property larger than the value of the rights which the supplier was to have received. In consequence, on the proper construction of the contract the supplier was found to have merely a floating charge over the stock of clothes from time to time rather than a vested beneficial interest under a trust.

3.4.5 Certainty of subject matter, insolvency and the law of finance

Introduction: from certainty to crisis

This section considers how the same principles of certainty of subject matter which were considered above have been significant in litigation following the global financial crisis of 2007–09.²¹⁹ Many of these cases flow directly from the seismic shock caused by the insolvency of the US investment bank Lehman Brothers on 15 September 2008, which transformed a financial crisis into a global economic catastrophe. There is no need to become disorientated by the complexities of the financial instruments at issue in these cases because we are concerned with the same simple principle of trusts law that was outlined above: that is, to what extent must the subject matter of a trust be segregated before a trust can be valid? (I have explained the details of those financial instruments in another book if you really need to know.²²⁰)

In essence, each of these cases involves the insolvency of a financial institution (like a bank or an investment house) which caused some customers of that institution to attempt to establish a trust in their favour so as to provide them with equitable proprietary rights which would survive the insolvency. Typically, the institution went into insolvency having breached regulatory obligations which required it to segregate the assets belonging to its clients off from one another and from the institution's own assets. The Supreme Court interpreted the regulations as permitting it to find a trust in spite of the lack of segregation of each individual customer's assets off from all other assets held by Lehman Brothers. Other decisions of the High Court and dissenting judgments in the Supreme Court upheld the traditional principle

²¹⁷ [1984] 3 All ER 982.

²¹⁸ See para 3.3.3 above.

²¹⁹ For an overview of the crisis, see Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, Sweet & Maxwell, 2009, Chapter 32.

²²⁰ Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, Sweet & Maxwell, 2013.

found in Re Goldcorp that there could not be a trust without the segregation of trust assets off from other property. Significantly, as will emerge, the majority decision of the Supreme Court in Lehman Brothers v CRC (considered in detail below) was explicitly limited to the interpretation of the relevant regulations, and therefore can be interpreted as having had no effect on the general law of trusts; although coming to a resolution of that case did mean going against the Goldcorp line of cases. However, many decisions of the High Court and the Court of Appeal were decided explicitly by reference to the general law of trusts.

The context in which 'investment firms' hold assets

It is not necessary to understand these cases that one understands the financial crisis, although some background information is useful. Principally, it is important to recognise that the insolvency of Lehman Brothers was the most significant insolvency in economic history. The administration of that insolvency is extremely complex and the breath-taking breaches of financial regulation which it has revealed are genuinely disturbing. Not least, Lehman Brothers (as with many other investment banks) was knowingly breaching its regulatory obligations to hold its clients' assets on a statutory trust further to the Client Asset Sourcebook which should have been closely administered by the Financial Services Authority ('the FSA').

The banks did this because it was profitable for them to use those assets as though they were assets which the banks could invest for their own profit, and because it was costly and inconvenient to have to maintain trusts for all of their investment clients. Traditional banking law has always maintained that a bank would become the absolute owner of any property deposited with it, as opposed to being a trustee of its customer's ordinary deposits.²²¹ It is only if the parties consciously declare a trust and require that the trust assets are held in a separate account that there will be a trust over that money.²²² Therefore, trusts and ordinary investment banking practice are not natural bedfellows – which is what prompted the litigation considered in this section.

Insolvency law maintains two principles strictly: first, that all unsecured creditors should be treated alike and that no unsecured creditor should be given any advantage over the others ('the pari passu principle'),²²³ and, second, that assets should not allowed to be taken from an insolvent person's estate so that they are unavailable in the administration of the insolvency ('the anti-deprivation principle').²²⁴ What these principles mean for trusts law is that the courts will be careful not to allow the existence of trusts to be inferred on only slight evidence because that would segregate assets away from satisfying the claims of other unsecured creditors. By the same token, Lehman Brothers was such a cataclysmic collapse – involving impacts on financial markets directly and indirectly worth hundreds of billions of dollars – that the courts have tended to take purposive interpretations of the financial regulations and of trusts law so as to maintain order in the unwinding of that investment bank in its insolvency. Therefore, while the demonstration of the existence and validity of any trust 221 Foley v Hill (1848) Cas 28, 9 ER 1002.

222 MacJordan Construction Ltd v Brookmount Erostin Ltd [1992] BCLC 350; Re Global Trader Europe Ltd (in liquidation) [2009] EWHC 602 (Ch), [2009] 2 BCLC 18.

223 Re BCCI (No 8); Morris v Rayner Enterprises Inc, Bank of Credit and Commerce International SA (No 8) [1997] 4 All ER 568, [1998] AC 214.

224 Belmont Park Investments Pty Ltd v BNY Corporate Trustee Services Ltd [2011] UKSC 38, [2011] 3 WLR 519.

must be clear in cases of insolvency,²²⁵ we will see the traditional principles being adapted differently by different judges here. Some very forceful judgments by High Court judges such as Briggs J have been reversed by the Court of Appeal simply because the Court of Appeal did not like the effect of those other judgments on the unwinding of Lehman Brothers.

Nevertheless, as will emerge, some of the courts were concerned to uphold the regulatory trusts in spite of the lack of clear segregation of the trust fund. It is sometimes said that ‘hard cases make bad law’, meaning that difficult factual scenarios can force judges to make unfortunate statements about the law so that they can reach the best outcome on those facts. In many of the cases to follow, that is a good description of what is happening.

The principle in outline

The principles dealing with certainty of subject matter are very clear in their outline; the problem is that different judges simply disagree as to which one should be used in practice. As considered above, the traditional approach is exemplified by the decision of the Court of Appeal in MacJordan v Brookmount to the effect that money held in a bank account must be held in a segregated account before it can form the subject matter of a trust.²²⁶ By contrast, the *Hunter v Moss*²²⁷ approach considered that it was not necessary to segregate 50 shares from a general holding of 950 shares to establish a trust over those 50 shares. The effect of the decision in Hunter v Moss was that no segregation would be necessary. However, the New South Wales Supreme Court took the view in *White v Shortall*²²⁸ that Hunter v Moss was not to be followed and instead found that the same outcome could be achieved by finding on the facts in front of it that there was an intention to declare a trust over the entire fund in favour of all of the people entitled to distributions from that fund. The approach in White v Shortall has been approved by the Court of Appeal to achieve the outcome it wanted: namely, that a trust could be found without the need for the segregation of assets into a number of trusts, one for each individual client.

The discussion to follow will consider the decided cases by beginning with the High Court decisions of Park J and Briggs J which applied the MacJordan approach, before turning to the Court of Appeal and Supreme Court decisions which took other approaches (in interpreting the regulations) which applied the White v Shortall approach.

Money in bank accounts and breach of regulatory obligations: Re Global Trader and Re Lehman Brothers (Europe) Ltd

This section considers two High Court decisions which followed the MacJordan approach. The decision of Park J in *Re Global Trader Europe Ltd (in liquidation)*²²⁹ related to 225 On these principles see Alastair Hudson, The Law on Financial Derivatives (5th edn, Sweet & Maxwell, 2012), Chapter 13 generally.

226 MacJordan Construction Ltd v Brookmount Erostin Ltd [1992] BCLC 350.

227 [1994] 1 WLR 452.

228 [2006] NSWSC 1379.

229 Re Global Trader Europe Ltd (in liquidation); Milner and another (liquidators of Global Trader Europe Ltd) v Crawford-Brunt and others [2009] EWHC 602 (Ch), [2009] 2 BCLC 18.

derivatives transactions (in the form of ‘contracts for differences’²³⁰ and spread-betting²³¹) conducted with a financial institution, Global Trader, which went into insolvency. Global Trader, in essence, held money in accounts for the benefit of its many different customers; some of those accounts were segregated and others were not. A financial institution operates huge numbers of accounts for its many different clients, and so in practice some accounts will be operated differently from others. At the time of Global Trader’s insolvency, the question was whether trusts could be found for the benefit of each of its customers. It was a question of fact from client to client as to whether or not each client’s assets had actually been segregated from other property. As in Re Goldcorp, in relation to one class of claimant in particular, Global Trader failed to segregate their money from other money so that it was not possible to identify which money was held for the benefit of which customer in relation to those funds at the time of Global Trader’s insolvency. Other customers of Global Trader were luckier because funds had actually been segregated to their account and therefore trusts could be found in their favour. Park J held, in general terms, that there could not be a trust over any part of a fund in favour of any particular customer if that fund had not been segregated from other property and identified as being held to the account of that particular customer.

That was the general principle although in truth the facts in Global Trader were slightly more complicated than that. The principal complicating factor was that FSA regulation, in the form of the Client Assets Sourcebook (‘CASS’), required that Global Trader should hold client assets in segregated funds, unless a customer had agreed to an ‘opt-out’ from the regulations.²³² In none of the cases considered so far in this chapter has there been regulation requiring that funds be held on trust for clients. This is the unique factor behind the cases involving financial institutions because, as will emerge, the basis on which this statutory trust was supposed to operate was not made sufficiently clear in the regulations.

For the purposes of the certainty of subject matter principle it is sufficient to understand that there were therefore several classes of customers falling, roughly, into two groups: those with the protection of CASS (‘the CASS customers’) and those who had opted out of CASS (who therefore had no CASS protection). It was argued on behalf of the CASS customers that Global Trader should be deemed to have held those funds on trust for its customers because the regulations required that there be a statutory trust in favour of those customers. However, because Global Trader had not performed its regulatory obligations scrupulously in favour of all of its customers, there was in fact a shortfall in the segregated funds which should have been put aside for those CASS customers. Global Trader had simply failed to put sufficient money into the accounts which should have been held for them.

Consequently, Park J held two things. First, those CASS customers could only have proprietary rights to the extent that there were actually funds segregated to their account. There could not be a trust in their favour regardless of the terms of the regulations if there was not actually a segregated fund which was identified as being held to their account. So, if that customer was entitled to £150,000 but only £100,000 had actually been put in a segregated account for them, then they could only have a trust over the £100,000 actually held in a segregated account in their name. They would have a purely personal claim as an unsecured creditor for the remaining £50,000 owed to them in this example. If the CASS customer was unfortunate and nothing had been paid into a segregated fund, then that customer would receive nothing on trust and instead would be required to hope that it would receive something in the insolvency as an unsecured creditor.

230 I.e. financial instruments which speculate on the movements between different market rates: for example, speculating that the Bank of England ‘base’ interest rate will remain lower than the return on the FTSE-100 share index.

231 I.e. betting on movements in different financial markets.

232 Customers might opt out of CASS for numerous reasons, one of which might be to avoid a fee associated with the maintenance of a trust account and another of which might be to make transactions simpler.

Of course, those CASS customers then tried to argue that Global Trader should hold other money on trust for them. Therefore, secondly, Park J held that the CASS customers had no proprietary rights to any other property owned by Global Trader to top up their segregated funds to the level they should have been at that time. If those amounts were not actually segregated for their account then they could not pretend nor argue that other money should be deemed to be held on trust for them. This would have breached the central tenet of insolvency law (the anti-deprivation rule) that assets should not be taken out of the insolvent company's estate unless the claimant had a clear right to identified property. In relation to the customers who had opted out of CASS, it was held that there would be no trusts in their favour where they could not identify any segregated funds held to their account specifically.²³³

Following Re Global Trader, in *Re Lehman Bros International (Europe)(No 2)*²³⁴ Briggs J considered the poorly drafted regulations in Part 7 of the FSA rulebook CASS ('CASS 7'),²³⁵ which both required that client assets were held on trust and yet at the same time permitted financial institutions to elect to operate a single, running account holding all of the clients' assets and the institution's own assets in that same general account prior to amounts being segregated to the accounts of individual customers. Lehman Brothers tended to operate general accounts and was slow to segregate client money. Indeed, its failures were described as being 'spectacular' and 'staggering' in different courts. The CASS regulations required that client money must be held on trust, but it was unclear at what point in time that trust came into existence: either when the money was received, or when segregation was actually effected by the bank. However, the regulations were unclear as to the nature of this statutory trust, the time at which it took effect and the property over which it took effect. When Lehman Brothers went into insolvency, the question arose, inter alia, as to whether or not a valid trust had been imposed over the moneys held in this general account in favour of clients. (Matters were complicated by the fact that Lehman Brothers had been breaching its regulatory obligations about the segregation of client money for many years.)

233 It was held that where moneys had passed into the general accounts of the company then those parties might be able to trace into those general bank accounts, provided that those assets were identifiable as the traceable proceeds of property owned in equity by them: that is an area of equity which is considered in detail in Chapter 19.

234 [2009] EWHC 3228 (Ch), [2010] EWHC 47 (Ch), [2010] 2 BCLC 301. See also the supplemental judgment of Briggs J at [2010] EWHC 47 (Ch).

235 See, for example, ibid, para [178] and [179]. The CASS regulations were created further to the EU Markets in Financial Instruments Directive ('MiFID') principles which obliged Member States to create arrangements in their domestic regulations whereby client money was segregated from other money. For a discussion of MiFID, see Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, Chapter 7 and Chapter 10.

It was held that even though the regulations provided that there should be deemed to be a trust over client money, nevertheless the regulations (under CASS 7) also permitted the financial institution to hold property in this general account with only a contractual obligation at that time to account to its clients.²³⁶ Briggs J held that until the money was segregated there could not be a trust over it in favour of any given client. If money was actually held in a segregated account for a given client then there could be a valid trust over that segregated money in favour of that client. Otherwise, the client would be required to advance a tracing claim (as considered in Chapter 19) to identify the traceable proceeds of any given client's money in any general account; this would require forensic accounting²³⁷ to trace the flow of the clients' moneys through the various accounts in practice.²³⁸

In a supplementary judgment,²³⁹ Briggs J held that, even though the bank would consider itself to be holding money for clients without allocating that money to specific clients, the bank should be deemed to hold that money on trust for clients for whom that money was intended to be held.²⁴⁰ (This, it is suggested, stretches the Goldcorp principle almost to breaking point: what makes this interpretation acceptable is that it can be identified which moneys are held for which group of clients prior to being allocated to them, and therefore there is sufficient identification to make a trust possible over that general fund for those several clients as beneficiaries in the shares indicated by their contracts with the bank.)

The approach of the Court of Appeal

Both of the judgments of Briggs J were appealed together to the Court of Appeal (under the name Re Lehman Brothers International (Europe)(in administration) v CRC Credit Fund Ltd).²⁴¹ The Court of Appeal took the view that the CASS 7 regulations should not be interpreted as requiring segregated funds for each client before a trust could come into existence. Instead the Court of Appeal preferred the approach that the regulations should be interpreted as intending the creation of 'a single trust' which took effect over the central pool of property

236 Briggs J took the view that due to defects in the drafting the regulations seemed to create a charge rather than a trust due to the lack of segregation, at para [178]. The regulations were so poorly drafted that it was unclear whether this permission to operate general accounts was intended as a temporary measure before the bank effected segregation; or whether banks were permitted in effect to operate general accounts permanently and then to effect segregation whenever they got around to it. The purpose of these regulations was a fudge between protecting customers through segregation of funds, and yet allowing banks a little leeway to operate their accounts in a way that was convenient for them. The mistake, it is suggested, was in failing to draft sufficiently tight regulations which required instant segregation of client money into distinct accounts – something which can be done simply on computer in a bank's operations area by allocating an account number to any given holding of assets.

237 Forensic accounting is a specialist branch of that profession which is expert in the difficult business of tracing payment flows through electronic bank accounts, shell companies and other similar devices.

238 Moreover, it was held that the regulations could not make an exception to the principle of insolvency law that no unsecured creditor could be advantaged over any other unsecured creditor.

239 In essence, Briggs J was called upon to consider another aspect of this same case shortly after giving judgment as considered immediately above. Both of these impressive judgments were then appealed to the Court of Appeal together.

240 [2010] EWHC 47 (Ch).

241 [2010] EWCA Civ 917.

held by the bank for all of its clients who fell under CASS protection.²⁴² All of the judgments in the Court of Appeal turned in part on general principles of trusts law, but they were concerned more particularly with very detailed readings of the very poorly drafted provisions of CASS 7. Indeed very little case law was cited. Consequently, these judgments can be interpreted as having no relevance for the general law of trusts, except to the extent that they deal explicitly with that general law.

In essence, the Court of Appeal held that the regulations should be interpreted as providing for the creation of one large trust under which all the CASS customers had equitable interests (with those equitable interests being based on their contractual rights against the bank). This was done in reliance on the model set out in White v Shortall, even though it is unclear that the sorts of facts which were found in White v Shortall could be identified on the facts in Lehman Brothers v CRC. To do this, the Court of Appeal interpreted the CASS regulations as permitting a single, large trust to be found for the benefit of the bank's customers, as opposed to needing there to be individual trusts for each customer. The approach of Briggs J and Park J had been, in effect, that there needed to be individual trusts for each customer. By reading the ambiguously-drafted CASS regulations closely, the Court of Appeal took a different view.

It is worth unpacking the reasoning which brought the Court of Appeal to that conclusion, contrary to the decision of Briggs J. Arden LJ held that the regulations intended the creation of a trust, but that the terms of that trust were left undefined, with the result that the general law of trusts must supplement the regulations. In other words, the regulations were so vague that the court was required to interpret what the terms of that trust should be, just as the Court of Appeal in Paul v Constance had been required to interpret the existence and terms of a trust between 'unsophisticated people' in their private lives (as was discussed at the beginning of this chapter). In interpreting the particular regulations at issue²⁴³ it was held that the trust was intended to take effect on receipt of the clients' moneys, as opposed to coming into existence only when the money was segregated to the account of a particular client.²⁴⁴ Following on from that finding, the Court of Appeal had to explain how a trust which came into effect on receipt of moneys operated. Their answer was to find that it was a large, single trust for all the relevant clients as beneficiaries. In large part, the reason for the Court of Appeal reversing this part of the judgment of Briggs J was that they took a more purposive approach which identified the underlying purpose of CASS 7 as being to protect investors.²⁴⁵ Consequently, given that the provisions of CASS 7 were ambiguous as to the nature of the trust which they imposed, it was held that it would be appropriate to take the analysis which 242 Ibid, at [125], per Arden LJ: '... the statutory trust created by CASS 7.7 is a single trust. It is not a series of individual trusts, one for each client.' This had the fortunate effect of creating a trust from the outset which protected all investors from that time. Thus the judgments of Briggs J are reversed on this particular point. Sir Mark Waller offered a neat summary of the difference in approach of the Court of Appeal to the judgment of Briggs J, including the observation that the result to which Briggs J came was 'unsatisfactory' even though the judgment was 'very impressive', at [241].

243 The regulatory rulebook in CASS 7 is simply too long and complex to be worth considering here in detail. The relevant regulations are reproduced as an appendix to the very full judgment of Arden LJ.

244 [2010] EWCA Civ 917, at [104] and [105], per Arden LJ, and at [193] per Lord Neuberger.

245 Ibid, at [181], per Lord Neuberger.

offered the best protection to investors.²⁴⁶ That necessitated the finding of a large, single trust which covered all CASS customers, as opposed to disappointing many customers who had not been fortunate enough to have had money segregated to their account.

What is missing from the judgment of Arden LJ is any analysis of the case law on certainty of subject matter. It is suggested that this is because the finding of a single, large trust means that the subject matter is taken to be all of the money in the pool, with the client's beneficial interests being in amounts provided for in their contracts with the bank, and because the Court of Appeal's principal focus was on the most convenient interpretation of the statutory trust created by the regulations. In effect, the Court of Appeal was using the sort of thinking that was used in White v Shortall (considered above) so as to come to a convenient conclusion on the facts. In essence, if you are free to interpret the terms of the statutory trust, then why not interpret it in the most convenient way possible for everyone involved? Exactly the same sort of issue relating to the client money practices of Lehman Brothers arises in the next section of this chapter.

The decision of the Supreme Court in Lehman Brothers International (Europe) v CRC

The decision of the Court of Appeal was appealed to the Supreme Court.²⁴⁷ It was one of a number of appeals to the Supreme Court on various aspects of this insolvency. The Supreme Court was divided 3:2. The majority took the view that they were simply interpreting the CASS regulations (in particular CASS 7) and not applying general principles of the law of trusts. The minority approached this appeal from the perspective of the general law of trusts.²⁴⁸ We shall take each in turn.

In essence, the majority of the Supreme Court approached this case strictly on the basis of the interpretation of the 'statutory trust' in the CASS regulations. They interpreted those CASS regulations by referring to the EU directive which had given birth to them: the Markets in Financial Instruments Directive ('MiFID').²⁴⁹ The majority, primarily through the judgment of Lord Dyson, chose to adopt an interpretation which offered the largest amount of protection to the largest possible number of clients of the bank.²⁵⁰ This was done by looking at the objectives contained in MiFID, to the effect that the Directive was intended to enhance investor protection, and by using those objectives as an aid to the interpretation of CASS. Consequently, the majority took the view that customer protection was procured by finding 246 However, Arden LJ explicitly left open the question as to whether there would be a breach of trust if the running account had been at any stage of a lesser value than the total claims against the bank on behalf of its customers, [2010] EWCA Civ 917, at [70].

247 [2012] UKSC 6, [2012] Bus LR 667.

248 See Lord Clarke, ibid, at para [110]. Indeed, Lord Clarke echoed the sentiments of Lord Neuberger in the Court of Appeal that it could even be 'dangerous to look at the general law of trusts because CASS 7 is intended to be a code', thus suggesting that this case should not be relied upon in the development of mainstream trusts law: ibid, para [121]. See also Lord Dyson, ibid, at para [145], who is clear that this is a case relating to CASS and not to general trusts law; and Lord Collins, ibid, at para [170] who refers to the specific as opposed to the general focus of this case.

249 Ibid, per Lord Clarke, at para [110].

250 Ibid, per Lord Dyson, at para [148]: 'If there are two possible interpretations of CASS 7, it seems to me to be axiomatic that the interpretation which more closely meets the purpose of the Directives should be adopted.' Similar sentiments are expressed at para [159] in his Lordship's conclusions on this point.

statutory trusts in favour of all the bank's relevant investment customers and therefore that a benign interpretation of the regulations should be taken. In that sense, this decision tells us nothing about general trusts law and as such should not be interpreted as having affected it. It was held by the majority that because the regulations require that 'all' client money is to be held on the statutory trust for 'all' customers,²⁵¹ then segregation of those assets into individual accounts would not be a pre-requisite for a client to participate in the allocation of the sums held by Lehman Brothers because all of those assets are necessarily held on the terms of the statutory trust anyway. Lord Dyson acknowledged the practical difficulties (of proof and of mathematics, not least) which this would cause in allocating amounts between clients of the bank. Nevertheless, a single, colossal trust was found to be within the intention of MiFID and within the ambiguous terms of CASS (whose draftspeople had clearly not anticipated this problem, nor even the possibility that banks might fail to observe their regulatory obligations).²⁵²

The minority (Lord Walker, a specialist in trusts law, and Lord Hope) proceeded on the basis that the statutory trust which was required by CASS was 'erected on the foundation of the general law of trusts'.²⁵³ Lord Walker doubted the efficacy of the large 'single trust' trust approach which had been taken in the Court of Appeal.²⁵⁴ Lord Walker was convinced of the dangers to trusts law, and to the orderly administration of insolvencies, if this approach was maintained instead of the rigour of requiring that trusts must be predicated on a clear segregation of the trust property. At one point Lord Walker held that 'a trust without segregation is a very precarious form of protection' which was a reason for rejecting the possibility of such a trust. Interestingly, Lord Walker held that 'the majority's decision [in the Supreme Court] makes investment banking more of a lottery than even its fiercest critics have supposed'²⁵⁵ because the absence of a need for segregation means that it is unknowable which client will get how much property in an insolvency out of the general pool of property in advance. His Lordship was particularly concerned by Lord Dyson's argument that MiFID required that all the assets of all the customers should be treated as being held on trust, precisely because it would make it very difficult indeed in practice to identify the rights which each customer would have. The minority were arguing that it was only by clinging to the traditional trusts law principle expressed in Goldcorp, that there could only be a trust in favour of a customer who could show that property had actually been segregated for her 251 Ibid, per Lord Dyson, at para [147].

252 This, it is suggested, begs the question as to what those regulatory obligations were. If the majority Supreme Court is correct, then those regulatory obligations were simply to herd all of the bank's assets and its client's assets into one massive account and transfer assets to clients whenever a demand for it was made. Such a broad obligation would be impossible to breach, except by non-payment to a customer. So, for there to be a breach of the regulatory obligations, it must have been the regulatory intention that each customer was entitled to have assets segregated for it. Consequently, the minority of the Supreme Court must be correct that the regulations required segregation of assets into specific accounts, instead of the assets being left in a central pool. There is an irony that the Lamfalussy Report which gave rise to MiFID in the EU speaks with enthusiasm about the creation of 'deep, liquid pools' of investment capital being created in the EU. In truth, all that the banks achieved was the creation of stagnant pools of unsegregated assets in which their creditors are required to fight with one another after a bank's insolvency.

253 [2012] UKSC 6, [2012] Bus LR 667, per Lord Walker, at para [84].

254 Ibid, per Lord Walker, at para [82].

255 Ibid, per Lord Walker, at para [85].

individual benefit, that it would be possible to know precisely which assets were held for those customers.

The effect of Lord Dyson's approach, it is suggested, is to turn every customer into an unsecured creditor. By insisting that all assets are held on trust for all customers, the customers individually are going to have to demonstrate what they are owed on the terms of their contracts with the Lehman Brothers group companies and then those assets (which by definition will be much less than the amounts which are owed to the customers in the aggregate) will have to be divided up in proportion to each customer's debts against the bank. Therefore, that huge mass of customers is still pursuing a claim against any money that remains in the bank. What Lord Walker's approach would have achieved would have been protected trust rights only for those customers who were fortunate enough to have had Lehman Brothers actually segregate assets into a separate account for them. In that way, those customers would have had proprietary rights under trust but the other customers would not. This is clearly beneficial for the first category of customer and disastrous for the second category. What Lord Dyson achieves is spreading the misery evenly among the customers of the bank, albeit that there is not a distinction between those who are completely protected and those who are left effectively with nothing.

There is no perfect answer to this question: either the traditional logic of trusts law is protected, or all customers are treated equally badly. The fault, of course, lies with Lehman Brothers and other banks like them²⁵⁶ which broke their regulatory obligations knowingly with breath-taking persistence. Lehman Brothers itself was correctly criticised by judges at all levels for its 'shocking underperformance' and its regulatory non-compliance 'on a truly spectacular scale'. That none of these issues have yet led to criminal prosecutions is an affront to our jurisprudence and to the rule of law itself. In essence, the powerful and the rich have thus far avoided prosecution, while the cost of their failures has been spread among ordinary citizens in the North Atlantic countries affected most directly by this crisis.

Securities held within investment banking groups: Re Lehman Brothers International (Europe) (In Administration)

This section considers a different stream of cases in relation to the insolvency of Lehman Brothers: that is, the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Lehman Brothers International (Europe) (In Administration),²⁵⁷ on appeal from a decision of Briggs J.²⁵⁸ The trusts law issues are very similar to the cases considered in the previous section of this chapter. They related to a slightly different issue with Lehman Brothers and arose in Re Lehman Brothers International (Europe) (In Administration).²⁵⁹ Lehman Brothers International Europe ('LBIE') was a subsidiary of that bank in Europe which acted as a central depository for all of the securities held by other Lehman Brothers subsidiaries in one particular region. Lehman Brothers was in the practice of settling all of its securities dealings in various jurisdictions across all its many subsidiary entities by transferring all of those securities to a single entity 256 There have been several investment banks which have been fined by the UK regulatory authorities for breaching their CASS obligations. Lehman Brothers was the only one of these banks to have gone into insolvency.

257 [2011] EWCA Civ 1544.

258 [2010] EWHC 2914 (Ch).

259 [2011] EWCA Civ 1544.

for each region:²⁶⁰ the relevant ‘hub’ subsidiary to which it transferred all of those securities in relation to the UK was LBIE. However, rather than segregating securities into different accounts within LBIE, Lehman Brothers simply passed all of the securities into a single, unsegregated account and conducted the bank’s complex dealings under that structure.²⁶¹ When the Lehman Brothers group of companies went into insolvency it was important to decide who owned the securities held by LBIE and whether they could be deemed to have been held on trust for the various claimants. Lehman Brothers was in the habit of pooling securities which it held on behalf of LBIE, on behalf of other subsidiaries of Lehman Brothers, and on behalf of its investment customers. LBIE operated as a ‘hub’ in this context (to use the language used in the judgment).

The question was whether this regional hub arrangement meant that there was no trust under the CASS rulebook in favour of the various subsidiaries and customers, or whether some other analysis could be used. The Court of Appeal in *Re Lehman Brothers International (Europe)(In Administration)*²⁶² followed *Hunter v Moss*²⁶³ without giving a full explanation as to why, and without considering the case law on certainty of subject matter in any detail. Instead, it appeared to be convenient to hold that the parties would have the property rights they wanted, even though there had been a conscious failure over about twenty years within Lehman Brothers to segregate any of the property purportedly held on trust and even though the purported trustee had been able to deal with that supposed trust property so as to make profits for itself. It is suggested that both of these elements should have prevented a trust being found on grounds respectively of uncertainty of subject matter and the lack of any clear certainty of intention to create a trust (as opposed to a floating charge).

Lloyd LJ simply concluded, without presenting a reasoned argument of his own beyond summarising the arguments of others, on two bases. First, that ‘there is no ground for saying that the trust could not take effect in law because its subject-matter lacked certainty’,²⁶⁴ with the result that a trust was found. However, this does not explain whether the requirement of certainty of subject matter is being rejected in general or whether there is found to be sufficient certainty on these facts. Moreover, this trust takes effect in equity, not ‘in law’. Second, his Lordship held that ‘it seems to me clear that . . . an approach involving 260 In essence, this was a sort of internal clearing house through which all of those securities could be bundled up together and invested. Global banks like Lehman Brothers are in constant motion: when New York went home, the Tokyo subsidiaries and personnel took over, when Tokyo went to bed then the London subsidiaries and personnel took over, and when London leaked home on the Underground then New York took over again. No securities and no cash would be allowed to sit still in accounts: instead, they would all be invested so as to keep earning profits. The central clearing entity would then transfer any securities or cash that were needed to the relevant subsidiaries when they were needed. You must remember that this involved millions of transactions and thousands of people, like an enormous beehive made of computers and money. The problem was that the central clearing entity structure in Lehman Brothers operated general accounts and not segregated accounts.

261 LBIE entered into ‘repo’ and ‘stock lending’ transactions with those securities, in essence to make money from them before the other subsidiaries or customers needed them. Those transactions are explained in Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, Sweet & Maxwell, 2009, Chapter 50. This contributed to the securities being treated as a single lump of securities and not being segregated to the accounts of the various customers or subsidiaries who would be entitled to them.

262 [2011] EWCA Civ 1544.

263 [1994] 1 WLR 452.

264 [2011] EWCA Civ 1544, [75].

the use of a trust binding on LBIE in favour of the affiliate was adopted²⁶⁵, although all that this assertion does is to assert that there should have been a trust, but not whether or not one was actually created.²⁶⁶ The Court of Appeal followed Hunter v Moss and purportedly applied the conclusion in White v Shortall but without delving into that case to identify whether or not the cases were sufficiently similar. This judgment does little to analyse the clear rejection of Hunter v Moss in White v Shortall and the weight of journal commentary which similarly rejects it. There is nothing in the judgment to indicate why Hunter v Moss is to be preferred to MacJordan v Brookmount, nor indeed why any one case is to be preferred to any other.

3.4.6 A question as to which property needs to be segregated

The unprogrammed development of trusts law

The law of trusts is a subject which has grown rapidly outwards from its original beginning as a convenient means of recognising that more than one person could have various forms of property rights simultaneously in respect of the same piece of land.²⁶⁷ Over time, the trust was applied to cases not involving land. New challenges to the logic of the trust over land were met by judicial ingenuity through which legal principle sought to keep pace with a changing world. In this sense, the law of trusts has developed as an accident of history. As such, the law of trusts was conceived as a reaction to circumstances and not out of immutable principle.²⁶⁸ By the 19th century, it became imperative that some certainty was introduced to the law of trusts beyond the haphazard development of rules to match new cases and new forms of property, and so the principles of certainty were developed. Given this rolling development of the law and an attempt to entrench principle firmly between the mid-19th and mid-20th century, it is unsurprising that there will come situations in which the logic of the law will stretch so far and no further, for example, in relation to certainty of subject matter. Nevertheless, there can be conceptual problems with applying this ostensibly simple rule, particularly when those rules were created originally with land in mind – particularly given that a holding of land is usually easy to render certain – rather than more complex forms of intangible property like shares and money in bank accounts.

Understanding which property must be certain

The essay which comprises Chapter 31 of this book considers the overlap between property law and trusts law. There is one particular problem which occasionally causes confusion in relation to certainty of subject matter. Certainty of subject matter requires that the fund which is to be held on trust must be segregated from all other property and must be

265 [2011] EWCA Civ 1544, [75].

266 Somewhat unsatisfactorily, Watkins LJ held in R v Clowes (No 2) [1994] 2 All ER 316 at 325 that: ‘As to segregation of funds, the effect of the authorities seems to be that a requirement to keep moneys separate is normally an indicator that they are impressed with a trust, and that the absence of such a requirement, if there are no other indicators of a trust, normally negatives it. The fact that a transaction contemplates the mingling of funds is, therefore, not necessarily fatal to a trust.’

267 See section 2.1 above and para 7.1.1 below.

268 Except in relation to the general principles of equity as outlined in section 1.1.

segregated from any property held on the terms of another trust. So, suppose that Jerry wants to create a trust over £99,000 in favour of his friends George, Elaine and Cosmo. If Jerry has all of his money in one bank account and there is £200,000 in that bank account, then there will be no certainty of subject matter because it cannot be known which £99,000 out of that mixture of £200,000 is intended to be held on trust.²⁶⁹

If Jerry does create a new bank account in which the £99,000 which is to be the subject matter of the trust is deposited separately from all other money, then there will be a valid trust because the £99,000 is segregated and so is sufficiently certain. Suppose that Jerry drafts his trust so that ‘the £99,000 shall be held equally for each of George, Elaine and Cosmo’; we might be concerned that we do not know which £33,000 is to be held for which of the three beneficiaries. However, there is no problem here as far as trusts law is concerned. All that is required is that the £99,000 which is to be the subject matter of the entire trust is segregated from all other property. Within that trust fund, however, it is perfectly permissible for the trustees to decide which money is to be advanced to which beneficiary.

Equally, in relation to a trust ‘to hold £10,000 on trust for my two children in equal shares’, there is no argument raised that the trust is void because neither child can know precisely which £5,000 out of the total £10,000 forms their equal share. Rather, we would accept that the trustees have a power to divide the fund in two and pay half each to each beneficiary. What needs to be certain is that the entire fund of £10,000 is sufficiently identifiable and not that the money constituting any particular interest within the fund is similarly identifiable.

While no argument is raised in that situation just considered, if the settlor were instead to have declared ‘I hereby declare two trusts over this £10,000 such that £5,000 shall be held on trust for my only son and £5,000 on a separate trust for my only daughter’, that would potentially raise the Goldcorp problem of knowing which £5,000 was to be held for which child because the parent would now be creating two entirely separate trusts which would require entirely separate subject matter. In this second situation, neither trust fund is certain – rather, both funds have a claim to half of the whole £10,000.²⁷⁰

Alternatively, if the settlor had declared ‘I hereby declare two trusts over my bank account such that half shall be held on trust for my only son and half on trust for my only daughter’ immediately before going bankrupt, the court might well have taken a stricter approach because of the claim of the unsecured creditors in that bankruptcy.²⁷¹ If the trust had provided ‘I hereby declare two trusts over the £10,000 in my bank account such that £5,000 shall be held on trust for my only son and £5,000 on trust for my only daughter’ when there was only £7,500 at the date of bankruptcy, then it is likely that the court would apply the rule in *Goldcorp*²⁷² to protect the bankrupt’s creditors (particularly if it was thought that the trusts had been created simply to put the money beyond the reach of those creditors).²⁷³ What the settlor should have done was 269 MacJordan v Brookmount [1992] BCLC 350.

270 Alternatively, it is possible that a court might be prepared to order that the trustees simply make a division of the total fund in line with the principles advanced in Hunter v Moss [1994] 1 WLR 452 and Re Harvard Securities Ltd [1997] 2 BCLC 369 and decline to apply the rule in MacJordan v Brookmount [1992] BCLC 350 (that a fund of money held in a bank account must be segregated to be the subject matter of a trust).

271 See the discussion of Insolvency Act 1986, s 423 in para 11.4.6 below and the powers of the courts to recover property put beyond the reach of creditors in expectation of bankruptcy.

272 [1995] AC 74.

273 This, however, raises different questions as to ‘sham trusts’: see paras 3.3.3 above and 11.4.6 below.

to declare one single trust over the £10,000 in favour of her son and daughter in equal shares because then the subject matter of this single bank account would have been identifiable.

Mistake in identifying the fund

There will not be a failure of a trust simply because the property which was intended to have been held on trust was mistakenly identified in the trust instrument. Instead the court may order the equitable remedy of rectification to rectify the trust instrument so that the correct property is identified in the trust instrument.²⁷⁴ The rationale behind this principle is easy to identify: if a settlor mistakenly records in a trust instrument that she wishes ‘my money in bank account number 110’ to be held on trust when she only had one bank account and that account had the number ‘100’, then it should not be open to some third person to claim that there was no trust created over bank account ‘100’ simply because of a mere typographical error or some similar sort of trifling mistake. The court must be convinced that it was a straightforward error and that the settlor’s intention to declare a trust over the alternative fund is clearly made out. So, in *Re Farepak Food and Gifts Ltd*²⁷⁵ Mann J considered a situation in which a company’s directors had created a separate bank account into which customers’ prepayments for goods and services were to be paid after the company had gone into insolvent administration. The company’s directors created a trust instrument so as to declare a trust over these moneys in favour of those customers but the trust instrument recorded the wrong account number. From the evidence it was clear that the new account was the one which had been created expressly for the purpose of bringing this trust into being. Consequently, Mann J was prepared to find that it was clearly the settlors’ intention that it was the new account which had been intended to be mentioned in the trust instrument and therefore held that the trust instrument should be rectified so as to record the details of the new account on grounds that there had been a simple error here. There is no question of uncertainty of subject matter here: rather the parties were certain as to the subject matter of the trust but made a simple error in recording that property in the trust instrument.

The underlying purpose of certainty of subject matter

The purpose of the rules on certainty of subject matter is to ensure that the trustees know over which property the trust takes effect. Once the trust fund is sufficiently certain, there is no problem in principle with allowing the trustees to decide which property is paid out of that fund to which beneficiary, in the same way that the trustees can decide which money is used to invest in shares, which money is used to invest in land, and so forth.

Thus, there is no doubt that interest earned on a fund of money will be added to the fund and subjected to the ordinary terms of the trust.²⁷⁶ Consequently, when interest is earned on a trust fund over money, that interest is simply added to the trust fund without anyone inquiring which beneficiaries are entitled to that interest. The interest is deemed to pass into the capital of the fund unless there is some express provision to the contrary. Suppose there is a trust over a fund of money with a power for the trustees to invest in shares. When the money is spent to acquire 274 Re Butlin [1976] Ch 251.

275 [2006] All ER (D) 265 (Dec).

276 Assuming here that there is no express trusts provision which would require that it be dealt with differently.

the shares, the rights of the beneficiaries attach to the shares once the trustees have secured an assignment of them: there is no suggestion that when the money is spent, the beneficiaries' rights have no property to which they can attach. Nor is there any suggestion of the trust's invalidity simply because the money held on trust is used to buy shares – rather, the shares are deemed to pass into the trust fund and to be held along with the other trust property.

3.5 CERTAINTY OF OBJECTS

There must be sufficient certainty as to the 'objects' (or, beneficiaries) of a trust or a power, or else that trust or power will be void. There are different tests for certainty of objects in relation to different forms of trust or power. Therefore, to decide whether or not it is possible to identify the beneficiaries of a trust or power with sufficient certainty it is first necessary to identify the nature of the power which is being exercised. It is important, therefore, to distinguish between: fixed trusts; discretionary trusts; fiduciary mere powers; and personal powers.

In relation to a fixed trust, it is necessary to be able to draw up a complete list of all beneficiaries.

In relation to fiduciary mere powers and discretionary trusts, it is required that it is possible to say of any person claiming to be a beneficiary that that person is or is not a member of the class of beneficiaries. Some exceptional cases have taken the view that the trust may be valid where it is possible to say that a substantial number of people do or do not fall within the class of beneficiaries.

In relation to personal powers, the authorities suggest that there will be no invalidity on grounds of uncertainty of objects. It is suggested that on principle this is the better approach because personal powers do not impose fiduciary obligations on the holder of the power.

There appears to be a distinction between uncertainty as to the concept used to identify the class of beneficiaries, problems of proving yourself to be a beneficiary, problems of locating beneficiaries and problems of administrative unworkability – only the first and last categories appear to invalidate the trust of necessity.

3.5.1 Introduction

The question at issue

A trust will be void if the 'objects' of that trust (meaning, the 'beneficiaries' of that trust) are uncertain. The principles dealing with certainty of objects relate to the need for the trustees to be able to know the identity of the beneficiaries under a trust because, in turn, the court cannot know whether or not trustees have exercised their powers properly if there is uncertainty as to the people who stood to benefit from that trust. Thus, it is said that it is important that the courts have someone in whose favour they can decree performance of the trust²⁷⁷ and that the identity of the beneficiaries must be certain so that the court can police the performance of the trustees properly (as considered below). If there were some dispute as to the manner in which the trustees should deal with the trust property, then the court would need to be able to take control of the management of the trust, but it cannot do this if there is some uncertainty as to the identity of the beneficiaries.²⁷⁸ Consequently, any trust which is uncertain as to its beneficiaries will be void. The 19th century authorities assumed that the court would be required to divide the property equally between members of the class of objects in such a situation and therefore the old case law used to require that a complete list of the objects could be prepared.²⁷⁹ The modern case law provides for a range of different tests dependent upon the type of power that is at issue.²⁸⁰ In particular, in the modern authorities, we should consider that the court has an inherent discretion to administer trusts and, if the court is to carry out this discretion properly, it must be possible for the court to know with certainty who the objects of a trust or a power are.²⁸¹

277 Morice v Bishop of Durham (1805) 10 Ves 522.

A ‘power’ is a responsibility imposed on a person, which might be part of a trust or which might stand alone, which grants that person a power to do whatever the terms of their power permits them to do with property and so forth.²⁸² The law on powers is distinct from the law on trusts, although the two concepts come close together in relation to the law on certainty of objects, as will emerge in the discussion to come.

The problem which is considered in this section is this: what level of certainty must there be as to the identity of the class of beneficiaries for a trust to be held valid? The question is whether the objects of the trust or power are sufficiently certain. The law relating to certainty of objects developed into its current form as a result of the merging of some of the tests relating to different types of powers and trusts in two House of Lords decisions in the 1970s: however, this area of the law still has different tests for different types of trust and power.²⁸³

This subject is best approached in the following way: first, identify the nature of the trust or power at issue. The choice is broadly between fixed trusts, discretionary trusts, fiduciary mere powers (including powers of appointment) and purely personal powers – the distinction between these forms of power and trust is considered in detail below. Secondly, apply the test for certainty of beneficiaries appropriate to that type of power or trust. In many circumstances, that test may appear overly strict and may produce a seemingly unfair result. Therefore, thirdly, consider the alternative cases which present a possible means of circumventing the strictness of those main tests, after you have considered whether or not the trust or power would be valid on the basis of the leading case. Fourthly, after analysing all of the above, consider one of the means of resolving the uncertainty bound up in these powers and trusts. This structure should guide the reader through the analysis of any problem relating to uncertainty of objects.

278 IRC v Broadway Cottages [1955] Ch 20, 30, per Jenkins LJ.

279 Kemp v Kemp (1801) 5 Ves Jr 849; Morice v Bishop of Durham (1805) 10 Ves Jr 522.

280 See variously IRC v Broadway Cottages [1955] Ch 20; Re Gulbenkian [1968] Ch 126; McPhail v Doulton [1970] 2 WLR 1110; Re Hay's Settlement Trusts [1981] 3 All ER 786.

281 Re Manisty's Settlement [1974] Ch 17, 27, [1973] 2 All ER 1203, 1211, per Templeman J; approved in Schmidt v Rosewood Trust Ltd [2003] 3 All ER 76, 88–89, [2003] UKPC 26, [42], per Lord Walker, both drawing on Morice v Bishop of Durham (1805) 10 Ves 522, 539, [1803–13] All ER Rep 451, 458, per Lord Eldon LC. See para 8.4.3 below for a full discussion of this case.

282 The leading text dealing with the law on powers is Thomas, Powers, 2nd edn, Oxford University Press, 2012.

283 Re Gulbenkian [1968] Ch 126; McPhail v Doulton [1970] 2 WLR 1110. See also [1984] Conv 304 (Martin) and 307 (Hayton).

*The distinction between trusts and powers*²⁸⁴

Trusts impose obligations on a trustee which the trustee is required to perform in obedience to the terms of that trust:²⁸⁵ breach of such obligations will render the trustee personally liable to account to the beneficiaries for any loss suffered and thus to restore the value of the trust fund if the original trust property cannot be recovered.²⁸⁶ Equally significantly, under a trust the beneficiary acquires proprietary rights in the trust property.²⁸⁷ The trustee owes fiduciary obligations to the beneficiary further to the trust.²⁸⁸

By contrast, an ordinary power which is not in the form of a trust obligation, creates no such proprietary rights in any beneficiary but may impose fiduciary obligations on the holder of the power: such powers are referred to as ‘mere powers’ because they create no trust. There are two forms of power, for our purposes. The first form is a fiduciary power which gives the holder of the power the ability to do an act – for example, to pay money to one of an identified class of people – but which does not require that the holder of the power do anything. The second type of power is a power which is given to a person otherwise than as a fiduciary. The distinction between taking a power as a fiduciary and not as a fiduciary is that a fiduciary is required to act in the utmost good faith and is prevented from acting capriciously or irrationally, whereas the holder of a non-fiduciary power is not bound in this way.²⁸⁹

The distinction between the various forms of power is considered in greater detail below. At this stage it is sufficient to understand that a mere power may be exercised over a fund of money or other property so that it can be paid out (or ‘appointed’) to an identified class of people (or, ‘objects’), but without obliging the holder of the power to make any such payment. An ordinary trust will oblige the trustees when and how to make transfers out of the trust fund to the beneficiaries. Between ordinary trusts imposing obligations on a trustee and mere powers granting an ability to advance property, there are ‘powers in the form of a trust’ which impose obligations on trustees but nevertheless give the trustees some discretion as to the manner in which their duties are to be performed. Such powers ‘in the form of a trust’ are known as ‘discretionary trusts’ in the modern jargon. Indeed, it is common to combine in one trust instrument many fixed and discretionary trusts, together with mere powers of appointment, so that the trustees are given a broad range of powers and duties both to achieve the settlor’s wishes and yet also to provide for sufficient flexibility to cope with unexpected circumstances.

There is one principal distinction between mere powers and all forms of trusts: that relates to the entitlements which the objects of the various powers have. The object of a mere power has no right to any property until the holder of the power exercises her discretion and decides to make a payment to that object. By contrast, a beneficiary under even a discretionary trust has a right to compel the trustee’s proper exercise of the power and also may have a proprietary right in the property over which the trustee is empowered to exercise her discretion.²⁹⁰

284 The most authoritative discussion of these principles is to be found in Thomas, 2012, paras 2.61–2.75.

285 Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

286 Target Holdings v Redfern [1996] 1 AC 421.

287 Saunders v Vautier (1841) 4 Beav 115.

288 Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

289 Re Hay’s ST [1981] 3 All ER 786.

290 See para 4.1.2 below for a detailed discussion of the proprietary rights of beneficiaries and of the objects of mere powers in this context.

Combinations of different types of power and trust may be used by a settlor in a single trust instrument so as to achieve her goals. An example might help to make this combination of different powers and trusts more comprehensible. Suppose that a settlor, Jane, wishes to provide for her husband, her two business partners, her two adult children, and her four sisters by means of a large settlement. Her intentions in relation to each of these people may be different, even though they will be set out in a single settlement. She may wish to create a bare trust in favour of her husband so that he is the only beneficiary in relation to some property she identified as being held for him exclusively: for example, the family home. She may wish to provide that some business assets are held for her business partners equally: in this sense she will impose a fixed trust so that the trustees are simply obliged to hold these business assets for the two partners equally. In relation to her children, she may want to require that the trustees pay money out to her children each year but she may also want the trustees to have a discretion as to which child is entitled to more money in any given year depending on how their fortunes fare in the future: therefore, she may require that the trustees make a payment to each child annually but she may decide to leave it up to the trustees to decide exactly how much each child should receive depending on their circumstances from year to year. This would be a discretionary trust which requires the trustees to make a payment each year but which nevertheless gives them scope to decide exactly how much that payment should amount to. Finally, Jane may decide that she wants to give her trustees the power to make a payment to any of her sisters if that sister is in serious financial difficulties: consequently, the trustees would be given a mere power such that they ‘may’ appoint a maximum amount of money to any sister who was in great financial difficulties but so that the money would otherwise be retained in the trust. The settlement we have constructed in this example contains a bare trust, a fixed trust in equal shares,²⁹¹ a discretionary trust, and a power to appoint money in favour of a total of nine different beneficiaries in relation to four separate funds of property. Because Jane cannot keep control over the property once it is settled on trust – even if she made herself a trustee she would still be bound by the terms of the trust – then she needs to construct a settlement which will be proof against future events. This combination of different types of powers and trusts can give the settlor great flexibility to ensure that her trustees will be able to cope with all sorts of eventualities in the future.

The most useful authority in this area is the judgment of Megarry VC in Re Hay’s ST.²⁹² His Lordship presents a very clear discussion of the various forms of power in this area and gives clear indications of the applicable standards of certainty.²⁹³ A discussion of these various powers and trusts follows in the next sections.

The example on which this section is based

It is important to decide on the facts of any case into which category the settlor’s directions fall. In determining which type of power is created, there is no simpler method than reading the 291 As to distributions among beneficiaries in ‘equal shares’, but equal shares between different groups, see Sammut v Manzi [2008] UKPC 58, [2009] 1 WLR 1834, where the court was required simply to apply the terms of the instrument.

292 [1981] 3 All ER 786.

293 For a wide-ranging scholarly discussion of trust powers, see the excellent book by Professor Thomas entitled quite simply Powers, 2012.

provisions of the trust closely to analyse the settlor's intention. It is possible for a settlor to create a trust and to give different people different types of power over the trust fund. The discussion which follows will divide between the four main forms of trust by analysing a fictional trust provision. So, suppose the following provisions were included in a trust instrument:

I settle four separate amounts of £1,000 each to be held by T on trust for members of my family as follows:

Amount 1: so that T shall distribute all of the £1,000 equally to any of my grandchildren who have enrolled for a full-time university degree course before 1 October 2011, with the power to retain the whole of that £1,000 for the remainder beneficiary.

Amount 2: so that T may distribute all or part or none of the £1,000 to either of my daughters on their 40th birthday, with the power to retain the whole of that £1,000 for the remainder beneficiary.

Amount 3: so that T shall divide the £1,000 between any of my sons who become unemployed, with the power to retain the whole of that £1,000 for the remainder beneficiary.

Amount 4: so that X, as an old family friend, shall be entirely free in a personal capacity to pay as much of the £1,000 as he sees fit to any of my grandchildren whom he deems worthy of it, with the power to retain the whole of that £1,000 for the remainder beneficiary.

Any amount held in remainder shall be held on trust for my wife.

Each provision is analysed in turn in the discussion to follow as an example of the four main types of powers associated with a trust.

3.5.2 Fixed trusts

The nature of fixed trusts

A fixed trust refers to those situations in which the trust provision requires that the property be held for a fixed number of identified beneficiaries.²⁹⁴ An example would be: '£10,000 to be held upon trust equally for the complete team of 11 Sunderland Football Club players who started the 1992 Cup Final at Wembley.' This is a fixed trust because the property is to be held 'equally' for this class of people such that it is necessary to know how many of them there are and who they are before the trust can be administered. It is only possible to divide property 'equally' if you know the number of people between whom that property is to be divided. In such a situation, it is necessary for the trustees to be able to produce a complete list of all the potential beneficiaries for there to be sufficient certainty as to the beneficiaries.²⁹⁵ Thus, in the example given at the start of this section:

²⁹⁴ See Thomas, 2012, para 3–03 et seq.

²⁹⁵ IRC v Broadway Cottages [1955] Ch 20.

Amount 1: so that T shall distribute all of the £1,000 equally to any of my grandchildren who have enrolled for a full-time university degree course before 1 October 2011, with the power to retain the whole of that £1,000 for the remainder beneficiary.

The trustees are required to distribute the property equally and therefore they have no discretion about the amount of property to be held for each beneficiary: rather, the trustees are obliged to act in the limited manner so described. In such situations the trustee has only an obligation to act in the manner identified in the trust instrument but no discretion of any sort. The beneficiaries have proprietary rights in the equitable interest of the trust fund in accordance with the terms of the trust instrument.

The test for certainty of objects in relation to fixed trusts

In relation to establishing the certainty of objects under a fixed trust, it is necessary for the trustees to be able to compile a complete list of the beneficiaries, as required by *IRC v Broadway Cottages*²⁹⁶ and by dicta of Lord Upjohn in Re Gulbenkian.²⁹⁷ That means that the trustee must be able to name each possible beneficiary or to identify all of the members of the appropriate class. If there are any objects about whom the trustee could not be certain, or if the trustee is not able to compile such a complete list, then the trust will be void for uncertainty. If the identity of the membership of the class cannot be known until an identified time in the future at which the trust is to be performed, then that will be permitted provided that it will be possible to compile a complete list of the members of that class at that time.²⁹⁸

3.5.3 Fiduciary mere powers: the power of appointment

The permissive nature of fiduciary mere powers

The more difficult category is the situation in which a trustee, or some other person acting in a fiduciary capacity, is granted a ‘mere power’²⁹⁹ which is not a fully fledged trust obligation but which gives the holder of the power the ability to exercise that power without any obligation to do so. (For the purposes of this discussion, we shall describe the person entitled to exercise the power as being a ‘trustee’ for ease of reference.)³⁰⁰ An example of a fiduciary mere power would be ‘the trustee may advance £1,000 to X’ as opposed to an example of a trust obligation which might read ‘the trustee shall pay £1,000 to X annually’. In the former case, the trustee is able to pay £1,000 but is under no compulsion to do so, whereas the second example compels the trustee to pay £1,000 to X. However, the fiduciary exercising a fiduciary mere power cannot act purely capriciously in relation to that power. Rather, the 296 [1955] Ch 20, 29, per Jenkins LJ; and also required at first instance by Wynn-Parry J at [1954] 1 All ER 878, 881.

297 [1970] AC 508, at 524. Cf Matthews (1984) Conv 22. Whereas Re Gulbenkian is a case dealing specifically with a mere power, Lord Upjohn did confirm that this was the test for certainty for fixed trusts.

298 Swain v Law Society [1981] 3 All ER 797, 822, per Fox LJ.

299 Also referred to as a ‘power of appointment’.

300 This is so given that such mere powers may commonly be contained in trust instruments so as to qualify fixed trusts or to act in their own right, as well as existing at large.

trustee is under an obligation to exercise that power reasonably and to be able to justify its exercise. As Megarry VC put it in Re Hay's ST:³⁰¹

A mere power is very different [from an ordinary trust obligation]. Normally the trustee is not bound to exercise it, and the court will not compel him to do so. That, however, does not mean that he can simply fold his hands and ignore it, for normally he must from time to time consider whether or not to exercise the power, and the court may direct him to do this.

Therefore, we see the situation in which the trustee is given permission to exercise a power without an obligation; the trustee is obliged only to consider whether or not that power should be exercised.³⁰² It remains open to the trustee, however, to decide whether or not to exercise the power in fact. Importantly, this power-holder is required to act as a fiduciary. So, in contradistinction to a person exercising a purely personal power in a non-fiduciary capacity, the trustee is required to act responsibly. It is that responsibility which the court is able to review. Thus, in the following example, the trustee is permitted to exercise a power of appointment over a fund of £1,000 but does not bear an obligation to carry it out:

Amount 2: so that T may distribute all or part or none of the £1,000 to either of my daughters on their 40th birthday, with the power to retain the whole of that £1,000 for the remainder beneficiary.

There is a permission, evidenced by the word ‘may’, for the trustee to pay nothing at all or a maximum of £1,000 to any one of a class of beneficiaries as the trustee decides. The second half of the sentence creates a power over any money which is not paid to the daughters. Therefore, there is a mere power which acts as a condition precedent to the trust obligation to hold any residue for the remainder beneficiary.

The test for certainty of objects in relation to fiduciary mere powers

The leading case dealing with fiduciary mere powers is the decision of the House of Lords in Re Gulbenkian.³⁰³ This case established a test which we shall refer to as the ‘is or is not’ test, which means that the trustees must be able to decide whether any hypothetical beneficiary is or is not within the class of objects. This rule is explained further below. Re Gulbenkian reversed the previous rule which had required the trustees to be able to draw up a complete list of beneficiaries.³⁰⁴ This older approach had meant that, if it was not possible for the trustees to compile a complete list of the class of beneficiaries in advance of exercising the trust, then the trust would be held to be void. The majority of the House of Lords in Re Gulbenkian took a different approach. It was found instead that for a trust to be valid the trustees must be 301 [1981] 3 All ER 786, 791. That the court will not interfere with the competence of the trustees to make the decision to appoint property, provided that is done properly, emerges from Breadner v Granville-Grossman [2000] 4 All ER 705.

302 Re Gestetner [1953] Ch 672, 688 per Harman J.

303 [1968] Ch 126.

304 Cf Re Gestetner [1953] 2 WLR 1033.

able to say of any postulant,³⁰⁵ coming before the trustees claiming to be a beneficiary, that that person was either within the class of beneficiaries or was not within the class of beneficiaries. In short, to validate a fiduciary mere power you must be able to tell whether any given individual 'is or is not' within the class of objects.³⁰⁶ As Lord Upjohn put it: 'the trustees, or the court, must be able to say with certainty who is within and who is without the power'.³⁰⁷ If there is even one person in relation to whom the trustees cannot decide whether or not she falls within the class of objects, then the trust is invalid. This 'is or is not' test is consequently still a strict test, whereby any uncertainty as to whether or not any hypothetical postulant is or is not within the class of objects will invalidate the fiduciary mere power.

It may be helpful to take an example to illustrate how this test works. Suppose a fiduciary mere power contained in a trust document which provided that 'the trustees may pay £10,000 to any of my good friends whom they shall deem worthy of it'. The problem of certainty of objects here is bound up in the use of the expression 'my good friends'. We must establish whether or not the objects of this power – the settlor's 'good friends' – are sufficiently certain. The trustees are bound by the 'is or is not' test. Let us try and bring this test to life. We should imagine the trustees sitting in a room behind a long desk facing the door. One by one a hypothetical queue of people come into the room claiming to fall within the class of objects. These claimants are 'the postulants'. For the power to be valid, the trustees must be able to say of any person who may come through the door claiming to fall within the class whether or not that person is indeed within or outside the class of objects. That means they must be able to say with certainty either that each postulant is or that each postulant is not within the definition of the class. If there is even one postulant about whom they could not be certain, then the power will be void.

So, in relation to the term 'my good friends' if there is likely to be any conceptual uncertainty as to what is meant by the term 'good friends' then the power will be void. The cases on the term 'good friends' are considered later in this chapter: but it is suggested that in general terms that expression is likely to be uncertain because, even if the trustees can distinguish 'friends' from 'mere acquaintances' and so on, there is then the added problem of knowing what a 'good' friend is as opposed to an 'ordinary' friend or a casual acquaintance, and so on.

This 'is or is not' test is quite a strict one – even though it is slightly more relaxed than the old 'complete list' test,³⁰⁸ which we considered above in relation to fixed trusts. The application of the complete list test would invalidate any power for which it would be impossible to produce a complete list of all of the objects of that power; whereas the 'is or is not' test means that the trustees do not need to know the identity of all of the objects in advance and instead may be able to wait to examine each postulant as circumstances arise. The reason for this relaxation in the test for fiduciary mere powers in *Re Gulbenkian*³⁰⁹ was that in relation to mere powers the trustee is not compelled to carry out her duties under the trust. Consequently, it was considered inconsistent to require the trustee to draw up a fixed list of 305 A 'postulant', a term used in the cases, means a person claiming entitlement under a trust or a power, or a hypothetical person whose potential entitlement is at issue.

306 Re Gulbenkian [1968] Ch 785, 787, per Lord Reid.

307 Ibid at 794, per Lord Upjohn.

308 Considered at para 3.5.5 below.

309 [1968] Ch 126.

the potential beneficiaries in whose favour the discretion could be exercised when the trustee was not necessarily even required to perform her power.

The case of Re Gulbenkian itself was concerned with the estate of Mr Gulbenkian,³¹⁰ who had created a will to provide bequests for ‘any person and his remoter issue . . . and any person . . . in whose house or apartment or in whose company or under whose care or control or by or with whom he may from time to time be employed or residing’. The question arose whether or not this expression was too uncertain because it did not define the class of objects of the trust sufficiently clearly. On the facts of this case it was held that this provision was sufficiently certain.³¹¹ Lord Upjohn rejected a test previously propounded by the Court of Appeal in *Re Allen*³¹² to the effect that even if only one person could be demonstrated to have fallen within the test then the power should be held to be valid so that property could be distributed among those people who did satisfy the test.³¹³ Instead, Lord Upjohn approved a test outlined in *Re Gestetner*³¹⁴ to the effect that it must be possible for the beneficiaries to prevent the trustees applying the trust property beyond the scope of their powers. Consequently, this approach requires potential beneficiaries to be able to control the trustees and that to be able to control the trustees it must be known what the extent of the trustees’ powers are. To know what the extent of the trustees’ powers are, it must be possible to know whether or not any people to whom the trustees purport to transfer trust property are within the class of beneficiaries. And to know whether or not any given people fall within the class of beneficiaries the terms of the trust instrument must allow one to know whether or not any given postulant is or is not within the class of beneficiaries. It is only in the last paragraph of his speech that Lord Upjohn expressed unambiguous support for the ‘is or is not’ test; this expression was also used by Lord Reid. What we must do now, however, is to consider how subsequent cases have sought to manipulate the ‘is or is not’ test so as to validate powers which the judges considered to be worthy of preservation. In the discussion below, we consider some issues with the Gulbenkian decision; but before then we will consider some later decisions which have taken different approaches from Gulbenkian on their own facts.

Alternative approaches to certainty of objects in relation to fiduciary mere powers

The shortcoming of the Gulbenkian test is that trusts which are certain as to 99% of postulants may fail because 1% of postulants are of a sort which are difficult to reconcile with the definition of the class of objects provided for under the terms of the trust. In short, theoretical difficulties might lead to the avoidance of otherwise perfectly serviceable trusts. Needless to say, there have been subsequent cases in which the courts have sought to give effect to trusts which would have fallen foul of a literal interpretation of the ‘is or is not’ test.

The Gulbenkian test is a strict one on its own terms in that the presence of a single unallocated postulant means that the trust will be held invalid. However, in Re Barlow,³¹⁵ the 310 Nubar Gulbenkian was a famous figure in 1960s London. Alan Bennett, in his book Telling Tales, 2000, refers to an occasion on which he saw Nubar Gulbenkian emerging from his familiar gold-plated taxi in Bond Street.

311 Thus overruling the decision of Harman J in Re Gresham’s Settlement [1956] 1 WLR 573, [1956] 2 All ER 193, dealing with a very similar trust provision.

312 In the Court of Appeal [1968] Ch 126, 134E, [1967] 3 All ER 15, 18.

313 [1968] Ch 126, 133.

314 [1953] 2 WLR 1033.

315 [1979] 1 WLR 278.

court attempted to mitigate the full extent of that approach. In Re Barlow, a testatrix provided an option for any of her ‘family or friends’ to purchase paintings at a specially low price. Under a strict application of the Gulbenkian test, this trust would have failed for uncertainty on the basis that the class of beneficiaries (here in particular the problematic category ‘friends’) could not include or exclude all potential claimants. However, Browne-Wilkinson J held that the bequest was valid, on three bases. First, and most importantly, the bequest was construed by Browne-Wilkinson J as disclosing an intention to make a series of identical, individual gifts to anyone who could prove that they personally fell within the core of the beneficial class intended by the testatrix: therefore, the bequest was found to constitute a series of gifts and not a power nor a trust at all. If it was a gift then no problem of certainty of objects in trusts law arose at all: certainty of objects is only an issue if the structure in question is a trust, as opposed to something else. Thus, Barlow provides an analytical approach which mitigates the full effect of the strict ‘is or is not’ test where the court is able to construe the settlor’s true intention to be to make a gift (or outright transfer) of property rather than a trust at all. Thus, we encounter a simple way of avoiding formalities required for the creation of a trust: structure or interpret the disposition otherwise than as a trust.

Secondly, Browne-Wilkinson J was also persuaded that, on the facts of that case specifically, the proposed distribution of property which the trustees were seeking the court’s permission to make, was a reasonable one which would satisfy the testator’s intention. Thirdly, his Lordship found that term ‘friends’ could be rendered conceptually certain as considered below in relation to the cases on the term ‘friends’. We shall return to these second and third aspects of the judgment later: for now we should focus on the reclassification of the power as being a gift. The significance on the facts of this case of the power being held to be in fact a gift is that the problem of certainty of objects only relates to the law of trusts and the law on powers, it is not a problem in the law of gift. Consequently, Browne-Wilkinson J had reached a pragmatic solution to the problem of validating this particular bequest in spite of the rules as to certainty of objects: if it can be analysed as a series of gifts, then no question of trusts law arises.

There are potential problems with the approach adopted in Barlow. The primary problem relates to the distribution of a fixed number of paintings on the facts of that case, but could conceivably apply to other forms of property. Given that the trustees are entitled to distribute property to people about whose credentials they are satisfied, it is possible that further beneficiaries claiming also to be entitled will emerge after all of the property has been distributed. Therefore, the looser test creates the possibility that the trustees will begin to exercise their powers without having been required to conduct a comprehensive analysis of the objects of their power. The question therefore arises whether it would have been better to have had a fixed list approach where there is a finite amount of tangible property rather than entitlement to income derived from a capital fund.³¹⁶ The latter example would make it possible for other beneficiaries who only came to light subsequently to be added to the class of entitled beneficiaries. With reference to the former, the property may be extinguished before all the potential beneficiaries are satisfied. In short, the reason for the decision in Barlow was that there was not perceived to be any problem in these circumstances of more beneficiaries emerging. Rather, the court wanted to enable the trustees to make some distributions to those beneficiaries already identified.

316 See para 3.5.5 below.

3.5.4 Discretionary trust

The obligatory nature of a discretionary trust

The discretionary trust requires that the trustees exercise their discretion and carry out their power, rather than being a fiduciary mere power which enables (but does not require) the exercise of their trust obligations. In the following example, the terms of the trust provide that the trustee ‘shall’ exercise the discretion, thus making its exercise by the trustee compulsory:

Amount 3: so that T shall divide the £1,000 between any of my sons who become unemployed, with the power to retain the whole of that £1,000 for the remainder beneficiary.

In this example, T is subject to a discretionary trust because the trust provides that ‘T shall divide the £1,000’: the word ‘shall’ indicates compulsion and thereby a discretionary trust power rather than a mere power. The further part of the provision, that T has the ‘power to retain the whole of that £1,000’, should be interpreted as being a mere power – that is, T is able to retain the £1,000 if she chooses but is not required to do so. Such combinations of powers are common in trust deeds to enable the settlor to provide for a suitable range of flexibility in the management and operation of the trust in the event that any one beneficiary subsequently comes to have more urgent needs than was the case when the settlor drafted the trust, particularly if the settlor then chooses to make herself a trustee as well, thus retaining ongoing practical control over the trust.

The leading case in relation to certainty of objects under a discretionary trust power

The leading case regarding the test for certainty in relation to discretionary trusts is the decision of the House of Lords in McPhail v Doulton.³¹⁷ Their Lordships adopted the *Re Gulbenkian*³¹⁸ test (the ‘is or is not’ test) for discretionary trusts. The tests for mere powers and discretionary trusts are therefore brought into line. As such, it is comparatively unimportant, for practical purposes, to attempt to draw any distinction between them. In practice, there is little substantive difference between the situation in which a trustee is exercising a permissive mere power and the situation in which the trustee is exercising a discretionary trust. In both circumstances, the trustee is prevented from acting totally capriciously and is obliged to consider the exercise of her power in accordance with the terms of the power itself. Therefore, the need to divide strictly between the two categories of power has waned slightly.³¹⁹

The facts in *McPhail v Doulton*³²⁰ were that payments were to be made in favour of ‘employees, ex-officers or ex-employees of the Company or any relatives or dependants of any such persons’. The question of uncertainty surrounded the expression ‘relatives and dependants’ in particular. The issue arose as to the nature of the power and, importantly, as to the appropriate test to decide the question of certainty of beneficiaries. It was found that

317 [1970] 2 WLR 1110.

318 [1968] Ch 126.

319 See Thomas, 2012, which is the most authoritative text on the question of trust and other similar powers.

320 [1970] 2 WLR 1110.

the application of the formerly applicable test in *IRC v Broadway Cottages*³²¹ required that a complete list of beneficiaries be capable of being drawn up by the trustees. However, requiring that there is no need for a complete list to be capable of being drawn up in advance, but rather that it be possible to say of any given postulant whether or not her case was sufficiently certain, would remove the uncertainty attached to trusts in favour of family or relatives in most circumstances.

The House of Lords in McPhail v Doulton adopted the ‘is or is not’ test set out in Re Gulbenkian in relation to discretionary trusts. Therefore, in considering the certainty of beneficiaries under a discretionary trust, it must be possible for the trustees to say of any postulant whether that person is or is not within the class of beneficiaries: if it is impossible to tell whether or not one individual falls within the class or not, that trust power fails. On the facts of the case, the House of Lords decided that the term ‘relative’ could be rendered certain if it were interpreted to mean ‘descendants of a common ancestor’, although this writer finds that expression every bit as confusing as the term ‘relative’.³²²

Alternative approaches to the test in McPhail v Doulton

The use of the Gulbenkian approach in McPhail did therefore import the problem identified above in relation to Gulbenkian, that the presence of a single postulant who could not be categorised as being or not being within the class of beneficiaries would invalidate the trust. Consequently, the Court of Appeal sought to mitigate the effect of the McPhail decision in *Re Baden (No 2)*³²³ to validate a trust which would otherwise have been invalid under the McPhail test. The case concerned (again) provisions relying on the vague term ‘relative’. In accordance with McPhail, it was held that ‘relative’ could be explained (equally perplexingly) as referring to ‘descendants of a common ancestor’ and therefore rendered conceptually certain. However, it was acknowledged that there might nevertheless be evidential problems in connection with proving that individuals are or are not relatives (for example, in finding birth certificates) and also ascertainability problems in finding all the relatives who might have died or moved away.

All three judges in the Court of Appeal gave separate judgments: each attempted to paint a gloss on the decision in McPhail which would validate the trust before them. In the judgment of Stamp LJ, it was held that the definition of ‘relatives’ should be restricted to ‘statutory next of kin’ rather than ‘descendants of a common ancestor’ because the latter was too broad. This approach concentrates specifically on the facts – although it doubts the approach to the term ‘relatives’ which was followed in the House of Lords.

The judgment of Sachs LJ approached the matter very differently³²⁴ by placing a burden of proof on the beneficiaries, rather than leaving it to the trustees to demonstrate that the trust was valid. In his Lordship’s words: ‘Once the class of persons to be benefited is conceptually certain it then becomes a question of fact to be determined on evidence whether any postulant

321 [1955] Ch 20.

322 Who are one’s common ancestors after all? Grandparents? Great-grandparents? A Christian might trace this back to Adam and Eve; an evolutionist to a single ape or microbe.

323 [1973] Ch 9.

324 From the outset of his judgment it was clear that Sachs LJ was annoyed that this case (which had been to the House of Lords already as McPhail v Doulton) had taken 12 years in total to reach the Court of Appeal.

has on inquiry been proved to be within it; if he is not so proved, then he is not in it . . .'³²⁵ In short, the onus was placed on the claimants to prove themselves to be a 'relative' within the terms of the trust. If they could not, they were deemed not to be a relative. In this way, the literal meaning of the 'is or is not' test is preserved, even though the logic derived from *IRC v Broadway Cottages*³²⁶ of requiring the trustees to demonstrate the validity of the trust is replaced by making the establishment of certainty simply a matter of evidence. Sachs LJ was careful not to seem to disagree with the House of Lords in McPhail v Doulton – rather, his approach preserved the literal force of that test but instead ensured that more trusts were likely to be validated on the basis that if a claimant cannot prove that she either is or is not within the class of beneficiaries, then she will be deemed not to be within that class. Therefore, the test remains intact, but many more trusts are likely to be validated because of the reversal of the onus of proof. It should be borne in mind, as Sachs LJ made plain in his judgment, that this does not mean that every trust will be validated: there will still be trusts provisions which are so vague that it will be impossible to know what the concept embodied in the provisions was intended to mean in any event (as considered below in relation to 'conceptual uncertainty').

The judgment of Megaw LJ in *Re Baden (No 2)*³²⁷ returned to the logic of the decision in *Re Allen*³²⁸ in seeking to validate those trusts in which there are a substantial number of postulants about whom one can be certain. Megaw LJ held that the trust would be held to be valid despite some potential uncertainties as to a number of postulants, provided that there was a distinct core number of beneficiaries who could be said to satisfy the terms of the power: that is, the trust would be valid provided that there were a substantial number of postulants about whom one could be certain. The trust power would not be held to be void on the basis that there is a small number of postulants about whom the trustees are uncertain. The principal concern with the 'is or is not' test was the requirement that the trustees would be required, on a literal application of that test, to prove that someone 'is not' within the class of objects rather than focusing instead on the existence of an appreciable number of people who satisfy the class of objects.³²⁹

(It should not be forgotten that the approach set out in *Re Barlow*³³⁰ above – that is, identifying in the settlor an intention to make a gift rather than a trust – could also be deployed in this context. Equally, there is no reason in principle why the arguments in Re Baden (No 2) could not be applied to fiduciary mere powers.)

Re-reading the 'is or is not' cases: what did Lord Upjohn mean to decide in Re Gulbenkian?

The purpose of this section is to drill down a little more deeply into the cases on certainty of objects relating to discretionary trusts and fiduciary mere powers. We will learn one important lesson in so doing: it is common for a case to be understood in later decisions and even in textbooks as having established a particular rule, when in fact the judge in that original

325 [1973] Ch 9, 19.

326 [1955] Ch 20.

327 [1973] Ch 9.

328 [1953] Ch 810.

329 [1973] Ch 9, 22.

330 Re Barlow [1979] 1 WLR 278.

case might not have meant that at all. It is a little like Humphrey Bogart in the classic, black-and-white film Casablanca, who is reputed to have muttered to the piano player in his favourite bar the words ‘Play it again, Sam’. Latterly, Woody Allen made a film called Play it Again, Sam which imagined what it would be like to have Humphrey Bogart’s character advising a young man on every step of his love life. Most impersonations of Humphrey Bogart have him saying ‘Play it again, Sam’ as he is supposed to have done in Casablanca. However, if you sit down to watch Casablanca, Humphrey Bogart does not actually say ‘Play it again, Sam’ at all.³³¹ Instead, the legend has grown up that that is what he said. A legend perpetuated by lots of television impressionists and by Woody Allen. This is the legend of what Humphrey Bogart is supposed to have said in Casablanca; we are now going to consider the similar legend of what Lord Upjohn is supposed to have said in Re Gulbenkian.

I am going to suggest to you now that Re Gulbenkian is similar to Casablanca in that it is a case which is commonly understood to have established a given rule when on a closer reading it might not have done so. We have discussed the test established in Re Gulbenkian for certainty of objects in relation to mere powers as being the ‘is or is not’ test. However, when you go to read Re Gulbenkian in the original, it is not clear that that was what their Lordships intended to hold. What is clear is that Lord Wilberforce and the majority of the House of Lords in the subsequent case of McPhail v Doulton tell us that Re Gulbenkian must be taken as authority for creating the ‘is or is not’ test for certainty of objects under mere powers. Consequently, it is now correct to say that the test for certainty of objects in relation to mere powers is the ‘is or is not’ test because we must follow the most recent decision of the House of Lords. So, the legend of Re Gulbenkian is that it created the ‘is or is not’ test. But we must now look a little more closely at these cases.

To begin at the beginning, Lord Hodson had been one of the Court of Appeal judges in IRC v Broadway Cottages who had held that a complete list of objects was required for the validity of a fixed trust. In his speech in Re Gulbenkian, Lord Hodson supported the ‘complete list test’ in IRC v Broadway Cottages as being the most appropriate test for discretionary trusts, and in a sense for mere powers as well. Lord Hodson’s particular concern was that the difference between trusts and powers should be maintained and that there was consequently a need for a stricter test for discretionary trusts than was needed for mere powers. The problem identified with the ‘is or is not’ test is that it does not require the fiduciary to know all of the members of the class before acting; instead, the trustees seem to have a power to limit their decisions to whichever objects of the trust actually turn up. Lord Guest concurred with Lord Hodson. However, both Lord Hodson and Lord Guest also concurred with Lord Upjohn.

For the bulk of Lord Upjohn’s speech, his Lordship circled round the issues and seemed to express support for the ‘complete list’ test set out in IRC v Broadway Cottages at one stage, except in relation to mere powers. It is only in the last paragraph of his speech that he held unambiguously that it is necessary to know whether or not any given person is or is not with the class of objects. Therefore, Lord Upjohn did not in fact seem to express clear support for the ‘is or is not’ test to the exclusion of all other tests throughout his speech. Lord Reid used the expression ‘is or is not’ in his speech and Lord Reid criticised both the decision in Broadway 331 At one stage Ingrid Bergman’s character almost says this (she is mumbling, so it is difficult to hear exactly what she says but it is not exactly ‘Play it again, Sam’) and Humphrey Bogart’s character says a few things to Sam about the music he is playing but never exactly ‘Play it again, Sam’. It is the perfect black-and-white film for a rainy day. So is Woody Allen’s film come to that.

Cottages for being too restrictive and this area of law in general for being over-burdened with technicality. Consequently we can see that Lord Reid supported the ‘is or is not’ test, whereas Lord Upjohn did not express his unequivocal agreement with it until the final paragraph of his speech. Furthermore, because Re Gulbenkian related only to powers, it is unclear which test Lord Upjohn intended to apply in cases involving discretionary trusts.

We then move on the decision of the House of Lords in McPhail v Doulton a short time later, in which Lord Upjohn did not appear. Instead it is Lord Wilberforce who suggested that Lord Upjohn’s intention in Re Gulbenkian should be understood as having been to establish an ‘is or is not’ test for discretionary trusts as well as for mere powers. This point is important: it is Lord Wilberforce’s interpretation that Lord Upjohn had meant to apply the ‘is or is not’ test and that he could be taken to have intended it to apply to discretionary trusts as well as mere powers, even though it is not absolutely clear that Lord Upjohn necessarily intended to hold anything of the sort on the face of his speech. When we come to the speeches of Lords Hodson and Guest in McPhail v Doulton we see that again they concurred with one another. Lord Hodson was clear in his opinion. As far as he was concerned, the only reason that he and Lord Guest had concurred with Lord Upjohn in Re Gulbenkian was because they had understood Lord Upjohn to be supporting the notion that the complete list test from IRC v Broadway Cottages was being applied to discretionary trusts (and arguably, on his Lordship’s account, even to mere powers).³³² That is, the fiduciary would need to know all the objects in advance. Lords Hodson and Guest are in the minority in McPhail v Doulton and therefore the majority (following Lord Wilberforce) established two principles: first, that the test of certainty of objects for mere powers should be understood as being the ‘is or is not’ test; and, secondly, that the test of certainty of objects for discretionary trusts should also be the ‘is or is not’ test. This is important: those two judges were significant in establishing the majority in Re Gulbenkian but they did not think that Lord Upjohn was deciding what Lord Wilberforce has taken him to mean subsequently. Thus we have established a legend from Re Gulbenkian, even though it is not clear that the majority of the House of Lords in that case intended it to be the test for future cases.

There are two points of view about what precisely the ‘is or is not’ test might mean. This test has been explained already on the basis that it means that the trustees must consider whether or not any hypothetical, possible postulant would either fall clearly within or without the class. An alternative interpretation of the test, which makes it more likely to be satisfied, is that the trustees need only measure the certainty of objects on the basis of the postulants who actually do come forward. Lord Hodson considers that the test should refer to hypothetical postulants generally and that the test in relation to trusts (whether fixed or discretionary trusts) should be stringent. Lord Hodson believed that Lord Wilberforce was prepared to narrow the postulants to those people who actually turn up and ask the trustees to consider only them. Clearly, if the trustees only had to make their minds up about the people who actually appeared in front of them then it would be much more likely that the ‘is or is not’ test would be satisfied than if the trustees had to be satisfied about any possible, hypothetical postulant. It is suggested that the speech of Lord Upjohn does not suggest only considering those who actually come forward. The test is whether or not the trustees can be satisfied about who is within and who is without the beneficial class in general terms. That, it is suggested, relates to all possible hypothetical objects of the trust or power.

332 Notably, Lord Hodson had appeared, sub nom Hodson LJ, in IRC v Broadway Cottages, so in the two House of Lords cases he was simply re-affirming (or so he believed) his concurrence with the complete list test in Broadway Cottages.

This is a unique feature of common law systems. Ideas go in and out of fashion over time. Understandings of what judges meant by the words they used can also change over time, unless those earlier judges make their meaning very clear indeed. Instead, during the course of a long judgment it is likely that a judge will express his ideas in many different ways with the result that, when we come to read those words many years later, we might be able to find different passages which appear to advance different points of view. Lord Upjohn's speech in Re Gulbenkian is a good example of this phenomenon: read it for yourself and identify passages which appear to support the Broadway Cottages test and other passages which appear to support the 'is or is not' test, and decide for yourself. In coming to write a legal textbook, I am required to set out the current position in trusts law. The current position must be that we follow the most recent House of Lords decision in McPhail v Doulton and its interpretation of the decision in Re Gulbenkian. However, as legal scholars, you and I must also be prepared to look a little more closely at what those judges actually said and what the underlying arguments seem to be.

The rights of beneficiaries under discretionary trusts

The nature of the rights of the object of a discretionary trust is considered below in section 4.1.2.

3.5.5 Personal powers

The non-fiduciary nature of a personal power

A personal power is a power given to an individual without making that person subject to any fiduciary duty in relation to the exercise of that power.³³³ An example of a personal power would be as follows, quoting from the example given above:

Amount 4: so that X, as an old family friend, shall be entirely free in a personal capacity to pay as much of the £1,000 as he sees fit to any of my grandchildren whom he deems worthy of it, with the power to retain the whole of that £1,000 for the remainder beneficiary.

This power would be said to be a personal power in that it is explicit that X is to exercise his discretion not as a fiduciary, but rather as an ordinary person without the constraints of demonstrating that he has acted in accordance with the terms of fiduciary office (this is evident from the words 'entirely free in a personal capacity'). A power given to a person outside any fiduciary capacity entitles that person to act in any way that he sees fit within the law generally and within the terms of the power.³³⁴ In this example, therefore, X can choose to pay all of the money to a favourite grandchild, but is not permitted to do anything which would be a criminal offence and is not empowered to pay more than the £1,000 which is available.

³³³ Re Hay's ST [1981] 3 All ER 786.

³³⁴ Ibid.

That a personal power may not be invalidated on grounds of uncertainty of objects

In the decision of Megarry VC in Re Hay's ST,³³⁵ it was found that the holder of a personal power cannot have it invalidated on the specific ground of uncertainty of objects.³³⁶ His Lordship held that 'it is plain that if a power of appointment is given to a person who is not in a fiduciary position, there is nothing in the width of the power which invalidates it per se', meaning that a personal power will not be void for uncertainty no matter how vague its terms may be. This point is echoed in *Re Wright*³³⁷ where it was held that the holder of the power 'is entitled to prefer one object to another from any motive he pleases, and however capriciously he exercises the power the Court will uphold it'. The thinking behind this principle is that it is open to a holder of a personal power to exercise or not exercise that power precisely as she sees fit because it is a power which is personal to her and not a power which she holds further to any fiduciary office. This enables the holder of the power to act capriciously, without any need to justify the reasons for that decision. This situation should be compared with that of the holder of a fiduciary power, in that a fiduciary must reflect upon whether or not to exercise that power, as considered below. Similarly, the holder of a discretionary trust power must be assiduous in surveying the range of objects and may not act capriciously. The reason for a personal power not being justiciable on grounds of uncertainty of objects is simply that the holder of the power is not acting in a fiduciary capacity, by definition, and therefore there is no reason for seeking to control the objects in whose favour that person exercises their power as though the holder of the power was a fiduciary. This is the approach taken by David Hayton.³³⁸

In short, personal powers are not justiciable on the basis that the objects of the power are uncertain.³³⁹ In the alternative, powers exercised by fiduciaries must not be exercised capriciously. In contrast with personal powers, it could be said that fiduciaries' powers are subject to 'negative justiciability': that is, if fiduciaries act improperly their powers will be declared null and void by the court, otherwise they will be permitted to do whatever they want.

The breadth of this principle must be clearly understood, however. Personal powers, like any other form of power, may be held to be void if the power is exercised in excess of its stated terms or if it is exercised so as to constitute a fraud on the power. So, for example, in relation to the excessive exercise of a power, if the power is a power to spend £1,000 on a given purpose, and if the holder of the power purports to spend £2,500, then the excessive portion of the exercise of that power will be void: that is, the £1,500 will be recoverable from the holder of the power. In relation to a fraud on the power, if the holder of the power purported to exercise the power so as to benefit someone who was evidently not intended to 336 However, if the holder of the power purports to act beyond the scope of that power then such excessive exercise will be void, on which see para 10.5.1.

335 Ibid.

337 [1920] 1 Ch 108, 118.

338 Hayton and Mitchell, 2005, para 3–103. See also Emery (1982) 98 LQR 551, especially at 582.

339 Re Leek [1967] Ch 1061, 1076.

benefit from it (for example, such as the power holder herself without being permitted to do so by the terms of the power) then that purported exercise of that power would be void.³⁴⁰ These are different issues from saying that a personal power may not be invalidated on the ground of the uncertainty of the identity of the objects of that power: it is a different matter altogether from certainty of objects.

There are commentators whose preference is for saying that personal powers must nevertheless be conceptually certain.³⁴¹ The basis for this argument is that if the holder of the power does not know what the terms of her power mean then it cannot be possible for the court to know whether or not that power has been exercised properly. However, if the power is a personal power to advance property between a testator's 'friends' then the holder of the power is not required to justify her actions as a fiduciary would have to and so can advance the property to people who are undoubtedly friends, even though there may be some other people about whom it is not possible to know with certainty that they are friends.³⁴² This is, in essence, the approach which Browne-Wilkinson J took in Re Barlow, as considered above: that is, the court may approve a scheme for the distribution of property even if there may be some uncertainty at the edges of the terms of the power. It could be said, of course, that this is just to unearth the Re Allen test in relation to questions of uncertainty of objects in relation to personal powers. The question would be as to personal powers which were drafted even more vaguely and about which it would be impossible to know who was intended to take a benefit at all, such as 'subject to a personal power to distribute this property to nice people I have met during my lifetime': it is suggested. Notably, though, the dicta set out above from Re Wright and from Re Hay's ST do permit the holder of the power to exercise even these powers. While the alternative approach – suggesting that personal powers could be invalidated on grounds of conceptual uncertainty – may have some academic support, it can only apply in exceptional or marginal cases in any event. More significantly there is no clear judicial statement to support it; whereas the proposition that personal powers are generally not susceptible to justiciability in relation to certainty of objects does have the judicial support advanced above.³⁴³

Personal powers embedded in trust instruments

It is possible that there could be a category of personal power which empowers a person to decide on the destination of trust property.³⁴⁴ For such a power to be a personal power, as opposed to a fiduciary power, that holder of that power must not be under any obligation to exercise nor to preserve it.³⁴⁵ For example, if this power is exercisable only in default of trustees making some other appointment, then it may be a purely personal power if its exercise may not be necessary and especially if the holder of the power is not also a trustee. So, 340 Re Somes [1896] 1 Ch 250, 255; Palmer v Locke (1880) 15 Ch D 294, 302.

341 See, for example, the breadth of arguments canvassed in Thomas and Hudson, 2010, para 4.29.

342 Emery (1982) 98 LQR 551; Thomas and Hudson, 2010, para 4.28.

343 There is a sense in which it could be an excessive exercise of a power to purport to appoint property to a person who is beyond the scope of the power, but what is clear is that Megarry VC was treating these concepts separately.

344 Re Mettoy Pension Trustees Ltd v Evans [1990] 1 WLR 1587, 1613, per Warner J. See also Re Mills [1930] 1 Ch 654; Re Greaves [1954] Ch 434.

345 Re Mettoy Pension Trustees Ltd v Evans [1990] 1 WLR 1587.

in Mettoy Pensions v Evans,³⁴⁶ where a company was given ‘absolute discretion’ in a trust instrument as to the manner in which it was to deal with any surplus generated by a pension fund, then the company should be found to have only a personal power, as opposed to a fiduciary power, over the use of that money. On the facts, however, it was held that the trustees had to be acting in a fiduciary capacity. The rationale for arguing that this power was a personal power was that there may not have been any surplus generated by the pension fund and also because the company was empowered to act in its absolute discretion in deciding how to use that property, as opposed to being required to act within the strictures of fiduciary obligations when dealing with that property.³⁴⁷ On the facts, however, trustees managing a pension fund were necessarily acting as fiduciaries, thus demonstrating the unlikelihood of finding that trustees are ever acting in a purely personal capacity.

3.5.6 Bare trusts

This category is not considered separately in the literature on this particular topic and is really a form of fixed trust for these purposes; however, it appears that we can make some more sense of the subject by dealing with it as a separate category. A bare trust is a trust under which the trustee holds property on trust for a single, specified beneficiary without any contingencies or terms governing the trust. Many trust obligations take this simple form. To consider the preceding trust obligations as the only possibilities is to ignore this more straightforward category. Therefore, the remainder provision in the example given at the beginning of this section appears to be a clear example of a bare trust:

Any amount held in remainder shall be held on trust for my wife.

There is a contingency that amounts must be held over in remainder before the trust obligation operates. However, once amounts are held in remainder, T holds the property on bare trust for the settlor’s wife. This obligation is straightforwardly categorised as a fiduciary obligation to hold that property for the benefit of the beneficiary. For a bare trust power to be sufficiently certain, it is simply necessary for the identity of that single beneficiary to be capable of being ascertained.

On the point of a ‘remainder’, it should be remembered that a remainder beneficiary is a beneficiary who takes absolute title in property after the death of the life tenant. So, in the following arrangement, ‘£1,000 to be held on trust for A for life, remainder to B’, A is the life tenant entitled to receipt of the income derived from the trust fund, whereas B is a remainder beneficiary who has some rights during A’s lifetime to ensure that the trust fund is not dissipated³⁴⁸ but who becomes absolutely entitled to the fund after A’s death. On the facts of the above example, the wife takes as a remainder beneficiary, meaning that she becomes absolutely entitled under a bare trust when all the other transfers have been completed. There is nothing uncertain about providing for the ‘remainder’ to be held on trust on the basis that the trustee will know what is left when the other gifts have been completed.³⁴⁹

346 [1990] 1 WLR 1587.

347 Ibid.

348 Re Ralli's WT [1964] 2 WLR 144; see para 5.4.2 below.

349 Sprange v Barnard (1789) 2 Bro CC 585, at para 3.4.4 above.

3.5.7 Understanding the different approaches in the cases

The general approach of the cases

Thus far we have seen that there are a number of cases which appear to be in conflict. In short, the principal dispute on the cases is as follows. The leading cases, such as Gulbenkian and McPhail v Doulton, are concerned that the beneficiaries can only control the trustees by applying to the courts for a declaration as to whether or not a power has been exercised properly. The court can only know whether or not the power has been exercised properly if the terms of the trust or power are sufficiently certain for the purposes of that type of trust or power. By contrast, judges like Lord Denning, Browne-Wilkinson J in Re Barlow and the judges in Re Baden (No 2) have taken the view that one should seek to uphold testamentary bequests wherever possible if, on the facts of the particular case, it is possible to know that there are some people who will definitely fall within the class of beneficiaries, even if there are also some people about whom one might not be sure. The motivation behind this second line of authority is to ensure that the testator's wishes are given effect to so far as possible and to ensure that people who were clearly intended to take a benefit from the power or trust should not be denied property because the power or trust is poorly drafted. More technically, Lord Denning was concerned that the law relating to discretionary trusts should be brought into line with the treatment of conditions precedent and 'powers collateral' where the tests for certainty are less onerous.³⁵⁰ It should be remembered, however, that these alternative approaches have only emerged in exceptional cases and have been approved in courts which are junior to the House of Lords' decisions in cases like Gulbenkian and McPhail v Doulton. The leading cases remain the House of Lords' decisions.

Decisions on their own facts, where the circumstances permit

There is one trend in some of the cases which is worthy of mention. In spite of the seeming strictness of the case law principles, it is possible by reference to some of the authorities to convince a judge that even though a strict interpretation of the case law tests may lead to a trust or power being held void, nevertheless the trustees' proposed course of action in any particular factual circumstances is acceptable with the result that the trust should be held to be valid. So in Re Barlow, Browne-Wilkinson J was fortified in his view that the will trusts before him could be interpreted to be a series of gifts to be made by the trustees to people who were capable of being considered to be the testator's 'friends' because the trustees had clearly identified the manner in which they were proposing to distribute the property. Browne-Wilkinson J was satisfied both that these people were indeed friends of the testator and also that there would be no hardship caused to any third parties. For an example of this approach consider the following passage in which Browne-Wilkinson J held as follows, in considering whether or not the term 'friends' would be sufficiently certain:

So in this case, in my judgment, there are acquaintances of a kind so close that, on any reasonable basis, anyone would treat them as being 'friends'. Therefore, by allowing the disposition to take effect in their favour, one would certainly be giving effect to part of the testatrix's intention even though as to others it is impossible to say whether or not they satisfy the test.

350 Re Gulbenkian [1968] Ch 126, 134; [1967] 3 All ER 15, 18, CA.

Similarly in Re Gestetner,³⁵¹ in spite of the ostensible rigidity of the case law principles, Harman J was prepared to accede to the trustees' proposed method of distributing of testamentary property because it satisfied the testator's objectives satisfactorily, even though the will was imperfectly drafted.

However, this should not be taken to mean that one can simply dispense with all of the legal principles. Even in these exceptional judgments the judges have agonised over the details of the earlier tests and only succumbed to the temptation to permit this level of flexibility when it could be justified in the circumstances of their cases.

3.5.8 Some particular words and expressions causing uncertainty

It will be useful to consider some other authorities on frequently-used words and expressions. The issue which confronts the court in each instance is whether or not the concept encapsulated by an individual word is sufficiently certain to define the class of objects or not. What can be derived from these authorities is that there is no evenly applied test, even in relation to the same concepts.

The term 'friends' and similar expressions

The term 'friends' has been held sufficiently certain in some contexts but not in others. In Re Gulbenkian Lord Upjohn simply accepted, without discussion, that the word 'friends' was an axiomatic example of something that would be uncertain. In Brown v Gould,³⁵² a trust in favour of 'old friends' was found to have been invalid by Megarry J.³⁵³ It was held that if the court cannot determine who an 'old friend' is, then the trustees will not be able to do so.³⁵⁴ In general, the term 'friend' has been considered to be conceptually uncertain and therefore void, whether referring particularly to 'old friends' or 'dear friends' or some such similar expression.³⁵⁵

Nevertheless, cases decided under the influence of the *Re Allen*³⁵⁶ approach to certainty of objects – to the effect that a trust should be valid if there were a substantial or sufficient number of people falling within the class on the facts of the particular case – have been prepared to find that if there were particular friends who could be taken to have been clearly intended to fall within the settlor's intention, then the power might be validated to that extent. In this vein, Megarry J has held:³⁵⁷

351 [1953] Ch 672.

352 [1972] Ch 53.

353 Making reference to the unreported case of Re Lloyds Trust Instruments, 24 June 1970.

354 In relation to the uncertainty of the term 'friends' generally, see Re Coxen [1948] Ch 747; Re Coates [1955] Ch 495; Re Gibbard [1966] 1 All ER 273; Re Gulbenkian [1968] Ch 126; Re Barlow [1979] 1 WLR 278.

355 Re Coates [1955] Ch 495; Re Gulbenkian [1968] Ch 126.

356 [1953] Ch 810.

357 This extract is reproduced by Thomas, 1998, 100 and in Brown v Gould [1972] Ch 53, 57.

Friendship . . . is a concept with almost infinite shades of meaning. Where the concept is uncertain, the gift is void. Where the concept is certain, then mere difficulty in tracing and discovering those who are entitled normally does not invalidate the gift.

So, in Re Barlow,³⁵⁸ Browne-Wilkinson J was prepared to hold that the term ‘friends’ might be sufficiently certain in relation to testamentary bequests which entitled ‘friends’ to buy paintings from the trustees. While Browne-Wilkinson J found that the term ‘friend’ in general terms would be uncertain, his Lordship was nevertheless prepared to find in reliance on the test in *Re Allen*³⁵⁹ that on the facts before him there were sufficient people who clearly would fall within the class of ‘friends’ in relation to that particular testator for the term to be validated.³⁶⁰ Browne-Wilkinson J held that the term ‘friend’ could be rendered certain if it was taken to mean people who had a long relationship with the settlor, and whose relationship with the settlor was not built on business but rather on social contact. It is this writer’s view that that approach does not necessarily answer all questions: for example, what is a ‘long relationship’? In that latter case, there was no trust over the paintings in Browne-Wilkinson J’s analysis because the bequest was taken to constitute an intention to enter into a series of discrete transactions equivalent to gifts.³⁶¹

There is other judicial authority relying on the old case of *Re Allen*³⁶² which has similarly sought to validate fiduciary mere powers in favour of old friends, before the decision in *Re Gulbenkian*³⁶³ required that all such powers could only have sufficiently certain objects if it could be said of any given postulant that that person is or is not with the class of beneficiaries. So, in relation to the expression ‘old friends’ used as a description of a class of persons to be benefited by a will, in Re Gibbard, Plowman J considered what might be meant by that term:³⁶⁴

Suppose that the testator had been at prep school³⁶⁵ with X and had gone on from prep school to public school with X, and then to university with X; each had become godfather to one of the other’s children, perhaps lived in the same neighbourhood, perhaps belonged to the same club, perhaps played golf together, perhaps dined in each other’s houses and had been doing that for fifty years. Could X, coming along and stating that that was the relationship between the testator and himself, fail to satisfy the description ‘any of my old friends’? I should have thought that the answer was no. I should have thought that ‘old friends’ was a sufficiently precise test in the sense that there is no difficulty in envisaging cases where claimants might come along and establish beyond question that they would be eligible to use that expression.³⁶⁶

358 [1979] 1 WLR 278.

359 [1953] Ch 810.

360 Importantly, on the facts of that case, his Lordship was prepared to find that it was clear whom the testator must have meant.

361 See also Re Gibbard [1967] 1 WLR 42: but note that this case was pre-Gulbenkian.

362 [1953] Ch 810.

363 [1968] Ch 126.

364 [1966] 1 All ER 273, 279, [1967] 1 WLR 42, 48.

365 This is a reference to ‘preparatory schools’, which are private schools attended by some children before the age of 14 usually with the intention that those children will progress to English public schools thereafter.

366 And in these dicta we have a picture of the comfortable domesticity of the English upper classes.

In the wake of Re Gulbenkian, however, this approach is insupportable. While it could be said of the particular individual spoken of by Plowman J that that person was an old friend, it would not be possible to say of anyone who came before the trustees that they were similarly an old friend. Such an approach as Plowman J suggests would only be possible if it were sufficient that the court find some people who fall within the class of objects.

The use of the term 'customers'

In Sparfax v Dommett,³⁶⁷ a power in favour of 'customers' was held to have been invalid. Theoretically, it would have been possible to produce records or receipts to prove that individual postulants had been customers. However, what was not clear was whether to be a 'customer' you would have had to have purchased an item or a service, or whether one could simply visit a shop and be a 'customer' without making a purchase. The term was held to have been uncertain because these sorts of imponderables were left unclear.

The use of the term 'relatives'

As considered above, the term 'relatives' is one which has frequently been used by settlors in creating trusts. In *McPhail v Doulton*³⁶⁸ – a case which was concerned only with the appropriate test for the identification of the objects of a discretionary trust – it was suggested that the term 'relatives' could be taken to mean 'descendants of a common ancestor', a notion which was criticised for its ambiguity above.³⁶⁹ When the facts of that same case were remitted for trial on the direct question of whether or not the term 'relatives' could be considered to have been sufficiently certain, it was considered that the classes identified in the statutory instruments governing division of an estate on intestacy.³⁷⁰ In further cases, the terms 'for my relations in equal shares' was interpreted to refer to statutory next of kin (as provided for in the Intestacy Rules) so as to render it conceptually certain.³⁷¹ Similarly, the expression 'issue' has been rendered sufficiently certain by taking it to mean 'descendants of every degree' albeit frequently restricted to referring only to children of the settlor.³⁷² The term may differ according to the context.³⁷³

3.5.9 Resolving the uncertainty: use of an expert or trustee discretion

Means of seeking to resolve uncertainty used in trust instruments

The preceding discussion has considered the strict tests applicable in cases of uncertainty and some decisions which have mollified the strict application of those tests. The purpose of this section is to consider the situation in which provisions have been added to the trust fund

367 (1972) The Times, 14 July.

368 McPhail v Doulton [1970] 2 WLR 1110.

369 See para 3.5.4 above.

370 Re Baden (No 2) [1973] Ch 9.

371 Re Gansloser's WT [1952] Ch 30; Re Poulton's WT [1987] 1 WLR 795.

372 See Thomas and Hudson, 2004, 111.

373 Ibid.

to enable the trustees to resolve any uncertainty in the trust by reference to experts or other designated individuals.

There are three common devices used by those drafting trusts to attempt to render certain provisions which would otherwise appear to be uncertain on their face. The first is to provide that some expert third party should be able to adjudicate on those persons who will or will not fall within the class of beneficiaries. The second is to give the trustees a power to decide who will or will not fall within the class in the event of any alleged uncertainty: this latter issue raising the question again whether such trustees are acting as fiduciaries or in a personal capacity when exercising such a power. The third is to provide, effectively, that the trustees have a discretion to appoint property to anyone in the world, in the hope that the power will be logically certain even if it will also be very broad. Each is considered in turn.

That some third person unconnected with the trust may be appointed as an expert

An example of the first approach for resolving uncertainty is to grant the trustees a power to appoint a third person to the role of arbitrator in the event of some uncertainty. Thus, in Re Tuck's Settlement Trusts,³⁷⁴ Lord Denning held that a trust, which provided that money was left on trust for the benefit of such of the testator's issue who married into the Jewish faith, would be valid because the court (or the trustees) was able to ask the Chief Rabbi for advice as to the extent that there was uncertainty about any postulant. Importantly, in this context the question of whether or not a person was of the Jewish faith was something which could be answered definitively by reference to Jewish law (which has clear rules on who will be considered to be a member of that faith). So, this trust was valid because it was possible on its own terms to appoint an expert who would render the class of objects sufficiently certain. Other similar cases have included trust conditions such as a prohibition that the propositus 'must not marry someone of the Jewish faith and parentage',³⁷⁵ in which case the 'parentage' part of the condition was held to be uncertain. Also, a condition that the propositus 'must remain Catholic' has been accepted as being sufficiently certain.³⁷⁶ It is unclear whether or not these approaches will be accepted as general principles in future cases.³⁷⁷ It is suggested that if the matters at issue are empirically demonstrable facts (such as a person needing to be suffering from a particular disease) or questions of law (such as whether or not a person is of a particular faith under Jewish law), then there ought to be no objection in permitting their validity because any uncertainty is removed by the decision of the specified expert.³⁷⁸ By contrast, provisions which, for example, left it to a testator's solicitor to decide who were that testator's 'good friends' would be objectionable because it could not be known whether or not the term 'good friends' were conceptually certain, nor could the solicitor or any other person claim to be objectively an expert in such matters when compared, for example, with matters of scientific rigour which could be established empirically or objectively.

374 [1978] 2 WLR 411.

375 Clayton v Ramsden [1943] AC 320.

376 Blaithwayt v Baron Cawley [1976] AC 397.

377 See Thomas, 1998, 135, para 3–117.

378 See Re Tuck's Settlement Trusts [1978] Ch 49, 62, [1978] 2 WLR 411, 424, per Lord Denning whereby the Chief Rabbi clause was considered to 'cure' the conceptual uncertainty.

Clearly, these decisions are in conflict with the rigour of the decision in McPhail v Doulton.³⁷⁹ The approach taken in *Re Barlow*³⁸⁰ and in Clayton v Ramsden,³⁸¹ by comparison, was that in relation to conditions subsequent, whereby entitlement to be recognised as a beneficiary would be removed if that beneficiary subsequently failed to satisfy some condition (for example, that X shall be a beneficiary provided that she remains sufficiently tall), it would be enough to demonstrate the efficacy of the trust if a sufficient number of people could fall within it regardless of whether or not some individuals failed to satisfy a condition subsequent. Therefore, it was not considered necessary in those cases to demonstrate that it could be said of any given postulant that she did or did not fall within the category of beneficiaries. Thus, in Re Barlow, Browne-Wilkinson J held that gifts could be made to any propositus once that person could demonstrate that she fell within the category of beneficiaries: it would not matter that they might subsequently fail to satisfy a condition. Therefore, there does appear to be a different principle in relation to powers involving conditions subsequent when compared to conditions precedent in this sense.³⁸² The approach in McPhail v Doulton,³⁸³ by dint of the ‘is or is not’ test, would have invalidated such objects clauses because it could not have been said whether or not any potential postulant would have fallen within or without the class of objects.

That the trustees may not exercise their own unfettered discretion as though third parties

As to the second means of resolving uncertainty, by giving the trustees a power to decide on their own cognisance how to resolve any uncertainty, Jenkins J dismissed the general effectiveness of such provisions in *Re Coxen*³⁸⁴ in the following terms:

If the testator had sufficiently defined the state of affairs in which the trustees were to form their opinion he would not have saved the condition from invalidity on the ground of uncertainty merely by making their opinion the criterion.

Therefore, it will be difficult to resolve uncertainty simply by purporting to give such a general power to the trustees. However, his Lordship considered that if the testator ‘had sufficiently defined’ the basis on which the trustees were to exercise their judgment – so that it became effectively an objective or empirically demonstrable fact – then the provision may be valid. Such a narrow power would, it is suggested, remove any uncertainty in any event if it made the train tracks on which the trustee’s discretion was to operate so clear and incapable of error. However, a discretion which cannot produce an uncertain result is, it is suggested, not a discretion which raises any problem of uncertainty of objects.³⁸⁵

379 [1970] 2 WLR 1110.

380 [1979] 1 WLR 278.

381 [1943] AC 320.

382 Underhill and Hayton, 2002, 82.

383 [1970] 2 WLR 1110.

384 [1948] Ch 747.

385 If the trustees’ discretion is on train tracks, then there is no scope for error or uncertainty, whereas if the trustees’ discretion enables them to travel across an open field, then there is always the possibility of uncertainty.

The strict principle is the better one, it is suggested. This approach is in line with principle because if the trustees were able to exercise some unfettered discretion in this sense qua trustees, the court would not be able to know whether or not they had exercised their power properly. That the trustees are given an open power to resolve any uncertainty still leaves the circular problem of whether or not their power is for sufficiently certain objects in the first place. So, simply suggesting that the trustees can resolve any uncertainty will not render certain what is otherwise uncertain.³⁸⁶ Rather, the settlor would have to be careful to appoint third parties either as experts (as under *Re Tuck's Settlement Trusts*³⁸⁷ above), or in some other fashion as the holders of purely personal powers which would not be invalidated simply by reference to their width (as considered in relation to *Re Hay's ST*³⁸⁸ above).

There is one further twist on this method of empowering the trust which might seem to provide a means of seeking to resolve uncertainty. This is to provide in the terms of the trust instrument that no term of the trust is to be deemed uncertain, but that any confusion in relation to a provision about which there appears to be uncertainty shall be resolved by a binding decision of the trustees. Nevertheless, the decision in *Re Coxen*³⁸⁹ held that a concept was not made certain by leaving it to the trustees to decide who constituted, in that case, 'an old friend'. There are two reasons for this approach. The first is that there are no clear, justiciable criteria on which the court can review the trustees' decision if the beneficiaries choose to challenge it. Secondly, the court will typically be unwilling to allow those occupying the office of trustees to act as settlor also.³⁹⁰ In short, while the decision would be clear, the criteria on which the trustees were to be judged would not and the courts could therefore have difficulty in reviewing their decision. Thus, in Re Wright's WT,³⁹¹ where a transfer of property was made to trustees to help institutions which the trustees considered had assisted the testator during his lifetime, that transfer was held to have been uncertain.

Granting the trustees wide powers

One further technique which has been used to resolve any risk of uncertainty is to give the trustees a power, for example, to advance trust property to 'anyone in the world' or to 'anyone whom the trustees consider appropriate'.³⁹² There is no objection to such a power being conferred on someone who is not a fiduciary.³⁹³ The problem is with conferring such a power on a fiduciary. At one level, such a power is certain: the class of objects means anyone in the world. Therefore, it is conceptually certain. The issue is twofold. First, whether or not it is too broad a class to be administratively workable (as considered in the next section). Secondly, and more particularly, how can the court possibly judge whether or not such a power had been exercised properly? If the power can be exercised in favour of anyone 386 Re Jones [1953] Ch 125, 130, per Dankwerts J; Re Burton's Settlements [1955] Ch 82, 95, per Upjohn J.

387 [1978] 2 WLR 411.

388 [1981] 3 All ER 786.

389 [1948] Ch 747.

390 Re Brook's ST [1939] 1 Ch 993.

391 (1857) 3 K & J 419.

392 Re Manisty [1974] Ch 17, [1973] 2 All ER 1203. The two types of power here are typically either 'special wide powers' or 'intermediate wide powers'. For a discussion of these types of powers, see Thomas, 1998, para 6–39 et seq.

393 Re Hay's ST [1982] 1 WLR 202.

in the world, then how can the court judge whether an advancement to a child in Bangladesh is more or less acceptable a use of that power than an advancement to a reindeer farmer in Lapland?³⁹⁴

In Re Manisty's Settlement,³⁹⁵ there was a provision in the settlement to the effect that if a given event took place, the trustees could advance property to anyone in the world (effectively) except some of the testator's identified relatives. The purpose of such provisions is to ensure that if a particular event takes place which would have unfavourable tax consequences for the settlement and its beneficiaries, then this provision seeks to declare that none of those identified people can be objects of the power in the expectation that this will solve the tax problem. Templeman J held that there was no issue of uncertainty in the drafting of this provision because it could be said with certainty which relatives were and which were not excluded from the class of objects on these facts.³⁹⁶

This approach is logical,³⁹⁷ but it is not without difficulty. In Blausten v IRC,³⁹⁸ it was held that such a power could be void for uncertainty in general terms if the power was simply too wide for the court to be able to know with any certainty whether or not the trustees had exercised that power properly. As Buckley LJ put this point in Blausten v IRC, considering such powers in general terms:³⁹⁹

If the class of persons to whose possible claims they would have to give consideration were so wide that it really did not amount to a class in any true sense at all no doubt that would be a duty which it would be impossible for them to perform and the power could be said to be invalid on that ground.

Subsequently, in Re Hay's ST,⁴⁰⁰ Megarry VC was asked to consider a power which could be exercised 'for such persons . . . as the trustees shall . . . appoint except the settlor'. His Lordship held that if the power was administratively workable,⁴⁰¹ and provided that the trustees considered the exercise of their power appropriately, then such a power need not automatically be void.

It is suggested that if the source of this area of law is to ensure that the court can exercise its inherent power to administer a trust,⁴⁰² then it cannot be possible to know whether or not a fiduciary has exercised a power properly if the power is expressed to be in such broad terms: therefore, such powers should be held to be void for uncertainty.⁴⁰³ (It should be 394 As the judges sometimes express this idea, is the fiduciary obliged 'to survey mankind from China to Peru?': Re Gestetner [1953] Ch 672, 688 per Harman J.

395 [1974] Ch 17, [1973] 2 All ER 1203.

396 Cf Mettoy Pension Trustees Ltd v Evans [1990] 1 WLR 1587, 1617, [1991] 2 All ER 513, 549, per Warner J, which took a broader view about the court's powers to intervene in relation to the administration of such powers beyond merely ensuring that the fiduciary had considered the exercise of her power appropriately.

397 In that logically, having excluded half a dozen people with certainty, we know who 'all of the rest of the people in the world' are. The problem is how can the trustees justify acting in favour of some people but not others?

398 [1972] Ch 256.

399 Ibid, 272.

400 [1982] 1 WLR 202.

401 A concept considered in the next section.

402 Schmidt v Rosewood Trust Ltd [2003] 3 All ER 76.

403 As considered in the next section, it is also the case that such powers would be void for unworkability if the trustees were in fact to measure the comparative rights of everyone in the world.

noted, as mentioned above, that Templeman J⁴⁰⁴ and Megarry VC⁴⁰⁵ have not themselves seen anything wrong per se with the width of such powers.) This analysis would depend upon the drafting of the trust provision and whether or not there are sufficient caveats expressed in relation to that power so that the court can understand what would be a proper and an improper exercise of that power. So, in Blausten v IRC, it was a requirement of the exercise of the power that the prior agreement in writing of the settlor be given to any exercise of the power: therefore, it was held that this power was not so wide as to be invalid for uncertainty because there would be some limit on its exercise and therefore it was in fact not a clause for the benefit of everyone in the world.

3.5.10 The various forms of uncertainty

There is an important further means of analysing the ways in which powers may be found to be valid or invalid: that is, the nature of the uncertainty. It appears that there are some forms of uncertainty which will not, in themselves, cause the trust to be found invalid. A division between the various forms of uncertainty has been made in the following way:⁴⁰⁶

- (a) Conceptual uncertainty.
- (b) Evidential uncertainty.
- (c) Ascertainability.
- (d) Administrative workability.

The point made in that article is that differing forms of uncertainty will or will not affect the validity of a trust in differing circumstances. The acid test is that ‘there must be sufficient certainty for the trustees to execute the trust according to the settlor’s intentions’. Adopting this division, each of these sub-divisions of uncertainty is considered in turn.

Conceptual uncertainty and the interpretation of objects clauses

The issue of conceptual uncertainty is the most fundamental in the validity of a trust or a power. The situation that is caught by this form of uncertainty is where the meanings of the words used in the trust are unclear.⁴⁰⁷ Nevertheless, judges will not try to make trusts invalid, but rather they should ‘judge the degree of certainty with some measure of common sense and knowledge and without excessive astuteness to discover ambiguities’:⁴⁰⁸ so if the matter is sufficiently certain for the purpose, then that should be enough. This was the approach which underpinned the *Re Allen*⁴⁰⁹ approach, an approach which sought to validate objects 404 Re Manisty [1974] Ch 17.

405 Re Hay's ST [1982] 1 WLR 202.

406 (1982) 98 LQR 551 (Emery). For a fuller discussion of these concepts see now Thomas, 1998, 91 et seq.

407 Re Sayer [1957] Ch 423, 432, per Upjohn LJ; Re Hain's Settlement [1961] 1 All ER 848, 853, per Upjohn LJ.

408 Blaithway v Baron Cawley [1976] AC 397, 425, per Lord Wilberforce. See also Hillas & Co v Arcos Ltd (1932) 147 LT 503, 514, per Lord Wright in broadly similar vein.

409 [1953] Ch 810.

clauses which were sufficiently comprehensible in their context. However, in the light of the strictness of the *Re Gulbenkian*⁴¹⁰ ‘any given postulant’ test, it is not clear that this approach is in the ascendant. Obviously, if the terms used are unintelligible to the trustees and the court, the trust cannot be carried out. It is conceivable that the uncertainty would arise because the settlor uses technical terms which the trustees cannot decipher – in such a situation, recourse might be had to the means for resolving uncertainty considered above. Alternatively, it might be that the words are familiar but so vague as to be incapable of effect. An example of this category would be ‘friends of the settlor’,⁴¹¹ ‘good customers’,⁴¹² ‘pure-blooded Englishmen’,⁴¹³ or ‘useful employees’. In short, if it is found to be impossible to be certain of the concept, the trust fails.⁴¹⁴

Evidential uncertainty

Aside from the problem of interpreting the concepts used in the trust, it is possible that it is simply impossible to prove as a question of fact whether or not a beneficiary falls within a class. Therefore, evidential uncertainty refers not to the meaning of the words involved, but rather to the question whether or not the claimant can prove that she falls within the class of beneficiaries. For example, a trust provision which entitled the holder of a season ticket to Sunderland Football Club in the season 2005/06 to a distribution from the trust fund on presentation of a ticket stub is conceptually certain. That is conceptually certain because we know what is meant by having been a season ticket holder in an identified season. However, for those season ticket holders who have lost their ticket stubs, it would be impossible to prove that they are genuinely beneficiaries. Therefore, their own claims would fail for evidential uncertainty because they would be incapable of proving that they fall within the class of beneficiaries, but the trust itself could be valid because the definition of the class of beneficiaries is sufficiently clear.

Where it is impossible to prove whether or not potential beneficiaries succeed in falling within the category, this will not invalidate a trust or a power of appointment (in most circumstances).⁴¹⁵ This appears to be consistent with good sense. There is no reason to invalidate the trust simply because someone who falls within a perfectly comprehensible trust provision is not able to produce the proof necessary to demonstrate to the trustees that she is indeed within the class of beneficiaries. Given the underlying policy motivation to validate trusts wherever possible, that there are problems of evidence rather than concept, it would appear inappropriate to avoid the trust.

There may be factual situations, however, in which it would seem more appropriate to avoid the trust. Suppose, for example, that there is a bequest of season tickets at Sunderland Football Club to a person who sat in seat A40 because he saved the testator from falling 30 feet to the ground below on an identified afternoon. If it was impossible to prove

410 [1968] Ch 126.

411 Re Coates [1955] Ch 495; Re Gulbenkian [1968] Ch 126.

412 Sparfax v Dommatt (1972) The Times, 14 July.

413 Re Allen [1953] Ch 810, 819, per Lord Evershed MR.

414 Re Baden (No 2) [1973] Ch 9.

415 Ibid.

who occupied that seat because his ticket was lost, that would make it impossible to carry out that trust obligation, but the trust could still be valid in theory because the settlor's intention is sufficiently clear. However, if it was impossible to prove who was in that seat, the trust may nevertheless fail because it is unworkable, and that property would lapse into residue as a consequence. The issue is therefore whether that trust should be held to be void on grounds of impossibility of proving entitlement, or valid because of its conceptual certainty. In the absence of a provision for transfer of the fund to a remainder beneficiary, it might be said that the trust fails and that the testator was intestate as to that property (so that the property would pass to the testator's next of kin under the Intestacy Rules).

As Jenkins LJ has held:⁴¹⁶

I must keep in mind the distinction between uncertainty as to the events prescribed by the testator as those in which the condition [governing any given object's right to take a benefit] is to operate (which is generally speaking fatal to the validity of such a condition) and difficulty in ascertaining whether those events . . . have happened or not, which is not necessarily fatal to such validity.

Thus, evidential uncertainty need not invalidate a trust nor a power, unless the circumstances make such invalidity reasonable.

Ascertainability

Linked to the last example of evidential uncertainty is the situation in which it is possible to understand the concept underlying the trust but it is impossible to find the beneficiaries. It might be impossible to find beneficiaries because they have died, or have remarried and changed names, or have moved abroad. This will not necessarily render the trust invalid.⁴¹⁷ It has been held by Wynn-Parry J that:

mere difficulty of ascertainment is not of itself fatal to the validity of the gift. As has been pointed out, it is a matter of degree, and it is only when one reaches, on the evidence, a conclusion that is so vague, or that the difficulty is so great that it must be treated as virtually incapable of resolution, that one is entitled, to my mind, to say that a gift of that nature is void for uncertainty.

So, ascertainability will not in itself cause a trust or power to be avoided, unless the greater part of the trustee's obligations are so difficult to perform that the trust could be considered to be incapable of being validated.

Suppose, for example, that there is a bequest of season tickets at Sunderland Football Club to those people who sat in seats A40 and A41 on a particular afternoon. Suppose further that it was possible to read the records to see who occupied those seats, but impossible to locate them because they had moved to Australia without leaving a forwarding address. That would 416 Re Coxen [1948] Ch 747, 760.

417 Re Benjamin [1902] 1 Ch 723; Re Saxone Shoe Co Ltd's Trust Deed [1962] 2 All ER 904; McPhail v Doulton [1970] 2 WLR 1110. Cf Re Hooper's 1949 Settlement (1955) 34 ATC 3; Re Eden [1957] 2 All ER 430.

make it impossible to carry out that trust obligation. The issue is therefore whether it should be held to be void on grounds of impossibility of ascertaining the whereabouts of the beneficiaries, or valid because of its conceptual certainty. In the absence of a provision for transfer of the fund to a remainder beneficiary, it might be said that the trust fails and that the testator was intestate as to that property (so that the property would pass to the testator's next of kin under the Intestacy Rules). If neither of the occupants of those seats could be found, then none of the trust obligations could be performed. However, if the class of beneficiaries was to be 200 people who sat in that part of the stadium and it is only those last two people who cannot be found, then the trust could be validated in favour of the 198 people who can be found.⁴¹⁸

Typically, the trustee's obligation will be discharged by placing advertisements in newspapers in which the beneficiary is thought likely to find them. Clearly, the size and nature of the bequest will tend to govern the lengths to which the trustees are required to go to locate the beneficiary. If it can be demonstrated that the trustees have taken sufficiently strenuous steps to find the lost member of the class of objects, then the court will order that the property be divided among the ascertained objects.⁴¹⁹

Administrative unworkability

As a final extension of the preceding categories, it might be that the nature of the trust is such that it is impracticable for the trustees to carry out the settlor's wishes. If a trust were administratively unworkable, then that trust would be invalid. Lord Eldon held the following, in establishing the importance of the workability of the trust:

As it is a maxim that the execution of a trust shall be under the control of the court it must be of such a nature that it can be under that control: so that the administration of it can be reviewed by the court, or the court itself can execute the trust: a trust, therefore, which in case of maladministration could be reformed and a due administration directed.⁴²⁰

Consequently, part of the requirement that the objects of the trust be certain is a requirement that the trust be drafted so that it is possible to administer the trust in such a way that the court can judge whether or not that administration has been carried out properly.

Suppose, for example, that a fund of £10,000 is settled on trust to be distributed between 'all registered supporters of Sunderland Football Club who are naturally red-haired and more than six feet tall'. The concept is certain and it will be possible for any postulant to prove that he falls within the category. However, if the trustees are two ordinary individuals, it would be a large task for them to administer a settlement among such a potentially large group of people. If, for example, the trust referred to 'all people living in England and Wales who are naturally red-haired and more than six feet tall', that would clearly be a problem for two ordinary citizens to administer. Indeed, it would appear to be so great a task as to be administratively unworkable, such that it ought to be declared invalid.⁴²¹ Therefore, the scope of the trust may make the difference.

418 Re Benjamin [1902] 1 Ch 723.

419 Ibid.

420 Morice v Bishop of Durham (1805) 10 Ves 522, 539.

The nature of the trustees may make the difference. Suppose the following trust provision: ‘... £10,000 to be held upon trust for all retired coal miners who worked for British Coal in County Durham, still alive at 1 November 2010.’ Clearly, the concept is certain enough. However, for ordinary members of the public acting as trustees, it would be difficult to administer this trust. Alternatively, if the trustees were also the trustees of the pension fund for miners in County Durham, it would be a far more straightforward task to access records held for retired miners and to distribute the funds accordingly. Therefore, it may be that it is the capacity and identity of the trustees from case to case which influences the workability of the trust power.

Therefore, where the requirements of the trust make it impossible for the trustees to perform their fiduciary obligations, this will invalidate the trust.⁴²² It should be noted that this principle applies to trust powers rather than to mere powers of appointment. Thus, in R v District Auditors ex p West Yorkshire CC,⁴²³ a trust which would have had the effect of including within its class of beneficiaries 2.5 million people in West Yorkshire was held to be administratively unworkable. The terms of the trust would have included seeking to relieve unemployment in that region, assisting bodies that worked with problems experienced by young people in that region and the encouragement of better race relations. It was held that these objectives, coupled with such a broad geographic region and large body of beneficiaries, would be administratively unworkable and that the power was consequently void.

3.5.11 Conclusion

In conclusion, the following structure is the preferred means of dealing with problem questions in this area:

- (a) identify the type of trust or power;
- (b) identify which test applies to that type of trust or power;
- (c) apply the means of eluding the strict test;
- (d) are there any exceptions to that test for that type of trust or power?

The result of a trust failing is that the property is held on resulting trust for the settlor.

Therefore, this structure suggests that the student apply the leading case to the appropriate form of power, before using one of the alternative analyses advanced in either *Re Baden (No 2)*⁴²⁴ or Re Barlow.⁴²⁵ At that second stage, the student might also consider Emery’s division between the various forms of uncertainty and their respective effects on the validity of the trust. That structure might look something like the following diagram.

421 McPhail v Doulton [1970] 2 WLR 1110; see para 3.5.4 above.

422 Ibid, per Lord Wilberforce.

423 (1985) 26 RVR 24.

424 [1973] Ch 9.

425 [1979] 1 WLR 278.

	Fixed trust	Discretionary trust	Mere power	Personal power
STAGE ONE: Identify the form of power
STAGE TWO: Identify the test appropriate to that power	IRC v Broadway Cottages – preparation of a complete list of beneficiaries	McPhail v Douulton – the ‘is or is not’ test	Re Gulbenkian – the ‘is or is not’ test	Re Hay’s ST – ‘nothing in the width of the power will invalidate the trust’
STAGE THREE: Apply the means of eluding the strict test	None possible	Baden (No 2) – (1) reverse the onus of proof, or (2) a substantial number of certain beneficiaries is satisfactory	Re Barlow – construe the trust as a series of individual gifts	Not necessary – power cannot be invalid in any event
STAGE FOUR: Use an ‘expert’ to resolve uncertainty	Re Tuck’s ST – unless irreconcilable conceptual uncertainty or administrative unworkability	Re Tuck’s ST – unless irreconcilable conceptual uncertainty or administrative unworkability	Re Tuck’s ST – unless irreconcilable conceptual uncertainty or administrative unworkability	Not necessary – power cannot be invalid in any event

Partial or total failure of the trust

It is said that where part of the gift fails, the whole gift must fail, to give effect to the settlor’s intention.⁴²⁶ However, there remains the problem of a complex trust in which only one out of a number of items of settled property is affected by the uncertainty. The issue would be that the failure of one disposition would lead to the invalidity of the entire settlement. As a point of trust drafting, it is important to include a *Cotman v Brougham*⁴²⁷ type of clause to ensure that the failure of one part does not affect the validity of the rest. It appears that where there is a remainder provision, there is no objection to allowing a single part of the settlement to lapse into residue, so that the remainder of the trust can remain valid.

In the case of Re Leek,⁴²⁸ it was accepted in principle that a trust made up of many different powers could continue to be valid if the one offending (or void) power contained in that trust were simply removed. In effect, that single power would be struck out and the trust given effect without it. The question whether or not it is possible for one power within a complex trust to be declared invalid and for the rest to remain valid will depend upon the precise context of the trust. Suppose a testator intended to benefit two classes of beneficiary: the first class being his only child and the second class being his 'close friends'. Suppose that the will also provided for his only child to be his residuary beneficiary. In such a situation, there would be no principled objection to the bequest in favour of his 'close friends' being held void for uncertainty, but for the remainder of the trust to be upheld as being valid.⁴²⁹

426 Re Gulbenkian [1968] Ch 126.

427 [1918] AC 514.

428 [1969] 1 Ch 563.

However, suppose there is a different testator who intended to benefit his 'valued employees and his personal secretary' with 'equal gifts of no more than £10,000' each out of a total fund of £100,000 (that is, 'equal gifts' requires a fixed trust so that the trustees can know between how many people the fund is to be divided to achieve equal shares). The expression 'valued employees' would not be sufficiently certain under the complete list test.⁴³⁰ But suppose the testator had had only one personal secretary during his entire career. It would be contrary to the intention of the trust to grant the whole £100,000 to the personal secretary, and therefore it would not be permissible to allow the trust to be valid in relation to the personal secretary's interest alone. Therefore, it is likely that the court would hold the entire trust power to be invalid. Although it might be that a particularly soft-hearted court would attempt to permit the personal secretary to be the beneficiary of a bare trust over £10,000 out of the fund of £100,000, once again this would raise the issue of certainty of subject matter.

429 Cf Hancock v Watson [1902] AC 14, at para 3.4.4 above.

430 IRC v Broadway Cottages [1955] Ch 20.

The rights of beneficiaries and the beneficiary principle

4.1 THE NATURE OF THE RIGHTS OF BENEFICIARIES IN THE TRUST FUND	181
4.1.1 The nature of the rights of beneficiaries as both proprietary rights and rights against the trustees in personam	181
4.1.2 The principle in Saunders v Vautier	182
4.1.3 The effect of beneficiaries having proprietary rights in the trust fund	185
4.1.4 Issues as to the nature of the rights of the objects of specific types of trust	186
4.1.5 Protective trusts	192
4.1.6 Insolvency, trusts law and the rights of beneficiaries	194
4.2 THE BENEFICIARY PRINCIPLE	197
4.2.1 The nature of the beneficiary principle	197
4.2.2 The strict approach to the beneficiary principle	200
4.2.3 The distinction between ‘people’ and ‘purpose’ trusts	202
4.2.4 Where a transfer may be interpreted as constituting a gift rather than a trust	210
4.2.5 Purpose trust or mere motive?	212
4.2.6 Anomalous purpose trusts which have been held to be valid	213
4.2.7 Perpetuities and accumulations	214
4.2.8 Arguments suggesting that the beneficiary principle should be forgotten	218
4.2.9 Summary of the case law approaches to the beneficiary principle	219
4.2.10 The application of the beneficiary principle to gifts made to unincorporated associations	220
4.3 UNINCORPORATED ASSOCIATIONS	220
4.3.1 Introduction	220
4.3.2 What is an ‘unincorporated association’?	220
4.3.3 Possible constructions of transfers to unincorporated associations	222
4.3.4 Distributions on the winding up of an unincorporated association	234

OVERVIEW

A beneficiary under an ordinary express trust acquires equitable proprietary rights in the trust property as well as rights to demand an account from the trustee and to hold the trustee liable for any breach of trust. The principle in Saunders v Vautier provides that if all of the beneficiaries are acting together and are sui juris then they may direct the trustees how to deal with the trust property. By contrast, the objects of mere powers have no proprietary interests at all until property is appointed to them. The nature of the rights of the objects of discretionary trusts are more complex because those objects may have no vested rights in any property until it has been appointed to them, except in relation to 'closed discretionary trusts'.

It is a further requirement of the law of trusts that there must be some person with the rights of a beneficiary or else there will not be a valid trust: this is referred to as the 'beneficiary principle'. The 'beneficiary principle' requires that there be some person (individual or corporate entity) in whose favour the court is able to exercise the trust.¹ By contrast, a trust which is created to achieve some abstract purpose without any person entitled to take an equitable interest in the trust property as beneficiary will be invalid.² Therefore, it is necessary to distinguish between trusts for the benefit of people and trusts for the achievement of abstract purposes, where the former is valid and the latter invalid.³ The exception to this rule is the charitable trust, discussed in Chapter 25. One particularly important example of this principle in action relates to transfers of property to unincorporated associations. A transfer of property to an unincorporated association must be structured correctly so that it does not constitute an invalid purpose trust.⁴ There are a number of different ways of structuring such a transfer to make it valid: whether as a trust for the benefit of identified people, or as an accretion to the association's funds subject to contract, or as a transfer to the club's officers subject to a mandate to use that property in accordance with the association's purposes subject to contract, or as a gift to the members of the association. The transferor must avoid transferring the property to the officers of the association on trust to use for the abstract purposes of the association. The structure of any transfer of property to an unincorporated association must therefore be organised carefully to ensure that it is valid. On the termination of such an association, the individual members may acquire individual rights in the property held for the association.

With reference to trusts for the benefit of identifiable people, the trust must be subject to a maximum perpetuity or the trust will be invalid (rule against remoteness). Similarly, the beneficiaries must be able to acquire their interests within the perpetuity period (rule against inalienability). Under the case law before 1964, a large number of trusts were invalidated for falling foul of this rule. However, the Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 1964 created a mechanism by which trusts for the benefit of people without a provision to prevent them from lasting in perpetuity can nevertheless be deemed to be valid for a statutory perpetuity period. This rule has been adopted by the Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 2009.⁵

1 See Lord Grant MR in Morice v Bishop of Durham (1805) 9 Ves 399, 405 as expressed in this context in Bowman v Secular Society Ltd [1917] AC 406, 441 by Lord Parker.

2 Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW [1959] AC 457; Re Grant's WT [1979] 3 All ER 359.

3 Re Denley [1969] 1 Ch 373; Re Lipinski's Will Trusts [1976] Ch 235.

4 Re Recher's WT [1972] Ch 526.

5 Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 1964, s 3.

4.1 THE NATURE OF THE RIGHTS OF BENEFICIARIES IN THE TRUST FUND

4.1.1 The nature of the rights of beneficiaries as both proprietary rights and rights against the trustees in personam

It is a necessary part of any trust that there is a beneficiary capable of enforcing the trustees' performance of their duties under the trust.⁶ This principle is known as the 'beneficiary principle' and forms the principal focus of this chapter from section 4.2 onwards. However, that proposition does not necessarily tell us very much about the nature of the rights of the beneficiary. Rather, it is the rule in Saunders v Vautier,⁷ considered in this section, which demonstrates that ultimately each beneficiary has an equitable proprietary right in the trust property. There has been much discussion over the centuries as to the nature of the beneficiaries' rights: some suggesting that they are simply rights in personam (that is, personal rights akin to a mere debt) against the trustees and others suggesting that they are also rights in rem (that is, rights in property) exercisable against the trust fund.⁸ It is suggested that the rights of the beneficiaries are to be understood as exhibiting two characteristics simultaneously: first, a proprietary right in the trust fund and, secondly, personal rights against the trustees in relation to the proper management of the trust's affairs.⁹ In both cases it is equity which recognises the beneficiaries' claims against the trust property and against the trustees personally, whereas the common law merely recognises the trustees as being the owners of the trust property in the sense that the trustees hold the legal title in any property held on trust.

In terms of trusts theory, the beneficiary has rights against the trustee personally in the event that the trustee breaches her trust in some way.¹⁰ In accordance with the most fundamental principles of equity, a court of equity will act in personam against the conscience of a defendant.¹¹ So, in the words of Lord Ellesmere in the Earl of Oxford's Case, 'the office of the Chancellor [acting through the courts of equity] is to correct men's consciences for . . . breach of trusts'.¹² As considered in Chapter 18, any trustee who commits a breach of trust will be subject to a personal obligation to replace any property lost to the trust or to pay over its equivalent value in cash.¹³ Thus, the purpose of the entire equitable jurisdiction is to consider the defendant trustee, to act in judgment over the conscionability of her actions and to hold any trustee to account to the beneficiaries of a trust. In that sense the courts act in personam, but that expression should not be understood as restricting the beneficiaries' rights to purely personal rights against the trust.¹⁴ Rather, since the 15th century, courts of equity have enforced the rights of a beneficiary under a trust not only against trustees but also against other people, provided that they had notice of the existence of the trust.¹⁵ Included within the classes of people who cannot resist the proprietary rights of the 6 Bowman v Secular Society Ltd [1917] AC 406, 441, per Lord Parker.

7 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

8 For a more detailed account of this aspect of a beneficiary's rights, see Thomas and Hudson, 2004, 173.

9 See para 8.4.8.

10 Target Holdings v Redfern [1996] 1 AC 421.

11 See the discussion at section 1.1 above.

12 The Earl of Oxford's Case (1615) 1 Ch Rep 1. See also Penn v Lord Baltimore (1750) 1 Ves Sen 444.

13 Target Holdings v Redfern [1996] 1 AC 421.

14 See para 2.3.4 above.

15 See, for example, Yearbook 5 Edw IV, Mich pl 16, considered by Thomas and Hudson, 2004, 173.

beneficiaries are heirs of a trustee and volunteers who receive the trust property without giving consideration for it. Only a person who is a bona fide purchaser for value of the trust property without notice of the trust (otherwise known as ‘Equity’s darling’) can take good title in the trust property:¹⁶ and even then the beneficiaries’ rights would consequently attach to the sale proceeds paid by the bona fide purchaser.¹⁷ The beneficiaries’ rights are therefore rights which attach to the trust property and protect the beneficiaries against the claims of third parties to that property. In consequence, the rights of the beneficiary should be understood both to be rights in the property comprising the trust fund as well as personal rights against the trustee. The following discussion considers the case of Saunders v Vautier,¹⁸ which is generally taken, in English law, to establish the proposition that the beneficiaries’ rights are rights in the trust property.

4.1.2 The principle in Saunders v Vautier

The principle itself

The rule in *Saunders v Vautier*¹⁹ has been considered on numerous occasions already in this book – a large amount of attention to lavish on an otherwise unobtrusive decision from the mid-19th century but for its importance in describing the nature of a beneficiary’s equitable interest. The principle which that case establishes is that all of the beneficiaries, constituting 100% of the equitable interest in a trust fund, provided that they are all sui juris and acting together, can direct the trustees how to deal with that trust fund. As Megarry J stated this proposition²⁰ in relation to the ability of beneficiaries using the rule in Saunders v Vautier to re-arrange the terms of a trust:

If under a trust every possible beneficiary was under no disability and concurred in the re-arrangement or termination of the trusts, then under the doctrine in Saunders v Vautier those beneficiaries could dispose of the trust property as they thought fit; for in equity the property was theirs. Yet if any beneficiary was an infant, or an unborn or unascertained person, it was held that the court had no general inherent or other jurisdiction to concur in any such arrangement on behalf of that beneficiary.

As the principle is described by Prof Thomas:²¹ ‘an adult beneficiary (or a number of adult beneficiaries acting together) who has (or between them have) an absolute, vested and indefeasible interest in the capital and income of property may at any time require the transfer of the property to him (or them) and may terminate any accumulation.’

A simple example of the operation of the doctrine in Saunders v Vautier would be a bare trust (under which a trustee holds on trust for one absolutely-entitled beneficiary) under which that beneficiary could direct the trustees either to transfer the legal title to the 16 See ibid; and Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

17 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

18 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

19 Ibid.

20 In Re Holt’s Settlement [1969] 1 Ch 100, 111.

21 GW Thomas, Powers, 1998, 176. Applied in CPT Custodian Pty Ltd v Commissioner of State Revenue [2005] HCA 53, para [47].

beneficiary so as to make her the absolute owner of the property, or direct the trustees how to deal with the trust property, provided that the beneficiary was of sound mind and aged 18 or over. This rule extends to circumstances in which there is more than one beneficiary. In such a situation, all of those beneficiaries would be required to act together and all of them would be required to be sui juris. This would enable the whole of the beneficiaries under even a complex trust to call for delivery of absolute title in the trust fund from the trustees. Thus, the beneficiaries are able to override the settlor's expressed wishes as to the treatment of the trust property.

The significance of this principle is that it establishes that the beneficiary has a right in the trust fund itself and not merely personal claims against the trustees or against the settlor. Once the trust is declared and once the trust property has been vested in the trustees, it is the beneficiaries who have the whip-hand in relation to the treatment of the trust fund.

Applications of the principle

The case of *Saunders v Vautier*²² itself concerned a testator who bequeathed £2,000 worth of East India stock on trust for Vautier. The trust provided that the capital of the fund should be held intact until Vautier reached the age of 25 and that the dividends from the stock should be accumulated with the capital. Vautier reached the age of maturity (at that time, 21 years of age) and sought delivery of the capital and dividends to him immediately rather than having to wait until he reached the age of 25. Lord Langdale MR held as follows:

I think that principle has been repeatedly acted upon: that where a legacy is directed to accumulate for a certain period, or where the payment is postponed, the legatee, if he has an absolute indefeasible interest in the legacy, is not bound to wait until the expiration of that period, but may require payment the moment he is competent to give a valid discharge.

In short, even though the trust specifically provided that the beneficiary was not to be entitled to take the property until he reached the age of 25, it was held that the rights of the beneficiary take priority over the directions of the settlor. This right of the beneficiary was held to be capable of enforcement even though, in the submission of the residuary legatees, Vautier's interest was contingent on reaching 25 and therefore ought not to have been satisfied.

The rule in Saunders v Vautier has its roots in the principles relating to wills applied in the ecclesiastical courts, traceable through cases such as *Green v Spicer*²³ and Younghusband v Gisborne.²⁴ What is clear is that Saunders v Vautier was concerned with the rights of one beneficiary under a will. What is similarly clear is that subsequent cases have interpreted that decision so as to found the broader proposition that groups of beneficiaries, potentially even under discretionary trusts,²⁵ are entitled to call for the property or to require that the trustees

22 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

23 (1830) 1 Russ & M 395.

24 (1844) 1 Col 400.

25 Green v Spicer (1830) 1 Russ & M 395. The complexities associated with the nature of a beneficiary's rights under a discretionary trust are considered later in this chapter.

deal with the property in a manner which may appear tantamount to a variation of the existing trust.²⁶

So, in Re Bowes,²⁷ a trust fund was created over £5,000 for the express purpose of planting trees on a large estate. Beneficiaries entitled under other provisions of that same trust were permitted to call for the fund reserved for the maintenance of trees so that they could alleviate the financial problems which they were experiencing at that time immediately. This approach was also applied by the Court of Appeal in Re Nelson,²⁸ where it was held that ‘the principle [in Saunders v Vautier] is that where there is what amounts to an absolute gift it cannot be fettered by prescribing a mode of enjoyment’. In other words, where all of the equitable interest is settled for the benefit of a group of beneficiaries absolutely, that is tantamount to transferring title outright to them by means of an assignment. Similarly, in *Baker v Archer-Shee*²⁹ Lady Archer-Shee was the only life tenant, having an interest in possession, under her father’s residuary estate with no other potential beneficiary in existence. Consequently it was held that Lady Archer-Shee would have been entitled under the principle in Saunders v Vautier to have directed the trustees how to deal with the trust property. Equally, Lady Archer-Shee was taxable on the income from the trust as though she was its absolute owner because this income was effectively held on bare trust for her.³⁰

Similarly, in Re Smith,³¹ a fund was held by the Public Trustee on discretionary trusts with a power to pay all or part of the capital and income to Mrs Aspinall and in the event of her death for Mrs Aspinall’s three children in equal shares. Mrs Aspinall, her two surviving children (then of the age of majority) and the personal representatives of her deceased child mortgaged their interests with an insurance company. This had the effect of enabling the beneficiaries to borrow money against their equitable interests. The issue was whether the beneficiaries (effectively in the person of the insurance company) were entitled to call for the property. In the view of Romer J, where the trustees have a discretion as to the amount of the fund to be passed to one beneficiary and are also obliged to pass any remainder outstanding after exercising that discretion to other beneficiaries, where all of those beneficiaries present themselves to the trustees demanding a transfer of the trust fund, the trustees are required to make that transfer. The important point in this case was that those two classes of beneficiaries would constitute the whole of the equitable interest. In consequence, the trustees would be required to treat those beneficiaries ‘as though they formed one person’ absolutely entitled to the trust. That circumstance would be different from, for example, a beneficiary in the position of Mrs Aspinall approaching the trustees on her own and demanding for herself the whole of the trust fund, and would also be different from the situation in which the trustees had the express power to withhold some part of the trust fund from either class of beneficiaries in any event. In neither of these cases would the *Saunders v Vautier*³² principle help the applicant, because she did not have the entire equitable interest in the former case and because the trustees had the power to defeat her interest in the latter.

26 These distinctions are considered below at para 4.1.5 below.

27 [1896] 1 Ch 507.

28 [1928] Ch 920.

29 [1927] AC 844.

30 See also Archer-Shee v Garland [1931] AC 212.

31 [1928] Ch 915.

32 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

Beyond the rule that beneficiaries representing the totality of the equitable interest can ask for delivery of the property, the decision in *Stephenson v Barclays Bank*³³ permitted a beneficiary to take delivery of her divisible share in the whole of the trust fund without needing to act together with the other beneficiaries: this approach would require that the property be capable of such division and that the beneficiary's precise entitlement is calculable. There are potential difficulties with this approach. Suppose a fund of money amounting to £100,000 in which five beneficiaries were expressed as having entitlement 'in equal shares'. Following Stephenson, one beneficiary would be entitled to call for £20,000 from the trustees. However, suppose that the rate of interest which the trustees could acquire for the fund fell as a result of the total capital falling below £100,000: would the loss of interest to the other beneficiaries be a ground for refusing that beneficiary's demand for delivery of her share? In Lloyds Bank v Duker,³⁴ a beneficiary was prevented from removing his part of the trust property because the removal of his portion from the total fund would have robbed the other beneficiaries of a majority shareholding in a private company. Therefore, it was held that the countervailing obligation to act fairly between the beneficiaries overrode the individual claimant's desire to realise his proprietary rights.³⁵

4.1.3 The effect of beneficiaries having proprietary rights in the trust fund

Having examined the rule in Saunders v Vautier,³⁶ it is important to consider the more general theoretical importance of this principle. As considered above, Page Wood VC in Gosling v Gosling,³⁷ and subsequently the Court of Appeal in Re Nelson,³⁸ located the underlying rationale of the rule in the recognition that ultimate title in the trust fund is with the totality of the beneficiaries under the trust. That a trust is understood as vesting ultimate title with the beneficiaries is taken, then, by some of their Lordships as rendering trusts akin to gifts. A gift, of course, is an outright transfer of absolute title by donor to donee, whereas a trust transfers merely equitable title to the beneficiaries such that the settlor has necessarily stopped short of transferring absolute title immediately to them. This attitude does somewhat concertina together the different concepts of gift and trust: that is, to base the principle on an assumed intention on the part of a testator to make an absolute gift to beneficiaries ignores the fact that the testator chose to effect his intention as a trust rather than as a straightforward gift. Under the rule in Milroy v Lord,³⁹ equity will not give effect to gifts by means of trusts and vice versa – in short, one mode of transfer cannot be effected by another.⁴⁰ So, if the testator intended a gift, then a gift should be made, whereas if a testator created an express trust bounded in by express provisions making the legatees' rights subject to some contingency, that should not be subjected to the rule in *Saunders v Vautier*⁴¹ because of some supposed analogy to a gift.

33 [1975] 1 All ER 625.

34 [1987] 3 All ER 193.

35 See para 8.3.9 below; Tito v Waddell (No 2) [1977] Ch 106.

36 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

37 (1859) John 265.

38 [1928] Ch 920.

39 (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

40 See para 5.4.2 below.

41 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

The point made in those decisions is slightly more subtle than to say ‘this trust should be described as a gift’. Rather, the point, as considered above, is that a transfer on bare trust is tantamount to vesting the entire interest in the beneficiary. By analogy, it is said, transferring property on trust means that all of those beneficiaries acting together constitute the entirety of the beneficial entitlement to the trust fund, and in consequence that the creation of such a trust is tantamount to making an outright transfer of the proprietary rights in the fund to those persons. On the one hand, this may be recognition of the practice (in cases like Re Smith)⁴² of beneficiaries in selling or borrowing against their equitable interests.⁴³ On the other hand, this may correlate with the policy outlined above, that mid-19th century opinion considered it important that capital should circulate freely and therefore it was expedient that the beneficiaries should have control over the trust property to prevent it stagnating in the hands of the trustees.

Transferring power over the use of the trust fund to the beneficiaries reduced the influence of the settlor over the same property. As Harris put the matter, ‘fidelity to the settlor’s intentions ends where equitable property begins’.⁴⁴ To be more positive about the same issue, the beneficiaries acquire rights in the property making up the trust fund. They are ultimately, beneficially its owners. For the settlor intent on preventing the beneficiaries from unpacking her carefully crafted trust, it is important to structure affairs so that it is impossible for the beneficiaries to act together, or so that the trustees have rights to retain part of the trust fund such that the beneficiaries do not have all of the rights to it.

That the rule in Saunders v Vautier is a development peculiar to the English law of trusts is demonstrated by the American cases of *Brandon v Robinson*⁴⁵ and Claffin v Claffin,⁴⁶ which preferred to observe the wishes of the settlor rather than advance the rights of the beneficiaries.⁴⁷ It is a feature of English law that the beneficiaries are treated as the ultimate owners of the trust fund,⁴⁸ and not that the intentions of the settlor be closely observed and followed.

4.1.4 Issues as to the nature of the rights of the objects of specific types of trust

Introduction

So far in this chapter we have considered the general position under the principle in Saunders v Vautier. This is the proper description of the rights of beneficiaries in ordinary trusts. However, there are a number of specific types of trust in which it is not clear whether or not the principle in Saunders v Vautier provides a complete description of the rights of beneficiaries. The principal problem arises in relation to discretionary trusts – as discussed in Chapter 3 – in which it could be said that no objects of the trust can have any property rights whatsoever until the trustees have appointed some property to them. Much will depend

42 [1928] Ch 920.

43 Moffat, 1999, 251.

44 Harris, 1975:1, 2.

45 (1811) 18 Ves 429.

46 20 NE 454 (1889).

47 On which point see Moffat, 1999, 252.

48 Curtis v Lukin (1842) 5 Beav 147.

upon the precise terms of the discretionary trust. Similar issues arise in relation to the objects of fiduciary mere powers and unit trusts. This section, therefore, considers issues which go beyond the ordinary law of trusts and which stretch outside the usual discussion of the beneficiary principle. The new undergraduate reader may choose to pass over this material for the time being.

The nature of the rights of the objects of a discretionary trust

In relation to discretionary trusts, there is a question as to the nature of the rights which the objects of such a trust have. (It should be recalled that in relation to discretionary trust powers, we usually speak of ‘objects’ as opposed to ‘beneficiaries’.) The central question is whether or not the objects of a discretionary trust could be said to have any proprietary rights in that trust property before the trustees exercise their discretion to allocate property to any one of them.⁴⁹ A discretionary trust requires that the trustees exercise a discretion in favour of a specified class of objects. The difficulties associated with identifying those objects were considered in section 3.4 above. The conceptual problem is as to the rights of the objects before the trustees exercise their discretion. Once the trustees’ discretion has been exercised, then clearly the objects to whom identified property has been advanced will have absolute rights in the property which has been transferred to them,⁵⁰ whereas objects to whom no property has been advanced will have no rights in any property (assuming that the trustees have not breached any of their duties). Before the discretion is exercised, it could be argued that none of the objects has any rights in any identified property.⁵¹ The effect of this argument would be that objects of discretionary trusts have no proprietary rights. However, it could be said that collectively they must constitute all of the people who could possibly acquire rights in the property at any time in the future. In consequence, it could be argued that all of the objects of the discretionary trust power – provided that they constitute all of the possible objects of that power and provided that they are all acting in concert – should be able to exercise the rights which the absolutely entitled beneficiaries would be entitled to under the principle of Saunders v Vautier under a fixed trust. The effect of this argument would be that all of the objects of a discretionary trust would have Saunders v Vautier rights and therefore that each object should be treated as having some sort of proprietary right in the trust property. Alternatively, a third argument might consider that the objects of the discretionary trust have a power to ensure that the trustees exercise their discretion properly. These arguments are considered in this section.

49 The general nature of beneficiaries’ rights was explained in the following way: ‘The beneficiaries’ interests in a trust fund are proprietary interests in the assets from time to time comprised in the fund subject to the trustees’ overriding powers of managing and alienating the trust assets and substituting others. On an authorised sale of a trust investment, the beneficiaries’ proprietary interests in the investment are overreached; that is to say, they are automatically transferred from the investment which is sold to the proceeds of sale and any new investment acquired with them. . . . The beneficiaries’ interest in the new investment are exactly the same as their interest in the old. They have a continuing beneficial interest which persists in the substitute.’ Millett, ‘Proprietary restitution’ in Degeling and Edelman, Equity in Commercial Law (Law Book Co, 2005), 15. Cited in Richstar Enterprises Pty Ltd v Carey (No 6) [2006] FCA 814, para [17].

50 Assuming there is no claim for the recovery of that property by the other objects on grounds of breach of trust.

51 Murphy v Murphy [1999] 1 WLR 282; Lemos v Coutts (Cayman) Ltd (2006–07) 9 ITEL 616. Cf Johns v Johns [2004] NZCA 42, [2005] WTLR 529.

The elegant solution to these questions, which has been proposed by Prof Thomas⁵² and accepted by the Federal Court of Australia in Richstar Enterprises Pty Ltd v Carey (No 6),⁵³ is that the proper analysis would depend upon whether the discretionary trust is open-ended or not. This is explained in Thomas on Powers in the following way:

Thus, although an individual object of an exhaustive discretionary trust (and a fortiori in the case of a non-exhaustive one) cannot claim any part of the trust fund or its income (as the case may be) because he is not entitled to any interest in it unless and until the trustees exercise their discretion in his favour, and notwithstanding that the class of beneficiaries is a closed class, all the objects of such a discretionary trust, where the class is closed, may join together and collectively call upon the trustees to transfer the fund to them or deal with the property subject to the discretion as if they were the absolute owners thereof . . . Although, as Lord Reid pointed out in Gartside v IRC, two or more persons cannot have a single right unless they hold it jointly or in common, and the beneficiaries of a discretionary trust do not have such a right – indeed, they are in competition with each other and what the trustees give to one is his alone – it remains the case that, under the principle laid down in Saunders v Vautier,⁵⁴ such beneficiaries, as the persons for whom or in whose favour alone the trust property may be applied, have a right to terminate the trust and deal with the property as if it were their own.⁵⁵

Therefore, an individual object has no property rights until property is appointed to her by the trustees. Rather, it can only be if the objects are acting together that they could possibly claim rights to property at all. The question is: in what circumstances could the collective rights of the beneficiaries grant them property rights in the discretionary trust property?

The answer is this: if the discretionary trust power obliges the trustees to exhaust all of the trust property by transferring it to the objects and provided that the complete class of objects can be defined, then the objects will be able to act together and rely on the principle in Saunders v Vautier to direct the manner in which the trustees are obliged to use the trust property.⁵⁶ Such a discretionary trust would be close-ended because the property would be required to be exhausted and it would be possible to know which people constitute the full membership of the class of objects. The objects of such a discretionary trust could have property rights in the trust property because that property must be divided between some of them and because it is possible to know who all the possible objects are so as to fall within Saunders v Vautier. This argument emerges from Re Smith:

When there is a trust under which trustees have a discretion as to applying the whole or part of a fund to or for the benefit of a particular person, that particular person cannot come to the trustees, and demand the fund; for the whole fund has not been given to him but only so much as the trustees think fit to let him have. But when the trustees have no discretion as to the amount of the fund to be applied, the fact that the trustees have a 52 See Thomas, 1998, 6–268, and Thomas and Hudson, 2004, 184 et seq.

53 [2006] FCA 814.

54 (1841) Cr & Ph 240.

55 GW Thomas, Powers, Sweet & Maxwell, 1998, para 6–268.

56 Re Smith [1928] Ch 915; Re Nelson (note) [1928] Ch 920.

discretion as to the method in which the whole of the fund shall be applied for the benefit of the particular person does not prevent that particular person from coming and saying: 'Hand over the fund to me'.⁵⁷

By extension, there are two circumstances in which this analysis would not apply. First, if the class of objects cannot be completely defined because there may be future, currently unknown members added to the class within the trust's perpetuity period. An example of this situation would be a provision in a trust instrument to the effect that the class of objects was defined as being 'any children of the settlor' at a time when the settlor was still alive and could therefore have further children in the future.⁵⁸ Secondly, if the trustees are not obliged to exhaust the whole of the trust property. This prevents there being property rights for the beneficiaries because, if the trustees were empowered to withhold some of the trust property and to appoint it to other objects, then it would not be possible for the objects of the discretionary trust power to assert that the whole of the equitable interest in that property was held for their benefit. This argument is conceived of by Parkinson and Wright in the following way:

Since the trustees of a discretionary trust have no duty to make a particular distribution, or indeed any distribution to a specific individual, the rights of the beneficiaries are limited to compelling the trustees to consider whether or not to make a distribution in their favour and to ensuring the property administration of the trust. This is true even if the discretionary trust only has one beneficiary.⁵⁹

This passage has been explained by the Federal Court of Australia in *Richstar Enterprises Pty Ltd*⁶⁰ as relating to non-exhaustive discretionary trusts and therefore as being in line with Thomas on Powers above, otherwise, it is suggested, it should be doubted.

Individual objects of a discretionary trust power will not have individual rights to any of the trust property because their rights are in competition with one another: that is, if object X receives trust property, then that is property which cannot be paid to object Y. Indeed, it has been suggested in one decided case, Gartside v IRC, that the distinct nature of each object's claims to the trust property means that no object can be recognised as having an interest in possession before any identified property has been appointed to her.⁶¹ In this case, the issue was whether or not the object had an 'interest in possession' for estate duty purposes.⁶² This analysis is particularly apposite if the trustees are not obliged to exhaust the whole of the trust property in favour of the objects of the power. If the class of potential objects remains open,⁶³ then even if there is only one object alive at the time, that person will not be able to exercise Saunders v Vautier rights because she could not prove that she would 57 Re Smith [1928] Ch 915, 918, per Romer J.

58 Re Trafford's Settlement [1985] Ch 34, 40, per Peter Gibson J.

59 Parkinson and Wright, 'Equity and Property' in Parkinson ed, The Principles of Equity, Law Book Co, 2003, 60, citing Re Weir's Settlement Trusts [1971] Ch 145.

60 [2006] FCA 814, para 26.

61 Gartside v IRC [1968] AC 553, 606, per Lord Reid, 617, per Lord Wilberforce.

62 See also Re Weir's Settlement Trusts [1971] Ch 145.

63 That is, if some future objects may yet join the class of objects.

constitute the entirety of the equitable interest in the trust property.⁶⁴ Nevertheless, in general terms, the logic of the Saunders v Vautier principle requires that all of the objects acting together will constitute the entirety of the potential equitable interest and that such a group may call for the trust property in circumstances in which the trustees are empowered to exhaust the whole of the fund and in which there cannot be any further members of the class of objects.⁶⁵

So, then we have to consider what rights the objects of the discretionary trust have to control the trustees. As Lord Wilberforce in *Gartside v IRC*⁶⁶ put it:

No doubt in a certain sense a beneficiary under a discretionary trust has an ‘interest’: the nature of it may, sufficiently for the purpose, be spelt out by saying that he has a right to be considered as a potential recipient of benefit by the trustees and a right to have his interest protected by a court of equity.

The key rights of all objects of all discretionary trusts, beyond the matters considered above, are therefore to have their claim to property under the trust considered by the trustees and to have that claim protected by the court against any abuse or breach of trust by the trustees in exercising their power.

The nature of the rights of the objects of a fiduciary mere power

The objects of a fiduciary mere power have only mere expectancies that they will have property appointed to them.⁶⁷ Consequently, they have no proprietary rights in any property before an appointment is made to them either individually or collectively.⁶⁸ This is a clear distinction from the discretionary trust power considered in the previous section. Under a discretionary trust power, the objects have some proprietary rights commensurate with being entitled under a trust, whereas objects under a mere power have no proprietary rights at all before the exercise of the appointment.⁶⁹ The rights of objects of a mere power are merely to have the power applied properly.⁷⁰

The nature of the rights of participants in a unit trust

The nature of the rights of participants in a unit trust, a type of trust used for investment purposes, take a slightly different form albeit that they are based fundamentally on ordinary trusts law principles. This illustrates how those fundamental principles can be adapted for specific purposes. A unit trust operates as follows. The core element of the unit trust is its deed of trust. The trust fund (as provided by the participants) will be held on trust by a trustee but all investment decisions will be made by a manager. The manager (or managers) will usually be a management company. The manager will be empowered by the trust deed to

64 Gartside v IRC [1968] AC 553.

65 As before, this requires that the discretionary trust power be an exhaustive power.

66 [1968] AC 553, 617.

67 Re Brooks' Settlement Trusts [1939] 1 Ch 993.

68 Re Gulbenkian [1968] Ch 126; Schmidt v Rosewood Trust Ltd [2003] 2 WLR 1442, 1455.

69 Ibid.

70 Ibid.

acquire securities of a type specified in the trust deed. This power will be subject to a general duty to maintain a portfolio of investments to spread the risk of the total investment capital of the fund. Those securities are then held on trust by the trustees appointed in the trust deed. The trustees will usually be a company but will in any event be distinct from the manager. The fiduciary function is therefore divided between the investment management responsibilities of the manager and the custodian responsibilities of the trustee. The profits of the pooled capital is then allocated equally between the units held. The investor (or, participant) will be entitled to a pro rata cash return for each unit held. The question is as to the nature of the rights of the participants in a unit trust.

The High Court of Australia in *CPT Custodian Pty Ltd v Commissioner of State Revenue*⁷¹ has considered the nature of the rights of investors in a unit trust which was created to invest in land. These investors under English law would be described as being beneficiaries under a trust; a similar approach is taken in Australia, only without the same statute in place.⁷² Each investor acquired a proportionate number of the total ‘units’ issued by the unit trust depending on the size of its investment. The question, for the purposes of Australian land tax, was whether or not the investors owned proprietary rights in the land held by the unit trust. It was held that a court of equity could exercise its inherent jurisdiction to supervise the management of a trust on behalf of the investors without that necessarily meaning that the investors had proprietary rights in the underlying property.⁷³ In Australia, in *Charles v Federal Commissioner of Taxation*⁷⁴ it had previously been held that ‘a unit under the trust deed before us confers a proprietary interest in all the property which for the time being is subject to the trust of the deed’, so that whether or not the investors owned any profits held by the trustees would depend on the manner in which the trustees held those moneys. On the facts of CPT Custodian Pty Ltd v Commissioner of State Revenue, because the trust property could also be applied by the trustees to meet their own expenses then it could not be the case that the investors were solely entitled to trust property between themselves. This is akin, it is suggested, to saying that the investors are in the position of objects of a discretionary trust in that they do not know to which property they may become entitled in the future until some contingency is satisfied first. Moreover, it is suggested that this argument is akin to saying that no beneficiary is ever entitled to proprietary rights in any trust fund where the trustees are entitled to deduct amounts for their expenses: that is an unfeasible argument because it would destroy the notion that beneficiaries have equitable proprietary rights in the trust fund.

For the purposes of English trusts law, s 237 of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 provides that the property held for the purposes of a unit trust is ‘held on trust for the participants’ in that trust and therefore the question of whether or not there is a trust for the investors is answered by the statute in that the investors are necessarily the owners in equity of the property held for the purposes of the unit trust.⁷⁵ The statute provides: “‘unit trust 71 [2005] HCA 53.

72 The nature of unit trusts is considered in Hudson, The Law on Investment Entities, 2000, Chapter 7; and in Thomas and Hudson, The Law of Trusts, 2004, Chapter 51, as was referred to by the High Court of Australia. As description of unit trusts taken from earlier editions of this book is also available on-line in the two web-sites supporting this book, as described in the Preface.

73 Relying on Schmidt v Rosewood [2003] 2 AC 709, 729, per Lord Walker.

74 (1954) 90 CLR 598, 609, per Dixon CJ, Kitto and Taylor JJ.

75 See GW Thomas and AS Hudson, The Law of Trusts, 2004, 1587 et seq.

scheme” means a collective investment scheme under which the property is held on trust for the participants.⁷⁶

It is suggested, therefore, in English law that the participants have proprietary rights against the unit trust property by virtue both of statute and of the rule in *Saunders v Vautier*⁷⁷ which permits the beneficiaries (provided that they are sui juris and absolutely entitled) to terminate the trust.⁷⁸ Therefore, the participant has (subject to any specific contractual, structural provision to the contrary) ultimately that kind of proprietary right,⁷⁹ when exercised in common with all the other participants, which is usually said to attach to a beneficiary under an ordinary English trust.⁸⁰

4.1.5 Protective trusts

*The purpose of protective trusts*⁸¹

In consequence of the principles considered so far in this chapter, it is very difficult to structure a so-called ‘protective trust’ under English law. A protective trust is a trust which prevents an absolutely-entitled, sui juris beneficiary from taking absolute title to the trust property so that the beneficiary can be treated as having no vested title in that property. A settlor may wish to use such a protective trust for one of three general purposes. First, to prevent a beneficiary who is incompetent in some way from taking absolute title in property because they are not considered reliable enough to vest absolute title in property in them: for example, a drug addict who is feared incapable of resisting the urge to spend the whole of a trust fund on feeding her addiction. Secondly, to prevent the settlor from appearing to have title in property which otherwise the settlor would be required to give up to her creditors in insolvency proceedings: here the trust might be used in an attempt to make it seem that the trust property were owned beneficially by some other person. Thirdly, to prevent the settlor from appearing to be absolutely entitled to trust property for tax or other regulatory purposes.

Methods of seeking to establish protective trusts

The reason for the difficulty in structuring such protective trusts in English law is that an absolutely-entitled beneficiary can direct the trustees how to deal with the property (such that she will be considered to be the equitable owner of that property)⁸² and consequently the courts will not permit a trust in favour of an absolutely-entitled beneficiary to deny proprietary rights in the trust property to that beneficiary.⁸³ In *Goulding v James*⁸⁴ the effect

76 See Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, Sweet & Maxwell, 2009, Chapter 52.

77 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

78 Re AEG Unit Trust Managers Ltd's Deed [1957] Ch 415. See Hudson, The Law on Investment Entities, 2000, Chapter 7; and in Thomas and Hudson, The Law of Trusts, 2004, Chapter 51.

79 Baker v Archer-Shee [1927] AC 844.

80 Costa and Duppe Properties Pty Ltd v Duppe [1986] VR 90; Softcorp Holdings Pty Ltd v Commissioner of Stamps (1987) 18 ATR 813.

81 See generally Thomas and Hudson, 2004, para 9–01 et seq.

82 Saunders v Vautier (1841) 4 Beav 115.

83 Hunt-Foulston v Furber (1876) 3 Ch D 285; Re Dugdale (1888) 38 Ch D 176; Re Brown [1954] Ch 39.

84 [1997] 2 All ER 239, 247, per Mummery LJ.

of the English law of trusts in relation to the principle in Saunders v Vautier was described in the following manner:

The principle recognises the rights of beneficiaries, who are sui juris and together absolutely entitled to the trust property, to exercise their proprietary rights to overbear and defeat the intention of a testator or settlor to subject property to the continuing trusts, powers and limitations of a will or trust instrument.

The effect of the principle is therefore that it is very difficult to prevent beneficiaries from undoing the settlor's intentions unless the trust is carefully structured. Similarly, trusts law will prevent a beneficiary with vested equitable rights from denying property rights associated with that interest. The only certain way to ensure that the beneficiary does not have sufficient property rights would be to create equitable interests in favour of other beneficiaries so that the protected beneficiary acting alone would not be able to assume control of the trust property nor be deemed to have such a right of necessity. For example, the settlor may appoint herself as one of the beneficiaries and so retain a veto against the other beneficiaries being able to claim that they constitute the entirety of the equitable interest.

Furthermore, the settlor could seek to structure matters so that the beneficiary's interests are made subject to some condition precedent. For example, the trust may be structured so that the beneficiary only acquires rights in the property if the trustees exercise some power of appointment in her favour, as opposed to some other objects of a class of objects of that power, with the intention that the protected object of that power will have no vested rights in any trust property. Tax law⁸⁵ and insolvency law⁸⁶ have a number of clawback provisions which may deem the trust to be a sham intended only to avoid liability to tax or to account to insolvency creditors. In the USA, with the exception of Nebraska, the rule in *Saunders v Vautier*⁸⁷ is not applied, and therefore it is possible to have what are known as 'spendthrift trusts' whereby the beneficiary is prevented from demanding delivery of the trust fund from the trustee. It is also possible to use these structures so as to provide protection from one's own bankruptcy under English law. For example, if Arthur thought that he was at risk of bankruptcy, he might try to create a trust over his property whereby he is expressed either as having no vested property rights in the trust fund or as losing them at the moment of his becoming bankrupt.⁸⁸ Having no vested rights in the property means that it will not pass to one's trustee in bankruptcy in the event of insolvency.⁸⁹

Also, building on the foregoing discussion of protection against insolvency, the settlor could seek to create a determinable interest which ended on the happening of a specified event. The structure of such a provision needs to be attended to carefully. If the trust sought to declare that Arthur's property rights would cease to be effective once he was declared bankrupt⁹⁰ or once 85 See generally the outline discussion of the tax treatment of discretionary trusts and tax avoidance structures in para 2.5.2 above.

86 Eg, Insolvency Act 1986, s 423.

87 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

88 Subject, that is, to what is said in Hudson, 2012 in relation to asset protection trusts and their limitation under insolvency legislation.

89 Re Scientific Investment Pension Plan Trusts [1999] Ch 53. Cf Welfare Reform and Pensions Act 1999, s 14(3).

90 Re Burroughs-Fowler [1916] 2 Ch 251.

it was transferred to a trustee in bankruptcy, then such provisions would be void.⁹¹ If Arthur's interest became terminable on the happening of some other event, then it could be valid. So, in Re Detmold,⁹² it was held unobjectionable to uphold a term in a marriage settlement which transferred the husband's entire interest to the wife in the event of his bankruptcy or the transfer of his share of the settlement property to a third person. In the modern context of bankruptcy, however, any device which seeks to put property beyond the reach of creditors in the expectation of bankruptcy will generally be unenforceable: such that structures used to put property beyond the reach of bankruptcy creditors would be capable of avoidance⁹³ and any protected interest under a trust would be liable to be forfeited in the event of bankruptcy.⁹⁴

Section 33 of the Trustee Act 1925

Alternatively, s 33 of the Trustee Act 1925 provides a form of words for any trust which is expressed to be a 'protective trust'. In such a situation, if the principal beneficiary in receipt of the income under a trust 'does or attempts to do or suffers an act or thing . . . whereby . . . he would be deprived of the right to receive the same', then the trust property so designated will be held for the 'maintenance or support' of the people nominated in the trust for that purpose. This prevents, for example, the profligate wasting of property by a life tenant under a trust such that remainder beneficiaries would be left without their property. Such a structure will prevent the trustee in bankruptcy from taking possession of property which is required by s 33 to be held for the benefit of those nominated remainder beneficiaries.

The rationale for this principle is that the principal beneficiary is not the absolute owner of the property; therefore, it would be inequitable to allow his creditors in bankruptcy to take absolute title to the property. What might be more difficult, however, is a situation in which the protective trust was created with the sole purpose of avoiding the principal beneficiary's creditors through the device of expressing that principal beneficiary's next of kin to be entitled to take an interest in remainder. For example, in the case of Midland Bank v Wyatt,⁹⁵ the court held that a purported creation of a trust over the bankrupt's interest in the family home in favour of his wife and daughters would be held void as a sham where its sole purpose was to avoid those creditors and where the wife and daughters were evidently not intended to take possession of their putative rights.

4.1.6 Insolvency, trusts law and the rights of beneficiaries

Trusts provide protection against the insolvency of trustee and settlor in general

A beneficiary under a trust will have her equitable interest protected against the insolvency of her trustees, unless any of the legislative provisions considered in the next subsection 91 Younghusband v Gisborne (1846) 15 LJ Ch 355; Re Sanderson's Trust (1857) 3 K & J 497 (bankruptcy); Brandon v Robinson (1811) 18 Ves 429; Re Dugdale (1888) 38 Ch D 176; Re Brown [1954] Ch 39 (alienation to a third person).

92 (1889) 40 Ch D 585.

93 Insolvency Act 1986, s 423.

94 Re Scientific Investment Pension Plan Trusts [1999] Ch 53.

95 [1995] 1 FLR 697.

apply. It is a very important feature of a trust used in commercial situations that if the trustee goes into insolvency then the trust fund is not distributed among the insolvent trustee's personal creditors because the trust fund is owned beneficially by the beneficiaries. Therefore, to seek protection against someone else's insolvency it is very useful indeed to have that insolvent person hold property on trust for you, or to have the court accept that the insolvent person should be treated as being a trustee (whether an express or a constructive trustee) for the claimant. Trusts provide protection against insolvency. As will emerge time and again throughout this book, people who have dealt with someone who has gone into insolvency will try to argue that the insolvent person should be treated as holding property on trust for them. By contrast, if the insolvent person merely owed them a debt (or, 'a personal claim') then the creditor would have no protection against that insolvency because there would be no property in which the creditor had rights. Consequently, the courts have become used to dealing with some fairly specious arguments to the effect that an express trust should be found even though many of the necessary pre-requisites for a trust (as discussed in Chapters 2 through 5) do not exist, or that a resulting or a constructive trust should be found even though the circumstances are not right (as discussed in Chapters 11 and 12). Consequently, insolvency is a context which arises again and again in relation to trusts law.

Insolvency legislation setting trusts aside

It is a salutary lesson to read a textbook on insolvency law and see how trusts are treated in that context as being ingenious devices to avoid insolvency law. In Chapter 3 we considered cases such as *Re Goldcorp*⁹⁶ and *Re Global Trader*⁹⁷ in relation to insolvent financial institutions and the need for the claimants to demonstrate that they were beneficiaries of those arrangements. However, there are provisions in the insolvency legislation which can operate so as to 'claw back' any property which was settled on trust solely for the purpose of avoiding insolvency creditors in anticipation of such an insolvency.⁹⁸ So, s 339 of the Insolvency Act 1986 provides that if a person enters into a transaction at an undervalue or gives 'a preference' to another person, then that transaction can be set aside. For this purpose, a 'transaction at an undervalue' includes any transaction entered into for no consideration (such as the ordinary declaration of a trust). The court may then make such order as it sees fit.

A similar provision is contained in s 423 of that Act, as discussed in section 11.4.7 below, relating specifically to the making of gifts or declarations of trust which can be set aside on the basis that they were intended to be used so as to defraud creditors, such that any property transferred in relation to them can be 'clawed back'.⁹⁹ The lesson from these provisions is that even if a purportedly valid trust is created in the expectation of an insolvency then the court may choose to set that trust aside if it was part of a transaction at an undervalue seeking to put property beyond the reach of the insolvent person's creditors. A good example of such

96 [1995] 1 AC 74.

97 [2009] EWHC 602 (Ch), [2009] 2 BCLC 18.

98 The decision of the Court of Appeal in BNY Corporate Trustee Services Ltd v Eurosail-UK 2007-3BL [2011] 1 WLR 2524 considers the legal principles in s 123 of the Insolvency Act 1986 on the identification of when an entity is to be deemed to be insolvent.

99 Midland Bank v Wyatt [1997] 1 BCLC 242.

a situation would be that in which the settlor created the trust knowing of the likelihood that she would soon go into insolvency in an effort to transfer her home and valuable chattels beyond the reach of her creditors. It was held in *Hill v Spread Trustee Co Ltd*¹⁰⁰ by the Court of Appeal that the grant of a security could constitute a transaction at an undervalue. Supplying a general principle, it was held by the Court of Appeal in *Agricultural Mortgage Corporation plc v Woodward*¹⁰¹ that the court will look at the totality of the transaction, examine it realistically, and take into account the real value of the benefits and advantages accruing to either side, while always taking into account the underlying purpose of the transaction. This underlines, perhaps, the continued efficacy of the equitable principle that the court will always look to the substance of a transaction and not simply to its form, as was considered in Chapter 3 in relation to sham trusts (section 3.3.3).

The high-water mark of claw-back provisions was reached in Re Butterworth,¹⁰² where a trader created a trust over his property before starting out in a new grocery business which failed a little over three years later. The Court of Appeal held that the trust was void for the purposes of the insolvency proceedings because it had been created so as to put the trader's property beyond the reach of his creditors in case his new business venture should fail. On this basis, albeit that that case was decided in 1882,¹⁰³ it can be very difficult to create a trust over one's own property which will be proof against one's own insolvency. This appears to be the opposite of the type of business practice which would emerge in 1897 in the wake of the decision of the House of Lords in Salomon v A Salomon & Co Ltd,¹⁰⁴ in which a boot-maker transferred his business assets, which he had previously owned himself absolutely, into a company such that the company was taken by the House of Lords to constitute a separate person from the boot-maker himself, with the result that the boot-maker would not be personally liable for the debts of his company. In *Midland Bank v Wyatt*¹⁰⁵ it was held that a trust would be set aside under s 423 of the 1986 Act where the trust that was purportedly created was a sham seeking simply to defraud the settlor's creditors.

These statutory provisions are all predicated ultimately on two common law principles, as has been confirmed in a recent decision of the Supreme Court. First, the 'pari passu' principle requires that each unsecured creditor be put in the same position in the administration of the insolvency such that no preference is given to any one unsecured creditor over any other, as confirmed in the decisions of the House of Lords in *Stein v Blake*¹⁰⁶ and in Re Bank of Credit and Commerce International SA (No 8).¹⁰⁷ Second, the 'anti-deprivation' principle prevents any assets being taken out of the estate of the insolvent person so that they are not available for distribution among the unsecured creditors, as confirmed in the decision of the Supreme Court in Belmont Park Investments Pty Ltd v BNY Corporate Trustee Services Ltd.¹⁰⁸ Consequently, the insolvency law context will need to be considered carefully when seeking to create a trust in practice to shield assets against insolvency.¹⁰⁹

100 [2006] WTLR 1009.

101 [1995] 1 BCLC 1, [1994] BCC 688; Barclays Bank v Eustice [1995] 1 WLR 1238.

102 (1882) 19 Ch D 588.

103 That case related to a predecessor provision to s 423.

104 [1897] AC 22. See Alastair Hudson, Understanding Company Law, Routledge-Cavendish, 2011, Chapter 2.

105 [1997] 1 BCLC 242.

106 [1996] AC 243.

107 [1997] 4 All ER 568, [1998] AC 214.

108 [2011] UKSC 38, [2011] 3 WLR 519.

109 See generally Hudson, 2012, in relation to 'Asset Protection Trusts' for a much more detailed treatment of this area.

4.2 THE BENEFICIARY PRINCIPLE

For a trust to be valid, there must be an identifiable beneficiary which is either an individual or a company. If there is no such beneficiary, and consequently the trust is for the achievement of some abstract purpose, then the trust is void. Therefore, where there is a trust for the benefit of 'people', the trust will be valid, whereas a trust created to carry out an abstract purpose will be void, except in a group of anomalous cases.

The cases differ on what will constitute a 'people trust'. The traditional view preferred a literal interpretation of the terms of the trust: if there was no beneficiary, then the trust was simply void. This approach has been supported in more recent cases. The alternative approach suggests that as long as there is some direct or indirect benefit for some ascertainable beneficiaries who can bring the matter before the court in the event of a dispute, then that will be sufficient to satisfy the beneficiary principle.

It was a feature of the older cases involving trusts which satisfied the beneficiary principle that such trusts must nevertheless have been subject to a perpetuity period or else they would be void under the rules against perpetuities. Such 'people trusts' may now be rendered valid by the operation of the Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 1964, which enables the trustees to 'wait and see' if the trust is wound up within the perpetuity period. Where the trust is not so wound up, the 1964 Act provides a mechanism for bringing the trust to an end automatically.

None of these rules apply to charitable trusts. Charitable trusts are discussed separately in Chapter 25.

4.2.1 The nature of the beneficiary principle

The basis of the beneficiary principle

Two ideas are fundamental to the law on express trusts. The first idea is that the consciences of the trustees can only be controlled if there are beneficiaries who can bring the trustees to court when the trustees have failed to perform their obligations under the trust adequately.¹¹⁰ Therefore, the courts insist on being able to take control of a trust in the event that there is some failure to perform the terms of the trust properly.¹¹¹ If there were nobody entitled to bring the trustees before the court by virtue of being a beneficiary, then the court would not be able to control the administration of the trust. In consequence, it is a requirement of English trusts law that there must be at least one beneficiary in whose favour the court can decree performance of the trust.¹¹² The second idea is that a trust requires that some property be held on trust for some person as beneficiary such that the beneficiary acquires a proprietary right in the trust property.¹¹³ It is the beneficiary's proprietary right in the trust property which gives the beneficiary the locus standi to petition the court if the trustees fail to perform 110 The precise nature of the obligations of trustees is considered in detail in Chapter 8. The means by which trustees are held to account for breaches of their obligations are considered in Chapter 18.

111 Morice v Bishop of Durham (1804) 9 Ves 399, (1805) 10 Ves 522; Bowman v Secular Society Ltd [1917] AC 406.

112 Ibid.

113 Saunders v Vautier (1841) 4 Beav 115.

their duties.¹¹⁴ In consequence, the so-called ‘beneficiary principle’ which we consider in detail in this chapter has become an essential feature of English trusts law.

The ‘beneficiary principle’ is a requirement that there must be an ascertainable beneficiary or beneficiaries for a trust to be valid.¹¹⁵ The policy underlying this principle, and arguably the whole of the law of trusts,¹¹⁶ is that there must be a beneficiary in whose favour the trust can be exercised by the court and that there must be beneficiaries with proprietary rights in the trust fund. The principle that there must be a beneficiary under a trust and that that class of persons must be sufficiently certain is generally taken to have been expressed most clearly in *Morice v Bishop of Durham*¹¹⁷ in the words of Lord Grant MR:

There can be no trust, over the exercise of which this court will not assume control . . .
If there be a clear trust, but for uncertain objects, the property . . . is undisposed of . . .
Every . . . [non-charitable] trust must have a definite object. There must be somebody in whose favour the court can decree performance.¹¹⁸

It is clear from these words that the court requires the existence of a beneficiary precisely because there must be a beneficiary who is able to keep the trustees in check by bringing any contentious matters before the court. Lord Eldon expressed the rationale behind the beneficiary principle as requiring also that the court be able to administer the trust if the trustees failed to do so or that the court be able to prevent maladministration of the trust.¹¹⁹ In either circumstance, it was only considered possible for the court to maintain certainty and to ensure that trustees are observing the terms of the trust if there is a beneficiary capable of suing the trustees.¹²⁰ Given that the settlor disappears out of the picture once the trust has been properly created, there is no one else capable of policing the activities of the trustees other than the beneficiaries.¹²¹

In Re Endacott,¹²² it was said, in relation to the beneficiary principle, that ‘no principle has greater sanction or authority’ in the law of trusts than that requiring the existence of a beneficiary. In the cases considered below, it will be seen that traditional judicial attitudes tended to invalidate trusts which did not satisfy the beneficiary principle on a literal interpretation of their provisions.¹²³ By contrast, more recent cases have tended to validate trusts provided 114 The beneficiary’s ‘locus standi’ in this context means the beneficiary’s power to bring a matter to court based on her right as a beneficiary under the trust. If the applicant had no such right, then the court would not acknowledge her right to sue the trustees.

115 Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW [1959] AC 457, as explained by Goff J in Re Denley [1969] 1 Ch 373.

116 As was considered in Chapter 2.

117 (1804) 9 Ves 399; (1805) 10 Ves 522. It is possible that these dicta are directed at the requirement for certainty of objects (see Thomas and Hudson, 2004, 159). These dicta are rehearsed, however, by Lord Parker in Bowman v Secular Society Ltd [1917] AC 406, 441.

118 These sentiments are applied equally to the beneficiary principle in Re Astor’s ST [1952] Ch 534, [1952] 1 All ER 1067 by Roxburgh J and in Re Endacott [1960] Ch 232, [1959] 3 All ER 562 by the Court of Appeal.

119 Morice v Bishop of Durham (1805) 10 Ves 522, 539.

120 Re Astor’s ST [1952] Ch 534.

121 Paul v Paul (1882) 20 Ch D 742.

122 [1960] Ch 232.

123 Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW [1959] AC 457.

that there is some person or group of persons who could sensibly be said to be capable of controlling the trust by bringing matters to court.¹²⁴

The policy against abstract purpose trusts

A trust which is not for the benefit of ascertainable beneficiaries is described as being a trust for the pursuit of an abstract purpose. Trusts for abstract purposes are void under English trusts law precisely because there is no beneficiary who can enforce the trustees' obligations before the court.¹²⁵ (It might be useful for you to think of the beneficiary principle as operating in addition to the rules on certainty of beneficiaries considered in Chapter 3: that is, all trusts require that there be ascertainable beneficiaries and it is the law on certainty of objects which tells us whether or not there are beneficiaries who are sufficiently ascertainable.)

It is feared that the absence of a beneficiary in abstract purpose trusts would have the effect of leaving the trustees at liberty to use the trust fund to pursue the purpose of the trust entirely as they saw fit, without the control mechanism of a beneficiary who is entitled to petition the court and so ensure that the trustees perform their fiduciary duties properly. Trustees are not entitled to use property for their own, personal benefit, nor are they permitted to use the property for any purpose other than the purpose specified by the settlor: without the possibility of the control of the trustees by the court, it would be possible for the trustees to abuse their powers in practice. Furthermore, if trusts for the carrying out of abstract purposes were allowed, the court would be required to oversee and validate the operation of such an abstract trust purpose without any guidelines as to how the trustees ought properly to act.

The other reason for avoiding abstract purpose trusts is that abstract purpose trusts may continue in existence in perpetuity. The courts have long thought that to have capital tied up in the fulfilment of an abstract purpose prevents that capital from circulating in the economy and consequently prevents it from being used to benefit people. The case law refers in part to 'the rule against remoteness of vesting', which is a reference to the problem of property not coming to vest in any beneficiary for an undetermined period of time. So, English property law will not enforce a trust of whatever kind which may last forever: this policy is encompassed in the rules against perpetuities and accumulations, which are discussed below in para 4.2.7.

An outline of the discussion to follow

There are two exceptions to the beneficiary principle: first, in relation to a few anomalous cases such as *Re Hooper*¹²⁶ which are considered below and, secondly, in relation to charitable trusts. Charities undertake activities which are considered by the law to be generally in the public interest and therefore statute creates an exceptional category for them.¹²⁷ In relation to disputes concerning charities, the Attorney-General sues in place of the beneficiary.

124 Re Denley [1969] 1 Ch 373; Re Lipinski [1976] Ch 235.

125 Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW [1959] AC 457.

126 [1932] Ch 38.

127 Charities are a case apart and considered in detail in Chapter 25.

The remainder of this section is therefore a discussion of the means by which the courts have sought to distinguish between those trusts which are for the benefit of persons and those trusts which are really only for an abstract purpose. For the purposes of this chapter we will define trusts which have ascertainable beneficiaries as being ‘people trusts’, and trusts which have no ascertainable beneficiaries and are therefore trusts for abstract purposes as being ‘purpose trusts’. The first issue is therefore to decide whether a particular trust is a ‘people’ or a ‘purpose’ trust: whereas the former has identifiable beneficiaries, the latter does not. It will emerge from the discussion to follow that many of the cases are in conflict. Therefore, we shall consider each approach in turn. A summary of these principles is set out in para 4.2.9.

4.2.2 The strict approach to the beneficiary principle

The approach based on the avoidance of trusts lasting in perpetuity

The traditional, strict approach to the beneficiary principle took a literal interpretation of the trust instrument and sought to decide whether or not there was any logical, possible risk of the trust fund failing to vest in a person as beneficiary within a reasonable period of time. The principal concern of the cases before 1964, when the Perpetuities and Accumulations Act was enacted, was to prevent trusts for abstract purposes continuing in perpetuity. As considered in para 4.2.7 below, the case law developed a complex series of rules concerning the situations in which property could be said to vest in beneficiaries within a sufficient time. Many of these principles required that the trust terminate or that the trust property be vested in some beneficiary within an identified period of time or within the lifetime of some identified person: only in these ways could the courts be sure that the trust would indeed come to an end. In the quaint expression used by Viscount Simonds, any trust property which might vest outside such a time period would ‘tend to a perpetuity’ and therefore the trust would be void.¹²⁸ The approach of the courts was to search for lapses in the drafting of trust instruments and to be astute in finding trusts void for bearing the risk of continuing in perpetuity and for propounding an abstract purpose.

An example of this judicial enthusiasm might be the formerly leading case of Re Wood,¹²⁹ which concerned a trust created for the purpose of working gravel pits such that the profits were to be held on trust for identified family members of the settlor. On the basis that the drafting of the trust meant that it was nominally capable on its own terms of lasting in perpetuity, it was held to be void for remoteness of vesting.¹³⁰ This case is said to indicate the absurdity of the rule, because there would clearly have been a point in time at which the gravel would have been exhausted so that the trust would necessarily have ceased to have effect at some time in the future. Consequently, the case became known as the ‘magic gravel pits’ case on the basis that it appeared to assume that the gravel would continue to be dug forever. There were numerous other decisions in which infant children were considered

128 Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW [1959] AC 457.

129 [1894] 3 Ch 381.

130 In another case called Re Wood [1949] 1 All ER 1100 Harman J considered that a bequest for the purpose of paying money towards the BBC’s ‘This Week’s Good Cause’ would be void because the trust was simply considered to be too uncertain and because it disclosed no beneficiary, nor was it a charitable bequest.

capable of giving birth and elderly women similarly fertile. Slightly more lyrically this doctrine has also become known as the ‘slaughter of the innocents’, meaning the avoidance of otherwise perfectly acceptable trusts. The modern approach is enshrined in the Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 2009 (discussed below) which permits those cases which might theoretically continue beyond the perpetuity period to continue in full effect until the effluxion of the statutory perpetuity period.

The modern approach is contrary to the old law rule under which if the trust property might have vested outside the perpetuity period it was held invalid. Some irrational decisions were reached in the heat of this judicial witch-hunt for trusts provisions which could possibly, rather than those which would probably, have vested outside the period.

The approach based on identifying an abstract purpose without any benefit to any person

In the wake of the Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 1964 and its successor in 2009, provided that the trust is a trust for the benefit of an identified class of beneficiaries, a trust will not be held to be invalid automatically because there is some defect in its drafting which suggests that the trust might last in perpetuity. As considered below,¹³¹ the 2009 Act introduces a perpetuity period if the trust does continue beyond the period of time permitted in the Act.¹³² In relation to trusts which are not for the benefit of an identified class of beneficiaries, the beneficiary principle still holds any such purpose trusts void. It is important, therefore, to identify whether or not a trust is a people trust or a purpose trust.

The primacy of the strict approach to the beneficiary principle is evident from a number of other cases. Two examples will serve for present purposes. In Re Astor’s Settlement Trusts,¹³³ a trust was created with the objective of advancing ‘the preservation of the independence and integrity of newspapers’. The particular objective was the preservation of The Observer newspaper which the Astor family had been instrumental in creating. It was held that there was no beneficiary of such a purpose and furthermore that the purpose was in any event uncertain. Consequently, the purported trust was held to be void. Similarly, in Re Shaw,¹³⁴ the great socialist man of letters George Bernard Shaw had left money in his will to be applied in the creation of a new alphabet (with the ultimate objective of developing a new language which all of the peoples of the world could speak and so increase understanding and peaceable relations between them). It was held that this was a void purpose trust because there was no identifiable beneficiary. These cases clearly rest on the finding that there were no identifiable beneficiaries on their facts.

There will evidently be a number of situations in which it is unclear whether a purpose can be said to benefit people or to be simply an abstract purpose. While the trust might be intended to achieve some abstract purpose, it may nevertheless seem that there are some people who might take some indirect benefit from the trust. So, it could be argued that some people would ‘benefit’ in the broadest possible sense of that word from an independent newspaper or from world peace. In such a situation, it might be argued that that trust ought to be considered to be a people trust. However, that argument will not work. What is meant

131 See para 4.2.7 below.

132 Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 2009, s 7.

133 [1952] Ch 534, [1952] 1 All ER 1067.

134 [1957] 1 WLR 729.

by the trusts law use of the term ‘benefit’ is that there must be at least one person who can benefit in the sense of having some proprietary right in the subject matter of the trust thus giving that person a right to control the actions of the trustees. It is not enough that the trust would improve your life in some indirect way without you having a right in the trust property: only charitable trusts, considered in Chapter 25, are able to operate in this indirect, abstract fashion.¹³⁵

For example, in Re Nottage,¹³⁶ a trust was purportedly created so that a cup would be provided for the best yachtsman in a yachting competition. The issue arose whether this trust could be said to benefit those people who were members of the yachting club, or whether it was simply a trust for the purpose of advancing the yachting competition at that club. It was held that the trust was not a people trust because its purpose was designed to improve yachting. Simply to say that it promoted competition among yachting enthusiasts was not sufficient to make it a purpose trust because there were no beneficiaries with any entitlement to the trust property under the *Saunders v Vautier*¹³⁷ principle. Consequently, the trust was held to be void as a purpose trust.

In the following section, we turn to consider the leading cases on the distinction between people and purpose trusts.

4.2.3 The distinction between ‘people’ and ‘purpose’ trusts

A ‘people trust’ is a trust the intention of which is to benefit identifiable people as beneficiaries,¹³⁸ as opposed to being focused on achieving some abstract purpose. If a trust qualifies as being a ‘people trust’, then it will satisfy the beneficiary principle and therefore be valid, whereas if a trust is a ‘purpose trust’, because it is created to pursue an abstract purpose without any identifiable beneficiaries, then it contravenes the beneficiary principle and will be void. Consequently, a trust to provide sports facilities for employees of a particular company will be a people trust because it provides some benefit for identifiable beneficiaries,¹³⁹ whereas a trust to preserve gravestones will be a trust for an abstract purpose and will therefore be void.¹⁴⁰

In assessing the development of the applicable principles, two cases are compared in the following discussion: first we will consider the decision of the Privy Council in Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW,¹⁴¹ where a gift in favour of an order of nuns was held void as a purpose trust; and secondly the decision of Goff J in Re Denley,¹⁴² in which a bequest for the maintenance of an employees’ sports facility was found to be a valid trust which was properly analysed as being for the benefit of people and not a purpose. These cases are frequently taken to be in opposition to one another, with Re Denley being taken to advance a modern approach. However, we shall attempt a reconciliation of the various approaches in para 4.2.9 below.

135 Cf Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW [1959] AC 457; Re Denley [1969] 1 Ch 373.

136 [1895] 2 Ch D 517.

137 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

138 You should recall that the definition of a ‘legal person’ includes both human beings and companies.

139 Re Denley [1969] 1 Ch 373.

140 Re Endacott [1960] Ch 232.

141 [1959] AC 457.

142 [1969] 1 Ch 373.

An example of the traditional, literalist approach: Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW

In the Privy Council appeal in Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW, property was left to ‘upon trust for such order of nuns of the Catholic Church . . . as my executors and trustees shall select’. The trustees selected the non-charitable order of Carmelite nuns. This order of nuns was not a charity because the order was contemplative and therefore did not exhibit the necessary public benefit to be considered charitable.¹⁴³ The property in question was a large amount of land in New South Wales: a sheep station comprising 730 acres of grazing land and a single homestead comprising 20 rooms (and which we might suppose could have housed about two dozen nuns at a pinch).¹⁴⁴ The question was whether this trust for ‘such order of nuns’ was an abstract purpose trust for the benefit of the order of nuns or whether it could be construed to be a people trust for the benefit of the individual nuns who belonged to the Carmelite order. The decision of the Privy Council was that the bequest was in the form of a non-charitable purpose trust, being intended on its literal interpretation for the abstract purposes of the order rather than for the benefit of any individual beneficiaries. It was therefore held to have been void.

Viscount Simonds, delivering the leading opinion of the Privy Council, held that the trust was a void purpose trust. He had three main planks to his arguments. First, most significantly, the trust was expressed as being made to the order of nuns, for the furtherance of their communal purpose, rather than to any specified, individual nuns. Therefore, the trust was deemed to have been intended for the abstract purposes of the order. Secondly, and building on the first point, it was held that the terms of the trust being for the order of nuns would mean that the trust would be for the benefit of people who would become nuns at some time in the future, rather than being limited to members of the order at the time of making the trust, and therefore would ‘tend to a perpetuity’ and so breach the rule against remoteness of vesting. Therefore, he would have held the trust void for perpetuities on that ground.¹⁴⁵

Thirdly, Viscount Simonds held that as a matter of logic it could not have been intended that ‘immediate possession’ of the rights of beneficiaries could have been taken by all the nuns in the order over a small homestead on a sheep farm. On a purely common sense basis, a worldwide order of nuns made up of thousands of members could not be said to benefit as individual beneficiaries from a gift of land containing a sheep station which could accommodate only about two dozen of their number. However, the issue of whether the land making up the rest of the sheep farm could have been developed or turned to account by the order was not addressed. Viscount Simonds also referred to a lack of evidence as to whether or not the order of nuns would have been able to wind itself up so that the property could have passed to the nuns as individual beneficiaries, in line with the *Saunders v Vautier*¹⁴⁶ principle. Moreover, his Lordship required that for a person to be a beneficiary under a trust, that person

143 Thornton v Howe (1862) 31 Beav 14; Dunne v Byrne [1912] AC 407.

144 No evidence was adduced as to how many nuns could have occupied the building at one time, but let us suppose two dozen nuns, assuming a sharing of bedrooms with other rooms for washing, cooking and religious observance. What is important is that the thousands of nuns making up the worldwide order of Carmelite nuns could not have occupied the building at one and the same time.

145 On the facts, a New South Wales statute came to the nuns’ rescue to uphold the gift – even though they lost on the trusts point.

146 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

must be intended to take ‘immediate possession’ of her rights in property, something which his Lordship considered could not have been intended in relation to the Carmelite nuns.

Possible alternative interpretations of the facts in Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW

By contrast with the approach actually taken by the Privy Council, the question arises whether this bequest could have been seen as either a gift made to persons (as suggested by Viscount Simonds, and as accepted in the case of *Cocks v Manners*¹⁴⁷ considered below) rather than for a purpose or object; or alternatively as a gift for each and every member of the order individually.¹⁴⁸ Theoretically, it would have been possible for the testator to have made a gift¹⁴⁹ to those nuns who were at the time of the bequest members of the order of Carmelite nuns. Alternatively, it would have been possible to have made a gift subject to a condition precedent that the property be held on trust for present and future nuns, subject to a valid perpetuity period. The more difficult question is whether the Privy Council in Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW could have interpreted the intention of the testator to have been to make such a gift. Indeed, in Cocks v Manners,¹⁵⁰ an amount of money was settled on trust for the benefit of an order of nuns with the Mother Superior acting as trustee. The issue arose whether or not the provision in favour of the order of nuns ought to invalidate the transfer as creating a purpose trust. The court considered that the transfer was not intended for the purpose of supporting the order of nuns, but rather that the trust was found to be valid as a gift in favour of all the members of the order individually. Therefore, the beneficiary principle did not apply in that case.

Direct or indirect use or enjoyment of property: Re Denley

A decision which indicated a different interpretation in analogous circumstances to the case of Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW was the decision of Goff J in Re Denley,¹⁵¹ in which case a sports ground was left for the recreational purposes of a company’s employees. The trust provided that land ‘be maintained and used as and for the purpose of a recreation or sports ground primarily for the benefit of the employees of [a] company and secondarily for the benefit of such other person or persons (if any) as the trustees may allow to use the same’.¹⁵² The issue concerned the nature of the transfer either as a void purpose trust for the maintenance of a sports ground, or as a valid people trust in favour of the employees of the company. The decision of Goff J was that he could:

see no distinction in principle between a trust to permit a class defined by reference to employment to use and enjoy land in accordance with rules to be made at the discretion of trustees on the one hand, and, on the other hand, a trust to distribute income at the

147 (1871) LR 12 Eq 574.

148 If the transfer were accepted as having been a gift to the individual members, then no question of trusts law would arise at all and therefore the beneficiary principle would not apply.

149 Subject to any applicable requirement for a perpetuity period.

150 (1871) LR 12 Eq 574. Cf Re Smith [1914] 1 Ch 937; Re Ogden [1933] Ch 678.

151 [1969] 1 Ch 373.

152 The certainty of objects issues here are resolved by looking at the company’s payroll to ascertain the beneficiaries from time to time.

discretion of the trustees amongst a class, defined by reference to, for example, relationship to the settlor. In both cases the benefit to be taken by any member of the class is at the discretion of the trustees, but any member of the class can apply to the court to compel the trustees to administer the trust in accordance with its terms.

Thus, Goff J suggested that a trust in favour of the employees of a company was very similar to an ordinary discretionary trust. Consequently, his Lordship could see no problem with holding the trust to be valid. The facts of Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW were distinguished as creating a trust for abstract purposes rather than for the practical benefit of the beneficiaries. It is submitted that this form of distinction is more convenient than completely satisfying. In truth, the two courts have different attitudes to the subject matter before them: one wanted to preserve the trust at all costs and the other did not. The decision in Re Denley decided that the strict approach of earlier authorities such as *Re Astor*¹⁵³ and *Re Endacott*¹⁵⁴ was confined to abstract purpose trusts (in which no human would take a direct benefit) and was not intended to include situations in which some identifiable humans would take a direct benefit from the trust's purpose. Consequently, the trust was held to be a 'people trust' such that it fell within the validating 'wait and see' provisions of the Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 1964.

In general terms, Goff J considered the best approach to be as follows:

I think there may be a purpose or object trust, the carrying out of which would benefit an individual or individuals, where that benefit is so indirect or intangible or which is otherwise so framed as not to give those persons any locus standi to apply to the court to enforce the trust, in which case the beneficiary principle would, as it seems to me, apply to invalidate the trust, quite apart from any question of uncertainty or perpetuity. . . . Where, then, the trust, though expressed as a purpose, is directly or indirectly for the benefit of an individual or individuals, it seems to me that it is in general outside the mischief of the beneficiary principle.

In short, the beneficiary principle will be deemed to be satisfied in circumstances in which there are identifiable beneficiaries who will take some benefit, even if that is only indirect, from the trust. That the beneficiaries can take an indirect benefit is important because it differs from Viscount Simonds's requirement that the people involved would have to take immediate rights in possession to qualify as beneficiaries under a valid trust. However, that is not to suggest that Goff J was supposing that we can ignore the beneficiary principle in future cases – far from it. As the passage quoted above requires, where the benefit is so intangible that those purported beneficiaries would not be able to bring the matter to court to control the activities of the trustees, then the trust will nevertheless be found to be invalid. What Goff J did do was to redraw the line at which trusts will be held valid or void – in effect making it easier to validate a trust than might have otherwise been possible.

Goff J identified other examples on the decided cases of money being used ostensibly for a purpose but being in truth for the indirect benefit of ascertainable people: these examples were an amount of money left on trust to maintain trees on land on which human beneficiaries under the same trust lived¹⁵⁵ and also money left for the upkeep of gardens as being for the benefit of human beings dwelling on the land.¹⁵⁶ Therefore, it was held that there were other cases in which the prosecution of an ostensibly abstract purpose had nevertheless been upheld as being for the indirect benefit of ascertainable people.¹⁵⁷ However, it should be noted that these cases involved actions for the termination of those trusts so that the capital could be distributed among the human beneficiaries.

153 [1952] Ch 534.

154 [1960] Ch 232.

A closer comparison of the cases of Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW and Re Denley

What is difficult to see is why there are different results in Denley and in Leahy. In the abstract, the facts of the two cases are very similar. In both cases there are large areas of land containing few buildings. In both cases it would be impossible for all of the potential class of people who might use the land to occupy it at the same time. In both cases it is possible to identify all of the human beings who will benefit from the property. So, those are the similarities. In Leahy, it was ascertainable who the members of the religious order would be. Therefore, it could have been said that the land in New South Wales would have been used for their benefit as an order, with different individuals taking turns to use the land at different times. This would have been in exactly the same way that it was not required that all of the employees in Denley would have had to use the sports ground permanently and all together. Rather, groups of employees would use the sports ground from time to time in the manner made possible by the trustees. Therefore, there was an equal possibility in Leahy of seeing the gift in favour of the order of nuns as being in favour of the individuals making up the order, perhaps were it to be used as a retreat,¹⁵⁸ in the same way that the sports ground is taken to be for the benefit of the employees. As to the point about only a few nuns being able to use the sheep station, it is equally unlikely that all of the employees would have used the sports ground. Consequently, the more closely these two decisions are analysed, the more difficult it is to determine any substantive differences between them.

The different analytical possibilities are similar to the approaches canvassed in Re Recher's Will Trusts,¹⁵⁹ where transfers of property are made either for the benefit of the member of a society or for the purposes of a society more generally, rather than needing to be seen didactically as being either for the benefit of people or as being provided strictly for a purpose. Therefore, the answer to any future situation would be a matter of analysis on any particular set of facts.

As considered below, the decision of Oliver J in *Re Lipinski's Will Trusts*¹⁶⁰ doubted the logical correctness of the approach in Leahy. In that case, Oliver J held that a bequest to a social club, even where it appeared on its face to be an abstract purpose trust, ought to be held as being for the benefit of the membership provided that the members constituted a sufficiently certain beneficial class. Oliver J found that where the membership of the club 155 Re Bowes [1896] 1 Ch 507.

156 Re Aberconway's Settlement [1953] Ch 647.

157 Re Harpur's WT [1962] Ch 78.

158 A 'retreat' in this sense would be a place used by a religious community to visit from time to time to enable individuals to contemplate their faith.

159 [1972] Ch 526; see para 4.3.3 below.

160 [1976] Ch 235.

had control over the capital of the trust fund (meaning that they were able to dispose of it in any way they wished – similar to the position in *Saunders v Vautier*¹⁶¹) there was an even more compelling argument for holding that the trust was a valid trust: this case is considered below.

That is an argument with some force. The judicial principle behind the rule against inalienability is the feared economic consequences of tying property into trusts for long-term, abstract purposes.¹⁶² The attitude of the judiciary in this context is therefore orientated around the notion of individual benefit from the trust, or of benefit being locked within a family. There has never been an argument raised that a trust for the education or the maintenance of young children would be void simply because it is based on a purpose. The reason why that trust has never been questioned is that the trust would clearly be for the benefit of those children. Similarly, there is no reason why a group of adults should not be able to join together and decide that they wanted to create a trust to achieve a common purpose – such as pooling money to pay wages to any of them who might become too unwell to work.

The question in principle, as suggested in Re Denley and in Re Lipinski, is therefore why it is necessary to invalidate trusts which are simply not expressed as being for the benefit of individuals even though their underlying purpose would benefit such people indirectly. In these cases, it was suggested that such purposes were unobjectionable in general terms and therefore that there was no good reason to be too astute in attempting to invalidate them. However, as considered in the next section, it is clear that the stricter approach is still taken in some cases.

The continued use of the strict approach

In spite of the foregoing discussion of Re Denley, it should not be thought that all decisions since Leahy have upheld trusts purposes as being valid. For example, in Re Grant's Will Trusts,¹⁶³ Vinelott J considered a testamentary transfer which was expressed to be made ‘to the Labour Party Property Committee for the benefit of the Chertsey HQ of the Chertsey . . . Constituency Labour Party’ or, if that constituency association should cease to exist, to be held for the purposes of the Labour Party’s Property Committee nationally. The terms of the Labour Party’s constitution laid down rigid rules as to the manner in which this money was to be used for the purposes of the Party as carried on in the appropriate constituency party.¹⁶⁴ Vinelott J found that the settlor’s intention was to maintain this capital sum to provide a permanent endowment for the purposes of the Chertsey Constituency Labour Party and that it therefore constituted an abstract purpose trust which was consequently void. An alternative analysis akin to Re Denley would have been that the money was intended to have been provided for the benefit of the individual members. Instead, a more literalist interpretation was given to this gift by Vinelott J on the basis that the testator appeared to intend a benefit for the present and future purposes of the association.¹⁶⁵ Vinelott J sought to limit the 161 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

162 Bowman v Secular Society Ltd [1971] AC 406.

163 [1979] 3 All ER 359.

164 The specified constituency had in fact ceased to exist by the time of the testator’s death.

165 This analysis contrasts markedly with the Conservative Party which is found to be a single association, whereas the Labour Party has been found to be broken up into distinct associations, one in each constituency: cf Conservative Association v Burrell [1982] 2 All ER 1.

decision in Re Denley on the basis that his Lordship considered that Re Denley was a case involving ascertainable beneficiaries and therefore that no question of diluting the beneficiary principle arose because the trust in that case appeared to be a perfectly valid trust in which a complete list of the beneficiaries could have been compiled without difficulty.

An alternative analysis of the facts in Re Grant's WT, suggested by Underhill and Hayton,¹⁶⁶ is that the bequest could have been seen as being for the benefit of the individual members, with merely a super-added direction that those beneficiaries ought to use the money for the purposes of the local Labour Party. In effect this analysis is suggesting that the facts in Re Grant's WT could have been interpreted as being like those in Re Denley because there were identifiable individuals (the members of the association) who could have taken a direct or an indirect benefit from that property. For the reasons given above, Vinelott J did not consider that the terms of the constitution of the Labour Party permitted such an analysis on those facts. More generally, from a close reading of his judgment, Vinelott J was simply not supportive of the sort of approach taken in Re Denley.

Explaining the distinction between the cases

It is not easy to draw a distinction between Leahy and Denley which survives close scrutiny. As considered above, both cases involved a trust drafted on its face as though a purpose trust, involving land which was intended for the use of a group of persons too large to take immediate possession of it simultaneously. Yet Viscount Simonds in Leahy held his trust void, whereas Goff J in Denley held his trust valid. The difference is possibly attitudinal. The two judges came from different generations. Viscount Simonds, at the height of his career, was a great literalist – reading trusts provisions closely and holding the settlor to intend exactly what he said. On the other hand, Goff J was a younger judge at the beginning of his career in the late 1960s (as was Oliver J in Lipinski).¹⁶⁷ He was prepared to take purposive interpretations to validate trusts which would otherwise have been void. Such attitudinal shifts occur between generations – some ideas become less fashionable among judges. Oliver J was prepared to go to lengths unheard of by Viscount Simonds in validating a trust.

Another distinction can be drawn between Goff J and Viscount Simonds as to their respective opinions of the nature of the property involved in a trust. Viscount Simonds considered that a trust can take effect only where the beneficiaries are able to take immediate possession of rights in the land – it was his view that it could not have been intended that each of the nuns in the Carmelite order was to take possession of rights in a small homestead on a sheep station. Goff J was content that there be some person who would be able to bring any irregularities to court as one of the class of beneficiaries. There was no requirement in Denley that there be rights of possession taken by the objects of the trust – rather, it was enough to satisfy the beneficiary principle that some people would benefit either directly or indirectly from the trust.

What Goff and Oliver JJ have suggested, in effect, is that it ought to be possible to validate a trust which is indirectly for the benefit of individuals, even if it might appear on its face to be a trust for the achievement of a purpose. After all, the trust offers a means of pooling and using money which is owned by a number of people in common so that they can achieve their lawful, communal goals. In such a situation, it is difficult to see why, in principle, such activities ought to be robbed of the advantages offered by the law of trusts to enable citizens to organise their own affairs.

¹⁶⁶ Underhill and Hayton, 2002, 106.

¹⁶⁷ [1976] Ch 235.

Oliver J goes so far in Re Lipinski as to suggest that he can see no reason why such a gift should fail. The suggestion is that the beneficiary principle is a technical interference in the ability of ordinary people to carry on perfectly lawful and socially desirable activities of forming associations and pooling their property to achieve their common ends. That the law of gift will validate such transfers of property, as is considered below,¹⁶⁸ means that it is only a part of technical trusts law which invalidates their purposes. However, as is considered in para 4.2.8 below, to overrule the beneficiary principle for the future would disturb the fundamental principle that the beneficiaries have equitable proprietary rights in the trust property and that they are liable to be taxed accordingly: to remove the beneficiary principle would make tax avoidance and regulatory avoidance easier with even more unfortunate consequences, as considered in para 4.2.8.

The form of property right necessary to constitute a person a beneficiary

The beneficiary principle is bound up with our discussion of the nature of a trust in Chapter 2, in which we considered the trust to be an amalgamation of property law rules governing the treatment of the trust fund and also a code of equitable obligations owed by the trustee to account to the beneficiary for their management of the trust property.¹⁶⁹ Where there is no human beneficiary, this relationship between a beneficiary capable of controlling the trustee and the trustee herself is absent. Therefore, there is an ideological objection to abstract purpose trusts, as well as the policy of preventing trusts from continuing in perpetuity, which is considered below.

The beneficiary principle is in line with the rights of the beneficiaries to the trust property as embodied in the principle in *Saunders v Vautier*¹⁷⁰ as discussed in para 4.1.2 above. The rule in Saunders v Vautier provides that all of the beneficiaries acting in concert¹⁷¹ must be able to direct the trustees as to the manner in which they should deal with the property held on trust.¹⁷² To achieve this, those beneficiaries must be clearly identifiable. This understanding of the proprietary rights of beneficiaries was taken by Viscount Simonds to suggest that to be a beneficiary, it is a requirement that that person have vested rights in the trust property in possession.¹⁷³ Consequently, there could not be said to have been beneficial rights in favour of the members of the order of Carmelite nuns because it could not have been said, in Viscount Simonds's view, that the entirety of that worldwide order of nuns had been expected to go into immediate possession of beneficial rights in the sheep station. By contrast, however, Goff J took the view that it was sufficient to constitute the employees of a company as beneficiaries under a trust over a recreation ground if those employees were to have the use and enjoyment of that land; therefore, use and enjoyment would have been

168 See para 4.2.4.

169 See section 2.5 above.

170 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

171 Provided that they do constitute the entirety of the equitable interest in the trust property and that they are all sui juris.

172 See para 4.1.2 above.

173 Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW [1959] AC 457.

sufficient for a beneficial right in property as opposed to each employee taking immediate rights in possession over the sports ground.¹⁷⁴

4.2.4 Where a transfer may be interpreted as constituting a gift rather than a trust

The discussion thus far has drawn a straightforward distinction between the people trust and the purpose trust. The approach in *Re Denley*¹⁷⁵ has clearly ushered in a means of validating more trusts than would otherwise have been possible under the approach taken by Viscount Simonds in *Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW*¹⁷⁶ or Vinelott J in Re Grant's Will Trusts.¹⁷⁷ The reader should already be developing a facility vital to trusts lawyers for looking around problems and finding other ways of structuring or interpreting our arrangements to reach the desired conclusions. Therefore, another means of eluding the beneficiary principle for trusts should be explored: that is, quite simply, structuring the disposition of property as an outright transfer (either under contract or by way of a gift) rather than as a trust.

This is demonstrated by the case of Re Lipinski.¹⁷⁸ This testamentary bequest was left for the benefit of an association in a form which appeared, at first blush, to be a purpose trust. The precise terms of the bequest of the testator's residuary estate were as follows: '... as to one half thereof for the Hull Judeans (Maccabi) Association in memory of my late wife to be used solely in the work of constructing the new buildings for the association and/or improvements in the said buildings ...' In particular, the words '... to be used solely in the work of constructing ...' make that bequest appear to create a trust for an abstract purpose, and the words '... in memory of my late wife ...' were said by the claimants to create a permanent endowment.

However, Oliver J held that, on the precise wording of the bequest, the testator intended that the association take control of the capital completely. It was therefore possible for the association, if it considered it appropriate, to spend all of that capital at once in the construction and maintenance of the buildings. Oliver J was of the view that to make a bequest on terms which transferred control of the capital was equivalent to a transfer of absolute beneficial title or, in other words, was equivalent to making a gift of the money. Therefore, if the bequest could be interpreted as an outright gift rather than as a trust, there was no problem with the beneficiary principle because the beneficiary principle does not apply to gifts.

The approach which Oliver J took to the satisfaction of the beneficiary principle was even more wide-ranging than that of Re Denley. Having considered the speech of Viscount Simonds in Leahy, Oliver J held that:

There would seem to me to be, as a matter of common sense, a clear distinction between the case where a purpose is described which is clearly intended for the benefit of ascertained or ascertainable beneficiaries, particularly where those beneficiaries have the power to make the capital their own, and the case where no beneficiary at all is intended

174 Re Denley [1969] 1 Ch 373.

175 [1969] 1 Ch 373.

176 [1959] AC 457.

177 [1979] 3 All ER 359.

178 [1976] Ch 235.

(for instance, a memorial to a favourite pet) or where the beneficiaries are unascertainable (as for instance in *Re Price*¹⁷⁹).

In other words, a distinction is drawn between those cases in which, even though the trust power is drafted so as to seem like a purpose on its face, there is an intention to benefit people and cases in which there is no intention to benefit people.

Therefore, it would not be correct to say that Oliver J simply distinguished the case in front of him on the basis that it concerned a gift rather than a purpose trust. He did consider and criticise the approach in Leahy. He held that there ought to be a distinction drawn between the situation in which the purpose is intended ‘for the benefit of ascertained or ascertainable beneficiaries, particularly where those beneficiaries have the power to make the capital their own’ and the situation in which ‘no beneficiary is intended [for instance, a memorial to a favourite pet] or where the beneficiaries are unascertainable’. Oliver J was suggesting that the beneficiary principle ought not to be applied in unincorporated associations¹⁸⁰ cases in a way that will tend to invalidate such dispositions by assuming that a disposition made in favour of such an association is necessarily to be taken to be for the purposes of that association. Rather, it was suggested that provided the membership of the association was sufficiently certain, a disposition to such an association ought to have been interpreted as being a valid people trust for the benefit of those members. That is particularly so when the membership as a beneficial class has a right to control the capital of the fund.

The distinction drawn by Oliver J is between a transfer to an association on trust which will benefit its members as being valid and a transfer to a trust for the maintenance of ‘a useful monument to myself’ as being void; however, Viscount Simonds in Leahy would have drawn the distinction between a trust which was for the immediate benefit of individuals taking immediate possession of their rights as being valid and a trust for present and future beneficiaries of a class as being void for tending to a perpetuity. The latter test would invalidate more trusts than the former.

A similar approach to Lipinski was taken in Re Turkington,¹⁸¹ in which Luxmoore J held that where property had been left for the purposes of a Masonic lodge (an unincorporated association) to trustees who were also the sole beneficiaries, there had been in effect a gift made to the members of the lodge at the time. Oliver J also relied on this decision in Re Lipinski,¹⁸² which he interpreted as being a case involving a power and not a purpose trust. He further referred to a stream of cases which had taken different approaches from the decisions in Leahy and in Re Wood.¹⁸³ All of these three cases concerned gifts with a statement from the donor as to the purpose for which the property was to be used. In each the gift was upheld as being valid on the basis that there were ascertainable beneficiaries who satisfied the beneficiary principle. These differences in approach demonstrate that what had previously been a matter of interpretation before Denley and Lipinski has now become a presumption of validity if there are people who may take direct or indirect benefit from the 179 [1943] Ch 422.

180 I.e. clubs and societies, like the Hull Judeans Maccabi Association: see section 4.3 below.

181 [1937] 4 All ER 501.

182 [1976] Ch 235.

183 [1949] 1 All ER 1100. That difference in approach was identified with cases like Re Clarke [1901] 2 Ch 110; Re Drummond [1914] 2 Ch 90 and Re Taylor [1940] Ch 481.

trust. The decision in *Re Grant's Will Trusts*¹⁸⁴ suggests that this approach does not command universal support.

4.2.5 Purpose trust or mere motive?

There are some cases in which the perpetuities and purpose trust rules appear to have been contravened but in which the courts have nevertheless interpreted the trust provision to connote only a motive behind the settlor's intention, rather than imposing a trust obligation, or as creating a gift rather than a trust. Suppose, for example, a settlor who intends property to be used for the benefit of specified individuals but who nevertheless creates a trust provision which denotes a purpose for which that property is to be applied. Such a provision might read: '£10,000 to be held by T upon trust to maintain a private library [therefore, not charitable] to enable my three children to study better for their A levels.' Cases of this sort are clearly a mixture of Re Denley trusts for the benefit of people but interlaced with an overriding obligation to carry out a particular purpose.

In Re Bowes,¹⁸⁵ it was held that the principle in *Saunders v Vautier*¹⁸⁶ (considered above)¹⁸⁷ could be applied so that the absolutely entitled beneficiaries acting together would be able to direct the trustees how to deal with the trust property. In Re Bowes, £5,000 was settled on trust to plant trees on a large estate. That provision would have constituted a purpose trust. However, the only two human beneficiaries under the trust were held to be entitled to direct the trustees to transfer the title in the money to the beneficiaries outright. Therefore, the purpose trust aspect was overlooked by the court in favour of upholding the validity of the trust in favour of the human beneficiaries.

Further examples of this judicial inventiveness occurred in a string of anomalous cases. *Re Osoba*¹⁸⁸ concerned a bequest in favour of the testator's widow 'for her maintenance and for the training of my daughter, Abiola, up to university grade and for the maintenance of my aged mother'. The court accepted the argument that this bequest for the training of Abiola was not a purpose trust but was, rather, an absolute gift to the three women with a merely moral obligation expressed in the trust.¹⁸⁹ In short, the settlor did not intend to create a trust in favour of Abiola, but rather to make a gift to her with an expression of how he would have liked the gift to be used.

Other cases include Re Andrew's Trust,¹⁹⁰ a decision of Kekewich J, in which a trust was created for the seven children of a clergyman once their education had been completed. Kekewich J held that the intention had not been to create a purpose trust but rather to make an absolute gift to the children with a statement of the settlor's motive in making the bequest.

A different problem may arise: suppose that such a purpose trust, with the intention to benefit individuals, has been created but that the objects of the trust become impossible before the trust can be performed. Thus, in Re Abbott Fund,¹⁹¹ a fund was created in favour of two elderly ladies, and subscriptions were sought from the public. The purpose was not 184 [1979] 3 All ER 359, as considered above at para 4.2.3.

185 [1896] 1 Ch 507.

186 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

187 See section 4.1 above.

188 [1979] 2 All ER 393.

189 Cf para 3.3.2 above, where it was explained that a merely moral obligation will not constitute a trust.

190 [1905] 2 Ch 48. See also the discussion of Re Grant's Will Trusts below in para 4.3.3.

191 [1900] 2 Ch 326.

fully performed before the ladies died. It was held that the trust property remaining undistributed should be held on resulting trust for the subscribers.

By way of comparison, it is interesting to note that a similar approach was taken in *Re Gillingham Bus Disaster Fund*¹⁹² in considering a subscription fund for which money was raised from the public in the wake of a bus crash. The victims of the crash did not require all of the money raised. The issue arose as to treatment of the surplus money. The court held that the surplus should be held on resulting trust for the subscribers. The potential problems with this form of resulting trust are considered below in Chapter 11.¹⁹³

4.2.6 Anomalous purpose trusts which have been held to be valid

As is the case with much of English law, there are a number of situations in which the general rule is not observed by a number of anomalous cases. This is the case with the beneficiary principle. There are a few old cases in which settlements which were clearly purpose trusts were nevertheless held to have been valid. These rules have subsequently been held to be valid only on their precise facts on the basis that no further anomalies will be permitted.¹⁹⁴ In Re Endacott,¹⁹⁵ the Court of Appeal avoided a settlement of money for the purpose expressed by the settlor of 'providing some useful monument to myself'. While it might have been understandable to have avoided this settlement solely on the basis of extraordinary egotism, the court avoided the trust on the basis that it offended against the purpose trust rule. Further, the court drew the line at the exceptions to the beneficiary principle which had been made up to that point.

It is perhaps worth noticing that all the exceptions which have been accepted by the court thus far have been testamentary, indicating perhaps a judicial reluctance to avoid trusts in situations in which the settlor could not amend the trust provision. It is unlikely that an inter vivos trust would be similarly excepted, because if the trust is avoided the settlor can always effect the settlement again.

There are four anomalous cases. It should be noted that each of these cases would clearly offend against the beneficiary principle because there is no human beneficiary with locus standi to enforce the trust and the trusts are clearly created for the furtherance of abstract purposes. Sir Arthur Underhill referred to them as being based on 'concessions to human sentiment':¹⁹⁶ that is, they were trusts purposes allowed by the individual judges in question because they saw no harm in them. First, in relation to trusts for the maintenance of specific animals, where a trust is created to ensure that the animal is looked after.¹⁹⁷ Secondly, trusts for the erection or maintenance of graves and sepulchral monuments, such as trust for the maintenance of particular gravestones in churchyards.¹⁹⁸ Thirdly, trusts for the saying of Catholic masses in private (which would otherwise be non-charitable purposes because there is no public benefit derived from the activity).¹⁹⁹ Fourthly, trusts for the promotion and

192 [1958] Ch 300.

193 See also para 4.3.4 below.

194 Re Endacott [1960] Ch 232.

195 Ibid.

196 See now Underhill and Hayton, 2002, 111.

197 Pettingall v Pettingall (1842) 11 LJ Ch 176; Re Dean (1889) 41 Ch D 552.

198 Re Hooper [1932] Ch 38.

199 Bourne v Keane [1919] AC 815.

furtherance of fox-hunting, such as a trust to fund the maintenance of a particular hunt from which no specific individuals could be said to derive direct, personal benefit.²⁰⁰

It should be noted that these trusts will nevertheless be subject to the need for a perpetuity period or they will offend the rule against inalienability. The shortcoming with these trusts is evidently that there is no beneficiary who would be obviously capable of suing the trustees to control their conduct of the trust. In looking more closely at the decided cases, it is clear that the judges were more often than not motivated by the fact that these abstract purpose trusts had clear perpetuities provisions and therefore it would have been impossible for the trusts to have continued in perpetuity.²⁰¹ Alternatively, other cases involving, for example, the erection of a gravestone were not considered to create any risk of a purpose lasting in perpetuity because once the gravestone was erected, the purpose would then cease.²⁰² In the wake of the decision in Re Endacott,²⁰³ we should recognise that these cases are wrong in principle and need not be applied in the future.

4.2.7 Perpetuities and accumulations

The principles in outline

The topic of perpetuities creates a number of problems for the validity of trusts, over and above the question of certainties. As considered above, a distinction must be made between trusts which are for the benefit of identifiable people and trusts which are created for a purpose. The reason being that the Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 1964 may validate people trusts which have no perpetuity provision, but not purpose trusts. This position has been amended further by the Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 2009, as explained below.

The principle against perpetuities is found in the judgment of Joyce J in *Re Thompson*²⁰⁴ in the following terms:

The rule against perpetuities requires that every estate or interest must vest, if at all, not later than 21 years after the determination of some life in being at the time of the creation of such estate or interest, and not only must the person to take be ascertained, but the amount of his interest must be ascertainable with the prescribed period.

In consequence, all equitable interests must vest within a perpetuity period of this sort under the case law principles. Statute has adapted those rules latterly. If the disposition was effected before 16 July 1964 then it is governed by the case law principle. However, if the trust came into effect after 16 July 1964, then it is governed by the Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 1964, considered below, to the effect that the parties ‘wait and see’ for a statutory limitation period whether or not the trust comes to an end. As a result of the Perpetuities and 200 Re Thompson [1934] Ch 342.

201 See in particular Re Dean (1889) 41 Ch D 552, per North J and Bourne v Keane [1919] AC 815, per Lord Buckmaster.

202 Re Hooper [1932] 1 Ch 38.

203 [1960] Ch 232.

204 [1906] 2 Ch 199, 202.

Accumulations Act 2009, dispositions which come into effect after that Act came into force on 6 April 2010 are governed by it.²⁰⁵

Explaining the rules on perpetuities – historical and cultural change

It is worth considering the reason for prohibiting purpose trusts continuing in effect in perpetuity. It should never be forgotten that the principles and policy which underpin property law, from the Law of Property Act 1925 to the common law, are based on a particular view of economics. The judiciary has long been aware of England's status as a trading nation. The birth of commercial law from the law merchant is testament to the expertise developed by English lawyers in reaction to the large amount of commerce within the jurisdiction or with other jurisdictions. The perceived necessity of creating property rules which do not prohibit this commercial flow is something which has loomed large in the collective judicial mind.

The stated purpose of the Law of Property Act 1925 was to facilitate the easy transfer of land and thus create an open market in real property.²⁰⁶ A similar principle is the doctrine of maximum certain duration, which requires that leases must not continue in perpetuity on pain of being held unenforceable.²⁰⁷ Similarly, the perpetuities rules prevent money and other property being tied up in trusts (which are not directed at the benefit of any particular individual), thus removing that capital from the economy.

In the mid-19th century, there was a change in judicial attitude both to use of money and to those forms of commercial undertakings which would be considered to be valid. The change in the intellectual landscape in the British Isles should not be underestimated. The utilitarianism of the Victorians established trade and investment for the common good as the pre-eminent goals of the rapidly expanding British Empire. In consequence, the turmoil of the South Sea Bubble (in which the economy had been profoundly shaken in 1720 by the failure of the South Sea Company) was forgotten and judges accepted that companies were not illegal contracts and subsequently, in 1897, in Salomon v A Salomon & Co Ltd,²⁰⁸ that entrepreneurs acting through companies should have the benefit of distinct legal personality as well as limited liability granted to them by statute. In this changed cultural environment, the judiciary began to develop economic principles on which to build forms of trusts law and company law which were cast in the furnace of their time. Thus, the rules against perpetuities and tying property up in perpetuity were advanced and hardened – precisely because the country's new affection for commerce and economic expansion required that capital be kept moving and that old-fashioned trusts which tied money up in perpetuity should be invalidated. It is important in considering the rules on perpetuities and so forth that their roots even before this Victorian expansionism are recognised. Ever since the Statute of Mortmain (literally 'mort' + 'main', the hand of the dead) the courts have prevented settlers controlling the use of property through trusts from beyond the grave in perpetuity.

The two common law rules

In relation to perpetuities, there are two rules to be borne in mind. The first is the rule against remoteness of vesting, which requires that the interests of beneficiaries must vest within the 205 Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 2009 (Commencement) Order 2010, para 2 (SI 2010/37).

206 City of London Building Society v Flegg [1988] AC 54.

207 Lace v Chantler [1944] 1 All ER 305.

208 [1897] AC 22.

perpetuity period. The second is the rule against inalienability, which requires that income is not bound up in the trust outside the perpetuity period.

Forms of perpetuity clause

Where a trust for people has a perpetuities clause in it which provides for the trust to come to an end within a timeframe envisaged by the Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 1964, it is valid. The times envisaged by the Act are 'a life in being' plus 21 years, or 80 years. The peculiar 'lives in being' provisions were frequently used in trusts in the form of 'royal lives clauses', where the trust would be said to continue, for example, 'for the duration of the life of the youngest grandchild of Queen Elizabeth II plus 21 years'. While these clauses seem odd, they do at least ensure that there will be a period of time within which the trust will terminate. Death, after all, is the only thing in this life that is certain. Alternatively, the Act permits the use of a simple period of not more than 80 years.

The question then is what to do about trusts which do not contain a perpetuity clause. Before 1964, the trust would have been held to have been void. The answer after 1964 is provided by the Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 1964.

The effect of the Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 1964

The 1964 Act sought to ensure that many of the trusts invalidated by the common law would be effective. Therefore, rather than allow trusts which satisfied the beneficiary principle to be deemed invalid because of some possibility that they might continue indefinitely, s 3 of the 1964 Act provided that those trusts be assumed to be valid unless they ultimately proved to continue outside the statutory perpetuity period. Section 3(3) provides that:

Where . . . a disposition . . . would be void on the ground that the right might be exercised at too remote a time, the disposition shall be treated . . . as if it were not subject to the rule against perpetuities and . . . shall be treated as void for remoteness only if, and so far as, the right is not fully exercised within that period.

Therefore, s 3 introduced the 'wait and see' provision, whereby the trustee is entitled to wait and see if the property does vest outside the perpetuity period. The trust is treated as being valid up to the end of the 'wait and see' period.

Section 1 of the 1964 Act creates a maximum, statutory perpetuity period of 80 years. A further issue then arises: how is the trust property to be dealt with at the end of the statutory perpetuity period? If the trust continues in operation at the end of that period, the class closing rules contained in s 4(4) of the 1964 Act are invoked. The effect of this guillotine provision is to say that no more beneficiaries become entitled to the property after the end of the statutory perpetuity period. Therefore, the trust fund is wound up and the proceeds of the winding up distributed among the surviving, currently-entitled beneficiaries.

One drafting device which is commonly used in trusts to elude the need to provide an express perpetuities clause is to use wording such as 'this trust shall continue in full force and effect as far as the law allows'. The effect of this provision is that the appropriate statutory perpetuity period is read into the trust provisions.

This mechanism was found to circumvent the perpetuity period problem in Re Hooper.²⁰⁹

The Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 2009

The principal effect of the Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 2009 ('PAA 2009') is to create a new perpetuity period of 125 years. Clearly this greatly simplifies the law in this area for the future. The PAA 2009 does not apply to certain transactions involving charities²¹⁰ nor to transactions involving pension schemes.²¹¹ Section 1 describes the ambit of the PAA 2009, subject to the notion in s 1(1) that '[t]he rule against perpetuities applies (and applies only) as provided by this section', in some of the poorest drafting seen this century, in describing the trusts and other instruments to which it will apply:

- (2) If an instrument limits property in trust so as to create successive estates or interests the rule applies to each of the estates or interests.
- (3) If an instrument limits property in trust so as to create an estate or interest which is subject to a condition precedent and which is not one of successive estates or interests, the rule applies to the estate or interest.
- (4) If an instrument limits property in trust so as to create an estate or interest subject to a condition subsequent the rule applies to—
 - (a) any right of re-entry exercisable if the condition is broken, or
 - (b) any equivalent right exercisable in the case of property other than land if the condition is broken.
- (5) If an instrument which is a will limits personal property so as to create successive interests under the doctrine of executory bequests, the rule applies to each of the interests.
- (6) If an instrument creates a power of appointment the rule applies to the power.

Therefore, by inference, this Act applies to trusts with successive interests; to trusts subject to some condition precedent (such as 'the beneficiary must reach the age of 21'); to trusts subject to some condition subsequent (such as 'provided that the beneficiary does not marry'); to wills with successive interests; and to powers of appointment. Interestingly this provision does not say: 'this Act shall apply to trusts'. Nor does it say 'this Act shall apply to bare trusts'. However, it is suggested that the reference in s 1(1) to 'the rule against perpetuities' is to be read as a reference impliedly to all trusts and other instruments to which the rule against perpetuities in the case law and under the 1964 Act would previously have applied.

As to the new statutory perpetuity period which is created by PAA 2009, s 5(1) provides that:

The perpetuity period is 125 years (and no other period).

Section 5(2) provides that s 5(1) applies 'whether or not the instrument . . . specifies a perpetuity period; and a specification of a perpetuity period in that instrument is ineffective'.

210 Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 2009, s 2(2) and (3). Under (2) it is provided that: 'The rule does not apply to an estate or interest created so as to vest in a charity on the occurrence of an event if immediately before the occurrence an estate or interest in the property concerned is vested in another charity'; and under (3) it is provided that: 'The rule does not apply to a right exercisable by a charity on the occurrence of an event if immediately before the occurrence an estate or interest in the property concerned is vested in another charity.'

211 Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 2009, s 2(4). Under (5) it is provided that 'The exception in subsection (4) does not apply if the interest or right arises under — (a) an instrument nominating benefits under the scheme, or (b) an instrument made in the exercise of a power of advancement arising under the scheme.'

Consequently, the upshot of this legislation is that all other perpetuity periods become 125 years, whether or not they would otherwise have been valid. Thomas and Hudson question why shorter perpetuity periods which were valid under the case law principles should be transformed into this form of period.²¹²

Section 6 provides for the starting point for measuring the period of 125 years: that is, the time at which the relevant instrument takes effect. Section 7 introduces a ‘wait and see’ provision in the sense that the trust is deemed not to be subject to the rule against perpetuities until the statutory period has expired and then any unused parts of the trust come to an end. Section 8 then introduces a ‘class closing’ rule to eliminate beneficiaries once the statutory perpetuity period has been reached. Section 18 provides that nothing in the Act affects the rule that ‘limits the duration of non-charitable purpose trusts’, which is a peculiar provision given that non-charitable purpose trusts which are not for the benefit of people are ineffective in any event: it is not a question of their duration, but rather their ineffectiveness.

4.2.8 Arguments suggesting that the beneficiary principle should be forgotten

There are many institutions which sell trusts services ‘offshore’,²¹³ primarily for tax avoidance purposes or to partition assets off from other entities. The trusts in such circumstances typically operate in the same way as mutual funds in that clients pay funds to the service provider and those funds are pooled with funds from other clients. This pooled money is then invested on behalf of all of the contributors to the fund. In ordinary circumstances, such an arrangement would be considered to provide each of the contributors with proprietary rights in the trust fund. However, to ensure that the contributors do not face any liability to tax attributable to their ownership of the fund, or to ensure that some other form of regulator does not learn of their partial ownership of the fund, the trust will be structured so as to suggest that none of the contributors to the fund owns any right in the trust property. Under the trusts legislation of many offshore jurisdictions, it is possible to have a trust without the beneficiaries needing to have any proprietary rights in the trust property. Such an analysis would not be possible under English law, because any structure purporting to be a trust in which there is no beneficiary with locus standi to enforce the trust would be void, as considered above.

It has been suggested²¹⁴ that if there were someone who was empowered to sue the trustees on behalf of the contributors to the fund, then that ought to satisfy the mischief of the beneficiary principle. This issue is considered in greater detail in Chapter 21.²¹⁵ For present purposes it is sufficient to observe two things. First, this suggestion would be ineffective under English law because a beneficiary is necessarily considered to have proprietary rights in the trust fund and the lack of any person with such rights renders any purported trust invalid. Secondly, the grounds on which this fundamental change in English trusts law is sought are repugnant to public policy. Change is sought by those in the offshore tax havens either to avoid liability to UK taxation or to avoid oversight by the Financial Services

212 Thomas and Hudson, The Law of Trusts, 2010, para 8.38.

213 By ‘offshore’ is meant that the jurisdiction is outside the UK, the USA and all similar, major jurisdictions. Often referred to as ‘tax havens’, such jurisdictions offer greatly reduced rates of tax (frequently involving the payment of only a small fixed fee by way of taxation) compared to most countries.

214 Hayton, 2001.

215 See also para 21.2.3 below.

Authority and other public, regulatory bodies. Particularly in the modern climate in which there are great fears about the funding of both international terrorism and international drug smuggling through clandestine bank accounts and financial arrangements, it is contrary to good sense to suggest that such arrangements should be facilitated by a change in English law. In either event, it is suggested that no change should be made to English law to achieve those ends. The role of the beneficiary principle in international trusts law practice is considered in para 21.2.4.

4.2.9 Summary of the case law approaches to the beneficiary principle

It is not possible simply to identify one approach on the cases as being correct and the others not; rather, different approaches will apply in different contexts. What is agreed on all of the preceding authorities is that a trust for the achievement of an abstract purpose, such as the erection of a memorial to a beloved pet, will be void.²¹⁶

The more difficult cases are those in which there seems to be some intention to benefit some ascertainable people indirectly. Where the settlor expresses his intention to be to transfer property on trust ‘for the benefit of’ identified people, whether directly or indirectly, then that will be a valid people trust;²¹⁷ indeed, it has been suggested that there is no problem of an abstract purpose if there are identified beneficiaries specified in the terms of the trust.²¹⁸ In either case, there will be some person in whose favour the court can decree performance.²¹⁹ The difference in opinion is whether it is enough that there is merely some person in whose benefit the court can decree performance or whether that person must have some proprietary rights in the trust fund.²²⁰ The latter point of view begins with the view that a beneficiary has that sort of proprietary right of immediate possession commensurate with the principle in *Saunders v Vautier*²²¹ in which beneficiaries representing the whole of the equitable interest can give directions to the trustees as to how the property should be used. Therefore, if property is expressed to be ‘held on trust for the purpose of [an association]’ or ‘by the officers of the association for the purposes of the association’, then that will be an abstract purpose trust and consequently void. In such a situation, there is little scope to interpret an intention to benefit some people as beneficiaries.

By contrast, Goff J in Re Denley suggested that it would be sufficient for there to be a people trust if there were some identifiable people who could take a direct or an indirect right in the property in the form of the use or enjoyment of that property. Alternatively, Oliver J in Re Lipinski suggested that there would be a people trust if there were ascertainable people – such as an implication that a transfer to a club is intended to be for the benefit of its members – or a gift if the members were given control over the capital of the transfer. It is this last view which is problematic. The distinction is between an understanding that the presence of some identifiable person who can hold the trustees to account will make the trust 216 Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW [1959] AC 457; Re Denley’s WT [1969] 1 Ch 373; Re Lipinski’s WT [1976] Ch 235.

217 Re Denley’s WT [1969] 1 Ch 373.

218 Re Grant’s WT [1979] 3 All ER 359.

219 Morice v Bishop of Durham (1805) 10 Ves 522; Bowman v Secular Society Ltd [1971] AC 406.

220 In this sense Vinelott J in Re Grant’s WT [1979] 3 All ER 359 suggested that the decision of Goff J in Re Denley’s WT [1969] 1 Ch 373 could be restricted to its facts or considered to be obiter dictum to the extent that it went beyond a finding that there was a trust for the benefit of identified people.

221 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

valid, and an understanding that for there to be such a person capable of holding the trustees to account, the trust must be drafted so as to make that sufficiently clear.

4.2.10 The application of the beneficiary principle to gifts made to unincorporated associations

The most significant application of the beneficiary principle, as already touched upon in the preceding sections of this section 4.2 of this chapter, is in relation to transfers of property to unincorporated associations. This particular issue is considered in detail in the next section of this chapter.

4.3 UNINCORPORATED ASSOCIATIONS

Gifts made to unincorporated associations must be structured correctly or else they will constitute invalid purpose trusts. There are a number of different ways of structuring such a transfer to make it valid: whether as a trust for the benefit of identified people, or as an accretion to the association's funds subject to contract, or as a transfer to the club's officers subject to a mandate to use that property in accordance with the association's purposes subject to contract, or as a gift to the members of the association. The transferor must avoid transferring the property to the officers of the association on trust to use for the abstract purposes of the association. The structure of any transfer of property to an unincorporated association must therefore be structured carefully to ensure that it is valid. On the termination of such an association, the individual members may acquire individual rights in the property held for the association.

4.3.1 Introduction

An unincorporated association is a group of people bound together by a contractual agreement but it is not a separate legal person (like a company). So when someone wants to give property to be used by the members of an association, they cannot give it to the unincorporated association itself because the association has no personality in law: instead, the property must be given to some person (either a human being or a company) to hold on behalf of the unincorporated association. This will itself cause problems because the person who holds the property for the association may be considered to be holding the property on the basis of an unenforceable purpose trust. There is a difficult boundary between making dispositions by way of a void purpose trust (which offends the beneficiary principle)²²² and making a disposition to an unincorporated association in a way that does not offend against the beneficiary principle.

4.3.2 What is an 'unincorporated association'?

The juridical nature of an unincorporated association

The first issue is to define what is meant by the term 'unincorporated association'. An association is a group of people who have joined together to form a club or society to pursue a common purpose, such as playing a sport together or indulging in some cultural activity. That they are ‘unincorporated’ means that they have not been incorporated as a company. A company has ‘legal personality’²²³ and therefore is able to own property in its own name, to enter into contracts in its own name and the rights of its members are controlled both by the Companies Acts as well as by the company’s constitution,²²⁴ whereas an unincorporated association can do none of these things. The best examples of unincorporated associations are social clubs not organised as companies. Most university law schools have some sort of law students’ society which will organise social events, academic events and careers events with outside organisations: such societies are unincorporated associations to which the members pay subscriptions, they elect a committee to run the society, and they agree to abide by the terms of the society’s constitution. Such a club or society itself, if not a company, will not have legal personality. That means that the club cannot own property in its own name; rather, property must be held in the name of some of its members on behalf of the club. Therefore, there is a risk that those members who hold the club property will appear to be trustees holding that property on trust for the purposes of the club. If that were the correct analysis, the trust might well be void for being a purpose trust.

²²² Considered in section 4.2 above.

Typically, the club will have membership criteria and will be subject to a constitution. The constitution will form a contract between members inter se who pay to join the club. A well-drafted constitution will set out not only the rights of the members, the means of selecting the club’s officers and the way in which property collected is to be used, but will also provide for the manner in which property is to be divided if the club terminates.

The issues which will be considered in this section will deal, for the most part, with the rights of various members to the club’s property, the various means by which property can be given to a club (by way of gift or otherwise) and the competing rights of members when the club is wound up. For the purposes of this section, we will assume such associations are not charities.

The most useful case on the nature of unincorporated associations is Conservative Association v Burrell.²²⁵ This case considered the legal nature of the Conservative Party. When an individual joined the Conservative Party, she became a member of her local Conservative Association serving the constituency in which she lived and not the national Conservative Party. Each local Conservative Association held its own funds through its local officers. Because the national Conservative Party lacked a central organisation which controlled the local Conservative Associations, the national Conservative Party as a whole was not an unincorporated association. Rather, each local Conservative Association constituted a separate unincorporated association, because they had their own membership and their own rules. In comparison, the Labour Party has a central administrative function, centralised membership and centralised rules which apply to all members so that it is the central party to which members belong, although they are allocated to local, constituency areas and regions.²²⁶ The Labour Party is therefore one single unincorporated association

223 Salomon v A Salomon & Co Ltd [1897] AC 22.

224 In relation to the companies, the constitution takes the form of the memorandum and articles of association, the minimum contents of which are controlled by statute.

225 [1982] 1 WLR 522.

226 See Re Grant’s WT [1979] 3 All ER 359. The differences in structure tell us a lot about the differences between these two political parties: the Conservatives insist on local freedom to run local affairs, whereas the Labour Party has a centralised bureaucracy expressing the central principles with which the individual members interact. There is no information about the nature of the Liberal Democrats in the decided case law.

liable to corporation tax, whereas the Conservative Party is not. Unincorporated associations are therefore identifiable as being comprised of their own members, subject to a constitution or rules, such that the association is not a distinct legal person.

The reason why making transfers of property to unincorporated associations is problematic

As explained in the preceding section, an unincorporated association cannot own property on its own account. Therefore, if property is to be transferred for the benefit of such an association, that property must be transferred to a person who will hold that property for the association. It is usual for this person to be an officer of the association – such as its treasurer. If the treasurer is holding property for the association, then one analysis of that person's interaction with the association would be that she is a trustee of the property holding that property for the purposes of the association: if this is the proper analysis of the transfer, then that transfer will be void as having created an abstract purpose trust – something which is not permitted under the beneficiary principle as considered in section 4.2 above. Therefore, our focus in this section will be on identifying the ways in which property should be transferred so that the purposes of an association can be pursued but in such a way that a void abstract purpose trust is not created. The method we will use to identify the manner in which the transfer is being made is by analysing closely the terms on which that transfer is made. Consequently, the following sections analyse a variety of possible structures, explaining how each works and which will be valid and which will be void.

4.3.3 Possible constructions of transfers to unincorporated associations

There are a number of possible analyses of transfers to unincorporated associations depending on the facts of each case. There are subtle differences between each one, so it is important to analyse the individual transfer closely to identify which interpretation applies in each case. While there are a number of different shades of interpretation on the decided cases, there appear to be seven analyses based on the cases which are considered below:

- (a) Outright gift, or assignment, to present members.
- (b) Trust for present members.
- (c) Trust for present and future members: endowment capital.
- (d) Transfer to members as an accretion to the club's capital to be used in accordance with the club's constitution.
- (e) Transfer subject to a mandate to use the property in accordance with the club's constitution.
- (f) Trust for abstract, impersonal non-charitable purposes.
- (g) Trust for charitable purposes.

It is worthwhile reminding ourselves of the problem. Unincorporated associations do not have legal personality and therefore are incapable of taking title in property. Therefore, transferring property to such an association (whether by outright gift or by means of a trust) creates the problem of ascertaining who is to take title in the property transferred. The property could either be held on trust, or alternatively transferred outright to the members as individuals. However, if the property is to be held on trust, there is a danger of creating a purpose trust which will be void under the beneficiary principle, as considered above. The only analysis which will necessarily render the transfer void is the analysis which finds that a given transfer is intended to be an abstract purpose trust. The other analyses have their own strengths and weaknesses, depending on the transferor's underlying objectives. In deciding which of the following analyses applies in any particular case, there is no simpler solution than to work through the analytical possibilities and see which applies most neatly to the facts in front of you. We shall consider the various possibilities in the sections to follow and consider in which circumstances each analysis would be appropriate. We shall suppose that the transferor of the property has not made her intentions clear and that therefore we are required to infer those intentions from the circumstances of the transfer of property to the unincorporated association.

(a) Outright gift, or assignment, to present members

The advantage of making a gift of property is that the trusts law concept of the beneficiary principle does not apply. If the donor of property intended that each of the members of the association was to have an item of property each absolutely, then this could be interpreted as being a series of small gifts, one to each member. Alternatively, it might be possible to see a large donation to a club as being one large gift of property which the members together take as tenants in common, just like the gift of money which was left in Re Lipinski to the Hull Judeans (Maccabi) Association. Indeed, the most straightforward means of transferring property to an unincorporated association is to make an outright gift to those members as individuals because a gift does not involve any of the complications associated with the beneficiary principle in trusts law. A 'gift' of property is synonymous with an 'outright transfer' of property or an 'assignment' of property. In each case, the transferor²²⁷ is transferring away all of her rights in property to another person. For there to be an outright transfer, it must be the case that the transferor retains no property rights at all in the property. If the transferor did purport to retain any property rights qua transferor, then it would not be an outright transfer which had been made but rather some kind of conditional transfer or even a trust. Therefore, in using the terms 'gift' or 'outright transfer' in this section, we are considering the transfer of all of a person's rights in property to another person without any right to recover those property rights.²²⁸ The term 'gift' is a common colloquial term for this kind of arrangement but it is being used in its strict legal sense here.

Let us take an example to illustrate the point. Suppose a gift of 11 Sunderland AFC replica kits is made to the New SAFC Supporters Association, at a time when that association has 11 members. If those kits were transferred outright to each of the individual members, so that each received one kit, that would be easily analysed as an outright gift of one kit to each of those members as individuals. Each member would take their own kit and acquire absolute title in it as a gift. Consequently, no question of the beneficiary principle arises. This analysis is possible because the property is of a kind which can be distributed easily between the members and on these facts there are exactly the same number of shirts as members. Therefore, there would be no reason to suppose that the transferor intended those shirts to be held on trust for the purposes of the association.

A more difficult example would involve property which cannot be divided up. Suppose then that the property which was transferred was the very football which was used in the 227 Also referred to as a 'donor' in relation to a gift.

228 That is, other than by some arm's length acquisition of the property by means of another, unconnected transaction.

1973 Cup Final, which was won 1–0 by Sunderland.²²⁹ If such an item of property were transferred to the 11 members of the association, it would be unreasonable to suppose that each of them would take title in a separate piece of that property. In this instance the property is a single, precious object which would lose its intrinsic significance if it were cut up into eleven pieces, one for each member of the club. The more likely interpretation of the transferor's intentions would be that the football was to be held intact for the club's purposes. Therefore, it would need to be decided who would look after the property. At this point, it could be said that the transferor's intention was to have the football held on trust by an officer of the club – if there were no beneficiaries with rights in the football then the analysis would be a void purpose trust as in Re Grant's WT. Alternatively, it is possible that the transfer could be deemed to have been a gift which was made in such a way that all of the members are to be joint tenants of the absolute title in the football – perhaps leaving the football in a glass case in their club's meeting rooms. The advantage of this gift analysis would be that there is no beneficiary principle problem.

However, it will not always be entirely clear whether or not a gift is intended. From the discussion above of the decision of Oliver J in Re Lipinski,²³⁰ we can glean the following proposition: if property is transferred on the basis of gift, rather than trust, then the rules of trusts relating to abstract purpose trusts will not apply. In particular, the analytical tool used by Oliver J is the idea that any transfer which grants the transferee complete control over the use of capital is tantamount to an outright gift of that capital. So, even if the transferor expresses her intention using words which suggest a declaration of a trust, then the court may still infer an intention to make a gift (as Oliver J did) if the beneficiaries acquire complete control of the capital. The argument is that if the transferee is entitled to spend the capital all at once, or to decide to use amounts periodically as she sees fit, then that has the same effect as making a gift of that property to the transferee.

The logic underpinning this idea is perhaps somewhat suspect. When the transferor has clearly intended to create a trust over property, it may be possible to argue that the trust is for the benefit of identifiable beneficiaries if it grants identifiable beneficiaries the right to use the capital entirely as they see fit. Therefore, it has the advantage that the problem posed by the beneficiary principle is removed. However, there is nothing to suggest that such a transfer ought not to be considered as a trust (albeit a trust for the benefit of identifiable beneficiaries) rather than as a gift. Control over the capital could equally well be explained as being a trust granting the beneficiaries the kind of property rights identified with *Saunders v Vautier*²³¹ whereby the beneficiaries have control of the trust fund as opposed to it being an outright gift.²³²

There is one further possible complication – where a gift is made contingent on some event, there may be an even narrower line between a gift and a trust. Suppose a gift made on the following terms: 'I give you this money provided that you pass your exams.' While that is an expression which might occur in the real world, it is unsatisfactory for the lawyer because the donor's intention is left unclear. It might be that the donor intends to give the money outright subject to a merely moral obligation to pass examinations. Alternatively, the donor may intend that no title is to pass in the money until the examinations are passed, 229 Ian Porterfield's strike and Jimmy Montgomery's double save will live long in the memory.

230 [1976] Ch 235; see para 4.2.3.

231 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

232 This latter view accords with the dicta of Oliver J in Re Lipinski [1976] Ch 235.

which would be a form of contingent gift under which transfer of title is contingent on the happening of some other event. As a further possibility, the donor may intend that she is to hold the money on trust for the donee on terms that the donee's rights vest only on passing the examinations. The short answer to this conundrum is that there is no right or wrong answer – rather, we must look at the circumstances and decide on what we think is the best interpretation of the donor's true intention.

(b) Trust for present members

A trust for the benefit of present members of the association would be a valid people trust, as in Re Denley. The restriction to present, as opposed to future, members removes any perpetuities problem. So, returning to the example used in the previous section, an alternative method of transferring the ball used in the 1973 Cup Final to the supporters club would be to declare a trust over the football such that it is 'held on trust by T for the benefit of those 11 persons who were the only registered members of the New SAFC Supporters Club as at 1 November 1998'. Using this express form of wording – 'for the benefit of those 11 persons', exactly as in Re Denley – would create a valid trust over the property for those current members as individuals.²³³ Again, there is no suggestion that the property is the subject of a void purpose trust; rather, the members take the property immediately and have individual equitable interests. Therefore, on these facts all of the members acting together and sui juris would be able to direct the trustee how to deal with the property under the rule in Saunders v Vautier.²³⁴ In this instance, the membership of the association is used to avoid any certainty of objects issue relating to the definition of the beneficiaries. The trust is structured for the benefit of those individual members rather than for the purposes of the association, thus making it a valid people trust as opposed to a void purpose trust. The one remaining issue arising from the trust provision, as drafted, would be the need for the inclusion of a perpetuities period.

Therefore, structuring the transfer correctly can alter the proper analysis of the donor's intentions. An advantage for the donor of using a trust structure would be the availability of the remedies for breach of trust and to recover property if the trustee should fail to comply with the settlor's wishes. A well-drafted trust instrument would explain clearly how the trustees were expected to behave so as to give effect to the settlor's wishes. By contrast, once a gift has been made, the donor has no control over the way in which the property is used. Therefore, there will be contexts in which a settlor will want to ensure that property is used in an appropriate, specified manner – in such contexts a trust is the best structure to employ. If a trust is to be used, then it must be structured appropriately so as to make it a valid people trust.

(c) Trust for present and future members: endowment capital

The difference between the trust for present members considered under (b) above and the endowment capital trust considered in this section is that an endowment capital trust intends that the property be locked into the trust so that income derived from the property is paid to the beneficiaries. Such a trust would be void for ‘tending to a perpetuity’ because endowment trusts ordinarily continue in existence for as long as there is capital left.²³⁵ Suppose that the trust provision reads as follows: ‘The football used in the 1973 Cup Final is to be held on trust so that the trustee must keep the ball on display and charge an entrance fee to members of the public to view the ball, and so that all such income generated is to be held on trust for the benefit of present and future members of the club.’ There are three possible interpretations here.

²³³ As accepted in Re Grant's WT [1979] 3 All ER 359.

²³⁴ (1841) 4 Beav 115.

The first would be that the trust is a trust for people (that is, the members of the association) which is capable of interpretation as lasting for a maximum perpetuity period, either if there is a perpetuity period included in the trust instrument or if the 1964 Act would impose one, so that there is certainty that the trust will be terminated.²³⁶ The second is that the trust is a trust for people but invalid as offending the rule against remoteness of vesting. The issue is then whether or not the 1964 Act would operate to impose a statutory perpetuity period, thus validating the trust. The third is that the trust is deemed to be a trust for the purposes of the association, by virtue of supporting its present and future members, with the result that it would be a void purpose trust.²³⁷

Deciding which of these three analyses best fits any given set of facts would require a close reading of the terms of the trust instrument. A transfer will be interpreted to be a purpose trust if it is made ‘for the present and future members’ of the association because that wording suggests that the trust will continue forever, serving future members. The assumption is that where future members are also expressed as being entitled to the property, there cannot be an immediate, outright gift in favour of the current membership because that would militate against the rights of future members. The only viable analysis would be that there could only be a void trust for the purposes of the association in such a situation. Therefore, a transfer of property ‘to be held upon trust by T for the purposes of the New Sunderland AFC Supporters Association’ would be void as in Leahy v Att-Gen NSW. References to ‘future members’ are therefore best avoided in trust instruments, unless there is a clear perpetuities provision to specify the time at which future members would cease to be entitled to the trust property.

(d) Transfer to members as an accretion to the club’s capital to be used in accordance with the club’s constitution

Unincorporated associations usually operate by means of a contract between the members as to the rules of the association. Typically, officers of the association will be chosen, and those officers will maintain the property used by the association, raise subscriptions, admit new members and so forth. Consequently, property transferred for the benefit of the association may be placed under the control of the association’s officers subject to the terms of the contract between the members in the form of their association’s constitution. In such a situation, it is usual that a gift intended to be made to the association will pass into the possession of the association's officers. An outright transfer on these terms will be valid if the property is intended to be held by the association's officers on the terms of the association's constitution as the agents of the association's membership and not as trustees under the law of trusts. The interpretation which is to be avoided is that those officers take the property as trustees under a void purpose trust. If contract law was the appropriate system of law to govern the transfer, then the beneficiary principle would not apply.

235 Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW [1959] AC 457; subject now to the effect of the Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 1964.

236 Re Denley [1969] 1 Ch 373.

237 Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW [1959] AC 457.

In Re Recher's Will Trusts,²³⁸ a part of the residue of will trusts was to be held on trust for an anti-vivisection association which had ceased to exist. The issue arose as to the validity of the gift in any event, as if the association had still continued in existence. Briefly put, Brightman J held that this transfer could be interpreted to be an 'accretion to the club's fund' and that it would consequently fall to be administered in accordance with the terms of the club's contractual constitution: thus taking the transfer out of the ambit of the beneficiary principle. His Lordship held:²³⁹

A trust for non-charitable purposes, as distinct from a trust for individuals, is clearly void because there is no beneficiary. It does not, however, follow that persons cannot band themselves together as an association or society, pay subscriptions and validly devote their funds in pursuit of some lawful non-charitable purpose. . . . Such an association of persons is bound, I would think, to have some sort of constitution; that is to say, the rights and liabilities of the members of the association will inevitably depend on some form of contract inter se, usually evidenced by a set of rules. In the present case it appears to me clear that the [members of the society] were bound together by a contract inter se. Any such member was entitled to the rights and subject to the liabilities defined by the rules. . . . In my judgment the legacy in the present case [to the society] ought to be construed as a legacy of that type, that is to say, a legacy to the members beneficially as an accretion to the funds subject to the contract which they had made inter se.

Brightman J is therefore suggesting that the beneficiary principle will not be an objection to the validity of a transfer of property to an unincorporated association if it is made under the law of contract as an accretion to the club's funds.²⁴⁰

Looking to the detail of his judgment, Brightman J held that it is possible for individuals to agree to deal between themselves as to a common purpose and to create a contract between themselves in the form of an association. Consequently, the use of their subscriptions and property committed under that contract could be controlled under the specific performance jurisdiction of the courts. Further, where there is no wording suggesting the creation of a trust, a transfer of property to that association should be read as an accretion to the capital collected for the association rather than creating immediate proprietary rights in favour of the members of the association.

Therefore, the interpretation which was applied to this bequest was that the property was transferred as an outright gift to members of the association as individuals, but held as an 238 [1972] Ch 526; Artistic Upholstery Ltd v Art Forma (Furniture) Ltd [1999] 4 All ER 277.

239 [1972] Ch 526, 538, [1971] 3 All ER 401, 407. Emphasis added by the author.

240 This approach was followed in Universe Tankships Inc of Monrovia v International Transport Workers Federation [1983] 1 AC 366, [1982] 2 All ER 67 and in Artistic Upholstery Ltd v Art Forma (Furniture) Ltd [1999] 4 All ER 277, per Lawrence Collins J.

accretion to the capital of the association. Consequently, the requisite officer of the association took possession of the property, even though it had been transferred to the members as individuals by way of gift. The use of the gift is then as an addition to the capital held by the association.

The treatment of the property, once it has become part of the capital collected for the association's purposes, is governed by the terms of the contract created by the members of the association between themselves. The transfer is deemed to be an outright transfer to the members of the association, albeit that the property is held by the association's officers on their behalf, and is to be used in accordance with the terms of the association's constitution. In broad terms, the members are therefore able to rely on provisions in their mutual contract to terminate the association and distribute the property between one another, as considered below. No question of trusts law generally, nor of the beneficiary principle specifically, arises where there has been a mere accretion to the funds of the association which is to be distributed in accordance with the terms of that association's constitution.

In deciding whether or not this Re Recher analysis is appropriate to any particular set of facts, we must consider the terms and the circumstances of the transfer closely. The donor should phrase his transfer as being 'an accretion to the association's general funds to be used in accordance with the terms of the association's constitution' for it to be held valid as in Re Recher. The donor should avoid using expressions such as 'the property is to be held on trust for the purposes of the association' because that would suggest the existence of a void purpose trust.

(e) Transfer subject to a mandate to use the property in accordance with the club's constitution as an agent of its members

Similarly to the preceding section, a mandate to use property in accordance with the terms of a club's contractual constitution would fall under contract law and not under the beneficiary principle in trusts law. Where property is transferred into the control of one person to pursue the purposes of the association, that person may be held to be an agent of the other members of the club rather than a trustee of property for the purposes of that association. Thus, in Neville Estates v Madden,²⁴¹ Cross J held that such a transfer could be interpreted to be:

a gift to the existing members not as joint tenants but subject to their respective contractual rights and liabilities towards one another as members. In such a case a member cannot sever his share. It will accrue to the other members on his death or resignation, even though such members include persons who became members after the gift took effect. It will not be open to objection on the score of perpetuity or uncertainty unless there is something in its terms or circumstances or in the rules of the association which preclude the members at any given time from dividing the subject of the gift between them.

Therefore, a gift made subject to a mandate that the property be controlled in accordance with the constitution of the association will be valid and is to be administered strictly in accordance with those rules for the benefit of the membership generally. This arrangement takes effect at common law (therefore not creating any equitable proprietary interest in the manner of an express trust) such that the club's officers are simply following a contractual instruction. That the property is used for the purposes of the association can be compelled by specific performance. A 'mandate' is a contractual direction which renders the person who is compelled to act on these instructions an agent of the person giving the direction. An example of a mandate would be an instruction given by a customer to her bank to make a payment by way of standing order out of her bank account to a third person such as her landlord. In such a circumstance, the bank would be acting as an agent of its customer on the terms of the contract between them (in the form of the customer's bank account) but not as a trustee. The fact that this arrangement takes effect under contract law means that there is no problem with trusts law nor with the beneficiary principle as a result. As this approach was explained in Conservative Association v Burrell by Brightman LJ:²⁴²

241 [1962] Ch 832, 849.

No legal problem arises if a contributor (as I will call him) hands to a friend (whom I will call the recipient) a sum of money to be applied by the recipient for political purposes indicated by the contributor, or to be chosen at the discretion of the recipient. That would be a simple case of mandate or agency. The recipient would have authority from the contributor to make use of the money, in the indicated way. So far as the money is used within the scope of the mandate, the recipient discharges himself vis-à-vis the contributor. . . . No trust arises, except the fiduciary relationship inherent in the relationship of principal and agent. . . . [If the contribution were made to an unincorporated association and paid to its treasurer then] the treasurer has clear authority to add the contribution to the mixed fund (as I will call it) that he holds. At that stage I think the mandate becomes irrevocable.

So, a payment to an unincorporated association could be interpreted as being a contribution to the association's general funds whereby the association's treasurer holds the property subject to a mandate to use it in accordance with the terms of the association's constitution. No trust arises in this context and therefore there is no problem with the beneficiary principle. The treasurer is simply the donor's agent under contract law principles. The significance of making that person an agent is that that person will bear the fiduciary obligations of an agent, and so the transferor can rely on their actions being controlled.

Again, one must look at the circumstances of the case and decide whether or not this is the best explanation of the donor's intentions. Did the donor intend that the recipient should simply use the property in accordance with the terms of the club's constitution and not that the recipient was to be a trustee of that property for the abstract purposes of the association? A donor would be well-advised to draft the terms of the transfer as 'an outright transfer subject to a mandate that the treasurer use the property in accordance with the terms of the association's constitution'. The donor should avoid using expressions such as 'the property is to be held on trust by the treasurer' which would suggest a void purpose trust.

(f) Trust for abstract, impersonal non-charitable purposes

The central issue considered above is that a purpose trust, which is not created for a charitable purpose, will be void because it offends against the beneficiary principle, as in Leahy

242 [1982] 2 All ER 1, 6.

v Att-Gen NSW and Re Grant's WT. If a transfer were interpreted to be an abstract purpose trust then it would be necessary to restructure that transfer in one of the ways indicated above, or for a court to be convinced to interpret that transfer in one of the other ways discussed above. The analysis of the transfer as being an abstract purpose trust is the worst possible result for the validity of the transfer, as is demonstrated by Leahy v Att-Gen NSW and Re Grant's WT. These cases have already been discussed in detail. Therefore, in this section we are concerned to identify some of the features of these cases which the transferor needs to avoid if her transfer is to be held to be valid.

A transfer is likely to be interpreted to be a trust if the transferor used expressions like 'the property is held on trust' and so forth. As is clear from Re Lipinski, however, using these sorts of expressions does not always lead to an interpretation of a transfer as being a trust if the court believes the true interpretation to be something else. Nevertheless, a transfer is likely to be interpreted as being a purpose trust where it is made 'for the present and future members' of the association, as in Leahy v Att-Gen NSW. The assumption is that where future members are also expressed as being entitled to the property, there cannot be an immediate, outright gift in favour of the current membership. Therefore, the transfer could not be interpreted to be an immediate gift as in (a) above. Consequently, the transfer will be interpreted as being held by the association's officers as trustees for the future members, as well as the present members, on the basis that a distribution of the property among present members would be contrary to the intention to benefit future members. Therefore, the transfer will be interpreted as a disposition for the purposes of the association, held on trust by the requisite officers, and therefore void.

For example, in Re Grant's Will Trusts,²⁴³ a bequest was left to 'the Labour Party Property Committee for the benefit of the Chertsey HQ of the Chertsey & Walton Constituency Labour Party' or in default to the National Labour Party. Vinelott J held that the bequest should be interpreted as being intended to be held on trust for the Labour Party, despite the expression 'for the benefit of'. It was then held that the intention was to create an endowment (a permanent block of capital) to generate income for the local or national Labour Party. Consequently, the bequest was held to be void for perpetuity, as well as being void as a purpose trust.

(g) Trust for charitable purposes

The final possible analysis would be that the purpose of the trust is charitable. Where the trust is for a charitable purpose, the beneficiary principle does not apply nor does the perpetuity rule. The context of charitable trusts is considered in Chapter 25.

An example of these various analyses

The judgment of Lawrence Collins J in *Re Horley Town FC*²⁴⁴ is a thorough survey of the possible analyses of property holdings by a small football club which was organised as an unincorporated association and which had different categories of membership.²⁴⁵ The question for us to consider now is how would we analyse a transfer of property to a football club, in this instance an unincorporated association. Let us consider the various possible analyses. A football club could be organised as a valid people trust for the benefit of its present members, and any future members within its perpetuity period, whereby those people are treated as being akin to the objects of a discretionary trust in that they are entitled to use the property as permitted by the club's management, as in Re Denley.²⁴⁶ Alternatively, any property transferred to the club could be interpreted as being a gift made to the current members as tenants in common if they were entitled to dispose of the capital as they sought fit, or as a valid people trust with ascertainable members, as in Re Lipinski.²⁴⁷ Alternatively, again, the club could be considered to be conducting an abstract purpose in providing for the playing of sport²⁴⁸ in relation to which no person takes any proprietary rights and which is therefore void, as in Re Grant's WT.²⁴⁹ The final analysis would be that any property passed to the trust is held in accordance with the terms of its constitution under the terms of the contract between the members as an accretion to the club's funds, as in *Conservative Association v Burrell*²⁵⁰ or Re Recher's WT,²⁵¹ or as a gift to the members as joint tenants, as in Neville Estates v Madden.²⁵² Which analysis is the best analysis will depend upon a close reading of the club's constitution, if any, and a consideration of the nature of the property involved, as considered in the next section.

243 [1979] 3 All ER 359, [1980] 1 WLR 360.

244 [2006] EWHC 2386.

The potential importance of the nature of the property involved

As was suggested in the preceding discussions of the various forms of potential analysis of a transfer of property to an unincorporated association, it may well be that the form of property involved will have an effect on deciding which analysis is the most appropriate. If the property is a billiard table which is being transferred to the association, then it would be improbable that that table was expected to be divided up between the members so that they would saw it up and take home a piece of it each. Therefore, a court is more likely to find either that the members were to be owners of it as a gift as joint tenants or else that it was intended as an endowment to be held for the purposes of the club in perpetuity as a billiard table held intact for as long as possible. Alternatively, akin to the sports field in Re Denley, it could be argued that it is to be made available for the benefit of all of the members and so 245 Ultimately no conclusion is reached as to whether or not this association was based on a valid trust for the benefit of identifiable people as beneficiaries, or an association predicated on a valid contract to which property is added as an accretion to its funds, or a void trust without beneficiaries which was formed for the pursuit of an abstract purpose. The discussion in the judgment in this context was predicated on the three categories set out in Neville Estates v Madden [1962] Ch 832, a formulation which does not mention explicitly the possibility that the association is organised as a valid discretionary trust for the benefit of the members of the association as in Re Denley [1969] 1 Ch 373 (although that case is cited, over-much focus is paid to Neville Estates v Madden). The judgment is, otherwise, an excellent survey of the case law in this area.

246 [1969] 1 Ch 373.

247 [1976] Ch 235.

248 Something which was not a charitable purpose before the passage of Charities Act 2006, s 2(2)(g).

249 [1979] 3 All ER 359.

250 [1982] 1 WLR 522.

251 [1972] Ch 526.

252 [1962] Ch 832.

be the subject matter of a valid trust. If there were 24 members of the club and 24 small, valuable works of art were donated to the club, it might be possible to interpret this as an accretion to the club's property so that the members were entitled to vote in accordance with their constitution to divide those artworks between them and take one each: that the artworks are chattels numerous enough for equal division makes them susceptible to this analysis, as opposed to necessarily needing to be treated as being held on trust or as an accretion to the club's funds. It would be logically difficult to interpret a gift of a billiard table in the same way because it is unlikely that the transferor could have intended to have each member of the association saw off a piece of the billiard table to take home. It would be more likely that a billiard table was intended to be held for the purposes of the club in its clubroom in perpetuity: this analysis would suggest that this transfer was an invalid purpose trust. By contrast, money is a form of property which, because it is so easily divided into so many different lots or held together as a complete fund, can potentially be subjected to any form of analysis because of its malleable form. So, transfers of money could be susceptible to many different analyses and therefore more reliance is likely to be placed on the precise words used and intention evidenced by the transferor.

What is unclear about this model of property being granted to unincorporated associations is that it still does not explain who actually owns the property. To say that the property is held subject to a contract does not tell us, for example, who owns the legal title over the property and so should be recorded as such at the Land Registry in relation to land or as a signatory over the bank account in relation to money or whatever. For example, if property were transferred to the Trust Lawyers' Association, an unincorporated association, then the property would have to be transferred to some human beings in fact because if no individual or any other legal person was able to receive the property then it would go on resulting trust back to the transferor. If the property was land and was received by, for example, Tariq and Zena (the President and Treasurer of the Association respectively) then we would have to ask whether Tariq and Zena are to be registered as proprietors of the land at the Land Register, then that would tend to the analysis that they hold the property on a trust of land because they are not intended to be the beneficial owners of the property themselves. Arguing that the property is in some way 'held' further to the terms of the association's constitution does not explain who owns the land. The contractual analyses in Re Recher and in Conservative Association v Burrell are convenient in that they avoid the problems of the beneficiary principle, but they do not really solve the property law problems with transfers of property in this context. An initially more promising analysis is that the members of the association are joint tenants at common law of the property but that each member has only limited rights to use the property in accordance with the agreement constituted between the members in the form of the association's constitution: principally, this means that the members may not sever their shares in the property contrary to the terms of that constitution. The problem remains, however, that if the property were land, then only four members could be entered on the Land Register under the Law of Property Act 1925, so those four members become trustees for the remaining beneficiaries in any event, which brings us back to the original problem.

Answering problems in this area

Students often find this a challenging topic because it is very different from anything which they have studied before. The key is to remember that the legal principles remain set in stone. It is only the facts of different problems or the factual circumstances of cases which change. So, you must analyse the facts of each different case and decide which of the different legal models they most closely resemble. Consider the words which the transferor used: which legal model do they most closely resemble? Is there anything about the nature of the property involved which leads you to one model rather than another?

The various advantages and disadvantages of these various analyses could be understood by reference to the following diagram. In essence this table records each of the five key analyses which have been described in this discussion and asks (a) whether or not each will be valid; and (b) whether or not each provides the donor with sufficient control over the use of the property once it has been transferred to its intended recipient. In essence, if a transferor transfers property to a person then she will want to know that that property will be used for the purpose for which she transferred it originally, whereas it is possible that when the officers of the unincorporated association receive the property they may decide that they want to use it for a purpose which would not meet with the approval of the transferor. Therefore, the fiduciary offices (like trustee and agent) offer protection to the transferor in that the fiduciary is bound by her fiduciary duties to use the property appropriately, whereas if the property is the subject of a gift then the recipient acquires ‘complete control’ over it and is free to do whatever she wants with the property.

Various analyses of transfer to unincorporated association	Abstract purpose trust	‘People trust’	Gift passing ‘complete control’	An accretion to funds	Taking property as agent subject to mandate
Leading case exhibiting this analysis	Leahy v Att-Gen NSW	Re Denley	Re Lipinski	Re Recher	Conservative Association v Burrell
Valid or Void?	Void	Valid	Valid	Valid	Valid
Does the transfer retain control of money after transfer?	Yes, but void	Yes, because governed by trustee’s fiduciary duties	No, because all title passes	No, because governed only by terms of association’s constitution	Yes, because governed by agent’s fiduciary duties
Is it clear who owns the property?	Yes, but void	Yes, held on trust	Yes	No	No

On each set of facts, having analysed (as discussed already in this section) which analysis best fits the facts of the situation, it is then important to advise a transferor as to which of the various possible structures offers the transferor the best combination of valid transfer and suitable control over the property. For example, if the transferor is also one of the officers of the association who will receive the property on behalf of that association, then having little control over the property once received would not bother her particularly; whereas if she had no control over that body then she may require some control over the recipient once the property is transferred to the unincorporated association. A lawyer’s role is to advise her client on the best structure for her goals. However, it is important to note that it is not a lawyer’s (nor a student’s) role simply to assume that the analysis which suits the client best is the one which necessarily applies. Instead one must look at the circumstances and recognise which analysis honestly fits the circumstances, and if one has the luxury of being able to structure the circumstances before the property is transferred then one must ensure that the structure actually embodies the desired result. For example, if one wishes to seem most like Re Denley then one should use the precise formulation used in that case by Goff J.

4.3.4 Distributions on the winding up of an unincorporated association

Moribund associations – bona vacantia

One arcane set of rules surrounds the treatment of transfers of property to associations which subsequently cease to exist. As considered above, where subscribers contribute to a fund which becomes moribund and where it is possible to identify those subscribers, the property subscribed will be held on resulting trust for the subscribers. However, where it is not possible for the property to be held on such a trust, it passes bona vacantia to the Crown.²⁵³ Therefore, if an association ceases to carry on any activities and has no members, the property held for that moribund association passes bona vacantia to the Crown, that is, to the Duchy of Cornwall.²⁵⁴ This rule, it is suggested, is a reminder of the underlying logic of English property law that it is the monarch who ultimately owns all property in the jurisdiction: therefore, any unclaimed property reverts to the monarch. This may seem remarkable to the reader.

When winding up an unincorporated association it was held by Lewison J in *Hanchett-Stamford v Attorney-General*²⁵⁵ that if there was still one member left of a moribund association then the property attributed to that association would not pass bona vacantia to the Crown. That much is in line with principle: where a member remains, the association is not completely moribund, even if it has stopped carrying on any activities. Interestingly, his Lordship considered that for the Crown to seize property in such circumstances would offend against that person's human rights to their property under the First Protocol of the European Convention on Human Rights.

Distributions among members on winding up

A number of problems arise on the termination of an association to do with the means by which the property belonging to the association is to be distributed. The first interpretation is that property should be returned to the person who transferred it to the association. As considered elsewhere,²⁵⁶ this approach has been employed where the transfer has taken the form of a subscription to a purpose which cannot be carried out. The property is held on resulting trust if those subscribers can be identified. So, under the old authority of Re West Sussex Constabulary's Widows, Children and Benevolent (1930) Fund Trusts,²⁵⁷ there were four categories of giving: substantial donations and legacies, money donated via collecting boxes, contributions from

253 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

254 At present the income from the Duchy of Cornwall is paid directly to the Prince of Wales.

255 [2008] EWHC 330 (Ch), [2008] 4 All ER 323.

256 See para 11.2.4 below.

257 [1971] Ch 1.

members, and entertainment such as raffles and sweepstakes. First, where the makers of the donations were identifiable, the donations could be returned. It was held that where a legacy was made to an unincorporated association which subsequently became moribund, then that legacy would be held on resulting trust for the donor's estate. In relation to legacies, it was considered by Goff J that they were separately identifiable from the other property and therefore capable of being returned to their donors in a manner which smaller contributions, such as to collection tins, were not. Therefore, secondly, in the case of the collection boxes, it was held that it is impossible to return the property to the subscribers on the basis that their transfers of property were both outright gifts and made anonymously. Thirdly, contributions from members could be distributed in accordance with the rules of the association. Where the rules of the association were silent as to the redistribution of subscriptions to the membership, then those members would be taken to have received the services for which they had paid through their subscriptions. Fourthly, the proceeds of the entertainment were not capable of being returned to the people who participated on the basis that people who had contributed that money had received the entertainment they paid for and therefore had no right to the return of their property – their interaction had been based on contract and not on trust.

A second approach might apply where the transfer is an outright transfer such that there can be no suggestion that the transferor retains any title in the property. Where the property has been the subject of a gift or outright transfer, the transferor would not ordinarily retain any right.²⁵⁸ Therefore, the property must be dealt with in accordance with the terms of the association's constitution, being the contract between the members.²⁵⁹ In circumstances where the contract provides for the mechanism by which the trust property is to be distributed, the matter is considered to be one of contract in which equitable principles have no role. In Re Bucks Constabulary Fund Friendly Society (No 2), Walton J held:²⁶⁰

It is a matter, so far as the members are concerned, of pure contract, and, being a matter of pure contract, it is, in my judgment, as far as distribution is concerned, completely divorced from all questions of equitable doctrines.²⁶¹

Therefore, the resulting trust is displaced as the means by which property is distributed on termination of the association by the law of contract. If the association contains rules as to the means by which the property held for the association is to be distributed, the members are bound by those contractual rules. There is a very important shift here between principles based on the law of property – by means of resulting trust – and principles based on contract, as in Re Bucks Fund. Where there is a contract between the members of the association, or between other people participating in entertainments organised by the association for fund-raising purposes, then the modern approach is to look to the enforcement of the terms of that contract in distributing the association's property. The motivation for this change in approach is that the membership of the association voluntarily subjugates its property rights to the terms of the association's constitution – itself a contract – and so should be held to the terms of that arrangement in the distribution of the association's property.

258 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

259 Neville Estates v Madden [1962] Ch 832.

260 [1979] 1 WLR 936.

261 Followed in Artistic Upholstery Ltd v Art Forma (Furniture) Ltd [1999] 4 All ER 277.

That a resulting trust should not be implied where the claimant has already received all that he was contractually entitled to was doubted in Davis v Richards and Wallington Industries Ltd,²⁶² where employees sought to recover rights in surplus contributions to their occupational pension fund. Scott J considered that the employees contributing to a pension fund ought to be entitled to recover the surplus contributions to that fund in the event that it was wound up. This was doubted in Air Jamaica v Charlton,²⁶³ where the Privy Council suggested that in cases of actuarial surpluses under occupational pension funds, the contributors were not automatically entitled to recover their over-contributions. These cases, it is suggested, relate specifically to the difficult questions relating to occupational pension funds which are considered in detail in Chapter 24:²⁶⁴ surpluses in that context are actuarial calculations that the amount of money contained in a pension fund is more than is needed to meet the pensions requirements of the number of pensioners then contained in the fund.

Method of distribution where association's rules are silent

The further issue is which approach is to be taken if the association's constitution is silent on the matter of distributing the trust property. This was the situation in Re Bucks Fund: the fund was wound up and the question raised whether its property should be distributed between its surviving members, or whether it should pass to the Crown as bona vacantia once the association had become moribund. The association's constitution was silent as to the question of the distribution of the property. Walton J held that the proper approach was to distribute the property rateably between the surviving members, according to their respective contributions, rather than vacating it to the Crown.

One further problem arose in that case: what if there were different classes of membership? Suppose a gentlemen's club provided a restaurant and library service at a rate of £10 per week for those who lived in London, and at a rate of £5 per week for those who lived outside London. On the winding up of the club, those members who had paid £10 would claim entitlement to double the proceeds of the members who had paid only £5.²⁶⁵ This was the situation in Re Sick and Funeral Society of St John's Sunday School, Golcar,²⁶⁶ in which there were ordinary, adult members and child members of a society which provided sickness and death benefits. The members paid different subscriptions according to their age but otherwise took broadly similar services from the association. It was ordered by Megarry J that the property should be divided rateably among the surviving members on the winding up of the association, such that the adult members would receive full shares and the children only half-shares in proportion to their subscriptions. Now suppose a different situation in which there was another gentlemen's club providing residence for its members and a restaurant, such that there was a membership rate of £100 per week for those who lived on the premises permanently and a £50 per week rate for those who did not stay for more than three days per week. On the winding up of the association, the members who were permanent residents might not be entitled to double the property on the basis that they received a service

262 [1990] 1 WLR 1511.

263 [1999] 1 WLR 1399.

264 See para 24.5.2 below.

265 Re Sick and Funeral Society of St John's Sunday School, Golcar [1973] Ch 51.

266 Ibid.

from the club which was twice as large as the occasional residents. In this latter example, the permanent residents might be considered to have received a more extensive service in consideration for their greater payment such that they ought not to have any greater right to the association's property on its winding up.

Similarly, there might be disagreement between those who had been members for a longer period than others, or who had played a more active part in the activities of the association. Clearly, the permutations are endless. It is to be expected that the courts will seek to distribute property in the most commonsensical way possible. This perhaps illustrates the shortcomings of English property and trusts law, in that entitlement is frequently seen as attaching to specific items of property rather than being related to amounts of value in communal property which is better identified as being made up of claims against other persons, rather than being in claims in rem.²⁶⁷

A further problem relates to different categories of member having different types of voting rights in meetings of the association, and who may also have paid different amounts by way of subscription as considered before: should different voting rights lead to different rights in the club's property on a winding up? Megarry V-C held in *GKN Bolts & Nuts Ltd etc Works Sports and Social Club*²⁶⁸ that the court should approach questions as to the winding up of unincorporated associations with the broad sword of common sense. In that case there was a clear distinction made in the club's rules between full members and other sorts of members such that only full members would be entitled to vote for a winding up of the association: consequently, it was held that only those members should be deemed to be entitled to participate in a winding up of that association so as to be entitled to receive its property absolutely beneficially.

In relation to the appropriate mechanism for winding up an unincorporated association whose members had different voting rights, Lawrence Collins J was asked to consider a club with full members, associate members, and temporary members in Re Horley Town FC.²⁶⁹ His Lordship acknowledged that the division between different categories of member was less clear in his case than in the GKN case. The temporary members took out membership only on a one-off basis when they attended social events organised by the club – such as pub quizzes and that sort of thing: these temporary members had no rights to vote at any of the club's meetings. Associate members belonged to approved sports clubs of other sorts and took out membership for one year at a time, which permitted them to use the football club's facilities during that time: importantly, associate members had only limited rights to vote at association meetings during their membership. Full members had full voting rights during their membership which could last as long as the club lasted. In the event that the assets of the club were wound up it was found that the temporary members should receive no property because they were not entitled to vote for a winding up. Similarly, even though 267 This discussion is taken up in relation to tracing below in Chapter 19: Barlow Clowes International Ltd (In Liquidation) v Vaughan [1992] 4 All ER 22.

268 [1982] 1 WLR 774.

269 [2006] EWHC 2386. For those reasons who want a sense of what Horley is like, perhaps the following will help. Horley is near Gatwick Airport to the south of London. The well-known goth rock band The Cure were originally from Horley. On the Faith album (Fiction Records, 1981) there is a track 'Other Voices' which has lyrics which suggest to me what it would be like to live in Horley: 'It's just the noises of other voices / Pounding in my broken head' (lyric by Robert Smith).

associate members had limited voting rights, ‘the associate members in the present case have no effective rights and it would be wholly unrealistic to treat the introduction of associate members by amendment of [the club’s rules] as a transfer of the Club’s property to them’. Therefore, only full members would be considered to be appropriate recipients of club property.²⁷⁰

However, the final paragraphs of the judgment are very unclear. The peni-penultimate clause²⁷¹ of the judgment proper provides that the Club’s rules have no provision explaining how a winding up is to be conducted. Therefore, Lawrence Collins J held that:²⁷²

The Rules do not specify how the Club’s assets are to be distributed following dissolution. In the absence of any rule to the contrary, there is to be implied into the rules of the Club a rule to the effect that the surplus funds of the Club should be divided on a dissolution amongst the members²⁷³ of the Club, and this distribution will normally be per capita among the members (irrespective of length of membership or the amount of subscriptions paid) but may reflect different classes of membership.

Ultimately, this question was adjourned for a further hearing.²⁷⁴ The principal point which emerges is that one’s category of membership will not necessarily entitle one to a greater or lesser share of the association’s property than other categories of member.²⁷⁵ If the terms of the club’s constitution are expressly that there should be distribution in differential amounts then that is the method which must be followed.²⁷⁶ Furthermore, in the judgment of Collins J it emerged that there will be differential distribution if that is the best analysis for the situation, for example if one category of membership did not have any rights to vote on matters such as distribution then it is not to be presumed that they should be entitled to participate in such a distribution.

A note on resulting trust

Chapter 11 considers the distribution of the proceeds of a trust which cannot be performed, or in relation to which there is surplus property. The approach had been taken in cases like West Sussex that property ought to be held on resulting trust for persons who had contributed to an unincorporated association, provided that such persons could be readily identified.²⁷⁷ Subsequently, there has been a development in equity from the use of resulting trusts in 270 The judgment, annoyingly, decides to stop distinguishing between the three categories of member at this point and Lawrence Collins J instead simply refers to ‘the members’ from this point forwards, thus making it unclear precisely which members were intended to be covered.

271 [2006] EWHC 2386, [129].

272 Ibid.

273 However, it is not made clear here exactly which category of members is intended. From the previous paragraphs it seems likely that this is a reference to ‘full members’ only, but the final paragraph of the judgment leaves this question for a later date.

274 [2006] EWHC 2386, [132].

275 Re Sick and Funeral Society of St John’s, etc [1973] Ch 51; Re Bucks Constabulary, etc (No 2) [1979] 1 WLR 936, 952; Re GKN Bolts, etc. [1982] 1 WLR 774, 778.

276 Re Bucks Constabulary, etc (No 2) [1979] 1 WLR 936.

277 Re West Sussex Constabulary’s Benevolent Fund Trusts [1971] Ch 1.

situations like West Sussex towards a use of contract law thinking in cases like Re Bucks.²⁷⁸ Equity was once eager to find resulting trusts to explain the return of title to the original owners of property. It is suggested (as considered in Chapter 11) that resulting trusts apply in situations in which the structure in which the legal title was originally held remains and that it is only the equitable interest which falls to be allocated. The thinking advanced in *Westdeutsche Landesbank*²⁷⁹ sounds the death knell for more adventurous theories of the resulting trust by holding that once property is transferred under an intention that the recipient take absolute title, there is no resulting trust. This thinking is in stark contradistinction to the theories advanced by the restitution school.²⁸⁰ In short, the resulting trust is displaced by an approach based on the law of contract.

It is suggested that the better approach for equity in any event in such circumstances ought to have been to require the parties to observe their contractual bargain (in the form of the association's constitution) rather than seeking to return title in property on resulting trust. The basis for this argument is that once a contract to transfer property is formed, the contracting parties are compelled to effect the transfer. This rule is clear under doctrines as varied as that in *Walsh v Lonsdale*²⁸¹ (that equity looks upon as done that which ought to have been done) and in *Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC*²⁸² (that a constructive trust be imposed where it would be unconscionable for the holder of the legal title to refuse to do so). In short, once the contract is formed, equity treats the equitable interest as having passed according to the terms of the contract. Therefore, it is not a question for resulting trust because the transferor loses title in the property qua original owner and acquires any proprietary rights only under the terms of the contract.

278 [1979] 1 WLR 936.

279 [1996] AC 669.

280 See section 31.3 below.

281 (1882) 21 Ch D 9.

282 [1996] AC 669.

Formalities in the creation of express trusts

5.1	SPECIFIC FORMALITIES IN THE CREATION OF TRUSTS	242
5.1.1	Declaration of trust	243
5.1.2	A completely constituted trust cannot be undone	244
5.2	THE PROPER CONSTITUTION OF A TRUST	245
5.2.1	The general principle governing the constitution of trusts	245
5.2.2	The constitution of trusts over personal property	246
5.2.3	The constitution of trusts of land	246
5.2.4	The settlor must have a proprietary right in the trust property at the time of purporting to declare the trust	247
5.3	EXCEPTIONS TO THE RULES OF FORMALITY	250
5.3.1	The operation of implied, resulting and constructive trusts	250
5.3.2	Fraud and unconscionability	251
5.4	IMPROPERLY CONSTITUTED TRUSTS AND IMPERFECT GIFTS	253
5.4.1	Introduction	253
5.4.2	Trusts and imperfect gifts	255
5.4.3	The rule that equity will not assist a volunteer and its impact on imperfect gifts	256
5.4.4	‘Doing everything necessary’, not an incompletely constituted trust	257
5.5	PERFECTING IMPERFECT GIFTS	265
5.5.1	Donatio mortis causa	265
5.5.2	The rule in Strong v Bird	266
5.5.3	Proprietary estoppel and the enforcement of promises	268
5.6	COVENANTS AND PROMISES TO CREATE A SETTLEMENT OVER AFTER-ACQUIRED PROPERTY	269
5.6.1	The problem of after-acquired property	269
5.6.2	To establish a trust the settlor must own the relevant property at the time of purporting to declare the trust	271
5.6.3	The enforceability of a promise under covenant	271
5.6.4	Trustees seeking to enforce a promise to settle after-acquired property	276
5.6.5	A summary of the principles discussed in this section	279

5.7 DISPOSITION OF EQUITABLE INTERESTS 280

- 5.7.1 The rule in s 53(1)(c) of the Law of Property Act 1925 280
- 5.7.2 Whether or not a transaction will fall within s 53(1)(c) 282
- 5.7.3 Transactions not within s 53(1)(c) 284
- 5.7.4 Declaration of a new trust by trustees or third party with dispositive powers 287
- 5.7.5 Were Grey v IRC and Vandervell v IRC decided correctly? 289
- 5.7.6 Sub-trusts 291
- 5.7.7 Declaration of new trust 292
- 5.7.8 Contractual transfer of equitable interest 295
- 5.7.9 Dispositions effected by trusts implied by law 296
- 5.7.10 Summary: analysing dispositions of equitable interests 297

OVERVIEW

A valid declaration of trust over personal property will not require any formality, provided that it can be demonstrated that the settlor intended to create an immediate trust over the property.¹ In relation to property to be made subject to a trust on death, in relation to trusts of land,² and in relation to certain other property, there will be statutory formalities to be satisfied before a valid trust will be created.

The settlor must have had proprietary rights in the trust property at the time of purporting to create the trust; it will not be sufficient that the settlor acquires those property rights at some subsequent time.³ For the effective constitution of the trust, the legal title in the trust fund must be transferred to the trustee.⁴

In cases of fraud, equity will not permit common law or statute to be used as an engine of fraud such that it may impose a trust even though there was no valid declaration of that trust.⁵

In cases where a property-holder has made an assurance to a claimant that she will acquire rights in that property, equitable estoppel will grant rights to that claimant if she can demonstrate that she has acted to her detriment in reliance on that assurance.⁶ The precise remedy awarded is at the discretion of the court and may be either proprietary or personal.

The trust will not be used to perfect an imperfect gift, on the basis that equity will not assist a volunteer.⁷ Where the intention was to make a gift, whether or not a gift was validly made will be decisive of the matter. The exceptions are as follows: cases of donatio mortis causa,⁸ executors of the estates of persons to whom they owed debts will be deemed to have those debts discharged by way of gift,⁹ the doctrine of proprietary

1 M'Fadden v Jenkyns (1842) 12 LJ Ch 146.

2 Law of Property Act 1925, s 53(1)(b).

3 Re Brook's ST [1939] 1 Ch 993.

4 Milroy v Lord (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

5 Rochevoucauld v Boustead [1897] 1 Ch 196; Lysy v Prowsa Developments Ltd [1982] 1 WLR 1044.

6 Gillett v Holt [2000] 2 All ER 289; Yaxley v Gotts [2000] 1 All ER 711.

7 Ibid.

8 Sen v Headley [1991] 2 WLR 1308.

9 Strong v Bird (1874) LR 18 Eq 315.

estoppel will operate to prevent detriment being suffered by those to whom a promise of gift was made; and cases of fraud, as above.

Where a promise is made under covenant to the effect that the settlor will settle property which is to be acquired in the future, there will not be a valid trust. A valid trust will only be created if the settlor owned property rights in the trust property at the time of purporting to declare the trust. Otherwise, only the parties to that covenant will be entitled to enforce the covenant at common law for damages, or in equity by specific performance if they have given consideration for the promise.¹⁰ Trustees who are parties to a covenant may not enforce that covenant,¹¹ unless the benefit of the covenant itself has been settled on trust.¹²

A disposition of an equitable interest must be effected by signed writing,¹³ unless both legal and equitable title pass together from the trust.¹⁴ Where a sub-trust is created, so that the beneficiary retains some office as sub-trustee, there is no disposition of the equitable interest – unless there is an outright assignment of that equitable interest.¹⁵ An agreement to transfer the equitable interest has been held to transfer the equitable interest automatically on the specific performance principle, without the need for signed writing.¹⁶

INTRODUCTION

This chapter considers a broad range of issues to do with the creation of valid express trusts. In the previous chapters, we considered the fundamental nature of the express trust and the necessity of introducing certainty to the trust and some of the powers of the beneficiary. This chapter does three things. First, it sets out some of the contexts in which there are specific formalities to be satisfied in relation to the creation of a trust. Secondly, it considers the mechanics of setting the trust in motion by the proper transfer of the legal title in the trust fund to the trustee. The third element is then analysing further the distinction between gifts and trusts, covenants and trusts, and the complex question of dispositions of an equitable interest.

5.1 SPECIFIC FORMALITIES IN THE CREATION OF TRUSTS

A valid declaration of trust over personal property will not require any formality, provided that it can be demonstrated that the settlor intended to create an immediate trust over the property. In relation to property to be made subject to a trust on death, in relation to trusts of land, and in relation to certain other property, there will be statutory formalities to be satisfied before a valid trust will be created.

This first section considers the means by which trusts are to be created where the trust fund is a particular form of property. The main distinctions are between trusts in relation to land

10 Cannon v Hartley [1949] Ch 213.

11 Re Pryce [1917] 1 Ch 234.

12 Fletcher v Fletcher (1844) 4 Hare 67.

13 Grey v IRC [1960] AC 1.

14 Vandervell v IRC [1967] 2 AC 291, HL.

15 Re Lashmar (1891) 1 Ch D 258.

16 Oughtred v IRC [1960] AC 206; Neville v Wilson [1997] Ch 144.

and trusts in relation to personal property, and between testamentary and inter vivos trusts. There are two stages which are important in the constitution of a trust: first, a valid declaration of trust; and, secondly, the transfer of the legal title in the trust property to the trustee.

5.1.1 Declaration of trust

The first issue is the means by which a trust will be declared. The appropriate formal requirements will depend on the nature of the property which is to be held on trust.

Declaration of trust on death

Where the trust is declared on the death of the settlor, by means of her will, there are formalities under s 9 of the Wills Act 1837 to be complied with. Section 9 provides that:

No will shall be valid unless –

- (a) it is in writing, and signed by the testator, or by some other person in his presence and by his direction; and
- (b) it appears that the testator intended by his signature to give effect to the will; and
- (c) the signature is made or acknowledged by the testator in the presence of two or more witnesses present at the same time; and
- (d) each witness either –
 - (i) attests and signs the will; or
 - (ii) acknowledges his signature, in the presence of the testator (but not necessarily in the presence of any other witness), but no form of attestation shall be necessary.

In short, the trust made under a will cannot be valid unless: it is in writing; it is signed by the testator; and it is also signed, or attested to, by two or more witnesses. Where these formalities are complied with, the will trust is valid. Failure to comply with these formalities will lead to a failure to create a valid will, or will trusts, and therefore the testator will die intestate.

Declaration of trust over land

There is a particular formality in relation to declarations of trust in respect of land. Section 53(1)(b) of the Law of Property Act 1925 provides that:

- (b) a declaration of trust respecting any land or any interest therein must be manifested and proved by some writing signed by some person who is able to declare such trust or by his will.

Briefly put, if a settlor wishes to declare a trust over land (or over any interest in some land, such as a lease or a beneficial right under a trust of land), then that declaration must be evidenced in written form and signed by someone who has a sufficient right in the property which is subject to the trust if it is effected inter vivos. Otherwise, a declaration of a testamentary trust over land must be created by means of a valid will.

Declaration of trust inter vivos over personal property

While there are formal requirements for the creation of trusts on death or in relation to land, there are no formalities required for an inter vivos trust of personalty.¹⁷ Therefore, to create a trust over chattels, it is sufficient that there is an oral declaration of trust disclosing sufficient intention to create a trust.¹⁸ There is, of course, always the practical difficulty of proving the existence of such a trust and of proving the terms on which the trust is created if that trust is not written down, because there will only be the testimony of witnesses on which the court can rely. This book is not, however, concerned with the law of evidence but rather with the types of action which will and will not create a valid express trust.

Many of the cases applicable in this area were considered above in relation to certainty of intention to create a trust, as considered in Chapter 3. In that chapter it was demonstrated that it is enough that the court can infer an intention to create a trust from the actions of the parties – there is not even a requirement that there be any particular form of words used to raise the finding of a trust. Thus, in Re Kayford,¹⁹ a company which conducted a mail order business required customers either to pay in advance in full for their goods, or to pay a deposit for those goods. The company's accountants advised the opening of a customers' trust deposit account and paid into it all money paid by customers for goods which had not yet been delivered. It was held that the action of setting up a distinct account for those payments constituted the creation of an express trust over those moneys, so that when the company went into liquidation, those customers who had paid into that account but who had not yet received their goods were held to be equitable owners of the contents of the account. It was held that 'the property concerned is pure personalty and so writing, though desirable, is not essential'. Therefore, there is a properly constituted trust without the need for a written declaration of trust.

Also considered earlier in Chapter 3 was the case of Paul v Constance,²⁰ in which the use of the words 'the money is as much yours as mine' in relation to money paid into a bank account held only in one party's name was found to be sufficient intention to create an express trust of the account over which the individuals were equitable tenants in common. The court found that surrounding circumstances, such as joint use of the money and a lack of sophistication of the people involved, contributed to the impression that the individuals had intended the creation of a trust.

Therefore, it is clear that in relation to personalty, a general intention to create an express trust will be sufficient to constitute a declaration of such a trust. The settlor is not required to use any particular form of words because the court will infer that intention from the circumstances of the case.

5.1.2 A completely constituted trust cannot be undone

There is an important principle of the law on express trusts which states that a trust is inviolate once it has been created, unless the settlor builds something to the contrary into the terms of the trust. This means that a settlor cannot cancel a trust, nor recover the trust

17 M'Fadden v Jenkyns (1842) 12 LJ Ch 146.

18 Paul v Constance [1977] 1 WLR 527.

19 [1975] 1 WLR 279.

20 [1977] 1 WLR 527.

property, once the trust has been validly created.²¹ Like so many of these rules of the law of trusts, it appears to have arisen at a time when trusts were being used primarily to effect large family settlements. When grand families succeeded in marrying their children off, they also negotiated the terms on which the property of each family would be made available to other relatives and descendants over time. There may have been situations in which the settlors may have decided that they preferred a trust to be cancelled if the marriage did not work, or there were no children, or the financial affairs of either family deteriorated. Nevertheless, once an inter vivos trust has been completely constituted, the settlor is not entitled to terminate it and recover the settled property, but rather the beneficiaries are entitled to enforce the trust. The beneficiaries have the right to enforce the trust even if they are volunteers. So, in Paul v Paul,²² a husband and wife contributed property to a marriage settlement which was to have benefited both themselves and other people. Their marriage failed and so both husband and wife, qua settlors, sought to unravel the settlement. However, it was held that the trust, once constituted, cannot be unwound. The only way in which such a termination would be possible would be under the principle in Saunders v Vautier,²³ where the beneficiaries would be entitled to terminate the trust and call for the delivery of the trust fund (as considered at section 4.2 above) but not the settlor acting qua settlor. If a settlor wanted to retain a power to cancel the trust then such a revocable trust is possible, provided that an explicit power to that effect is included in the trust instrument. This will have a tax effect in most situations.

5.2 THE PROPER CONSTITUTION OF A TRUST

For the effective constitution of a trust, there must have been a valid declaration of trust and the legal title in the trust fund must be transferred to the trustee, or the settlor must have declared herself to be trustee.

5.2.1 The general principle governing the constitution of trusts

For a trust to be effective, it is necessary that the settlor must have demonstrated an intention to declare a trust over property in which she had property rights at the time of declaring the trust, and it is also necessary that the person who is to act as trustee takes the legal title in the trust fund. The question for this section of this chapter then is understanding the means by which legal title in differing forms of property is transferred to the trustee. The following are some of the more common forms of property discussed in this book and the particular means of transferring legal title in them. The remainder of this chapter is then concerned with isolating those situations in which legal and equitable title are suitably transferred from settlor to trustee and beneficiary respectively, and more particularly the situations in which such transfer mechanisms interact with gifts, contract, bailment and so forth.

The most definitive statement of the need to vest the trust property in the trustee is given in Milroy v Lord,²⁴ where Turner LJ held that:

21 Paul v Paul (1882) 20 Ch D 742.

22 Ibid.

23 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

24 (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

in order to render a voluntary settlement valid and effectual, the settlor must have done everything which, according to the nature of the property comprised in the settlement, was necessary to be done in order to transfer the property [to the trustee] and render the settlement binding upon him. He may, of course, do this by actually transferring the property to the persons for whom he intends to provide, and the provision will then be effectual and it will be equally effectual if he transfers the property to a trustee for the purposes of the settlement, or declares that he himself holds it in trust for those purposes . . . but in order to render the settlement binding, one or other of these modes must, as I understand the law of this court, be resorted to, for there is no equity in this court to perfect an imperfect gift.

These dicta constitute the clearest statement of a comparatively straightforward principle that there can be no trust before legal title to the trust fund is transferred to the trustee. It should be remembered, however, that where the settlor intends to make herself sole trustee of the property, it is enough that she effects a valid declaration of trust because there is no need to transfer the legal title to another person. Therefore, if A wishes to create a trust such that she is herself trustee for the benefit of her children over property of which she is already the absolute owner, it is sufficient for her to declare herself trustee of that property and to declare that she holds it on trust for her children from that time forward because all title in the property is already vested in her.

5.2.2 The constitution of trusts over personal property

In relation to trusts of personalty, there are no formalities to be complied with before the trust fund is transferred to the trustee.²⁵ For shares to be transferred validly under statute such that a trustee is vested with the legal title in those shares, it is necessary that the shares be registered in the name of the trustee. In common with shares, copyrights and patents have their own particular formalities for the transfer of legal title in the property.

5.2.3 The constitution of trusts of land

As discussed above, declarations of trusts in relation to land must comply with s 53(1)(b) of the Law of Property Act 1925:

a declaration of trust respecting any land or any interest therein must be manifested and proved by some writing signed by some person who is able to declare such trust or by his will.

The settlor need not execute a deed necessarily to create such a trust, although that is the most advisable way of ensuring that a proper settlement is created. It is sufficient if there is some writing, signed by the settlor, which provides evidence that such a trust has been created. An alternative possibility is that the settlor settles the property in her will. Where the trust is created by means of resulting or constructive trust, the formalities do not apply.²⁶ It should also be recalled that any contract for the sale of land or of any interest in land must be effected in writing such that all of the terms of the contract are contained in one document.²⁷

²⁵ M'Fadden v Jenkyns (1842) 12 L.J. Ch 146; Milroy v Lord (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

²⁶ Law of Property Act 1925, s 53(2).

Once a trust has been created over land then the provisions of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996 govern the obligations of the trustees, the rights of the beneficiaries to occupy and otherwise deal with the land, and the circumstances in which a sale of the property can be ordered by the court. These provisions are considered in detail in Chapter 16.

The following section will consider the situations in which a claimant may seek to establish the existence of some equitable interest despite a failure to constitute the trust fund effectively.

5.2.4 The settlor must have a proprietary right in the trust property at the time of purporting to declare the trust

The settlor must have an appropriate interest in the trust property to create a valid trust

Before a settlor is able to create a valid trust over property, it is necessary that that settlor owns the proprietary rights in the property which she is purporting to settle on trust at the time of purporting to declare the trust. This point is made in Norman v Federal Commissioner of Taxation by Windeyer J²⁸ in the following way: ‘. . . it is impossible for anyone to own something that does not exist, it is impossible for anyone to make a present gift of such a thing to another person, however sure he may be that it will come into existence and will then be his to give’.

Just as a person cannot give something in which she has no interest, she cannot declare a trust over property in which she has no interest. At one level, it is clearly important that a person does not attempt to create a trust over property in which she has no interest at all. At another level, there is the problem posed by a settlor seeking to create a trust over property in which she expects to have a right at some point in the future. Similarly, it is said that a settlor cannot create a binding trust over property if the settlor does not have proprietary rights in that property at the time of purporting to create the trust. Importantly, a trust will not come into existence even if she does subsequently become entitled to that property.²⁹

To illustrate this principle there are two very useful cases made up of similar, but crucially different, facts which serve to show how an intention to transfer property will not necessarily lead to the implication of a trust. In Re Brooks’ ST,³⁰ there were two settlements over which a bank was trustee simultaneously. The beneficiary under one settlement, Arthur, had promised that any money he might receive from the first trust, over which his mother had a broad personal power of appointment, would be passed to the second trust. It is important that Arthur did not have any beneficial interest in the first settlement. Rather, he had a hope (or, a mere spes; or, a mere ‘expectancy’) that his mother would decide to exercise her wide power of appointment to pay money to him at some time in the future. He did not have beneficial rights which would have enabled him to sue his mother to enforce the transfer of 27 Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, s 2.

28 (1963) 109 CLR 9, 24.

29 Re Brooks’ ST [1939] 1 Ch 993.

30 Ibid.

money to him. In time it transpired that his mother did appoint money to him from the first trust. When the proceeds of the spes did arrive in Arthur's bank account, the bank effected an automatic transfer of that money in accordance with the promise which Arthur had made. Arthur sued the bank for the return of the money.

The issue arose whether or not Arthur had made a gift of the money. Clearly he had not. At the time of promising the money to the second trust, he had no rights in the money and he had not sanctioned the transfer to the account of the second trust when he did receive that money later. The further trusts law point was whether Arthur ought to be considered as having declared a trust over the money received from the first trust. It was held that there was only a mere spes at the time of the purported declaration of trust. Therefore, Arthur had had no proprietary rights at the time of purporting to settle that money over which he could have declared that trust. A mere spes is too insubstantial to be a property right.³¹ Therefore, no trust had been created by Arthur.

The further point raised before the court was that the trustee was therefore appearing to act as the settlor here. On the basis that Arthur had never created a valid trust over the money, the only person who could have purported to create that settlement was the trustee bank. It was held to be impossible for a trustee to declare the terms of a trust. It is for the settlor to declare the trust, and it is for the trustee to carry out the terms of that trust. Even where the trustee was also the person who acted as settlor, acting qua trustee that person cannot declare the terms of the trust. Therefore, no valid trust was ever created by Arthur and therefore the intended beneficiaries acquired no rights to compel Arthur to transfer the money received from his mother's power of appointment to their trustees.

A similar case is Re Ralli's WT,³² in which the facts were analogous with those in Re Brooks' ST. In Ralli, a daughter, Helen, had a remainder interest under a trust at the time when she purported to promise that any money received from that first trust would be settled on the second trust. The trustees were the same for both settlements and therefore those trustees sought to effect the promise automatically without waiting for Helen to ratify her earlier promise. Helen instead decided that she wanted to keep the money for herself after all. The question arose whether or not she was obliged to carry out her promise, and whether or not she had created a valid trust at the time of making that promise. The transfer and the new trusts were upheld, but the decision was per incuriam Re Brooks' ST. Despite Ralli having been decided in ignorance of Brooks, it is possible to reconcile the judgments in the following way.

It was held that, because Helen had a remainder interest at the time of the promise to settle the property, she had an equitable proprietary right in the trust fund. The rights of a remainder beneficiary will constitute an equitable proprietary right in the trust fund because, inter alia, such a remainder beneficiary has a right to ensure that the trustees do not favour the life tenant to the exclusion of the rights of the remainder beneficiary.³³ Therefore, Helen had some property right which could be the subject matter of a trust, which meant that she could 31 Under Tailby v Official Receiver (1888) 13 App Cas 523, if there had been a contract for the transfer of the expectancy whereby Arthur, on these facts, had received consideration from the beneficiaries, then the equitable interest in that property would pass to those beneficiaries once Arthur received it on the basis that 'equity looks upon as done that which ought to have been done'. See also Re Lind [1915] 2 Ch 345; Palette Shoes Pty Ltd v Krohn (1937) 58 CLR 1, 26; Re Androma Pty Ltd [1987] 2 Qd R 134, 152.

32 [1964] 1 Ch 288.

33 Tito v Waddell (No 2) [1977] Ch 106.

validly declare a trust over it. Consequently, it was held that the validly declared trust must be carried out by compelling Helen to transfer the money to the trustees of the second settlement. The subtle difference between the two cases turns on the nature of the right which the settlor had at the time of the purported declaration of trust to decide whether or not there had been a valid declaration of trust. That there was some property right vested in the settlor in Ralli compelled the trust to be carried out, in accordance with Paul v Paul,³⁴ unlike Re Brooks' ST.

This point is evident in a number of other decided cases. So, in Re Ellenborough,³⁵ a woman purported to declare a trust over property which she hoped to receive in the future. It was held that no trust was created because, at the time of the purported declaration of trust, she had no right in the property.

The alternative approach to this area of law might be to suggest that the settlor ought, in good faith, to be bound by her promise to create a trust over property. It is possible that if property is left for an extended period of time as though it were held validly on trust, equity may decide that (in accordance with the equitable principle that delay defeats equity) the settlor ought not to be entitled to unwind the trust. For example, in Re Bowden,³⁶ a woman purported in 1868 to settle on trust any property to which she might have been entitled when her father died before she entered a convent to take holy orders. It was held that no trust was created because she had no right to any property belonging to her father (who was alive at the time of the purported declaration of trust) and therefore could not create a trust over any such property. Remarkably, on these facts the woman had not objected when the property had been taken on trust by the intended trustees while she had become a nun. All the parties had then carried on with this arrangement for about 65 years. However, Bennett J held that when property had been transferred to the trustees after her father's death in 1869, the woman could not claim in 1935 to have the property returned to her because the property had been treated as effectively settled for a period of over 60 years. Other cases asserting like ideas are *Re Adlard*³⁷ and Re Burton's Settlements.³⁸

Alternative approaches to the requirement that the settlor must have had proprietary rights in the trust property at the time of purporting to declare the trust

There is one decided case in which a trust has been enforced contrary to the principle in Re Brooks' ST.³⁹ In Re Anstis,⁴⁰ it was accepted by Buckley J that a term providing that all the property falling within a covenant 'shall become in equity subject to the settlement hereby covenanted' would constitute a trust before any proprietary right was received by the settlor. It is contended that this judgment is anomalous and contrary to settled principle. It is only in cases of estoppel, as considered below,⁴¹ that such an arrangement could lead to the creation

34 (1882) 20 Ch D 742.

35 [1903] 1 Ch 697.

36 [1936] Ch 71.

37 [1954] Ch 29.

38 [1955] Ch 82.

39 [1939] 1 Ch 993.

40 (1886) 31 Ch D 596.

41 See para 5.5.3 below.

of a valid trust at a time when the purported settlor did not have any proprietary rights in the property.⁴²

It may be that the trustees are entitled to recover damages from the promisor. In Re Cavendish Browne,⁴³ a testatrix purported to declare a trust over land to which she was not entitled at the time of the declaration. She entered into a covenant with her trustees that she would settle the property once it was received. The testatrix failed to vest title in the trustees on receiving rights in the land. It was held that the trustees were entitled to damages for the breach of the covenant at common law in the amount of the value lost to the fund to have been held by the trustees.⁴⁴

5.3 EXCEPTIONS TO THE RULES OF FORMALITY

In cases of fraud, equity will not permit common law or statute to be used as an engine of fraud such that it may impose a trust even though there was no valid declaration of that trust. No formalities are required in relation to constructive trusts and resulting trusts under s 53(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925.

5.3.1 The operation of implied, resulting and constructive trusts

This section considers situations in which formalities are not required to invoke equitable doctrines akin to a trust. Any strict rule of formality is likely to generate unfortunate results in some circumstances. In relation to trusts law, the formal rules for the creation of express trusts may occasionally mean that no trust is created even though it would seem fair that there should be a trust. Consequently, equity has developed trusts implied by law, in the form of constructive trusts and resulting trusts, which will be imposed, broadly speaking, by the courts regardless of the need for formality to prevent unconscionable dealings with property, as considered in Part 4. Section 53(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925 creates an exception for trusts implied by law (whether resulting trusts or constructive trusts) from the rules as to a declaration of trust in relation to land and also the requirement for writing to effect a disposition of an equitable interest. It provides: ‘This section does not affect the creation or operation of resulting, implied or constructive trusts.’ Therefore, such trusts do not need formalities.

The courts may have recourse to such devices to prevent a defendant taking an unconscionable benefit where no formal trust was created.⁴⁵ The question of resulting trust is considered in detail in Chapter 11. There is an important overlap between the detail of the prevention of fraud doctrine and the occasional use of the resulting trust to prevent injustice. Thus, in Hodgson v Marks,⁴⁶ an elderly woman, Mrs Hodgson, was induced by her lodger, 42 The only means of ratifying this decision would be if the benefit of the covenant were deemed to be held on trust: Fletcher v Fletcher (1844) 4 Hare 67; see para 5.6.2 below.

43 [1916] WN 341.

44 See also Williamson v Codrington (1750) Belts Supp 215; Clough v Lambert (1839) 10 Sim 174; (1839) 59 ER 579; Davenport v Bishop (1843) 2 Y & C Ch Cas 451; Fletcher v Fletcher (1844) 4 Hare 67; Cox v Barnard (1850) 8 Hare 510; Re Parkin [1892] 3 Ch 510; Synge v Synge [1894] 1 QB 466; Re Plumtre’s Marriage Settlement [1910] 1 Ch 609.

45 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669, considered at section 12.1 below.

46 [1971] 2 WLR 1263.

Evans, to transfer the title in her house into his sole name. The motivation on her part had been to protect Evans, for whom she felt sorry, from her nephew who despised Evans (rightly it turned out) and who had expressed his intention to be to ensure that Evans received nothing after her death. There was an agreement between Mrs Hodgson and Evans that Evans would hold the property in such a way that Mrs Hodgson would be able to occupy it for the rest of her life, but importantly no formality for the creation of an express trust over land had been effected. Subsequently, Evans sold the property to a third party and disappeared with the proceeds.

The question arose as to whether the third party purchaser, who had acted in good faith, should acquire the property, or whether the old woman could maintain that the property was held on trust for her. It was held that the property was held on resulting trust for the elderly woman in accordance with her prior agreement with Evans. Thus, justice is seen to be done in relation to Mrs Hodgson, who would otherwise have lost her home to a confidence trickster, although perhaps not in relation to the third-party purchaser of the property, who had no reason to suppose he would not acquire good title.⁴⁷ It is, however, unsatisfactory that a resulting trust (as opposed to a constructive trust or estoppel) was used to grant her this right.

Therefore, in the imposition of express trusts, as with trusts implied by law, there are mixed issues of achieving justice and demonstrating an entitlement to specific property. The common root of all of these institutions in the conscience of the common law owner frequently leads to the courts deciding either to find an express trust on comparatively flimsy evidence,⁴⁸ or seeking to prevent the common law owner from acting unconscionably by means of a constructive trust even though there is ostensibly a common intention as to title in the property found on the facts.⁴⁹ Thus, to return to the core purpose of equity to mitigate unfairnesses which may be wrought by statute, such trusts implied by law will lead to the imposition of a form of trust without the need for formalities.

More usually, constructive trusts or proprietary estoppel are used by the courts in these situations. As considered in Chapter 12, if a defendant deals unconscionably with another's property, then the defendant will hold that property on constructive trust for the claimant.⁵⁰ Alternatively, where a defendant makes a representation to a claimant in reliance on which that claimant acts to her detriment, then the claimant will be entitled to a proprietary right or compensation on proprietary estoppel principles, as considered in Chapter 13.⁵¹

5.3.2 Fraud and unconscionability

The second context in which the creation of a trust without recourse to formality is important is fraud. This doctrine is a little more difficult to reconcile with the law of express trusts. The core equitable principle which is applicable in this circumstance is that 'statute cannot be used as an engine of fraud'. What this means is that a person will be precluded from relying 47 This principle is contrary to the ordinary rule that a bona fide purchaser for value without notice would acquire good title in the property bought: Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669. Cf Swadling, 2000.

48 Paul v Constance [1977] 1 WLR 527.

49 Hodgson v Marks [1971] 2 WLR 1263, although that case did relate to land with its own formalities.

50 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669, considered at section 12.1 below.

51 Re Basham [1986] 1 WLR 1498; Gillett v Holt [2000] 2 All ER 289.

on her common law or statutory rights where to do so would enable her to carry out a fraud on another person.

This principle cuts to the very heart of the trust concept as an essentially equitable doctrine. If a trustee, the legal owner of property, were able to rely on her common law rights to the exclusion of all other obligations, this would enable her to misuse the property held on trust for the beneficiary. Where Xavier is trustee of land held on trust for Yasmin and Zena, Xavier is able as legal owner to take out a mortgage over land. Suppose then that Xavier purports to keep the loan money raised by way of mortgage for his own benefit, and refuses to make any of the repayments. The result would be that the mortgagee would repossess the land to discharge the loan. According to common law, the mortgagor Xavier is the owner of the loan moneys. However, equity will prevent Xavier from relying on that common law title to prevent Yasmin and Zena from asserting any rights over the mortgage moneys on the basis that common law would otherwise be used as an engine of fraud by Xavier. Therefore, this principle is at the heart of preventing trustees from misusing trust property and is also primarily concerned with imposing trustee obligations on fraudsters.

The clearest exposition of the rule was in Rochefoucauld v Boustead,⁵² where P was a mortgagor of property which was sold by the mortgagee to D. D had orally agreed to hold the property on trust for P, subject to the repayment to D of the purchase price. However, D sold the land at a higher price to a third-party purchaser, but did not then account for the surplus in the sale proceeds to P. D then became bankrupt. The issue arose whether or not P could assert any right in the money which ought to have been paid to him by D but which had not been so paid. It was held that ‘... it is a fraud on the part of the person to whom land is conveyed as a trustee, and who knows it was so conveyed, to deny the trust and claim the land himself’. Here, parol (that is, oral) evidence was used to prove that the land was conveyed upon trust when D agreed that the property would be held on trust for P. Although there had not been a formal declaration of trust over the land, the court was determined to prevent a situation in which D would have been able to avoid the parties’ common understanding that the land was to have been held on trust for P. Therefore, the court deemed there to be a valid trust to avoid the perpetration of a fraud.

The principle is similarly demonstrated in Lys v Prowsa Developments,⁵³ where A sold land to B on the express understanding that B would hold the land on trust to give effect to a licence conferred by A on C. It was held, applying the principle against common law rights being used as an engine of fraud, that C acquired enforceable rights under trust against B to compel B to carry out the terms of that trust. In similar vein, it was held in *Bannister v Bannister*⁵⁴ that ‘[t]he fraud which brings the principle into play arises as soon as the absolute character of the conveyance is set up for the purpose of defeating the beneficial interest’. Therefore, the principle against permitting common law rights to be used as an engine of fraud is concerned to protect the person who is intended to receive the beneficial interest in that property, as well as to regulate the conscience of the common law owner of property.⁵⁵

52 [1897] 1 Ch 196.

53 [1982] 1 WLR 1044.

54 [1948] WN 261.

55 See Chaudhary v Yavuz [2011] EWCA Civ 1314 considering this decision.

On this point, the court in *Gardner v Rowe*⁵⁶ held that a trust is unenforceable but not void in the period of time between the verbal declaration of trust and the writing necessary to satisfy the formalities for the creation of a trust. In that case, A had granted a lease to B on oral trusts for C. Such a trust over an interest in land required evidence in writing for it to be formally valid.⁵⁷ B then became bankrupt, but B executed a deed stating the terms of the trust on which the property was to have been held. It was held by the court, against the creditors in the bankruptcy, that there had been a valid declaration of trust prior to B's bankruptcy, such that his creditors had no claim to the lease. It should be noted that under the Rochevoucauld doctrine, B was bound by the terms of the trust from the time he took the lease. So, if instead A orally declared himself trustee of the land for C and provided written evidence only after his own bankruptcy, he would not be bound by the trust until the written evidence of that declaration. Therefore, his creditors would have had a claim to the land.⁵⁸

The principle identified in this section is in line with the core principles of equity outlined in Chapter 1 that equity will act in personam against a person who would otherwise be permitted to commit an unconscionable act by the strict application of common law rules. Furthermore, this principle in relation to the creation of express trusts is in line with the principle set out by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in *Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC*⁵⁹ that the essential nature of the trust is its regulation of the conscience of the common law owner of property.

5.4 IMPROPERLY CONSTITUTED TRUSTS AND IMPERFECT GIFTS

The trust will not be implied so as to perfect an imperfect gift, on the basis that equity will not assist a volunteer. Where the intention was to make a gift, whether or not a gift was validly made will be decisive of the matter. The exceptions are as follows: cases of donatio mortis causa; executors of the estates of persons to whom they owed debts will be deemed to have those debts discharged by way of gift; the doctrine of proprietary estoppel will operate to prevent detriment being suffered by those to whom a promise of gift was made; and cases of fraud.

5.4.1 Introduction

As considered in section 5.2 above, for a trust to be properly constituted, it is necessary for the three certainties to be present when the settlor purports to declare the trust⁶⁰ and also for the legal title in the trust property to be vested in the trustees.⁶¹ If these requirements are not met, then there is no valid trust created. This section considers those situations in which a trust has not been properly created and yet a claimant argues that there ought to be an effective trust nevertheless.

56 (1828) 4 Russ 578.

57 Law of Property Act 1925, s 53(1)(b).

58 This is always assuming that C had not acted to his detriment with reference to the land, thus claiming rights under proprietary estoppel: considered below at para 5.5.3.

59 [1996] AC 669.

60 The certainties of intention, subject matter and objects considered in Chapter 3.

61 See para 5.3.1 above.

There are two general situations in which this issue might arise. The first situation is that in which a person who was intended to be a beneficiary under a failed trust may seek to argue that the settlor who failed to create a valid trust is bound by good conscience to give effect to the intended beneficiaries' expectations that a trust would be created in their favour. So, even if the settlor fails to constitute a valid trust, the intended beneficiary may seek to argue that equity should provide her with property rights in the fund which was to have been settled on trust in any event.

The second situation arises when a person intends to make a gift of property but either changes her mind or fails to effect a transfer of that property to the intended recipient. The question, therefore, is whether an intention to make a gift of property (as opposed to a trust) can be enforced by arguing that the donor of the property is a trustee of that property on the grounds that it would otherwise be unconscionable for her to renege on her promise to make that gift. An intention to declare a trust arises in circumstances in which there is a division in the ownership of property between the legal title and the equitable interest in the manner considered in Chapter 2. By contrast, an intention to make a gift involves an intention to effect a transfer of absolute title in property from the owner of absolute title in that property ('the donor') to another person ('the donee'). The donor owes no fiduciary obligations to the donee in ordinary circumstances and the donee acquires no rights in the property until the transfer of absolute title takes effect. So, if Bernard promises to make a gift to Mani but then changes his mind, Mani may argue that in good conscience Bernard ought to be obliged to transfer the property and consequently Mani may argue that equitable title in the property should have passed on trust to Mani. However, equity will not assist someone who is the recipient of a benefit for which she has not given consideration unless there has been a validly constituted trust.⁶² This rule is known as the principle that equity will not assist a volunteer. The best example of a volunteer in this context would be someone who expects to receive a gift but who has no proprietary rights in that gift and who has given no consideration for that gift. That equity will not assist a volunteer means that equity will not force the donor of the gift to make that gift if the donor decides not to make it.⁶³

To explain the type of situation in which these issues may arise, consider the following set of facts:

Young Joey, aged six, is waiting for Christmas. It is November and he has been told by his mother that he must be good or else Santa Claus will not bring him any presents. Joey behaves himself impeccably in the lead-up to Christmas. He keeps his room tidy, helps his mother to wash up (when he remembers) and does all his homework. He therefore has every expectation that he will receive the football boots for which he has asked.

However, if his mother decides not to give him the pair of football boots which he has thirsted after for so long, then Joey has no legal remedy. Equity will not help him if he has given no consideration for those boots because as such he would be a mere volunteer. As will be considered below, if he had contributed to the purchase price, or possibly acted to his

62 Re Brooks' ST [1939] 1 Ch 993.

63 This rule indicates the increasing rigidity of the law concerning express trusts, which makes them appear to be more like contracts than the flexible equitable remedies from which they were born.

detriment in a meaningful way, then there would be a possibility of acquiring proprietary rights on equitable estoppel principles.⁶⁴

Much of the discussion in this section returns to the discussion in Chapter 3 concerning the necessary intention to create a trust.⁶⁵ In those cases it was held that the intention of the transferor must be to create a trust. A general intention to benefit some other person will not be enough to create a trust. As held by Lord Jessel MR in Richards v Delbridge:⁶⁶

the settlor need not use the words ‘I declare myself a trustee’ but he must do something which is equivalent to it and use expressions which have meaning; for however anxious the court may be to carry out a man’s intention, it is not at liberty to construe words other than according to their proper meaning.

As considered above, the courts will be prepared to infer an intention to create a trust in many situations, but they will not infer an intention to create a trust over property in circumstances in which the transferor actually intended to make an outright transfer of that property. So in *Milroy v Lord*⁶⁷ (as outlined above), Turner LJ held that:

... to render the settlement binding, one or other of these modes [of transferring property to the trustee] must, as I understand the law of this court, be resorted to, for there is no equity in this court to perfect an imperfect gift.

Therefore, a claimant cannot rely on the law of trusts to effectuate an incomplete gift. However, as considered immediately below, there are situations in which equity may decide that it is contrary to conscience for the intended recipient to be denied any interest in the property.

5.4.2 Trusts and imperfect gifts

How do we decide whether an action of a transferor is to be classified as a trust or as something which is merely an imperfect gift? In general terms, it is not open to someone who wishes to show that they should have received title in property to argue that they are a beneficiary under a trust in circumstances in which they were expecting to be the recipient of a gift which was never completed.⁶⁸ There is a temptation for a lawyer attempting to enforce a gift which has not been made properly to argue that the donor in fact intended to create a trust over the property. So, for example, what if A intended to make a gift of 20 ordinary shares in SAFC plc to B but failed to register those shares in B’s name, thus leaving the gift improperly made? B might seek to argue that A had intended to transfer those shares to B and therefore that A should be treated as having declared herself trustee over those shares for the benefit of B. A core rule of the English law of express trusts is that equity will not permit an action which was intended to be a gift to be validated by deeming

64 See para 5.5.3 below.

65 Jones v Lock (1865) 1 Ch App 25; Paul v Constance [1977] 1 WLR 527.

66 (1874) LR 18 Eq 11.

67 (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

68 Ibid.

it to be a trust instead.⁶⁹ Therefore, in terms of vesting the trust property in the trustee, that a donor who fails to complete the gift already has legal title in that property will not suffice to demonstrate that that intended donor should be deemed to be a trustee of that property. Remember, this is still in the context of express trusts – we will consider trusts implied by law in Part 4 below.

5.4.3 The rule that equity will not assist a volunteer and its impact on imperfect gifts

Equity will not assist a volunteer. This principle means that equity will not assist a person to acquire rights if that person has not given consideration so as to acquire rights under contract: a ‘volunteer’ is a person who has not given consideration. The issue we shall consider in this section is whether or not a failure to make a complete, perfect gift can be rescued by deeming a trust to have been created over the property in question instead. Strictly speaking, beneficiaries under trusts will not have given consideration: however, equity assists beneficiaries once there has been a valid declaration of trust in their favour. Importantly, however, in relation to a mere promise to settle property at some point in the future, there will not have been any consideration given for the promise nor will a valid trust have been created because the intention here is merely a promise to create a trust in the future. Whereas, if consideration had been given in return for that promise then there would have been a contract created. Our limited concern for the moment is whether or not a failure to make a perfect gift can be saved by construing it instead to have been an intention to create a trust.

In the leading case in this area, Milroy v Lord,⁷⁰ a voluntary deed executed by Milroy purported to assign 50 shares to Samuel Lord upon trust for Milroy’s benefit and in remainder to specified relatives (including the claimant). Lord was already acting as Milroy’s agent under a general power of attorney (a fact which the claimant alleged made it seem as though Lord was already acting as a trustee). However, no transfer of the shares was registered in the company’s books, as was required by the formalities for transferring shares under the law at the time; with the result that Milroy remained the legal owner of those shares and Lord acquired no legal title in them so as to make him a properly constituted trustee. Before a valid transfer could have taken place, this registration formality had to be complied with. This requirement of re-registration was the obligation of the transferor to complete before a transfer could be effective. The claimant sought to establish that a trust had been declared and that he had thereby acquired an equitable proprietary right in the shares. It was held that an ineffective transfer does not constitute a declaration of trust without there being a clear intention to create a trust in that way. Furthermore, to render a voluntary settlement valid and effectual, the settlor must have done everything which was necessary to be done to transfer the property and render the settlement binding upon him. That transfer must be performed in the manner appropriate for the property concerned. On these facts, no such transfer had been effected because the shares had not been re-registered and therefore no trust had been validly effected because legal title had not passed to the intended trustee. Therefore, one cannot try to argue for an express trust on the general basis of good conscience or failed gift if the settlor failed to vest legal title in the property in the trustee.

⁶⁹ Ibid.

⁷⁰ (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

The decision of the Court of Appeal in that case was encapsulated in the following central statement of the law in this area (mentioned above but repeated here for ease of reference), when Turner LJ held that:⁷¹

in order to render a voluntary settlement valid and effectual, the settlor must have done everything which, according to the nature of the property comprised in the settlement, was necessary to be done in order to transfer the property and render the settlement binding upon him . . . but in order to render the settlement binding, one or other of these modes [outright transfer, declaration of self as trustee, or transfer of property to a third party as trustee] must, as I understand the law of this court, be resorted to, for there is no equity in this court to perfect an imperfect gift. The cases, I think, go further to this extent: that if the settlement is intended to take effect by transfer, the court will not give effect to it by applying another of those modes. If it is intended to take effect by transfer, the court will not hold the intended transfer to operate as a declaration of trust, for then every imperfect instrument would be made effectual by being converted into a perfect trust.

Therefore, the court is adamant that a frustrated intention to make a gift will not be saved by re-interpreting it as an intention to create a trust.⁷² This strict rule ensures an element of certainty in the law. Otherwise, the intention to create a trust might become a very vague notion which would be effectively moribund and available to perfect any imperfect gift. However, the doctrine has been applied more creatively in some of the more modern decisions considered below.

5.4.4 ‘Doing everything necessary’, not an incompletely constituted trust

The principle in Re Rose

An issue arises in relation to the situation in which the donor has done everything necessary to transfer title in the property to another person but where that outright transfer (or, gift) has nevertheless not been completed. The question is: if the donor has performed all the acts necessary to be performed by her to complete the making of a gift, should the donor have been deemed to hold that property on trust for the intended donee from that moment of completing the necessary acts? It was held in *Re Rose*⁷³ that if the donor has done everything necessary for her to do to make the gift, then equity will deem an equitable interest in the relevant property to have passed automatically, even if the donee is a volunteer. This principle, it is suggested, is an exception to the rule that equity will not assist a volunteer, as considered in the previous section. This exception is considered in detail in the following section.

⁷¹ Ibid.

⁷² Milroy v Lord was followed more recently in Canada in Marquis-Antle Spousal Trust v R 2009 TCC 465, 12 ITELR 314 where a taxpayer sought to avoid capital gains tax by using a discretionary trust in Barbados but it was held that no valid trust was created inter alia because legal title was not vested in the trustee.

⁷³ [1952] Ch 499.

The exception to the principle that equity will not assist a volunteer: doing everything necessary to transfer title

If a donor has done everything necessary for her to do to transfer title in property by way of gift, then an equitable interest in that property will pass even if the donor fails to complete all of the formalities necessary to complete that transfer. Confusingly, there are two separate cases in this area called Re Rose.⁷⁴ There are significant differences in the facts of those cases which enabled the courts to apply the rules quoted from *Milroy v Lord*⁷⁵ above to different effect. It is important to understand the narrow factual differences between Milroy v Lord and the two Re Rose cases, which can be the only reasonable explanation for the different decisions reached in those three cases. In Milroy, the agent had not completed all of the formalities necessary to achieve a transfer of the property; in Re Rose (1952),⁷⁶ Lord Evershed held that all of the actions necessary to be taken by the transferor to effect a valid transfer had been carried out, such that the court considered that it would have been against conscience for the donor to have sought to renege on his intention to make a transfer of the property.

In Re Rose (1949),⁷⁷ the testator had purportedly made bequests of shares in favour of a man called Hook, provided that Hook had not received those shares by transfer before Rose's death. Mr Rose had executed a voluntary transfer in respect of the shares which he had given to Hook: this transfer form constituted everything required of Rose to transfer the shares, but was not a completion of the transfer because there were further formalities to be performed by the company. The issue was whether the transfer of shares to Hook had taken effect under the ineffective inter vivos transfer form or under the terms of the will. As mentioned, the completion of this transfer form was the only formality which Mr Rose was required to carry out as transferor; however, the company's articles of association gave the board of directors power to refuse to register the transfer of shares. Therefore, the transfer was not complete until the board approved it. On the facts of Re Rose (1949), it was important for Hook to demonstrate that the transfer had taken effect before Rose's death to ensure its validity. The counter-argument was that there had been no transfer until ratification by the board of directors, and that there could be no suggestion of an express trust having been created because that would be to give effect to the intended bequest by other means not intended by the transferor.

However, Jenkins J held that because Mr Rose 'had done everything in his power to divest himself of the shares in question', the shares should be treated as having been passed to the legatee by the transfer and only perfected by registration. That Mr Rose could not have unwound the transfer once he had filled in the transfer form impressed the court that equitable title should be deemed to have passed.

In Re Rose (1952),⁷⁸ the registered owner of shares executed two share transfers, one in favour of his wife absolutely by way of gift and the other in favour of two people (including his wife) on trust. The shares were in a private company, which empowered the board of 74 [1949] Ch 78 and [1952] Ch 499.

75 (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

76 [1952] Ch 499.

77 [1949] Ch 78.

78 [1952] Ch 499.

directors to object to the transfer of shares. Again, the transferor had completed all the formalities required of him; only ratification by the board of directors remained before the transfer was complete. The date of transfer was again important so that Rose's estate could demonstrate that the voluntary transfer had succeeded in passing an equitable interest in the shares to attract a lower rate of tax than would otherwise have been payable if the transfer had not taken effect until the date of ratification by the board. The argument for the Inland Revenue was that there was no transfer until ratification, as provided by company law, and that there could be no suggestion of an express trust having been created because that would be to give effect to the intended bequest by means not intended by the transferor.

The Court of Appeal in Re Rose (1952)⁷⁹ approved the decision in Re Rose (1949)⁸⁰ and held that the equitable interest in the shares had been transferred as soon as the transferor had completed all of the formalities which he was required to complete. The court sought to distinguish the case of Re Fry,⁸¹ in which an American had been held to have failed to create a trust where he had filled in a transfer form in relation to shares in a private company but had not received the required consent of the Treasury to effect a valid transfer of those shares. In Re Rose, Jenkins J sought to suggest that the purported settlor in Fry had not done everything necessary to divest himself of the shares. However, it is difficult to see exactly which element remained outstanding in Fry which similarly had not been completed in Rose.

Understanding the principle at issue

A further complication is the rule which is derived from Re Rose (1952) on the basis that a trust (of some description) was created by transfer of the equitable interest in the property from the husband to his wife once he had done everything necessary for him to do to transfer the property. Lord Evershed's judgment was couched in the language of gift and not trust: his Lordship referred throughout to 'donor', 'donee' and 'gift' rather than to 'trust' or 'trustee'. Therefore, it is not immediately apparent how this judgment is authority for a proposition based on the law of trust. A partial answer is offered by Lord Evershed's explanation as to how title passed to Mrs Rose from her husband when he argued that after Mr Rose had purported to transfer title to his wife by doing everything necessary for him to do, it would have been inequitable for him to have reneged on that promise:

if Mr Rose had received a dividend between [completion of the document and consent being granted by the board of directors] and Mrs Rose had claimed to have that dividend handed to her, what would Mr Rose's answer have been? It could no longer be that the purported gift was imperfect; it had been made perfect. I am not suggesting that the perfection was retroactive. But what else could he say? How could he . . . deny the proposition that he had . . . transferred the shares to his wife? . . . therefore the transfer was valid and effectual in equity from March 30, 1943, and accordingly the shares were not assessable for estate duty.

Therefore, it was argued that Mr Rose would have been compelled to hand over the dividend if one had been received between the time when he had done everything necessary for him to do to transfer title and the date at which the company formally consented to the transfer of the shares. The reason why he is so compelled is not immediately obvious from these dicta. In the language of the 21st century, we would explain it as being contrary to good conscience for Mr Rose to refuse to acknowledge that an equitable interest had passed and in consequence that a constructive trust had been created over the shareholding. It is suggested that Re Rose should be understood as being either a constructive trust or a general equitable principle, but not an express trust.

⁷⁹ Ibid.

⁸⁰ [1949] Ch 78.

⁸¹ [1946] Ch 312.

Conceptually different applications of the Re Rose principle

Despite the conceptual difficulties identified with the Re Rose principle in the preceding paragraph, this decision has been followed in numerous other cases.⁸² In T Choithram International SA v Pagarani,⁸³ a man lying on his deathbed sought to declare an inter vivos trust over his property. The settlor's intention was that he would be one of nine trustees over that property. However, the dead man failed to transfer legal title in the property to all nine trustees and, as a consequence, under the ordinary law of trusts, the trust would not have been validly constituted. Nevertheless, it was held that a valid trust was created over that property even though the deceased person had not transferred the legal title in the trust property to all nine trustees as trustees. The rationale given by the court was that the Rose principle could be applied so that the settlor could be taken to have done all that was necessary to create a trust and therefore that the equitable interest in his property should be taken to have passed automatically.

Subsequently, the Court of Appeal in Pennington v Waine has applied this principle (in following Choithram) so as to perfect a gift of shares in circumstances in which the donor had neither effected a declaration of trust over the shares nor done everything which was necessary for her to do to effect a transfer of the shares.⁸⁴ Here Ada Crampton wanted to transfer 400 shares in a private company to her nephew, Harold, and to have Harold made a director of that company. Ada completed a share transfer form which she sent to her accountant, Pennington, but Pennington failed to forward this form either to the company or to Harold. Consequently, due to the failure to deliver the form, no transfer of the shares was made to Harold. Ada subsequently signed a form consenting to Harold becoming a director of the company but by her will she transferred him insufficient shares for Harold to have a controlling shareholding in the company. If Ada had transferred the 400 shares to Harold before her death, then Harold would have had such a controlling interest in the company. It was held by Arden LJ (with whom Schiemann LJ agreed) that an equitable interest in those shares passed to Harold because it was considered that it would have been unconscionable for Ada to have refused to transfer those shares to Harold, whereas it was held by Clarke LJ that it was not necessary to have delivered the form to the company because the transfer took effect as an equitable assignment. It was clearly the view of the Court of Appeal that it had remained Ada's intention throughout her life to transfer these 400 shares to Harold and this influenced their Lordships' decision.

82 Vandervell v IRC [1967] 2 AC 291, HL; Mascall v Mascall (1984) 50 P & CR 119; Brown & Root Technology v Sun Alliance and London Assurance Co [1996] Ch 51. See also Corin v Patton (1990) 169 CLR 540.

83 T Choithram International SA v Pagarani [2001] 1 WLR 1. See also M Halliwell [2003] The Conveyancer 192.

84 Pennington v Waine [2002] 1 WLR 2075.

The decision in Pennington v Waine extends the Re Rose principle beyond its former boundaries where it could be demonstrated that the donor had indeed done everything necessary for her to have done to finalise the transfer. In Pennington v Waine, Clarke LJ accepted that the principle operated in general terms and that the equity identified by the Court of Appeal in *Re Rose*⁸⁵ was capable of such general application. It has been suggested that the Rose principle can be understood as being part of the more general principle that a court of equity should not be officious in defeating a gift.⁸⁶ So we might understand this to mean that the intention of the court in Pennington v Waine was to effect a gift and because courts of equity should not strike down gifts too eagerly, then the Rose principle could be extended so as to protect this gift.

However, in Pennington v Waine, there was not even such a concatenation of circumstances as there was in Re Rose, in that there had not been completion of all of the formalities necessary for the transferor to have performed. No completion of the necessary formalities had taken place on those facts. As such, the ordinary law of gift requires that the disponor be able to change her mind and to refuse to transfer the property, provided she does so before effecting the transfer. It is suggested that equity should not compel the transfer for two reasons. First, at what point should equity consider that it would be unconscionable for the disponor to recant her intention to make the gift? Could it be after she has told the other person of her intention to make the gift,⁸⁷ or when the property has been put in a condition so that it would be possible to transfer it (such as wrapping it or separating it from other property),⁸⁸ or when some of the legal formalities necessary for the transfer have been considered,⁸⁹ or when all of the legal formalities have been performed to effect the transfer?⁹⁰ In line with principle, it can only be on the happening of that last of these four possibilities that an equitable interest in the property can be said to pass, because that is the only approach which complies with Re Rose itself and because up until that point the donor would be able to renege on her intention to make the gift at common law. Secondly, the disponor had not performed all of the formalities necessary for her to perform to effect a transfer of absolute title in the property: therefore, equity is purporting to transfer an equitable interest in circumstances in which there has not been a transfer of title at common law nor a specifically enforceable transfer of such title and at a time when the recipient of the property is a mere volunteer.⁹¹ A third point arises under company law: it is not clear – assuming the directors

85 [1952] Ch 499.

86 T Choithram International SA v Pagarani [2001] 1 WLR 1; Pennington v Waine [2002] 1 WLR 2075.

87 This cannot be the appropriate point in time because a person who is made a promise without giving consideration is a volunteer without any rights to compel the performance of the promise (absent proprietary estoppel).

88 Again, this cannot be the appropriate point in time because there is not necessarily the appropriate intention to make a gift of that property simply because it would be possible for the property to be transferred.

89 This cannot be the point given that by definition all of the necessary formalities have not yet been performed.

90 At last . . . I think we have reached it.

91 As a point of company law, it is not clear – assuming the directors or other shareholders have some right to resist the registration of the new shareholder – on what basis equity could recognise that title had passed to the claimant on the basis that the defendant had done everything necessary to transfer title (because at that time the claimant would be able to exercise Saunders v Vautier rights to compel the transfer of absolute title to herself) when under company law the board of directors retains the right to prohibit that transfer at all. Under the principle nemo dat quod non habet, the defendant could not claim to have such a title which could be passed to the claimant.

or other shareholders have some right to resist the registration of the new shareholder – on what basis equity could recognise that title had passed to the claimant on the basis that the defendant had done everything necessary to transfer title. Once equitable title is deemed to have passed the claimant would be able to exercise Saunders v Vautier rights to compel the transfer of absolute title to herself. However, under company law a board of directors with this power to refuse to ratify a transfer of shares prohibit that transfer.⁹² This prohibition might be exercised by a board of directors precisely because they want to prevent a given person from acquiring shares in the company – for example to prevent a hostile takeover. Therefore, equity is subverting fundamental principles of company law by deeming an automatic transfer of property rights in shares when the company itself may still be entitled to resist that transfer at common law.

Similarly, in T Choithram International SA v Pagarani,⁹³ we have an unfortunate situation in which a deceased settlor – who could not therefore amend the nature of his affairs – failed properly to constitute the trust. That, it seems to me, could well have been an end of the matter. In such situations, of course, the court will prefer to give effect to the dead person's intentions rather than have a trust over particularly valuable property lapse into residue so as to benefit residuary legatees who were intended only to take any scraps left over from the administration of the dead person's estate and not to receive a large windfall in the form of property which the dead person had thought he had transferred elsewhere in his lifetime. In this vein, Lord Browne-Wilkinson held that '[a]lthough equity will not aid a volunteer, it will not strive officiously to defeat a gift'.⁹⁴ So, this is what the court is really doing, it seems to me, when it interpolates an equitable compulsion to deem property to have passed on the Rose principle in flat contradiction of the common law of gift: it is trying to give effect to a dying man's wish in spite of the technical rules. Nevertheless, on a literal interpretation of the principle in Milroy v Lord, it is not possible to support an incompletely constituted trust or to rescue a gift by another, artificial means. The dead man had not constituted the trust by transferring the legal title in the property to the trustees and so no trust had been properly created. Equity, however, will frequently find a way to produce a convenient answer in spite of the technical rules.

A return to the mainstream approach

A level of common sense has been re-introduced to this area of law by two recent decisions on the Re Rose principle. Whereas the courts in Pagarani and Pennington had both sought to find the Re Rose principle satisfied on the strictly incomplete facts in front of them, these recent decisions have returned to the ostensible strictness of the principle such that, even though the propositus had not been demonstrated to have changed his mind about making a transfer, the court would not find a transfer of the equitable interest if some act which that 92 This depends upon the nature of the company and the provisions of its articles of associations. By contrast, public companies which have their shares traded on the London Stock Exchange and which are entered on the Official List must ensure that their shares are freely transferable. It is commonly in relation to private companies that such provisions would be a part of the articles of association so as to prevent outsiders interfering with the company's affairs.

93 T Choithram International SA v Pagarani [2001] 1 WLR 1. See also M Halliwell [2003] The Conveyancer 192.

94 [2001] 2 All ER 492, 501.

person had been required to perform had not actually been performed. So, in *Kaye v Zeital*⁹⁵ the Court of Appeal refused to accept a finding at first instance that a transfer had taken effect even though the purported transferor had failed to do everything necessary for him to do. In that case the purported transferor had not provided the purported transferee with the share certificate nor any other documentation which, in relation to that company, she required to demonstrate that a valid transfer had been made in her favour.

In Curtis v Pulbrook,⁹⁶ Briggs J took the sensible approach that where a man had failed to transfer shares to his wife and daughter because he had not completed the transfer process, then the Re Rose principle could not be relied upon. His intention had been to make a gift of the shares, and yet he had neither completed a share transfer form nor sent the share certificates to the intended recipients. He then deposited documents which related to the shares in this company with his solicitors before leaving the UK to live with his new partner in Thailand; those documents did not contain a completed share transfer form. Therefore, at no stage had he done everything necessary for him to do to effect a transfer of the property. Furthermore, he had not been authorised to effect transfer of this sort to his wife and daughter in any event. Consequently, it was held that the principle in Re Rose had not been satisfied on these facts.⁹⁷ Moreover, it was held that there could not be a constructive trust because there was no evidence that the wife and daughter had suffered any detriment in these circumstances: although it is suggested that it is not clear that detriment is required for a constructive trust, so much as unconscionable activity on the part of the defendant trustee.⁹⁸ Briggs J did express the following view about the earlier cases, Pagarini and Pennington:⁹⁹

I reach [my] conclusion without any great comfort that the existing rules about the circumstances when equity will and will not perfect an apparently imperfect gift of shares serve any clearly identifiable or rational policy objective.

In other words, his Lordship considered that the recent case law had not seemed to follow any clear principle. Briggs J summarised the decisions in the recent Re Rose cases as generating three bases on which the Rose principle would arise:¹⁰⁰

The first is where the donor has done everything necessary to enable the donee to enforce a beneficial claim without further assistance from the donor . . .¹⁰¹ The second is where some detrimental reliance by the donee upon an apparent although ineffective gift may so bind the conscience of the donor to justify the imposition of a constructive trust . . .¹⁰² The third is where by a benevolent construction an effective gift or implied declaration of trust may be teased out of the words used.¹⁰³

95 [2010] EWCA Civ 159, [2010] 2 BCLC 1.

96 [2011] EWHC 167 (Ch), [2011] 1 BCLC 638.

97 Pennington v Waine [2002] 2 BCLC 448 and Kaye v Zeital [2010] 2 BCLC 1 applied.

98 See Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington [1996] AC 669, at section 12.1 below.

99 [2011] EWHC 167 (Ch), [2011] 1 BCLC 638, [47].

100 [2011] EWHC 167 (Ch), [2011] 1 BCLC 638, [43].

101 Pennington v Waine [2002] 2 BCLC 448 at [55]–[56] and Re Rose (decd), Rose v IRC [1952] 1 All ER 1217, [1952] Ch 499

102 Pennington v Waine [2002] 2 BCLC 448 at [59].

103 Ibid at [60]–[61], ‘apparently based upon’ Choithram International SA v Pagarani [2001] 2 All ER 492, [2001] 1 WLR 1.

What is interesting about this summary is that it does not reflect the precise rationale which Lord Evershed MR used in Re Rose itself, on the basis of unconscionability in renegeing on the promise to make a transfer, as considered above. That aside, the first principle is the principle which can be divined from Re Rose, albeit not adopting the generally equitable approach in that case. While the Re Rose decision itself is used as authority for the ‘constructive trust’ argument, that idea is not broached at all in Re Rose itself. The third principle is not really a principle at all, but rather is a judicial determination to validate testamentary gifts wherever possible.

A modern explanation of the Re Rose principle

It is this writer’s opinion that Re Rose is properly understood as a case of constructive trust. Given the Court of Appeal’s decision, the argument must be that Mr Rose is deemed to have transferred equitable title in the shares because he had done everything in his power to transfer them away (in Re Rose (1952) transferring them partially onto trust), and that it would therefore be unconscionable for him to deny that that transfer created some proprietary rights in the claimant. In accordance with the definition of a constructive trust provided by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in *Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC*¹⁰⁴ that a constructive trust comes into existence from the moment the conscience of the trustee is affected by knowledge of some relevant fact, the contention must be that Rose was a trustee under a constructive trust over the shares. It is contended that there could not have been an express trust because Rose did not intend to create an express trust in the manner in which the court ultimately imposed one. To have held otherwise would be in conflict with Milroy v Lord,¹⁰⁵ as considered above.¹⁰⁶

The weakness in this thinking is that, at common law, the transferor would be able to go back on the intention to transfer at any time before the transfer formalities were completed. In such a situation, the claimant would be required to rely on principles of equitable estoppel¹⁰⁷ or the avoidance of fraud¹⁰⁸ to insist that the transfer be carried through. Any rights flowing from that property, such as rights to a dividend, ought properly to pass to the common law owner unless either of those principles comes into play.

The main flaw in this doctrine is that it supposes an outright transfer has taken place in circumstances in which the transferor may well intend to retain for herself the right to renege on the transfer before the final formality is performed. It is significant that in Re Rose (1952),¹⁰⁹ Lord Evershed pointed out that title in the property was subsequently transferred as originally intended – it was only the time of the transfer for estate duty purposes that was at issue. The case of *Mascall v Mascall*¹¹⁰ is instructive in this context because it concerned a father who had intended to transfer land to his son but, having done everything necessary for him to do, then sought to terminate the transfer before completion of the formalities by 104 See Chapter 12.

105 (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

106 Oakley, 1997, 311 et seq.

107 Yaxley v Gotts [2000] 1 All ER 711.

108 Rochefoucauld v Boustead [1897] 1 Ch 196.

109 Re Rose [1952] Ch 499.

110 (1984) 50 P & CR 119.

the Land Registry because he had an argument with his son. The father contended that he should be entitled to terminate the transfer. However, the Court of Appeal held that because the father had done everything he had to do to transfer the property, he was not entitled to renege on the transfer.

The distinction between *Rose*¹¹¹ and some of the cases on perfecting imperfect settlements considered above, such as Re Brooks' ST,¹¹² must be that in Rose, the purported settlor had the property rights which he purported to transfer and that he evidenced sufficient intention to transfer them away such that he should be bound by that intention. Otherwise, the explanation for the Rose principle can only be found in constructive trust.

5.5 PERFECTING IMPERFECT GIFTS

As considered above, equity will not assist a volunteer. The implication for the law of trusts is that the courts will not therefore imply a trust simply to make good a gift which has not been validly made at common law. Trusts will not operate as a catch-all category merely to enforce promises or to reinforce merely moral obligations. That said, there are situations in which a gift which has not been validly made may be capable of enforcement by equity in particular circumstances. There are three contexts in which a gift will be perfected: donatio mortis causa; the rule in Strong v Bird,¹¹³ and the doctrine of proprietary estoppel.

5.5.1 Donatio mortis causa

This category frequently confuses students – it is far more limited than it might otherwise seem. The doctrine of donatio mortis causa arose specifically to create an exception to the rule that a testamentary gift must be made properly or else it will not be effective. The gifts are gifts made during the donor's lifetime, made in expectation of immediate death, and which are intended to take effect on the donor's death. It is also important that the donor intends to 'give up dominion' to the property at the time of making his donatio mortis causa.¹¹⁴ Thus, the donor must not intend to be able to deal with the property after the purported gift and must intend, in effect, to give up her rights to the property at that time.¹¹⁵ This doctrine ordinarily only operates in cases of people acting in extremis.

For example, donatio mortis causa would cover a situation like that of a soldier lying dying on a battlefield, his head supported by a comrade as his life ebbs away, who then gasps 'I want my Sunderland AFC shares to be given to my second son'. That statement would not be sufficient to make an ordinary transfer of the shares because the formality of re-registering them under the Companies Act 2006 would not have been complied with. However, the doctrine of donatio mortis causa provides that such a gift will be enforceable because it was made in expectation of death in circumstances in which it would not have been reasonable to expect the purported donor to comply with the formalities for making a valid gift of the shares.

111 [1952] Ch 499.

112 [1939] 1 Ch 993.

113 (1874) LR 18 Eq 315.

114 Wilkes v Allington [1931] 2 Ch 104; Re Lillington [1952] 2 All ER 184.

115 Re Wasserberg [1915] 1 Ch 195; Birch v Treasury Solicitor [1951] Ch 298; Woodland v Woodland [1991] Fam Law 470, CA.

The Court of Appeal in *Sen v Headley*¹¹⁶ considered facts which concerned a couple who had lived together for 10 years but had separated more than 25 years before the material time. One of the couple died of a terminal illness, but before death told his former partner (the plaintiff) that the house (with unregistered title) was hers and that ‘You have the keys . . . The deeds are in the steel box’. While it was argued against the plaintiff that she had always had keys to the house, such that the lifetime gift could have no further effect by way of gift, the plaintiff was successful in establishing her claim to the house because title deeds were essential in establishing title to unregistered land. There was no retention of dominion in this case because the deceased had not expected that he would return to the house, or that he would have been able to deal with it in any way before his death.

5.5.2 The rule in Strong v Bird

The rule in Strong v Bird itself

The rule in *Strong v Bird*¹¹⁷ provides that if a debtor is named by the testator as an executor of the estate of the one to whom he owed the debt, that chose in action is discharged – in effect a gift is made of the amount of the debt. It is necessary that the donor intended to make an inter vivos gift of this property. The more modern rationale for the rule is that the executor cannot be expected to sue himself for the debt. The rule appears to be more convenient than real. The assumption is that if a person is made executor of an estate, the deceased must have intended to free the executor from any outstanding debts between them. The executor acquires all the deceased’s rights to sue others, therefore the executor would be required to sue himself to recover the debt. While the rules relating to conflicts of interest would generally seem to apply to force the executor to withdraw or to act impartially, the law is content to excuse the executor from meeting the debt. It has also been held that gifts in relation to administrators should receive such immunity from a liability for the debt, even though this status has not been conferred on them by the deceased himself.

In relation to incomplete gifts, the rule in Strong v Bird means that where a deceased person intended to make a gift of property to another person without ever making a complete gift of it, if that intended recipient is named as executor of the deceased’s estate, the gift is deemed to have been completed.¹¹⁸ Clearly, the application of the rule to property other than debts is an extension of the ratio in Strong v Bird, but the rule holds good nevertheless. The rule has been extended in relation to administrators appointed to administer the deceased’s estate in the case of intestacy.¹¹⁹ It also applies to gifts of land.¹²⁰ It does not necessarily follow that the rule is appropriate in the context of administrators: you may be appointed as administrator of my estate, but I may also want to be paid what you owe me.

116 [1991] Ch 425.

117 (1874) LR 18 Eq 315.

118 Re Stewart [1908] 2 Ch 251.

119 Re James [1935] Ch 449; Re Gonin [1979] Ch 16.

120 Re James [1935] Ch 449.

Need for a continuing intention

Where the deceased person had an intention to benefit the claimant executor or administrator, but then changed that intention, the claimant will not be granted title in the property at issue.¹²¹ In Re Gonin,¹²² a mother wished to pass her house to her illegitimate daughter on death but had the (incorrect) notion that she could not do so because her daughter had been born out of wedlock. Therefore, the mother wrote a cheque for £33,000 in her daughter's favour. When her daughter was subsequently appointed administratrix of her mother's estate, it was held that she could not claim title to the house because her mother had indicated an intention to replace the gift of the house with a gift of money instead. Similarly, in Re Freeland,¹²³ an intention to make a gift of a car was not supported by the rule in Strong v Bird where the deceased had continued to use that car in apparent negation of any stated intention to make a gift of it to the plaintiff executor.

Criticism of the rule in Strong v Bird

It does appear that the rule in *Strong v Bird*¹²⁴ has a fundamental conceptual weakness. The executor is required to hold property on the trusts set out in the will. The executor therefore has legal title in property vested in her to hold that property on trust for the legatees. There can be no suggestion that the executor, in the capacity of executor, can have any equitable title in the property. Rather, the role of executor/trustee is to protect the trust property for the beneficiaries. And yet the rule in Strong v Bird does permit the executor to take a beneficial interest in trust property. The benefit to the executor is the extinction of a debt which the executor would otherwise owe to the deceased's estate.

It appears that the courts are allowing themselves to become hamstrung by the nature of the property here. A chose in action owed by the executor is the same as any other piece of property. There is a different rule if the property owed by the executor was a specific table belonging to the deceased. Suppose, for example, that no perfect gift had been made of the table but that it had passed into the control of the executor. In that circumstance, there could be no argument other than that the table would be returned, beneficially, to the deceased's estate and passed in turn to whichever legatee was entitled to it. However, because the property is a chose in action, the courts have adopted a different approach. It is suggested that this distinction between tangible and intangible property is impossible to support. Furthermore, the rule, even in relation to intangibles, ignores the fact that the deceased has taken no express action to complete that gift.

The solution to the problem about the executor being required to sue herself can be resolved by saying that a trustee is not permitted to act on the basis of any conflict of interest.¹²⁵ Therefore, the executor ought to vacate the position of trustee so that this property which comprises a part of the estate can be collected in with all the other property owned beneficially by the deceased at the date of death. The rule is, of course, particularly arbitrary 121 Re Gonin [1979] Ch 16.

122 Ibid.

123 [1952] Ch 110.

124 (1874) LR 18 Eq 315.

125 Keech v Sandford (1726) Sel Cas Ch 61; Tito v Waddell (No 2) [1977] Ch 106.

in that it permits an administrator to benefit from this rule. By definition, the administrator is not a person whom the deceased intended to benefit by extinction of the chose in action because the administrator is appointed by the court and not by the deceased.

5.5.3 Proprietary estoppel and the enforcement of promises

Proprietary estoppel is a remedial doctrine which either seeks to compensate a claimant for detriment suffered as a result of relying on the representation made by the defendant or to give effect to the expectations raised by having so acted in reliance on a representation. The general nature of estoppel in equity is considered in detail in Chapter 13. Having considered the contexts in which equity will not involve itself in perfecting gifts, it is worth considering, albeit briefly, the context in which equity will provide a blanket claim in cases where the claimant has suffered some detriment in reliance on the promise that she would receive rights in property. By a circuitous route, this doctrine can therefore be seen as perfecting imperfect gifts in some contexts. The claim would appear to operate as follows. If Arthur had promised Bertha that he would transfer to her a valuable antique fireplace, knowing that Bertha had spent a large amount of money in having builders remove her old fireplace in the expectation that she could replace it with Arthur's fireplace, then even if Arthur failed to complete the gift, Bertha could argue that the fireplace be transferred to her due to her detrimental reliance on Arthur's representation. Thus, proprietary estoppel might have the indirect effect of completing an imperfect gift.

Thus, in Pascoe v Turner,¹²⁶ a man left a woman, with whom he had been in a relationship, but told her that the house and all its contents were hers. Interpreted as a gift, this was an incomplete gift of the house (in relation to which there would have needed to have been compliance with ss 52 and 53 of the Law of Property Act 1925) but a complete gift of the contents of the house (in relation to which there would have needed to have been no formalities). The woman sought to claim rights in the house on the basis of proprietary estoppel because she had carried out some peripheral improvements to the decorative order of the house. It was held that encouragement or acquiescence in improvements being made to the house led to the formation of an expectation in the woman of a property right. It was further found that to protect that right, it was necessary to complete the imperfect gift of the house by granting Turner the fee simple in the property, on the basis that it was the 'minimum equity necessary to complete the gift'.¹²⁷

The clearest exposition of the modern doctrine of proprietary estoppel was set out in Re Basham,¹²⁸ in which there was merely oral evidence only of a gift of a house to a stepdaughter by her stepfather during his illness. Her claim was that she had been induced into thinking that by acting to help the dying man through his illness she would acquire an interest under her stepfather's will. Ultimately, the stepfather died intestate, and the intestacy rules would have passed the property to his nieces, who were his blood relatives. It was held that given that the stepdaughter had acted to her detriment in reliance on her stepfather's promise of a gift of the house, the doctrine of proprietary estoppel would pass the property to the stepdaughter rather than the nieces.

126 [1979] 2 All ER 945.

127 Crabb v Arun DC [1976] Ch 179.

128 [1987] 1 All ER 405.

In this way, proprietary estoppel operated to perfect the imperfect gift of the house, even though its primary aim had been to prevent the stepdaughter from suffering detriment.¹²⁹ This doctrine is in line with the underlying principle that equity will not assist a volunteer. In relation to proprietary estoppel, the claimant is not a volunteer due to the detriment suffered. There is therefore the question, considered in Chapter 13, as to the form of detriment which will be sufficient to recategorise the claimant as something other than a volunteer.

The question of equitable estoppel in relation to express trusts generally is considered in detail in Chapter 13.

5.6 COVENANTS AND PROMISES TO CREATE A SETTLEMENT OVER AFTER-ACQUIRED PROPERTY

Where a promise is made under covenant to the effect that the settlor will settle property which is to be acquired in the future, there will not be a valid trust if the settlor had no rights in the property at the time of purporting to create the trust. A valid trust will only be created if the settlor owned property rights in the trust property at the time of purporting to declare the trust. Otherwise, only the parties to the covenant will be entitled to enforce the covenant at common law for damages, or further to the Contract (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, or in equity by specific performance if they have given consideration for the promise. Trustees who are parties to a covenant may not enforce that covenant; unless the benefit of the covenant itself has been settled on trust, in which case a valid trust will have been created.

5.6.1 The problem of after-acquired property

A settlor must have proprietary rights in the property which is to be settled on trust at the time of purporting to declare a trust.¹³⁰ It has frequently happened in family situations that a person has made a promise to other family members that she will settle on trust for those family members some property which she expects to receive at some point in the future. This promise is usually made in the form of a covenant – that is, a contract under deed – which may be signed by the trustees or by the intended beneficiaries as well as by the settlor. However, if the settlor does not have any property rights in the property at the time of purporting to declare that trust, then there cannot be a valid trust.¹³¹ The following question arises: if there is no valid trust, can the intended beneficiaries nevertheless sue on the covenant? Consequently, there is an interaction in this context between the law dealing with covenants and the law of express trusts. A covenant is a form of promise executed under a deed and is therefore a binding contract. Therefore, this area requires a discussion of contract law as well as trusts law. The principal issue is this: if Bernard makes a promise to Fran and Mani that in the future Bernard will settle property on Fran as trustee to hold it on trust for Mani as beneficiary, in what circumstances will that promise be enforceable? We will consider this situation, and these people, as we go through this section of this chapter. To bring this issue to life, consider the following set of facts:

¹²⁹ Lim v Ang [1992] 1 WLR 113.

¹³⁰ See para 5.2.4 above.

¹³¹ Re Brooks' ST [1939] 1 Ch 993.

David was a man in his late forties and a confirmed bachelor. He hoped that he would receive a legacy from his maiden aunt, who was still alive in 1998. David had no right to any property belonging to his aunt before her death and could get no right under her will until she died. In 1998, David made a promise to the trustees of a family settlement that he would settle any property he did receive from his aunt in the future on trust for his nieces. This promise was in the form of a deed of covenant (that is, a contract) between David and the trustees. In 1999, David was unexpectedly married after a whirlwind romance. He and his new wife had a baby girl in 2000. David decided that he did not want to pass any property received from his aunt to his nieces because he now had a child of his own to care for. In 2001 his aunt died and left him £50,000.

The problem here is whether or not David will be required to observe the promise which he made in 1998. The various analyses are considered in detail in the discussion which follows, but an outline of the issues can be given at this stage.

The nieces in this example are volunteers – that is, they have given no consideration for the promise made by David. Following the equitable maxim that ‘equity will not assist a volunteer’,¹³² the nieces would prima facie be entitled to nothing. However, if David has succeeded in declaring a valid trust, then he will be bound by the promise, because a trust once made cannot be undone.¹³³ The question as to whether or not David can have created a trust would depend on whether or not he had any proprietary rights in the money at the time he purported to create the trust: if David had no rights at that time, he could not have created a valid trust.¹³⁴ On these facts, David did not have any rights in the property at the time of purporting to create the trust – he had only a mere hope that he would receive some rights in the future – and therefore could not have created a trust.

The further question to arise would therefore be whether or not the trustees could enforce David’s obligation under the deed of covenant. Again, equity will not permit enforcement by the trustees if the nieces are merely volunteers.¹³⁵ It would be necessary for the nieces either to have given consideration,¹³⁶ or to have been made parties to the deed of covenant¹³⁷ or to be identified as third parties entitled to benefit under the contract.¹³⁸ Otherwise, the nieces would be entitled to rely on equity only if they could assert that some other property had been settled on trust for them with the intention that the money received from the aunt was to be added to that trust.¹³⁹ These issues are considered below. First, we shall begin with a reminder of the principles as to whether or not a valid trust will have been created.

132 Milroy v Lord (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

133 Jefferys v Jefferys (1841) Cr & Ph 138; Paul v Paul (1882) 20 Ch D 742.

134 Re Brooks’ ST [1939] 1 Ch 993; Re Ralli’s WT [1964] 2 WLR 144.

135 Re Pryce [1917] 1 Ch 234; Re Kay [1939] Ch 329; Re Cook [1965] Ch 902.

136 Pullan v Koe [1913] 1 Ch 9.

137 Cannon v Hartley [1949] Ch 213.

138 Contract (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999.

139 This last idea is considered in the discussion of Fletcher v Fletcher (1844) 4 Hare 67 and Don King Productions Inc v Warren [1998] 2 All ER 608, per Lightman J; affirmed [2000] Ch 291, CA, at para 5.6.4 below.

5.6.2 To establish a trust the settlor must own the relevant property at the time of purporting to declare the trust

As was considered above in section 5.2.4, a settlor must own the relevant property rights at the time of purporting to declare the trust. If the settlor does not own those property rights at the time of purporting to settle them on trust, then there will not be a valid trust. This is important in relation to covenants to settle after-acquired property. If the settlor does have some rights in the property, then a valid trust will be declared and the beneficiaries will have rights against the settlor under the law of trusts to pass any property identified in the trust instrument into the trust fund. So, in Re Ralli's WT,¹⁴⁰ Helen was a remainder beneficiary under a trust who purported to declare a trust over any property in which she might become absolutely entitled in the future when the life tenant died. At the time of declaring this trust it was held that Helen did have some property rights, in the form of her remainder interest under the trust, so that she did create a valid trust at that time, with the consequence that when the life tenant did die some time later Helen was obliged to pass the property to which she then became entitled to her trustees on the terms of that trust. By contrast, in *Re Brooks' ST*¹⁴¹ Arthur had only a mere hope that he would receive some property under a power of appointment at the time he purported to declare a trust over any property which he might receive in the future. Consequently, when there was some property appointed to him latterly, it was held that no valid trust had been created because at the time at which he had purported to declare that trust he had had no proprietary rights capable of constituting a trust fund.

Therefore, if a settlor purports to declare a trust over after-acquired property at a time at which she has no property rights, there will not be a valid trust declared and therefore the beneficiaries can have no equitable interests which are enforceable against her. In the following sections we shall consider what effect there can be on this principle if the settlor has not simply purported to declare a trust, but has gone further and entered into a covenant either with the beneficiaries or with the trustees under which she promised to settle any after-acquired property on trust.

5.6.3 The enforceability of a promise under covenant

This section considers the circumstances in which promises made by means of a deed of covenant or a contract will be enforceable. It should be remembered that a promise made in a deed of covenant will have the full force and effect of a binding contract (on the basis that a deed replaces the need for consideration).¹⁴² In a distant past represented in the novels of Jane Austen, well-to-do families had arranged marriages (typically) such that the riches and standing of both families would be maintained. These marriages were forged in tandem with complicated settlements which allocated rights in the property of both families, providing for the rights of future generations as well as the married parties. As part of these agreements, it was common for the parties to enter into promises to settle property which might be received in the future on the terms of the matrimonial trust (or 'marriage settlement').

¹⁴⁰ [1964] 1 Ch 288.

¹⁴¹ [1939] 1 Ch 993.

¹⁴² Hall v Palmer (1844) 3 Hare 532; Macedo v Stroud [1922] 2 AC 330.

Settlement cannot be unmade

Before considering the detail of the rules relating to covenants, it is worth reminding ourselves of the rules relating to the creation of trusts. Clearly, there may be situations in which the parties create marriage settlements, or other trusts, under which they promise to deal with property in a particular manner. However, it is possible that subsequent events may make the terms of the settlement appear to be unattractive. For example, in Paul v Paul,¹⁴³ where a couple who were parties to a complex marriage settlement subsequently sought to separate, the couple also sought to undo the marriage settlement and reallocate the property between themselves. It was held by the court that a settlement, once created, could not be undone.¹⁴⁴ The only circumstances in which the beneficiaries would be entitled to undo a trust would be in accordance with the rule in Saunders v Vautier,¹⁴⁵ whereby absolutely-entitled beneficiaries, acting sui juris, are empowered to direct the trustees to deliver legal title in the property to them. The further point which flows from this is that the trustees are not obliged to obey any directions which the settlor may seek to give after the trust has been constituted if those terms are outwith the terms of the trust.¹⁴⁶ Therefore, where trustees were vested with a discretionary power to provide for the maintenance of the settlor's children, the trustees were entitled to ignore the settlor's financial position when considering the exercise of their powers and not worry themselves that this might have the incidental effect of reducing the settlor's liabilities under a court consent order.¹⁴⁷

Parties to the covenant can enforce the covenant

In relation to covenants to deal with property in a particular manner, the parties to the covenant are entitled to enforce the covenant under the ordinary principles of the law of contract. In the trusts context, the importance of a covenant would be as an obligation entered into by a person to settle specified property on trust for the benefit of other people. On the basis that there is no trust created, the covenant itself will give the parties to the covenant the right to sue to enforce the promise at common law, without the need for resort to the law of trusts. For example, where a person had undertaken by deed of covenant to settle property on his daughter, she would be entitled to enforce that obligation if she were a party to the covenant and consequently to receive an award of damages at common law.¹⁴⁸ It would be in the capacity of a party to the covenant that the daughter would be entitled to seek performance of the obligation in the covenant. However, she would not be able to sue on the promise in her capacity as a beneficiary under that trust, for the reasons given below.

Rights to specific performance are available only to those who have given consideration.¹⁴⁹ So, in Pullan v Koe,¹⁵⁰ the claimant was entitled to claim a right in contract where she had given consideration as part of a marriage settlement, and in consequence was entitled to

143 (1882) 20 Ch D 742.

144 Paul v Paul (1882) 20 Ch D 742.

145 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

146 Fuller v Evans [2000] 1 All ER 636.

147 Ibid.

148 Cannon v Hartley [1949] Ch 213.

149 Pullan v Koe [1913] 1 Ch 9; Cannon v Hartley [1949] Ch 213.

150 [1913] 1 Ch 9.

specific performance of the defendant's promise to settle after-acquired property on trust for her. If the claimant had not given consideration for the promise, then her only claim would be based on an entitlement to damages at common law if she were a party to the covenant. A deed of covenant does not require consideration because the use of a deed to create the contract is said to replace the ordinary need for consideration in a contract. Therefore, parties to deeds of covenant will frequently be volunteers because they will usually not have given consideration if they have simply signed the deed of covenant. Equity will not assist a volunteer – as considered above. Specific performance is an equitable remedy and therefore not available to volunteers because equity does not assist volunteers.¹⁵¹ In the case of Cannon v Hartley,¹⁵² a father entered into a covenant to settle after-acquired property on his daughter, amongst others. His daughter had given no consideration for this covenant, but she was entitled to damages at common law for breach of covenant when her father refused to transfer the property onto trust because she had been a party to the covenant. Her right to damages was predicated entirely on the basis that she had been a party to the covenant in that case. Significantly, the claimant in *Cannon v Hartley*¹⁵³ could only receive damages because she had not given consideration to become a party to the deed of covenant, unlike the claimant in *Pullan v Koe*¹⁵⁴ who had given consideration within the terms of a marriage settlement.

This rule has always struck this writer as unduly formalistic. To restrict the liability of a contracting party who has refused to observe the terms of the contract to a liability in damages does not necessarily permit the other contracting party to rely on a further non-cash benefit contained in the contract. The other party may prefer to have the contract performed rather than simply to receive cash damages. While it is a long-standing principle of equity that volunteers will not be assisted, what the principle in Cannon v Hartley does is to enable parties to a deed to renege on their obligations to perform the acts specified in the contract and limit their liabilities to cash damages. Another approach might be to argue that the defaulting party is acting unconscionably in relation to the property which ought to be transferred to the benefit of the other party to the deed.¹⁵⁵ Alternatively, if the claimant could demonstrate that she had suffered some detriment in reliance on the representation made in the deed of covenant, there might be a right to proprietary estoppel to reverse that detriment.¹⁵⁶ Here the dividing line between the law of trusts' affection for enforcing conscionable behaviour in relation to property and the formalistic application of the rule against benefiting volunteers is clear. Good conscience would generally favour performance of the promise. However, English law's preference for enforcing bargains (that is, arrangements where consideration passes) over mere promises (that is, representations without any consideration passing) means that the concept of 'good conscience' is subjugated to the commercial legal practice in favour of arm's length bargains.

Under contract law, it has been held that a contractual promise to transfer after-acquired property under a power of appointment will be subject to specific performance. So, under *Tailby v Official Receiver*¹⁵⁷ if there had been a contract for the transfer of any property

151 Jefferys v Jefferys (1841) Cr & Ph 138.

152 [1949] Ch 213.

153 Ibid.

154 [1913] 1 Ch 9.

155 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

156 Lim v Ang [1992] 1 WLR 113 considered at section 14.7 below.

157 (1888) 13 App Cas 523.

which was received under a mere expectancy in the future then the equitable interest in that property would pass to those beneficiaries once the defendant received it. This decision is based on the equitable principle that ‘equity looks upon as done that which ought to have been done’. It is significant that the claimant had tendered consideration to the defendant and therefore that the claimant was not a volunteer.¹⁵⁸ Because the defendant is not a volunteer, there is no breach of the principle that equity will not assist a volunteer. So, it is under the contractual doctrine of specific performance that the equitable interest passes, and not under trusts law.

Non-parties cannot enforce the covenant – pre-1999

In circumstances in which a person undertakes by means of a deed under covenant to settle after-acquired property on specified trusts, the beneficiaries will not have locus standi to enforce the promise unless they were parties to the covenant.¹⁵⁹ A person who is not a party to the covenant cannot enforce it. Where the covenant is effected between the settlor and the trustee, the trustee will be able to enforce it as a party to the covenant.¹⁶⁰ The issue of trustees seeking to enforce the covenant is considered below.

Contracts for the benefit of a third party – post-1999

In many civil code jurisdictions in continental Europe (where the trust does not exist generally as a legal concept), arrangements considered to be a trust under English law would frequently be understood in those civil code jurisdictions not as a division in property rights but rather as contracts for the benefit of third parties. So, if an absolute owner of property entered into an arrangement whereby her agents were to invest identified property with the intention of benefiting her children, that would probably constitute a contract between the owner of the property and her agents which was intended to benefit the children as third parties. Most non-Anglo-American jurisdictions see property rights as vesting in one person as owner with other people having merely personal claims in relation to the use of the property. This differs greatly from the English trust, in which the trustees and the beneficiaries all have varying forms of proprietary rights against the trust fund itself.

The enactment of the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 has had the effect of introducing to English contract law the concept of a contract which reaches out beyond the common law rules of privity of contract to situations in which contracts are made specifically for the benefit of some third party on that civil code model. In relation to the issue of after-acquired property, the purported beneficiary will be able to enforce the contract if she is identified in the contract either personally, or as part of a class of persons for whose benefit the contract has been created.¹⁶¹ The claimant is entitled to rely on all of the rights accorded 158 See also Re Lind [1915] 2 Ch 345; Palette Shoes Pty Ltd v Krohn (1937) 58 CLR 1, 26; Re Androma Pty Ltd [1987] 2 Qd R 134, 152.

159 Cannon v Hartley [1949] Ch 213.

160 Beswick v Beswick [1968] AC 58; Pullan v Koe [1913] 1 Ch 9. See also Darlington BC v Wiltshier Northern Ltd [1995] 1 WLR 68; Panatown Ltd v Alfred McAlpine Construction Ltd [2000] 4 All ER 97.

161 Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, s 1.

by contract law, including damages and specific performance – therefore, the contract takes effect at common law and in equity.¹⁶²

The limits on the operation of the Act appear to be as follows. First, there must be a contract and not a mere promise. The promise made by the promisor must be in the form of a contract with consideration, or made under a deed. The principal argument against the operation of the 1999 Act in many situations would be that the promise made by the promisor to settle after-acquired property would not constitute a contract because typically there would be no consideration passing between the promisor and either the trustee or the purported beneficiary. In many commercial situations, there will be a commercial contract (into which the trust is incorporated), or there may be a contract between settlor and trustee in situations such as an occupational pension fund (as considered in Chapter 24). However, in relation to a formal contract of retainer between the settlor and trustee, it is unlikely that such a contract created to authorise the trustees' fees would specify a benefit for any beneficiary on its face. Further, it may be that an arrangement which will not create common law rights because there is no enforceable contract will grant rights in equity under either promissory or proprietary estoppel.¹⁶³

Secondly, it is not clear to what extent the identified class of persons able to enforce the contract will correlate with the rules for certainty of objects in trusts law. To make the point another way: what is the class which must be identified? Will that level of certainty correspond with the trusts law rules for the identity of beneficiaries under, for example, a discretionary trust? It would seem sensible to suppose that if the class is sufficiently certain as a class of beneficiaries, it ought to be sufficiently certain for the purposes of the 1999 Act. What remains unclear, however, is whether or not the beneficiary would be required to have vested rights within the terms of the contract, or whether the Act would also apply to people who potentially fall within a class of objects of a mere power of appointment.¹⁶⁴ In the latter case, it could not be contended that the contract was for the benefit of the beneficiary because there was no vested interest on the part of the third party.

Thirdly, and perhaps most significantly, a contract may create personal rights and not necessarily proprietary rights nor fiduciary obligations. Suppose, therefore, that the promise made is a promise to transfer money – the claimant's entitlement is unlikely to be enforceable by specific performance because it is merely a money claim.¹⁶⁵ In consequence, the claimant receives only personal rights and not rights in property against that fund. However, if the contract provided the third party with rights in identified property (other than money), then there would be no principled reason to suppose that specific performance would not grant that third party rights in the property when received by the promisor.

It is important to remember that while a contract may also create a trust as a byproduct,¹⁶⁶ the contract itself will not be a trust in itself. A contract will not grant equitable title in property – only a trust, or a charge or a similar right will do that. A trust will give certain remedies which a mere contract cannot. The principal advantage of the trust over the

162 Ibid.

163 Hughes v Metropolitan Railway (1877) 2 App Cas 439; Central London Property Trust Ltd v High Trees House Ltd [1949] KB 130; Combe v Combe [1951] 2 KB 215; or in relation to proprietary estoppel, Gillett v Holt [2000] 2 All ER 289; Yaxley v Gotts [2000] 1 All ER 711.

164 Re Brooks' ST [1939] 1 Ch 993.

165 South African Territories Ltd v Wallington [1898] AC 309; Beswick v Beswick [1968] AC 58.

166 Re Kayford [1975] 1 WLR 279.

remedies available under contract law (principally common law damages and equitable specific performance) is that the trust will entitle the claimant to proprietary rights in that property which is held on trust. A beneficiary under a trust will be able to acquire preferential rights in an insolvency¹⁶⁷ and will be entitled to receive compound interest on amounts owing to it¹⁶⁸ rather than merely simple interest. Significantly, also, a trustee is bound by obligations of utmost good faith and prevented from allowing any conflicts of interest or the making of secret profits.¹⁶⁹

The 1999 Act will replace many of the situations in which the case law has struggled to provide a remedy for the purported beneficiary in relation to after-acquired property. However, the foregoing discussion has highlighted some of the situations in which the 1999 Act will not have any application. It has also highlighted those senses in which the law of contract does not offer any better right to the claimant than the law of trusts. Indeed, if the claimant is seeking to claim rights in identified property, then a trust remains the most significant claim of all. The following sections consider the rights of the purported beneficiary and of the trustee to enforce the promise otherwise than under the law of contract.

5.6.4 Trustees seeking to enforce a promise to settle after-acquired property

This section considers the following problem. Suppose that a settlor expects to receive an allotment of ordinary shares in Sunderland AFC plc and that she undertakes by means of a deed of covenant with trustees to settle any shares received on trust for specified beneficiaries. If the settlor has only a mere spes in the shares at the time of the purported creation of the trust, there will not be a valid declaration of trust.¹⁷⁰ However, if the settlor had some equitable interest in the property at the time of the creation of the trust, there will be a valid trust over that equitable interest.¹⁷¹ These issues have already been considered earlier in this chapter.¹⁷²

Trustee not permitted to enforce the promise

The question arises as to the duties incumbent on the trustee to seek to enforce the covenant. The issue is the following. In circumstances where there is no valid trust, because the settlor had no equitable interest in the relevant property at the time of purporting to declare that trust, there is no right in the beneficiary to oblige the trustee to exercise those powers under the covenant. If the trustee were to sue under the covenant, as a party to that covenant, there would be no beneficiary for whom the property could be held on trust. It is not permissible for trustees to declare the terms of the trust.¹⁷³ Consequently, the court will not permit the trustee to sue for the property.¹⁷⁴ Indeed, the result of these cases is that the trustee must not begin such an action because that action would be struck out.

167 Re Goldcorp [1995] 1 AC 74.

168 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

169 Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46.

170 Re Brooks' ST [1939] 1 Ch 993.

171 Re Ralli's WT [1964] 2 WLR 144.

172 See para 5.4.2 above.

173 Re Brooks' ST [1939] 1 Ch 993.

174 Re Pryce [1917] 1 Ch 234; Re Kay [1939] Ch 329; Re Cook [1965] Ch 902.

The reason for this preclusion is that if the trustee did seek to enforce the covenant and sue for specific performance, the trustee would not be entitled to take a beneficial interest in that property as a mere trustee. Consequently, there would be a gap in the beneficial ownership, requiring that the equitable interest in the property be held on resulting trust for the settlor.¹⁷⁵ In general terms, English law will not permit a person to sue for property in circumstances in which the claimant would be required to hold that property on trust for the defendant in any event.¹⁷⁶ So, in Re Kay's Settlement,¹⁷⁷ a woman created a conveyance of property to herself for life and in remainder to other people while she was a spinster. The conveyance contained a covenant to settle after-acquired property. Subsequently, the woman married and had children. In later years she received property which fell within the terms of the covenant but to which she had had no entitlement at the time of creating the covenant. The woman refused to settle the property on trust in accordance with the covenant. It was held that none of the beneficiaries under the conveyance could establish any rights in the after-acquired property. The question arose whether or not the trustees, as parties to the covenant, could force the woman to settle the after-acquired property. In line with the earlier decision in Re Pryce,¹⁷⁸ it was held that the trustees should not be permitted to sue the woman under the terms of the covenant because the trust which they were seeking to enforce did not exist precisely because the woman had had no rights in the property at the time she had purported to create that trust. In the later case of Re Cook,¹⁷⁹ this idea hardened into a strict principle that the trustees ought not to be permitted to commence such litigation because it would be vexatious and wasteful. If the trustees were allowed to commence the litigation and enforce the covenant, there would be no trust on which the property could be held; because the trustees would not be entitled to take the property beneficially qua trustees, they would be required to hold the property on resulting trust for the original covenantor; therefore, the litigation would be wasteful because, even if successful, the trustees would be obliged to return the property to the defendant in any event.

This policy of avoiding wasteful litigation emerges in the case of Hirachand Punanchand v Temple,¹⁸⁰ in which a father sought to liquidate his son's creditors by reaching an agreement with them to pay off a percentage (but not the whole) of his son's debts as a full and final settlement of their claim against his son. The creditors agreed to the settlement proposed by the father and took the sum from him. However, the creditors, in contravention of their agreement with the father, sought to proceed against the son for the balance of the debt owing. It was held that the creditors would have been estopped from retaining title in any money they would have received from the son because it was in flat contravention of their agreement with the father. Consequently, the court refused even to allow the action to proceed, because any money won against the son would have been held on trust for the father. It is suggested that this thinking can be applied to the situation of trustees suing under covenants.¹⁸¹

175 Vandervell v IRC [1967] 2 AC 291, HL.

176 Hirachand Punanchand v Temple [1911] 2 KB 330; Re Cook [1965] Ch 902.

177 [1939] Ch 329.

178 [1917] 1 Ch 234.

179 [1965] Ch 902.

180 [1911] 2 KB 330.

181 Hayton, 1996.

A trust of the promise itself

The exception to the approach set out above appears in the decision in Fletcher v Fletcher.¹⁸² A father covenanted with a trustee to settle an after-acquired sum of £66,000 (in 1844 an enormous sum of money) on his sons, Jacob and John. The property was passed to the trustee on the father's death. In reliance on the principles set out in the line of cases culminating in *Re Cook*¹⁸³ (above), the trustee contended that there had been no valid trust and that the trustee ought, therefore, to be absolutely entitled to the money. The court held, however, that the surviving beneficiary, Jacob, was entitled to sue under the terms of the trust on the basis that there had been property which could have been settled on the purported trust.

The property identified by the court in Fletcher v Fletcher was the benefit of the covenant itself. This single idea requires some short analysis. A covenant creates obligations. A party to the covenant can transfer the benefit of the covenant to another party, or borrow money using it as security. A covenant, in the same way as a debt, is a chose in action. A covenant can therefore be considered to be property in itself. Consequently, to enable the creation of a valid trust in circumstances in which a covenant is created obliging the settlor to settle after-acquired property on trust, the settlor would be required to settle the benefit of the covenant on trust for the beneficiary. That chose in action would be replaced by the subsequently acquired tangible property as the trust fund in time. This was the mechanism we should understand the court as having used in Fletcher v Fletcher to justify the finding that there was a valid trust and thus to give the beneficiary a right to sue the trustee to force him to collect in the property to be settled on trust. In reality, it was to prevent the trustee's unconscionable claim to such an enormous sum of money.

In the case of Don King v Warren,¹⁸⁴ two boxing promoters entered into a series of partnership agreements whereby they undertook to treat any promotion agreements entered into with boxers as being part of the partnership property. It was held by Lightman J (and subsequently the Court of Appeal) that this disclosed an intention to settle the benefit of those promotion agreements on trust for the members of the partnership. This demonstrates a principle akin to that in Fletcher v Fletcher, whereby a contract was held to have been capable of forming the subject matter of a trust despite being incapable of transfer on its face. Further examples of the benefits of contracts or statutory licences being held on trust despite being incapable of transfer are the cases of *Swift v Dairywise Farms*¹⁸⁵ and Re Celtic Extraction.¹⁸⁶ In these two cases, the benefits of statutory licences which were not transferable from one person to another were held to be capable of constituting a trust fund despite the impossibility of transferring them.¹⁸⁷ Therefore, the point made in Fletcher v Fletcher,¹⁸⁸ that a trust can be declared over a chose in action, is one with modern support.

Suppose, as an illustration of this principle, that Arthur decides to settle property which he hopes will be advanced to him under a power of appointment at some point in the future.

182 (1844) 4 Hare 67.

183 [1965] Ch 902.

184 [1998] 2 All ER 608, per Lightman J; affirmed [2000] Ch 291.

185 [2000] 1 All ER 320.

186 Re Celtic Extraction Ltd (In Liquidation), Re Bluestone Chemicals Ltd (In Liquidation) [1999] 4 All ER 684.

187 Cf Krasner v Dennison [2000] 3 All ER 234 – restriction on transferability of annuity contracts did not prevent them vesting in a trustee in bankruptcy.

188 (1844) 4 Hare 67.

Therefore, Arthur decides to enter into a covenant with Tamsin, his appointed trustee, to the effect that he will settle any after-acquired property on trust for Gertrude. Some time later, Arthur is appointed a large sum of money. Given that he has no proprietary rights in the property at the time of making the covenant, he cannot create a valid trust.¹⁸⁹ Gertrude is a volunteer – in that she has given no consideration for Arthur’s covenant – and therefore she cannot claim specific performance of the covenant to settle property in her favour. Gertrude is not a party to the covenant: if she had been, then she could have claimed common law damages for breach of Arthur’s obligation.¹⁹⁰ However, if the covenant were worded such that Arthur undertook ‘to hold the benefit of this covenant on trust for Gertrude immediately’, then Arthur would have demonstrated a sufficient intention to create a trust of the covenant itself and so he would have created a valid trust at the time of making the covenant. Given that Arthur created a valid trust at that time, when he subsequently receives property under the power of appointment, that property passes on to the settlement in favour of Gertrude regardless of Arthur’s change of heart.¹⁹¹

5.6.5 A summary of the principles discussed in this section

The principles considered in this section often challenge trusts law students. This section aims to summarise them and so draw them together. The question is whether or not a valid trust will be created by a promise (usually in the form of a covenant) made by Bernard that he will settle property which he hopes to receive in the future so that Fran will hold that property on trust for Mani. If Bernard had a proprietary right in the property at the time of purporting to declare this trust, then there will be a valid trust and Mani will be able to compel Bernard to transfer the property to Fran when he acquires it in the future so that Fran will hold it on trust for Mani.¹⁹² Suppose, however, that Bernard decides to keep the property for himself when eventually he does receive it. If there is a valid trust created, then Bernard may not renege on it.¹⁹³ There is no need to pursue that particular hypothetical example any further because Mani has a good claim in trusts law.

However, if Bernard had no such property rights at the time of purporting to declare that trust, then Mani would have no immediate rights in trusts law because no trust would have been created.¹⁹⁴ Suppose that Bernard had made the promise to settle the after-acquired property in the form of a covenant: if so, Mani may have rights under contract law in the following contexts. If Mani had been a signatory to that covenant then Mani would be entitled at common law to sue Bernard for damages.¹⁹⁵ If Mani had given consideration for the promise then Mani would be entitled under contract law to sue for specific performance of the obligation to transfer the after-acquired property when it is received.¹⁹⁶ If the contract identified Mani as someone who was intended to take a benefit from it, then Mani would have rights under the Contract (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999.

189 Re Brooks’ ST [1939] 1 Ch 993.

190 Cannon v Hartley [1949] Ch 213.

191 Fletcher v Fletcher (1844) 4 Hare 67.

192 Re Ralli’s WT [1964] 1 Ch 288.

193 Paul v Paul (1882) 20 Ch D 742.

194 Re Brooks’ ST [1939] 1 Ch 993.

195 Cannon v Hartley [1949] Ch 213.

196 Pullan v Koe [1913] 1 Ch 9.

The question then arises whether or not Fran, assuming that she was a signatory to this covenant in her capacity as trustee, could sue on the terms of the covenant so as to compel Bernard to transfer to her the after-acquired property when Bernard receives it. Assuming still that Bernard had no property rights at the time of purporting to declare the trust, then there would not have been a valid trust in existence.¹⁹⁷ If there was no valid trust in existence, then Fran has no-one for whom she can hold the property on trust, even if she did sue Bernard to compel him to transfer that property across to her. Because there are no beneficiaries, on the basis that there is no trust, Fran would be holding the property for no-one: Fran could not keep it for herself beneficially because she was only ever intended to be a trustee in this example. It is not possible for Fran to hold property for no-one under English law. Therefore, Fran would have to hold the property on resulting trust for Bernard,¹⁹⁸ because there is no-one else who can take an equitable interest in it.¹⁹⁹ Consequently, the courts have held that Fran may not even commence litigation against Bernard under the covenant because it would be a waste of time (or, in the technical jargon, it would be vexatious litigation).²⁰⁰

The only way in which Mani could acquire an equitable interest under a trust in the after-acquired property – continuing the example in which there was no trust created originally and in which Mani had given no consideration – would be if it could be proved on the facts that Bernard had intended to declare a trust over the benefit of the covenant itself.²⁰¹ It is suggested that, to establish such a trust over the benefit of the covenant itself, Bernard would have had to have demonstrated that intention very clearly. If such a trust were created over the benefit of the covenant, then Mani would have rights as a beneficiary under a valid trust so that he could compel Bernard to settle the after-acquired property on trust with Fran when he does eventually receive it.

5.7 DISPOSITION OF EQUITABLE INTERESTS

A disposition of an equitable interest must be effected by signed writing as required by s 53(1)(c) of the Law of Property Act 1925, unless both legal and equitable title pass together from the trust. Where a sub-trust is created, so that the beneficiary retains some office as sub-trustee, there is no disposition of the equitable interest – unless there is an outright assignment of that equitable interest. In some cases, an agreement to transfer the equitable interest has been held to transfer the equitable interest automatically on the specific performance principle, without the need for signed writing.

5.7.1 The rule in s 53(1)(c) of the Law of Property Act 1925

The purpose of s 53(1)(c) of the Law of Property Act 1925 was twofold: first, to prevent hidden oral transactions in equitable interests defrauding those entitled to property; and,

197 Re Brooks' ST [1939] 1 Ch 993.

198 Vandervell v IRC [1967] 2 AC 291.

199 Re Pryce [1917] 1 Ch 234; Re Kay [1939] Ch 329.

200 Re Cook [1965] Ch 902.

201 Fletcher v Fletcher (1844) 4 Hare 67; Don King Productions Inc v Warren [1998] 2 All ER 608, affirmed [2000] Ch 291.

secondly, to enable trustees to know where the equitable interests are at any one time. Section 53(1)(c) provides that:

a disposition of an equitable interest or trust subsisting at the time of the disposition must be in writing signed by the person disposing of the same, or by his agent thereunto lawfully authorised in writing or by will.

Therefore, for a disposition of an equitable interest to take effect, the person who is making the disposition is required to make that disposition by signed writing. It has been held that a disposition made in two documents, when taken together, would be sufficient to satisfy s 53(1)(c).²⁰² The term ‘disposition’ is a wide one which incorporates a range of methods for transferring an equitable interest which will include gifts and sales of equitable interests but does not necessarily require that the equitable interest has been destroyed.²⁰³ To disclaim an equitable interest²⁰⁴ or to identify the person who should be entitled to one’s equitable interest under a pension fund²⁰⁵ is not to effect a disposition of such an interest. Notably, a declaration of trust does not constitute a disposition of an equitable interest because a declaration of a trust effects the creation of an equitable interest rather than a disposition of a pre-existing equitable interest.²⁰⁶ Therefore, s 53(1)(c) does not apply to declarations of trusts.

Section 53(1)(c) of the Law of Property Act 1925 does not apply in relation to a financial collateral arrangement.²⁰⁷ This is a transaction used to provide security in complex financial transactions, principally financial derivatives, where the parties transfer cash or securities to one another equal to the net exposure one party has to the other in relation to the mark-to-market value of any outstanding transactions between them.²⁰⁸

The most vital context in which s 53(1)(c) has operated on the reported cases is in relation to stamp duty. Stamp duty is a tax which is imposed on documents which effect transfers of certain types of property between persons. Therefore, the requirement that there be writing for a disposition of an equitable interest has the effect of requiring that there be a document, which in turn may create a liability to tax. Consequently, it became important for taxpayers in a number of situations to attempt to demonstrate that the transfer of their property took 202 Re Danish Bacon Co Ltd Staff Pension Fund Trusts [1971] 1 WLR 248, [1971] 1 All ER 486. See also Crowden v Aldridge [1993] 1 WLR 433, [1993] 3 All ER 603.

203 Newlon Housing Trust v Alsulaimen [1999] 1 AC 313, [1998] 4 All ER 1 in relation to the meaning of disposition under s 24 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, following Grey v IRC [1960] AC 1 in that the equitable interest need not have been extinguished to have been disposed of.

204 Re Paradise Motor Co Ltd [1968] 1 WLR 1125, [1968] 2 All ER 625.

205 Re Danish Bacon Co Ltd Staff Pension Fund Trusts [1971] 1 WLR 248, [1971] 1 All ER 486; Gold v Hill [1999] 1 FLR 54.

206 See the dicta of Lord Browne-Wilkinson to this effect in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington [1996] AC 669: a creation of a trust also creates the equitable interest in property; the equitable interest does not sit latent in property before a declaration of trust, rather before the creation of a trust over property we should think only of there being absolute title in that property.

207 That s 53(1)(c) does not apply in relation to collateral arrangements is demonstrated by Lewison J in Mills v Sportsdirect.com Retail Ltd [2010] EWHC 1072 (Ch), [2010] 2 BCLC 143, as considered in Chapter 3.

208 Financial Collateral Arrangements (No 2) Regulations 2003 (SI 2003 No 3226) Art 4(2). See the discussion of these arrangements in Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, Sweet & Maxwell, 2009, para 45–01; and by the same author, The Law on Financial Derivatives, 5th edn, Sweet & Maxwell, 2012, Chapter 12 generally.

effect without the need for a written document. This would mean the avoidance of s 53(1)(c) and the concomitant avoidance of tax. The case law which was spawned by this desperation to avoid tax is therefore quite complicated.

It is interesting that the purpose of s 53(1)(c) was to promote certainty before a disposition would be considered to have been validly effected. However, the manner in which s 53(1)(c) has been used by the taxing authorities has been to say that a disposition must have been made in writing and therefore that it is a written document which carries out the disposition, rather than the document merely providing evidence of the disposition.²⁰⁹

5.7.2 Whether or not a transaction will fall within s 53(1)(c)

The issue is then one of deciding when a disposition will fall within s 53(1)(c) – and therefore to decide how s 53(1)(c) can be avoided. The most straightforward judgment in this area is Grey v IRC.²¹⁰ This case is, in reality, a case of attempted tax avoidance in which the tax avoidance scheme was held not to work.²¹¹ The taxpayer's plan was to transfer shares to his grandchildren without paying tax by creating a trust over them and simply moving the equitable interest in the shares so as to avoid the tax regulations.

The taxpayer, Hunter, created six settlements in 1949: five were separate trusts, one each for the benefit of his five grandchildren, and the sixth was for the benefit of then-living and future grandchildren. On 1 February 1955, he transferred 18,000 ordinary shares in a company to the trustees to hold on bare trust for Hunter. Then, on 18 February 1955, Hunter irrevocably directed his trustees to hold those shares on the terms of the 1949 settlements as to 3,000 shares each. Subsequently, on 25 March 1955, Hunter and the trustees together executed six written declarations of trusts in respect of the shares which, they contended, merely confirmed the oral direction of 18 February in written terms. Hunter's plan was to argue that the oral direction, rather than the documents, effected the transfer and therefore that no stamp duty should be payable.²¹²

The question was whether the oral direction of 18 February was sufficient to transfer Hunter's interest in the shares, or whether it was required to have been done by signed writing. Hunter wanted to avoid signed writing because such a written transfer would have attracted ad valorem stamp duty. Instead, he wanted to demonstrate that his right in the shares ought to have been passed under the verbal direction of 18 February, thus avoiding the stamp duty.

The House of Lords, in the leading speech of Viscount Simonds, held that what Hunter was doing was making a disposition of his equitable interest. On the basis that the shares were held on trust for Hunter from 1 February 1955, he retained only an equitable interest in them. Therefore, it was said that he could only have been disposing of an equitable interest on 18 February. The House of Lords held that s 53(1)(c) of the 1925 Act therefore applied to require that the disposition be made in writing. The speech of Viscount Simonds repays some close attention. It is very short. Noticeably, his Lordship did not dwell on any of the niceties which will attract our attention in relation to later cases. Viscount Simonds was a

209 Grey v IRC [1960] AC 1.

210 Ibid.

211 See also Baird v Baird [1990] 2 AC 548, [1990] 2 All ER 300.

212 A similar argument was attempted in Cohen & Moore v IRC [1933] 2 KB 126.

clear-minded judge. In dealing with this case his Lordship was concerned solely with what the word ‘disposition’ means. It was argued on behalf of Hunter that the word ‘disposition’ should be given a narrow meaning drawn from early legislation based on the Statute of Frauds such that it would be limited to formal ‘grants and assignments’. Viscount Simonds made his approach clear in the first sentence when he referred to the ‘plain question’ arising on the facts.²¹³ His Lordship held that if the word ‘disposition’ was ‘given its natural meaning, it cannot, I think, be denied that a direction given by Mr Hunter, whereby the beneficial interest in the shares theretofore vested in him became vested in another or others, is a disposition’.²¹⁴ To put the same argument more simply: if Hunter’s instruction means that the equitable interest starts with one person and then moves to another person, then there has been a disposition of it. If the interest moves, then it has been subject to a disposition. It was held that there was no reason in the statute to impose any more limited meaning on the word than that.²¹⁵ It is only in later House of Lords decisions that the scope of what might constitute a disposition is narrowed greatly.

The manner of the disposition looked something like this:

On the left side of the triangle is Hunter’s original creation of a bare trust of the shares to be held on trust for himself by the Trustee. The base of the triangle depicts the attempt on 18 February to transfer his interest in the shares orally, and the successful transfer by means of signed writing on 25 March. The lines making up the right sides of the triangle depict the six 1949 settlements under which the equitable interest in the shares is then held after 25 March. The importance of the decision, as depicted in this diagram, is that Hunter had only an equitable interest at 1 February, and therefore was deemed to have attempted to make a disposition of that equitable interest when he directed his trustees to transfer the equitable interest in the shares to the 1949 grandchildren settlements. To achieve this goal under s 53(1)(c) would have required signed writing, thus attracting liability to stamp duty. The House of Lords therefore deemed the 18 February oral direction to be of no effect and therefore held that it was the written documentation of 25 March which effected the disposition: thus attracting stamp duty.

213 [1960] AC 1, 12.

214 Ibid.

215 It is an irony that in some dictionaries, the natural meaning given to the word ‘disposition’ is ‘a person’s personality or mood’ or ‘the arrangement of objects’ (such as Michael Nyman’s delicious piece of music ‘The Disposition of the Linen’ in The Draughtsman’s Contract soundtrack). However, there is a contemporaneous meaning referring to ‘the action of getting rid of or making over; bestowal by deed or will’ in the two-volume Shorter Oxford English Dictionary. However, that this word has at least two natural meanings does make the purported logic of Viscount Simonds’s approach seem a little less watertight.

In the following section are considered a number of means by which Hunter might have restructured his tax arrangements to achieve this transfer without the need for signed writing. First, however, it is important to consider a different stream of cases in which the taxpayer benefited from a different approach to s 53(1)(c) adopted by a differently constituted House of Lords.

5.7.3 Transactions not within s 53(1)(c)

As set out above, it became important in many tax contexts to demonstrate that equitable property rights could pass without the need for a document. The collective mind of the tax lawyers was therefore focused on a means of transferring rights in property without the need for signed writing under s 53(1)(c). The litigation which probed the perimeters of the rule in s 53(1)(c) was that revolving around the estate of Mr Vandervell – a man who laid down his estate so that law students could learn about dispositions of equitable interests.

Transfer of equitable interest together with legal interest

In Vandervell v IRC,²¹⁶ Mr Vandervell had begun with the philanthropic intention to benefit the Royal College of Surgeons (RCS) and presumably ended with a profound hatred of lawyers. The means by which Vandervell decided to benefit the RCS was complicated. Given the high rates of taxation at the time, it would not have been efficient for him to have made a gift of cash after having paid tax on that cash. Therefore, he decided to transfer shares to the RCS, so that when the annual dividend was paid out to the shareholders that dividend would be paid in cash to the RCS in a more tax-efficient way. The shares themselves were originally held on trust for Vandervell as sole beneficiary by a bank as trustee together with Vandervell Trustee Co Ltd, a company which was wholly owned by Vandervell and used to manage his assets under this trust. Therefore, Vandervell himself had only an equitable interest in the shares.

The Inland Revenue argued in relation to s 53(1)(c) that Vandervell had failed to divest himself of his equitable interest through this arrangement because he had made a disposition of his equitable interest as a beneficiary of the trust and therefore required signed writing to make that disposition effective. Consequently, it was argued, the Vandervell settlement (and Mr Vandervell as beneficiary) retained the equitable interest in the shares, making him liable to taxation.

The House of Lords rejected the argument that Vandervell had not divested himself of his equitable interest in accordance with the requirements of s 53(1). It was held that where a beneficiary directs a trustee to move the entire absolute interest in property (that is, both legal and equitable interests together) to new trusts, there does not need to be a separate disposition of the equitable interest under s 53(1)(c), and neither can the beneficiary be said to retain any of the beneficial interest. It was the court's unanimous view that s 53(1)(c) was not intended to cover dealings with the absolute title in property (that is, both legal and equitable together); rather, it was meant to cover dispositions of the equitable interest alone. Therefore, Vandervell won on the s 53(1)(c) point.

216 [1967] 2 AC 291, HL.

A number of other arguments were raised. It was suggested, in accordance with principles discussed elsewhere in this chapter, that perhaps Vandervell had done all that was required of him to divest himself of his rights in the shares. It was Lord Wilberforce who considered expressly whether or not the beneficiary had done all that he was required to do to divest himself of his equitable interest under Re Rose,²¹⁷ but he held that this simply begged the question as to what exactly the beneficiary was required to do to rid himself of that interest. The transaction in Vandervell can be represented by the following diagram:

The three lines represent the three stages in the transaction. Line 1 represents the pre-existing Vandervell settlement on which the shares were held on trust for the benefit of Mr Vandervell. Line 2 represents the instruction given by Mr Vandervell to the Trustee that his equitable interest should be combined with the legal title, and that both should be transferred to the RCS. Line 3 represents the eventual transfer of legal and equitable title together. It is this transmission of absolute title in the property which is said to keep this arrangement outwith the scope of s 53(1)(c) because legal and equitable title passed together. The rationales given for finding that this transfer of legal and equitable title together does not constitute a 'disposition' of the equitable interest require some attention.²¹⁸ Lord Donovan took the view that if one had satisfied the formalities necessary to transfer the legal title, and if the two titles were to pass together, then there should be no further formality necessary (under s 53(1)(c)) to transfer the equitable interest.²¹⁹ Lord Wilberforce accepted that there was no need to have a separate formality for the transfer of the equitable interest if there was already clear compliance with the formalities for transferring the legal title (and if both titles were then to pass together). He argued for this state of affairs by reference to Re Rose (considered earlier in this chapter) by saying that because Mr Vandervell had done everything necessary for him to do to transfer legal and equitable title to the Royal College of Surgeons then

217 [1952] Ch 499.

218 Their Lordships focused primarily on the effect of resulting trusts in this context, but Lords Donovan and Wilberforce lavished some attention on the proper analysis of s 53(1)(c).

219 [1967] 2 AC 291, 317–8: (that is, 'In such a case I see no room for the operation of s 53(1)(c)').

the equitable interest should be considered to have passed automatically to the College.²²⁰ Lord Wilberforce considered that the purpose of s 53(1)(c) was merely to prove who held the equitable interest; whereas Viscount Simonds in Grey v IRC seemed to consider that compliance with s 53(1)(c) in itself was required effectively to carry out the disposition of that equitable interest.

Now, it is noticeable that in Grey v IRC Viscount Simonds did not discuss any of these niceties. Indeed, it is possible that if Viscount Simonds had decided Vandervell v IRC then he would have found that because the equitable interest in the shares moved from Mr Vandervell to another person (the Royal College of Surgeons) then there had simply been a disposition of that equitable interest. It is a different, more modern House of Lords (many of whom had practised commercial law and who were therefore more accepting of these sorts of clever schemes) which is prepared to accept that Vandervell's scheme should avoid s 53(1)(c). So, what do we make of the analysis which Grey v IRC gives of s 53(1)(c) in the light of the decision in Vandervell v IRC? It is suggested, taking the two cases together, that Grey applies now only to cases in which there is no movement of the legal and equitable titles together, but rather only a movement of the equitable interest on its own: this is so because Vandervell v IRC is authority for the proposition that if the equitable interest passes with the legal title then s 53(1)(c) does not apply. So, signed writing is only required under s 53(1)(c) if the legal title is not passed to new trustees on new trusts and if the equitable interest is transferred alone; whereas signed writing is not required if the legal and equitable titles are passed together either to a different trust or by way of a transfer of absolute title.

However, Vandervell lost this case on another, important point. On transfer of the shares to the RCS, Vandervell was concerned that the Vandervell settlement be able to recover the shares once the dividend pay-out had benefited the RCS. Therefore, the transfer to the RCS was made subject to an option that the shares could be repurchased for £5,000. The problem was that the documentation did not make clear who would be entitled to exercise the option to repurchase the shares. The option constituted an equitable interest in the shares, but it was not made clear who was to be the owner of the equitable interest (given that the Vandervell Trustee Ltd was intended only to hold the option as a fiduciary): that gap in the ownership of the shares constituted by the option was the issue before the court. The House of Lords held that because there was no equitable owner specified over the option, that option must be treated as being held on resulting trust for the person who had it originally: in short, it was held on resulting trust for Mr Vandervell under the terms of the original Vandervell settlement. Therefore, because Vandervell had failed to divest himself of the whole of his equitable interest in the shares, the Vandervell settlement was held liable for tax in connection with them. This issue is considered in more detail in Chapter 11.

It had been unclear whether or not an option could have been held on resulting trust. The House of Lords was split on whether an option could be held on trusts which Vandervell would declare from time to time or that the option was held on trusts to be decided at a later date. It was held instead that where the legal owner vests the legal estate in a trustee before specifying the trusts, the trustee holds the property on resulting trust for the settlor until the trusts are declared – any declaration of those trusts will result in a disposition of that equitable interest under s 53(1)(c).

220 [1967] 2 AC 291, 330.

5.7.4 Declaration of a new trust by trustees or third party with dispositive powers

The Vandervell litigation had only just begun. The Inland Revenue intensified its efforts in the wake of a decision of the House of Lords in *Vandervell v White*²²¹ concerning the tax aspects of the transaction. As a result of that case, the issue arose as to treatment of the shares once the option to repurchase them had been exercised. This problem was confronted in Vandervell (No 2),²²² a notoriously difficult case. At first instance, Megarry J delivered a seminal judgment on the operation of resulting trusts, which is considered in detail in Chapter 11. The issue was appealed to the Court of Appeal, where Lord Denning embarked on a remarkable intellectual odyssey to save the Vandervell estate from further exposure to taxation.²²³

The Inland Revenue was claiming that the executors of Vandervell's estate were liable to it for the beneficial interest in the shares when the Vandervell settlement repurchased under the option which had been held over in Vandervell v IRC.²²⁴ Therefore, the executors had to bring an action against the trustees of the trusts to pay off the Inland Revenue. The trustees maintained that Vandervell did not own any rights in the shares after the transfer to the RCS, so that the children could benefit because no provision had been made for them in the will.

The Inland Revenue had pulled out of the litigation at the Court of Appeal stage, leaving a stepmother (claiming for the property to return to the Vandervell estate, in the person of the executors) trying to prevent the shares passing to the benefit of Vandervell's children by his first marriage who would take the property under the children settlement. (See, it's just like a soap opera: stepmother fighting with the stepchildren over the dead man's estate.)

The majority of the Court of Appeal held that (1) new trusts over the shares had been declared, and (2) even if they had not been declared, the executors would have been estopped from asserting their interest in the shares. This appears from the decision of Lord Denning. The root of the decision is that the option rights disappear once the option is exercised, leaving a question as to who should get the proprietary rights in the shares.

The two points need some careful examination. The declaration of the new trusts over the shares was by the trustees under the fiduciary capability identified by Lord Upjohn in Vandervell v IRC,²²⁵ according to Stephenson LJ. In other words, because the option rights disappear, it is possible for the trustees to decide to whom the shares should pass beneficially. Clearly, this extraordinary proposition conflicts with the decision in Re Brooks' ST,²²⁶ under which it was said that the trustee cannot declare entirely new trusts over the property – a trustee can only enforce the terms of the trust.

As to the second limb of the decision (that the trustees would have been estopped from refusing to pass the shares to the children settlement), it is unclear how the estoppel arises

221 [1970] 3 WLR 452.

222 [1974] Ch 269.

223 By the time of this appeal, Vandervell had died and the litigation was between Vandervell's children and their stepmother, whereby the children were seeking to argue that the shares had passed into a settlement created for their benefit whereas their stepmother was seeking to show that the shares returned to the Vandervell settlement, thus to Vandervell's estate and so to her personally as Vandervell's next of kin.

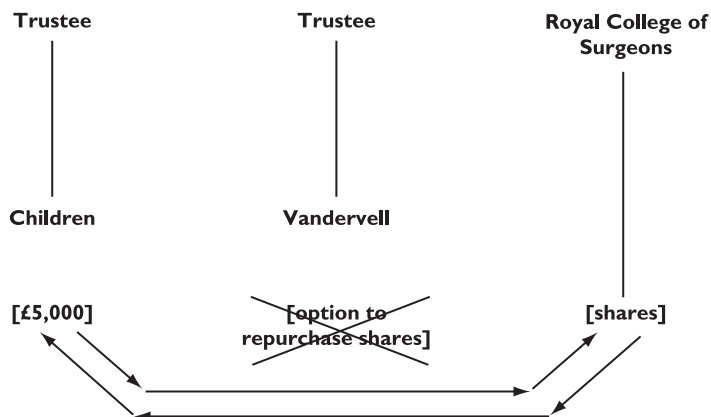

224 [1967] 2 AC 291.

225 Ibid.

226 [1939] 1 Ch 993.

here. The authority which is invoked for this estoppel is Hughes v Metropolitan Railway.²²⁷ It is important to note, however, that Hughes is a case dealing with promissory estoppel which does not cater specifically for the presence or absence of rights in property. The clear impression is that Lord Denning was eager to find a ‘just’ solution to the practical problems of ending the Vandervell litigation once and for all, and allocating the deceased’s property between the family members.

The following diagram indicates Lord Denning’s analysis of the transaction and the movements in title in the various items of property:

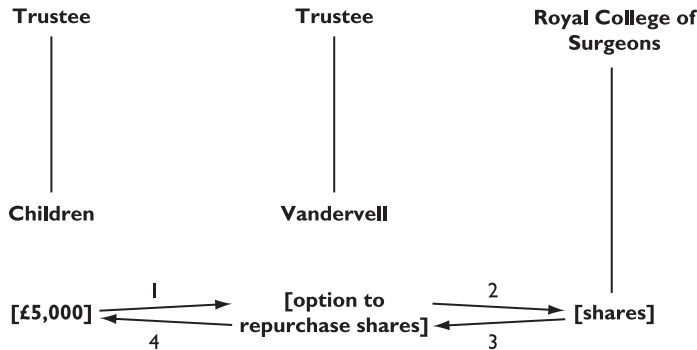

This transaction seems more complicated. The vertical lines show the pre-existing equitable ownership of each item of property. The RCS are equitable owners of the shares; the Vandervell settlement retains the equitable title in the option to repurchase the shares (remembering that the option is itself property); and the children settlement has the £5,000 in cash which is needed to exercise the option.

In Lord Denning’s analysis, the option simply ceases to exist once it is exercised (which is why the diagram shows the option being crossed out). Therefore, Lord Denning finds that the question as to where the equitable title in the option rests is a matter for debate once the option rights have disappeared. Consequently, Lord Denning held that the children settlement must be deemed to acquire the equitable interest immediately on the basis that it is the children settlement which provides the money to exercise the option. Consequently, the bottom lines of the diagram show the money moving from the children settlement to the RCS, and the shares moving directly to the children settlement. Therefore, says Lord Denning, no property passes through the Vandervell settlement and there is no tax liability attaching to that settlement.

There is only one flaw with this theory: it is completely contrary to principle.²²⁸ The better analysis, it is suggested, must operate on the basis of the diagram below:

²²⁷ (1877) 2 App Cas 439.

²²⁸ Stephenson LJ clearly had doubts about this approach: a criminal law specialist, he suggested in his judgment that he was being required to walk ‘a dark and unfamiliar path’ in deciding this case.

On the basis of this diagram we see a far more watertight analysis of the various transactions. Line 1 represents the transfer of the £5,000 from the children settlement. The proper analysis must be – because the money is being used to exercise the option, and because that option can only be exercised by the Vandervell settlement as equitable owner of the option – that £5,000 is transferred from one settlement to the other by way of gift, loan or contract. Whatever the legal analysis of the transfer of that £5,000, that is a legal relationship between the trustees of those two trusts only, which cannot bind the RCS because the RCS has never been made a party to it. The RCS has a subsisting legal relationship only with the Vandervell settlement by reference to the option to repurchase the shares – a contract between those two.

Therefore, on the exercise of the option, proprietary rights in the shares must be transferred to the Vandervell settlement, or else the RCS would be in breach of its contract to retransfer the shares to the Vandervell settlement on payment of £5,000. The rights represented by the option do not disappear. That option is itself property (in the form of a chose in action). Rather, the transfer of that piece of property leads necessarily to the acquisition by the Vandervell settlement of rights in other property (the shares themselves), as represented by line 2 (exercise of the option) and line 3 (transfer of the shares). It is then line 4 that represents the claim the children settlement may have against the Vandervell settlement, based on contract (or possibly some principle of estoppel or constructive trust) to transfer the shares to the children settlement. However, for tax purposes, it must be the case that the property is transferred via the Vandervell settlement, thus making the Vandervell settlement liable for tax.

5.7.5 Were Grey v IRC and Vandervell v IRC decided correctly?

The litigation on s 53(1)(c) can appear to be complicated, even though it revolves around a very simple idea concerning the need for writing in making dispositions of equitable interests.²²⁹

The analysis in this short section is derived from an article by Green.²³⁰ It revolves around a close reading of the facts in the Grey and Vandervell decisions. Remember our realpolitik 229 If you think you have heard enough and you are worried about becoming horribly confused, you might decide to skip this next section. Those of you who are brave enough might persevere though. No pain, no gain.

230 (1984) 47 MLR 388.

thesis that some judges have taken restrictive, literal views of the law (like Viscount Simonds in Grey) whereas others are more permissive (like Lord Wilberforce in Vandervell and Chinn v Collins below). Therefore, it is possible to see different outcomes as being a result of comparative judicial reluctance not to make it too easy to elude s 53(1)(c). Building on that idea, Green suggests that we should look at Grey a little differently. Remember the diagram:

The complaint is that while the direction was given by Hunter to the Trustee to move the equitable interest, it would have been open to the court to find that there had in fact been a resettlement of the shares on new trusts, and not simply a disposition of the equitable interest. Possibly, the court was caught in deciding that the Trustee was the same human being, rather than saying the Trustee was acting in different capacities as trustee of seven different trusts. Therefore, perhaps Hunter should be deemed to have directed the trustee of his trust to transfer both legal and equitable title in the shares to the trustees of six different trusts. On that basis, the diagram would look as follows:

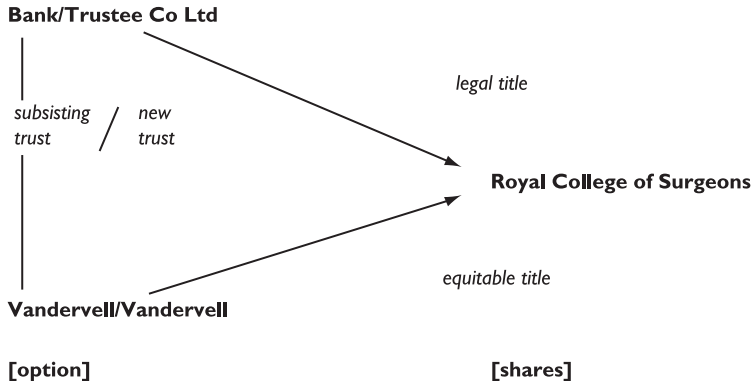

That is, the legal title and the equitable interest passing together from the Hunter trust to the six 1949 grandchildren settlements. Therefore, there ought to be no need for signed writing in line with the decision in Vandervell v IRC.

Similarly, it is not clear how the legal title for the shares in Vandervell is held at the outset. It is clear that Vandervell retained a part of the equitable interest in the shares, and therefore the whole of the equitable interest was not transferred with the legal title such that the RCS could have claimed to have had absolute title in the property. Therefore, the question arises: has Hunter made a partial disposition of his equitable interest, without transferring the whole in conjunction with the legal interest? Indeed, the bank and the Vandervell Trustee Co Ltd retain the legal title over that option as trustees for Vandervell – therefore, the whole of the legal interest had not transferred out of the Vandervell settlement.

The further problem is the identity of the trustee for Mr Vandervell. It would appear that the shares were held on trust for Vandervell by the bank under a bare trust. The right to exercise the option to buy back the shares was vested in Vandervell Trustee Co Ltd (VTCO, a company over which Vandervell had control which operated as a trustee for him). The issue with the option was that it was held by VTCO on trust but the identity of the beneficiary was not made clear – therefore, it was held that it was to be held on resulting trust for Vandervell. However, if the bank held as trustee of the shares at the outset, for VTCO to act as trustee of the option must mean that the property was not in fact held on resulting trust for Vandervell, because that would have required the bank to be the trustee of the option. Rather, if the option was held by VTCO, a trustee of a different trust, for Vandervell, then the option was held on a different express trust for Vandervell and not on resulting trust at all. Therefore, the analysis from Grey v IRC would seem applicable here because the bank remains the ultimate trustee in the sense of a custodian, in some capacity, of the shares even when they are transferred beneficially to the Royal College of Surgeons, with the result that it could only have been the equitable interest which moved in that case. This was not the analysis used by the House of Lords, but it is a possible analysis on the facts nevertheless.

Consequently, the Vandervell diagram might be as follows:

The following sections consider a number of means by which s 53(1)(c) is purportedly avoided.

5.7.6 Sub-trusts

There are a number of subtle shades of distinction between disposing of an equitable interest and creating a sub-trust. A sub-trust would include a situation in which the beneficiary under a trust agrees to hold a part of her own equitable interest on trust for another person. A little like a tenant holding rights on a subtenancy for a sub-tenant, the beneficiary under a trust can hold her equitable interest on sub-trust for a sub-beneficiary. This should be counterposed with an assignment of a tenancy in which the assignee would become the new tenant in place of the assignor; thus, a beneficiary who creates a sub-trust may be deemed to have made a disposition of all of her rights under the trust if the sub-beneficiary receives all of her equitable interest.

Therefore, the important element to a sub-trust is that the beneficiary retains some equitable right in the property held for her benefit under the trust, in contradistinction to the situation in which that beneficiary transfers absolutely all of her equitable rights in the trust property to the sub-beneficiary. By ‘retaining some right’ in the property is meant, for example, retaining some discretion as sub-trustee as to the amount of income to be paid to the sub-beneficiary from time to time. It is important that the beneficiary as sub-trustee retain some office to repel the argument that she has disposed of all of her rights in the property.

The situation in which the beneficiary transfers all of her rights to the sub-beneficiary is properly analysed as an assignment of the property. Such an outright assignment of all of the beneficiary’s equitable rights would constitute a disposition of the trust property. The metaphor used in *Re Lashmar*²³¹ is that we can look through a bare trustee so that the beneficiary who is to act as ‘sub-trustee’ effectively drops out of the picture, having disposed of her equitable interest in favour of a new beneficiary so that the trustee is now effectively holding the property for the sub-beneficiary directly.

The question for the legal advisor which arises with reference to s 53(1)(c) of the Law of Property Act 1925 is whether the sub-trust constitutes a disposition of the entire equitable interest, or whether the beneficiary retains some rights so that it does not constitute such a disposition. As Lindley LJ put it, the question is whether or not ‘the trustee had duties to perform’ in her capacity as trustee, or whether she had no duties to perform such that the sub-beneficiary could ‘look through her’.²³² It has been held that the creation of a sub-trust will not constitute a disposition of an equitable interest on the basis that the trustee retains some duties qua trustees or rights in the property and therefore has not made a full disposition of those rights.²³³ To preserve the distinction between a sub-trust and an outright assignment, the beneficiary would be required to retain some office as a trustee – such as exercising a discretionary power over the selection of beneficiaries – to ensure that the arrangement is classified as a sub-trust.

5.7.7 Declaration of new trust

Following from the point made above about the creation of a sub-trust, a further means of avoiding the requirement of s 53(1)(c) of the 1925 Act would be to declare a new trust over the trust property. The question which arises is whether a declaration of a new trust by a beneficiary under an existing trust over that equitable interest would constitute a disposition of an equitable interest within s 53(1).

It should be recalled that a declaration of a new trust over property in which the settlor holds absolute title is not a disposition of an equitable interest; rather, that is the time at which the settlor creates the equitable interest.²³⁴ If the beneficiary under an existing trust terminates that trust (under Saunders v Vautier)²³⁵ and declares new trusts over the property previously held on trust, that will not constitute a disposition of the equitable interest (as argued unsuccessfully in Cohen & Moore v IRC)²³⁶ – a point considered in greater detail below.

231 (1891) 1 Ch D 258.

232 [1891] 1 Ch 258, 268, per Lindley LJ.

233 Ibid; Grainge v Wilberforce (1889) 5 TLR 436; DHN Food Distributors Ltd v Tower Hamlets LBC [1976] 1 WLR 852, [1976] 3 All ER 462.

Similarly, a variation of a trust under the Variation of Trusts Act 1958²³⁷ will not constitute a disposition of an equitable interest within s 53(1)(c) requiring signed writing.²³⁸ In Re Vandervell (No 2),²³⁹ Lord Denning held that the trustees were entitled to declare new trusts over the property held by the RCS. However, following the decision in *Re Brooks' ST*²⁴⁰ it is said that it is impossible for trustees to declare new trusts over the trust property, in contradistinction to a formal variation under the 1958 Act, as considered by Megarry J in Re Holt's Settlement.²⁴¹

It is only if the beneficiary directs the trustee that the property then held on trust is to be held on the same trusts but for a different person as beneficiary that there is a disposition of an equitable interest under s 53(1)(c).²⁴² In this context, it could be said that the analysis set out in *Grey v IRC*²⁴³ is the one which future litigants will necessarily seek to avoid if they are trying to escape the need for signed writing, or if they are seeking to argue that an interest has passed when no signed writing was effected.

Assignment of equitable interests

It is clear that an equitable interest is capable of assignment. Where such an outright assignment takes place under which the equitable interest is still held on the terms of the same trusts, there will have been a disposition of that interest.²⁴⁴ It is only if the assignment has been onto new trusts that no disposition will have taken place either because equitable title will have passed with the legal title,²⁴⁵ or because there has been a formal variation of the trusts.²⁴⁶ These points are considered further below.

Direction to trustees to hold on trust for another

A direction to bare trustees to transfer the beneficial interest in assets to other trustees of a separate settlement to be held on the trusts of that settlement constitutes a disposition of an equitable interest requiring s 53(1)(c) writing.²⁴⁷ Alternatively, the beneficiary, if absolutely 234 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669; Grey v IRC [1960] AC 1.

235 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

236 [1933] All ER 950.

237 Considered below in Chapter 10.

238 In Re Holt's Settlement [1969] 1 Ch 100.

239 [1974] Ch 269.

240 [1939] 1 Ch 993.

241 [1969] 1 Ch 100.

242 Grey v IRC [1960] AC 1.

243 Ibid.

244 Ibid.

245 Vandervell v IRC [1967] 2 AC 291.

246 Re Holt's Settlement [1969] 1 Ch 100.

247 Grey v IRC [1960] AC 1.

entitled, could exercise her rights under *Saunders v Vautier*²⁴⁸ to direct the trustee to transfer both the legal and equitable title in the trust fund to new trusts.²⁴⁹ This second approach would not constitute a disposition of an equitable interest under s 53(1)(c) because both legal and equitable title pass together. Remember, the principle in Saunders v Vautier permits all of the beneficiaries (provided they are sui juris and acting together) to direct the trustees how to deal with the trust property: including directing a termination of the trust. No case has yet held such a direction to be a disposition of such an equitable interest. However, Green argues that a declaration effected specifically over a trust of an equitable interest must amount to a disposition of that equitable interest (a proposition taken from the speech of Viscount Simonds in Grey v IRC).²⁵⁰

As an alternative means of avoiding the result in Grey v IRC,²⁵¹ Hunter would have been better advised to create a new trust and thus avoid ad valorem stamp duty. The appropriate steps would be orally to declare himself trustee of the shares alongside two existing trustees and then to retire from the position of trustee, leaving two others behind such that there would be no need to transfer the legal estate to a new trustee. The two remaining trustees would then prepare a document confirming that they held on the trusts originally declared by Hunter.

Automatic transfer under variation of trust

The question of varying trusts is considered in detail in Chapter 10. Under the terms of the Variation of Trusts Act 1958 and in line with the common law set out in Chapman v Chapman,²⁵² it is possible for the trustees and the beneficiaries to apply to the court for an order varying the terms of the trust. A number of questions arise in general terms: the main question is typically whether the variation canvassed in front of the court is merely a variation of the trust or rather a wholesale resettlement of the trust fund on new trusts. Deciding between those two options is a matter of degree. A further issue, which is more pertinent to the current discussion, is whether the variation of trust constitutes a disposition of an equitable interest by any beneficiary.

An example of this latter issue arose in Re Holt's Settlement.²⁵³ An originating summons was served under the Variation of Trusts Act 1958, by which the settlor's daughter sought to surrender her life interest in one-half of the income of the trust so that she could both reduce her own liability to surtax and increase the entitlement of her children to the life interest. One question which arose was whether the mother's surrender of her life interest to her children constituted a disposition which required signed writing within s 53(1)(c) of the 1925 Act.

The doctrine in *Re Hambleton's Will Trusts*²⁵⁴ stated that an order of the court permitting a variation automatically varied the trust without the need for any further action on the part of the trustees. This decision ostensibly contravened that in Re Joseph's Will Trusts,²⁵⁵ in

248 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

249 Vandervell v IRC [1967] 2 AC 291.

250 [1960] AC 1.

251 Ibid.

252 [1954] 2 WLR 723.

253 [1969] 1 Ch 100.

254 [1960] 1 WLR 82.

255 [1959] 1 WLR 1019.

which case Vaisey J had held that it was necessary for the judge to include words in the court order permitting the trustees to alter the trusts, rather than acknowledging that the court order automatically had that effect. While this may appear to be a rule of little wider relevance, it was held in Re Holt's Settlement that the fact that the court order permitted the trustees to treat the trust as having been altered automatically meant that there was no need for the trustees to perform any formality to secure that variation. Consequently, the automatic effect of the order meant that the equitable interest passed to the disponent's children without the need for signed writing.

Therefore, a further means of eluding s 53(1)(c) is to acquire an order of the court permitting a variation of the trust in a manner which transfers the equitable interest from the beneficiary to another person. That order takes effect automatically without the need for signed writing.

5.7.8 Contractual transfer of equitable interest

The celebrated doctrine in *Walsh v Lonsdale*²⁵⁶ set out an important facet of the interrelationship between common law and equity. That case concerned an agreement to grant a seven-year lease with rent payable in advance at the beginning of each year. No formal lease was ever created. However, the tenant went into occupation and began to pay rent quarterly in arrears, as though a tenant under a legal periodic tenancy. The issue arose whether the court should enforce the requirement for rent to be paid each year in advance on the basis that the agreement for a lease constituted an equitable lease,²⁵⁷ or whether the court should give effect to the rent agreement established by the periodic tenancy. The court held that in situations in which an equitable and a common law analysis conflict, equity prevails, and therefore the contract for rent in advance would be effected in equity.

The further point raised by the doctrine of equitable leases is that where there is a contract to perform an action, the contracting party receiving the benefit of that action receives an equitable right of specific performance which entitles her to force the other party to carry out its contractual obligations. This rule operates on the basis of the equitable maxim 'equity looks upon as done that which ought to have been done'. Therefore, it is said that the contracting party acquires an equitable interest in any property which is to be transferred to her in accordance with the terms of the contract.

In terms of s 53(1)(c), this offers very exciting possibilities. The doctrine in Walsh v Lonsdale provides that an equitable interest in property passes automatically on the creation of a contract to transfer that property. In respect of dispositions of an equitable interest, this opens up the possibility that the equitable interest could be passed from one person to another without the need for signed writing. Thus, in Oughtred v IRC,²⁵⁸ a mother and son sought to transfer the equitable interest in two parcels of shares which were held on trust for each of them. However, to have executed such a transfer in writing would have meant that the mother and son would have been subject to stamp duty. Therefore, they entered into an oral contract under which they sought to argue the equitable interest had passed before signed writing being effected. The judgment is slightly equivocal, particularly the speech of Lord

256 (1882) 21 Ch D 9.

257 Parker v Taswell (1858) 27 LJ Ch 812.

258 [1960] AC 206.

Jenkins, in that he finds there has been no case which prevents a subsequent written transfer being subject to stamp duty despite the purported previous transfer of the equitable interest.²⁵⁹

The more straightforward approach is summarised in the old case of Lysaght v Edwards.²⁶⁰ Lord Jessel MR held expressly that contracts for the sale of land pass the equitable interest in that land before any signed writing which is effected subsequently.²⁶¹ Later, in Chinn v Collins,²⁶² Lord Wilberforce expressly approved the suggestion that the formation of a binding contract to transfer property automatically passed equitable interest in any property which was the subject matter of that contract without the need for any formality (other than any formality necessary to form a valid contract in those circumstances).²⁶³ It is arguable that both of these judicial comments were obiter dicta. However, the modern authorities are clear that a contract to make a disposition is not a disposition in itself.²⁶⁴ So in Neville v Wilson,²⁶⁵ two shareholders had entered into a verbal agreement to the effect that the company should be wound up and the company's property divided between them in proportion to their shareholdings. It was held that by virtue of the binding agreement between the parties, the rights attaching to each of the parties' shares were held on constructive trust one for the other. There was therefore no need for signed writing to transfer these equitable interests.

5.7.9 Dispositions effected by trusts implied by law

As mentioned earlier, there is an exception from the general need for formalities built into s 53 by s 53(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925, in relation to trusts which are imposed by the court by operation of law rather than being purportedly express trusts. These issues are considered below in Part 4. In short, there are no formalities necessary where the court imposes such a trust.

It was held in Chinn v Collins,²⁶⁶ in which the argument was put on the basis of constructive trust, that where a contract is made (that is, in circumstances in which an equitable interest is used to discharge a debt), a bare constructive trust will arise in favour of the party holding the chose in action. Similarly to the principle in Walsh v Lonsdale,²⁶⁷ it is assumed by equity that everything which ought to have been done has been done. Therefore, where there is a contract to transfer an equitable interest in property, equity considers that the contract has succeeded in transferring equitable title in the property before any formal disposition of that interest is necessary.²⁶⁸ Until the formal transfer of the interest is effected, the party obliged to transfer it under the terms of the contract is deemed to be constructive trustee of that property for the purchaser.

259 Followed in Parinv (Hatfield) Ltd v IRC [1998] STC 305.

260 (1876) 2 Ch D 499.

261 Ibid., 507.

262 [1981] AC 533.

263 Ibid., 548.

264 Neville v Wilson [1997] Ch 144.

265 [1997] Ch 144. An alternative view was taken in United Bank of Kuwait plc v Sahib [1997] Ch 107, 129; [1995] 2 All ER 973, 992, where Chadwick J held that he could not see that Oughtred v IRC created such a principle.

266 [1981] AC 533, 548.

267 (1882) 21 Ch D 9.

268 Chinn v Collins [1981] AC 533, 548, per Lord Wilberforce.

Therefore, the development which Chinn v Collins established was that the equitable interest transferred automatically on the basis of constructive trust, rather than by means of the somewhat convoluted rule in Walsh v Lonsdale. The constructive trust would arise on the basis that it would be unconscionable for the party obliged to transfer title under the contract to refuse to observe that contractual obligation.²⁶⁹ The one advantage to this approach is that the doctrine in Walsh v Lonsdale depends on the availability of specific performance, whereas the constructive trust arises whether or not specific performance would be available. Therefore, in relation to contracts in which specific performance would not be available, the constructive trust device will permit the proprietary rights to be transferred automatically. The further advantage of the constructive trust is that it does not require any formality in its creation.²⁷⁰

The case of *Neville v Wilson*²⁷¹ approved the transfer of an equitable interest automatically on the creation of a contract between the transferor and transferee, on the basis that a constructive trust arose on creation of the contract which compelled the transfer of that equitable interest without the need for further formality. In that case, there was an agreement for the winding up of a company, in line with insolvency legislation. The issue which arose was whether the creation of the agreement meant that the rights attaching to the shares were held by each of the parties on constructive trust for the other party, or whether the liquidation of the company prevented such a transfer taking place. The Court of Appeal held that the creation of the agreement did cause the equitable interest in the shares to pass automatically on constructive trust.²⁷² Nourse LJ held that this was in line with the speech of Lord Radcliffe in the House of Lords in *Oughtred v IRC*²⁷³ and also with Upjohn J in the same case, and also with London and South Western Railway Co v Gomm.²⁷⁴ One point which is not considered in full is the transmutation in this doctrine from the rule in *Walsh v Lonsdale*²⁷⁵ based on specific performance to a rule based on constructive trust thinking – that much is accepted without comment. It might be that the development of this area of law into concepts based on constructive trust simply marks a new trend in judicial thinking which values the apparent certainties of the law of trusts over the vague principles of equity as personified by 19th century cases like Walsh v Lonsdale.

5.7.10 Summary: analysing dispositions of equitable interests

Given the complexity of this subject, it is perhaps helpful to summarise the various possible analyses set out above. It is worth remembering that there remains an issue as to whether or not, on their own facts, *Grey v IRC*²⁷⁶ and *Vandervell v IRC*²⁷⁷ are correct.²⁷⁸ The following nine points delineate the possible analyses:

269 Cf Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

270 Law of Property Act 1925, s 53(2): a proposition also accepted by Megarry J in Re Holt's Settlement [1969] 1 Ch 100.

271 [1997] Ch 144.

272 This approach was accepted in Sahota v Bains [2006] EWHC 131 (Ch).

273 [1960] AC 206.

274 (1882) 20 Ch D 562, per Lord Jessel MR.

275 (1882) 21 Ch D 9.

276 [1960] AC 1.

277 [1967] 2 AC 291.

278 Green (1984) 47 MLR 388; Harris (1975) 38 MLR 557.

- (a) The core of the problem is the need for a disposition of equitable interest to be effected in signed writing.²⁷⁹
- (b) Where there is a clear intention on the part of the beneficiary that her equitable interest is to be passed to another beneficiary, this requires signed writing under s 53(1)(c) to be effective.²⁸⁰
- (c) The most straightforward means of avoiding s 53(1)(c) would be as follows. The whole interest in the property (comprising both legal and equitable title) must be transferred to new trustees in favour of new beneficiaries as in Vandervell v IRC.²⁸¹ Where this is achieved, it will not constitute a disposition of the equitable interest within s 53(1)(c). One explanation of this reasoning might be that the transfer of legal and equitable title together is analogous to the situation in which the absolutely-entitled beneficiary invokes her *Saunders v Vautier*²⁸² rights and directs the trustee to declare new trusts over the entire interest.
- (d) Alternatively, where the beneficiary under an existing trust declares a sub-trust over that existing equitable interest, it is unclear under Vandervell v IRC whether a sub-trust can be created without the need for signed writing under s 53(1)(c). The analyses appear to find either that there has been the creation of a sub-trust in which the beneficiary retains some office as trustee and therefore has not disposed of the entire beneficial interest; or there has been a sub-trust created under which the beneficiary has passed on her entire equitable interest (and then drops out of the picture as in Re Lashmar)²⁸³ requiring signed writing under s 53(1)(c).
- (e) It has been accepted that the trustees might make a declaration of trust. Under the principle in Re Brooks' ST,²⁸⁴ it was held that the trustees could not declare new trusts over the property themselves. However, in Re Vandervell (No 2),²⁸⁵ it was held that the trustees had the power to declare the trusts where there had been an express transfer of the property between trusts.
- (f) Otherwise, in Re Vandervell (No 2), there might have been a perfect gift made over the income derived from the trust property. Consequently, there would not be disposition of any equitable interest, unless some kind of proprietary estoppel can be proved as in Re Basham.²⁸⁶ However, the estoppel invoked in Vandervell (No 2) is very dubious, invoking *Hughes v Metropolitan Railway*²⁸⁷ (a case on promissory estoppel) as authority.
- (g) More directly, the beneficiary could use her Saunders v Vautier rights in calling for the trust property (where sui juris, and absolutely entitled), or could direct the trustees to pay the income from the trust fund to another beneficiary.
- (h) A variation of trusts under the Variation of Trusts Act 1958 will effect a disposition of an equitable interest without the need for signed writing.²⁸⁸

279 Law of Property Act 1925, s 53(1)(c).

280 Grey v IRC [1960] AC 1.

281 [1967] 2 AC 291.

282 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

283 (1891) 1 Ch 258.

284 [1939] 1 Ch 993.

285 [1974] Ch 269.

286 [1986] 1 WLR 1498.

287 (1877) 2 App Cas 439.

288 In Re Holt's Settlement [1969] 1 Ch 100.

- (i) In line with Walsh v Lonsdale,²⁸⁹ the minority opinion in *Oughtred v IRC*²⁹⁰ suggested that where there is a valid contract to sell an equitable interest, the vendor holds the property as constructive trustee of his equitable interest for the buyer, and therefore there is a disposition of the equitable interest without the need to comply with s 53(1)(c). Similarly, in Chinn v Collins,²⁹¹ Lord Wilberforce held that the equitable interest is transferred directly after the contract is created on the basis of constructive trust (as applied in Neville v Wilson).²⁹²

289 (1882) 21 Ch D 9.

290 [1960] AC 206.

291 [1981] AC 533.

292 [1997] Ch 144.

Secret trusts

6.1 INTRODUCTION	301
6.1.1 The statutory background	302
6.1.2 Distinguishing between types of secret trust	303
6.1.3 An example of a secret trust	304
6.1.4 Explaining the role of the secret trust	305
6.1.5 Mapping the discussion to follow	306
6.2 FULLY SECRET TRUSTS	307
6.2.1 Creating a valid, fully secret trust	307
6.2.2 Intention to benefit	308
6.2.3 Communication of the secret trust	309
6.2.4 Acceptance of the office of trustee	310
6.2.5 Consequence of the failure of secret trust	311
6.3 HALF-SECRET TRUSTS	312
6.3.1 Creating a valid half-secret trust	312
6.3.2 Communication	312
6.3.3 Acceptance	313
6.3.4 Clash of doctrines – beneficiary attesting to the will	313
6.4 GENERAL PRINCIPLES	314
6.4.1 The problem with secret trusts	314
6.4.2 Trustee dies before the settlor	314
6.4.3 Disclaimer of the trust	315
6.4.4 Where further property is added to a secret trust	315
6.4.5 Secret trusts arising on intestacy	316
6.4.6 Specific problems of evidence	316
6.4.7 Secret trustees with different knowledge	318
6.4.8 Time of the creation of the trust	319
6.5 THE PROBATE DOCTRINE OF INCORPORATION BY REFERENCE	319
6.6 CATEGORISING THE SECRET TRUST	320
6.6.1 The traditional view	320
6.6.2 The modern view	322
6.6.3 The split view	322

6.6.4 Secret trusts simply as an exception to the Wills Act 323

6.6.5 An alternative view – secret trusts and good conscience 324

OVERVIEW

A secret trust arises when a testator wishes to benefit some person who cannot be named in the will; therefore the testator will ask a trusted confidant to agree to an arrangement whereby the confidant will receive a gift under the will ostensibly for her own benefit but which is in fact to be held on trust by that person for a third person who cannot be named in the will. Equity will enforce this arrangement as a secret trust so that the confidant cannot claim to be beneficially entitled to the property left in the will. The secret trust operates in spite of the provisions of the Wills Act 1837 and therefore illustrates equity's determination to prevent statute being used as an engine of fraud.¹

Secret trusts fall into two main categories: fully secret trusts and half-secret trusts. Fully secret trusts arise in circumstances where neither the existence nor the terms of the trust are disclosed in the terms of the will. Oral evidence of the agreement between the testator and trustee is generally satisfactory. The settlor must have intended to create such a trust. That intention must have been communicated to the intended trustee. The trustee must have accepted the office and the terms of the trust explicitly or impliedly.²

For a valid half-secret trust, the settlor must intend to create such a trust. Further, the existence and terms of the trust must be communicated to the intended trustee before the execution of the will. The intended trustee must then accept the office of trustee and acquiesce to the terms of the trust.³

6.1 INTRODUCTION

The area of secret trusts raises interesting questions about the operation of equity in the law of trusts to achieve justice between the parties to litigation outside the strictures of legislation and common law.⁴ In parallel with that, secret trusts raise a number of questions about the interaction between express trusts and the trusts implied by law which are considered in Part 4 of this book.

The significance of the secret trust for the purposes of this book more generally is that the secret trust demonstrates the willingness of equity to contravene straightforward statutory principles to achieve the result which the court considers to be in line with good conscience. A secret trust is a clandestine arrangement between a testator and a trustee which operates outside the terms of the will. As will emerge from the following discussion, equity enforces the settlor's true intentions to benefit a third party even though this is contrary to the provisions of the Wills Act 1837, which was itself based on long-standing principles of the old Statute of Frauds. A

1 Cf Rocheffoucauld v Boustead [1897] 1 Ch 196.

2 Ottaway v Norman [1972] 2 WLR 50.

3 Blackwell v Blackwell [1929] AC 318.

4 It is also a good, old-fashioned equitable topic with lots of subtle distinctions made in the case law which are meat and drink for examiners.

worked example of a secret trust is given below at para 6.1.3. For present purposes it is necessary only to appreciate that a secret trust arises when a testator wishes, for whatever reason, to transfer the benefit of property to a person without specifying that person as a legatee under her will; in consequence, a confidant is asked to act as trustee for this secret arrangement under which the confidant ostensibly receives a gift under the will which the confidant is then expected to hold on trust for that third person. In this circumstance equity will enforce a trust in favour of that intended beneficiary in spite of such a trust prima facie breaching the Wills Act.

Equity's primary concern in developing the doctrine of secret trusts was to prevent the trustee from committing a fraud and attempting to keep the property left to the trustee under this clandestine arrangement for herself. One conceptual difficulty which emerges from this doctrine is that of deciding how to categorise the secret trust when faced with the various possibilities of express trust, constructive trust and a one-off rule based on equitable principles of preventing fraud.

6.1.1 The statutory background

The key feature of the secret trust is that it operates 'dehors the will' (that is, beyond the terms of the will itself) and in contravention of the provisions of the Wills Act 1837. Section 9 of the 1837 Act provides as follows:

No will shall be valid unless –

- (a) it is in writing and signed by the testator, or by some other person in his presence and by his direction; and
- (b) it appears that the testator intended by his signature to give effect to the will; and
- (c) the signature is made or acknowledged by the testator in the presence of two or more witnesses present at the same time; and
- (d) each witness either –
 - (i) attests and signs the will; or
 - (ii) acknowledges his signature, in the presence of the testator (but not necessarily in the presence of any other witness), but no form of attestation shall be necessary.

These provisions clearly set out the means by which a will is to be created if it is to be valid on death. Their purpose is to prevent frauds being perpetrated by people who might otherwise claim that they were entitled to property held in the deceased's estate. As a result of the 1837 Act, only those people who are identified in a properly executed will as having rights against the testator's property shall be entitled to receive such property on the testator's death. In the event that no will is effected, or if the will is invalid, the Intestacy Rules allocate title to the next of kin (those rules being effected under the Administration of Estates Act 1925).

However, the ramifications of these provisions are broader than that. If the testator wishes to alter the terms of her will, any alteration or any new will must conform to the provisions of the Act or else it will not be valid. Similarly, if the testator wishes to create some arrangement outside the precise terms of the will, that arrangement will be similarly invalid if it does not comply with the terms of the will.⁵ Therefore, a secret trust (being an arrangement for the organisation of title in property after the testator's death outside the terms of the will) will be strictly invalid under the terms of the Wills Act 1837.

⁵ Re Edwards [1948] Ch 440.

Equity takes a different approach and holds that a secret trust will be valid in equity if it is properly created. The requirements for the proper creation of a secret trust are considered below. On this basis, it is suggested that it is best to consider that the secret trust is a doctrine which seeks to provide justice in circumstances in which a literal application of the Wills Act would permit unconscionable behaviour on the part of the person intended to act as trustee of the secret trust.

6.1.2 Distinguishing between types of secret trust

It is important to distinguish between the two primary forms of secret trust. The distinction is important because the case law attributes different rules to each form of secret trust in different situations.

Fully secret trust

The first kind is the 'fully secret trust' – that is, a trust which is not referred to at all in the terms of the will. In such a situation the testator will have communicated the terms of the arrangement to the intended secret trustee. The property intended to pass to the beneficiary of the arrangement will then be left to the secret trustee without any mention being made in the will as to the reason why the property is being left to that secret trustee. As will emerge from the discussion to follow, it is often very difficult to prove the existence of a fully secret trust, unless the testator had mentioned the detail of the arrangement to someone else.

Half-secret trust

The second kind of secret trust is the 'half-secret trust' – that is, a trust which is mentioned in some form in the will. Importantly, the existence of the trust but not its terms are disclosed in the will. If all of the terms of the secret trust were disclosed it would be a testamentary trust and not a secret trust at all. The manner in which the half-secret trust is disclosed in the terms of the will differs from case to case. It may be that the testator provides: 'I leave the sum of £1,000 to Freddie for purposes which he knows all about.' That expression may disclose a half-secret trust, or it may simply indicate that the testator is grateful to Freddie for some particular kindness which he had performed in the past. Alternatively, the expression 'I leave the sum of £1,000 to Freddie to carry out my particular wishes as set out in my letter to him of 15 December 1998' is more likely to indicate a half-secret trust. It may be that such an explicit mention of another document may bring into play the probate doctrine of incorporation by reference, which would require that that letter be construed as forming a part of the will.⁶

One further point should be noted on the distinction between a fully secret trust and a half-secret trust. Given that so much turns on the division made between the two, it is important to note that in many circumstances it will be difficult to know whether the trust is fully secret or half-secret. In relation to the example cited above – that ‘I leave the sum of £1,000 to Freddie for purposes which he knows all about’ – it could be said that that trust is fully secret if no one appreciates the significance of Freddie’s knowledge. If Freddie is able to explain away those words as being something trifling and sentimental rather than as disclosing a fiduciary obligation imposed on Freddie, then the trust could be said to be fully secret. It would only be if the surrounding circumstances or something said by the testator to another person put them on notice of the existence (but not the terms) of the trust that it could be said to be half-secret. Therefore, words used by the testator may be susceptible to more than one interpretation. When creating strict divisions between categories of secret trusts that should be borne in mind.

6 In the Goods of Smart [1902] P 238; Re Jones [1942] Ch 238; as interpreted by Re Edwards' WT [1948] Ch 440.

Secret trusts on intestacy

There is potentially a third class of secret trust altogether. It is possible that a secret trust may arise to circumvent the Intestacy Rules. In a situation where a dying person was encouraged not to make a will and thereby to leave property so that it passes on intestacy, the dying person might agree with the person who would take title in his property as next of kin under the Intestacy Rules not to make a will on the basis that the next of kin would give effect to the dying person’s wishes by way of secret trust. In such a situation, if the next of kin had induced the dying person not to make a will in reliance on his promise to give effect to the dying person’s wishes, that next of kin would be required to hold the property received on trust for the intended beneficiaries.⁷ This doctrine similarly prevents the recipient of property from perpetrating a fraud.

6.1.3 An example of a secret trust

A ‘secret trust’ is almost as exciting as its name suggests. A testator creates a secret arrangement which ostensibly benefits person X but with the real intention of benefiting person Y. Typically, the testator will not leave the property directly for the benefit of person Y in the will because to do so would be embarrassing. Alternatively, sometimes people prefer to live their lives in as complicated a way as possible and so are more comfortable in creating complex arrangements beyond their wills. To create a secret trust, a testator must form an arrangement with some person who is intended to act as trustee for a beneficiary not named in the testator’s will. The testator will leave the property ostensibly to the trustee in the will to form the impression that the trustee is intended to take the property beneficially. However, the testator’s true intention will be that the trustee is intended to hold the property on trust for the real beneficiary after the testator’s death.

Suppose the following situation:

Bingo has learnt that he has a terminal illness and therefore needs to organise his affairs before death. Unfortunately, his personal life is a little complicated. He is married with children and therefore wishes to leave the bulk of his estate to his family for their maintenance. However, he has also had another child, Chloe, by an adulterous relationship with his mistress, Lottie. Therefore, he also wishes to benefit his mistress and illegitimate child. However, Bingo does not want to cause his wife any further distress after his death, and he knows he cannot leave any money to Lottie expressly in his will without his wife finding out. To enable him both to benefit his mistress and child and to keep that relationship secret from his wife, he decides to leave a large amount of money in his will ostensibly to his best friend Freddie so that Freddie can pass that money on to Lottie after his death. Freddie agrees to the arrangement in full knowledge of all of its terms. Consequently, Bingo dies leaving a fund of £100,000 to Freddie in his will.

⁷ Sellack v Harris (1708) 2 Eq Ca Ab 46.

This is indeed a ‘secret’ trust because the arrangement is something known only to Bingo and to Freddie. Its purpose is to make a disposition to Lottie and Chloe without having to identify either of them in the terms of the will. The Wills Act 1837 and the general law of probate would require that, for Lottie to take an equitable interest in any of Bingo’s estate, Lottie would have to be specified expressly as a legatee under the will. As considered above in para 6.1.1, under s 9 of the Wills Act 1837 ‘no will shall be valid unless – (a) it is in writing and signed by the testator’ and unless the signature is formally witnessed by two or more witnesses. Any other purported disposition after death which is not made in compliance with the 1837 Act is invalid under the law of probate. The purpose of a secret trust, however, is to prevent Freddie from asserting title to the fund of £100,000 which was never any of the parties’ intentions that he should take beneficially. Therefore, the secret trust operates as an exception to the strict provisions of the Wills Act.

There are other problems with the manner in which the secret trust is created. It may be that some passing reference is made to the arrangement in the will. Suppose the following facts:

In 1998 Bingo made a will which was witnessed by Freddie. Bingo explained that he wanted Freddie to hold any property left to him on secret trust for Lottie, as before. Under the terms of the will Freddie was bequeathed a sum of £100,000 to use that sum ‘in accordance with my desires which he knows all about’.

This arrangement would be a ‘half-secret trust’ on the basis that the existence of the trust is disclosed (or hinted at) in the will but the precise terms of the trust remain a mystery. This should be compared with the situation in which no reference at all to the secret trust arrangement is made in the will: a ‘fully secret trust’.

In these circumstances one core principle operates to create the secret trust: it would be unconscionable for Freddie to assert beneficial ownership of that property in circumstances in which he knew that the property was supposed to be held on trust for Lottie. Therefore, it is an equitable response that requires Freddie to hold property on trust, even though his common law rights would appear to permit him to treat the property as his absolutely.

6.1.4 Explaining the role of the secret trust

The secret trust is included in this part of the book, within the discussion of the formation and nature of express trusts, primarily because the secret trust is most easily understood as an exception to the formal requirements in the creation of will trusts, as set out in s 9 of the Wills Act 1837. The original purpose of the doctrine of secret trusts in the early case law was to prevent statute or common law being used as an instrument of fraud,⁸ for example, in situations in which the beneficiaries under a will received the property only on the understanding that they would hold it for someone else. In McCormick v Grogan,⁹ Lord Westbury set out the basis of the secret trust as a means of preventing fraudulent reliance on common law or statutory rights:¹⁰

The court has, from a very early period, decided that even an Act of Parliament shall not be used as an instrument of fraud; and that equity will fasten on the individual who gets a title under that Act, and impose upon him a personal obligation, because he applies the Act as an instrument for accomplishing a fraud. In this way a court of equity has dealt with the Statute of Frauds, and in this manner, also, it deals with the Statute of Wills.

Thus, the legal owner of property may be made subject to a ‘personal obligation’ in Lord Westbury’s words (perhaps that is better rendered as a ‘proprietary obligation’ to act as a trustee) which requires that person to hold the specific property on trust for the person whom the testator had intended to receive an equitable interest in the property.¹¹

One important facet of the early cases on secret trusts before *McCormick v Grogan*¹² (in relation to fully secret trusts) and *Blackwell v Blackwell*¹³ (in relation to half-secret trusts) was that it was necessary for the claimant to demonstrate that the secret trustee was perpetrating a fraud by suggesting that the legacy left to her on the terms of the will was intended in fact for the claimant beneficially. The difficulty with proving fraud was that the standard of proof for fraud requires the claimant to prove almost beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was acting fraudulently.¹⁴ With the advent of the more complex tests set out in McCormick and Blackwell respectively, the need to prove actual fraud was removed. The questions of evidence remain in two contexts, however. First, practically, it is frequently a difficult thing to prove the content of a secret arrangement between one person now dead and another person with a vested interest in denying that the arrangement ever existed. Secondly, the law of evidence, quite apart from the provisions of the Wills Act, throws up a number of problems considered below in para 6.4.6.

6.1.5 Mapping the discussion to follow

The following discussion is broken into five parts: (1) general principles surrounding the creation of a fully secret trust; (2) the rules relating to fully secret trusts; (3) the rules relating to half-secret trusts; (4) the probate doctrine of incorporation by reference; and (5) the various conceptual understandings of secret trusts.

8 McCormick v Grogan (1869) LR 4 HL 82; Jones v Badley (1868) 3 Ch App 362, 364; and Blackwell v Blackwell [1929] AC 318.

9 (1869) LR 4 HL 82.

10 Ibid., 97.

11 By ‘personal obligation’ is meant that equity requires him to act in personam.

12 (1869) LR 4 HL 82.

13 [1929] AC 318.

14 Peek v Gurney (1873) LR 6 HL 377; Re Snowden [1979] 2 WLR 654.

6.2 FULLY SECRET TRUSTS

Fully secret trusts arise in circumstances in which neither the existence nor the terms of the trust are disclosed in the terms of the will. Oral evidence of the agreement between the testator and trustee is generally satisfactory. The settlor must have intended to create such a trust. That intention must have been communicated to the intended trustee. The trustee must have accepted the office and the terms of the trust explicitly or impliedly.

6.2.1 Creating a valid, fully secret trust

As set out above, the term ‘fully secret trust’ refers to those trusts under which only the trustees and the settlor are aware of the existence of the trust and of the terms of the trust. In the circumstances envisaged by this section, property will have been left to a person under a will, or will have passed to him under the Intestacy Rules, without any other person being aware of the settlor’s intentions. While the law had once required proof of a fraud on the part of the defendant, a more specific test has emerged from the cases considered below.

In the leading case of Ottaway v Norman,¹⁵ Ottaway devised his bungalow, half his residuary estate and a sum of money to Miss Hodges for her to use during her lifetime, provided always that she was, in turn, to bequeath this property to the claimant after her death. She failed to do this in her will. Rather, she left the property by her own will to Mr and Mrs Norman. After Hodges’s death the plaintiff brought an action against Hodges’s executors claiming entitlement under secret trust principles to the property which had been left in Ottaway’s will. Brightman J set out the elements necessary to prove the existence of a fully secret trust in the following terms:

It will be convenient to call the person on whom such a trust is imposed the ‘primary donee’ and the beneficiary under that trust the ‘secondary donee’. The essential elements which must be proved to exist are: (i) the intention of the testator to subject the primary donee to an obligation in favour of the secondary donee; (ii) communication of that intention to the primary donee; and (iii) the acceptance of that obligation by the primary donee either expressly or by acquiescence. It is immaterial whether these elements precede or succeed the will of the donor.

From Ottaway the following three-step test emerges, there must be: an intention to benefit the claimant-beneficiary; communication of that intention to the intended secret trustee; and acceptance by the secret trustee of that obligation. It was found on the facts of Ottaway that Hodges had known of Ottaway’s intention and had acquiesced in it. Therefore, it was held that the bungalow and residuary estate should pass to the plaintiff. However, the money was not subject to the same obligation because the court found it difficult to see how this could have been done if Hodges was entitled to use the money during her lifetime, unless there was an implication that she had to keep Ottaway’s money separate from her own.

Perhaps the easiest conceptualisation of what the court is really looking for, behind the three-stage test set out in Ottaway, appears in Wallgrave v Tebbs,¹⁶ where it was held by ¹⁵ [1972] 2 WLR 50.

¹⁶ (1855) 25 LJ Ch 241.

Wood VC that where the secret trustee-legatee ‘expressly promises’ or ‘by silence implies’ that he is accepting the obligation requested of him by the testator then he will be bound by that obligation. The Wills Act will not interfere with the working of secret trusts in this way. The distinct components of the test (intention, communication and acceptance) are considered separately below.

6.2.2 Intention to benefit

Akin to the need for evidence of sufficient intention to create an express trust, the settlor of a secret trust must intend that the legal titleholder of property under a will (or intestacy) be trustee of that property for another.¹⁷ Therefore, we are thrown back on many of the concepts considered in Chapter 3 in relation to certainty of intention in the creation of express trusts: that is, the distinction between an intention that one person is to hold property on trust for another person subject to fiduciary obligations, and an intention to create a merely moral, non-legal obligation that one person is expected to provide for the welfare of another person.

In circumstances where all that the deceased intended was to impose a moral obligation on the legatee as to the use of property, that will not be sufficient to create a secret trust.¹⁸ In Re Snowden,¹⁹ an elderly woman was unsure how to deal with her property on death. Therefore, she left the property to her elder brother with the words ‘he shall know what to do’. It happened that her brother died only days later. The issue arose whether the brother had been subject to a secret trust in favour of the woman’s niece and nephew. It was held by Megarry VC that the deceased woman had only intended to impose a moral obligation on him – an intention which could not be interpreted as imposing a positive trust obligation on her brother. Therefore, the property passed beneficially on the terms of her brother’s will.

A further example of the question whether or not there was manifested sufficient intention to create a trust can be derived from McCormick v Grogan.²⁰ The facts are rather melodramatic. A testator executed a very short will in 1851 in which all of his estate was to pass to Mr Grogan. In 1854, the testator had contracted cholera and, knowing that he did not have long to live, he sent for Grogan. When Grogan arrived he was told by the testator that his will was in a desk drawer together with a letter instructing Grogan as to certain intended bequests. The letter contained the words: ‘I do not require you to act strictly in accordance with the foregoing instructions, but rather I leave it entirely to your own good judgment to do as you think I would do if I was still living, and as the parties are deserving.’ The claimant considered himself to have been both deserving and overlooked by Grogan, and therefore sought a declaration that he had a right under a secret trust in certain property. The House of Lords held that the testator had not intended to impose a trust obligation on Grogan, particularly in the light of the sentence in the letter to him quoted above which explicitly absolved Grogan of any trusteeship. Therefore, it was held that Grogan held the property subject only to a moral obligation to provide for the people mentioned in the letter. There was no secret trust under which the plaintiff could claim a benefit.

17 Ottaway v Norman [1972] 2 WLR 50, per Brightman J.

18 Re Snowden [1979] 2 All ER 172.

19 Ibid.

20 (1869) LR 4 HL 82.

6.2.3 Communication of the secret trust

The basic principles in relation to the communication and creation of fully secret trusts can be briefly stated. Where the settlor intends to create a secret trust, it is important that this intention is communicated to the trustee and that the terms of the secret trust are similarly communicated to her. Without such communication of the trust to the secret trustee there can be no trust.²¹ Communication and acceptance can be effectuated at any time during the life of the testator. Under fully secret trusts there need be communication only before death. However, more complex issues fall to be considered.

The first question which arises is as follows: precisely what is it that must be communicated? That will depend on the nature of the property and of the testator's intention. In the event that the secret trustee is intended to take as bare trustee and hold a single item of property on trust for the beneficiary, there is no need for communication of the testator's intention that that property be held on bare trust. However, if there is more than one intended beneficiary, the identity of those various beneficiaries and the manner in which the property is to be distributed between them would also need to be communicated. A third scenario would be that in Ottaway v Norman itself, in which the secret trustee was entitled to use the property during her lifetime provided that she left that property to specified beneficiaries in her will. In such a situation it is necessary for the precise terms of the trust to be communicated to the secret trustee. The settlor must communicate both the existence of the secret and also as many terms of the trust as are necessary in the context.

The case law dealing with communication draws some distinctions between these contexts. In the case of Re Boyes,²² the testator informed the intended trustee that he meant to leave property to him under a secret trust arrangement. The testator also informed the trustee that the terms of the trust would be communicated to the trustee before the testator's death. In the event, the terms of the trust were not communicated. After the testator's death, two unattested documents were found among the testator's effects which purported to direct the trustee to hold the property on trust for the testator's mistress and child. Significantly, it was unclear whether or not these unattested documents were sufficient to set out those terms as being the testator's final intention in the absence of any explicit communication of those terms to the secret trustee. Kay J held that presentation of these two unattested documents was insufficient to constitute communication of the terms of the trust to the trustee. The rationale given for this decision was that the trustee was not given the opportunity to refuse to act under the trust. Given the facts of this particular trust (that the testator wanted to benefit his unknown mistress and illegitimate child), the judge's approach in a decision handed down in 1884 was perhaps sensitive to the delicate position in which the trustee would be placed by compelling him to act to hold property in secret for the dead man's mistress and offspring.

In contradistinction to the strict approach taken in Boyes, that the trustee must be offered the chance to object to the office of trustee, there have been subsequent decisions which have held that communication of the terms of the trust might take place after the testator's death, provided that the trustee knew in general terms that he was expected to act as a trustee in receipt of the gift under the will. Thus, it has been held that while communication can ordinarily be made orally or by letter from the settlor to the intended secret trustee, it can also be performed by means of a sealed envelope containing the terms of the trust given to the trustee (or made available to the trustee) before the testator's death (generally referred to as 'constructive communication'), with instructions not to open the envelope until after death.²³ In the case of Re Keen, the court took the view that the trustee was in a situation analogous to that of a ship sailing under sealed orders. In such a situation, the captain of the ship sets sail but is not permitted to know his orders until the time at which he is allowed to open the envelope which contains a document setting out his precise instructions. Therefore it is said that while the trustee does not know the precise detail of his fiduciary obligations, the means by which he can ascertain the terms of the trust are clearly known to him. It should also be acknowledged that the trust in *Re Keen*²⁴ was a half-secret trust disclosed on the terms of the will, and therefore the existence of the trust was more apparent to outside observers than that in Boyes.²⁵

21 Ottaway v Norman [1972] 2 WLR 50.

22 (1884) 26 Ch D 531.

So, in Boyes the distinguishing factor must be supposed to have been that the trustee knew nothing of the terms of the trust before the settlor's death beyond the testator's general intention to create such a trust. The court's approach on the facts of that case appears to have been motivated by the fact that it was not clear that the two unattested documents were intended to stand for the terms of the trust, as well as the court's reservations about the trustee's inability to know the terms of the trust in time to refuse to accept the office of trustee. It appears that communication of both the intention and of the terms requires that the trustee must be able to know with sufficient certainty the terms of the trust before the death of the testator, an approach which was approved in *Moss v Cooper*²⁶ and also in Re Bateman's WT.²⁷

6.2.4 Acceptance of the office of trustee

Following on from the decision of the court in Keen, the acceptance of the trustee to act as such is a vital pre-requisite to the imposition of the liabilities of a secret trustee on him. Two reasons for this rule are apparent. First, the basis of the secret trust was the avoidance of fraud on the part of the secret trustee, and therefore it is important that the secret trustee has accepted the office before such a standard can be imposed. Secondly, the trustee is to be given the opportunity to turn down the office, particularly given the sensitive nature of holding property in such circumstances. Communication and acceptance can be effectuated at any time during the life of the testator. However, communication can also be given by means of a sealed envelope given to the trustee before the testator's death, with instructions not to open until after death, subject to what was said in the foregoing section.²⁸

The office of trustee under a fully secret trust can be accepted in one of two ways. In the words of Wood VC in Wallgrave v Tebbs:²⁹

23 Re Keen [1937] Ch 236.

24 Ibid.

25 (1884) 26 Ch D 531.

26 (1861) 1 J & H 352.

27 [1970] 1 WLR 1463, which expressly approved Re Keen.

28 Re Keen [1937] Ch 236.

29 (1855) 25 LJ Ch 241.

Where a person, knowing that a testator in making a disposition in his favour intends it to be applied for purposes other than his own benefit, either expressly promises, or by silence implies, that he will carry on the testator's intention into effect, and the property is left to him upon the faith of that promise or understanding, it is in effect a case of trust; and in such a case, the court will not allow the devisee to set up the [Wills Act].

The court's focus is on the question whether or not the actions of the trustee on being asked to act by the testator were sufficient to be said to have caused the testator to carry through his intention. Importantly, the trustee is not required to have expressly promised (although that will suffice to constitute acceptance); rather, it is enough that the trustee 'by silence implies' that he will act as trustee. Suppose, therefore, that a testator is lying sick in bed in full knowledge that he will soon die. He calls a close confidant to his bedside and in great secrecy explains his plans, and then asks: 'I know you will act as my secret trustee, won't you?' If the trustee remains silent and thereby allows the testator to believe that he has accepted the office then the trustee will be bound by the secret trust and not permitted to take the property beneficially.³⁰

In *Wallgrave v Tebbs*³¹ itself, a testator had left £12,000 'unto and to the use of Tebbs and Martin, their heirs and assigns, for ever, as joint tenants'. Oral and written evidence was presented to the court which demonstrated both that the testator had intended Tebbs and Martin to hold the property on secret trust and that the purposes of that trust were in breach of the Statute of Mortmain. At no time had the testator's true intentions been communicated to Tebbs or to Martin. In consequence, Tebbs and Martin sought an order from the court that they were entitled to take beneficial ownership of the property left to them by will. Wood VC held that they could indeed take beneficial ownership and were not required to act as trustees, because there had been 'no such promise or undertaking on the part of the devisees [Tebbs and Martin]' which could have constituted acceptance of the office. The significant point was that the two men had no knowledge of the intention to create a secret trust on the terms alleged, and therefore the gift on the face of the will took effect in their favour.

Where the terms of the trust are not disclosed, it has been held that the trustee must hold the property on resulting trust for the testator to prevent his own unjustified benefit.³² Consequently, the trustee would hold the property for the next of kin under the Intestacy Rules. The question which arises then is whether or not this would unjustifiably benefit the next of kin, in that secret trusts normally operate to divert property from the normal beneficiaries because the testator had a genuine motive of benefiting concealed beneficiaries.

6.2.5 Consequence of the failure of secret trust

In the event that there is no validly created secret trust, it is important to understand the manner in which the property will be dealt with. One of two possibilities arises. If the intention of the testator is taken to be an intention to benefit the named legatee absolutely beneficially then the absence of a secret trust means that the legatee will take the gift absolutely.³³

30 An approach approved in Moss v Cooper (1861) 4 LT 790.

31 (1855) 25 LJ Ch 241.

32 Re Boyes (1884) 26 Ch D 531.

33 Wallgrave v Tebbs (1855) 25 LJ Ch 241.

Alternatively, if the intention of the testator is that the legatee is intended to take the property only as a fiduciary, it would be inappropriate for the person to take the property absolutely beneficially. Instead the fiduciary would be required to hold the property on resulting trust for the testator's residuary estate.³⁴

6.3 HALF-SECRET TRUSTS

For a valid half-secret trust, the settlor must intend to create such a trust. Further, the existence and terms of the trust must be communicated to the intended trustee before the execution of the will. The intended trustee must then accept the office of trustee and acquiesce to the terms of the trust.

6.3.1 Creating a valid half-secret trust

A half-secret trust is a trust under which the existence of the trust is disclosed in a document, such as a will, but the terms of the trust remain secret. The requirements for a valid half-secret trust were set out in *Blackwell v Blackwell*³⁵ by Lord Sumner, who held that there must be 'intention, communication and acquiescence' between settlor and trustee. In relation to half-secret trusts, Lord Sumner set out the core principles in *Blackwell v Blackwell*³⁶ in the following terms:

The necessary elements [to create a half-secret trust], on which the question turns, are intention, communication and acquiescence. The testator intends his absolute gift to be employed as he and not as the donee desires; he tells the proposed donee of this intention and, either by express promise or by the tacit promise, which is satisfied by acquiescence, the proposed donee encourages him to bequeath the money on the faith that his intentions will be carried out.

Therefore, the test for a half-secret trust is very similar to that for a fully secret trust.³⁷ It was also held in Blackwell that there is no need for the plaintiff to prove actual fraud on the part of the defendant (or secret trustee).

6.3.2 Communication

Communication must be before or at the time of the execution of the will.³⁸ Lord Sumner held in Blackwell that '[a] testator cannot reserve to himself a power of making future unwitnessed dispositions by merely naming a trustee and leaving the purposes of the trust to be supplied afterwards'.³⁹ The rationale for this rule is that the trustee must know of the terms of the trust and be able to disclaim the obligations of trusteeship. Similarly, the testator is not

34 Vandervell v IRC [1967] 2 AC 291, HL.

35 [1929] AC 318.

36 Ibid.

37 Ottaway v Norman [1972] 2 WLR 50.

38 Blackwell v Blackwell [1929] AC 318.

39 Ibid., 339.

entitled to use the secret trust as a means of delaying the point in time at which he will finally decide the terms on which he wishes his estate to be left.

Where communication occurs after the will, the trust will fail and the legatee will hold on resulting trust for the residuary estate.⁴⁰ Therefore, there is a distinction between half-secret trusts and fully secret trusts in that the settlor must communicate before the execution of the will in the former, but need not communicate the existence or terms of the trust until the time of death in the latter.⁴¹ Mee has pointed out that there is a different rule in the Irish cases, permitting communication at any time until death.⁴²

6.3.3 Acceptance

The rules relating to acceptance of the obligations contained in half-secret trusts are similar to those for fully secret trusts. As with fully secret trusts, considered above, the intended trustee must accept the office of trustee and acquiesce in the terms of the trust. Similar issues arise as to the necessity of all trustees being aware of their obligations under the trust, as considered above. As seen above, in relation to half-secret trusts, Lord Sumner set out the core principles in *Blackwell v Blackwell*⁴³ in the following terms:

[H]e tells the proposed donee of this intention and, either by express promise or by the tacit promise, which is satisfied by acquiescence, the proposed donee encourages him to bequeath the money on the faith that his intentions will be carried out [emphasis added].

Therefore, this test is in line with that in *Wallgrave v Tebbs*⁴⁴ for fully secret trusts. In that context Wood VC held that a person would be bound by a secret trust if he expressly promised or by silence implied acceptance of the terms of the trust. Those same sentiments are rendered in Blackwell v Blackwell as the trustee acting by means of ‘express promise’ or ‘tacit promise’. It is required that the trustee acquiesce in the testator’s proposed arrangement. It is this acquiescence which constitutes the root of the secret trustee’s liability in equity to act as a trustee. One of the progressions in this area of the law in Blackwell was that it was no longer necessary to demonstrate that the trustee had committed fraud. Basing this area of law on fraud overlooked the foundation of the trustee’s liability as being properly a proprietary obligation deriving from the acceptance of the trustee’s instructions which are subsequently carried into effect on death.

6.3.4 Clash of doctrines – beneficiary attesting to the will

In the case of Re Young,⁴⁵ the juxtaposition between the requirements of the Wills Act 1837 and the rules as to secret trusts was made most clear. In Re Young, a secret trust was referred 40 Re Keen [1937] Ch 236; Re Bateman’s WT [1970] 1 WLR 1463.

41 Re Spence [1949] WN 237.

42 Mee [1992] Conv 202; Riordan v Banon (1876) LR 10 Eq 469.

43 [1929] AC 318.

44 (1855) 25 LJ Ch 241

45 [1951] Ch 344.

to in the will. The terms of that secret trust were that the chauffeur would receive a legacy. The formal difficulty was that the chauffeur had witnessed the will and therefore ought to have been precluded from taking beneficially under that will in accordance with s 15 of the 1837 Act, which provides that 'if any person shall attest to the execution of any will . . . such devise . . . shall [against such person] be utterly null and void'.

It was held by Dankwerts J that the chauffeur could take validly in accordance with the terms of the secret trust. The underlying reason is that the 1837 Act necessarily has no part to play in the decision whether or not there is a secret trust, given that the rationale which underpins the doctrine of secret trusts that each secret trust necessarily operates in the face of the requirements of that statute. The stated ratio was that, when considering s 15 of the Wills Act with reference to a legatee who has witnessed the will, it might be that the beneficiary is actually taking as trustee under a secret trust and not beneficially so that the policy under the 1837 Act is not necessarily contravened.

6.4 GENERAL PRINCIPLES

This section introduces some specific issues which arise in relation to secret trusts, before turning to the detail of various intellectual approaches to the secret trust.

6.4.1 The problem with secret trusts

It seems to this writer that the subject of secret trusts cuts to the very heart of the nature of a trust, as discussed in para 6.6.5 below. A secret trust concerns the situation in which the settlor wishes to create a trust but, for various reasons, wishes to keep the matter secret from everyone except the trustee. The problem is, then, how is the trust to be proved? Typically, the settlor will create the trust secretly, disclosing the arrangement only to the intended trustee, before dying. Given the secrecy of the trust, it is perfectly possible that only the trustee knows of the existence of the trust. The property which was intended to make up the trust fund will then be transferred to the trustee by the settlor's will. To the rest of the world it will appear that an outright gift of that property has been made to someone, even though she was in reality intended to be only a trustee of it.

Presumably there are thousands of secret trusts which have come to nought because unscrupulous trustees have taken the property as though absolutely entitled to it, without disclosing the trust to another living soul. Alternatively, the will may give a hint, such as 'I leave my SAFC shares to Albert in accordance with my wishes already expressed to him', or the testator may refer in the will to a letter written to the trustee which explains the terms of the trust. All of these possibilities are considered below.

6.4.2 Trustee dies before the settlor

There is clearly a problem with secret trusts in that the person intended to take the property as trustee may predecease the settlor. In the general law of probate, if an intended legatee were to predecease the testator, the gift would lapse into the residue of the deceased's estate. Clearly, it would not be possible for the secret trust to take effect where the trustee was dead before the property vested in her. In such a circumstance, a fully secret trust would fail because the deceased secret trustee's personal representatives would not know of the trust and therefore would not be able to carry it out.⁴⁶ However, in the case of a half-secret trust, it will be possible for the deceased secret trustee's personal representatives to know of the existence of the trust and thereby to give effect to it, in spirit⁴⁷ if not in detail.⁴⁸

6.4.3 Disclaimer of the trust

A further problem is that the secret trustee may seek to refuse to act as trustee. There are two possible approaches: either the property should be deemed to be held on trust for the beneficiaries in any event (although it would not be clear who would act as trustee); or the bequest is deemed to fail for want of a trustee such that property is deemed to be held on resulting trust for the deceased settlor's estate. It is possible for the secret trustee to disclaim the office of trustee, provided that the disclaimer is communicated to the settlor.⁴⁹ It appears that the secret trustee may disclaim the trust even after the death of the settlor, without invalidating the secret trust.⁵⁰ These issues are considered further below.

6.4.4 Where further property is added to a secret trust

It is important that, for a secret trust to take effect, the identity of the property is sufficiently certain. While this rule is also the case for express trusts generally, as considered in Chapter 3 in the discussion of the Privy Council decision in Re Goldcorp,⁵¹ the issue is particularly difficult in relation to secret trusts. Under ordinary express trusts there is a requirement for certainty of subject matter so that the court and the trustees can know which property is held subject to the terms of the trust. This problem is intensified in relation to secret trusts because not only is there the issue of demonstrating which property is to be covered by the secret trust, but also there is the problem of proving that there is a secret trust in existence at all. Consequently, given the status of the secret trust as an exception to the Wills Act 1837, the courts have adopted a strict approach to the identity of the property comprising the trust fund in line with Re Goldcorp.

Thus, in Re Colin Cooper,⁵² the testator communicated his intention to create a secret trust over a fund of £5,000. The testator then sought to add more money to that fund at a later date without communicating this intention to the trustee. The court upheld the rule that the identity of the property must be communicated to the trustee. Furthermore, it was held that any addition to the amount formerly orally settled was to be held on resulting trust for the testator's residuary estate, and was not to be held as part of the secret trust.

The rationale for this distinction, despite the fact that the property would have been sufficiently certain for the purposes of an ordinary express trust, is that the secret trustee did not know of the trust over the added moneys at the relevant time before the testator's death. As considered below, the necessity of communication of the terms of the trust before the 46 Re Maddock [1902] 2 Ch 220.

47 Ie, because the terms are not known to the personal representatives.

48 Mallott v Wilson [1903] 2 Ch 494.

49 Re Maddock [1902] 2 Ch 220.

50 Blackwell v Blackwell [1929] AC 318, per Lord Buckmaster.

51 [1995] AC 74.

52 [1939] Ch 811.

testator's death or before the execution of the will (depending on whether the trust is fully secret or merely half-secret) distinguishes the issue of certainty in relation to secret trusts from that in relation to ordinary express trusts. In relation to fully secret trusts it is said that it is sufficient that the terms of the trust be communicated to the trustee at any time before the testator's death. Therefore, the identity of the fund to be held on trust need not be made clear to the trustee either. On the other hand, in relation to a half-secret trust it is required that the terms of the secret trust be communicated to the trustee before the execution of the will. Therefore, in relation to a half-secret trust the identity of the trust property must be made known at an earlier date than in relation to a fully secret trust. Given that the half-secret trust will come into being (as will all secret trusts) only on the death of the testator, the identity of the trust property is required to be made plain at an earlier stage than would be necessary in relation to ordinary express trusts.

6.4.5 Secret trusts arising on intestacy

There is a tendency to assume that secret trusts arise solely in relation to wills. However, it is possible that a settlor may have purported to create a trust which was not revealed to any person other than the intended trustee without a will having been made. In such a situation, it would be possible for the settlor to die without leaving a will, but in a situation in which equity may regard the person in whom title is vested (on or before death) as being, in reality, a trustee of that property. Such situations are considered, for the purposes of this discussion, as falling within fully secret trusts on the basis that there is no will to disclose them.⁵³

The form of secret trust supported in *Sellack v Harris*⁵⁴ arises in situations in which the person receiving property on intestacy under the Intestacy Rules in some way encouraged the deceased person to believe that by failing to make a will, and thus allowing property to pass to that person on intestacy, the recipient of the property would hold it on secret trust. This approach appears to be similar to a form of proprietary estoppel which binds the recipient of the property as a person who causes the deceased person to act in reliance on some assurance given (either expressly or impliedly) by the defendant. Unlike an ordinary example of proprietary estoppel, however, the benefit of the estoppel does not pass to the person who acted detrimentally in reliance on the assurance: in other words, it is the deceased person who acts in reliance and not the beneficiary under the secret trust (who is to all intents and purposes a volunteer). Further, an estoppel would bind the defendant only from the time of the court order, whereas the secret trust will bind the defendant from the moment of receiving the property in the knowledge of the deceased person's intention that the property be held on trust for the ultimate beneficiary.

6.4.6 Specific problems of evidence

As pointed out above, the principal practical problem associated with secret trusts is the fact that they are formed in secret and are therefore difficult to prove. There are other technical problems to do with the conflict between such informal arrangements and the formalities required by the law of probate.

⁵³ Sellack v Harris (1708) 2 Eq Ca Ab 46.

⁵⁴ Ibid.

The parol evidence rule

The parol evidence rule maintains that, in the general law of evidence, oral testimony cannot be introduced to contradict written evidence in the form of a will. Thus, it is possible that the court may hold that, in certain circumstances, the oral evidence of secret trust may not be enforced where such evidence is in direct contradiction of the terms of the will. For example, in *Re Keen*⁵⁵ a sum of money was left by will 'to be held upon trust and disposed of by them among such person, persons or charities as may be notified by me to them'. Contemporaneously with the creation of the will, the testator gave a sealed letter to one of the executors which was subsequently found to contain the name of a woman. However, the Court of Appeal held that the words in the will anticipated that the direction would be one given in the future, so that the letter passed at the same time as the will was executed could not have been the document referred to by the testator in the terms of the will. Consequently, the court held that the oral evidence of secret trust was in contradiction to the terms of the will. Therefore, the secret trust would not be enforced, such that the property passed to the residuary beneficiaries under the will.

This decision appears difficult and revolves around a literal (and somewhat pedantic) interpretation of the terms of the will. However, it does illustrate the importance of applying the precise terms of the will where there is a conflict between that document and some verbal communication to another person. It is difficult to know where to draw the line with this principle, given that secret trusts operate to contradict the rules for the formal creation of the will by definition. Clearly, the very purpose of the secret trust is that it does contradict the terms of the will by introducing other evidence to support the assertion that the testator did not intend a legatee to take property specified in the will beneficially.

Problems of evidence generally

Needless to say, in most circumstances, the central problem will necessarily be one of demonstrating that a dead person intended to create a trust when, by definition, there will be few surviving persons able to provide any direct evidence of that intention. It is clear that the standard of proof required of the person alleging the existence of a secret trust is therefore high. As Lord Westbury held in McCormick v Grogan:⁵⁶ being a jurisdiction founded on personal fraud, it is incumbent on the court to see that a fraud, malus animus, is proved by the clearest and most indisputable evidence . . . You are obliged, therefore, to show most clearly and distinctly that the person you wish to convert into a trustee acted mala animo. You must show distinctly that the testator or the intestate was beguiled and deceived by his conduct.

These dicta emphasise the result of the secret trust being based, classically, on the avoidance of fraud. In common with fraud claims, the standard of proof is therefore high.⁵⁷ This recognises the reality of secret trusts claims: in most cases, the claimant will be alleging that the defendant is fraudulently asserting beneficial ownership of property which ought to have been held on trust for another person. However, the debate entered into at the end of this section as to the true nature of the secret trust (perhaps as an inter vivos express trust or a constructive trust) raises the question whether a burden of proof based on fraud is appropriate. More modern approaches would suggest that it is not.

55 [1937] Ch 236.

56 (1869) LR 4 HL 82.

57 Re Snowden [1979] 2 All ER 172.

A trustee cannot adduce evidence to demonstrate that he is entitled to take property beneficially (other than in a separate capacity) when he knows that he is to hold the property as trustee.⁵⁸ To allow such evidence would be to allow the defendant to perpetrate a fraud.⁵⁹ In certain circumstances it may be appropriate to decide whether the testator's intention was to create a trust, or merely a conditional gift or an equitable charge in relation to fully secret trusts.⁶⁰

6.4.7 Secret trustees with different knowledge

Obligations on the secret trustees

The issue arose in *Re Stead*⁶¹ as to the proper approach in cases where the testator leaves property to A and B on trust for X, where A and B are joint tenants of the legal title in the property, but in circumstances where A knows of the trust but B does not. It was held that where the testator has communicated his intention to A only before the date of the will and A accepts, both A and B are bound by the trust. However, where the testator has communicated his intention to A only after the date of the will and only A accepts, only A will be bound by the trust. The justification given for these approaches was that in the former case, the testator would be encouraged to make the bequest by A's acquiescence, whereas in the latter, the testator could not have been induced in that fashion.

However, it is perhaps difficult to understand the difference between the latter situation, where T is presumably similarly encouraged not to alter the bequest on the faith of A's acquiescence, even though B has had no opportunity to comment, and the former, where the situation is the same in all material respects. Perrins⁶² has suggested that it would be better to assess whether or not the bequest was actually induced by the promise in either case,⁶³ rather than create general rules which make assumptions as to what the parties would do in practical situations.

In relation to a half-secret trust, where the trust expressly provides that the property is 'to be held in accordance with my terms which I have made known to them' but where communication is not made to all of the trustees, there will not be a secret trust imposed on all the intended trustees.⁶⁴ The secret trust would not take effect. Any person who received the 58 Re Rees [1950] Ch 284, CA; Re Tyler [1967] 3 All ER 389; Re Pugh's WT [1967] 3 All ER 337.

59 Re Spencer's WT (1887) 57 LT 519; Re Williams [1933] Ch 244.

60 Irvine v Sullivan (1869) LR 8 Eq 673; Re Ford (1922) 2 Ch 519.

61 [1900] 1 Ch 237.

62 Perrins, 1972.

63 Huguenin v Baseley (1807) 14 Ves Jun 273.

64 Re Keen [1937] Ch 236 and Re Spence [1949] WN 237.

property in the knowledge that he was intended merely to act as a fiduciary, and not to take the property beneficially, would hold that property on resulting trust for the testator's residuary estate. In relation to any legatees to whom communication had not been made, the bequest might take effect as an outright transfer,⁶⁵ assuming that it would be possible for those persons to take possession of that property separately from those legatees to whom communication had been made. The situation would be different if the will had provided 'to be held in accordance with the terms which I have made known to any one or more of them'.⁶⁶

6.4.8 Time of the creation of the trust

It is generally assumed that a fully secret trust is constituted at the moment of the testator's death. This assumption is sensible. The trust must come into existence at some point in time. It must be possible to know at what moment the trustee becomes subject to the fiduciary duties of trusteeship. The sensible approach to providing for the date of death means that the most recent version of the will applies, passing legal title in the property to the secret trustee. Before that time, the trustee has no title in the property. (If the trustee had had title in the property, that would raise the question whether the trust was a normal inter vivos express trust, rather than a testamentary secret trust.)

However, there is the alternative authority of Re Gardner,⁶⁷ where Romer J held, controversially, that the gift is created at the date of the will, rather than at the date of death. Perhaps this decision is capable of explanation in that the court was evidently concerned to see property pass according to the wishes of the deceased. In that case, property had been left by a testatrix to her husband, subject to a secret trust in favour of her nephew and nieces. One niece predeceased the testatrix. Her executors sought to enforce her interest under the secret trust. Romer J held that the deceased niece had acquired her equitable interest in the property at the time the husband accepted the office of secret trustee, and not at the time of the testatrix's death.

It is suggested that the decision in Re Gardner cannot be correct in principle because the will could have been altered subsequently, thus revoking the secret trust. At law generally an absolute gift cannot be revoked. Therefore, the two approaches would be in straightforward contradiction. Furthermore, there would be problems if the intended donee predeceased the testator. Under the doctrine of lapse, where the beneficiary dies before the gift is made, the gift lapses and results to the settlor's estate to be distributed under the Intestacy Rules. This would not be possible if Gardner were correct because the property would already have passed to the deceased donee. The gift is not actually vested until the time of the testator's death and therefore the secret beneficiary had a mere spes at the time of her death.

6.5 THE PROBATE DOCTRINE OF INCORPORATION BY REFERENCE

The doctrine of incorporation by reference is a doctrine belonging, properly, to the law of probate. It relates to a situation where a testator expressly incorporates another, existing ⁶⁵ Wallgrave v Tebbs (1855) 25 LJ Ch 241.

⁶⁶ Re Keen [1937] Ch 236.

⁶⁷ [1923] 2 Ch 230.

document into the will. For example, the will may provide ‘I leave my season ticket to Sunderland AFC on the terms set out in a letter dated 14 October 2011 and concealed in my underpants drawer.’ In this way, the letter becomes a part of the will even though the will does not set out the terms contained in that document. The law of probate gives effect to such devices, where they are sufficiently certain, to give effect to the testator’s underlying intentions.⁶⁸

6.6 CATEGORISING THE SECRET TRUST

There is a problem of categorising the secret trust. This book has left secret trusts among the express trust material because that is where the majority of commentators and judges seem to think secret trusts belong. But, to be honest with you, my heart is not in it. Some writers do maintain that secret trusts (particularly half-secret trusts) are a form of express trust. There are two streams to this argument: the traditional view and the modern view. Two other approaches are suggested: the ‘split view’ and the author’s own.

It is important to note that the distinction between secret trusts as express or constructive trusts is an important one given that there are no formal requirements in relation to the creation of constructive trusts (through s 53(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925), whereas there are formal requirements for the creation of express trusts. Therefore, if the secret trust is found to be in truth an express trust, it would also need to satisfy the rules as to formalities considered in Chapter 5 above.

6.6.1 The traditional view

The traditional view is presented as the ‘fraud theory’. As discussed above in this chapter, the fraud view tallies with the equitable doctrine illustrated in *Rochefoucauld v Boustead*⁶⁹ which precludes a person from relying on his common law rights to perpetrate a fraud. It is that equitable doctrine which explains the underpinning of the secret trust.⁷⁰ In McCormick v Grogan,⁷¹ Lord Westbury set out the basis of the secret trust as a means of preventing fraudulent reliance on common law or statutory rights:⁷²

The court has, from a very early period, decided that even an Act of Parliament shall not be used as an instrument of fraud; and that equity will fasten on the individual who gets a title under that Act, and impose upon him a personal obligation, because he applies the Act as an instrument for accomplishing a fraud. In this way a court of equity has dealt with the Statute of Frauds, and in this manner, also, it deals with the Statute of Wills.

68 All that is required of the executors, in the example above, is to brave the testator’s underpants drawer.
69 [1897] 1 Ch 196.

70 McCormick v Grogan (1869) LR 4 HL 82.

71 Ibid.

72 Ibid., 97.

These dicta acknowledge that, as a matter of historical fact, the doctrine was based on equity's concern to prevent fraud. That the secret trust is based on fraud also imports the higher standard of proof used in fraud cases than in ordinary civil cases.⁷³

A problem with enforcing this traditional, fraud-based doctrine is the following: what is the named legatee (or secret trustee) supposed to do with the property? The issue is whether to hold the property on resulting trust for the settlor (or for the residuary estate once the settlor is deceased), or to pass it to the proposed beneficiary. There is a tension here between observing the wishes of the testator on the one hand, and satisfying the evidential burden for sufficient certainty in the creation of an express trust on the other. Furthermore, it is not clear whether the fraud is said to be perpetrated simply by the secret trustee seeking to assert beneficial title, or whether the fraud is properly a fraud perpetrated against either the settlor or the intended beneficiary.

The fraud theory is based on the trustee's unconscionable refusal to observe the terms of the secret trust agreed with the testator. Before the mid-19th century it was necessary to prove fraud before liability would be attached to the defendant as secret trustee. The doctrine operated to prevent the wrong committed by the defendant. As such a secret trust could be said to have been a form of restitution for wrongdoing or restitution to prevent unjust enrichment. However, the basis on which the doctrine operates is the imposition of a trust. Therefore, the mistake under which the fraud theory operates is in thinking that liability attaches as a result of fraud. It does not. Liability attaches on the basis of the proprietary obligation accepted by the defendant when the testator communicates his intention to the defendant: that proprietary obligation is assumed by the defendant when the testator dies and leaves the ostensible gift of property to the defendant in his will. The defendant is a trustee from the moment that his knowledge of the obligation which the testator wished to impose on him coincides with his conscience, preventing him from asserting absolute title to the property ostensibly left to him by will when the will comes into effect on the testator's death.

Two important points should be made. First, the obligation is a proprietary obligation immediately on the testator's death and not an obligation which arises as a result of the avoidance of fraud only when the beneficiary or some other person brings the matter to court.⁷⁴ Secondly, that obligation does not bind the defendant until the date of the testator's death because the testator could have changed his will or rescinded the secret trust arrangement at any time (logically) until death, or even thereafter by means of sealed instructions.⁷⁵ What is most important to recognise is that the obligation of the defendant arises on the basis of a trust and does not arise only when a claim of fraud is brought against him. Secret trusts are institutional and not remedial.

With that realisation, the fraud theory is based on weak foundations. It is true to say that equity will not permit the defendant to use the Wills Act as an engine of fraud, but it is also true to say that the defendant is deemed to be a trustee from the moment of the testator's death (if the requirements for the establishment of a secret trust have been satisfied). A more modern understanding of the use of the term 'fraud' in equity is as a synonym for the concept of 'conscience', as opposed to denoting the sense of 'fraud' used in the tort of deceit.

73 Re Snowden [1979] 2 WLR 654.

74 Rickett (1979) 38 CLJ 260.

75 Re Keen [1937] Ch 236.

However, all trusts arise on the basis of conscience and therefore that observation – even if ‘fraud’ should be read as meaning simply ‘conscience’ – does not help with the task of defining how secret trusts are to be categorised alongside other forms of trust. The question, then, is what form of trust is created.

6.6.2 The modern view

A more modern view of the nature of the secret trust is that the trust was created and declared inter vivos between the testator and the trustee, with the property vesting upon the death of the testator. This approach justifies the classification of the secret trust as a form of express trust. In short, it is argued that the testator sought to declare a trust while alive but did not completely constitute that trust until the point of death, when the will transferred title in the trust fund to the trustee. To complete the logic of this position, it is said that there could not be an express trust on death because that would be in contravention of the Wills Act – however, to balk at the application of the Wills Act in this context (as many of the proponents of this view seem to) is perhaps to forget the fact that secret trusts are intended to operate in contravention of the Wills Act in any event. Further, the express trust could not take place at the time that the testator communicates his plan to the trustee because no legal title vests in the trustee until the testator’s death. Therefore, if the secret trust is to take effect as an express trust it must take effect as an executory trust – that is, a trust which takes effect at some designated point in the future. That designated point is the date of the testator’s death.

However, an alternative analysis of this view is that the testator really intended to create a gift of property which is then being perfected by a trust, despite having been intended to take effect as a gift. This would conflict with the rule in *Milroy v Lord*⁷⁶ that a trust cannot be used to perfect a transfer which was intended to take effect by other means. Furthermore, this approach is objectionable on the basis that it requires the implication of an express trust which, by definition, was not required to comply with the formalities for the creation of an express trust. To attempt to analyse secret trusts as being express trusts appears to be a busted flush precisely because no such formally valid express trust was actually created. The secret trust arises when there has been an intention to create a secret trust, communication of that intention and acceptance by the trustee of that office. This does not require that there be satisfaction of the rules relating to express trusts as considered elsewhere in this book (see Part 2).

If the secret trust does not operate as an express trust then it falls to one of two alternative analyses. Either secret trusts are an exception to such formalities altogether (and constitute a one-off, sui generis rule of the law of probate), or they constitute a form of constructive trust (as considered below).

6.6.3 The split view

There is a third category of commentators who argue that fully secret trusts and half-secret trusts should be analysed differently one from the other: that is, that there should be a ‘split view’ of the two forms of secret trust. Oakley takes this approach.⁷⁷ In his view, fully secret

76 (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

77 Oakley, 1997, 243.

trusts are better classified as constructive trusts, rather than as a form of express trust either avoiding fraud or effecting an inter vivos disposition. On the other hand, it is his contention that half-secret trusts are presented as being a species of express trust under which the reference made in the will to the existence of the trust provides sufficient evidence of the creation of an express trust.⁷⁸ The issue which is not addressed at this level is as to the formal requirements for express trusts. However, in relation to constructive trusts, s 53(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925 provides that there are no formalities necessary for the recognition of constructive trusts.

Martin is another proponent of the split view, but on a different basis from Oakley.⁷⁹ In explaining her split approach to the two forms of secret trust, Martin draws a different distinction between two types of secret trust which draws on the traditional view's determination to avoid fraud. The main plank of the argument is that by breaking secret trusts into two categories it can be seen that some secret trusts will operate to prevent fraud whereas others will not. The first category of secret trust would be those trusts which are mentioned in the will. It is said that in relation to trusts which are disclosed in the will there will be no fraud because a fiduciary duty is created simply by that mention in the will. The second category encompasses those secret trusts which are not mentioned in the will trust and in relation to which fraud is consequently more likely.⁸⁰ In line with the traditional view, this split view permits secret trusts to be imposed as a form of constructive trust to prevent fraud; whereas half-secret trusts are considered less likely to operate on that basis.

6.6.4 Secret trusts simply as an exception to the Wills Act

One further explanation of the operation of secret trusts would be, quite simply, that they constitute an exception to the Wills Act which defies straightforward definition. As Megarry VC stated the matter in Re Snowden:⁸¹ 'the whole basis of secret trusts . . . is that they operate outside the will, changing nothing that is written in it, and allowing it to operate according to its tenor, but then fastening a trust on to the property in the hands of the recipient.' It is not suggested that Megarry VC was subscribing to so Luddite a view as to suggest that secret trusts are simply 'something other' than the forms of trust considered in this book. What is suggested is that Megarry VC does put his finger on an essential feature of the secret trust: that it does not correlate easily with the existing rules concerning trusts and therefore its difference ought to be recognised as much as the possibilities of its complying with more general principles of English trusts law. What the following paragraph indicates is that it is only possible to correlate secret trusts with the broadest possible principles of the law of trusts: that is, that the conscience of the secret trustee will prevent that person from denying the office imposed on him once he receives a gift under the will.

⁷⁸ Re Baillie (1886) 2 TLR 660.

⁷⁹ Martin, 1997, 153.

⁸⁰ Ibid.

⁸¹ [1979] 2 All ER 172, 177.

6.6.5 An alternative view – secret trusts and good conscience

Establishing the case for a composite view of all secret trusts as constructive trusts

The argument advanced here is this writer's own and is subtly different from those set out above. In short, it is contended that secret trusts are to be considered to be constructive trusts because they are imposed on the recipient of the testamentary gift where that person knows in good conscience that she is required to hold that property on trust for someone else. As outlined above, the secret trust cannot be considered to be an ordinary express trust because it does not obey the formalities for testamentary trusts; neither does it necessarily obey the formalities set out in cases like *Milroy v Lord*⁸² or Morice v Bishop of Durham,⁸³ as considered in Chapter 5. Therefore, the secret trust falls to be considered either as a species of trust apart from all others, or as a form of constructive trust. These contentions are considered immediately below.

It is suggested that fully secret trusts are constructive trusts as contended by Oakley.⁸⁴ By definition there will not have been compliance with the formalities in relation to express trusts over land, shares or other such items of property if a trust is imposed over property for the benefit of A, when beneficial title in that property was explicitly allocated by will to B. A secret trust is not an express trust because it does not comply with the formalities necessary for such trusts; rather, it is imposed in line with the rules set out in *Blackwell v Blackwell*⁸⁵ and Ottaway v Norman.⁸⁶ Therefore, the fully secret trust must fall within the implied trusts in s 53(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925. There is no other satisfactory explanation for such a trust other than its being a constructive trust imposed to prevent the unconscionable actions of the legal owner of that property.

This leaves the half-secret trust unaccounted for. Rather than attempt to make out a case for half-secret trusts as constructive trusts at this stage, it would be profitable to analyse precisely what is meant by the term 'half-secret trust'. At root, there is only a subtle difference between the fully secret and the half-secret trust.

There will be only a shade of difference between a will containing the words 'I leave £100,000 to Fred', a will containing the words 'I leave £100,000 to Fred for reasons which he will understand', and another will containing the words 'I leave £100,000 to Fred to carry out purposes which I have communicated to him'. The first example is clearly a fully secret trust and the last is equally clearly a half-secret trust. The issue is as to the middle case. This could be said to disclose a half-secret trust if there had been discussions between Fred and the testator. Alternatively, it could be an acknowledgment of some close relationship between Fred and the testator which would cause the testator to leave £100,000 to Fred.

In short, there will be occasions in which the line between fully secret and half-secret trusts is difficult to draw. As considered elsewhere in this chapter, there will be situations in which there will be significant differences between the rules applied to fully secret and to half-secret trusts. Given the narrow line between the two forms of secret trust in many

82 (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

83 (1805) 10 Ves 522.

84 See also the remarks of Nourse J in Re Cleaver [1981] 1 WLR 939.

85 [1929] AC 318.

86 [1972] 2 WLR 50.

situations, it would be unfortunate to seek to operate the two on different bases. However, the principle which will be common to judicial attitudes to all three forms of wording suggested above is that equity will not permit the secret trustee to benefit unconscionably from the testator's bequest. Controlling the conscience of the trustee is the key element in all circumstances – whether the case concerns a fully secret or a half-secret trust. The distinction between different forms of secret trust has more to do with evidential questions than with issues concerning the application of varying conceptual analyses to secret trusts.

As a result of the observation of this grey area between the established categories, there is no conceptual need to apply different rules to the two forms of secret trust – or, it is suggested, even to continue to distinguish between them. The tests for the creation of either form of trust have coalesced into very similar requirements of intention, communication and acquiescence/acceptance. It is only in relation to the time by which communication must be performed that there is any palpable distinction between them. What would be preferable would be for one single explanation for the operation of all kinds of secret trust to be isolated, given the tremendous overlap that exists between them and the arbitrary distinctions which may be created if that difference is maintained.

The argument based on constructive trust

In truth, what is happening when courts impose secret trusts is that they are imposing the office of trustee on the recipient of a gift on the basis that it would be unconscionable for that person to retain an absolute interest in the property. The primary motivating factor behind equity's response here is that the secret trustee is aware that she was not intended to take beneficial title in the property but rather to hold it on trust for another person. As considered above, there will be no finding of secret trust where the recipient had not had the testator's intention communicated to her and where that office had not been accepted.⁸⁷ Secret trusts will be imposed only on those who have knowledge of the unconscionability of retaining absolute title in the property.

Consequently, the imposition of a secret trust falls four-square within the test for a constructive trust as set out by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC,⁸⁸ as considered in Chapter 12 below: that is, a constructive trust is imposed on a person who has knowledge of some factor affecting his conscience in relation to the use of property. Thus, the recipient of a testamentary gift who knows that he has acquiesced in an arrangement whereby the testator intended him to take that property in a fiduciary capacity only will be a constructive trustee of that property from the moment that legal title passes into his hands. In exactly that way, outwith the formalities for express trusts, equity imposes a constructive trust on anyone who accepts the office of secret trustee, whether that trust is disclosed in the will or not. As stated above, this is the only feature common both to fully secret and half-secret trusts. A secret trust therefore always conforms to a categorisation as a species of constructive trust which operates as an exception to the rules as to the creation of valid, express will trusts. That there is no need for any formality in the creation of constructive trusts is established by s 53(2) of the 1925 Act.

87 Wallgrave v Tebbs (1855) 25 LJ Ch 241; Blackwell v Blackwell [1929] AC 318.

88 [1996] AC 669.

The form of secret trust as constructive trust, not estoppel

The secret trust serves to highlight a further feature of the constructive trust as compared to the doctrine of proprietary estoppel. It may have occurred to the reader that the three-stage test of intention to benefit, communication and acceptance⁸⁹ bears some of the hallmarks of proprietary estoppel, in that the estoppel doctrine requires that there has been a representation promising a benefit in reliance on which the claimant acts to his detriment.⁹⁰ However, what is clear is that proprietary estoppel requires there to have been some detriment on the part of the claimant and that it will be, in general terms, estoppel's intention to prevent that detriment going uncompensated.⁹¹ The doctrine of secret trusts is concerned to enforce the promise only obliquely – the primary purpose of the doctrine of secret trusts historically was always to prevent a fraud being committed by the person to whom the testamentary gift was made with the intention that the gift be held on trust for the concealed beneficiary. Secret trusts necessarily uphold the trustee's proprietary obligations under the trust and do not simply seek to compensate the claimant for the detriment which she has suffered. Therefore, the secret trust is similar to that model of constructive trust set out in *Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC*⁹² which imposes a trust on the trustee from the moment he takes legal title in property which he knows is intended to be held on trust for another person.

The secret trust crystallises at the moment of the testator's death – that is, from the moment at which the will, and the secret trust contained within it, come into full force and effect. A constructive trust comes into existence from the moment when the defendant has knowledge of the factor affecting his conscience.⁹³ That is not quite true of the secret trust. The testator could reverse his intention to carry out the secret trust at any time before his death simply by changing his will. The constructive trust would typically come into existence at the later receipt of the trust property and the defendant's knowledge of the fiduciary duty imposed on the defendant: that is probably true of the secret trust too, in that the secret trustee is subject to the secret trust only from the moment of taking possession of the testamentary gift. This differs from proprietary estoppel, in that the estoppel rights come into existence only from the date of the court order prospectively and may not even grant property rights to the claimant.⁹⁴

89 Ottaway v Norman [1972] 2 WLR 50.

90 Re Basham [1986] 1 WLR 1498.

91 Lim v Ang [1992] 1 WLR 113; Walton Stores v Maher (1988) 62 AJLR 110, (1988) 164 CLR 387. Although in truth there are exceptional decisions like Pascoe v Turner [1979] 2 All ER 945, in which the estoppel does appear to be enforcing the initial representation.

92 [1996] AC 669.

93 Ibid.

94 Baker v Baker (1993) 25 HLR 408.

Essay – The nature of express trusts

7.1 THE BASES OF EXPRESS TRUSTS	327
7.1.1 The paradox at the heart of the law on express trusts	327
7.1.2 Giving and time	329
7.1.3 The role of equity as guardian of conscience	330
7.2 DIFFERENT TRENDS IN THE CASES	331
7.2.1 Formality	331
7.2.2 Redistribution of wealth	332
7.2.3 Questions of technique	333
7.2.4 Equitable estoppel and express trusts	334

7.1 THE BASES OF EXPRESS TRUSTS

7.1.1 The paradox at the heart of the law on express trusts

Equity is sometimes flexible and sometimes rigid

There is a paradox at the heart of the law on express trusts. On the one hand the trust is predicated on principles of equity which are in turn traceable to philosophical ideas of fairness and justice which were identified in Chapter 1 with Aristotle and others. On the other hand much of the law discussed in this Part 2 of this book to do with express trusts has been concerned with very technical ideas which have resembled common law principles of contract more than flexible principles used to achieve fair or just results at the whim of whichever judge is sitting to hear a case. Therefore, while we began this book with high-sounding talk of conscience, fairness and justice, we came quickly to concern ourselves with hard-nosed commercial practice or with technical rules used to allocate property between family members. In truth, when we peer a little more closely at the case law which we have considered in this Part 2 of this book there have been plenty of cases which have appeared to retreat into an approach which seemed far more like the approach favoured by Aristotle in refusing to apply strict rules of trusts law or of common law where that would generate injustice: so, we have considered how secret trusts circumvent the provisions of the Wills Act, how Rochevoucauld v Boustead prevented a defendant from relying on her strict legal rights to defraud the plaintiff, how Hunter v Moss sought to prevent the defendant from relying on a strict principle of trusts law to enable him to withhold property he was contractually obliged to transfer, and so on. There is, I would suggest, a conflict between some aspects of trusts which are concerned with the implementation of hard-and-fast rules and other aspects of equity more generally which are concerned with the appropriate application of principles of fairness to cases where those principles are considered to be more appropriate than the outcome of applying those hard-and-fast rules.

It is suggested later in this essay that this is bound up with the way in which the courts have been required to develop trusts law and equity. There was never a time at which a legislator sat down in England and set out all of the principles of trusts law in a statute. Similarly equity has never been described in such clear terms. Instead, both systems of law have developed pell-mell across the centuries on a case-by-case basis, albeit by reference to precedent. Frequently, judges have stopped to remind us of the intellectual foundations of what came before them and to map out the lie of the land ahead, but even those statements when they have come have only served to identify the particular prejudices of the time in which those words were spoken. So, the talk in the Earl of Oxford's Case in 1615 that equity exists to correct men's consciences has a slightly different echo in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington in 1996 when Lord Browne-Wilkinson is asked to adjudicate in a dispute between a large investment bank and a local authority.

How learning equity is very like learning the English language

I have a theory that there is something bound up even in the English language with this way of thinking. Some Englishmen (by which I mean to include women) like to think of themselves as being clear-headed and logical, such that they would like their law to be based on clear rules which everyone can learn and understand. Other Englishmen like to think of themselves as being caring and open-minded, and open to free expression of ideas, so that they would like to think of their law as being made up of principles which will guide private citizens when going about their lawful activities and which will constrain the unconscionable activities of others. The English language itself is a mixture of these contradictory currents. In fact I think that the nature of the English language is the best analogy for this complex structure of equity. The English language does have a number of rules and descriptions of its grammatical principles but, as anyone who has grown up learning a language like French or Italian or who has learned Latin will know, the English language does not have an organised system of endings and declensions and so forth like those other languages. Irritatingly, English also has an exception to almost every grammatical rule you learn. Also there are many English words which contain identical groups of letters but which are pronounced completely differently: for example 'cough', 'thought', 'borough', 'through' and so on. This leads many people to think that English has no meaningful grammatical rules and therefore that English can be spoken in any way one likes without worrying about grammar. However, there are many idioms and understood grammatical rules which will make a well-educated English person recoil in horror if a speaker breaks them. This is just like equity, I think. It may look like this is an area of law which is entirely concerned with random decisions by judges on a case-by-case basis according to what they think is 'fair' or 'conscionable', but in truth there is a very subtle understanding of how these various principles fit together, just like there is a very subtle understanding among the English-speaking peoples about how English grammar operates. Therefore, in trusts law, for example, we have a subtle mixture of hard-and-fast rules like certainty and the beneficiary principle, mixed with a fluid understanding of how other principles of equity may operate so as to disrupt the application of those hard-and-fast rules.

The English mind is therefore a mixture of strict rules and fluid principles, just like the English language. The same can be said of English private law. In this essay we shall think about how the law we have discussed so far in this book can be understood in that way. Hopefully this will help to pull all of this material into focus. We shall begin by thinking about the relationship between making gifts of property and making property available to other people through trusts in traditional trusts law.

7.1.2 Giving and time

Traditional trusts were concerned with the allocation of property rights, usually between family members, across the generations either during the parties' lifetimes or on the death of one of them. Consequently, there is a connection between giving and settling property on trust. Moffat suggests, with something of a metaphysical lilt, that 'a private trust is . . . a gift projected on the plane of time'.¹ What he means is that the trust constitutes a gift made by the settlor but it is not a gift which is perfected at one moment when possession of absolute title in that property passes to the beneficiary. Rather, an express trust operates over a period of time in transferring title from the settlor, via the stewardship of the trustee, to the beneficiaries of the arrangement. It should be pointed out that Moffat is not intending this remarkable expression to be a definition of the trust. Instead I am fixing on it precisely because it is such a powerful image; and therefore you should forgive me if what follows seems at first to be a little pedantic; but the image is so strong as to be deserving of close attention.

At one level Moffat is undoubtedly correct, and his reminder of the role of time here is very important. A trust is a stylised means of transferring title which has bound up in it the different roles of trustee and beneficiary. However, there are two aspects of the sentiment which would cause me to take issue with this statement as a definitive expression of the private trust. The first issue is with the term 'gift'. Trusts are often concerned with allocations of title in complex commercial situations. It would not be correct to say that commercial parties are making gifts (or outright transfers) of property in many of these situations. Rather, they are structuring the holding of title in property which is deployed for their common interaction (as considered in *Quistclose Investments v Rolls Razor*² and *Clough Mill v Martin*³). Alternatively, express trusts are often concerned with the allocation of property rights in circumstances in which the parties are unaware that they are creating trusts.⁴ In any event, a trust is not a gift, properly so-called, precisely because an intention to make a gift will not be perfected by means of a trust.⁵ What is true is that there is a general intention to pass title in property – which a lay person might well term a 'gift'.

The second complaint follows on from the first and takes issue with the suggestion that the express private trust operates on the basis of pre-meditated gift and not as a means of policing the conscience of the legal owner of property. As is clear from the leading speech of Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC,⁶ the trust is founded on the conscience of the legal owner of property. This statement has an awkward

1 Moffat, 1999, 92.

2 Quistclose Investments Ltd v Rolls Razor Ltd (In Liquidation) [1970] AC 567.

3 [1984] 3 All ER 982.

4 Paul v Constance [1977] 1 WLR 527.

5 Milroy v Lord (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

6 [1996] AC 669.

provenance. On the one hand it expresses the reason why, in principle, a trust would be enforced on a defendant.

However, in many situations the trust arises as a result of a will drafted by a testator creating a trust, or out of a contract which provides that X shall hold identified property for Y until specified contingencies occur: the creation of a trust usually derives from some other action of the parties which the law of property recognises as vesting an equitable interest in a set of claimants and merely legal title in other people as trustees. It is only in relation to breach of such obligations of property law norms, or in situations in which the parties do not understand that a trust is the proper analysis of their interaction, that an express trust could be said to arise on the basis of conscience as opposed to being merely explicable ex post facto as a control of conscience.

7.1.3 The role of equity as guardian of conscience

Moffat is right to remind us of the element of time. Trusts extend equity's control of conscience over time. It also reminds us that there are more elemental forces at work in relation to equity and trusts. To explain which elemental forces I mean, take the example of the ground-breaking work in theoretical physics in relation to chaos theory in the late 20th century. Whereas we had previously understood the physical world as being built on rigid building blocks called atoms, we now understand the world to operate on the basis of particles and waves of energy moving in more random ways: a phenomenon referred to as 'chaos theory'. And yet, this seemingly random activity at the sub-atomic level produces order: trees that grow towards the sun, solid rock, and so on. Within our atoms are gluons and quarks and other exotic phenomena which scientists are still discovering. Therefore, we could think of our strict legal rules, akin to our atoms, containing more chaotic but equally essential phenomena like equitable principles, akin to the sub-atomic particles, which seem to move in random patterns but which are essential to maintaining the fabric of the whole.⁷ In this way we can think about equity as being an essential and integral factor in the maintenance of the overall fabric of the law. Equity is a form of energy which supplements the whole of private law and which is an essential part of its structure.

So the law of trusts, and equity more generally, are required to reconcile parties in conflict from a wide range of causes including wills, commercial contracts, and family disputes. It is suggested that the single idea of 'conscience' will solve all of those various disputes. Evidently the notion of conscience employed will be required to be different in each one of those contexts – but it is not apparent how we decide on the appropriate form of conscience to apply to such cases in the abstract. This ideal of good conscience is a useful way of describing the pattern which equity creates in resolving these disputes; but it is not a means by which the legal system ought to attempt to impose order on that chaos by shoe-horning different social problems into the same ill-fitting boots. As Dr Freud has told us, it is a human response to seek to impose order on chaos, but that is occasionally a symptom of some neurosis founded on our frustration at the fact that the world will just not comply with our desire for order.⁸ Instead we must, at times, accept that chaos is the way of things and permit our legal norms to reflect this. We must accept that not all of our private law can be reduced to simple rules: instead it is important that we retain an ability to reach the right result even if occasionally we might have to do so by means which go against the letter of the strict rules which we do have. Equity is as much a part of the law as the strict legal rules just as sub-atomic particles are as much a part of matter as the atom.

7 Cohen and Stewart, 1994.

8 Freud, 1930.

7.2 DIFFERENT TRENDS IN THE CASES

7.2.1 Formality

The principal way in which the law of trusts seeks to impose order on chaos is by means of legal formalities. Most of the formalities relating to the creation and constitution of trusts are based on the 1677 Statute of Frauds which was concerned to prevent fraudulent claims by people asserting rights to property to which they had no genuine rights.⁹ The main problem identified by this legislation was the lack of evidence as to which person owned which rights unless claimants were required to produce written evidence of their entitlement before their claim would even be entertained by the courts. This approach was the basis for formalities as to declaration of trust over land, conveyance of rights in land, dispositions of equitable interests and the proper creation of wills.

That thinking has also informed much of the case law in this area. The rules as to certainty of intention, of objects and of subject matter are all based on the courts' need to be able to understand the settlor's intentions and thus to control the trustees' actions. Similarly, the beneficiary principle was founded such that the courts would be able to enforce the trust through the claims brought before them by beneficiaries. Indeed, for all the squabbling among the judiciary as to the precise scope of the beneficiary principle,¹⁰ the only area on which all of their Lordships could agree was the foundation of the principle on the need for there to be some person who could bring the matter before the courts.

The cases making up the *Vandervell*¹¹ litigation, together with *Oughtred*¹² and Grey,¹³ all demonstrate the way in which the law of trusts deals with innovative thinking to manipulate trusts law concepts. While the courts remain wedded to principles of certainty, the use of trusts law principles highlights the inherent flexibility in the core ideas. For each potential for tax liability, or for each argument that a trust might be invalid, there is a range of ways and means of avoiding those pitfalls. So, in relation to the void purpose trust,¹⁴ it is possible to validate a trust intended in truth for abstract purposes by making gifts for the benefit of identified individuals,¹⁵ by passing control of capital,¹⁶ by making a transfer to an unincorporated association as an accretion to its funds¹⁷ and so forth. Similarly, a disposition of an 9 Griffiths, 2003.

10 Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW [1959] AC 457; Re Denley [1969] 1 Ch 373; Re Lipinski's Will Trusts [1976] Ch 235.

11 [1967] 2 AC 291.

12 [1960] AC 206.

13 [1960] AC 1.

14 As discussed in Chapter 4.

15 Re Denley [1969] 1 Ch 373.

16 Re Lipinski [1976] Ch 235.

17 Re Recher's WT [1972] Ch 526.

equitable interest can be avoided by transferring that interest together with the legal title, or by terminating the trust and declaring a new trust, or by passing that interest under a specifically enforceable contract, or by varying the terms of the trust.¹⁸

What is interesting is the strict adherence to formality and the spirit of the legislation in decisions by Viscount Simonds in *Leahy*¹⁹ and in Grey v IRC,²⁰ when compared with more purposive approaches taken by other judges in later cases. What this illustrates is a movement away from perceiving the law of trusts as being something to do with the strict observance of age-old rules and a shift towards enabling citizens to make use of trusts law techniques to achieve socially desirable goals. It would be wrong to try to think of the distinctions between these various cases as being capable of reconciliation one with another. The approach taken by Goff J in Re Denley and by Oliver J in Re Lipinski is simply different from that taken by Viscount Simonds in Leahy. Two different generations of judges had different attitudes to the role of the law, in exactly the same way that two generations of ordinary people would have different tastes in music. Viscount Simonds is concerned to see observance of the law for the law's sake; the next generation of judges prefers to permit people to use trusts provided that they do not transgress certain mandatory rules about the possibility of some beneficiary being able to enforce the trust in court.

The law of trusts should be seen as a developing literature in exactly the same way that one would study developments in the novel, fashion or film. As time passes new ideas come to the fore and replace old ideas. Many of the core decisions in this subject were settled in the mid-19th century. Consider how many pivotal cases were decided in the reign of Queen Victoria between 1837 and 1901: Milroy v Lord (1862), Saunders v Vautier (1841), Fletcher v Fletcher (1844), Knight v Knight (1840); M'Fadden v Jenkyns (1842), and in relation to company law Salomon v Salomon (1897) which held that companies were separate legal persons and not trusts at all. That timing is no surprise in itself. During the Victorian era it was commonplace to suggest that the commercial success of the British Empire in taking trade to the furthest corners of the globe had a profound effect on the opinions of the educated classes in England and Wales. As Norman Davies put it in his monumental history of The Isles,²¹ during this period 'the centralised British Empire was still the largest economic unit on the world map, holding astronomic potential for further growth and development'. It would be churlish to suppose that the great developments in the formalisation of the express trust through certainties and perpetuities rules (which established the trust as a more useful commercial tool and which also identified the company as a distinct legal person better suited to raising capital for entrepreneurs) happened coincidentally during the same period as the British Empire was establishing itself as the world's leading economic power and as English law was establishing itself as the commercial world's lingua franca.

7.2.2 Redistribution of wealth

The law of trusts and the development of equity are two very important means by which the law absorbs more general, social agreements as to the sort of morality to which family and 18 As discussed in Chapter 5.

19 [1959] AC 457.

20 [1960] AC 1.

21 Davies, 1999, 642.

commercial life ought to conform. With the movement into an avowedly free capitalist society in which ordinary citizens are more than mere serfs under a feudal system (and arguably beyond that into a globalised society in which citizens have enforceable human rights), the central point of trusts law has changed. The certainties of the family settlement which devolved title in property down the generations for the landed gentry have given way to rules on perpetuities which prefer the free flow of capital to patriarchal domination.

In the pre-Victorian era, the trust had become an ever more important vehicle for the distribution of wealth between members of families on death or during life. In the late 20th century the trust became an increasingly important means of avoiding liability to tax by obfuscating the true ownership of property for tax purposes, or for the purposes of insolvency law. The decision in Grey v IRC,²² and possibly even that in Leahy,²³ was caught in that gap between social change towards tax avoidance and so forth and a judicial reluctance to validate such arrangements through the agency of trusts law.

Moffat examines the interaction between inheritance tax, trusts and the distribution of wealth in the UK in detail.²⁴ The real difficulty in attempting to establish a picture of wealth distribution and the extent to which it is tied up in trusts is that express trusts are private and information is available only through the tax system. Similarly, it is not always possible to know whether trusts are created for tax avoidance, for the maintenance of property, for the use of a succession of individuals, or for the maintenance of particular individuals. What is clear is that, even given the rules on perpetuities, trusts do permit those sections of the population who are sufficiently well informed to organise their affairs both so as to minimise their liability to tax and so as to benefit future generations of their own relations.

7.2.3 Questions of technique

What the student should take away from the study of express trusts is an appreciation of the many pliable techniques which exist for the manipulation of trusts law for a number of purposes. Those purposes fall into two general categories. First, as a socially useful means by which ordinary citizens and corporations can organise the terms of their communal use of property. In Part 8, we shall consider the ways in which trusts and derivatives of trusts techniques are used to organise charities, pension funds, co-operatives and even (in a very particular manner) NHS trusts. Similar techniques based on the stewardship of property by a trustee for the ultimate entitlement of beneficiaries also form an important part of commercial agreements, as considered in outline in Chapter 2 and in more detail in Part 7.

Secondly, as a means of using trusts to elude or avoid legal problems. So, for example, the preceding discussion of the carrying on of dispositions of equitable interests, in ways which avoid the provisions of s 53(1)(c) of the Law of Property Act 1925, has indicated the manner in which trusts lawyers are able to structure their clients' affairs to achieve the desired effect. The same holds true for situations in which the client is not seeking to avoid some legal rule but rather to achieve an identified, desired effect. Therefore, a commercial contract between two multinational financial institutions dealing in financial derivatives, or between two sole traders dealing in used cars, can be secured by providing that payment is held on trust until both buyer and seller are satisfied that the contract has been properly performed. The same trusts law techniques will apply, with suitable adaptations, to both circumstances. Express trusts law is therefore also about the development of tools with which lawyers can help their clients to achieve their goals.

22 [1960] AC 1.

23 Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW [1959] AC 457.

24 Moffat, 1999, 76 et seq.

With the increasing tightening of the formalities relating to the creation of express trusts, we might think that the trust is becoming ever more similar to the contract. As will become apparent in Parts 4–6, even in relation to trusts implied by law there is a tendency for the courts to generate increasingly rigid rules for the recognition of such trusts. As a result, much of the fluidity previously identified with the notion of ‘conscience’ has been lost. Indeed the rules of equity are becoming ever more reminiscent of the rules of the common law. The formalities necessary to create an express trust are similar to the three-stage test for the creation of a common law contract: offer/acceptance, consideration and intent to effect legal relations.

Equity ought to be about more than merely creating trusts by numbers. While the use of the express trust will become ever more institutionalised with its deployment in commercial contracts, will trusts and so forth, it should not be forgotten that this difficult concept of ‘conscience’ lies in the background. The question as to what constitutes good and bad conscience in different circumstances is a very real one, not necessarily with reference to the creation of such trusts but certainly in relation to the management and breach of such arrangements. The available remedies and equitable responses to contravention of the trust will differ in desirability from context to context. Therefore, this book takes the unusual step of dividing its later discussion between uses of the trust in commercial cases and in welfare-related cases.

In short, equity and trusts have a potentially far broader application than is at present allowed. The development of those principles will be a question of reading and applying the literature of equity and the literature of modern social theory to find the commonalities and dissonances between their shared use of English words like ‘equity’, ‘justice’ and ‘efficiency’, as discussed in Chapter 32.

7.2.4 Equitable estoppel and express trusts

One recurrent theme in the law relating to express trusts is the presence of equitable estoppel propping up situations in which express trusts are otherwise not available. These are contradictory currents, in truth. Equitable estoppel, in the form of proprietary estoppel, arises in situations in which the claimant has acted to his detriment in reliance upon an assurance made by the defendant.²⁵ The remedy supplied is at the discretion of the court. Typically it is such remedy as is necessary to achieve the ‘minimum equity to do justice to the plaintiff’:²⁶ this may result in a remedy which varies between a right to absolute title in the property at issue²⁷ and a purely personal claim to money.²⁸ What is most significant is that the 25 Re Basham [1986] 1 WLR 1498; Yaxley v Gotts [2000] 1 All ER 711.

26 Crabb v Arun DC [1976] Ch 179; Yaxley v Gotts [2000] 1 All ER 711.

27 Pascoe v Turner [1979] 2 All ER 945.

28 Baker v Baker (1993) 25 HLR 408.

purpose of equitable estoppel is to reverse the detriment suffered by the claimant. The remedy is therefore not simply that necessary to achieve the ‘minimum equity to do justice to the plaintiff’ but more precisely that necessary to achieve that justice by compensating the detriment suffered by the claimant.²⁹

It is one of the principal tenets of the law of express trusts that equity will not assist a volunteer.³⁰ From that proposition flows a number of other rules. First, equity will not complete an incompletely constituted trust.³¹ Therefore, a disappointed person who considered himself otherwise entitled to receive a gift could not argue that the donor ought to be deemed to have declared a trust over that property. That is, unless the donor had done everything necessary for her to do to divest herself of title in the property.³² Secondly, no claimant will be entitled to assert title in property unless there has been a declaration of trust and until the trust has been constituted.³³ Thirdly, flowing from the second, no claimant will be entitled to claim rights under a trust unless the formalities necessary for the declaration of the trust have been performed.³⁴

In all of these situations the main tenet of trusts law is that it is the intention of the settlor which is enforced by the court. As we have seen, there are issues concerning the interaction between the intentions of the settlor and the rights of the beneficiaries to assert rights under *Saunders v Vautier*³⁵ to call for the trust property and terminate the trust. However, it is the donative intention of the settlor which is carried out. Cases like *Paul v Paul*³⁶ and *Re Ralli's WT*³⁷ indicate that the settlor is not able to unpack the trust once it has been properly constituted, unless she has reserved to herself some express power to do so.

Where the trust is held to be invalid, the claimant may be able to claim rights under proprietary estoppel on the following basis. Where the settlor has not simply expressed a general intention to create a trust at some time in the future but has also made some assurance to the claimant that she will be a beneficiary under that trust, the claimant might argue that she acted to her detriment in reliance on that assurance. Clearly, it would be necessary for the claimant to demonstrate that she had in fact suffered some detriment in reliance on that assurance – as considered above, the appropriate remedy would be dependent on the nature and extent of that detriment. Assuming that the court considered a proprietary remedy was appropriate, the beneficiary might be entitled to a substantially similar right under equitable estoppel to that which would have been available if the trust had been properly constituted. In effect, then, equitable estoppel provides for a discretionary, reactive remedy which counter-balances the rigid rules of certainty required by the law of express trusts. Estoppel therefore fills a gap left by the increasingly institutional law of trusts to provide for justice in individual situations.

29 Lim v Ang [1992] 1 WLR 113.

30 Milroy v Lord (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

31 Ibid.

32 Re Rose [1952] Ch 499.

33 Milroy v Lord (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

34 See perhaps Grey v IRC [1960] AC 1.

35 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

36 (1882) 20 Ch D 742.

37 [1964] 2 WLR 144.

The law of trusts has developed a range of doctrines which validate trusts even though these general principles have not been obeyed: for example, constructive trusts, secret trusts, and the rule in Strong v Bird.³⁸ The doctrines of constructive trusts and secret trusts were developed to prevent unconscionable conduct and fraud. Their intention is distinct from that in estoppel. Estoppel prevents the claimant suffering detriment precisely as a result of the non-performance of some assurance given by the defendant, whereas the constructive and secret trusts doctrines protect the claimant against the defendant's unconscionable behaviour. There is clearly potential for overlap between these doctrines (as considered in Yaxley v Gotts).³⁹ The distinction, as discussed in Chapter 15 below, is that the constructive trust imposes a retrospective, institutional trust over property, whereas the estoppel claim grants either personal or proprietary claims prospectively on a discretionary basis from the date of the court order. Similarly, express trusts are concerned narrowly with property rights over identified property,⁴⁰ whereas estoppel is concerned more generally with the avoidance of detriment. Within the canon of equity, then, the doctrine of equitable estoppel is considerably more broadly based than the law relating to express trusts.

38 (1874) LR 18 Eq 315.

39 [2000] 1 All ER 711.

40 Re Goldcorp [1995] 1 AC 74.

Part 3

Administration of trusts

This page intentionally left blank

The duties of trustees

8.1	INTRODUCTION	341
8.2	THE OFFICE OF TRUSTEE	342
8.2.1	The nature of the office of trustee	343
8.2.2	Appointment of trustees	344
8.2.3	Principles governing dealings with the trust property	347
8.2.4	The manner in which the trustees are obliged to act in general terms	347
8.2.5	Removal, death or retirement of trustee	349
8.2.6	Right to remuneration	350
8.2.7	Right to reimbursement and indemnity	350
8.2.8	Delegation of trustees' powers	353
8.3	THE GENERAL DUTIES OF TRUSTEES	353
8.3.1	Duties on acceptance of office	354
8.3.2	Duty to obey directions of the trust	356
8.3.3	Duty to safeguard trust property	356
8.3.4	Duty to act impartially between beneficiaries	357
8.3.5	Duty to exercise reasonable care	361
8.3.6	Duties in relation to trust expenses	364
8.3.7	Duty to invest the trust property	365
8.3.8	Duty to distribute the trust property correctly	365
8.3.9	Duty to avoid conflicts of interest	367
8.3.10	Duties of confidence and duties in relation to Chinese walls	375
8.3.11	Duty to act gratuitously	376
8.3.12	Duty to account and to provide information	377
8.3.13	Duty to take into account only relevant considerations, and to achieve the trust's intended objective: the principle in Pitt v Holt	377
8.3.14	Mistake in the exercise of a trustee's powers	391
8.3.15	The effect of breach of duties	392
8.4	THE TRUSTEES' DUTY TO PROVIDE INFORMATION AND TO ACCOUNT TO THE BENEFICIARIES	392
8.4.1	Introduction	392
8.4.2	The limited duty to give general information as to the existence and nature of the trust	393

8.4.3	The limited duty to disclose trust documents to those with a proprietary interest under the trust	394
8.4.4	Which documents constitute trust documents?	397
8.4.5	Who constitutes a beneficiary with a right to access to information?	399
8.4.6	No obligation on trustees to give reasons for their decisions	400
8.4.7	No obligation to disclose confidential information	401
8.4.8	The duty to render accounts	403
8.4.9	Fiduciary duties in relation to Chinese walls and confidential information	404
8.5	LIMITATION OF THE TRUSTEES' DUTIES	407
8.5.1	The validity of exclusion of liability clauses under case law	408
8.5.2	Disclaimer, release and extinguishment of powers	420
8.6	CONTROL OF THE TRUSTEES	420
8.6.1	Control of the trustees by the beneficiaries	420
8.6.2	Control of the trustees by the court	421
8.6.3	Setting aside trustees' decisions for taking into account irrelevant considerations or for failing to take into account relevant considerations	424

OVERVIEW

The manner in which trustees are obliged to carry out their fiduciary duties is the core of the trust – the trustees owe those duties to the beneficiaries in relation to the trust fund. Statute provides for limited situations in which trustees who are incapable of performing their duties can be removed from office and other trustees appointed in their place.¹

The duties of the trustees are manifold. The duties considered in this section are the following.

(1) The duties on acceptance of office relating to the need to familiarise oneself with the terms, conditions and history of the management of the trust. (2) The duty to obey the terms of the trust unless directed to do otherwise by the court. (3) The duty to safeguard the trust assets, including duties to maintain the trust property, as well as to ensure that it is applied in accordance with the directions set out in the trust instrument. (4) The duty to act even-handedly between beneficiaries, which means that the trustees are required to act impartially between beneficiaries and to avoid conflicts of interest. (5) The duty to act with reasonable care, meaning generally a duty to act as though a prudent person of business acting on behalf of someone for whom one feels morally bound to provide. (6) Duties in relation to trust expenses.

(7) The duties of investment, requiring prudence and the acquisition of the highest possible rate of return in the context. (8) The duty to distribute the trust property correctly. (9) The duty to avoid conflicts of interest, not to earn unauthorised profits from the fiduciary office, not to deal on one's own behalf with trust property on pain of such transactions

¹ Section 8.2.

being voidable, and the obligation to deal fairly with the trust property. (10) The duty to preserve the confidence of the beneficiaries, especially in relation to Chinese wall arrangements. (11) The duty to act gratuitously, without any right to payment not permitted by the trust instrument or by the general law. (12) The duty to account and to provide information. (13) The duty to take into account relevant considerations and to overlook irrelevant considerations, failure to do so may lead to the court setting aside an exercise of the trustees' powers if they have committed a breach of trust in so doing.² The nature of the trustees' liabilities for breaching any of these duties are considered in Chapter 18.

The trustees bear only a limited obligation to give information to beneficiaries in relation to the administration and management of the trust fund and in relation only to that part of a trust fund in which they have a proprietary interest. Recent case law has emphasised the court's inherent discretion to make orders relating to the administration of trusts and therefore the access of beneficiaries to information may be enlarged in the future or alternatively it may continue to be exercised in accordance with traditional principles. Trustees are not obliged to disclose to beneficiaries any matter in relation to any exercise of their fiduciary discretion, nor are they obliged to disclose any confidential matter. The court reserves discretion as to the manner in which trustees exercise their powers, but not as to the content of any such decision unless there has been palpable wrongdoing.³

Trustees are entitled to have their liabilities for breach of trust and for the commission of any tort limited by the terms of the trust instrument. Such liability exclusion clauses are equitable devices and not contractual provisions. Trustees can limit their liability for negligence and gross negligence, but they may not limit their liability for dishonesty or fraud. There is a division in the authorities between a permissive approach to such exclusion clauses and an approach which prefers to limit them.⁴

The trustees may be controlled by the beneficiaries by means of an application to the court. The court has an inherent jurisdiction to make orders in relation to the administration of a trust. The court may make orders by way variously of (a) giving directions, (b) assuming administrative control, (c) judicial review (in a private law sense) of the trustees' actions, or (d) setting aside any decision of a trustee made by taking into account irrelevant considerations or failing to take into account relevant considerations.⁵

8.1 INTRODUCTION

It is a remarkable feature of the law of trusts that there is no central statement of the duties owed by trustees in either a statute or in a single case; rather, there is a sense of the obligations borne by trustees which is expressed by the idea that trustees will bear those duties whenever conscience demands that they do.⁶ There is no core of trusteeship in this sense but rather each example of trusteeship falls to be interpreted on its own terms.⁷ There is a general

2 Section 8.3.

3 Section 8.4.

4 Section 8.5.

5 Section 8.6.

6 Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

7 Cf Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241; Hayton, 1996.

sense of what it means to be a trustee which is then sensitive to the context of each trust instrument or to the context of each individual fiduciary office, and which is observable from the many decided cases in which the duties of trustees have been considered.

It should be borne in mind that there are two very different forms of trust at issue here. At one extreme there are trusts the terms of which are contained in carefully drafted trust instruments and which are managed by professional trustees, whereas at the other extreme there are informally created trusts or trusts without carefully drafted trust instruments whose trustees may not be professional trust managers. Carefully drafted trust instruments may well adapt or exclude some of the general principles of trusteeship which are considered in this chapter and in the succeeding chapters. Therefore, it should be recalled that any question as to the application of these principles in any given context will frequently be answered by an analysis of the trust instrument in question. In this chapter we will focus on the general principles and we will consider the extent to which it is possible to exclude general principles of trusts law in a trust instrument, whether those general principles were created by case law or by statute.

As we shall see in this chapter and in the two chapters to follow, there are many conflicting approaches to the duties owed by trustees on the decided cases. Some of this uncertainty is a result of the development of our understanding of the role of the trustee between the 19th century, when many of these principles were formalised for the first time, and the 21st century. Other difficulties are caused by the different contexts in which trustees may act: for example, the difference between professional and non-professional trustees, between trustees dealing entirely with family property and trustees managing large pension funds, between trustees of express trusts and trustees of trusts implied by law.

This chapter is organised as follows. First, a consideration of the manner in which trustees are appointed, removed and how they are treated by the trust.⁸ Secondly, a survey of the general duties of trustees.⁹ This section forms the focal point of this chapter and gives us our clearest understanding of the nature of trusteeship in express trusts. Thirdly, the particular nature of the trustees' duty to account to the beneficiaries and, more specifically, the particular types of information which the trustees are required to give to particular kinds of beneficiaries about the management of the trust. Clearly, if the beneficiary principle is to function effectively in practice so that the beneficiaries are able to hold the trustees to account for any shortcomings in their management of the trust, then it is important to know how much information the beneficiaries can demand from the trustees.¹⁰ Fourthly, the important question of the trustees' right to limit or exclude their liabilities for negligence or breach of trust by the insertion of a term to that effect in the trust instrument.¹¹ Fifthly, an analysis of the way in which beneficiaries can control and set aside trustees' actions.

8.2 THE OFFICE OF TRUSTEE

The manner in which trustees are obliged to carry out their fiduciary duties is the core of the trust – the trustees owe those duties to the beneficiaries in relation to the trust

8 Section 8.2.

9 Section 8.3.

10 Section 8.4. See, eg, Morice v Bishop of Durham (1805) 10 Ves 522 and the requirement, considered in Chapter 4, that there must be a beneficiary in whose favour the court can decree performance.

11 Section 8.5.

fund. Statute provides for limited situations in which trustees who are incapable of performing their duties can be removed from office and other trustees appointed in their place. The forms of incapacity include death, infancy, mental ill-health, absence from the jurisdiction and unwillingness to act. Trustees have limited rights to remuneration for their services, to be reimbursed for their expenses and indemnified against certain liabilities assumed when acting on trust business.

8.2.1 The nature of the office of trustee

The scope of trusteeship in relation to express trusts

This section considers the nature of trusteeship. While, in truth, most of this book is a consideration of the nature of trusteeship and the rights of beneficiaries, this chapter focuses on the office of trustee itself and the manner in which legal persons become trustees and the general obligations which are owed by trustees unless something is provided to the contrary in the trust instrument. That the office of trustee is in truth an example of equity acting on the conscience of the legal owner of property was explored in Chapter 1. This chapter pursues that thinking into the detail of the office of trustee.

The personal obligations incumbent on a trustee in relation to a beneficiary were considered in part in relation to the enforcement of trusts in Part 2, and are also discussed in Chapter 9, Chapter 10 and in Part 6 of this book in relation to the liabilities of a trustee who commits a breach of trust. This chapter focuses on the nature of a number of those obligations specifically to do with the obligations of the trustee to communicate information to the beneficiaries and the manner in which trustees are required to carry out their duties.

Duties on acceptance of the office of trustee

Once a trustee has accepted the office of trustee, she is then bound by all of the terms of the trust instrument and, where applicable, by the requirements of the general law of trusts. These principles are considered at para 8.3.1 below.

Refusal to act as trustee

A person may refuse to act as a trustee and is perfectly entitled to refuse the entire office from the outset.¹² Equally, it is open to a trustee to limit her liabilities as a trustee¹³ as well as to refuse to act in the first place.¹⁴ If the trustee does limit or exclude her liabilities, then those liabilities are reduced or removed to that extent.¹⁵ Acceptance will be proved clearly if the trustee either signs the trust instrument¹⁶ or gives an explicit declaration of assent such as writing a letter to that effect.¹⁷

12 Robinson v Pett (1734) 3 Peere Wms 249, per Lord Talbot.

13 Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241.

14 In the event that a person refuses to act as trustee then that person cannot in principle be said to be bound in conscience to act as a trustee.

15 This question is considered in detail in section 8.5 below.

16 Jones v Higgins (1866) LR 2 Eq 538.

17 Vickers v Bell (1864) 4 De GJ & S 274.

Nevertheless, two complications arise. First, what if the trustee accepts the office of trustee initially and then seeks to refuse that office subsequently? If the trustee has accepted the office of trustee and then seeks to repudiate it later, the refusal of the office is ineffective.¹⁸ Instead the trustee (for such she will have become) would have to seek formally to disclaim the office, as considered below.¹⁹

The second problem in relation to refusal to act would arise if an individual had refused to act as trustee from the outset but had nevertheless come inadvertently into possession of the property which she was supposed to hold on trust. Suppose, for example, that a settlor thrust a valuable chattel into the hands of his intended trustee while on his deathbed and died before the intended trustee had a chance to request that the settlor appoint someone else as trustee. In such a situation, the trustee could not be bound by the office of trustee having repudiated the office but nevertheless should be treated as being either a bare trustee of the property, required to hold it until some other person can be found to act as trustee in her place, or as a bailee of the property to the same extent. What would be inequitable would be to hold that person liable to observe all of the terms of the trusteeship – as to investment of the property and so forth – as though she was actually bound to act as a full trustee.

Duties applicable in relation to trusts implied by law

What is unclear from the decided cases is the extent to which the rules considered below should be taken as applying to resulting and constructive trusts, which are considered in detail in Part 4. It is clear that the appointment and removal of trustees, and issues as to conflicts of interests and duties to give information, apply to trustees of express trusts. It is to be supposed that the same duties and obligations must be applied to trustees under resulting trusts and constructive trusts from the date of the order which confirms the existence of such a trust. What is more difficult is the extent to which such obligations should be deemed to have existed from the time that the trust came into existence but before the date of the court order.

The precise nature of such obligations remains unclear because there has been little discussion of them in the case law – frequently because the finding of a constructive trust or a resulting trust resolves questions as to title in the property in any event. It has been said that it would be ‘a mistake to suppose that in every situation in which a constructive trust arises the legal owner is necessarily subject to all the fiduciary obligations and disabilities of an express trustee’.²⁰

8.2.2 Appointment of trustees

It is possible for a trust instrument to create its own quasi-legislative framework for the powers of trustees and others to appoint or remove trustees. The validity of such provisions will depend upon any objections to them based on public policy. In the absence of any such 18 Re Sharman's Will Trusts [1942] Ch 311, 314. Refusal of probate even when a person has promised a testator that she would act will nevertheless be effective under the law of succession: Doyle v Blake (1804) 2 Sch & Lef 231, 239, per Lord Redesdale LC.

19 See para 8.5.2 below.

20 Lonrho plc v Fayed (No 2) [1991] 4 All ER 961, per Millett J.

provisions, the Trustee Act (TA) 1925 will apply. It is possible for a settlor to exclude the terms of the 1925 Act in whole or in part.²¹ Therefore, the settlor may choose to create a different mechanism by which trustees are to be appointed to the office of trustee. This might be done, for example, to facilitate tax planning by enabling trustees resident in jurisdictions outside the UK to be appointed to the office of trustee.

Appointment of trustees

There is a statutory power of appointing new or additional trustees contained in s 36 of the TA 1925. Section 36(1) provides that it is possible to appoint new trustees in circumstances in which an existing trustee falls into one of the following categories: is dead; remains outside the UK for a continuous period of more than 12 months; desires to be discharged; refuses to act as a trustee; is unfit to act as a trustee; is incapable of acting as a trustee; or is an infant. In such circumstances, any person who is nominated by the terms of the trust to appoint a replacement, or failing that the remaining trustees (or the personal representatives of the last surviving trustee), may by writing appoint one or more other persons to be trustees in the place of the trustee who has fallen into one of these seven categories. In Richards v Mackay,²² in a decision relating to the appointment of foreign trustees, Millett J held that ‘where the trustees maintain their discretion . . . the court should need to be satisfied only that the proposed transaction is not so inappropriate that no reasonable trustee could entertain it’. Therefore, it is unlikely that a court will find that the appointment of trustees will be unenforceable unless there is some manifest defect in the course of action proposed by the trustees.

The statutory provisions further provide in s 36(2) of the TA 1925 that where a trustee has been removed under a power in the trust, a new trustee or trustees may be appointed as if that pre-existing trustee had been dead. Where the trustees have indeed died, a power of appointment given to that trustee is exercisable by the executors (or personal representatives) of the last surviving trustee.²³ In circumstances where there is a sole trustee, any person authorised by the trust to nominate a replacement trustee may appoint one or more additional trustees in writing.²⁴ Where a trustee is incapable pursuant to the Mental Health Act 1983, no new trustee can be appointed without an order to that effect being made under the Mental Health Act 1983.²⁵ Any appointees put into office under this s 36 are treated as having the same powers as if they had been originally appointed trustee.²⁶

There is a distinction between ‘unfitness to act’ and being ‘incapable of acting’. The concept of unfitness refers to whether or not the person in question is legally capable of acting, for example by being insolvent, and so it relates to whether or not she has the legal power to act as a trustee. By contrast, the concept of incapacity in this context refers more generally to being physically or mentally unable to carry out the duties of trusteeship. Therefore, a person in a coma would be incapable of acting as a trustee, whereas a person who had become bankrupt would be unfit to act as a trustee.

21 TA 1925, s 69.

22 [1990] 1 OTR 1.

23 TA 1925, s 36(4).

24 Ibid., s 36(6).

25 Ibid., s 36(9).

26 Ibid., s 36(7).

Inherent judicial discretion

The court retains a power to appoint new trustees under s 41 of the TA 1925. That section provides that '[t]he court may, whenever it is expedient to appoint a new trustee or new trustees, and it is found inexpedient, difficult or impracticable to do so without the assistance of the court, make an order appointing new trustee or trustees . . .'.²⁷ Therefore, the court's own discretion does not require that it be necessary for the court to act, merely that it is considered to be 'expedient' on the basis of the difficulty in relying on some other mechanism. An example of such expediency is where one trustee is obstructing the proper administration of a trust by refusing to consent to the actions proposed by the other trustees. In such a situation, the court may deem it expedient to appoint a new trustee to enable the trust's purposes to be performed.

One of the most common reasons for making alterations in this way in practice is for the purposes of tax avoidance. In many circumstances, where the trustees are resident in a tax jurisdiction outside the UK, the trust will be treated as resident in that other jurisdiction and therefore not liable to UK tax. Consequently, a trust which has generated sizeable income or a taxable capital gain may wish to change its residence from the UK to another jurisdiction. The most straightforward method of achieving this is to appoint new trustees resident in that other jurisdiction and have the UK resident trustees withdraw.

On this issue, it was held in *Re Whitehead's WT*²⁸ that there was a distinction between exercise of a court discretion and a discretion belonging solely to the trustees. Where it is the exercise of the court's own discretion,²⁹ the court is unlikely to allow the appointment where the purpose of that appointment is the avoidance of tax. However, tax-saving is a valid consideration for trustees and therefore, where it is a matter for the trustees' own discretion, the trustees can act on a desire to minimise the tax exposure of the trust.³⁰

Miscellaneous statutory powers of appointment

Under the supplemental provisions contained in s 37 of the TA 1925, the number of trustees may be increased so as to create a separate set of trustees (not exceeding four in number) for the purpose of holding a particular fund, especially where it is a complex trust structure or where the fund comprises many different types of property. In any event, where there is only one trustee at the creation of the trust it is not obligatory to appoint more than one trustee. However, a sole trustee shall not be appointed where that trustee would be unable to give a good receipt for the trust property.³¹ There is sufficient evidence that there is a vacancy among the trustees in relation to a trust of land, provided that there is a statement in any trust instrument identifying one of the grounds in s 36(1) in relation to the existing trustees.³² In relation specifically to trusts of land, s 19 of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996 empowers all of the beneficiaries acting sui juris to give a written direction to the trustees to appoint or remove a trustee.

27 Ibid, s 41.

28 [1971] 1 WLR 833.

29 Eg, under the Variation of Trusts Act 1958, considered in Chapter 10 below.

30 Cf the discussion of the Hastings-Bass principle considered at para 8.3.13 below.

31 TA 1925, s 37(2).

32 Ibid, s 38.

In relation to the appointment of new trustees, the issue arises as to the manner in which property must be vested in the new trustees. Further to s 40(1) of the TA 1925, this vesting of the trust fund in the newly appointed trustees takes place automatically, provided that the appointment of the new trustees was effected by deed. This principle does not apply where the property is held by personal representatives and not by a trustee.³³ There are three exceptions to the s 40(1) principle set out in s 40(4). First, where the trust property is a mortgage of land, there is no automatic vesting because the mortgage deed will not make mention of the existence of the trust and it would become a complicated matter to ensure that redemption of the mortgage had been properly carried out. Secondly, in relation to a lease containing a prohibition on assignment without consent because the automatic transfer of the property to new trustees would defeat the purpose of that covenant against assignment without consent. Thirdly, in relation to shares and securities held on a register, because an automatic re-vesting of the property would defeat the statutory requirements for registration of the titleholder to effect a good transfer.

8.2.3 Principles governing dealings with the trust property

General questions relating to specific dealings with the trust property – whether selling it, allowing beneficiaries to occupy it or otherwise – are considered in Chapter 10.³⁴ Otherwise, the general principles which govern the manner in which trustees are required to bear in mind the interests of various beneficiaries and to avoid conflicts of interests, always governed by a general duty of care, are considered below in section 8.3.

8.2.4 The manner in which the trustees are obliged to act in general terms

The fundamental requirement of good conscience

Trustees are required to act in good conscience, at the most basic level.³⁵ This includes the avoidance of conflicts of interest between the trustees' personal interests and the interests of the beneficiaries.³⁶ The material considered in this chapter presents us with a map of those obligations which are generally said to impact on the trustees' consciences. What will emerge is that there is no single list of the obligations owed by trustees in general terms; rather, each trustee's obligations fall to be interpreted on the basis of that trustee's particular trust instrument or on the basis of the circumstances in which each trust was created (if there was no trust instrument or if the trust instrument was silent on a particular point).

The general duty of care and prudence

The general law of trusts has always required that a trustee acts with prudence and care.³⁷ This venerable principle has been adapted by statute into a general duty of care which is 33 Re Cockburn's WT [1957] 3 WLR 212.

34 See in particular section 10.1 below.

35 Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

36 See para 8.3.9 below.

37 See, eg, Speight v Gaunt (1883) 9 App Cas 1; Learoyd v Whiteley (1887) 12 App Cas 727.

considered in detail below.³⁸ Thus, whereas the trustees' duties are said to be based on a requirement of good conscience, the trustees' more precise duties are also to be considered in terms of duties of good management and fair dealing with the trust property. This does not mean that the idea of conscience is not important. Rather, it is the notion of conscience which imposes the office of trustee in the first place. Thereafter, in relation to express trusts, these duties of good management become significant and the duties of fair dealing become significant in relation to the operation of all trusts. The particular contexts in which these general principles are applied will emerge as this chapter progresses.

Trustees must act jointly; whether they are liable entirely jointly or severally

Where there is more than one trustee, those trustees are expected to act jointly.³⁹ Therefore, as a general rule, the trust property is required to be vested in the name of all of the trustees jointly, all of the trustees must receive any trust income, all of the trustees must give a receipt, and so forth. That said, however, there are circumstances in which the trustees need not act jointly. The trust instrument may permit some other means of proceeding without unanimity⁴⁰ or necessity may require that assets be registered in the name of only one of the trustees at a given time.⁴¹ In such situations, however, the property must not be left in the hands of one or only a few of the trustees for longer than is necessary.⁴²

Nevertheless, no individual trustee will be liable for any default which is the default individually of another trustee.⁴³ Therefore, as we shall see, it is a vexed business to know in which situations the trustees are considered to be responsible entirely as a collective entity and in which situations they bear only individual liability. Clearly this is important from the perspective of the beneficiaries. If the trustees are only liable for their own personal defaults, then the beneficiaries will only be able to proceed against any given trustee for breach of trust if it can be shown that that trustee was responsible for that breach; however, if the trustees are jointly liable, then the beneficiaries will be able to recover their losses from whichever trustee they choose and it will be a matter for the trustees to allocate liability between themselves.⁴⁴

The nature of the trustees' liability for breach of trust

The nature of liability for breach of trust is considered in detail in Chapter 18. For present purposes it is sufficient to recognise the following. The trustees' principal obligation is to 38 See para 8.3.5.

39 Luke v South Kensington Hotel Co (1879) 11 Ch D 121; Re Dixon (1826) 2 GL & J 114; Re Hilton [1909] 2 Ch 548; Re Whitely [1910] 1 Ch 600; Re Butlin's Settlement Trust [1976] Ch 251.

40 TA 2000, s 11. For example, where only one trustee is to receive income on behalf of all of the other trustees: Townley v Sherbourne (1633) Bridg 35, 2 W & TLC (9th edn) 577; Gouldsworth v Knights (1843) 11 M & W 337.

41 Consterdine v Consterdine (1862) 31 Beav 330.

42 Brice v Stokes (1805) 11 Ves 319; Re Munton [1927] 1 Ch 262.

43 Townley v Sherbourne (1633) Bridg 35, 2 W & TLC (9th edn) 577. This principle was enshrined in the now repealed TA 1925, s 30(1) whereby trustees were liable only for their own acts and defaults. Although a trustee will be liable for any breach of trust of which she has knowledge or which she conceals or, obviously, in which she knowingly participates in some way: Boardman v Mosman (1799) 1 Bro CC 68. There will also be liability for failing to protect the interests of the beneficiaries in such a situation: Brice v Stokes (1805) 11 Ves 319; Gough v Smith [1872] WN 18.

44 Liability for breach of trust is considered in detail in Chapter 18, para 18.2.4.

account to the beneficiaries both in the sense of rendering accounts as to the value of the trust fund⁴⁵ and also to account in the sense of making good any loss caused to the trust by some breach of the trustee's obligations. Thus, if the trust suffers a loss which has some causal connection with a breach of trust committed by the trustees, then the trustees are obliged to restore the value lost to the trust.⁴⁶ The precise nature of the remedy owed by the trustee in such a circumstance is to account to the beneficiaries for the loss where this idea of accounting may take one of three forms: either recover any property which was lost to the trust by the breach of trust, or to restore the value of the trust fund in cash terms, or to pay equitable compensation for any loss suffered by the trust as a result of the breach of trust.⁴⁷

8.2.5 Removal, death or retirement of trustee

Our focus now turns to the situations in which a trustee can be removed from office.

Voluntary retirement of trustee

It is possible for there to be a retirement of a trustee without a new appointment being made.⁴⁸ Where the trust itself contains a power permitting such retirement, that term is decisive of the matter. As considered above, the trustee may retire on the basis of one of the categories set out in s 36(1) of the TA 1925 (for example, unwillingness to act or absence from the jurisdiction).

Alternatively, a trustee who wishes to be discharged from the office of trustee will be deemed to have been discharged provided that there will remain two trustees or a trust corporation, and provided that the trustee has declared this intention by deed.⁴⁹ Two further caveats under that section exist to the effect that the remaining trustees must consent to the retirement, as must any person empowered by the trust deed to approve such retirement.

It is also possible for all of the sui juris beneficiaries acting together, when absolutely entitled, to consent to the retirement of a trustee. This is an extension of the rule in *Saunders v Vautier*⁵⁰ considered above.

Removal of trustee

Where there is an express power in the trust deed permitting the removal of the trustee by means of a specified mechanism in the trust instrument, that will be decisive of the matter (unless it is contrary to public policy). Commercial trusts will frequently contain an express provision for the alteration of the person who is to act as custodian of property. Typically, the commercial purpose would be to enable two commercial parties to appoint an alternative trustee. This change might be motivated by the cost of the trustee's professional fees. The 45 As considered below in section 8.4.

46 Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421, considered in detail in Chapter 18.

47 Ibid.

48 The decision of a trustee to retire must be voluntary and must not have been induced by undue influence: Daniel v Drew [2005] WTLR 807.

49 TA 1925, s 39.

50 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

change might instead be motivated by a desire to make the trust emigrate to a different jurisdiction (perhaps for tax purposes) by appointing a trustee who is resident in another jurisdiction.

Under s 36(1) of the TA 1925, a trustee may be removed on the basis of one of the probanda set out in that subsection, as considered above. The court has jurisdiction under s 41 of the TA 1925 to appoint a new trustee and remove the former trustee. Alternatively, the court may exercise its inherent jurisdiction to remove a trustee where that is considered to be equitable. The court will consider the wishes of the settlor, the interests of all of the beneficiaries under the trust, and the efficient administration of the trust.⁵¹ The court will typically be reluctant to consent to the appointment of trustees resident outside the jurisdiction without some undertaking to be bound by the decision of the court and therefore may remove such trustees where they are interfering with the proper administration of the trust.⁵² Similarly, the court will be likely to remove a trustee whose personal interests conflict with the interests of the trust, particularly where that conflict is interfering with the proper administration of the trust. Thus, in Moore v M'Glynn,⁵³ a trustee was removed in circumstances where he set up a business in direct competition with the business interests of the trust. In relation to trusts of land, s 19 of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996 empowers all of the beneficiaries acting sui juris to give a written direction to the trustees to appoint or remove a trustee.⁵⁴

8.2.6 Right to remuneration

The trustee is entitled to be remunerated for any service to the trust even if that service could have been performed by a lay trustee (that is, someone not professionally qualified to carry out that task).⁵⁵ A trustee acting in a professional capacity is entitled to receive such remuneration as is reasonable in the circumstances.⁵⁶ Similarly, delegates may be remunerated on a basis that is reasonable in the circumstances.⁵⁷ The provisions as to remuneration of trustees apply only where they have not been expressly excluded by a trust instrument.⁵⁸

8.2.7 Right to reimbursement and indemnity

A trust operates through the personality of the trustees: that is, a trust has no legal personality and therefore the legal title in its property must be vested in the trustees, contracts on behalf of the trust must be effected in the names of the trustees and so forth. In consequence, the trustees incur a range of liabilities in the ordinary conduct of the trust's affairs and the trustees will seek both to be reimbursed for expenses incurred as part of conducting these activities and also indemnified against any liability suffered while conducting those same 51 Re Tempest (1866) 1 Ch 485.

52 Re Freeman's ST (1887) 37 Ch D 148.

53 (1894) 1 IR 74.

54 See generally Letterstedt v Broers (1884) 9 App Cas 371, per Lord Blackburn. See also Adam and Company International Trustees Ltd v Theodore Goddard (2000) The Times, 17 March.

55 TA 2000, s 28(2).

56 Ibid, s 29(2), (3): providing the trustee is not a trust corporation or a charitable trustee, governed by the TA 2000, s 30.

57 Ibid, s 32.

58 Ibid, s 28(1).

activities. First, as to reimbursement, in relation to any expenses incurred while on trust business, the trustee is entitled to be reimbursed from the trust funds or to make payments in pursuit of the trust's objectives out of the trust fund,⁵⁹ provided that such payments are not made contrary to the terms of the trust.⁶⁰ The sorts of expenses which may be recovered include travelling expenses,⁶¹ expenses incurred in employing agents to perform trust activities,⁶² the costs of taking legal advice,⁶³ and the costs of associated with new trustees familiarising themselves with the trust's affairs.⁶⁴ Secondly, a trustee is entitled to payment in relation to the provision of professional services⁶⁵ to the trust if there is a provision in the trust instrument entitling her to receive such payment.⁶⁶ It is no objection to this right of payment that the services in question could have been performed by a non-professional trustee.⁶⁷ This right to payment can be excluded by the trust instrument.⁶⁸

Thirdly, a trustee is entitled to be indemnified by the trust in relation to any contractual obligation incurred on behalf of the trust.⁶⁹ Self-evidently, if the trustee were not so indemnified, then, by way of example, purchases made on behalf of the trust would need to be paid for by the trustee personally: therefore, the trustee is evidently entitled to make that payment out of the trust property⁷⁰ and to be indemnified against obligations arising from the contract generally.⁷¹ In accordance with principle, the trustees will only be entitled to be indemnified against contracts which were entered into properly within the terms of their trusteeship and not in relation to contracts which were entered into outwith their authority.⁷² In relation to any contracts entered into beyond the trustees' powers,⁷³ the trustees will be personally responsible to satisfy any obligations owed to some third party. Equally, the trustees will be entitled only to a partial indemnity to the extent that the trust instrument entitles them to 59 Ibid, s 31(1). This right to reimbursement has long been supported by the case law: see, eg, Worrall v Harford (1802) 8 Ves 4; and by subsequent case law dealing with successive statutes: Re Earl of Winchilsea's Policy Trusts (1888) 39 Ch D 168; Holding and Management Ltd v Property Holding and Investment Trust plc [1989] 1 WLR 1313.

60 TA 2000, s 31(2).

61 Malcolm v O'Callaghan (1837) 3 Myl & Cr 52.

62 TA 2000, s 11.

63 Macnamara v Jones (1784) 2 Dick 587; Smith v Dale (1881) 18 Ch D 516.

64 Re Pumfrey (1882) 22 Ch D 255; De Vigier v IRC [1964] 2 All ER 907.

65 A person provides professional services if those services were provided in the course of a profession or business which is connected with the management of trusts: TA 2000, s 28(5); whereas a lay trustee is a person who is neither a trust corporation nor acting in the course of a profession or business: TA 2000, s 28(6).

66 TA 2000, s 28(1).

67 Ibid, s 28(2).

68 Ibid, s 28(1).

69 The notion of the trustee who is entitled to be indemnified in this way generally includes constructive trustees who hold property on proprietary constructive trust on the basis that if one seeks equity (by means of enforcing a constructive trust), then one must do equity (by means of permitting that trustee an indemnity against her expenses in the management of that property): Rowley v Ginnever [1897] 2 Ch 503. See also Travis v Illingworth [1968] WN 206.

70 See TA 2000, s 31(1)(b) in relation to the right to make payment even of the trustees' expenses out of the trust fund.

71 Dowse v Gorton [1891] AC 190; Re Oxley [1914] 1 Ch 604; Vacuum Oil Co Pty Ltd v Wiltshire (1945) 72 CLR 319.

72 Ibid.

73 That is, any contracts entered into ultra vires.

enter into such a contract, for example, committing only a given proportion of the trust's assets to the satisfaction of that contract.⁷⁴ Similarly, in relation to the tortious liability of trustees, the trustees will be indemnified against any such liability provided that that liability was incurred in the proper performance of the trustee's duties.⁷⁵ However, to the extent that the trustee was acting outwith her duties, or to the extent that she was so acting without due diligence, then the trustee will not be indemnified.⁷⁶ Therefore, it is significant for the trustee to be entitled to an indemnity that the transaction into which the trustee had entered was authorised by the trust instrument.⁷⁷ An indemnity will only be permissible in circumstances in which the transaction was unauthorised if the transaction afforded a benefit to the trustees and if the court, in its general discretion, considers an indemnity to be appropriate.⁷⁸

Difficult questions arise as to the allocation of trustees' expenses between various parts of the trust. For example, if trustees of a discretionary trust are acting for all parts of the trust at once, a question might arise as to whether those expenses should be allocated to the capital or to the income parts of the trust. The result for the objects of that particular part of the trust may be significant because the value of their interests will be reduced by the amount of the expenses. Lindsay J upheld the traditional principle that ordinarily it is the capital part of the trust which bears such general expenses which are not evidently directed to one particular part of the fund, and indeed suggested that there would need to be particular circumstances on the facts of any given case to justify a different analysis, in Revenue & Customs Commissioners v Trustees of the Peter Clay Discretionary Trust.⁷⁹ The principle is based on the idea advanced in *Re Bennett*⁸⁰ that if expenses were borne for the benefit of the entire trust estate then they were attributable to capital. This principle might be rationalised on the basis that if the expenses were borne for the benefit of the estate generally and for its long-term upkeep, then they were truly capital expenses because they would affect the capital value of the property. However, the answer might be different if, for example, money was spent on the upkeep of a house occupied by the life tenant under a trust which provided that no other beneficiary had a right to occupy that house and that the rights of the other beneficiaries were limited to an interest in shares: in such a set of facts it would be only reasonable to charge the trustees expenses in relation to the house to the life tenant's portion of the trust. Similarly, expenses borne for the purpose of the running of the trust on a day-to-day basis are more likely to be considered to best borne by the income part of the trust.⁸¹ It may be 74 Ex p Garland (1803) 10 Ves 110; Re Johnson (1880) 15 Ch D 548; Re Webb (1890) 63 LT 545. So, for example, if the trustees were entitled to invest only one-half of the trust's assets in shares quoted on the London Stock Exchange and the trustees in fact invested three-quarters of the trust's assets in such shares, then the trustees would only be entitled to an indemnity in relation to two-thirds of the trust's investment in those shares.

75 Flower v Pretchel (1934) 159 LT 491.

76 Ibid; see also Re Raybould [1900] 1 Ch 199.

77 Leedham v Chawner (1858) 4 K & J 458; Hosegood v Pedler (1879) 66 LJ QB 18. Moreover, no further indemnity will be permitted if the trustee owes some personal obligation to the beneficiaries by way of breach of trust until that obligation is satisfied: Jacobs v Rylance (1874) LR 17 Eq 341.

78 Vyse v Foster (1872) 8 Ch App 309, 336; Re German Mining Co (1854) 4 De GM&G 19; Re Smith's Estate [1937] Ch 636.

79 [2008] 2 WLR 1052, Lindsay J.

80 [1896] 1 Ch 778. See also Stott v Milne (1884) 25 Ch D 710, as discussed in Revenue & Customs Commissioners v Trustees of the Peter Clay Discretionary Trust [2008] 2 WLR 1052, 1062.

81 In re Duke of Norfolk's Settlement Trusts [1979] Ch 37, 62, per Walton J. possible also to divide expenses between income matters and capital matters on the principles set out above.⁸²

Until the trustee's right to be indemnified is satisfied, the trustee has a lien over the trust fund⁸³ equal to the amount owed to her.⁸⁴ The trustee's lien takes priority over even the interests of the beneficiaries.⁸⁵

8.2.8 Delegation of trustees' powers

In general terms, a trustee is personally liable, in conscience, for all of her own acts and defaults under the general law of trusts. In consequence, a trustee may not delegate her obligations as a trustee to some other person under the old case law⁸⁶ in line with the general principle delegates non potest delgare.⁸⁷ Nevertheless, statute does now permit delegation of trustees' powers in limited circumstances, as considered in section 10.2.

8.3 THE GENERAL DUTIES OF TRUSTEES

The duties of the trustees are manifold. The duties considered in this section are the following. (1) The duties on acceptance of office relating to the need to familiarise oneself with the terms, conditions and history of the management of the trust. (2) The duty to obey the terms of the trust unless directed to do otherwise by the court. (3) The duty to safeguard the trust assets, including duties to maintain the trust property, as well as to ensure that it is applied in accordance with the directions set out in the trust instrument. (4) The duty to act even-handedly between beneficiaries, which means that the trustees are required to act impartially between beneficiaries and to avoid conflicts of interest. (5) The duty to act with reasonable care, meaning generally a duty to act as though a prudent person of business acting on behalf of someone for whom one feels morally bound to provide. (6) Duties in relation to trust expenses.

(7) The duties of investment, requiring prudence and the acquisition of the highest possible rate of return in the context. (8) The duty to distribute the trust property correctly. (9) The duty to avoid conflicts of interest, not to earn unauthorised profits from the fiduciary office, not to deal on one's own behalf with trust property on pain of such transactions being voidable, and the obligation to deal fairly with the trust property. (10) The duty to preserve the confidence of the beneficiaries, especially in relation to Chinese wall arrangements. (11) The duty to act gratuitously, without any right to 82 As was suggested by Vinelott J in Carver v Duncan [1985] AC 1082, with the Court of Appeal focusing on the construction of the appropriate tax regulation.

83 This lien takes effect over both the capital and the income of the trust fund: Stott v Milne (1884) 25 Ch D 710; Hardoon v Belilios [1901] AC 118.

84 Stott v Milne (1884) 25 Ch D 710, 715; Governors of St Thomas's Hospital v Richardson [1910] 1 KB 271, 276. See now also Balkin v Peck (1998) 1 ITL 717.

85 Dodds v Tuke (1884) 25 Ch D 617, 619; Re Griffith [1904] 1 Ch 807.

86 Attorney-General v Glegg (1738) 1 Atk 356; Clough v Bond (1838) 3 My & Cr 490; Re Bellamy and Metropolitan Board of Works (1883) 24 Ch D 387; Re Flower and Metropolitan Board of Works (1884) 27 Ch D 592.

87 That is, 'a delegate is not able to delegate'.

payment not permitted by the trust instrument or by the general law. (12) The duty to account and to provide information.

This section of this chapter considers the most significant general duties which arise in relation to the operation of a trust. Its importance for the flow of argument in this book is its explanation of the relationship between trustee and beneficiary. In the consideration of the conduct of the trust, it is possible to see the nature of the obligations between trustee and beneficiary most clearly. As considered in Chapter 2, the trust is comprised of property rules which relate to the treatment of trust fund, and also of personal obligations between the trustee and beneficiary. Those personal obligations were considered in relation to the enforcement of trusts in Part 2, and are also discussed in Part 6 in relation to the liabilities of a trustee who commits a breach of trust. This chapter focuses on the nature of a number of those obligations specifically to do with the obligations of the trustee to communicate information to the beneficiaries and the manner in which trustees are required to carry out their duties. This section identifies the most important of the trustee's general duties,⁸⁸ albeit that the discussion of some of these duties contains cross-references to more substantive discussions of those duties elsewhere in this chapter or elsewhere in this book.

8.3.1 Duties on acceptance of office

Once a trustee accepts the office of trustee, that trustee is bound by all of the obligations in the trust instrument.⁸⁹ The trustee may not consider that she is imbued with powers which are more extensive than those set out in the trust instrument,⁹⁰ except to the extent that the trust instrument is silent about some power which is granted to the trustee by the TA 1925 or 2000⁹¹ or silent about some duty imposed by statute or by case law.⁹² These principles are amplified in para 8.3.2 below. The trustee's obligations at the outset are composed of very general responsibilities and specific responsibilities.

The general responsibilities are for the trustee to familiarise herself with the terms of trust,⁹³ the nature of the property involved, the range of objects within the contemplation of the trust,⁹⁴ the identity of the other trustees,⁹⁵ to consult all of the documentation connected to the trust⁹⁶ (including the trust instrument, any documents relating to the exercise of any discretionary power or power of appointment, trust accounts, the scope of investments made by the trust,⁹⁷ statements of investment criteria and so forth) and to familiarise herself with 88 That is, duties provided under the general law as opposed to the more specific duties which may be identified in a trust instrument.

89 Clough v Bond (1838) 3 My & Cr 490, unless that would be to the apparent benefit of the beneficiaries and not in breach of some other mandatory rule (such as a rule of illegality).

90 Ibid.

91 This proposition, it is suggested, must be correct as a matter of principle within the scope of that legislation.

92 As before, it is suggested that this proposition must be correct as a matter of principle.

93 The costs and expenses of conducting this process of familiarisation may be recovered from the trust: Re Pumfrey (1882) 22 Ch D 255; De Vigier v IRC [1964] 2 All ER 907.

94 Hallows v Lloyd (1888) 39 Ch D 686, 691, per Kekewich J.

95 Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [1993] 1 WLR 1260, 1265.

96 Tiger v Barclays Bank Ltd [1952] 1 All ER 85.

97 Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [1993] 1 WLR 1260.

any other information pertinent to the management of the trust which is not recorded in documentary fashion.⁹⁸ Evidently, then, the first obligation of the trustee is one of general familiarisation with all of the issues connected to the management of the trust, both formal and informal matters connected to the management of the trust's affairs. If necessary the trustee is required to take legal advice as to the efficacy or legality of any action taken by the trustees in relation to the trust. What a trustee – whether a new trustee of an existing trust or a trustee of a new trust – cannot do is sit supinely by without investigating the nature and extent of her obligations as trustee. In general terms it is of some comfort to a trustee to know that any individual trustee will only be liable, in principle, for any matters of which she had or could have been expected to have had knowledge.⁹⁹ Nevertheless, it is important to bear in mind that a trustee will be liable for matters of which she could be expected to have knowledge: that is, as mentioned before, the trustee is obliged to find out information about her trusteeship and not simply to fail to investigate matters over which she is expected to exert control.¹⁰⁰

The specific responsibilities of any trustee will come from two sources: first, any specific provisions of the trust instrument which impose particular duties on the trustee and, secondly, any duties which can be said to arise as a result of the context in which that person became trustee and the nature of the trust property. It will not be possible to consider here all of the possible provisions in any trust instrument which could ever come into existence; rather, we shall focus on some of the contexts which may influence these specific responsibilities. In general terms, it is the nature of the trust property and the composition of the class of trust objects which will be important. To begin with the trust property, the trustee is required to consider the nature of the property which is held on trust. The first duty is to ensure that the property is properly vested in the trustees.¹⁰¹ The second duty will be dependent on the nature of that property. If the property is money, then the trustee will be required to consider the manner in which that money should be invested,¹⁰² or to sell any property in a reasonable time which the trust requires her to sell,¹⁰³ or to distribute income and capital at appropriate times,¹⁰⁴ or to collect rents from land¹⁰⁵ and so forth. If the property requires maintenance (such as building work on land or taking legal proceedings to collect income owing to it)¹⁰⁶ or insurance¹⁰⁷ or other, similar actions in relation to it, then the trustee must perform those duties in good order.

98 Mond v Hyde [1999] QB 1097.

99 Re Hurst (1892) 67 LT 96; Young v Cloud (1874) LR 18 Eq 634.

100 See ibid., and Mond v Hyde [1999] QB 1097.

101 Underwood v Stevens (1816) 1 Mer 712; Lewis v Nobbs (1878) 8 Ch D 591.

102 See Moyle v Moyle (1831) 2 Russ & M 710, whereby, a little like the biblical parable of the talents, if a trustee simply holds onto the money for an unreasonably long period of time without investing that money, then she will be liable for failure to deal appropriately as a trustee with that property.

103 Fry v Fry (1859) 27 Beav 144; Wentworth v Wentworth [1900] AC 163.

104 Hawkesley v May [1956] 1 QB 304.

105 Tebbs v Carpenter (1816) 1 Madd 290.

106 Buxton v Buxton (1835) 1 My & Cr 80; Re England's Settlement Trusts [1918] 1 Ch 24.

107 Re Godwin's Settlement (1918) 87 LJ Ch 645.

8.3.2 Duty to obey directions of the trust

Each trustee is bound by all of the obligations in the trust instrument.¹⁰⁸ Failure to obey the terms of the trust will constitute a breach of trust.¹⁰⁹ In general terms, a trustee does not have powers which are more extensive than those set out in the trust instrument.¹¹⁰ One clear exception to this principle arises in circumstances in which there is no trust instrument, or in circumstances in which the trust instrument is silent on a particular point. If the trustee is granted a particular power – such as the general power of investment¹¹¹ – by a statute, such as the Trustee Act 1925 (TA 1925) or the Trustee Act 2000 (TA 2000),¹¹² or alternatively if some duty is imposed on a trustee either by a statute or by case law, then it is suggested that that power or duty will be applicable to that trustee.¹¹³ It is a general principle of the TAs 1925 and 2000, however, that the terms of those Acts may be excluded by a term in the trust instrument¹¹⁴ and, impliedly at least, it is a principle of the general law of trusts that the liabilities of trustees may be excluded for all breaches of trust¹¹⁵ which do not amount to dishonesty.¹¹⁶ Where the trustees are bound by other legislative codes, for example, in relation to unit trusts or pension funds or more generally as to investment under the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, then those statutory obligations may supplement or even override any terms of the trust instrument.¹¹⁷ A failure to carry out any action required by the trust or the performance of an unauthorised action will constitute a breach of trust.¹¹⁸

8.3.3 Duty to safeguard trust property

The duty of safeguarding the trust property is fundamental to the notion of trusteeship and to the operation of trusts. Consequently, it can easily be understood that the trustees are responsible for ensuring that no harm comes to any property which they hold on trust. Thus, a trustee holding a house on trust would be required to ensure that the house was kept in proper repair, a trustee holding a horse on trust would be required to ensure that the horse was properly stabled, and so forth. To that extent, this duty will be dependent on the nature of the property. At this introductory level, we can understand the trustees' obligations as being obligations to prevent the property from becoming broken, run-down or worthless.

However, there is a further dimension to this duty which imposes active obligations on the trustees to consider the best interests of the beneficiaries and so to consider the most appropriate way of maximising the utility or the value of the property, as applicable. Therefore, if 108 Clough v Bond (1838) 3 My & Cr 490, unless that would be to the apparent benefit of the beneficiaries and not in breach of some other mandatory rule (such as a rule of illegality).

109 Clough v Bond (1838) 3 My & Cr 490; as discussed in Chapter 18.

110 Ibid.

111 TA 2000, s 3.

112 This proposition, it is suggested, must be correct as a matter of principle within the scope of that legislation.

113 As before, it is suggested that this proposition must be correct as a matter of principle.

114 TA 1925, s 69; TA 2000, Sched 1, para 7.

115 Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241.

116 Walker v Stones [2001] QB 902.

117 For example, in relation to unit trusts (Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, s 253) and pension funds (Pensions Act 1995, s 33), the exclusion of the trustees' liabilities for the investment of the trust property is prohibited by statute no matter what the provisions of the trust instrument may suggest.

118 Breach of trust is considered in Chapter 18.

the property is investment capital, then the obligations of the trustees are to obtain the most profitable investments¹¹⁹ commensurate with the type of trust in question,¹²⁰ whereas if the trust's underlying objective is to provide accommodation for the beneficiaries, then the trustees' principal obligation will be to secure the maintenance and utility of the property so that it is fit for its purpose. In either case, the trustees have active duties to safeguard the trust property so that it remains suitable for the trust's objectives and may not simply watch over the property and preserve it from decay. So, if the trust property is comprised of money which is to be invested for the benefit of the beneficiaries, then the trustees will be required to consider the manner in which that money should be invested.¹²¹ If the property were land and buildings which were rented out to tenants with a view to securing an income stream from those rents, then the trustees would be required to manage the property proactively by means of collecting the rents¹²² or taking any necessary steps to enforce the beneficiary's rights generally over that land¹²³ or to insure the land appropriately.¹²⁴

8.3.4 Duty to act impartially between beneficiaries

The general duty to act impartially between individual beneficiaries and between classes of beneficiaries

In general terms, a trustee is obliged to act impartially as between all of the beneficiaries.¹²⁵ At one level this requires the trustee to exercise fairness as between each beneficiary, showing no favour to any one; and at another level, this requires the beneficiary to act even-handedly as between different classes of beneficiaries.¹²⁶ It is suggested that the duty of impartiality is akin to the duty not to permit conflicts of interest, considered above, in that the trustee is expected to stand apart from partisan considerations as to the different entitlements of various classes of beneficiary to the fruits of the trust fund (income beneficiaries and life tenants) and to the fund itself (capital and remainder beneficiaries). As a fiduciary, the trustee is required to act in relation to each of the beneficiaries without any grace or favour, in the same way that the trustee must not take any personal advantage from the trust.

At its simplest level, then, the trustee is to treat each member of the same class of objects in the same way on the basis that each object has identical rights to all other members of the same class. The trustees are also required to act impartially between different classes of beneficiary and not simply between beneficiaries of the same class. The clearest example of the situation in which trustees have difficulty in acting impartially between different classes

119 Cowan v Scargill [1985] Ch 270.

120 Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [1993] 1 WLR 1260.

121 See Moyle v Moyle (1831) 2 Russ & M 710 whereby, a little like the biblical parable of the talents, if a trustee simply holds onto the money for an unreasonably long period of time without investing that money then she will be liable for failure to deal appropriately as a trustee with that property.

122 Tebbs v Carpenter (1816) 1 Madd 290.

123 Buxton v Buxton (1835) 1 My & Cr 80; Re England's Settlement Trusts [1918] 1 Ch 24.

124 Re Godwin's Settlement (1918) 87 LJ Ch 645.

125 Stephenson v Barclays Bank Trust Co Ltd [1975] 1 WLR 882; [1975] 1 All ER 625; Cowan v Scargill [1985] Ch 270; Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [1993] 1 WLR 1260.

126 The expression 'even hand' being that preferred in a number of cases: Re Tempest (1866) 1 Ch App 485, 487, per Turner LJ; Re Lepine [1892] 1 Ch 210, 219, per Fry LJ.

of beneficiary arises in relation to trusts in which there is a life tenant, entitled to the income of the trust, and beneficiaries in remainder, whose interest is in the capital of the fund. In such a situation, the trustee is obliged not to focus the investment and distribution of the trust fund on the generation of short-term income for the life tenant, when that would be to the detriment of the remainder beneficiaries who would depend on there being capital left in the trust fund.¹²⁷ However, even treatment need not mean that each object of a trust receives the same property under discretionary trusts, as considered below: rather each of them is entitled to equally impartial consideration.

Equally, it may be that one beneficiary satisfies a condition precedent to the vesting of some interest before any other beneficiary, in which case Walton J held the following in Stephenson v Barclays Bank Trust Co Ltd:¹²⁸

When the situation is that a single person who is sui juris has an absolutely vested beneficial interest in a share of the trust fund . . . he is entitled to have transferred to him . . . an aliquot share of each and every asset of the trust fund which presents no difficulty so far as division is concerned. This will apply to such items as cash, money at the bank or an unsecured loan, stock exchange securities and the like. However, as regards land, certainly in all cases, as regards shares in a private company in very special circumstances . . . the situation is not so simple, and even a person with a vested interest in possession in an aliquot share of the trust fund may have to wait until the land is sold, and so forth, before being able to call upon the trustees as of right to account to him for his share of the assets.

Thus, there may be forms of property which can be readily divided and transferred in part to one beneficiary without causing any loss to the other beneficiaries. A loss may be caused to the other beneficiaries by requiring a sale of the property earlier than would otherwise achieve the highest available price: in relation, for example, to land in the UK, a sale of a house in the 1960s would only have realised a few thousand pounds, whereas a sale of that same house in the 1990s would have realised many hundreds of thousands of pounds. Therefore, to distribute some forms of property early to one beneficiary may be to the detriment of future beneficiaries and so ought to be resisted.¹²⁹

If a trustee has a mere power to appoint or advance property, or a similar power under a discretionary trust, then by definition this will require the trustees to grant property to one beneficiary and perhaps none to another, or to grant more to one beneficiary than to another, in the proper exercise of their power. This duty is therefore not a duty to treat all beneficiaries equally. If trustees were required to treat all beneficiaries absolutely equally, and so required by the case law to give them identical amounts of property in all circumstances, then that would make the exercise of most fiduciary powers impossible. By definition a settlor will often want the trustees to use any discretion granted to them under the trust instrument so as to do the best for the beneficiaries: this may involve digging one particular beneficiary out of trouble by advancing a large amount of money to her. If this is within the terms of their powers, then the trustees cannot be limited in their actions if it is what the terms of the trust provide. Therefore, what this principle should be taken to mean is that trustees must treat the objects of their powers impartially and in a manner which they can justify after the event. They should treat them impartially in the sense that no single beneficiary or group of beneficiaries should receive an unjustified benefit at the expense of the other beneficiaries. This is particularly difficult when the trustees have different classes of beneficiaries with competing claims to the trust capital: for example, some who are entitled to income during their lifetimes and others who are entitled to the capital only after the life tenants have died. Given the difficulties of resolving the competing interests of different classes of beneficiaries, in Nestlé v National Westminster Bank, Hoffmann J held that:

127 Re Barton's Trusts (1868) LR 5 Eq 238.

128 Stephenson v Barclays Bank Trust Co Ltd [1975] 1 WLR 882, 889.

129 Re Marshall [1914] 1 Ch 192.

A trustee must act fairly in making investment decisions which may have different consequences for differing classes of beneficiaries. . . . The trustees have a wide discretion. They are, for example, entitled to take into account the income needs of the tenant for life or the fact that the tenant for life was a person known to the settlor and a primary object of the trust whereas the remainderman is a remoter relative or stranger. Of course, these cannot be allowed to become the overriding considerations but the concept of fairness between classes of beneficiaries does not require them to be excluded. It would be an inhuman rule which required trustees to adhere to some mechanical rule for preserving the real value of capital when the tenant for life was the testator's widow who had fallen upon hard times and the remainderman was young and well-off.¹³⁰

In consequence, this principle permits some reference to the precise issues which faced the trustee in the context of her own trust obligations and did not simply require that the trustee live up to an objective standard of proper performance. In pension funds there will be a huge number of beneficiaries potentially with competing interests in the trust fund: thus, the judges are aware of the need not to allow this rule to become too narrow. This elasticity in the principle was recognised by Chadwick LJ in Edge v Pensions Ombudsman in relation to a pension trust fund.¹³¹

The so-called duty to act impartially . . . is no more than the ordinary duty which the law imposes on a person who is entrusted with the exercise of a discretionary power: that he exercises the power for the purpose for which it is given, giving proper consideration to the matters which are relevant and excluding from consideration matters which are irrelevant. If pension fund trustees do that, they cannot be criticized if they reach a decision which appears to prefer the claims of one interest – whether that of employers, current employers or pensioners – over others. The preference will be the result of a proper exercise of the discretionary power.¹³²

130 Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [2000] WTLR 795, 802.

131 [2000] Ch 602, 627, [1999] 4 All ER 546, 567.

132 Similar sentiments were made at first instance by Scott V-C in Edge v Pensions Ombudsman [1998] Ch 512, to the effect that the duty to act impartially is not a straitjacket, although it does express the position that a trustee may nevertheless not act in a manner which unfairly prefers one beneficiary over another in breach of duty.

Therefore, this duty to act impartially does not necessarily mean that all beneficiaries are to be treated absolutely equally. Rather, trustees are not permitted to favour one class of beneficiaries or particular beneficiaries at the expense of other beneficiaries without good reason. Or, to make the same point positively, they can discriminate between different beneficiaries provided that they can justify their actions. Self-evidently, where trustees have a power to select between beneficiaries it would be impossible if the trustees were to be held liable for breach of trust simply because they exercised their power reasonably so as to appoint property to one beneficiary rather than another entirely within the terms of that trust or power.

Similarly, by analogy with Chirkinian v Larcom Trustees Ltd,¹³³ in relation to funds created not simply to provide employee pensions but to provide loans to employees as well, there would be no breach of trust simply because a trustee made a loan to a beneficiary within the terms of that trust.¹³⁴ So, even if that company went into insolvent liquidation subsequently, the trustees would not be required to recover that loan from the beneficiary to whom the loan was made on the basis (inter alia) that it constituted an unfair benefit to that particular beneficiary, provided that the loan had been made within the terms of the trustees' power to make such loans under the trust instrument. Equally, the trustees were not compelled to recover such a loan simply because there was subsequently an insolvency, unless the liquidator was seeking to recover the loan under insolvency law and had instructed the trustees to do that. On these facts that was not the case. Thus, a breach of trust will not be held to arise where the trustees are performing the terms of their trusteeship properly. Therefore, the context of the situation may mean that equality is not possible, and that absolute impartiality is not a practicable goal either, provided always that the trustees are exercising their powers properly.

This impartiality will be required of trustees by the courts unless there is some provision to the contrary in the terms of the trust instrument which requires that there be some different treatment.¹³⁵ That policy is clearly in line with a broader policy of applying the wishes of the settlor as manifested in the terms of the trust. Therefore, the case law rules are really a default setting in the absence of any express provisions set out by the settlor as to the treatment of the trust fund.

Allocations of assets between capital and income beneficiaries

There are always difficulties in knowing which forms of additional property realised by the trustees or settled onto the trust are to be added to capital and which are to be treated as being income: this is particularly significant where some beneficiaries are entitled to income and others only to capital. Generally, large increments to the trust fund are treated straightforwardly as additions to capital, rather than as bundles of future income to be applied to the life tenant's benefit.¹³⁶ However, where the property received has only taken the form of mere income (as with a bonus dividend paid on a share), they fall to be treated as income,¹³⁷ unless 133 [2006] EWHC 1917; [2006] WTLR 1523.

134 Chirkinian v Larcom Trustees Ltd [2006] WTLR 1523.

135 Ibid.

136 Ibid.

137 Re Bouch (1885) 29 Ch D 635.

they have been paid from a capital account (such as a share premium account).¹³⁸ Similarly, the addition of capital amounts to the account of a trustee, such as a reduction of capital by a company paid out to its shareholders, will be taken to form part of the capital of the fund.¹³⁹ A more difficult situation is that in which exceptional profits are generated in any given year of account: if realised from the disposal of capital assets, then they would belong to the capital account, whereas the generation of a large amount of income would ordinarily constitute income. In such a case, the court will look to the nature of the receipt in the trustees' hands.¹⁴⁰ In the absence of any such express provision, the life tenant will be entitled to the income generated by the fund, provided that there is no unauthorised discrimination in favour of the life tenant as against other beneficiaries.¹⁴¹

8.3.5 Duty to exercise reasonable care

The duty of care in the case law

The trustee's obligation in the 19th-century case law was to act as a prudent person of business would have acted if acting on behalf of someone for whom she felt morally bound to provide. Whereas it was held in *Learoyd v Whiteley*¹⁴² that a trustee must act as a businessperson of ordinary prudence, this approach was modified in Bartlett v Barclays Bank,¹⁴³ in which it was held that trustees are permitted to take a prudent degree of risk but must avoid anything which amounts to 'hazard'. In the context of delegating authority to invest to some other person, the classic statement of the trustee's obligation was set out in the following terms in Speight v Gaunt in the decision of Lord Jessel MR:¹⁴⁴

It seems to me that on general trust principles a trustee ought to conduct the business of the trust in the same manner that an ordinary prudent man of business would conduct his own, and that beyond that there is no liability or obligation on the trustee.

Clearly, this may be a difficult test for a trustee to observe – particularly if that trustee is not acting in a professional capacity. As this concept was put by Megarry VC in Cowan v Scargill, the trustees are required to:

take such care as an ordinary prudent man would take if he were minded to make an investment for the benefit of other people for whom he feels morally bound to provide.¹⁴⁵ This

138 Hill v Permanent Trustee Co of NSW [1930] AC 720.

139 Ibid.

140 Re Doughty [1947] Ch 263; Re Kleinwort's Settlements [1951] 2 TLR 91.

141 Re Barton's Trusts (1868) LR 5 Eq 238.

142 (1887) 12 App Cas 727.

143 [1980] Ch 515.

144 Speight v Gaunt (1883) 9 App Cas 1. See also Brice v Stokes (1805) 11 Ves 319; Bullock v Bullock (1886) 56 LJ Ch 221.

145 A rendering of the concept of prudence in relation to trustees in Guernsey, a Francophile system of law based on Norman law at root, is put somewhat more lyrically as an obligation to act 'en bon père de famille'; or, to put that into English, to act as though a good parent acting for his family. With all of the time-bound, gendered notions to one side, that gives a flavour of the trustee acting for someone for whom he or she felt morally bound to provide.

duty includes the duty to seek advice on matters which the trustee does not understand, such as the making of investments, and, on receiving that advice, to act with the same degree of prudence. Although a trustee who takes advice on investments is not bound to accept and act on that advice, he is not entitled to reject it merely because he sincerely disagrees with it, unless in addition he is acting as an ordinary prudent man would act.¹⁴⁶

The approach taken here is that the trustees are to focus primarily on the protection and maintenance of the trust fund, whilst also allowing it to grow steadily.¹⁴⁷

By contrast, Millett LJ in Armitage v Nurse suggested that he did not consider that there was a general duty on trustees to act with skill and care. The precise issue before the Court of Appeal in that case was whether or not a trustee could rely on a clause in the trust instrument which purported to exclude that trustee's liability for breach of trust caused by gross negligence. What Millett LJ held precisely was that 'I do not accept the further submission that [the trustee's] core obligations include the duties of skill and care, prudence and diligence'. This is surprising given that an obligation of prudence had long formed part of the case law on trustees' duties, as set out above. What Millett LJ was seeking to do was to reject the notion that trustees could not exclude their liabilities because there is some notional minimum level of obligations which all trustees must bear if there is to be a valid trust: his Lordship was doing this because in the case in front of him he was keen to ensure that trustees could have their liabilities excluded in the trust instrument without such clauses being held to be void. The detailed rules concerning trustee exemption clauses are considered below in section 8.5.1. What is important to note at this stage is that some modern judges – like Millett LJ – do not wish to allow the ordinary obligations on trustees to become too demanding so that the trust may become unattractive to commercial people because the obligations involved are too strict. Nevertheless, it is respectfully suggested that the case law had long contained a requirement of prudence and that the Trustee Act 2000 now contains a general duty of skill and care, as considered immediately below.

This principle requiring that the trustees act with care is considered in detail in relation to the investment of the trust property – the situation in which it is most significant – in Chapter 9.¹⁴⁸ While it may be that there has been a change in the judicial view of trustees' duties, the passage of the Trustee Act 2000 has changed the ordinary obligations of trustees from being based on 'prudence' to being based on 'reasonableness', as considered in the next section.

The limited statutory duty of care

The case law principles have been displaced in part by s 1 of the TA 2000, which provides that:

- (1) Whenever the duty under this subsection applies to a trustee, he must exercise such care and skill as is reasonable in the circumstances, having regard, in particular –
 - (a) to any special knowledge or experience that he has or holds himself out as having, and

146 Cowan v Scargill [1985] Ch 270, 289.

147 See the effect of this approach in Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [1993] 1 WLR 1260.

148 See section 9.6.

- (b) if he acts as trustee in the course of a business or profession, to any special knowledge or experience that it is reasonable to expect of a person acting in the course of that kind of business or profession.

Therefore, the focus of s 1 of the 2000 Act is that the trustee must be held to a subjective standard of care commensurate with any knowledge or experience which she already has. The test is subjective in the sense that it is reactive to the trustee's own knowledge and experience, and the standard of care that is required will be a standard of care which is reasonable for someone with that knowledge or experience. If a trustee is foolish enough to represent herself as having knowledge or experience which she does not have, then the trustee is held to the standard of care appropriate to the knowledge and experience which she claimed to have had.¹⁴⁹ Similarly, if the trustee is an incompetent professional, then she will not be held to her low level of competence but rather to the level of competence which one ought to have been able to expect of such a professional.

There is nothing in the legislation which requires the trustee to act; as opposed to the case law which imposed a positive obligation to do the best possible for the beneficiaries.¹⁵⁰ Rather, the statutory duty of care applies only to the six categories of power identified in Sched 1 to the Act.¹⁵¹ Those six categories of power are: investment; acquisition of land; the use of agents, nominees and custodians; compounding of liabilities; insurance; and dealing with reversionary interests.

This principle requiring that the trustees act with care is considered in detail in relation to the investment of the trust property in Chapter 9.

What is the effect of the Trustee Act 2000 on the case law standard of prudence?

The principal effect of the Trustee Act 2000 has been to shift the ordinary obligations of trustees from a requirement that they act prudently to a requirement that they act reasonably. This shift is subtle but significant. If a trustee is required to act prudently then that trustee is required to be cautious. When faced with a choice of options, the trustee must seek to be careful as opposed, for example, to taking a reasonable risk to make profit or to benefit the beneficiaries. By contrast, a requirement that a trustee act reasonably means that a trustee does not necessarily need to be cautious: instead when faced with a choice of options the trustee can take an acceptable level of risk provided that her actions are reasonable in the context. The remainder of the TA 2000, as considered in detail in Chapter 9, obliges trustees investing trust property to ensure that her actions are suitable, that they comply with modern standards of portfolio investment, and that they are based on appropriate professional advice. (It should be remembered that the TA 2000 will only signal a shift away from case law principles in relation to the investment of trusts in any event – the other areas will remain unaffected by the Act.) Thus, the need to act reasonably, as opposed to being careful, might seem to involve taking greater risks but they are informed risks which must be appropriate for the context. So, investing a pension fund involving millions of pounds will necessarily require the taking of reasonable investment risks to make large profits for all of the pensioners, whereas investing an elderly widow's few life savings reasonably will require the trustees to ensure that there is as little risk of losing those life savings as possible. Therefore, the test of reasonableness may require some trustees to behave prudently if the context so requires, but it also liberates other trustees to act more progressively on behalf of the beneficiaries without being pre-occupied by a high standard of obligation.

149 TA 2000, s 1(1)(a).

150 Cowan v Scargill [1985] Ch 270.

151 TA 2000, s 2.

It is difficult to know how the TA 2000 will affect the case law principles. The remainder of this long chapter on trustees' obligations contains many hundreds of cases advancing the thirteen principal obligations of trustees. The TA 2000 will not affect most of those cases. What it might do is signal to judges in the future that the culture in which trustees operate has become more liberal in that the trustees must be able to act reasonably, always within the confines of their obligations in the trust instrument, rather than having to act overly cautiously. The TA 2000 itself provides that its principles can be excluded by the trust instrument and therefore trustees will frequently limit their liabilities in practice in any event by ensuring that the settlor provides that the trustees can act as liberally as possible. The purpose behind the passage of the TA 2000 was to liberate trustees from the strictures of 'prudence' when investing trust property. Coupled with the approach taken by the Court of Appeal in Armitage v Nurse – which was, on the limited point of the existence of duties of prudence on trustees, contrary to earlier authority – this signals a potential shift in the nature of trustees' duties from a need for caution towards a need for trustees to be able to justify their actions as having been reasonable. What might be lost in this development, it is suggested, is the need to recognise that there is something special about the fiduciary obligations of trustees which ought not to be so diluted by removing many of the irreducible core of obligations on them, such as the duty to act with appropriate care and skill, before the device which we call a 'trust' is all but meaningless when compared to ordinary common law obligations like the contract.

8.3.6 Duties in relation to trust expenses

The trustee is entitled to be reimbursed for any expense and to be indemnified against trust expenses generally, as considered in para 8.2.7 above. There are complex questions, however, as to the allocation of expenses between different parts of the same trust fund. So, in *HMRC v Peter Clay Discretionary Trust*¹⁵² an issue arose, in essence, as to whether or not the trustees of a discretionary trust could charge a part of their expenses relating to the capital portion of a trust fund to the income portion of that fund. Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs ('HMRC') objected to this charge being made against the income from the trust for tax purposes. It was held, in line with traditional principle, that charges incurred 'for the benefit of the entire estate' should be charged to capital.¹⁵³ The issue was whether or not there could also be a charge to income in this case. In the earlier authorities,¹⁵⁴ Sir John Chadwick considered, deciding whether or not an expense was for the benefit of the whole estate depended on whether or not it would benefit the entire estate, both the life tenant

152 [2009] 2 WLR 1353.

153 See In re Bennett [1896] 1 Ch 778 and Carver v Duncan [1985] AC 1082.

154 Ibid.

(the income beneficiary) and the remainderman (the capital beneficiary) in traditional settlements. Sir John Chadwick upheld the principle that if the work had been done for the benefit of the whole estate, both income and capital, then it would be chargeable to capital alone; however, because a part of the work which the trustees had done in this instance had been conducted exclusively for the income portion of the trust fund, then those expenses would properly be chargeable to the income portion of the fund alone.¹⁵⁵

8.3.7 Duty to invest the trust property

The duties in relation to the investment of the trust property are considered in detail in Chapter 9. The law on investment of trusts is caught between an obligation on the trustees to secure the best performing investments available in accordance with the terms of the trust,¹⁵⁶ while balancing that quest for a high return with the general obligation to act prudently.¹⁵⁷ The tension between taking care and yet seeking the highest available return has developed into a modern requirement that trustees maintain a portfolio of investments whereby a breadth of investments will balance out the risks associated with any individual investment generating a loss.¹⁵⁸ The enactment of the TA 2000 has supplied a range of powers and duties for trustees when investing the trust property in the event that a trust instrument has no specific investment powers and duties to the contrary. The most significant statutory power is a general investment power for trustees whereby trustees have the investment powers of an absolute owner of the trust property.¹⁵⁹ This power displaces the greatly restrictive obligations contained in the now-repealed Trustee Investment Act 1961 which required a very conservative investment policy for trustees. The TA 2000 also requires trustees consciously to create standard investment criteria in the form of a set of principles by reference to which they will make their investments.¹⁶⁰ In making investment decisions, the trustees are also obliged to take professional advice.¹⁶¹ When making investment decisions, the trustees are still governed by the general statutory duty of care.¹⁶²

8.3.8 Duty to distribute the trust property correctly

Further to the trustee's duty to obey the terms of the trust¹⁶³ and the concomitant duty to avoid breaches of trust, the trustee must therefore obey any instructions as to the distribution of the trust property. Any failure to obey the terms of the trust will constitute a breach of 155 See now Law Commission, Capital and Income in Trusts: Classification and Apportionment, Law Com No 315, 2009, in particular as to the treatment of distributions from companies as constituting capital when received by a trust.

156 Cowan v Scargill [1985] Ch 270. See para 9.6.2 below.

157 Speight v Gaunt (1883) 9 App Cas 1, considered above at para 8.3.5 and, in relation specifically to investment of the trust property, at para 9.6.3 below.

158 Bartlett v Barclays Bank Trust Co Ltd. [1980] Ch 515. See generally section 9.6 on this development.

159 TA 2000, s 6(1). See para 9.3.1 below.

160 Ibid., s 4(1). See para 9.5.2 below.

161 Ibid., s 5(1). See para 9.5.3 below.

162 Ibid., Sched 1, para 1(b). See para 9.4.1 below.

163 Clough v Bond (1838) 3 My & Cr 490; considered at para 8.3.2 above.

trust, no matter what inducement there might have been to commit that breach,¹⁶⁴ although the beneficiaries will only be entitled to recover any property lost to the trust fund or to recover the value of any loss suffered as a result of the breach of trust.¹⁶⁵

Aside from active breaches of trust, there are other forms of distribution which trustees must avoid. Trustees should only make distributions to beneficiaries who are sui juris and therefore able to give a good receipt for the property. Consequently, unmarried infants¹⁶⁶ and the insane may not give a good receipt because they are not sui juris at law. There are other contexts in which distribution may pose difficulties for trustees. After a divorce, a court order may have varied the terms of a family settlement and the trustees must therefore obey the terms of the court order rather than the original terms of the settlement.¹⁶⁷ When a beneficiary has died, the trustees should only release property to a personal representative if that representative can provide proof of entitlement to receive the property acceptable to English law;¹⁶⁸ otherwise the trustee will become a constructive trustee or executor de son tort of the wrongly distributed property.¹⁶⁹ In some circumstances it may not be known whether or not a beneficiary has died, in which case if there is no trace of that beneficiary for seven years, then the trustees are entitled to assume that she is dead,¹⁷⁰ although the trustees are supposed to seek actual proof of death before making any distribution on this basis.¹⁷¹

The general problem here is the problem of knowing which of a class of beneficiaries remains alive and who is therefore entitled to be considered either to receive property under a fixed trust or to be the object of some power held by the trustees. A similar form of this problem arises when the trustees seek to decide whether or not a given postulant still qualifies for membership of a class of objects of a trust or power. In general terms the trustees should protect themselves against any claim that they exercised their powers wrongly¹⁷² by means of taking out an advertisement in the Gazette, and in a newspaper circulating in the district where any land at issue is situated, provided that the advertisement provides a mechanism for contacting the trustees and a deadline for such communication.¹⁷³ There is no obligation to 164 Therefore, the trustee will bear the principal liability even if she had been presented with a forged document by a person claiming entitlement to trust property: Ashby v Blackwell (1765) Eden 299; Eaves v Hickson (1861) 30 Beav 136. Cf Re Smith (1902) 71 LJ Ch 411.

165 Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421.

166 Although a married infant may give a good receipt: Law of Property Act 1925, s 21.

167 Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, s 24; Family Law Act 1996, s 15, Sched 2, paras 1, 2 and 5.

168 As, for example, under the Power of Attorneys Act 1971, s 5.

169 Smith v Bolden (1863) 33 Beav 262; New York Breweries Co Ltd v Attorney-General [1899] AC 62.

170 Re Watkins [1953] 1 WLR 1323.

171 That is, seek a Benjamin order: Re Benjamin [1902] 1 Ch 723.

172 Provided that they comply with the procedure contained in Law of Property Act 1925, s 27, as considered next: Re Letherbrow [1935] WN 34 and 48; Re Holden [1935] WN 52. Not surprisingly, the trustees cannot ignore a claim of which they have notice simply because that beneficiary does not respond to the advertisement: Markwell's Case (1872) 21 WR 135. Although, just because trustees know of a claim, they may nevertheless not be able to find the beneficiary in question and therefore ought not to be liable provided that they have taken reasonable steps to find that person. In such a situation the trustees should seek a court order as to their best course of action: see para 8.6.2 below. For example, if a trustee has acted honestly and reasonably, then he may be excused for any breach of trust: TA 1925, s 61.

173 Law of Property Act 1925, s 27.

advertise in a foreign country if that is considered impracticable by the trustees.¹⁷⁴ An alternative means of protection is to seek the advice of counsel of 10 years' standing.¹⁷⁵

8.3.9 Duty to avoid conflicts of interest

The general duty to avoid conflicts of interest

The trustee has an obligation not to permit conflicts of interest either between two competing fiduciary duties, or between the trustee's personal interests and the interests of the beneficiaries.¹⁷⁶ At one level, therefore, a trustee is not permitted to refrain from any action as trustee which would otherwise have been carried out, nor to take any action which would otherwise not have been performed, on the basis that the trustee's behaviour was motivated by a conflict between her personal interests and her countervailing fiduciary obligations.¹⁷⁷ However, it should be understood that the courts are not simply concerned to deal with conscious and deliberate conflicts of interest – for example, when a trustee intentionally seeks to make an unauthorised personal profit from the use of the trust property – but are concerned more generally to remove even the possibility that there might be any such abuse of fiduciary position by imposing a duty to avoid all potential, as well as actual, conflicts of interest. Therefore, at a second level, fiduciaries are obliged to refrain from any potential conflicts of interest. As is considered below, any benefit taken from such a conflict of interest will be held on constructive trust for the beneficiaries.¹⁷⁸

The two key principles in this area are frequently described as the 'no conflict rule' and the 'no profit rule'¹⁷⁹ where the former rule prohibits fiduciaries from allowing any conflict between their personal interests and their fiduciary duties, and where the latter rule prohibits fiduciaries from profiting from their fiduciary offices. These two related principles have been described in the following fashion by Deane J in *Chan v Zacharia*¹⁸⁰ as being predicated on two separate themes:

The first is that which appropriates for the benefit of the person to whom the fiduciary duty is owed any benefit or gain obtained or received by the fiduciary in circumstances where there existed a conflict of personal interest and fiduciary duty or a significant possibility of such conflict: the objective is to preclude the fiduciary from being swayed by considerations of personal interest. The second is that which requires the fiduciary to 174 Re Gess [1942] Ch 37.

175 Administration of Justice Act 1985, s 48(1).

176 Tito v Waddell (No 2) [1977] 3 All ER 129; Re Thompson's Settlement [1985] 2 All ER 720. This is equally true where accountants are advising both clients in a transaction and are therefore required to separate their activities by means of internal divisions (known as 'Chinese walls'); Prince Jefri Bolkiah v KPMG [1999] 1 All ER 517. Cf Kelly v Cooper [1993] AC 205 (estate agents).

177 Clark Boyce v Mouat [1994] 1 AC 428; Nocton v Lord Ashburton [1914] AC 932.

178 Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46.

179 See Don King Productions Inc v Warren [2000] Ch 291 and In Plus Group Ltd v Pyke [2002] 2 BCLC 201, 220; cited with approval in Ultraframe UK Ltd v Fielding [2005] EWHC 1638 (Ch), [2005] All ER (D) 397, [1305], per Lewison J.

180 (1984) 154 CLR 178, 198; cited with approval in Don King Productions Inc v Warren [2000] Ch 291; and in Ultraframe UK Ltd v Fielding [2005] EWHC 1638 (Ch), [2005] All ER (D) 397, [1305], per Lewison J. account for any benefit or gain obtained or received by reason of or by use of his fiduciary position or of opportunity or knowledge resulting from it: the objective is to preclude the fiduciary from actually misusing his position for his personal advantage.

In either case, the trustee may be protected if she can show that she was authorised to act in the manner in which she did, as considered in the next section. Similarly, while the trustee cannot transact in a way which will accord any direct benefit to herself,¹⁸¹ it may be possible for the trustee to sell trust property to a company in which the trustee is a mere shareholder without attracting liability.¹⁸² This will preclude liability under the conflict of interest rule unless the trustee stands to make some substantial personal gain as a result of the company being substantially under his control¹⁸³ or in such a situation where the transaction itself involves a lack of probity.¹⁸⁴

Trustee making unauthorised profits from the trust

In the event that the trustee makes any profit from the trust which has not been authorised by the terms of the trust, then the trustee is required to hold any such profits (and any property derived from those profits) on constructive trust for the beneficiaries, in accordance with any specific provisions of the terms of the trust.¹⁸⁵ If the trustee deals with the trust property in breach of trust and makes a loss, the trustee will nevertheless be required to make good the property and the loss to the trust fund.¹⁸⁶ These issues are considered in detail in Chapter 12¹⁸⁷ and Chapter 18.¹⁸⁸

This rule is a strict rule which developed from the rule in Keech v Sandford,¹⁸⁹ in which case a trustee sought to renew a lease which previously he had held on trust for an infant beneficiary. The beneficiary, being an infant, was not able to take out the new lease in his own name and therefore the trustee took out the lease in his own name instead. It was held that the lease should be held on constructive trust for the beneficiary not because there had been any suggestion of fraud or unconscionable behaviour on the part of the trustee, but rather because the court considered that it should be astute to prevent even the possibility that there might be any unconscionable benefit taken by a trustee. This principle was expressed in the following manner by Lord Herschell in Bray v Ford:

It is an inflexible rule of a Court of Equity that a person in a fiduciary position . . . is not, unless otherwise expressly provided, entitled to make a profit, he is not allowed to put himself in a position where his interest and duty conflict. It does not appear to me that 181 Thompson's Trustee in Bankruptcy v Heaton [1974] 1 WLR 605.

182 Silkstone and Haigh Moor Coal Co v Edey [1900] 1 Ch 167.

183 See, eg, Farrar v Farrars Ltd (1888) 40 Ch D 395.

184 Such as the auctioning of land at an undervalue by auction where only the trustee's spouse is present: Tse Kwong Lam v Wong Chit Sen [1983] 3 All ER 54.

185 Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46; Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324, [1993] 3 WLR 1143.

186 Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324, [1993] 3 WLR 1143.

187 Section 12.5.

188 Section 18.1.

189 (1726) Sel Cas Ch 61.

this rule is . . . founded upon principles of morality. I regard it rather as based on the consideration that, human nature being what it is, there is danger, in such circumstances, of the person holding a fiduciary position being swayed by interest rather than by duty, and thus prejudicing those whom he was bound to protect. It has, therefore, been deemed expedient to lay down this positive rule.

The aim of this principle, then, is to prevent trustees from defrauding the trust by abstracting trust profits to themselves. It functions, in Lord Herschell's account, on the basis of a maudlin attitude to human nature by which it is supposed that all people, whether fiduciaries or not, are weak and will succumb to temptation if the law is not pitched at its strictest. In some cases it appears to operate harshly where trustees seek to make profits for the trust which the beneficiaries acting through that trust could not have made for themselves. One example of this situation was the case of Boardman v Phipps,¹⁹⁰ in which a solicitor took over the management of a trust which he had previously been advising. That solicitor contributed his own, personal money to a business plan, involving the acquisition of a majority shareholding in a private company. Subsequently, the solicitor realised a large personal profit in common with the beneficiaries of the trust who also realised a large profit – there was no suggestion that the solicitor had defrauded the beneficiaries, albeit that he could not demonstrate that sufficient information had been given to the beneficiaries so as to obtain authorisation from them for his course of action. Nevertheless, the majority of the House of Lords held that the trustee should hold all of his profits on constructive trust for the beneficiaries even though all of their Lordships agreed that he had not acted in bad faith.¹⁹¹ Lord King LC in Keech v Sandford held that 'it is very proper that [this] rule should be strictly pursued, and not in the least relaxed, for it is very obvious what would be the consequence of letting trustees have the [trust property in their own names]'.¹⁹²

Consequently, even in the absence of any proof of fraud or unconscionable behaviour, the trustee will be liable to hold any such profits on constructive trust for the beneficiaries.¹⁹³ The fiduciary may only be absolved from this obligation if the trust permits a particular form of profit (such as for a professional trustee to charge fees),¹⁹⁴ or if the fiduciary has sought authorisation for the profit,¹⁹⁵ or the person involved is held not to be in a fiduciary position at all.¹⁹⁶ However, it is not clear that authorisation will always generate permission to make profits or protection from liability for making such unauthorised profits,¹⁹⁷ whereas a right to

190 [1967] 2 AC 46.

191 The trustee was entitled to some equitable accounting to compensate him for his efforts in generating that profit for the trust.

192 (1726) Sel Cas 61.

193 Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46.

194 On which, see para 8.2.6 above.

195 Queensland Mines v Hudson (1977) 18 ALR 1; Prince Jefri Bolkiah v KPMG [1999] 1 All ER 517. In Brown v IRC [1965] AC 244, it was suggested by Lord Reid that a trustee cannot keep any benefit taken from dealing with the beneficiaries unless he can 'show authority'.

196 Re Biss [1903] 2 Ch 40, as when a family business was passed to the defendant in a situation in which he was found by the Court of Appeal to owe no duties of good conscience to any other member of the family when renewing the lease over the business premises.

197 Industrial Development Consultants Ltd v Cooley [1972] 1 WLR 443; on which, see generally section 12.5 below.

receive payment or a finding that one is not a fiduciary will provide such absolution from liability.¹⁹⁸ This limitation on the defence of authorisation will obtain particularly if that authorisation has been sought merely from other trustees. In line with the idea of trusteeship being a bundle of obligations owed to the beneficiaries under the trust, simply obtaining the permission of other fiduciaries would not appear to be sufficient to avoid the ambit of the rule against profit from a fiduciary office.¹⁹⁹ However, receiving the permission, or affirmation, of beneficiaries will generally prevent any beneficiaries who gave such permission from seeking to enforce the rule against self-dealing, as considered next.²⁰⁰

The principle against self-dealing transactions

In a situation in which a trustee purports to deal on her own account with the trust property and especially if she takes a profit from such a transaction, not only will the trustee be required to hold that profit on constructive trust for the beneficiaries of the trust, but also the transaction itself may be set aside.²⁰¹ Previously we have considered the obligations of fiduciaries when making unauthorised profits from their office in general terms. The specific problem in relation to the self-dealing principle is that the trustees are purporting to deal with the beneficiaries of their fiduciary power as a third party, for example, when seeking to buy property from the trust. In that instance, the trustee would be acting simultaneously on behalf of the trust as well as acting on her own behalf. Such a transaction is considered to bear the risk that the trustee will acquire the property from the trust at an advantageous price and thus exploit the beneficiaries, although by the same token it might be argued on the facts of some cases that the price which the trustee obtains would have been the same price which the beneficiaries would have obtained on the open market and therefore that there is nothing wrong with the transaction.

Nevertheless, the prevailing strict approach on the leading authorities holds that the transaction is voidable, rather than automatically void, at the instance of the beneficiaries. On the basis of these authorities, there is no possibility that the courts will listen to arguments that the transaction caused no harm to the beneficiaries and therefore that the beneficiaries ought not to be permitted to avoid that transaction, the reason for this strict approach being to protect the beneficiaries from the ‘danger’ resulting from such a course of argument.²⁰² Consequently, it is possible for the beneficiaries to affirm the transaction after the event if they consider it to be in their interests so to do. The purpose of this rule is to prevent further conflicts of interest.²⁰³ This rule had always been interpreted and 198 Re Biss [1903] 2 Ch 40.

199 Regal v Gulliver [1942] 1 All ER 378.

200 Holder v Holder [1968] Ch 353.

201 Tito v Waddell (No 2) [1977] 3 All ER 129, 141, per Megarry VC. See also Newgate Stud Co v Penfold [2004] EWHC 2993 (Ch).

202 Parker v McKenna (1874) 10 Ch App 96, 124, per James LJ. Indeed, his Lordship considered it necessary to secure ‘the safety of mankind’ by applying the strict version of this principle. That this is a general rule of policy has been affirmed by Vinelott J in British Coal Corp v British Coal Staff Superannuation Scheme Trustees Ltd [1993] PLR 303, 312.

203 Re Brooke Bond & Co Ltd’s Trust Deed [1963] Ch 357; Re Thompson’s Settlement [1985] 2 All ER 720; Motivex Ltd v Bulfield [1988] BCLC 104.

applied on a strict basis.²⁰⁴ Lord Eldon expressed the strict approach to this principle in the following terms:²⁰⁵

The purchase [of trust property by the trustee on his own account] is not permitted in any case, however honest the circumstances; the general interests of justice requiring it to be destroyed in every instance; as no Court is equal to the examination and ascertainment of the truth in much the greater number of cases.

It is a matter of policy that this principle is strictly observed.²⁰⁶ Consequently, a fiduciary cannot ordinarily seek to argue that no substantial harm would be caused to the beneficiaries' interests by the transaction. So, it would not be open to the trustee to maintain that the price had been fixed by an independent third party or seemingly that the transaction had been effected through a third party.²⁰⁷ In either case, the transaction would be voidable. In line with the principle in Keech v Sandford,²⁰⁸ the courts are concerned to prevent the possibility of fraud.

Exceptionally, some flexibility was permitted in Holder v Holder,²⁰⁹ when the Court of Appeal decided that it was possible for a court to inquire into the trustee's knowledge and intentions, and to decide on that basis that it was permissible for transactions in good faith to be affirmed by the court rather than being voidable. In that case, a testator's son had formally renounced his status as executor and (apart from some few initial activities) had taken no part in the administration of the estate. The son acquired the freehold to a farm of which he had formerly been tenant from his father's estate at auction. The price reached was greatly in excess of the reserve price. Consequently, the Court of Appeal held that the transaction should not be voidable on the grounds that the son had taken no substantive actions as trustee, nor had he benefited from any transaction at an undervalue as a result. It might similarly be wondered why a trustee who bought property from the trust at a standard market price – for example, a price fixed on a stock exchange – should not be entitled to enforce that purchase. This approach does, however, appear to be in conflict with the explicitly inflexible view of the House of Lords in Boardman v Phipps, where no evident advantage had been taken of the beneficiaries and no loss caused to those beneficiaries by a person who was not even an express trustee (but rather who became a constructive trustee by means of his meddling with the trust, or a 'trustee de son tort' as such a person is known).²¹⁰ The general principle in *Ex p Lacey*²¹¹ was clearly to the effect that any transaction with the trust in which the trustee had 204 Ex p Lacey (1802) 6 Ves 625; Ex p James (1803) 8 Ves 337.

205 Ex p James (1803) 8 Ves 337, 345. See also Ex p Bennett (1805) 10 Ves 381; Randall v Errington (1805) 10 Ves 423; Parker v McKenna (1874) 10 Ch App 96.

206 British Coal Corp v British Coal Staff Superannuation Scheme Trustees Ltd [1993] PLR 303, 312, per Vinelott J.

207 Wright v Morgan [1926] AC 788. See also Campbell v Walker (1800) 5 Ves 678, 680, where the sale was made at a public auction and sold to the trustee for well above the reserve price: nevertheless, the Lacey principle was strictly applied.

208 (1726) Sel Cas Ch 61.

209 [1968] Ch 353.

210 [1967] 2 AC 46.

211 (1802) 6 Ves 625.

a personal interest would be voidable at the instance of the beneficiary. In Holder v Holder,²¹² it was doubted by Harman LJ (in an obiter remark) whether the court was bound to apply the principle in *Ex p Lacey*²¹³ as a strict rule. In Holder, it was suggested that the mischief of the principle would not be affected where the trustee had ceased to act in effect as a trustee and therefore could not be deemed to be both the seller of the interest (on behalf of the trust) and also the buyer (on his own account). However, courts in subsequent cases have not interpreted Holder as casting any doubt on the general applicability of the Lacey principle.²¹⁴

It is clear that the understanding of the self-dealing principle in the leading cases entitles the beneficiary to avoid any such transaction on the basis, set out in the *Keech v Sandford*²¹⁵ rule, that even the possibility of fraud or bad faith being exercised by the trustee is to be resisted.²¹⁶ Megarry VC in *Tito v Waddell (No 2)*²¹⁷ enunciated the self-dealing principle in the following terms – ‘if a trustee purchases trust property from himself, any beneficiary may have the sale set aside ex debito justitiae, however fair the transaction’. The right of the beneficiary is therefore to set aside the transaction. There is no defence against the exercise of such a right that the transaction was entered into as though between parties acting at arm’s length. The same principle applies to purchases by directors from their companies,²¹⁸ although most articles of association in English companies expressly permit such transactions.²¹⁹ So, where a director of a company which owned racehorses organised that some of those horses be sold to two partnerships in which he and his wife respectively had financial interests, it was held that these were self-dealing transactions.²²⁰ Where the beneficiary acquiesces in the transaction, however, that beneficiary is precluded from seeking to have that transaction set aside.²²¹

The strict application of the Lacey principle was demonstrated in Wright v Morgan,²²² in which a will bequeathed rights in property to a person who was both legatee and one of two trustees of the will trusts. The will permitted sale of the property to that legatee of the property. The legatee sought to transfer the property to his co-trustee subject to an independent valuation of the open market price for the property. The issue arose whether this transfer to the co-trustee should be set aside. It was held that the transaction was voidable even though there had been an independent valuation of the price.²²³ The reasoning stated for applying the principle in spite of the independent valuation was that the trustees nevertheless could have delayed the sale and so applied a value which was no longer the open market value. Similarly, where fiduciaries acquired leases from a company and a partnership on their own account, it was held that those transactions were voidable at the instance of the beneficiaries of the powers.²²⁴

212 Ibid.

213 (1802) 6 Ves 625.

214 See, eg, Re Thompson’s Settlement [1986] Ch 99.

215 (1726) Sel Cas Ch 61.

216 Ex p Lacey (1802) 6 Ves 625.

217 [1977] Ch 106.

218 Aberdeen Railway Co v Blaikie Brothers (1854) 1 Macq 461.

219 See Jaffey, 2000.

220 Newgate Stud Co v Penfold [2004] EWHC 2993 (Ch).

221 Holder v Holder [1968] Ch 353.

222 [1926] AC 788.

223 See also Whelpdale v Cookson (1747) 1 Ves Sen 9; Sargeant v National Westminster Bank (1990) 61 P & CR 518.

224 Re Thompson’s Settlement [1986] Ch 99.

The only advisable course of action for a trustee wishing to enter into such a transaction would be to acquire the leave of the court in advance of the transaction to acquire those interests. The court will require the trustee to demonstrate that the transaction is in the interests of the beneficiaries and that the trustee will not take any unconscionable advantage from the transaction.²²⁵ It might be thought that such an application has the effect merely of adopting the obiter remarks of Harman LJ in *Holder v Holder*²²⁶ to the effect that the court could treat the *Lacey*²²⁷ principle as merely a rule of practice and accept as valid any transaction which was shown not to be to the unconscionable advantage of the trustee nor to the concomitant disadvantage of the beneficiaries.

Unsurprisingly, the trustee will not be able to avoid this principle simply by selling to an associate or a connected company or similar person, although the authorities on this point relate primarily to sales to relatives,²²⁸ to nominees,²²⁹ to the trustee's children²³⁰ and to the trustee's spouse.²³¹ It is suggested that in any event, such a transaction would be a sham transaction and therefore capable of being set aside in any event²³² or treated as an attempt to effect a fraud on the power.²³³

The fair dealing principle

Where a trustee deals with a beneficiary's interest in the trust, or acquires that beneficiary's interest, there will be an obligation on the trustee to demonstrate fair dealing. Thus, in Tito v Waddell (No 2), Megarry VC held:²³⁴ if a trustee purchases the beneficial interest of any of his beneficiaries, the transaction is not voidable ex debito justitiae, but can be set aside unless the trustee can show that he has not taken advantage of his position and has made full disclosure to the beneficiary, and that the transaction is fair and honest.

Therefore, there is a burden of proof on the trustee to demonstrate both that no advantage was taken of the beneficiary, and that the beneficiary was made fully aware of the nature and the circumstances of the transaction. Where there is no disclosure to the beneficiary, therefore, the transaction will be set aside.²³⁵

The fair dealing principle is similar to the self-dealing principle considered immediately above. The fair dealing principle only validates acquisitions by trustees of the interests of their beneficiaries will be enforceable provided that the trustee does not acquire any 225 Campbell v Walker (1800) 5 Ves 678; Farmer v Dean (1863) 32 Beav 327.

226 [1968] Ch 353.

227 Ex p Lacey (1802) 6 Ves 625.

228 Coles v Trecothick (1804) 9 Ves 234 – which may be permitted where the transaction appears to be conducted as though at arm's length.

229 Silkstone & Haigh Moor Coal Co v Edey [1900] 1 Ch 167; Re Postlethwaite (1888) 60 LT 514.

230 Gregory v Gregory (1821) Jac 631.

231 Ferraby v Hobson (1847) 2 PH 255; Burrell v Burrell's Trustee 1915 SC 333.

232 See, eg, Street v Mountford [1985] 2 WLR 877; Midland Bank v Wyatt [1995] 1 FLR 697.

233 Rochevoucauld v Boustead [1897] 1 Ch 196.

234 [1977] 3 All ER 129.

235 Hill v Langley (1988) The Times, 28 January.

advantage attributable to his fiduciary office.²³⁶ This principle also applies to fiduciary relationships such as acquisitions by agents of the interests of their principals.²³⁷

To demonstrate that the transaction was not procured as a result of any abuse of position the trustee will be required to demonstrate that no details were concealed, that the price obtained was fair and that the beneficiary was not required to rely entirely on the trustee's advice.²³⁸ The fair dealing principle is necessarily less strict than the self-dealing principle because the trustee is able to seek justification of the former by demonstrating that the transaction was not procured in bad faith. It is an unconscious aspect of the principle nevertheless that the beneficiaries are required to authorise the transaction rather than permitting the trustee to act entirely alone: this accords with the principles on authorisation considered above. Where the beneficiary is an infant, the trustee will not be able to demonstrate that the beneficiary made an informed decision.²³⁹

Limitations on the 'no conflict' principle

The duty not to permit conflicts of interest has clearly been expressed as being a strict principle, particularly in cases in the early 19th century.²⁴⁰ It is clear that a trustee may realise a personal profit if that is envisaged by the terms of the trust instrument.²⁴¹ There are, however, other judicial statements to the effect that there is some flexibility in this principle, provided always that it is remembered that its purpose is the protection of the beneficiaries.²⁴² One situation in which a trustee may be entitled to take a profit, then, is in a situation in which the settlor puts the trustee in a position in which the trustee, impliedly, is required to operate in the context of some conflict of interest.²⁴³ So, consider a professional investment advisor, such as a stockbroker, who is appointed as trustee of a trust fund and who, to the settlor's certain knowledge, was already trustee of many hundreds of other trusts simultaneously. In that situation, the settlor would have put the trustee in a situation in which that trustee had to consider the competing needs of many beneficiaries under many different trusts and also to consider her own commissions and profits derived from recommending investment strategies to those various trusts. Equally, a stockbroker would, in line with modern market practice, sell to the trust securities which the stockbroker already owned and would possibly buy back from the trust those same securities when the trust sought to realise its profits, thus necessarily involving dealing with the trust on her own account. In such a professional situation, the trust instrument would usually contain provisions (at the insistence of the professional trustee) which permitted this ostensible conflict of interest and which would thus seek to limit the trustee's potential liabilities.²⁴⁴

236 Chalmer v Bradley (1819) 1 J & W 51; Tito v Waddell (No 2) [1977] Ch 106.

237 Edwards v Meyrick (1842) 2 Hare 60.

238 Coles v Bradley (1804) 9 Ves 234.

239 Sanderson v Walker (1807) 13 Ves 601.

240 Eg, Ex p Lacey (1802) 6 Ves 625.

241 Sargeant v National Westminster Bank plc (1990) 61 P&CR 518.

242 Boulting v Association of Cinematograph, Television and Allied Technicians [1963] 2 QB 606, 636, per Upjohn LJ.

243 Sargeant v National Westminster Bank plc (1990) 61 P & CR 518, 519, per Nourse LJ.

244 See para 8.5.1 below.

Nevertheless, it is suggested that there may be situations in which the transaction may not be to the detriment of the beneficiaries, but if the transaction is indeed a benign or even profitable one from the beneficiaries' perspective, then the beneficiaries can affirm the transaction if they choose to do so. If the beneficiaries do not choose to affirm the transaction, then it must be assumed that it is not considered by them to be in their best interests and therefore there is no good reason to dilute the 'no conflict' principle to protect the trustee from the obligation to reconstitute the trust fund. If the trustee requires protection, then the trustee can insist on terms to that effect being inserted in the trust instrument. Otherwise, the trustee cannot be under any doubt that self-dealing and other transactions will not be valid if the 'no conflict' principle is strictly enforced.

8.3.10 Duties of confidence and duties in relation to Chinese walls

One of the core duties of a fiduciary is a duty of confidence, which is coupled with the duty of loyalty.²⁴⁵ In Reading v R,²⁴⁶ Asquith LJ proposed the following summary of those circumstances in which a fiduciary relationship can be said to exist:

a 'fiduciary relation' exists . . . whenever the plaintiff entrusts to the defendant property, including intangible property as, for instance, confidential information, and relies on the defendant to deal with such property for the benefit of the plaintiff or for purposes authorised by him, and not otherwise.

The essence of the fiduciary relationship is loyalty and consequently precludes the fiduciary from advancing his personal interests at the expense of, or in conflict with, the interests of the object of his fiduciary obligations.²⁴⁷ Those sentiments have been expressed by Millett LJ in the following terms:

A fiduciary is someone who has undertaken to act for or on behalf of another in a particular matter in circumstances which give rise to a relationship of trust and confidence. The distinguishing obligation of a fiduciary is the obligation of loyalty. The principal is entitled to the single-minded loyalty of his fiduciary. The core liability has several facets. A fiduciary must act in good faith; he must not make a profit out of his trust; he must not place himself in a position where his duty and his interest may conflict; he may not act for his own benefit or the benefit of a third person without the informed consent of his principal. This is not intended to be an exhaustive list, but it is sufficient to indicate the nature of fiduciary obligations.²⁴⁸

Therefore, a fiduciary (such as a trustee) must protect the confidence of his beneficiaries. That much has been considered already in relation to the obligation not to permit conflicts of 245 Bristol & West Building Society v Mothew [1998] Ch 1.

246 [1949] 2 KB 232 at 236.

247 On which see Chapter 29 on the imposition of constructive trusts in relation to the abuse of fiduciary office generally.

248 Bristol & West Building Society v Mothew [1998] Ch 1 at 18, per Millett LJ.

interest.²⁴⁹ Briefly put, if a fiduciary earns a profits from the misuse of confidential information owned by a beneficiary without authorisation, then that profit is held on constructive trust by the fiduciary.²⁵⁰

One context in which the protection of confidential information is particularly significant is in relation to Chinese walls.²⁵¹ Chinese walls arise in circumstances in which an organisation is involved in acting on both sides of a transaction such that communication of confidential information owned by both sides to that transaction would ordinarily be possible between officers of that organisation in breach of the organisation's fiduciary duties of confidence to both parties. The clearest example of a Chinese wall would be the arrangement put in place when different departments within the same law firm are acting as advisors to two different companies who are negotiating a merger of their organisations. The Chinese walls relate specifically to the arrangements by which employees of that law firm are prevented from meeting so as to discuss the merger transaction, from seeing documentation relating to the other party's participation in the merger transaction, from accessing those parts of the firm's buildings where employees from the other department may work or store documents or even recreate, and from learning any confidential information in general terms. Clearly, to prevent the sharing of such information between fellow employees is a particularly complex business. Such a communication of confidential information would constitute a breach of the 'no conflicts' rule,²⁵² in that a conflict would be permitted between the interests of different beneficiaries, as well as general breach of the general duty of confidence to each of the beneficiaries involved. The law firm, to continue the earlier example, would be able to demonstrate that it did not bear any liability for any breach of confidentiality if effective Chinese wall arrangements were in place²⁵³ – for example, if any exchange of information was made by the contumelious perseverance of employees in meeting outside the workplace. The arrangements need to be demonstrably thorough and designed specifically for those particular circumstances.²⁵⁴ Chinese walls are considered in greater detail below in relation to the provision of information by trustees.

8.3.11 Duty to act gratuitously

In general trusts law, it is assumed that the trustee accepts her office voluntarily and it is assumed equally that she will not permit any conflicts of interest between the beneficiaries' interests and her own personal interests.²⁵⁵ Consequently, it is assumed by the case law that the trustee will act without regard to payment.²⁵⁶ It is suggested, however, in the modern context that this duty is of reduced value for two reasons. First, in commercial trusts practice, the trustees will be entitled to remuneration by the terms of the trust instrument. Secondly,

249 See para 8.3.9 above.

250 Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46.

251 Chinese walls are considered in detail below at para 8.4.9.

252 See para 8.3.9 above.

253 Galmerrow Securittes Ltd v National Westminster Bank plc [2002] WTLR 125.

254 Bolkiah v KPMG [1999] 2 AC 222.

255 See para 8.3.9 above.

256 Robinson v Pett (1734) 3 P Wms 249, 251.

as considered above, there are rights to remuneration and reimbursement of expenses in general terms.²⁵⁷ Therefore, the main context in which this principle might be said to bite – that is, denying the trustees any sort of wage or emolument from their office – is circumscribed in most cases in which the duties are so onerous as to require such remuneration. Therefore, the significance of this principle in modern practice is as a recognition of the trustee’s obligations to act loyally in the service of the beneficiaries in the manner required by their fiduciary office. In that sense, beyond questions of authorised remuneration, the trustee continues to act gratuitously.

8.3.12 Duty to account and to provide information

The trustees’ obligations to account to the beneficiaries and the extent of the trustees’ obligations to provide information to the beneficiaries are considered in section 8.4 below.

8.3.13 Duty to take into account only relevant considerations, and to achieve the trust’s intended objective: the principle in Pitt v Holt

Introduction

Imagine for a moment how wonderful your life would be if you had a ‘magic eraser’ with which you could wipe out all of your poor choices in life, before going back and making those choices again. In the law of trusts, the ‘principle in Hastings-Bass’ seemed to offer trustees and their advisors just such a magic eraser in that they could ask the court to set aside any inappropriate exercise of their powers or discretions so that they could make their choices again. The principle as it was expressed in Pitt v Holt allowed trustees’ decisions or exercises of their powers to be set aside on the ground that they had failed to take into account a relevant consideration, or had taken into account an irrelevant consideration, if the trustees had committed a breach of their duties. Such an exercise of the trustees’ decision-making powers would be voidable, as opposed to being immediately void. However, it would not be a breach of the trustees’ duties if they took professional advice which transpired to be wrong. Typically, in the decided cases, the trustees had taken advice which failed to identify the tax consequences of acting in a particular way. Simply following that advice would not be a breach of duty.

This section considers the case law principles in chronological order (having summarised the decision of the Supreme Court) because that is the most cogent way of explaining the issues which have arisen. Before the decision in Pitt v Holt, the principle in Hastings-Bass had acquired a life of its own as the judgment of Buckley LJ in the case of *In re Hastings-Bass*²⁵⁸ itself was transformed by subsequent cases into a mechanism by which trustees who made errors in the exercise of their powers or discretions in relation to a trust fund could effectively expunge their errors and have their actions set aside. Principally, those errors had taken the form of incurring unforeseen tax liabilities for those trusts. For trusts law and tax professionals the doctrine in Hastings-Bass appeared to make it possible to undo any 257 See paras 8.2.6 and 8.2.7 above.

258 [1975] Ch 25, [1974] 2 WLR 904, [1974] 2 All ER 193.

exercise of a trustee's powers or discretion which had an unforeseen consequence. Importantly, it was a result of the development of that principle by Warner J in *Mettoy Pension Fund Trustees Ltd v Evans*²⁵⁹ that it came to be accepted among trusts law practitioners that the court could set aside any such action of a trustee if the trustee had taken into account an irrelevant consideration or had failed to take into account a relevant consideration when exercising their powers. Given that many trusts are used in practice for tax avoidance purposes, this rule was a very useful long-stop²⁶⁰ if the trustees and their advisors failed to spot a future tax liability.

Cases involving this principle have come thick and fast in recent years in reliance on the Mettoy approach to this principle. However, the decision of the Supreme Court in the joined appeals of Pitt v Holt and Futter v Futter,²⁶¹ which approved the points made in the thorough judgment of Lloyd LJ in the Court of Appeal, appears to have spoiled the party by restricting the operation of the Hastings-Bass principle to situations in which the trustees have committed a breach of trust, with the effect that mere errors or misunderstandings of the effect of an action would not be enough to have that action set aside. Consequently, incurring an unexpected tax liability will not in itself be a breach of trust. This is, as will be explained below, a great limitation on this principle, echoing a line of authority which began most clearly in Abacus Trust v Barr.²⁶² In essence, Lloyd LJ re-read the judgment of Buckley LJ in Hastings-Bass closely and decided that the development which began in Mettoy was a misreading of that case. Indeed, Lord Walker has now told us that the so-called 'principle in Hastings-Bass' is a misnomer because that principle really arose in Mettoy for the first time, and it should be limited in the future in the ways that are explained in this section.

In spite of the decision of the Supreme Court, the clearest statements of principle are those set out by Lloyd LJ in a lengthy analysis of the old case law. In general terms, in the Supreme Court, Lord Walker agreed with Lloyd LJ in his own lengthy account of the older case law. It is unfortunate perhaps that Lord Walker, delivering the judgment of the Supreme Court, did not set out any clear encapsulation of the principles himself; preferring instead to conduct his own lengthy survey of the authorities, expressing agreement here and there with some of the key points in the Court of Appeal and in Abacus Trust v Barr. Lloyd LJ in the Court of Appeal did present clear statements of what the principles should be. Therefore, this discussion retains an analysis of the judgment of Lloyd LJ in Pitt v Holt.²⁶³

There were two key arguments running through this area of the law before Pitt v Holt: first, whether Hastings-Bass should have a limited, negative interpretation placed on it such 259 [1990] 1 WLR 1587, [1991] 2 All ER 513.

260 In cricket a 'long-stop' is a fielder who is placed a few yards directly behind the wicketkeeper so that if the wicketkeeper fails to stop the ball then the long-stop is there to provide cover for the wicketkeeper and stop the ball reaching the boundary. The principle in Hastings-Bass used to have this role in case trustees caused a loss to the trust in the exercise of their powers (like the ball getting past the wicketkeeper) by simply having the exercise of those powers reversed after the event.

261 [2011] EWCA Civ 197, [2011] 3 WLR 19.

262 [2003] EWHC 114 (Ch), [2003] Ch 409, [2003] 2 WLR 1362, [2003] 1 All ER 763. Interestingly, the approach taken by Lightman J Abacus Trust v Barr was one which Lloyd J had disagreed with in Sieff v Fox [2005] EWHC 1312 (Ch), [2005] 1 WLR 3811, [2005] 3 All ER 693 but about which he later changed his mind (and there is no greater evidence of an honest intellect than that) in Pitt v Holt: that approach means that the trustee must commit some breach of duty (ie a breach of trust).

263 See, for example, the evidence led by Prof Paul Matthews in In re R and S [2011] JRC 117 as to English law in this regard being settled.

that a court may hold a trustee's actions to be voidable if it chooses to do so where there has been a breach of trust (as in Pitt v Holt and in Abacus v Barr);²⁶⁴ or, second, a more expansive, positive reading to the effect that beneficiaries are entitled to have their trustees' actions set aside where there have been irrelevant factors taken into account or relevant factors overlooked or mistakes made, regardless of whether or not there has been a breach of trust. As Lord Walker and Lloyd LJ both pointed out in Pitt v Holt, this appears to be a situation in which the dicta of Buckley LJ in Hastings-Bass were developed far beyond his Lordship's original intentions by the decisions of later courts, especially in Mettoy. Consequently, this principle will now be referred to in this book as 'the principle in Pitt v Holt'.

The purpose of this principle: setting aside the exercise of the trustee's powers

The principles considered in this section permit the court to set aside trustees' actions or decisions in certain circumstances. At the most general level it would be contrary to principle if a trustee could misapply her powers so that trust property was misappropriated without the beneficiaries having any means of setting aside such a misapplication of the trustees' powers. The trustees would be liable to account to the beneficiaries for any loss caused by a breach of trust.²⁶⁵ Nevertheless, the beneficiaries may prefer to set the exercise of the trustees' power aside so that an appropriate exercise of that power can be applied instead of simply recovering compensation from the trustees. This would be so particularly if the trust property was intrinsically valuable and considered likely to increase in value in the future; merely recovering compensation for the property valued at the time of the breach of trust would not include the subsequent increase in the value of that property. In relation to discretionary trusts, for example, a misapplication of the trustees' power might have caused trust property to be paid to the wrong beneficiary or to beneficiaries who might not have been entitled to that property if the power had been properly applied. Alternatively, it may be that the trustee has not committed any breach of trust but, in exercising her powers properly, she has made a decision which the beneficiaries would prefer to have set aside. For example, if the trustees exercised their powers properly but, in so doing, exposed the trust to a large tax liability, the beneficiaries would prefer to have that decision set aside so that a more tax-efficient means of acting could be identified. So, in this section we are concerned to identify the ways in which beneficiaries may be able to set aside the exercises of trustees' powers. These principles are collectively referred to as the 'principle in Pitt v Holt'.

Taking into account relevant considerations and ignoring irrelevant considerations: the principle in Pitt v Holt

Beneficiaries may be able to have the exercise of a power or a discretion by the trustees set aside if the trustees have taken into account irrelevant considerations or have not taken into account relevant considerations in so acting;²⁶⁶ and provided that there has also been some 264 This book has always taken the approach that the narrow interpretation was preferable and that there was no reason for trusts law to provide a form of 'magic eraser' for the errors of trustees: that is why the law on breach of trust or the law of negligence or professional indemnity insurance exists – to allow beneficiaries to recoup the cost of their advisors and trustees causing them loss.

265 Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421, considered in detail in Chapter 18.

266 Re Hastings-Bass [1975] Ch 25.

breach of duty by the trustees.²⁶⁷ The exercise of the trustees' power in such a situation is voidable at the instance of the court but not automatically void.²⁶⁸

In reaching a decision as to the proper exercise of a trustee's power – and we are thinking here particularly of discretionary trust and fiduciary mere powers, rather than simply trust obligations²⁶⁹ – there will be relevant considerations and there will be irrelevant considerations. Consider, for example, a discretionary trust power whereby a trustee was empowered to pay money for the maintenance of whichever of the homes of the settlor's adult children required building work at any time. Relevant considerations in relation to the exercise of this power might include the condition of the various buildings owned and occupied by those children, the urgency of any renovation work, or the relative wealth of the children and their ability to pay for their own repairs if the trust is short of funds. One important consideration, on the cases, would be any potential tax charge which the exercise of the power might incur. Irrelevant considerations might include whether the trustees like some of the children more than others, whether the trustees would prefer to use the money to pay for holidays for the children, or whether the trustees consider the dilapidations to be the children's fault. If the trustees took into account only these irrelevant considerations or failed to take into account any of the relevant considerations, then the objects of that power would be able to petition the court to have the trustees' ultimate decision set aside.²⁷⁰ Clearly there are two questions here: whether the factor was relevant or irrelevant, and the extent to which it was operative on the trustees in making their decision to act or not to act.

The question then is as to the precise nature of the court's powers in the event that the trustees have taken into account irrelevant considerations or failed to take into account relevant considerations. If a trustee failed to take into account a relevant consideration or took into account an irrelevant consideration, then two results ensue. First, the trustee may have committed a breach of trust by failing to perform her powers or her obligations properly.²⁷¹ Secondly, the beneficiaries are entitled to challenge the exercise of that power and to seek to have it set aside or otherwise administered by the court.²⁷²

Any analysis of this area must begin with the judgment of Buckley LJ in the case of In re Hastings-Bass from which this doctrine takes its name. The principle in Hastings-Bass was described in that decision in the following negative form²⁷³ by Buckley LJ where:²⁷⁴

267 Abacus Trust Company (Isle of Man) v Barr [2003] 2 WLR 1362, 1370, para 24; Burrell v Burrell [2005] EWHC 245, [2005] All ER (D) 351; Pitt v Holt, Futter v Futter [2011] EWCA Civ 197, [2011] 3 WLR 19.

268 Pitt v Holt, Futter v Futter [2011] EWCA Civ 197, [2011] 3 WLR 19.

269 We are thinking particularly of discretionary trust powers and mere powers because fixed trust obligations will generally not be susceptible of misapplication since such an obligation usually only comprises a simple instruction to act in a particular way, whereas discretionary trust powers and mere powers give the power-holder a broader range of considerations to take into account or to ignore. Thus, a complaint about failing to take a consideration into account or about taking into account an irrelevant consideration is more likely to relate to a discretionary trust power or a mere power because they have more scope for such misapplications.

270 Re Hastings-Bass [1975] Ch 25; Scott v National Trust [1998] 2 All ER 705; Edge v Pensions Ombudsman [2000] Ch 602.

271 This need not necessarily be so, it seems: the trustees may act properly but nevertheless fail to consider appropriate matters as they ought to be considered: Burrell v Burrell [2005] EWHC 245, [2005] All ER (D) 351.

272 Re Hastings-Bass [1975] Ch 25. Equally, the trustees could seek to set aside decisions which they regretted: Breadner v Granville-Grossman [2001] Ch 523, 543, per Park J.

273 As described by Mann J in Burrell v Burrell [2005] EWHC 245, [14].

274 [1975] Ch 25, 40.

a trustee is given a discretion as to some matter under which he acts in good faith, the court should not interfere with his action notwithstanding that it does not have the full effect which he intended, unless (1) what he had achieved is unauthorised by the power conferred upon him, or (2) it is clear that he would not have acted as he did (a) had he not taken into account considerations which he should not have taken into account, or (b) had he not failed to take into account considerations which he ought to have taken into account.

This is said to be a negative, limited form of the principle because the court is not required to take any action to set aside the action of the trustees but rather has a discretion whether or not it chooses to do so. Indeed, Buckley LJ clearly provided that ‘the court should not interfere. . . unless’ certain events had taken place, and even then the court had a discretion whether or not to intervene. This follows the principle that it is for the trustees to decide what actions to take in the performance of their duties, and that the court will only intervene in the event of some breach of duty. Thus, the court should not interfere with a trustee’s exercise of a power unless it is clear either that the trustee has acted in breach of duty or unless she would not otherwise have reached the decision which she did reach. It is the second of these principles which does not explicitly require a breach of trust. Instead, all that seems to be required is that the trustee would not have acted as she did if she had understood the ramifications of her actions – and that was sufficient to allow later courts to take this principle to mean that a breach of trust was not always required. Lloyd LJ gets around this problem in Pitt v Holt by finding that this summary of the principles is not part of the ratio decidendi in Hastings-Bass; whereas Warner J focussed unfortunately this second principle in Mettoy Pensions Trustees v Evans. Lord Walker agreed with the former analysis in the Supreme Court in Pitt v Holt.

Consequently this principle was put into a positive, broader form²⁷⁵ by Warner J in Mettoy Pensions Trustees v Evans. It was this positive formulation of the principle which created the subsequent difficulties by allowing the courts in later cases to expand the principle beyond the narrow limits which Buckley LJ appeared to envisage for it in his first principle by building on the second principle. This positive interpretation was set out by Warner J in the following terms:²⁷⁶

If, as I believe, the reason for the application of the principle is the failure by the trustees to take into account considerations which they ought to have taken into account, it cannot matter whether that failure is due to their having overlooked (or to their legal advisors having overlooked) some relevant rule of law or limit on their discretion, or is due to some other cause. . . . it is not enough that it should be shown that the trustees did not have a proper understanding of the effect of their act. It must also be clear that, had they had a proper understanding of it, they would not have acted as they did.

Therefore, Warner J removed any reference to a need for a breach of duty and instead based the principle on a mere failure by the trustees to account properly for irrelevant or relevant considerations (such as a likely tax charge) and also that the trustees would not have acted in the way they did if they had understood the effect of their actions. From this interpretation of what Buckley LJ had held in Hastings-Bass, as is considered below, subsequent cases were far more pro-active in setting aside the exercises of powers and discretions by trustees.

²⁷⁵ As described by Mann J in Burrell v Burrell [2005] EWHC 245, [15].

²⁷⁶ [1990] 1 WLR 1587, 1624.

The decision of Lightman J in *Abacus Trust Company v Barr*²⁷⁷ suggested, however, that it should be a requirement of any application of the principle in Hastings-Bass that the trustees must have committed a breach of trust, and not simply that irrelevant considerations have been taken into account or that relevant considerations have not been taken into account:

In my view it is not sufficient to bring the rule into play that the trustee made a mistake or by reason of ignorance or a mistake did not take into account a relevant consideration or took into account an irrelevant consideration. What has to be established is that the trustee in making his decision has . . . failed to consider what he was under a duty to consider. If the trustee has, in accordance with his duty, identified the relevant considerations and used all proper care and diligence in obtaining the relevant information and advice relating to those considerations, the trustee can be in no breach of duty and his decision cannot be impugned merely because in fact that information turns out to be partial or incorrect. . . . [T]he rule does not afford the right to the trustee or any beneficiary to have a decision declared invalid because a trustee's decision was in some way mistaken or has unforeseen and unpalatable consequences.

The ramifications of this change in the direction of the principle are significant. The authorities after Mettoy had mostly taken the view that it was enough that the trustees had acted inappropriately (by failing to account for relevant considerations or by accounting for irrelevant considerations) without there to be any need for the trustee to have breached her obligations. If Lightman J were correct, then the principle would be a principle dependent on a breach of trust (that is, failing to consider something which one was under a duty to consider) and an alternative to a personal claim against the trustee for compensation.²⁷⁸ Buckley LJ had originally provided that a demonstration that the trustee had acted in breach of duty was only one alternative means by which the principle could be put into effect.²⁷⁹ Lord Walker agreed with this analysis in the Supreme Court in Pitt v Holt: the principle therefore requires that the trustees have committed a breach of duty.

At the time that Abacus v Barr was decided, whether or not the principle in Hastings-Bass was to be considered to be dependent on proof of some breach of duty was a moot point.²⁸⁰ In Pitt v Holt, Lloyd LJ took the view that a breach of duty by the trustees was indeed required. Interestingly, when giving judgment in the High Court in *Sieff v Fox*²⁸¹ Lloyd LJ had doubted Abacus Trust v Barr and the idea that an exercise of a power or discretion by 277 Abacus Trust Company (Isle of Man) v Barr [2003] 2 WLR 1362, [23].

278 Target Holdings v Redfems [1996] 1 AC 421.

279 [1975] Ch 25, 40.

280 Burrell v Burrell [2005] EWHC 245, [22], per Mann J. In that case it was held that the principle could be invoked in either case because there had been a breach of duty. See also Gallaher v Gallaher [2004] EWHC 42, [2005] All ER (D) 177, [162] et seq., per Etherton J, where the same point is raised but not disposed of because it was not considered necessary to dispose of it on the facts.

281 [2005] EWHC 1312 (Ch), [2005] 1 WLR 3811, [2005] 3 All ER 693 – confusingly Lloyd LJ was still sitting in the High Court at this stage even though he had been elevated to the Court of Appeal at this point.

the trustees would be merely voidable and not automatically void, although in Pitt v Holt Lloyd LJ acknowledged that on reflection he had changed his mind, as well as holding that a breach of trust by the trustees should be a pre-requisite of the application of the doctrine.²⁸² Pitt v Holt and the other cases which had reduced the scope of this principle are considered next.

Limiting the principle

In the joined appeals of Pitt v Holt and Futter v Futter,²⁸³ the Supreme Court considered the so-called doctrine in Re Hastings-Bass and the (separate) doctrine of mistake (which is considered below in section 8.3.14). In essence, the doctrine set out in Re Mettoy has been greatly limited by the Supreme Court in Pitt v Holt. What was clear in the cases before Pitt v Holt was that the Mettoy principle was already being steadily reduced in scope. Whereas once upon a time it had been a favourite principle of Chancery counsel in Lincoln's Inn, who considered that they could use it to reverse inadvertently costly errors made by trustees, especially in relation to the taxation of trusts, it began to be limited by the courts to a much narrower range of events. Three cases were particularly significant in this regard.

First, the principle was limited to the acts and omissions of trustees and is not to be used in relation to inherent weaknesses in the trust instrument itself. The issue in *Smithson v Hamilton*²⁸⁴ was an error in the drafting of the instrument which governed a pension fund. An application was brought to amend this rule in the trust instrument. However, Park J held in Smithson v Hamilton that the Hastings-Bass principle did not apply to the acts of settlors (such as mistakes in the drafting of a pension fund instrument) but rather only applied to the actions and omissions of trustees. Furthermore, Park J held that there would not be a general equitable relief for mistakes of this sort: what the parties were really seeking to do was to effect a rectification of the trust instrument, for which Hastings-Bass was an inappropriate mechanism, given that mistake was governed at the time by the doctrine in Gibbon v Mitchell (as considered below).

Secondly, in *Donaldson v Smith*²⁸⁵ the scope of the principle in Hastings-Bass was limited to exercises of the trustees' discretionary powers and did not extend to the trustees' general power under the law of trusts to enter into contracts on behalf of the trust. This was a very significant limitation because it restricted the operation of Hastings-Bass to the discretionary powers of those trustees – such as powers to distribute £100,000 per annum to one beneficiary or to another – but not to other types of trust power.²⁸⁶ This is a limit which should always have been understood as applying to this principle, even though many practitioners sought to extend it to cover the general actions of trustees, mistakes made by settlors in

282 [2011] EWCA Civ 197, [2011] 3 WLR 19, at [30]

283 [2011] EWCA Civ 197, [2011] 3 WLR 19, [2011] 2 All ER 450, [2011] STC 809, [2011] Pens LR 175, [2011] BTC 322, [2011] WTLR 623, 13 ITEL 749.

284 [2008] 1 WLR 1453, [2007] EWHC 2900 (Ch). See Thomas and Hudson, The Law of Trusts, 20.63. See also Thorpe v Revenue and Customs Commissioners [2009] EWHC 611 (Ch) as to what will constitute the exercise of a trust power: so where a person who was both a trustee and a beneficiary sought to call for the trust it was only as a trustee that he could have given an instruction to a building society to demand delivery of legal title in the trust property, per Evans-Lombe J.

285 [2007] WTLR 421.

286 See Thomas and Hudson, The Law of Trusts, 20.62.

drafting the trust instrument causing the trustees to make mistakes, and so forth. The principle in Mettoy had thus become a sort of ‘magic eraser’ for chancery practitioners.

The attitude of Her Majesty’s Revenue and Customs is important in these cases, it is suggested, because these cases are predominantly concerned with using this principle to avoid liability to tax.²⁸⁷ Unsurprisingly, the Revenue’s view was that the Hastings-Bass principle had been extended far beyond its natural limits in the wake of the decision in the Mettoy Pension Fund v Evans case in which the principle was formulated in its ‘positive’ sense so as to require that the exercise of a power be set aside in toto.²⁸⁸ All of which leads us to the restatement of this principle in Pitt v Holt, which is the third and most significant illustration of the limitation of the principle in Mettoy.

The decision in Pitt v Holt

As outlined above, the decision of Lloyd LJ in Pitt v Holt, with which the other members of the Court of Appeal agreed, narrowed the Mettoy principle considerably by returning to the decision of Buckley LJ in the Court of Appeal in Hastings-Bass itself and subjecting it to a close re-reading. Lloyd LJ was careful to note that he was bound by the decision in Hastings-Bass but that the intervening decisions had all been decisions of the High Court alone; something which his Lordship credited to the fact that the Inland Revenue had decided not to make itself a party to any of these later cases and that the parties had always been happy with the result they acquired before the High Court such that an appeal was never necessary. In part, what Lloyd LJ did in Pitt v Holt was to identify the ratio decidendi in Hastings-Bass as having been very narrow, and the summary of the principles set out by Buckley LJ as not forming a part of that ratio decidendi. It is suggested that this is to overstate the case because Buckley LJ was clearly summarising the points of law he had just developed, and therefore they had sprung from his consideration of the law necessary to reach his ratio decidendi. Nevertheless, in support of the approach taken by Lloyd LJ, there is no reason to read Buckley LJ as requiring a court to set aside a trustee’s exercise of her powers; rather, Buckley LJ clearly held that the court could set aside the exercise of that power if it was considered to be appropriate. That is, the exercise of the power would be voidable if the court so decided, but it was not automatically void. In this vein, Lloyd LJ held in Pitt v Holt that:²⁸⁹

127. The cases which I am now considering concern acts which are within the powers of the trustees but are said to be vitiated by the failure of the trustees to take into account a relevant factor to which they should have had regard – usually tax consequences – or by their taking into account some irrelevant matter. It seems to me that the principled and correct approach to these cases is, first, that the trustees’ act is not void, but that it may be voidable. It will be voidable if, and only if, it can be shown to have been done in breach of fiduciary duty on the part of the trustees. If it is voidable, then it may be capable of being set aside at the suit of a beneficiary, but this would be subject to equitable defences and to the court’s discretion. The trustees’ duty to take relevant matters into account is a fiduciary duty, so an act done as a result of a breach of that duty is 287 Ibid., 20.71 et seq.

288 See HMRC Tax Bulletin, Issue 83, June 2006, at 1292–4; www.hmrc.gov.uk/bulletins.

289 [2011] EWCA Civ 197, [127].

voidable. Fiscal considerations will often be among the relevant matters which ought to be taken into account. However, if the trustees seek advice (in general or in specific terms) from apparently competent advisers as to the implications of the course they are considering taking, and follow the advice so obtained, then, in the absence of any other basis for a challenge, I would hold that the trustees are not in breach of their fiduciary duty for failure to have regard to relevant matters if the failure occurs because it turns out that the advice given to them was materially wrong. Accordingly, in such a case I would not regard the trustees' act, done in reliance on that advice, as being vitiated by the error and therefore voidable.

Significantly then, it was held that the court should only set the exercise of a power aside if the trustees had committed a breach of trust ('a breach of fiduciary duty'). It would not be a breach of trust simply to have taken professional advice and followed it, before realising that that advice had been incorrect or inadvisable. Such a situation could possibly involve a breach of trust, depending on the circumstances, but it would not be a breach of trust in itself. Indeed, for trustees to follow professional advice, in the context of their own trust and the exercise of their own discretion, is best practice. This approach was approved by the Supreme Court.

The case of Pitt v Holt itself concerned a man who had suffered brain damage in an accident and in whose interests a receiver was appointed by the Court of Protection. The receiver created a discretionary trust as part of her plan for the man in her care, but failed to appreciate the inheritance tax consequences of that course of action. The joined appeal in Futter v Futter concerned a discretionary trust scheme in relation to which the trustees, in reliance on professional advice as to their best course of action, had failed to appreciate that there would be a capital gains tax charge.²⁹⁰ In both cases, the trustees sought a court order to set aside their exercise of their powers. It was held on the facts in Pitt v Holt and in Futter v Futter by Lord Walker in the Supreme Court that the actions of the trustees would not be set aside in either appeal because neither set of trustees had acted in breach of trust, even though they had failed to appreciate their respective tax law positions. Both sets of trustees had taken appropriate professional advice, which had turned out to be incorrect or inadvisable in their circumstances, and therefore the trustees wished to reverse their decisions by having the court set them aside so that those decisions could be made again with a clean slate. However, it was held that this had not involved the trustees in any breach of trust. They had taken advice and followed it, acting always in accordance with the terms of their powers. They would not have been capable of being sued for breach of trust on that basis. Therefore, having read Hastings-Bass closely, it was found that the doctrine could not be invoked. Furthermore, it was found that the court was not obliged to set the exercise of this power aside in any event because even if there had been a breach of trust the exercise of this power would have been merely voidable. It is suggested that it may be undesirable for a breach of trust to lead to merely voidable consequences and cleaner in many circumstances to have the exercise of that power be automatically void so that the beneficiaries can take action to recover any property passed from the trust without first requiring the decision of the court.²⁹¹

290 In the case of Futter v Futter the relevant partner in the firm of solicitors which had given this unfortunate advice to the trustees was named 'Mr Cutbill'. In these circumstances, one wonders whether or not he did.

291 For the approach in Jersey in the wake of Pitt v Holt see In re R and S [2011] JRC 117.

The nature of the relevant and irrelevant considerations which have been considered to be significant

The key question, therefore, is how does one identify a factor, whether considered or ignored by the trustees, as being of sufficient relevance for the objects of the power to commence an action? The relevant and irrelevant considerations will differ from case to case depending upon the objectives and terms of any given trust, the nature and identities of the beneficiaries, the nature of the trust property and so forth. So, the considerations in relation to a single beneficiary may differ from the considerations applicable in relation to a power over a large class of potential beneficiaries.²⁹² It is also difficult to know whether or not the interests of other users of the trust or others who may take an interest in remainder ought to be taken into account.²⁹³ Examples of considerations taken into account or not taken into account include a failure to take an up-to-date valuation of assets held in a pension fund before transferring assets between funds,²⁹⁴ failing to take into account the fiscal consequences of a decision,²⁹⁵ or failing to take the settlor's wishes into account correctly.²⁹⁶

The question then is to try to frame some sort of test which will help to understand from case to case what would constitute a relevant consideration which ought to be taken into account or an irrelevant consideration which ought not to be taken into account. In relation to relevant considerations which ought to have been taken into account by trustees when making a decision, most of the authorities have seized upon the idea that a consideration would have been relevant if it might have caused the trustee to make a different decision had she considered it.²⁹⁷ This proposition has been explained in the following way by Lightman J in Abacus Trust Co (Isle of Man) v Barr:²⁹⁸

[This principle] does not require that the relevant consideration unconsidered by the trustee should make a fundamental difference between the facts as perceived by the trustee and the facts as they should have been perceived and actually were. All that is required in this regard is that the unconsidered relevant consideration would or might have affected the trustee's decision, and in a case such as the present that the trustee would or might have made a different appointment or no appointment at all.

Lightman J proceeded to suggest four pre-requisites to a claim based on the Hastings-Bass principle necessary to set aside a trustee's actions: first, whether or not the trustee's actions were sufficiently fundamental; second, whether the trustee had failed to consider something which she was duty-bound to consider and failed to act with sufficient diligence

292 Green v Cobham [2002] STC 820.

293 See Stannard v Fisons Pension Trust Ltd [1991] PLR 225. Eg, the employer in relation to an occupational pension fund: Re Imperial Foods Pension Scheme [1986] 1 WLR 717; Lock v Westpac Banking Corp [1991] PLR 167.

294 Stannard v Fisons Pension Trust Ltd [1991] PLR 225.

295 Green v Cobham [2002] STC 820; Burrell v Burrell [2005] EWHC 245 (inheritance tax).

296 Abacus Trust Company (Isle of Man) v Barr [2003] 2 WLR 1362.

297 Re Hastings-Bass [1975] Ch 25. Sir William Bass created a settlement on the marriage of the colourfully-named 'Captain Peter Robin Hood Hastings-Bass' to provide rights for a number of family members to the settled property. Questions arose as to whether or not estate duty was payable on the Captain's death, and whether the trustees were right to focus on the issue of estate duty when considering the exercise of a power of advancement which they held.

298 [2003] 2 WLR 1362, 1369.

in identifying that necessary information; third, whether the trustee was at fault for failing to give effect to the settlor's objectives; and fourth, whether the exercise of the power was void or voidable.

It has been suggested that this formulation of the principle, however, sets the barrier too low in that, in the view of dissatisfied objects of the power who had been overlooked by the trustees, too many purportedly relevant considerations might have been overlooked by the trustees.²⁹⁹ If the barrier were set too low, then it would be too easy to challenge trustees' decisions and the management of some trusts might become mired in litigation between warring camps of beneficiaries each time the trustees make an appointment of property.³⁰⁰ The decision in Pitt v Holt solves a part of this dilemma by raising the general barrier to entry for beneficiaries seeking to have the exercise of a power set aside.

The court's response if the power was exercised in ignorance of a relevant consideration or in contemplation of an irrelevant consideration

The issue then is as to the appropriate nature of the court's response if the power in question was exercised in ignorance of a relevant consideration or in contemplation of an irrelevant consideration. There are a range of possible judicial responses, each dependent on the extent to which the effect of the trustee's exercise of their power had deviated from the trust's intended objectives.³⁰¹ In general terms, it has been accepted that the incorrect exercise of the power should be voidable and not automatically void.³⁰² At one extreme the exercise of a power will be validated if the result was not 'substantially or essentially different from that which was intended',³⁰³ whereas the exercise of a power of appointment would be invalidated if the trustees had not addressed their minds as to the impact of the law on the efficacy of the trust so that the trust's objective was not achieved at all.³⁰⁴ Nevertheless, in Re Hastings-Bass,³⁰⁵ the Court of Appeal would not avoid an exercise of a power to advance capital to the life tenant of a trust for creating benefits for the life tenant which were not within the trust's original contemplation when the exercise of that power had achieved the principal objective of saving death duties.

There is a way of thinking of the Pitt v Holt principle as being based on the court's supervision of the powers of fiduciaries.³⁰⁶ On this basis, the court's response would be to validate the trustees' decision to the extent that it was valid and then to set aside only the excessive 299 [2003] PCB 173 (E Nugee); (2003) Trust Law Int 114 (B Green).

300 This argument is advanced by Thomas and Hudson, 2004, 385 et seq.

301 As suggested by Gilbey v Rush [1906] 1 Ch 11; Re Vestey's Settlement [1951] Ch 209. On which, see Thomas and Hudson, 2004, 387.

302 AMP v Barker [2001] PLR 77, per Lawrence Collins J; Hearn v Younger [2002] WTLR 1317, 1338, [90], per Etherton J; Abacus Trust Company (Isle of Man) v Barr [2003] 2 WLR 1362, [28]–[33], per Lightman J; Hunter v Senate Support Services Ltd [2004] EWHC 1085. This discussion was raised in Donaldson v Smith [2006] All ER (D) 293 (May), para [52].

303 Re Vestey's Settlement [1951] Ch 209, 221, per Lord Evershed MR.

304 Re Pilkington's Will Trusts [1961] Ch 466, 489 (the effect of s 32 of the TA 1925); Re Abrahams' Will Trusts [1969] 1 Ch 463 (the effect of the rules against perpetuities and accumulations).

305 [1975] Ch 25.

306 For these purposes, a distinction can be drawn between a power of appointment – which takes effect in favour potentially of a class of objects – and a power of advancement – which can be exercised only to benefit that person who receives that advancement.

part. In this way, the principle derived from Hastings-Bass has been described as being limited only to a principle concerning the excessive exercise of a power.³⁰⁷ On this narrow explanation, the entire exercise of the power should fail only if there is no possibility of drawing a distinction between the proper and the excessive execution of that power,³⁰⁸ or alternatively where the exercise of the power fails to achieve the objectives of the trust (as though akin to the principles appropriate to a mistake of law).³⁰⁹ To put this point another way: the court should consider the extent of the fiduciary's power and only set aside the exercise of that power to the extent that the taking into account of irrelevant factors, or the failure to take into account relevant factors, constituted an excessive exercise of that power. Consequently, the exercise of the fiduciary's power should be validated to the extent that it was within the proper limits of that power. So, in Besttrustees v Stuart,³¹⁰ Neuberger J held that a purportedly retrospective alteration of the rules of a pension fund, where the trust instrument only permitted prospective alterations, should be permitted to the extent that it took effect prospectively and be set aside only to the extent that it was an excessive execution of that power.³¹¹ A similar approach was contemplated in *Mettoy Pension Fund Trustees Ltd v Evans*³¹² and in Burrell v Burrell.³¹³

The form of default by the trustee which will justify the application of the principle

Before the decision in Pitt v Holt, despite the breadth of the Hastings-Bass principle as suggested by the passage quoted from Buckley LJ in the preceding section, there was a division of opinion on the cases as to the precise meaning of this wide version of the principle. The distinction between these authorities has been explained³¹⁴ as being a distinction between a 'might materially have affected [the decision] test'³¹⁵ and a 'would [have altered the decision] test':³¹⁶ that is, the former test only requires proof that if the trustee had accounted for the proper considerations appropriately, then it might have affected her decision, as opposed to the latter test requiring the claimant to demonstrate that it definitely would have affected the decision which the trustee made. The 'might have' test is an objective test, whereas the 'would' test is a purely subjective test.³¹⁷ This returns us to the alternative proposition in the passage quote above from the judgment of Lightman J in *Abacus Trust Co (Isle of Man) v Barr*³¹⁸ as to whether or not accounting for considerations properly would have made a 307 See Thomas and Hudson, 2004, 388, para 11.55; and see Thomas, 1998, 435.

308 On which see section 10.5 below.

309 See Thomas and Hudson, 2004, 388.

310 [2001] PLR 283.

311 Applying Thomas, 1998.

312 [1990] 1 WLR 1587.

313 [2005] EWHC 245, [25], per Mann J.

314 Hunter v Senate Support Services Ltd [2004] EWHC 1085, [172].

315 Stannard v Fisons Pension Trust Ltd [1991] PLR 225, [39]. This form of test has been expressed in Hearn v Younger [2002] WTLR 1317, 1338, [86] by Etherton J to the effect that: 'a decision of trustees to exercise a discretion will be void if (a) the trustees have failed to take into account a material consideration, and (b) that consideration might have materially affected their decision.'

316 Re Hastings-Bass [1975] Ch 25.

317 Hunter v Senate Support Services Ltd [2004] EWHC 1085, [183].

318 [2003] 2 WLR 1362, 1369.

‘fundamental difference’ to the trustee’s understanding of the facts. The approach taken by Lightman J does not fall down clearly either on the side of the ‘might have’ or the ‘definitely would have’ made a difference approach: rather, it seems to focus on the degree of importance which the true facts would have had in the making of the decision if they had been known to the trustees. It is suggested that, if anything, Lightman J is suggesting an objective approach whereby the court will examine whether or not the trustees ought to have reached a different decision because the true facts would have had such a high degree of significance in the administration of the trust that the trustees would have had to have reached a different decision.³¹⁹

The principle has been phrased slightly differently in *Sieff v Fox*³²⁰ by Lloyd LJ (sitting in the High Court) in the following terms:³²¹

Where trustees act under a discretion given to them by the terms of the trust, in circumstances in which they are free to decide whether or not to exercise their discretion, but the effect of the exercise is different from that which they intended, the court will interfere with their action if it is clear that they would not have acted as they did had they not failed to take into account considerations which they ought to have taken into account, or taken into account considerations which they ought not to take into account.

Significantly, Lloyd LJ himself held in *Pitt v Holt*³²² that this account of the principles could not be accepted as being correct because it neither identified the need for a breach of trust nor that the exercise of the power was merely voidable and not automatically void.³²³ On the facts of Sieff v Fox, property held on a discretionary trust was resettled on a new discretionary trust with unforeseen capital gains tax consequences. It was found that the trustees would have acted differently had they been aware of their mistake. Applying this notion in Betafence v Veys,³²⁴ Lightman J held that the trustees of a pension fund in that case were free 319 By contrast, it is suggested that a subjective approach would require the court to examine more closely the actual decision which those particular trustees would have made at the time and in the circumstances in which they made their original decision, taking into account the actual facts. The focus on the degree of significance of these matters to the trust appears to be an objective assessment of the circumstances. To be entirely subjective in a test in this context would, it is suggested, involve taking into account too many imponderables (would the trustees have understood the significance of those facts if they had known them, would they have been headstrong, would that have been their principal consideration at the time the decision was made, etc?).

320 [2005] EWHC 1312 (Ch), [2005] 1 WLR 3811, [2005] 3 All ER 693. Also sub nom Re Bedford Estates; Sieff v Fox.

321 [2005] EWHC 1312 (Ch), [2005] 1 WLR 3811, [2005] 3 All ER 693.

322 [2011] EWCA Civ 197, [30].

323 In Sieff v Fox it could be understood that Lloyd LJ drew a distinction between cases in which the trustees were free as to the exercise of their discretion (that is, fiduciary mere powers principally, I would suggest) and cases in which the trustees are compelled to exercise their discretion (in the manner of discretionary trusts). In relation to ‘mere power’ cases it was held that trustees’ decisions should only be set aside if they would definitely have acted differently but for the ‘mistake’; whereas, in relation to ‘discretionary trust’ cases it was held that trustees’ decisions should only be set aside if they merely might have acted differently but for the ‘mistake’. The word ‘mistake’ is in inverted commas because that is how Lightman J described this test in Betafence v Veys [2006] EWHC 999 (Ch), para [72], although that is not exactly how Lloyd LJ phrased matters in the passage quoted above: Lloyd LJ referring simply to the trustees’ ‘not acting as they did had they not failed to take into account considerations’, as opposed to the trustees having positively made a mistake.

324 [2006] EWHC 999 (Ch); [2006] All ER (D) 91 (May), para [72].

in the exercise of their discretion, and therefore that it must be demonstrated that those trustees would definitely have exercised their powers differently but for their mistake, and that on the facts in front of him it could not be so proved definitively, and therefore that their decision would not be set aside. Lightman J did ask whether or not this particular rule needed to be carried into pensions law, considering it perhaps to be an unnecessary refinement, but decided that it was a matter which could only be decided by an appellate court given the precedent of Sieff v Fox which faced his Lordship. The decision in Pitt v Holt has resolved that issue.

Examples of this principle being applied in the decided cases have tended to concern trustees who have not understood the tax effect of the decisions which they have made, with the result that the beneficiaries who sought to reverse those decisions had to demonstrate that it would have made a fundamental difference to the trustees' decisions if they had appreciated the actual tax effects of their decisions. So, where trustees failed to realise that a will trust and accumulation and maintenance settlements under their control formed a single, composite unit for capital gains tax purposes, it was held that the trustees' actions attracting capital gains tax should be set aside in their entirety because the trustees would not have exercised their powers in the way they had done if they had considered the tax implications correctly.³²⁵ The same issue arose in Sieff v Fox,³²⁶ where certain discretionary trusts were resettled on new discretionary trusts with unforeseen capital gains tax consequences, something which constituted a relevant consideration which ought to have been taken into account. Similarly, where trustees entered into a tax avoidance scheme which unbeknownst to them attracted liability to capital gains tax, their appointment of property under the avoidance scheme was held to have been void because it was considered of great importance that trustees consider the tax effect of any decision and that a failure on their part to appreciate the tax consequences on these facts constituted a failure to take into account a relevant consideration.³²⁷

Evidently, the principal use of the Mettoy principle in modern trusts practice is in relation to tax avoidance. In effect, it grants a second bite of the cherry to trustees who have erroneously caused the beneficiaries to suffer a liability to tax. Therefore, it has become a principle which is deployed most frequently as a form of long-stop insurance for trustees who fail to take adequate professional advice as to the fiscal effects of their decisions or who fail to follow that advice properly. The beneficiaries are thus protected from the attentions of HMRC by the back door because the trustees' approach can be set aside and a different decision taken instead. Another approach would be to allow HMRC to recover the tax to which they would otherwise be entitled on the basis of revenue law and to leave the beneficiaries to proceed against the trustees in negligence or for breach of trust. It is not clear to this writer why the law of trusts should be quite so keen to permit tax avoidance in a context in which the common law would shift the burden to the defendant and/or her insurers. That HMRC chose to participate in Pitt v Holt was significant in bringing another perspective before the court on the operation of this principle.

325 Green v Cobham [2002] STC 820.

326 [2005] EWHC 1312, [2005] 1 WLR 3811, [2005] 3 All ER 693.

327 Abacus Trust Company (Isle of Man) v Barr [2003] 2 WLR 1362.

Failure to exercise a discretionary power will render any act of the trustees a nullity

It has been held that a failure to exercise a discretionary power will render any act of the trustees of a discretionary trust a nullity. In Betafence v Veys,³²⁸ Lightman J held that it would be a nullity if trustees with a discretion failed to realise that they had such a discretion and so failed to exercise their discretion. In this regard Lightman J followed Turner v Turner,³²⁹ a case in which trustees of a discretionary trust simply followed the directions of the settlor without appreciating that they had a discretion and so without exercising their discretion. Consequently, their actions were held to be a nullity and they were therefore required to exercise their discretionary power conscious of that power and in a manner appropriate to fiduciaries.

The error which gives rise to the doctrine in Pitt v Holt must be an error made by the trustees, not an error made by the settlor such as a mistake in the drafting of the trust instrument (for example, the scheme rules for a pension fund) nor an error made by some other person involved in the trust at a distance (such as the employer in relation to an occupational pension scheme).³³⁰ Therefore, it was held in *Smithson v Hamilton*³³¹ that if a scheme rule in a pension fund failed to account for proper actuarial calculations, then that was not the fault of the trustees.³³² In such circumstances the proper remedy would not be to set aside the entire scheme under the Pitt v Holt principle, but rather to seek a rectification of the scheme rules.³³³ In effect we could think of this as being a defect in the creation of the trustees' obligations as opposed to being some fault in the manner in which the trustees carried out their obligations.

8.3.14 Mistake in the exercise of a trustee's powers

There is a different principle from the Hastings-Bass principle considered in the preceding section of this chapter which provides for the actions of trustees to be set aside on the grounds of mistake. Lord Walker restated the principles relating to mistake in the Supreme Court in Pitt v Holt so as to disagree with the earlier model of this principle set out by Millett J in Gibbon v Mitchell and so as to disagree, on this point alone, with the judgment of Lloyd LJ in the Court of Appeal in Pitt v Holt.

As considered above, a trustee may make a mistake in the form of taking into account irrelevant considerations or failing to take into account relevant considerations: in such circumstances, the purported exercise of a power may be set aside on the basis of the principle in Pitt v Holt. However, it will not be sufficient for the implementation of that principle that a trustee simply made a mistake: rather, the trustee must have failed to take into account considerations which she was under a duty to consider and she must also have committed a breach of duty.³³⁴ The grounds on which the doctrine of mistake will operate are different.

Lord Walker expressed the doctrine of mistake as operating in the following fashion in the Supreme Court in Pitt v Holt such that the court can set aside the exercise of a trustee's powers on grounds of mistake by reference to the following principles:

328 [2006] EWHC 999, [2006] All ER (D) 91 (May), para [73].

329 [1984] Ch 100.

330 Smithson v Hamilton [2008] 1 All ER 1216, Park J.

331 Ibid.

332 Ibid.

333 Ibid.

334 Meek v Bennie [1940] NZLR 1. See generally Thomas, 1998, 309–24 on the improper exercise of powers.

The court cannot decide the issue of what is unconscionable by an elaborate set of rules. It must consider in the round the existence of a distinct mistake (as compared with total ignorance or disappointed expectations), its degree of centrality to the transaction in question and the seriousness of its consequences, and make an evaluative judgment whether it would be unconscionable, or unjust, to leave the mistake uncorrected. The court may and must form a judgment about the justice of the case.

Consequently, the exercise of a power will be set aside on grounds of mistake if it would be unconscionable to leave that mistake uncorrected, and if the nature and significance of the mistake required that form of action. A mistake of this sort would be something different from inadvertence, misprediction of future facts, or mere ignorance. However, forgetfulness, inadvertence and ignorance could lead to such a state of mind that a significant mistake could occur. Deciding whether one is in the former class of cases or in the latter will depend upon an analysis of the facts in accordance with the passage from Lord Walker's judgment which was quoted immediately above.

8.3.15 The effect of breach of duties

If the trustees commit a breach of trust, then those trustees will be liable to effect specific restitution of any property transferred away from the trust or to pay equitable compensation to the beneficiaries for any loss suffered as a result of that breach of trust.³³⁵ The principles concerning breach of trust are considered in detail in Chapter 18.

8.4 THE TRUSTEES' DUTY TO PROVIDE INFORMATION AND TO ACCOUNT TO THE BENEFICIARIES

The trustees bear only a limited obligation to give information to beneficiaries in relation to administration and management of the trust fund and in relation only to that part of a trust fund in which they have a proprietary interest. Recent case law has emphasised the court's inherent discretion to make orders relating to the administration of trusts and therefore the access of beneficiaries to information may be enlarged in the future or alternatively it may continue to be exercised in accordance with traditional principles. Trustees are not obliged to disclose to beneficiaries any matter in relation to any exercise of their fiduciary discretion, nor are they obliged to disclose any confidential matter. The court reserves discretion as to the manner in which trustees exercise their powers, but not as to the content of any such decision unless there has been palpable wrongdoing.

8.4.1 Introduction

An important part of the ability of the beneficiaries to control the trustees is their ability to force the trustees to account to the beneficiaries by way of giving information to them as to the administration of the trust. The idea of the trustees accounting to the beneficiaries is considered in a subtly different sense in Chapter 18, in that the trustees are also required to account to the beneficiaries if there is any breach of trust: this means that the trustees will be obliged to compensate the beneficiaries for any loss to the trust out of their own pockets.³³⁶ This section, however, focuses first on the obligation to account in the sense of the provision of information by the trustees to the beneficiaries, and then on the duty to render accounts giving an indication of the financial position of the trust. As to the general obligation to give information, it will become clear from the decided cases that there is a distinction drawn between cases of necessary confidentiality between trustee and settlor, cases concerning the trustees' exercise of their discretion as to the entitlement of beneficiaries to have interests in specific trust property, and cases concerning information as to the day-to-day management of the trust. There is no general obligation for the trustees to give full information to anyone who considers themselves entitled to an equitable interest under the trust.³³⁷ The traditional English view is that access to information is limited to those with proprietary rights in the trust property to information relating specifically to the property in which they have rights.³³⁸ However, an alternative approach has been mooted by the Privy Council which recognises the court's general discretion to supervise trusts and so to order access to information in favour of an applicant whenever it sees fit.³³⁹ It may well be that in the future, application of these principles the courts decide to exercise their discretion in such a way that they adhere closely to the traditional English approach in any event.³⁴⁰ These various approaches are considered below, beginning with the traditional English approach.

335 Target Holdings v Redfems [1996] 1 AC 421.

8.4.2 The limited duty to give general information as to the existence and nature of the trust

The trustees are required to inform sui juris beneficiaries of the existence and terms of a trust.³⁴¹ The requirement to inform the beneficiaries of the terms of the trust will necessarily involve disclosing to those beneficiaries the existence of their equitable interests, but there is no concomitant obligation to explain to the beneficiaries the meaning of those interests.³⁴² Perhaps this is a recognition of the potentially combative relationship between trustee and beneficiary in the event of some breach of trust, particularly in relation to pension funds.³⁴³

336 Ibid. See Chapter 30 for a discussion of the remedy of account in general terms.

337 As impliedly accepted in O'Rourke v Darbishire [1920] AC 581; Re Londonderry [1965] Ch 918; unless the court chooses to exercise its inherent discretion as to the management of trusts, perhaps: Schmidt v Rosewood Trust Ltd [2003] 2 WLR 1442.

338 O'Rourke v Darbishire [1920] AC 581; Re Londonderry [1965] Ch 918.

339 Schmidt v Rosewood Trust Ltd [2003] 2 WLR 1442.

340 On which, see Crowe v Stevedoring Employees Retirement Fund [2003] PLR 343; Foreman v Kingstone [2004] 1 NZLR 841.

341 Hawkesley v May [1956] 1 QB 304. See also Re Emmet's Estate (1881) 17 Ch D 142; Re Lewis [1904] 2 Ch 656. The duty is not a duty concomitantly borne by the settlor such that there is no ostensible obligation on the settlor to inform the trustees or the beneficiaries (Fletcher v Fletcher (1844) 4 Hare 67), although this squares oddly with the fact that if a trust has been validly created by a settlor, then that settlor is obliged to constitute the trust even if the settlor changes her desire to give effect to the trust (Re Ralli's WT [1964] 2 WLR 144; and see also the fact that the settlor may not undo a trust once it has been constituted as in Paul v Paul (1882) 20 Ch D 742).

342 Hamar v Pensions Ombudsman [1996] PLR 1, 10–11; NGN Staff Pension Plan Trustees Ltd v Simmons [1994] OPLR 1. See also Tito v Waddell (No 2) [1977] Ch 106, 242.

343 See, eg, NGN Staff Pension Plan Trustees Ltd v Simmons [1994] OPLR 1; Hamar v Pensions Ombudsman [1996] PLR 1, 10–11.

The explanation given in the cases is that to give such advice to one beneficiary out of a class of beneficiaries might be to advantage that beneficiary over the other beneficiaries;³⁴⁴ however, it does not explain why there should not be an obligation on trustees to give an equal level of information of that sort to all of the beneficiaries. It also recognises the fact that a trustee may be liable for any advice which is mistaken or which causes loss to the beneficiary. The trustees are not obliged, for example, to inform the beneficiaries of any breach of trust which comes to their attention.³⁴⁵ The beneficiaries are entitled to know the names and addresses of the trustees, something which is important if the beneficiaries are to be able to contact the trustees in relation to the management of the trust.³⁴⁶ In the event that some beneficiaries cannot be found, the trustees are only obliged to make reasonable efforts to locate and inform the beneficiaries.³⁴⁷ Other facets of the obligation to give information are considered in the paragraphs to follow.

8.4.3 The limited duty to disclose trust documents to those with a proprietary interest under the trust

No right of access to trust documents if the trust instrument precludes such access

The beneficiaries will have no right to trust documents if the trust instrument expressly precludes such access.³⁴⁸ In principle, it could be seen that the beneficiaries' proprietary rights would be a bundle of rights which does not include access to information of specified kinds or information in general. What would be difficult in practice would be the situation in which beneficiaries require information to scrutinise the trustees' exercise of their powers but where the trust excluded the right to such access. The Privy Council decision in *Schmidt v Rosewood*³⁴⁹ held that the court has an inherent discretion out of which access to information can be ordered; this may have the effect that the court can order access to information nevertheless. However, the position is different in relation to confidential information the disclosure of which will not be ordered in general.³⁵⁰

The traditional approach under English law

The general extent of the duty of trustees to disclose trust documents to beneficiaries, where there is no provision in the trust instrument dealing with such matters, was expressed by Lord Wrenbury in the following terms:³⁵¹

[A beneficiary] is entitled to see all the trust documents because they are trust documents and because he is a beneficiary. They are in a sense his own. Action or no action,

344 Hamar v Pensions Ombudsman [1996] PLR 1.

345 Miller v Stapleton [1996] 2 All ER 449, 463; Hamar v Pensions Ombudsman [1996] PLR 1; NHS Pensions v Beechinor [1997] OPLR 99; Outram v Academy Plastics [2000] PLR 283.

346 Murphy v Murphy [1999] 1 WLR 282.

347 Re Hay's Settlement Trusts [1982] 1 WLR 202.

348 Tierney v King [1983] 2 Qd R 580; Hartigan Nominees v Rydge (1992) 29 NSWLR 405, 446.

349 [2003] 2 WLR 1442; Pollard, 2003.

350 See para 8.4.7.

351 O'Rourke v Darbishire [1920] AC 581, 626.

he is entitled to access to them. This has nothing to do with discovery.³⁵² The right to discovery is a right to see someone else's document. A proprietary right is a right to access to documents which are your own.

Despite the apparent breadth of this statement, two issues arise. The first relates to the question 'who is a beneficiary?' in such circumstances, for example, in relation to the objects of discretionary trusts: this issue is considered in para 8.4.5. The second issue was raised by Lord Walker³⁵³ to the effect that Lord Wrenbury's statement was appropriate on the facts of the case in front of him because the beneficiary in that case would have been entitled to the entire trust fund and therefore it would be right to say that he was also entitled to all of its documentation: however, his Lordship suggested that the question remains whether that position be the same in relation to a trust containing different classes of beneficiaries. It seems in accordance with principle that if a person does not belong to a particular class of beneficiaries entitled to a particular subset of the trust fund, then there is no reason to suppose that that person is entitled to see documentation relating to that subset of property:³⁵⁴ this accords with Lord Wrenbury's logic because that person would not be the owner of those documents because she would not have any proprietary right in that property. So, for example, a beneficiary entitled only to the trust capital is not necessarily entitled to see documentation relating to the trust income.³⁵⁵

It has been said that it may be the case then that one beneficiary's desire for information may be disadvantageous to the other beneficiaries.³⁵⁶ However, this statement is one with which this writer has some difficulty. It is difficult to see how simply providing information to a beneficiary could cause harm to another beneficiary, provided always that the trustees are exercising their powers properly; unless, perhaps, there is thought to be, for example, a risk of disclosing confidential account details relating to other beneficiaries. If the inquisitive beneficiary were able to pressure the trustees, as a result of receiving that information, into changing their minds so as to benefit her, then it would either be the case that the trustees had previously been exercising their powers inappropriately so as to disadvantage the inquisitive beneficiary or else that the trustees are latterly exercising their powers wrongly by advantaging the inquisitive beneficiary. It is not the provision of information which is problematic but rather the trustees' strength of character to ensure that they are exercising their powers properly throughout.

Indeed, the right to information being based on ownership of the property to which those documents relates is perhaps not the most appropriate basis for access to information. It may be that the capital beneficiary can only know whether or not the trustees are exercising their powers properly if that beneficiary has information about the management of the income portion of the trust fund. If the test remains one based on ownership, then the capital 352 'Discovery' is the technical procedure during litigation in which the parties seek disclosure of information from one another.

353 Schmidt v Rosewood Trust Ltd [2003] 2 WLR 1442, 1457C.

354 Re Tillott [1892] 1 Ch 86, per Chitty J; Re Cowin (1886) 33 Ch D 179.

355 Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [2000] WTLR 795, 822; although in such a situation, it might be that the capital beneficiary wishes to know whether or not capital has been comprised in favour of generating more income such that the capital beneficiaries may argue that such documentation would give them vital information as to the probity of the trustees' management of their own property.

356 Re Cowin (1886) 33 Ch D 179, 197, per North J.

beneficiary is never entitled to know about the income portion of the trust. However, if the test recognised that someone who is validly a beneficiary under the trust is entitled to access to all documentation which affects her equitable interest in the trust, then that would be an approach which matched the beneficiaries' genuine interests more closely.

In *Re Londonderry*³⁵⁷ the claimant sought copies of documents from the trustees in relation to a trust. The claimant was one of a class of beneficiaries who were the objects of a power of appointment over the trust's income. The trust capital had been exhausted in appointing property to the defendant: in effect, therefore, the claimant wanted information as to the trustees' decisions so that he could learn why the power of appointment had been exercised in favour of the defendant such that there was no capital left. The Court of Appeal (in particular Harman LJ) held that trustees were not obliged to give reasons for their decisions. Following on from the idea in O'Rourke v Derbyshire that a beneficiary is entitled to documents relating to a part of the trust over which one has property rights, Harman LJ held:

If the [beneficiary] is allowed to examine [the minutes and agendas of trustees meetings], she will know at once the very matters which the trustees are not bound to disclose to her, namely, their motives and reasons. Trustees who wish to preserve their rights in this respect must either commit nothing to paper or destroy everything from meeting to meeting. . . .

I would hold that, even if documents of this type ought properly to be described as trust documents, they are protected for the special reason which protects the trustees' deliberations on a discretionary matter from disclosure. If necessary, I hold that this principle overrides the ordinary rule. This is in my judgment no less in the true interest of the beneficiary than of the trustees. Again, if one of the trustees commits to paper his suggestions and circulates them among his co-trustees, or if inquiries are made in writing as to the circumstances of a member of the class, I decline to hold that such documents are trust documents the property of the beneficiaries. In my opinion such documents are not trust documents in the proper sense at all. On the other hand, if the solicitor advising the trustees commits to paper an aide-mémoire summarising the state of the fund or of the family and reminding the trustees of past distributions and future possibilities, I think that must be a document which any beneficiary must be at liberty to inspect. . . . I cannot think that communications passing between individual trustees and appointors are documents in which beneficiaries have a proprietary right.³⁵⁸

I have two particular problems with this formulation. First, I do not understand why there is assumed to be a need for secrecy in such circumstances. The alternative view would be that if trustees act as fiduciaries then they must be accountable to the beneficiaries and therefore they must be transparent about their acts and omissions and thought processes. Secondly, if the beneficiaries do not have information as to the trustees' acts and omissions then they are robbed of the ability to bring proceedings against the trustees in the event of breach of trust because they cannot find out if there has been a breach of trust because they have no access to the appropriate information. It is to be remembered that the beneficiary principle (discussed in Chapter 4) requires that ‘there must be some person in whose favour the court can decree performance’: which in turn requires that the beneficiaries must have sufficient information to be able to seek proper performance of the trust.

357 [1964] 3 All ER 855.

358 Ibid at 860.

The new analysis

The Privy Council in *Schmidt v Rosewood Trust Ltd*³⁵⁹ suggested an alternative approach to understanding which beneficiaries are entitled to access to the trust documents. Rather than consider the beneficiary as being entitled on the basis of a proprietary interest, it was suggested instead that the power to order access to information is based on the court’s inherent jurisdiction to assume control of a trust and to supervise the actions of the trustees. Therefore, the court should be permitted to order access to information wherever appropriate. What this approach does not help with is in telling us which beneficiaries are entitled to access to which sorts of information and which beneficiaries are not so entitled. All the Schmidt v Rosewood Trust Ltd approach suggests is that one can apply to the court for an order seeking disclosure and that the court has a discretion as to which beneficiaries will be entitled to disclosure and which will not. It does not tell us which types of beneficiary have an entitlement to peruse trust documents as of right.³⁶⁰

8.4.4 Which documents constitute trust documents?

The right to access to information under the traditional approach is predicated on ownership of the trust property to which that information relates and therefore means that such owners are entitled to access to trust documents. To remind ourselves of what Lord Wrenbury held in O’Rourke v Darbishire on that point:³⁶¹

A beneficiary has a right of access to the documents which he desires to inspect upon what has been called in the judgments in this case a proprietary right. The beneficiary is entitled to see all trust documents, because they are trust documents, and because he is a beneficiary. They are, in this sense, his own.

The question is then as to the nature of documents which can properly be described as ‘trust documents’. The contents of that category have been found to be incapable of precise definition. Trust documents in relation to a discretionary trust do not include documents relating to the basis on which the trustees have made their decisions as to the use of their discretion.³⁶²

359 [2003] 2 WLR 1442.

360 In Schmidt v Rosewood the claimant sought access to information on the basis that he was a beneficiary of two settlements of which his father was co-settlor and on the basis that (acting as his father’s executor) his father had been a beneficiary of those settlements too. The trustees resisted disclosure on the basis that they contended that the claimant had no beneficial rights in either context. As set out in the text, the Privy Council decided that the court has an inherent discretion as to questions of disclosure, thus sidestepping the focus on the idea whether or not the claimant needed a beneficial right to acquire disclosure of information. Ultimately the matter was remitted to the court of first instance to find further facts.

361 [1920] AC 581.

362 Re Londonderry [1965] Ch 918, per Danckwerts LJ.

By contrast, a beneficiary is entitled to see all documents held by the trustee in her capacity as trustee³⁶³ whether those documents relate to the creation of the trust,³⁶⁴ receipts as to payments made by the trustees or on their behalf,³⁶⁵ or advice received from counsel.³⁶⁶ So, the beneficiary is entitled to see documents as to the management or condition of the trust, but not documents relating to the exercise of the trustees' decisions in relation to the management of the trust, as considered below.³⁶⁷

The obligation to provide information (albeit of limited types) as to management accounts is an important part of the control of the trustee by the court and by the beneficiaries. Without such information it would be impossible in many circumstances to commence breach of trust claims, that is, the type of litigation dealt with in Chapter 18. What is clearly a limit on the power of beneficiaries is the lack of any entitlement to see documentation as to the rationale underpinning trustees' decisions or a right (in the absence of any such provision in the trust instrument) to receive reasons for trustees' decisions. So, under the O'Rourke v Darbishire approach, the objects of a discretionary trust are not entitled to know the reasons for the trustees' decision. This approach would deny the objects the information which they would need to commence proceedings, for example, under the Hastings-Bass principle on the basis that the trustees had taken into account an irrelevant consideration or had failed to take into account a relevant consideration.

By contrast with the decision in O'Rourke v Darbishire, the more recent decision of the Privy Council in *Schmidt v Rosewood Trust Ltd*³⁶⁸ has suggested that there is no inherent right to disclosure of trust documents. As Lord Walker expressed this approach:

no beneficiary . . . has any entitlement as of right to disclosure of anything which can plausibly be described as a trust document. Especially when there are issues as to personal or commercial confidentiality, the court may have to balance the competing interests of different beneficiaries, the trustees themselves, and third parties. Disclosure may have to be limited and safeguards may have to be put in place.³⁶⁹

Rather, the entitlement to disclosure of trust documents was held to be dependent on the discretion of the court as part of the court's general power to administer any trust. In the wake of the decision in Schmidt, which is of persuasive authority being a Privy Council decision, we will have to wait to see whether or not this new, narrower approach is used to displace the presumption that beneficiaries have an inherent right to consult trust documents relating to property in which they have proprietary rights.³⁷⁰

363 Simpson v Bathurst (1869) LR 5 Ch App 193, 202; Bursill v Tanner (1885) 16 QBD 1; Re Cowin (1886) 33 Ch D 179, 186; Re Ojeh Trust [1993] CILR 348.

364 Ex p Houldsworth (1838) 4 Bing NC 386; Bhandar v Barclays (1997/98) 1 OFLR 497.

365 Clarke v Ormonde (1821) Jac 108; Re Ellis [1908] WN 215.

366 Devaynes v Robinson (1855) 20 Beav 42; Wynne v Humbertson (1858) 27 Beav 421. But excluding any advice relating to the trustee's own personal liabilities: Brown v Oakshott (1849) 12 Beav 42.

367 See para 8.4.7 below.

368 [2003] 2 WLR 1442.

369 Ibid, 1463.

370 O'Rourke v Darbishire [1920] AC 581.

8.4.5 Who constitutes a beneficiary with a right to access to information?

If the right of access to information is predicated on equitable ownership of the property to which the information relates,³⁷¹ then anyone without such ownership would not be entitled to access to that information. This much was considered above. However, a further question arises: what does it mean to be a beneficiary in this sense? Does a person who is a member of a class of objects under a discretionary trust, but who has no vested right in any segregated property, constitute a beneficiary? Or is that person denied the status of being a ‘beneficiary’ for this purpose on account of the fact that she does not own vested property rights in any property? The answer suggested by Neuberger J is that the object of a discretionary trust is entitled to require that trustees provide information to him as to the value of the trust property, the trust income, and the manner of the management of the trust fund.³⁷² Indeed, in Re Ralli's WT,³⁷³ the rationale for considering that a remainder beneficiary was entitled to a proprietary right in the trust property, including its income, capable of founding a trust over that remainder interest was that the remainder beneficiary had some right at least to control the behaviour of the trustees.³⁷⁴ Thus, the object of a discretionary trust would appear to have sufficient proprietary interest to entitle her to access to information relating to the management of that part of the trust.

More recently, however, the Privy Council has cast doubt on the general proposition that the object of a discretionary trust is entitled to access to trust documents as of right, preferring instead to hold that it is for the court in each case, as part of its inherent discretion to supervise the administration of a trust, to decide whether or not any given beneficiary is entitled to access to information.³⁷⁵ Nevertheless, it has been held in Australia that the approaches in *Re Londonderry*³⁷⁶ and O'Rourke v Darbishire continue to have effect even after Schmidt v Rosewood on the basis that the court's inherent discretion ought to favour those beneficiaries on the basis of their proprietary interest in the trust fund.³⁷⁷ In New Zealand, Schmidt v Rosewood has been applied but in such a way as to recognise that the objects of discretionary trusts were entitled to access to information.³⁷⁸ It is suggested that the Schmidt v Rosewood approach is unfortunate for two reasons. First, one cannot know if one has a right to access without incurring the expense of going to court. Secondly, it promotes secrecy on the part of trustees and militates against beneficiaries having that sort of access to information which makes the logic underpinning the beneficiary principle possible.³⁷⁹ What is meant by this reference to the beneficiary principle is this: the logic of trusts law is that the conscience of the trustee is controlled by the court only if there is some person in whose favour the court can decree performance.³⁸⁰ However, if the beneficiaries do 371 As in ibid.

372 Murphy v Murphy [1999] 1 WLR 282.

373 [1964] 2 WLR 144.

374 See also Stuart-Hutcheson v Spread Trustee Co Ltd [2002] WTLR 1213; Millar v Hornsby (2000) 3 ITEL 81.

375 Schmidt v Rosewood [2003] 2 WLR 1458.

376 Considered below at para 8.4.7.

377 Crowe v Stevedoring Employees Retirement Fund [2003] PLR 343.

378 Foreman v Kingstone [2004] 1 NZLR 841.

379 On the beneficiary principle, see Chapter 4 generally.

380 See section 4.2.

not have access to trust information, then they cannot commence litigation and the court will therefore not be able to take control over the trustees' actions. Thus, the logic of trusts law threatens to collapse unless the beneficiaries have access to the necessary information. This idea is pursued below at 8.4.7 in relation to Breakspear v Ackland.³⁸¹

8.4.6 No obligation on trustees to give reasons for their decisions

Trustees are required to give accounts and to provide details as to the decisions which have been made in accordance with the management of the trust.³⁸² The beneficiaries, or the class of objects of a power, are entitled to be informed of a decision, but are not entitled to be given the reasons as to why that decision was taken.³⁸³ The trustees may be required to disclose the material on which they based their decision, but they are not obliged to divulge their reasoning in reaching the decision that they did: this may have the effect that the trustees are not obliged to disclose any material on which they based their decision if that would reveal the reasoning behind their decision.³⁸⁴ Where trustees fail to explain the reasons for their decision to exercise their discretion in a particular way, the court may set aside that decision or require reasons to be given.³⁸⁵ In Re Beloved Wilkes Charity,³⁸⁶ the trustees were required to select a boy from among a list of given parishes. They chose a boy not from one of those parishes but rather one who was the brother of a Minister who had sought help for his brother from one of the trustees. Lord Truro set aside the trustees' selection on the basis that it was done solely to benefit a person who had a nexus to the trustee and therefore was not a proper exercise of that power.

The court will look at the adequacy of reasons where they are given.³⁸⁷ Written material which gives minutes of management of trust property should be disclosed to beneficiaries, but material relating to the exercise of discretions need not be.³⁸⁸ It might be wondered why there is a difference in these two contexts. The rationale is that the former rule (concerning management of the trust fund) relates to professional management of the beneficiary's entitlement to the trust property, whereas the latter principle (concerning the exercise of discretion in connection with a discretionary trust) relates to a more fundamental question, in that such exercise of their discretion decides whether or not the beneficiary will have an interest in the trust at all. Therefore, a trustee is not obliged to disclose the reasons for making any determination as to the exercise of a discretion.³⁸⁹

381 [2008] 3 WLR 698.

382 Re Londonderry [1965] 2 WLR 229.

383 Hartigan v Rydge (1992) 29 NSWLR 405.

384 Ibid., 445, per Sheller JA.

385 Re Beloved Wilkes Charity (1851) 3 Mac & G 440.

386 Ibid.

387 Klug v Klug [1918] 2 Ch 67.

388 Re Londonderry's Settlement [1965] 2 WLR 229.

389 Wilson v Law Debenture Trust Corp plc [1995] 2 All ER 337. See also Tierney v King [1983] 2 Qd R 580; Stuart v Armourguard Security [1996] NZLR 484; Crowe v Stevedoring Employees Retirement Fund [2003] PLR 343.

8.4.7 No obligation to disclose confidential information

A further question might arise: are beneficiaries entitled to see a memorandum set out by the settlor giving her intentions with reference to the fund? In particular, should such a memorandum be disclosed if the settlor has expressed it to be confidential? Suppose the following set of facts: the settlor gave the trustees a memorandum set out by the settlor giving her intentions with reference to a power of appointment under the fund, and then the trustees told the claimant's sister that they would not make an appointment to her because of the terms of the memorandum. In just such a case in New South Wales, the majority of the court followed the decision in *Re Londonderry's Settlement*³⁹⁰ in holding that the memorandum itself need not be shown to the beneficiary because it related to the exercise of the trustees' discretion,³⁹¹ rather, there is an implied obligation of confidentiality between trustee and settlor which would prevent the trustees from being obliged to disclose any such information. The rationale given by the Court of Appeal in Re Londonderry is that an obligation to make disclosure to the members of a family, for example, might cause irreparable harm to family relations if the settlor had sought to benefit some family members at the expense of others.³⁹² Similarly, correspondence between the trustees and one or more of the beneficiaries may be considered to be confidential and so not to be capable of disclosure.³⁹³

In the Cayman Islands case of Lemos v Coutts & Co,³⁹⁴ the Londonderry decision was also followed. Although a beneficiary may have proprietary rights to trust documents, it was held that such a right did not grant the beneficiary an absolute right to consult all documents. The court held that there may be categories of document which it is right to exclude from the beneficiaries. The right to see documents will be granted where they are evidentially important to the beneficiaries' case. The question, which is not answered by this approach, is whether the beneficiary should be allowed to see documents where there is no litigation pending.

In the wake of the Privy Council's decision in Schmidt v Rosewood Trust Ltd,³⁹⁵ it may be that the court may consider it appropriate to exercise its discretion so as to order disclosure of confidential information. However, in general terms, it would be suggested on the basis of the older authorities that confidential information is ordinarily not the sort of information which is disclosed to beneficiaries. It was recognised by Lord Walker in Schmidt v Rosewood that 'no beneficiary (least of all a discretionary object) has any entitlement as of right to disclosure of anything which can plausibly be described as a trust document . . . [e]specially when there are issues as to personal or commercial confidentiality . . .'.³⁹⁶ Nevertheless, if the power to order disclosure is now apparently at the discretion of the court as part of the court's inherent power to control the administration of the trust, then it would be open to a court to order such disclosure if, for example, it considered that non-disclosure was facilitating a fraud to be perpetrated on one or more of the objects of a power. The court would be less likely to make such an order for disclosure, it is suggested, if a disgruntled object of a

390 [1965] 2 WLR 229.

391 Hartigan v Rydge (1992) 29 NSWLR 405.

392 [1956] Ch 928, per Salmon LJ.

393 Re Londonderry's Settlement [1965] Ch 918.

394 (1992) Cayman Islands ILR 460.

395 [2003] 2 WLR 1442.

396 Ibid, 1463–64.

power were merely seeking to embark on a ‘fishing expedition’ in the hope of discovering something on which to base a claim against the trustees.

The question of a beneficiary’s right to disclosure of information arose again in *Breakspear v Ackland*³⁹⁷ when a beneficiary sought disclosure of a settlor’s ‘letter of wishes’. A letter of wishes is a letter sometimes written by a settlor which is not strictly binding on the trustees as a part of a trust instrument but which nevertheless records the settlor’s wishes as to the way which the trustees should exercise any discretion or other power they have under the terms of the trust instrument. In this way, for example, a settlor might seek to avoid the tax consequences of leaving property to Xena by creating an open-ended discretionary trust under which Xena has no vested equitable interest, but nevertheless write a letter of wishes to her trustees so as to ensure that the trustees in practice will take certain matters into account when making their decision and that they will exercise their discretion so as to appoint the property to Xena. In Breakspear, Briggs J ordered disclosure of the letter of wishes on the facts of the case before him. His Lordship followed the principle in Re Londonderry to the effect that the exercise of a trustee’s ‘discretionary dispositive powers’ remained ‘inherently confidential’³⁹⁸ and therefore that a letter of wishes was similarly confidential in ordinary circumstances, except where the court considered that the circumstances and the best interests of the beneficiaries required it.³⁹⁹ Briggs J identified the benefits of confidentiality in cases involving family illness and so forth; and thus, ‘regardless of my own opinion’,⁴⁰⁰ downplays the general desire for more openness in trust dealings.⁴⁰¹ Nevertheless, after a lengthy review of the authorities from around the Commonwealth (with some circularity), his Lordship found that the question of awarding disclosure of this document was a matter for the trustees’ discretion and not a question of whether or not the beneficiary had a proprietary right in the document. Thus the strict English authorities are interpreted by reference to decisions in Australia,⁴⁰² even though Re Londonderry is considered (with due deference to the doctrine of precedent) to remain good law.⁴⁰³ Briggs J, however, considered that he needed to read the letter of wishes for himself and, with great secrecy as to its contents, decided that disclosure of the letter would be in the long-term benefit of the administration of the trust. He came to this view because he considered that disclosure would have been necessary in future litigation when the trustees would likely be required to seek the court’s sanction for a scheme of apportionment of the property between the beneficiaries in any event.

His Lordship identified a weakness in the decision in Schmidt v Rosewood in that if the resolution of the question depended on the court’s discretion, then trustees would be required to bring litigation on every occasion; and considered the old approach in cases such as *In re Beddoe*⁴⁰⁴ that the trustees could always obtain the court’s approval at ‘modest expense’ to

397 [2008] 3 WLR 698.

398 Ibid., at 707.

399 On this basis a letter of wishes was not disclosed in Australia in Hartigan Nominees Pty Ltd v Rydge (1992) 29 NSWLR 405. See also In re Rabaïotti’s Settlements [2000] WTLR 953, Jersey Royal Court; and Countess Bathurst v Kleinwort Benson (Channel Islands) Trustees Ltd [2007] WTLR 959, Royal Court of Guernsey: both of which applied the Londonderry principle to cases involving letters of wishes.

400 [2008] 3 WLR 698, 717.

401 Ibid., at 717.

402 In particular, Hartigan Nominees Pty Ltd v Rydge (1992) 29 NSWLR 405.

403 [2008] 3 WLR 698, 716 et seq.

404 [1893] 1 Ch 547.

be anachronistic given the cost of modern litigation. Ultimately, where Lord Walker departed from Re Londonderry, his comments were dismissed as being obiter dicta by Briggs J. This point was made in the text above: the Schmidt approach does require litigation for the parties to know where they stand. Briggs J identified a key tension in this area: on the one hand there is a traditional preference for confidentiality (which is likely to find favour among trustees), while on the other hand modern mores prefer openness in financial dealings as opposed to secrecy.⁴⁰⁵ Much of the commentary in this area identifies that dichotomy. Briggs J considered himself bound by precedent and the confidentiality in Re Londonderry, but was evidently in favour of greater transparency in trust dealings. The principle remains that the trustees are advised to seek a court order before bringing or defending proceedings.⁴⁰⁶

In similar vein it has been held in *Wilson v Law Debenture Trust Corp plc*⁴⁰⁷ that the trustees of a pension fund who had been given a discretionary power ought not to be required to disclose the reasons for their decisions precisely because the creators of the pension scheme could be taken to have granted the trustees that discretion precisely so as to minimise litigation, and thus that they should not be required to give reasons for their decisions. It is suggested that this is an odd reason for denying disclosure because it makes it effectively impossible for beneficiaries under the scheme to challenge decisions which are adverse to them and could therefore well provide an efficient smokescreen for inappropriate discrimination between beneficiaries, fraud and so forth.

8.4.8 The duty to render accounts

One of the trustees' most significant duties is the duty to render accounts to the beneficiaries as to their management of the trust's affairs. The accounts are required to give an accurate record of the trustees' management of the trust together with supporting documentation such as receipts.⁴⁰⁸ This information must include, at the beneficiary's request, a valuation of the trust fund.⁴⁰⁹ The beneficiaries are also entitled to have such trusts accounts and documents provided to their accountants⁴¹⁰ or legal advisors,⁴¹¹ except for those sorts of documents to which those beneficiaries have no entitlement.⁴¹² This duty cannot be excluded by the trust instrument because it is one of the core obligations of trusteeship.⁴¹³

In this book we shall see the notion of rendering accounts appearing in three subtly different senses.⁴¹⁴ The duty to account to the trustees encapsulates not only the rendering of 405 See also Sir Gavin Lightman, 'The Trustees' Duty to Provide Information to Beneficiaries', [2004] PCB 23.

406 Alsop Wilkinson v Neary [1995] 1 All ER 431; Bonham v Blake Laphorn Linell [2006] EWHC 2513 (Ch), [2007] WTLR 189; Breadner Granville-Grossman [2006] WTLR 411; Three Professional Trustees v Infant Prospective Beneficiary [2007] EWHC 1922 (Ch), [2007] WTLR 1631.

407 [1995] 2 All ER 337, per Rattee J.

408 Springett v Dashwood (1860) 2 Giff 521; Burrows v Walls (1855) 5 De GM & G 233; Newton v Askew (1848) 11 Beav 145.

409 Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241, 261. See also Re Tillott [1892] 1 Ch 86; Re Page [1893] 1 Ch 304; Ryder v Bickerton (1743) 3 Swan 30n.

410 Kemp v Burn (1863) 4 Giff 348; Re Cowin (1886) 33 Ch D 179; Re Londonderry's Settlement [1965] Ch 918; Schmidt v Rosewood Trust Ltd [2003] 2 WLR 1442.

411 Hawkesley v May [1956] 1 QB 304.

412 On these categories of documents see the previous paragraphs of this section.

413 Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241, 253, per Millett LJ.

414 For a general description see Glazier v Australian Men's Health (No 2) [2001] NSW SC 6.

formal accounts in the fiscal sense, but also incorporates the sense of informing the beneficiaries about the manner in which the trustees have discharged their duties, in the way that a schoolmaster might demand that a naughty schoolboy ‘account for his actions’. This notion of accounting also encapsulates the general obligation borne by the trustees to obey the terms of the trust and is the foundation of the liability for any breach of trust. Therefore, when we consider liability for breach of trust in detail in Chapter 18,⁴¹⁵ we shall consider the trustees’ liability to account in the further sense of compensating the beneficiaries in cash for any loss occasioned to the trust fund by their breach of trust.⁴¹⁶ In the arcane language of trusts law, any challenge to the accounts brought by the beneficiaries is done by way of ‘falsifying and surcharging’ those accounts. In modern parlance, we think of falsifying account as the process by which a trustee is subjected to a personal liability to account to the beneficiaries in cash or equivalent value for any loss suffered by the trust as a result of the breach of trust.⁴¹⁷ By contrast, surcharging accounts refers specifically to an argument that some asset ought to have been recorded in the trust accounts but has not been so recovered as a result of the trustee’s failure to get the trust property in.⁴¹⁸ If the trustee has been guilty of wilful default in failing to get the trust property in, then the trustee will be liable for any property or value which might have accrued to the trust but for her wilful default.⁴¹⁹

As to the detail of calculating the loss to the trust and the nature of the available remedies for breach of trust, you are directed to Chapter 18.

8.4.9 Fiduciary duties in relation to Chinese walls and confidential information

If a fiduciary were to earn personal profits from the misuse of confidential information belonging to a beneficiary, then that profit would be held on constructive trust for those beneficiaries. More generally the fiduciary may be liable for any loss caused to that beneficiary by means of compromising that confidential information. The obligations of a fiduciary are obligations of good faith, loyalty and confidence.⁴²⁰ As such, the manner in which a fiduciary deals with confidential information belonging to a beneficiary is an important part of her fiduciary duties. There are two kinds of confidential information which should concern us here. The first kind would be confidential information which itself has a market value, such as knowledge of a secret ingredient or a formula used in a manufacturing process. This type of confidential information is recognised by intellectual property law as being property, akin to a copyright or a patent in that sense.⁴²¹ Thus, such property can itself

415 See section 18.1.

416 This obligation arises in tandem with an obligation to effect specific restitution of any property taken from the trust: Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421. This obligation includes a liability to costs resulting from a failure to keep proper accounts: Eglin v Sanderson (1862) 3 Giff 434; Re Linsley [1904] 2 Ch 785; Re Den Haag Trust (1998) 1 OFLR 495.

417 Clough v Bond (1838) 3 My & Cr 490, 496; Knott v Cottee (1852) 19 Beav 77; Re Massingberd (1890) 63 LT 296; Wallersteiner v Moir (No 2) [1975] QB 373, 397; Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421.

418 Bristol & West Building Society v Mothew [1998] Ch 1, 17; Bank of New Zealand v New Zealand Guardian Trust Co [1999] 1 NZLR 664, 687.

419 Partington v Reynolds (1858) 4 Drew 253; Coulthard v Disco Mix Club [1999] 2 All ER 457.

420 Re Coomber [1911] 1 Ch 723; Bristol & West Building Society v Mothew [1998] Ch 1.

421 Coco v AN Clark (Engineers) [1969] RPC 41, 48, per Megarry J; Douglas v Hello! [2001] EMLR 199, 251, per Keane J. See Thomas and Hudson, 2004, para 29.29.

be held on trust and so any misuse of such property by a fiduciary would give rise to liability for breach of trust and for any secret profits made by the fiduciary to be held on constructive trust.⁴²²

The second kind of confidential information of significance is knowledge of some private information as to the beneficiary's personal affairs. This sort of information might not be intellectual property, in the sense that it may not be capable of forming the subject matter of a trust in some circumstances, but misuse of such information by a fiduciary would constitute a breach of those fiduciary duties. An example of this second type of confidential information would be knowledge of the location of the beneficiary's secret, personal bank accounts and knowledge of the structure of the trusts and companies which hold the beneficiary's personal assets. Misuse of information of this type would similarly lead to liability for breach of trust, in relation to any loss which resulted to the beneficiary, and a constructive trust over any secret profits made from that misuse of confidential information.⁴²³

One particular context in which either form of confidential information might cause difficulties for fiduciaries is the context of litigation or advice given by professional advisors, such as solicitors or accountants, to their clients. The particular difficulty which arises in relation to complex litigation involving large corporate entities is that there are comparatively few law firms and very few accountancy firms which are sufficiently expert or technically capable of providing the necessary advice and services. In such situations, it is therefore common for large law firms or accountancy firms to be advising both parties to litigation. Evidently, there is the very real possibility of a conflict of interest or transmission of confidential information when employees of the same firm are advising both parties to litigation and are therefore in possession of a large amount of confidential information as to both parties' prospects for success, the details of their businesses and their tactics. That the same solicitors' firm, for example, acts for both sides in litigation is not, in itself, objectionable provided that both principals give their informed consent to such an arrangement.⁴²⁴

Consequently, the firms attempt to instate what are commonly known as 'Chinese walls' within the firm. The purpose of a Chinese wall is to segregate those employees who are advising one client from those employees who are advising the other client. There is no principle in English law to preclude a firm of solicitors from advising both parties to litigation or to prevent a firm of solicitors from acting in litigation against a former client,⁴²⁵ although a firm cannot act both for and against the same client, unless that firm has the consent of both clients.⁴²⁶ A good example of the sorts of techniques which are used are discussed in the case of Bolkiah v KPMG.⁴²⁷ This is achieved, it is hoped, by programming the firms' security systems so as to deny employees advising client A from accessing any premises or part of the premises used by employees advising client B. This will include denial of access to photocopying facilities, restroom and refreshment facilities of such employees as well as their offices and other work areas. Usually, large firms will require 422 Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46, as considered above.

423 Bolkiah v KPMG [1999] 2 AC 222, [1999] 1 All ER 517.

424 Marks & Spencer plc v Freshfield Bruckhaus Deringer [2004] 3 All ER 773.

425 Rakusen v Ellis Munday & Clarke [1912] 1 Ch 831, [1911–13] All ER Rep 813.

426 Bolkiah v KPMG [1999] 2 AC 222, [1999] 1 All ER 517, 526h.

427 [1999] 2 AC 222, [1999] 1 All ER 517.

different departments to work in different buildings and will prevent any employees moving from one team to another team. Employees are prevented from taking work home or even out of the office so that there cannot be any risk of loss or transmission of confidential information outside the office either accidentally or deliberately. A successful Chinese wall strategy will prevent the employing company or firm from being attributed with any knowledge acquired by employees; otherwise, if an employee of a firm had a requisite form of knowledge of confidential client information, then that knowledge would ordinarily be attributed to the employer, thus making the employer liable for any breach of duty.⁴²⁸

In Bolkiah v KPMG, the claimant Prince Jefri Bolkiah had been finance minister in Brunei and was a part of the Brunei royal family. In time, he fell from favour and sought advice from the defendant accountancy firm. Subsequently, a Brunei state-owned entity, BIA, commenced litigation in relation to the claimant. BIA retained the defendant accountancy firm to advise it in relation to that litigation. The accountancy firm put in place the sort of Chinese walls just considered. When the courts came to consider the efficacy of the accountancy firm's arrangements, it was held that there were two principal problems with the operation of these Chinese walls in this case. The first problem was that the Chinese walls were the defendant's usual arrangements rather than being arrangements which were designed specifically for the circumstances of the particular litigation. The court was consequently unconvinced that the firm had done everything necessary to ensure that there was no transmission of confidential information within the firm. The second problem was that the Chinese wall arrangements failed in practice because there were movements of staff between the two departments such that there were employees in one department who necessarily knew information which should have been kept within the other department. In the event, there was transmission of confidential information as to the claimant's personal affairs within the firm, in particular as to the structure of his personal holdings.

The defendant accountancy firm argued that it had done everything reasonable to preserve the confidentiality of the claimant's information. However, Lord Millett, speaking for a unanimous House of Lords, held that the defendant's obligation was not a mere obligation to do all that was reasonable; rather, it was an absolute duty to ensure that there was no breach of confidence. Thus there was no defence for the defendant on the basis that the defendant had sought to do everything reasonable in the circumstances. His Lordship held that in relation to solicitors acting for their clients:⁴²⁹ the duty to preserve confidentiality is unqualified. It is a duty to keep the information confidential, not merely to take all reasonable steps to do so. Moreover, it is not merely a duty not to communicate the information to a third party. It is a duty not to misuse it, that is to say, without the consent of the former client to make any use of it or to cause any use to be made of it by others otherwise than for his benefit.

That the duty is 'unqualified' means that the fiduciary has no defence if the duty is breached and the beneficiary suffers some loss from that breach. Further, however, the fiduciary is 428 Galmerrow Securities Ltd v National Westminster Bank plc [2002] WTLR 125. Cf Harrods Ltd v Lemon [1931] 1 KB 157, demonstrating that ordinarily the knowledge of some wrongful or fraudulent design by one agent of a company or other organisation will generally be attributed to that company or organisation.

429 [1999] 2 AC 222, 232, [1999] 1 All ER 517, 527, per Lord Millett.

under a duty not to misuse the information generally and therefore the fiduciary would be liable to be subjected to an injunction to prevent the misuse of the property and not simply to account for the benefit in the event that the misuse caused some loss to the beneficiary.

Indeed, if the business at issue is of such confidentiality and of such significance to one client's business, then it may be that the court will consider that it would not be possible to put effective barriers in place and so enjoin the advisor from acting for both clients.⁴³⁰ So, in Marks & Spencer plc v Freshfields Bruckhaus Deringer,⁴³¹ a firm of solicitors acquired a great deal of confidential information about their client's logistical arrangements and supply chain. The client, Marks & Spencer, was in the process of restructuring these core elements of their business: as a nationwide high street retailer, this sort of information was vital to their business. The solicitors then sought to act at the same time for a consortium which was seeking to take over Marks & Spencer. It was held that the principles as to Chinese walls were not restricted to confidential information in one transaction but would apply in relation to information which might be passed across different transactions. An injunction was granted to prevent the solicitors from acting for both clients so that the risk of confidential information being passed would be avoided.⁴³²

In Bolkiah v KPMG itself, the House of Lords held that there was a difference between acting as a solicitor and acting as an accountant who provides audit services. The solicitor acts throughout the duration of her retainer in a fiduciary capacity for the client, but that fiduciary obligation comes to an end when the relationship ceases, so that the solicitor may thereafter act against the former client. However, in relation to information relating to the time when the solicitor was acting for the client, the solicitor remains in a fiduciary relationship forever, or else the client could have no practical protection against the solicitor's breach of duty. Auditors, by contrast, frequently provide accountancy services to people who may be in conflict in the future or who may even be in conflict at the time of providing the services. Significantly, the basis for the fiduciary's duty is the need to avoid any conflict of interest between the fiduciary's personal capacities and the obligations owed to the beneficiary.⁴³³

8.5 LIMITATION OF THE TRUSTEES' DUTIES

Trustees are entitled to have their liabilities for breach of trust and for the commission of any tort limited by the terms of the trust instrument. Such liability exclusion clauses are equitable devices and not contractual provisions. Trustees can limit their liability for negligence and gross negligence, but it appears that they may not limit their liability for dishonesty or fraud. There is a division in the authorities between a permissive approach to such exclusion clauses and an approach which prefers to limit them.

430 Marks & Spencer plc v Freshfields Bruckhaus Deringer [2004] 3 All ER 773.

431 [2004] 3 All ER 773, [2004] EWHC 1337 (Ch). Applying Young v Robson Rhodes (A Firm) [1999] 3 All ER 524; Baron Investments (Holdings) Ltd (In Liquidation) [2000] 1 BCLC 272; Baird Textiles Holdings Ltd v Marks & Spencer plc [2002] 1 All ER (Comm) 737.

432 See also Koch Shipping Inc v Richards Butler (A Firm) [2002] EWCA Civ 1280, [2002] 2 All ER (Comm) 957.

433 [1999] 2 AC 222, 232, [1999] 1 All ER 517, 527, per Lord Millett.

8.5.1 The validity of exclusion of liability clauses under case law

The trustees' right to exclude their liabilities by express provision in the trust instrument

The trustees' liability for breach of trust may be excluded completely or limited by an express provision to that effect in the trust instrument.⁴³⁴ Such exclusion of liability provisions takes effect as equitable provisions and not as contractual provisions.⁴³⁵ A number of different expressions are used in this context to describe effectively the same material. Strictly, 'exclusion of liability' clauses seek completely to prevent the trustees from bearing any liability for any breach of trust; whereas 'limitation of liability' or 'exemption of liability' clauses usually seek only to prevent trustees from being liable for breach of trust for particular acts or omissions. Commonly, however, all of these terms are used as though they are synonymous and concerned with attempting to limit the liability of trustees for breach of trust for identified categories of behaviour, such as negligence or carelessness or mistake. There are also clauses which seek to exclude the trustees' liabilities by extending their powers such that anything which might otherwise be a breach of trust falls under the trustees' impliedly extended powers so as not to constitute a breach of trust at all. Similar in effect are 'duty modification' clauses which alter the extent of the trustees' duties so as effectively to exclude liability for breach of trust. In this discussion the term 'exclusion of liability' clause shall be used to refer to all of these intentions, except where the context requires otherwise.

Technically it is the settlor who provides for the trustees' exclusion of their liabilities when the settlor creates the trust instrument and declares the trust. However, in practice it will be professional trustees who will either be solicitors responsible for drafting the trust instrument who will therefore include an exclusion of liability provision in that instrument, or else they will insist that whoever does draft the trust instrument includes such an exclusion of liability provision.⁴³⁶ Therefore, while the settlor technically grants this immunity from liability for breach of trust to the trustees, in practice it is more likely to be the trustees themselves who ensure that it happens and who dictate the terms on which it takes effect.

Trustees are permitted therefore to elude liability for breach of trust if there is a provision in the trust instrument which excludes their liability for the particular type of breach which is complained of. Liability for breach of trust, as described in Chapter 18 in detail, may otherwise arise on breach of an express provision of the trust instrument, or on breach of some provision of the Trustee Act 2000, or on breach of some obligation imposed by the case law. It is the trust instrument which must exclude liability for breach of trust for present

434 Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241; Taylor v Midland Bank Trust Co (2000) 2 ITELR 439; Bogg v Raper (1998) The Times, 22 April; Wight v Olswang (1999) The Times, 18 May. This approach has also been followed in pensions law, with the following cases all concerned with the interpretation of trustee exemption provisions: Elliott v Pensions Ombudsman [1998] OPLR 21; Woodland-Ferrari v UCL Group Retirement Benefits Scheme [2002] EWHC 1354 (Ch), [2003] Ch 115; Seifert v Pensions Ombudsman [1997] 4 All ER 947; Duckitt v Pensions Ombudsman [2000] OPLR 167; Alexander Forbes Trustee Services Ltd v Halliwell [2003] EWHC 1685 (Ch), [2003] Pens LR 269.

435 Re Duke of Norfolk Settlement Trusts [1982] Ch 61, 77.

436 See, however, Bogg v Raper (1998/99) 1 ITELR 267, 281 – a case in which the trustees were permitted to rely on the exclusion clause which they had drafted. See also Law Commission, 'Trustee Exemption Clauses' (2006), para 2.13.

purposes, as opposed to the various defences to actions of breach of trust which excuse liability as opposed to preventing it arising in the first place. Thus, by way of example, liability based on a negligent breach of trust will only be excluded if the trust instrument is drafted so as to exclude liability for negligent acts by the trustees.

The decision in Armitage v Nurse

The leading case in this area is the decision of the Court of Appeal in *Armitage v Nurse*⁴³⁷ which held that a clause excluding a trustee's personal liability in all situations, including loss caused by the trustee's own gross negligence, except in cases of the trustee's own dishonesty, would be valid.⁴³⁸ Consequently, that trustee would not have been held liable for breach of trust even if he had caused loss to the beneficiaries through his own grossly negligent breach of trust. In that case the claimant was a beneficiary under a trust which held agricultural land among the trust property. The trustees of that settlement were also directors of a company which farmed the land which was held on trust. The value of the land had fallen substantially, it was alleged, on the basis of the negligence of the trustees in their management of it. The trustees, therefore, sought to rely on their exclusion of liability clause to prevent any liability for breach of trust on grounds of this alleged negligence. The Court of Appeal held that the trustees could rely on the exclusion of liability clause. The exclusion of liability clause in that settlement provided that no trustee would be liable for any loss or damage caused to the trust fund unless it was caused by any trustee's 'own actual fraud'. It was held that this exclusion clause would be effective even where it purported to limit that trustee's liability for gross negligence. Millett LJ held that while it was permissible for a trustee to exclude her liability for all defaults including gross negligence, a trustee could not exclude her own liability for breach of trust if that breach of trust was caused by her own fraud or dishonesty. Earlier authorities which had suggested that gross negligence could not be excused were not followed.⁴³⁹ On the Armitage v Nurse approach to this area of law, a trustee exemption clause will be effective in relation to the matters for which it seeks to exclude the trustee's liability for breach of trust, in the words of Millett LJ,⁴⁴⁰ 'no matter how indolent, imprudent, lacking in diligence, negligent or wilful he may have been, so long as he had not acted dishonestly'.

Interpretation of the trust instrument

It was held in Armitage v Nurse that the older case of *Wilkins v Hogg*⁴⁴¹ had established the principle that a settlor was able to limit the liabilities of her trustees if she so wished and provided that such an intention to exclude the trustees' liabilities was set out in the trust instrument.⁴⁴² An exclusion of liability clause will be interpreted so as to give that clause

437 [1998] Ch 241.

438 Under a Guernsey statute, a trustee is entitled to rely on an exclusion of liability clause (in relation to a trust created under that system of law) to exclude liability for her own gross negligence: Spread Trustee Ltd v Hutcheson [2010] WTLR 315, Guernsey Court of Appeal, as affirmed by the majority of the Privy Council [2011] UKPC 13, as considered below.

439 See Pass v Dundas (1880) 43 LT 665, as held by Millett LJ at [1998] Ch 241, 256.

440 Followed in Barracough v Mell [2005] EWHC 3387 (Ch), [2006] WTLR 203, [90].

441 (1861) 31 LJ Ch 41.

442 Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241, 255, where it was required that the settlor make her intention plain.

its natural meaning, but the settlor's intention to exclude the trustees' liabilities must nevertheless be plain.⁴⁴³ The court's role when faced with an exclusion clause is that the court 'must construe the words of the exemption clause in light of the conduct complained of and decide whether liability has been excluded by the terms of the clause. In carrying out this exercise the clause must be construed fairly according to the natural meaning of the words used'.

Therefore, a trustee will not necessarily have her liabilities for breach of trust excluded entirely, unless the appropriate clause in the trust instrument envisaged the exemption of liability for the particular fault complained of.

Dishonesty

A trustee may not exclude her liability for dishonesty, as considered above. The question of what constitutes 'dishonesty' is complex in this context. The meaning of 'dishonesty' in relation to the law on dishonest assistance is considered in detail in section 20.2. In relation to liability for breach of trust, the Court of Appeal in *Walker v Stones*⁴⁴⁴ was asked to consider whether or not a solicitor had been dishonest. The question arose whether or not a solicitor could be dishonest if he did not subjectively appreciate that he was being dishonest because he believed that he was acting in the best interests of the trust. It was held by Nourse LJ that a solicitor could not escape a finding of dishonesty in this fashion if no reasonable solicitor acting as trustee would have considered it to be honest to act in that way. In Armitage v Nurse, Millett LJ held that 'actual fraud', as described in the trust instrument in that case, meant simply 'dishonesty'.⁴⁴⁵ Where trustees will be liable for breach of trust if they act dishonestly, then the appropriate test for identifying dishonesty here has been held by Millett LJ to require '... at the minimum an intention of the part of the trustee to pursue a particular course of action, either knowing that it is contrary to the interests of the beneficiaries or being recklessly indifferent whether it is contrary to their interests or not'.⁴⁴⁶

This subjective approach to dishonesty, based on the defendant's knowledge, is at odds with the objective test for dishonesty set out in *Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan*⁴⁴⁷ as considered in Chapter 20 in relation to dishonest assistance.⁴⁴⁸ It is suggested, in consequence, that the approach in Walker v Stones is to be preferred.

443 Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241, 255. See also Midland Bank Trustee (Jersey) Ltd v Federated Pension Services Ltd [1996] PLR 179, 192; Bogg v Raper (1998/99) 1 ITEL 267, 280; Wight v Olswang (No 2) (1999/2000) 2 ITEL 689 on this point.

444 [2001] QB 902.

445 [1998] Ch 241, 251.

446 This approach is followed in Gwembe Valley Development Co v Koshy [2004] 1 BCLC 131, 170; Newgate Stud Company v Penfold [2004] EWHC 2993 (Ch), [249], per David Richards J. Cf Isaac v Isaac [2004] All ER (D) 71.

447 [1995] 2 AC 378.

448 See section 20.2 generally.

An intentional breach of trust is not necessarily a dishonest breach of trust; wilful default

It has been held that an intentional breach of trust is not necessarily a dishonest breach of trust.⁴⁴⁹ The clearest example of this initially surprising proposition is that in which a trustee deliberately embarks on a course of action which she knows to be in breach of trust but which she genuinely believes will be in the best interests of the beneficiaries ultimately.⁴⁵⁰ It is not dishonest because it is done out of benign motives. This would still be a breach of trust but it would not be dishonest. Consequently, if the trustee's liability were excluded by a provision in the trust instrument, which nevertheless did not exclude liability for dishonesty, then that trustee could rely upon that exclusion of liability clause even if her breach of trust had been deliberate because it would not necessarily be dishonest. So, in *Woodland-Ferrari v UCL Group Retirement Benefits Scheme*⁴⁵¹ two trustees of a pension fund were removed from office having committed breaches of trust which caused the trust a shortfall in excess of £870,000. The trustees claimed to be entitled to rely on an exclusion of liability clause contained in the trust instrument. The question arose as to whether or not there had been a 'fraudulent breach of trust' for the purposes of s 281 of the Insolvency Act 1986. It was found that the word 'fraudulent' in this context would require 'dishonesty'. On the facts, not enough information had been pleaded in detail before the Pensions Ombudsman to disclose a finding of dishonesty, nor even of wilful default. It was found that even though the trustees had caused the trust assets to be invested in investments in which they also had interests, nevertheless it had not been proven that there had been anything 'dishonest' about their breach of trust on the facts. The test for 'dishonesty' combined references to Armitage v Nurse and Walker v Stones. Consequently, the finding of the Pensions Ombudsman that a statutory demand be levied against the trustees was to be set aside because a 'fraudulent breach of trust' had not been proved on the facts. What emerges from this case, nevertheless, is the proposition that a 'deliberate breach of trust' is not necessarily a 'fraudulent' nor a 'dishonest' breach of trust, relying on Armitage v Nurse. Therefore, a trustee's breach of trust may be excluded even if it has been deliberate, but provided that it was not dishonest.

Nevertheless, as for 'wilful default' on the part of a trustee, Millett LJ held in Armitage v Nurse that it may not be excluded by a provision in the trust instrument on the following basis:⁴⁵²

A trustee is said to be accountable on the footing of wilful default when he is accountable not only for money which he has in fact received but also for money which he could with reasonable diligence have received. It is sufficient that the trustee has been guilty of a want of ordinary prudence.⁴⁵³ In the context of a trustee exclusion clause, however, such as s 30 of the Trustee Act 1925, it means a deliberate breach of trust.⁴⁵⁴ The 449 Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241, 250; Taylor v Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd [1999] All ER (D) 831, per Ratte J in the Court of Appeal; Woodland-Ferrari v UCL Group Retirement Benefits Scheme [2002] EWHC 1354 (Ch), [2003] Ch 115.

450 This was the example used by Millett LJ in Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241, 250.

451 [2002] EWHC 1354 (Ch), [2003] Ch 115.

452 [1998] Ch 241 at 252.

453 See eg, Re Chapman, Cocks v Chapman [1896] 2 Ch 763, [1895–9] All ER Rep 1104.

454 Re Vickery, Vickery v Stephens [1931] 1 Ch 572, [1931] All ER Rep 562.

decision has been criticised, but it is in line with earlier authority.⁴⁵⁵ Nothing less than conscious and wilful misconduct is sufficient. The trustee must be—

‘conscious that, in doing the act which is complained of or in omitting to do the act which it said he ought to have done, he is committing a breach of his duty, or is recklessly careless whether it is a breach of his duty or not’.⁴⁵⁶

A trustee who is guilty of such conduct either consciously takes a risk that loss will result, or is recklessly indifferent whether it will or not. If the risk eventuates he is personally liable. But if he consciously takes the risk in good faith and with the best intentions, honestly believing that the risk is one which ought to be taken in the interests of the beneficiaries, there is no reason why he should not be protected by an exemption clause which excludes liability for wilful default.

Lord Clarke agreed in Spread Trustee Company Ltd v Hutcheson with the argument that under English law a trustee’s liability cannot be excused for wilful default.⁴⁵⁷

Cases after Armitage v Nurse

The Armitage v Nurse approach has been approved in four subsequent cases. First, in *Bogg v Raper*⁴⁵⁸ the Court of Appeal considered a claim that trustees had failed to exercise sufficient control over the trust property which comprised a controlling shareholding in a private limited company. In such circumstances trustees would ordinarily be required to ensure that they exercised sufficient scrutiny of the company’s activities because the shareholding granted them control enough to do so. The trust instrument, however, excluded the trustees’ liability for ‘any loss’ provided that they acted in good faith. The court held that the exclusion of liability clause meant that the trustees bore no liability for breach of trust in this context. The Court of Appeal also rejected an argument to the effect that the trustees, being the solicitors and accountants to the trust, should not be permitted to rely on language in the trust instrument which they had drafted and included. It was held that this was not a benefit conferred on the trustees but rather simply defined the extent of their liabilities.⁴⁵⁹

Secondly, *Wight v Olswang (No 2)*⁴⁶⁰ followed the underlying principle in Armitage v Nurse in theory. However on the precise facts of that case there were two clauses which were contradictory. One of those clauses purported to exclude the trustees’ liabilities for breach of trust, whereas the other did not. It was held that the trustees could not rely on the purported exemption of liability provision because it was not clear that it disclosed an 455 See Lewis v Great Western Rly Co (1877) 3 QBD 195, [1874–80] All ER Rep Ext 1793, Re Trusts of Leeds City Brewery Ltd’s Debenture Stock Trust Deed, Leeds City Brewery Ltd v Platts [1925] Ch 532n, and Re City Equitable Fire Insurance Co Ltd [1925] Ch 407, [1924] All ER Rep 485.

456 Re Vickery, Vickery v Stephens [1931] 1 Ch 572 at 583, [1931] All ER Rep 562 at 567], per Maugham J.

457 [2011] UKPC 13, [2012] 1 All ER 251, at [55].

458 (1998/99) 1 ITELR 267.

459 It has been suggested that, not only did this confer a benefit by permitting the trustees to exclude themselves from liability in a manner which they had engineered in advance, but also that this constituted a benefit in that it saved the trustees the insurance premiums necessary to protect themselves against liability otherwise: see Hayton and Mitchell, 2005, 9–311.

460 (1999/2000) 2 ITELR 689.

intention on the part of the settlor, when read with the other clause, to exclude their liabilities in the manner for which they contended. Therefore, while no doubt is cast on the Armitage v Nurse principle in the abstract, it may not be relied upon if it is not clear that the settlor intended to exclude the trustees' liability for breach of trust in the relevant circumstances.

Thirdly, in *Barraclough v Mell*⁴⁶¹ there was a clause in a will trust which provided that the trustee's liability for breach of trust was to be excluded 'unless the same shall have happened through his own personal act done by him either with the knowledge that it was wrongful or without any belief that it was rightful and not caring whether or not it was wrongful'. This case therefore addresses a lacuna in the law as described by Millett LJ in Armitage v Nurse. Strictly speaking, on the basis that Millett LJ in Armitage v Nurse permitted exclusion of liability for negligence but not for dishonesty, it was therefore unclear whether or not a breach of trust caused by the trustee's own recklessness – falling somewhere between gross negligence and dishonesty, it is suggested – could be excluded by an exclusion of liability clause in the trust instrument. This exemption of liability provision in Barraclough v Mell considers just such a provision based on recklessness in that the trustee need not care whether or not the breach was wrongful. Judge Behrens QC appeared to accept that this provision would be enforceable, without any point being taken on whether or not 'recklessness' in general terms should be considered to fall on the permissible or impermissible exemption clause side of the line. Instead Judge Behrens QC proceeded on the evidence to consider whether or not the trustee had acted wrongfully in making payments out of the trust fund which she was not authorised to make under the terms of the trust. It was found that the trustee had not known of the wrongfulness of her actions and that she had acted immediately to seek to recover the money when the true nature of her actions was brought to her attention: therefore, it was found that she was entitled to rely on the exclusion of liability provision and so was not liable for breach of trust.

It is respectfully suggested that this sort of approach to exclusion of trustees' liability is precisely the sort of approach which will lead trustees to be lazy in working out the extent of their powers and the nature of their actions: if trustees know that they will not be liable in any event (whether they understand the nature of their actions or not) then they are unlikely to be suitably diligent in working out the nature of their duties. Why go to the effort of finding out if you will not be liable in any event? It is, to quote concepts from Chapter 18 on breach of trust, likely to be an opiate on the diligence of the trustees.⁴⁶²

Fourthly, in *Baker v JE Clark & Co (Transport) UK Ltd*⁴⁶³ a widow brought a claim against a trustee of a company pension scheme for failing to make a payment out of the trust after her husband, who was an employee of the company, had died. The trust instrument contained an exclusion of liability provision to the effect that:

None of the trustees shall be liable for the consequence of any mistake or forgetfulness . . . or for breach of duty or trust whatsoever, whether by commission or omission unless it shall be proved to be made, given, done or omitted in personal conscious or bad faith of the trustees or any of them.

461 [2005] EWHC 3387 (Ch), [2006] WTLR 203.

462 Sentiments expressed in Bahin v Hughes (1886) 31 Ch D 390, at 398, per Frey LJ. See section 18.2.4.

463 [2006] EWCA Civ 464.

Thus, the exclusion of the trustees' liability was intended to be total, except for breaches of trust committed knowingly in bad faith. On the facts it was not proved that the trustee had acted in bad faith. Therefore, it was held that the trustee was entitled to rely on the exemption clause and therefore bore no liability for breach of trust. The trustee had not brought the exemption of liability clause to the attention of the beneficiaries when they had contributed to the pension fund (as settlors, therefore) but that was not considered by the Court of Appeal to be any objection to the effectiveness of the exemption of liability clause.⁴⁶⁴

Gross negligence in Spread Trustee Company Ltd v Hutcheson

The Privy Council has considered the law relating to the exclusion of liability of trustees in an appeal from Guernsey in Spread Trustee Company Ltd v Hutcheson.⁴⁶⁵ A statute enacted in 1989 in Guernsey permitted liability to be excluded for negligence and gross negligence but not for fraud nor for wilful default; uninterestingly for our purposes this case considered the law in Guernsey before and after that statute came into effect, but interestingly with a consideration of the English law position and its possible effect as an aid to the interpretation of the law in Guernsey. It was accepted by Lord Clarke (speaking for the majority) that there were instances in which English law does differentiate between ordinary negligence and 'gross negligence',⁴⁶⁶ although Millett LJ in Armitage v Nurse had considered that to be only a difference of degree (i.e. slightly negligent running through to very negligent) as opposed to a qualitative difference between two different types of negligence.⁴⁶⁷ Nevertheless, it was accepted that under English law, since Armitage v Nurse certainly, liability could be excluded for gross negligence.⁴⁶⁸

Lady Hale in a spirited dissenting speech noted that the Supreme Court has yet to have the opportunity to consider the judgment of Millett LJ in Armitage v Nurse and also doubted that the law in England and Wales (let alone Scots law, which was also in issue in that appeal) had always been clear about the treatment of grossly negligent breaches of trust. Her ladyship made the point that cases such as *Re City Fire and Equitable Insurance*⁴⁶⁹ and *Re Trusts of Leeds City Brewery Debenture*⁴⁷⁰ did not in fact consider the point whether or not trustees were entitled to exclude their liabilities. Her ladyship referred to arguments in Parliament relating to the Trustee Act 2000 (on investment of trusts, discussed in Chapter 9) that professional trustees should bear a different test from other trustees (to the effect that professional trustees seeking to exclude their liability should be subject to the same test as for contractual exclusion of liability clauses under the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977).⁴⁷¹ However, it is 464 A further point was alluded to by Tuckey LJ, which impacts on the discussion at para 21.2.4 concerning the overlap between contract law and trusts law which, by extrapolation, suggests that even if a trust were to be interpreted as being based on the principles of contract law then trustee exemption clauses required by the trustees could be ineffective by dint of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977.

465 [2011] UKPC 13, [2012] 1 All ER 251. See generally Matthews, 1989, which is referred to extensively by the Privy Council.

466 See [2011] UKPC 13, [2012] 1 All ER 251, at [50].

467 [1998] Ch 241 at 253–4.

468 Cf Matthews, 1989 and Midland Bank Trust Co (Jersey) Ltd v Federated Pension Services [1995] JLR 352.

469 [1925] Ch 407.

470 [1925] Ch 532n.

471 [2011] UKPC 13, [2012] 1 All ER 251, at [136].

Lord Kerr who really hit the nail on the head in his dissenting judgment when his Lordship held the following:

If, as I suggested at the beginning of this judgment, the placing of reliance on a responsible person to manage property so as to promote the interests of the beneficiaries of a trust is central to the concept of trusteeship, denying trustees the opportunity to avoid liability for their gross negligence seems to be entirely in keeping with that essential aim.⁴⁷²

A trustee ought not to be able to exclude liability for gross negligence. A trustee is a fiduciary who is required to act selflessly in the interests of her beneficiaries, or to take proper advice where that is not otherwise possible. It is not too high a standard to set for that person to avoid grossly negligent performances of those duties. It is not being said that that person cannot still avoid liability for being negligent or careless; all that is being suggested is that when that negligence is so severe as to be ‘gross’, then liability for it ought not to be excluded by the trust instrument. Lord Kerr pointed out that the claimant in Armitage v Nurse was a 17-year-old girl, Paula, something which otherwise escapes our notice. Professional trustees who were expected to care for Paula’s remainder interest in land were entitled to escape liability for their grossly negligent acts, provided that they had not been dishonest in so doing. In the meantime they would have charged their fees to the trust while at the same time they would have been shielded from any liability for their gross carelessness by a provision placed in the trust instrument for their sole benefit by other professionals, the solicitors who drafted that trust instrument. There is something very wrong in this. The decision in Armitage v Nurse is both an opiate on the professionalism of trustees and an opiate on their consciences.

The nature of trustees’ obligations if they are limited by exclusion clauses

Trustees’ exclusion of liability clauses raise important questions as to the nature of the obligations of a trustee in general terms. There are two ostensibly competing lines of authority. The first line of authority, in short, holds that any express provision in a trust deed, or some collateral contract, which purports to limit the liability of the trustees will be given full force and effect by the courts.⁴⁷³ The most important recent case in this line is that of *Armitage v Nurse*⁴⁷⁴ (decided before the enactment of the Trustee Act 2000).⁴⁷⁵ In explaining the limit of the trustee’s obligations, Millett LJ had the following to say:

[T]here is an irreducible core of obligations owed by the trustees to the beneficiaries and enforceable by them which is fundamental to the concept of a trust. If the beneficiaries have no rights enforceable against the trustees there are no trusts. But I do not accept the further submission that their core obligations include the duties of skill and care, prudence and diligence. The duty of trustees to perform the trusts honestly and in good

472 Ibid., at [180].

473 Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241; Taylor v Midland Bank Trust Co (2000) 2 ITELR 439; Bogg v Raper (1998) The Times, 22 April; Wight v Olswang (1999) The Times, 18 May.

474 [1998] Ch 241, [1997] 2 All ER 705: adopting the language of DJ Hayton.

475 Considered in para 9.3 below.

faith for the benefit of the beneficiaries is the minimum necessary to give substance to the trusts, but in my opinion it is sufficient . . . a trustee who relied on the presence of a trustee exemption clause to justify what he proposed to do would thereby lose its protection: he would be acting recklessly in the proper sense of the term.

His Lordship acknowledged the notion that there is a minimum content beneath which the office held is not the office of a trustee. Nevertheless, a trustee who excludes her liability for all loss caused by breach of trust (except losses caused by her own actual fraud) will not be subject to any liability for breach of trust. Thus, while it is accepted that one does not have an arrangement which can properly be defined as being a trust if the obligations imposed on the fiduciary are too slight, almost all of the liabilities ordinarily associated with being a trustee can be excluded. The result would be that, in practice, a trustee with the protection of an exclusion of liability of clause will face almost no liabilities for breach of trust, provided she is not actually dishonest. However, merely requiring someone not to be dishonest does not put too much strain on their conscience. Nor does it make it seem as though there is anything very special about a trust.

The question of course remains: what is the minimum content beneath which one will not be a trustee at all? Denying the existence of any duty of care and skill is at odds with the general duty of care provided in s 1(1) of the Trustee Act 2000 (enacted after the decision of the Court of Appeal in Armitage v Nurse) which requires that a trustee ‘must exercise such care and skill as is reasonable in the circumstances’, thus imposing a partial duty to take care and to exercise skill if that provision is not expressly excluded in the trust instrument. Nevertheless, the approach of the court in Armitage v Nurse was to pitch that minimum content at merely requiring the trustee to act honestly; the court would have held differently if the trustees had acted dishonestly or fraudulently because in such a situation the exclusion clause would have had no effect. To demonstrate that there has been fraud would be difficult to prove in a situation in which the trustee did not take any direct, personal benefit.⁴⁷⁶ The duties of acting honestly and in good faith are seemingly not capable of being excluded. By way of further example, the trustees’ duty to account⁴⁷⁷ to the beneficiaries cannot be excluded by the trust instrument because it is one of the core obligations of trusteeship.⁴⁷⁸

The test for dishonesty which was applied by Millett LJ required:

at the minimum an intention of the part of the trustee to pursue a particular course of action, either knowing that it is contrary to the interests of the beneficiaries or being recklessly indifferent whether it is contrary to their interests or not.⁴⁷⁹

This is, it is suggested, a predominantly subjective approach to dishonesty, being based on the defendant’s knowledge, is at odds with the objective test for dishonesty set out in Royal 476 This issue is considered at para 9.5.2 below in relation to investment of trust funds.

477 As considered in para 8.4.8 above. See Thomas and Hudson, 2004, 358, para 10.130.

478 Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241, 253, per Millett LJ.

479 This approach is followed in Gwembe Valley Development Co v Koshy [2004] 1 BCLC 131, 170; Newgate Stud Company v Penfold [2004] EWHC 2993 (Ch), [249], per David Richards J. Cf Isaac v Isaac [2004] All ER (D) 71.

*Brunei Airlines v Tan*⁴⁸⁰ as considered in Chapter 20.⁴⁸¹ The weakness with Millett LJ's approach is that one can escape liability simply by claiming that subjectively you see nothing wrong in what you have done.

Nevertheless, in general terms, to find that the office of trusteeship equates to a requirement merely of acting honestly and of rendering accounts does not appear to make the office of trustee different in quality from many other, non-fiduciary relationships. Millett LJ even adopted the words of Sir Nathaniel Lindley MR to the effect that as 'my old master, the late Selwyn LJ, used to say "The main duty of a trustee is to commit judicious breaches of trust"'.⁴⁸² That is, not to get caught, not to commit breaches for which liability is not excluded, and not to commit breaches which will cause loss. The effect of these dicta is that the trustees' duties are not to avoid breaches of trust but rather a trustee will still be obeying the letter of the law in performing her duties if she only commits breaches of trust which are excused within the precise terms of her trusteeship. In truth, what the Court of Appeal was doing in Armitage v Nurse was recognising the preference for professional trustees to be able to restrict their liabilities by means of careful drafting of the trust instrument. The exclusion clause in that case was upheld as being valid because to have done otherwise might be to rob professional trustees of the protection of wide-ranging exclusion clauses in the future with the result that they may refuse to act as trustees. The principal objection to this approach is that the fiduciary nature of the trust relationship is thus transformed into something akin to a merely contractual relationship between settlor and trustee. If exclusion clauses can displace many of the trustee's obligations to act in the utmost good faith, not to permit conflicts of interest, and to invest as though managing the property of someone for whom the trustee felt morally bound to provide, then the nature of trusteeship fails to have any particular resonance. It is like being a party to an ordinary contract and not like being someone who is subject to fiduciary duties.

More specifically, the decision in *Walker v Stones*⁴⁸³ took a subtly but significantly (I would suggest) different tack to the decision in Armitage v Nurse. The issue in Armitage v Nurse, strictly put, was to decide whether or not the trustees had acted dishonestly within the meaning of the exclusion clause in that case. A similar provision was contained in the trust deed in Walker v Stones. The trustees of a discretionary trust in this case, who were solicitors, were exempted from all liability except 'wilful fraud or dishonesty'. The Court of Appeal in Walker v Stones took the view that the proper test to be applied in deciding whether or not a trustee had acted dishonestly was that applied by the Privy Council in *Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan*⁴⁸⁴ to the effect that one should consider whether or not the trustee had acted as an honest trustee would have acted in the circumstances. The consequences of such a test is that the court does not look to see whether or not the trustee has acted deceitfully, but rather considers the objective notion of whether she failed to do what an honest person

480 [1995] 2 AC 378.

481 See section 20.2 generally.

482 [1998] Ch 241, 250, [1997] 2 All ER 705, 709, quoting Perrins v Bellamy [1899] 1 Ch 797, 798, per Sir Nathaniel Lindley MR.

483 [2001] QB 902. This case has been doubted in relation to its findings on the issue of reflected loss in Gardner v Parker [2004] BCLC 554 in the wake of the decision of the House of Lords in Johnson v Gore-Wood [2002] AC 1, [2001] 1 All ER 481, Giles v Rind [2002] 4 All ER 977, [2003] 1 BCLC 1.

484 [1995] 2 AC 378. See now also Twinsectra v Yardley [2002] 2 WLR 802, [2002] 2 All ER 377.

would have done. This latter, objective approach is far broader than asking the question whether or not the trustee knew that she was being deceitful. In relation specifically to exclusion of liability clauses, the court in Walker v Stones was of the view that if the trustee took the view unreasonably that her actions were honest then the exclusion clause could not be relied upon. Therefore, the notion of honesty which was bound up in the precise terms of these particular exclusion clauses is broadened here again to make trustees liable for any breach of their duties which they could not reasonably have considered to be honest exercises of their duties. Consequently, it was not open to the solicitors acting as trustees in that case to argue that they did not realise that their behaviour would have been considered to have been dishonest by an objective person nor that they considered their actions (though objectively dishonest) to have been in the interests of the beneficiaries.

The issue could be considered in the following manner. The trustee would argue that she only agreed to act as a trustee on the basis that her liability was limited to the extent of the exclusion of liability clause. Therefore, the trustee would not be acting in bad conscience by insisting that she should not be liable for any default beyond that specified in the exclusion of liability clause because she did not agree to be bound by anything else. Thus, on the one hand it could be said on behalf of the trustees that they did not agree to act as trustees unless their liabilities were excluded by the trust instrument. Alternatively, it might be said that if someone agrees to act as a trustee then she must be taken to accept the general obligations of good conscience and good management required of a trustee and therefore that to allow extensive exclusion clauses to be effective subverts the necessary stringency of the office of trustee. Thus, on the other hand, it could be argued that acting as a trustee should be deemed necessarily to incorporate a range of obligations which include liability to account for breach of trust which cannot be excluded at all if the obligations which are owed by trustees are to remain special and unique to the particular office of being a trustee. There is no perfect answer to this debate: either the trustees escape liability and impose a loss on the beneficiaries, or the trustees are forced to bear liabilities which they had not agreed to bear.

This issue is considered further in Chapter 21.⁴⁸⁵

Statutory restrictions on limitation of liability

There are important categories of trustee who are not permitted to exclude their liabilities for breach of trust. The restrictions on exclusion of liability are all provided for by statute as part of public policy. So, pension fund trustees are not permitted to exclude their liabilities;⁴⁸⁶ trustees of unit trusts are not permitted to exclude their liabilities;⁴⁸⁷ and trustees of debenture trusts are not permitted to exclude their liabilities.⁴⁸⁸

The oddity of the commercial trusts

It seems to me that what Millett LJ was seeking to do in Armitage v Nurse, inter alia, was to make the trust more attractive to commercial people. More specifically, it seems that Millett

485 See para 21.2.4.

486 Pensions Act 1995, s 33.

487 Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, s 253.

488 Companies Act 2006, s 750.

LJ was seeking to make the office of trustee more attractive to commercial, professional people who will wish to act as trustee but who will not want to assume the very broad liabilities which ordinarily come with that office. In consequence, to make trusts law seem commercially astute, Millett LJ held that trustees should be able to restrict their liabilities by insisting on the inclusion of an express provision to that effect in the trust instrument – an approach which was approved of expressly in Bogg v Raper, as considered above. However, while the trusts case law is seeking to make itself appear to be more commercial, the most commercial aspects of financial law are moving in the opposite direction. As set out in the immediately preceding section there are three categories of trustees, who are involved in the most advanced investment structures in the modern economy, who are not permitted to exclude their liabilities. They are not permitted to exclude their liabilities because public policy recognises that the imposition of stringent fiduciary duties on trustees, including full liability for breach of trust, is essential if those trustees are to be held in check and required to act in the most professional manner possible. This, it is suggested, is a standard of behaviour which should be required of all trustees in all circumstances.

The paradox in the law on exemption clauses

The present organisation of the law on trustee exemption clauses contains one tremendous paradox, namely that the more professional a trustee is, the more likely she is to have a term included in the trust instrument which governs her actions so as to exclude her liability when she acts negligently in the discharge of her fiduciary duties; whereas, a non-professional trustee who would probably not know that such a provision could be included in a trust instrument would therefore be held fully liable for breach of trust if she causes some loss to the trust despite never having held herself out as being a professional trustee in the first place. Thus, the qualified and experienced professional trustee escapes liability for causing loss completely, whereas the non-qualified and inexperienced trustee will bear full liability. There is something intuitively wrong with that, I would suggest.

The Law Commission's reform proposals

The Law Commission has made proposals for an extra-statutory change to the law dealing with the exclusion of trustees' liabilities in its paper 'Trustee Exemption Clauses'.⁴⁸⁹ The somewhat toothless proposal that was made in this paper was to avoid legislation imposing duties on trustees and instead to rely on a statement of best practice whereby professional trustees should be required to bring any exclusion clause to the attention of the settlor at the time of creating the trust and to ensure that the settlor understands its effect. Thus, a welcome distinction is drawn between professional and non-professional trustees. However, there is no meaningful obligation – certainly no legal obligation – to be placed on trustees to control their use of exclusion clauses.

489 Law Commission, Trustee Exemption Clauses, Law Com No 301 (Cmnd 6874).

8.5.2 Disclaimer, release and extinguishment of powers

Disclaimer

Once a person has accepted the office of trustee, any fiduciary power such as the office of trustee may be disclaimed in accordance with s 156 of the Law of Property Act 1925. Such a disclaimer must be a complete disclaimer and may not simply disclaim a part of the power.⁴⁹⁰ The fiduciary is not capable of exercising that power once it has been disclaimed. Alternatively, the beneficiaries could agree by deed⁴⁹¹ to release the trustee from her obligations in whole or in part.⁴⁹²

Release

In circumstances in which the beneficiaries agree formally to release the trustee from any liability, the equitable doctrine of release will operate so as to protect that trustee from any liability arising from her breach of trust.⁴⁹³ However, that does not prevent the beneficiaries from seeking equitable relief in respect of any factor which was not made known to them at the time of granting the release or which arises outside the terms of that release.⁴⁹⁴ Therefore, in a situation in which employees signed a release form in respect of any breach of duty by their employer, it was held that this would not prevent a claim for relief in relation to any stigma caused to their careers when it subsequently emerged that their employer bank had been dealing dishonestly.⁴⁹⁵

8.6 CONTROL OF THE TRUSTEES

The trustees may be controlled by the beneficiaries by means of an application to the court. The court has an inherent jurisdiction to make orders in relation to the administration of a trust. The court may make orders by way variously of (a) giving directions, (b) assuming administrative control, (c) judicial review (in a private law sense) of the trustees' actions, or (d) setting aside any decision of a trustee made by taking into account irrelevant considerations or failing to take into account relevant considerations.

8.6.1 Control of the trustees by the beneficiaries

This section considers the ways in which beneficiaries are able to exert control over the administration of the trust, generally by application to the court. It should be recalled that the 490 Re Eyre (1883) 49 LT 259; Saul v Pattinson (1886) 34 WR 561; Re Lord and Fullerton's Contract [1986] 1 Ch 228, 233.

491 Law of Property Act 1925, s 155(1).

492 Conveyancing Act 1881, s 52. Cf Weller v Kerr (1866) LR 1 Sc&D 11, whereby a power coupled with a trust or a collateral power could not be released in this fashion under the general law, although this position was reversed by the Law of Property Act 1925, s 155.

493 Lyall v Edwards (1861) 6 H & N 337; 158 ER 139; Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England v North Eastern Railway Co (1877) 4 Ch D 845; Turner v Turner (1880) 14 Ch D 829.

494 BCCI v Ali [2000] 3 All ER 51.

495 Ibid. Cf Malik v BCCI [1997] 3 All ER 1.

logic of the law of express trusts is that there must be some person in the role of beneficiary in whose favour the court can decree performance of the trust.⁴⁹⁶ Therefore, it is of the essence of a trust that the beneficiaries are able to petition the court in relation to the actions or omissions of trustees⁴⁹⁷ and that the court has an inherent jurisdiction to supervise the administration of a trust.⁴⁹⁸ This right to petition the court rests with objects of a discretionary trust as much as beneficiaries with vested rights under a bare trust.⁴⁹⁹ Typically, control will be exercised by petition to the court seeking a declaration as to the manner in which the trustees are required to act. The most complete form of control for absolutely entitled, sui juris beneficiaries acting together is that they are able to terminate the trust by directing that the trustees deliver the trust property to them.⁵⁰⁰

What is less clear is the basis on which the trustees can be controlled during the life of the trust, that is, without calling for the termination of the trust by delivery of the property to the beneficiaries. It is clear that the trustee cannot decide the terms of the trust.⁵⁰¹ Therefore, the trustee is necessarily bound by the terms of the trust, entitling the beneficiary to petition the court to have the trust property administered in accordance with the terms of the trust. In Re Brockbank,⁵⁰² it was held that where the court is unable to interfere in the selection of trustees, the beneficiaries are similarly unable to act. The case of *Tempest v Lord Camoys*⁵⁰³ illustrates the principle that the court will not interfere in the appointment of a new trustee, provided that is done in accordance with the terms of the trust and not in contravention of public policy. Furthermore, it is not clear how this interacts with the s 26(3) of the Law of Property Act 1925 duty to consult with beneficiaries under a trust for sale, now under s 11 of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996.

8.6.2 Control of the trustees by the court

The mode of control of the trustees by the court is dependent on the nature of the power

The extent of the court's control of the trustees will depend upon the precise nature of the trust, and whether the power given to the trustee is a personal power or a fiduciary power. Trustees are required to consider the exercise of trust powers: they cannot exercise them entirely capriciously.⁵⁰⁴ A trustee can act however she likes where it is a personal power.⁵⁰⁵ In this latter circumstance, the court will not interfere with the bona fide exercise of the power. Where trustees have a power of appointment, they are required to consider the exercise of their discretion and the range of the objects of their power.⁵⁰⁶ The nature of the trustees' general duties under the various forms of power were considered in detail in section 3.5 above.

496 Morice v Bishop of Durham (1805) 10 Ves 522.

497 Ibid. See section 4.2 above.

498 Schmidt v Rosewood Trust Ltd [2003] 2 WLR 1442.

499 See, eg, Re Ralli's WT [1964] 2 WLR 144.

500 Saunders v Vautier (1841) 4 Beav 115.

501 Re Brooks' ST [1939] 1 Ch 993.

502 [1948] 1 All ER 287.

503 (1882) 21 Ch D 571.

504 Re Hay's ST [1981] 3 All ER 786.

505 Ibid.

506 Ibid; Turner v Turner (1978) 122 SJ 696, CA.

Directions

Trustees are entitled at any stage to petition the court for guidance as to the proper performance of their duties. Trustees are entitled to seek guidance as to the nature and extent of their duties,⁵⁰⁷ as to the effect of trust documents,⁵⁰⁸ and generally to ensure that they do not commit a breach of trust.⁵⁰⁹ The Civil Procedure Rules contains the means for making such an application in Part 64.⁵¹⁰ Equally, the beneficiaries may make an application to prevent or require the doing of some act.⁵¹¹

Administration

When the functioning of the trust has become impossible or the disputes between the parties have reached an insurmountable obstacle, an application may be made to the court asking the court to direct the proper administration of the trust.⁵¹² The court in such a circumstance may make an order for the replacement of some or all of the trustees or make a declaration as to the probity of the course of action which some or all of the trustees had proposed to take.⁵¹³

*Judicial review of trustees' actions*⁵¹⁴

Trustees have obligations under trusts and they may also have a range of discretionary trust or fiduciary mere powers. Any failure to perform an obligation under a trust may be the subject of an action for breach of trust if there is any loss or an application for directions if no loss is suffered. As to powers, a further question may arise as to the beneficiaries' rights to challenge the exercise of a power. The question then arises as to the extent to which the court will consider itself empowered to intervene to compel the exercise of some power, or alternatively to declare that a decision has been reached inappropriately. It was stated by Lord Truro in *Re Beloved Wilkes's Charity*⁵¹⁵ that:

the duty of supervision on the part of the Court will thus be confined to the question of the honesty, integrity, and fairness with which the deliberation has been conducted, and will not be extended to the accuracy of the conclusion arrived at, except in particular cases.

Therefore, the form of judicial review at issue here is concerned with the honesty, integrity and fairness of the trustees' decisions or actions, but will not revisit the content of any such decision. In other words, it is for the trustees to make their own decisions about the management 507 Re Buckton [1907] 2 Ch 406, 414; McDonald v Horn [1995] 1 All ER 961, 970. A protector of a trust may make a similar application: Re Omar Family Trust [2000] WTLR 713; Re Hare Trust (2001) 4 ITELR 288, as may a beneficiary.

508 Re Berens [1888] WN 95; Re Fremie's Contract [1895] 2 Ch 256.

509 Ibid.

510 CPR Pt 64, r 64.2(1).

511 Suffolk v Lawrence (1884) 32 WR 899.

512 Talbot v Earl of Radnor (1834) 3 My & K 252; Re Gyhon (1885) 29 Ch D 834; Re Blake (1885) 29 Ch D 913.

513 See generally Re Cabburn (1882) 46 LT 848.

514 In general terms, see Thomas and Hudson, 2004, Chapter 20.

515 (1851) 3 Mac & G 440, 448.

of the trust (always provided that there has been no breach of trust), whereas the court will only consider the probity of such decisions in relation to honesty, integrity and fairness.

Trustees also owe a large number of obligations under general trusts law beyond the limitations of the basis for judicial review of trustees' actions set out immediately above. It may be, therefore, that the breach of any such principle may give rise to such a judicial review. For example, in general terms, trustees are required to act prudently,⁵¹⁶ and also to exercise their powers in a responsible manner according to the purpose of that power.⁵¹⁷ So, if a trustee of a discretionary trust chose to advance the whole of the income from a trust fund to an object of the trust to whom she was engaged to be married so that they could pay for improvements to their home, then the question would arise whether or not the trustee had acted honestly and it would be open to the other objects of the discretionary trust to seek a judicial review of that trustee's decisions. Alternatively, if the trustee had exercised her power so as to advance the whole of the trust income equally between the objects of a discretionary trust, while excluding herself despite being one of the objects of the trust, then there would be no suggestion that a question as to her honesty, integrity or fairness arose. Thus, judicial review is limited to circumstances in which an issue of honesty, integrity or fairness would arise.

In the ordinary exercise of a discretionary trust power it has been held that the court will not interfere with or review the accuracy of a decision in relation to a power which has been exercised in good faith.⁵¹⁸ It has been held, exceptionally, that a power (which is not expressed to be uncontrollable in a trust instrument) may be interfered with by the court even if there has not been any bad faith: for example, where applications of trust property for the maintenance of children by means of their education were deemed by the court not to be in the beneficiaries' best interests.⁵¹⁹ It seems that the courts are more inclined to interfere with the trustees' actions where the beneficiaries are children and the powers being exercised are for the maintenance of such children, particularly where the trustees have acted capriciously in the exercise of their powers,⁵²⁰ or have acted on the basis of manifestly improper reasons.⁵²¹ More generally, courts have interfered with a trustees' discretions in circumstances in which the trustees have failed to examine the contents of deeds before signing them,⁵²² or have acted in a way which was so unreasonable as to appear vexatious.⁵²³ Where a power of appointment was expressly specified to be exercisable only before a given date, the court would not interfere with the trustees' power so as to force them to exercise it given that it was a mere power of appointment drafted in permissive form.⁵²⁴ Therefore, there had not 516 Learoyd v Whiteley (1887) 12 App Cas 727; Eaton v Buchanan [1911] AC 253.

517 McPhail v Doulton [1971] AC 424, 449, per Lord Wilberforce.

518 Gisborne v Gisborne (1877) 2 App Cas 300, 305, per Lord Cairns; Re Schneider (1906) 22 TLR 223, 226, per Warrington J. In circumstances in which the trustees' discretionary powers are expressed to be 'absolute' powers, there is a difficult question as to whether or not those powers are justiciable at all. An absolute power, assuming it to be a fiduciary power and not a personal power, cannot in principle be beyond the control of the court. If the power-holder is a fiduciary, then those obligations considered above in section 8.3, requiring that the trustees refrain from conflicts of interest and so forth, must necessarily be capable of being applied by the court.

519 Tabor v Brooks (1878) 10 Ch D 273, per Malins VC. Cf, however, Re Schneider (1906) 22 TLR 223.

520 Re Hodges (1878) 7 Ch D 754; Tabor v Brooks (1878) 10 Ch D 273.

521 Klug v Klug [1918] 2 Ch 67.

522 Turner v Turner (1978) 122 SJ 696.

523 Re Chapman (1895) 72 LT 66.

524 Breadner v Granville-Grossman [2001] Ch 523; applying Cooper v Martin (1867) LR 3 Ch App 47 and Re Hastings-Bass [1975] Ch 25, CA.

been any unconscionable act simply in the trustees failing to exercise that power, nor could any proceedings be begun on the basis of breach of trust on this basis: in either case, the trustees were permitted not to exercise that power.

Where a company has a power⁵²⁵ to distribute the surplus of an employee pension fund (where that fund is actually held by a trust company), the company has a fiduciary duty which governs the manner in which it distributes the proceeds of that pension fund.⁵²⁶ This power is incapable of review by the court unless it is exercised capriciously or outside the scope of the trust.⁵²⁷ In Mettoy Pension Fund Trustees Ltd v Evans,⁵²⁸ because the power was held to be a fiduciary power, it was held that it could not be released or ignored by the fiduciary. This meant that the company was always trustee of that power and that it had no beneficial interest in the fund. Therefore, when the company went into insolvency, the liquidator could not take possession of the contents of the trust fund and use it to pay off ordinary creditors of the company because the employee-contributors to the fund were not volunteers but rather beneficiaries under a trust.⁵²⁹

Trustees must give informed consideration to the exercise of their discretion. For example, the trustees may need to have reference to actuarial principles to come to such a decision.⁵³⁰ The exercise of the decision of the trustees in *Stannard v Fisons*⁵³¹ was found by Dillon LJ to be capable of review where such knowledge ‘might materially have affected the trustees’ decision’. One further argument in this context would be that a beneficiary is entitled to see documents with reference to the trust as part of the trustee’s duty to account to the beneficiary of the trust, as considered above.

8.6.3 Setting aside trustees’ decisions for taking into account irrelevant considerations or for failing to take into account relevant considerations

The trustees’ decisions may be set aside if they have taken into account irrelevant considerations or if they have failed to take into account relevant considerations. This part of the courts’ armoury, known as the principle in Re Hastings-Bass,⁵³² was considered in detail at para 8.3.13 above. It is suggested that, as well as being a part of the trustees’ general duties, it may also be thought of as a way in which the beneficiaries, through the courts, can police the manner in which the trustees exercise their powers. Broadly put, the courts’ power is a power to set aside trustees’ decisions for taking into account irrelevant considerations or for failing to take into account relevant considerations. The complexities associated with this analysis are considered at para 8.3.13 as aforesaid.

525 Whether a fiduciary mere power or a power under a discretionary trust.

526 McPhail v Doulton [1970] 2 WLR 1110, per Lord Wilberforce; Mettoy Pensions Fund [1990] 1 WLR 1587.

527 Mettoy Pensions Fund [1990] 1 WLR 1587, per Warner J.

528 Ibid.

529 See Chapter 24 on this issue.

530 Stannard v Fisons [1992] IRLR 27.

531 Ibid.

532 Re Hastings-Bass [1975] Ch 25.

The investment of trusts

9.1 THE USE OF TRUSTS AS INVESTMENT VEHICLES	426
9.1.1 The scope of this chapter	426
9.1.2 The utility of private trusts for investment purposes	427
9.2 INTRODUCTION TO THE PRINCIPLES OF THE TRUSTEE ACT 2000	428
9.2.1 The scope of the Trustee Act 2000	428
9.2.2 The meaning of ‘trustee’ in this context	429
9.2.3 The repeal of the Trustee Investment Act 1961	429
9.2.4 A map of the law on the investment of trusts	430
9.3 THE GENERAL POWER OF INVESTMENT	433
9.3.1 The scope of the general power of investment	433
9.3.2 The meaning of ‘investment’	434
9.4 THE TRUSTEES’ STANDARD OF CARE WHEN MAKING INVESTMENTS	434
9.4.1 The statutory duty of care	434
9.4.2 The possible meanings of ‘reasonable’ care in this context	436
9.5 THE PROCESS OF MAKING INVESTMENT DECISIONS	438
9.5.1 The statutory duty of care in the process of making investment decisions	438
9.5.2 Standard investment criteria	438
9.5.3 The obligation to take professional advice	441
9.5.4 Investment in land	443
9.6 CASE LAW ON THE TRUSTEES’ DUTIES IN THE INVESTMENT OF TRUSTS	443
9.6.1 The interaction of the Trustee Act 2000 and the old case law	443
9.6.2 The duty to make the best available return	444
9.6.3 The standard of care of the prudent businessperson	446
9.6.4 The management of risk through portfolio investment strategies	449
9.6.5 Liability in accordance with standard market practice	451
9.7 EXPRESS INVESTMENT POWERS	453
9.7.1 Priority of express powers of investment over statutory principles	453
9.7.2 Strict construction of powers of investment	454
9.7.3 Power to confer investment powers on the trustees	454

9.8 TRUSTEES AS AUTHORISED PERSONS UNDER THE FINANCIAL SERVICES AND MARKETS ACT 2000	455
9.8.1 The purpose of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000	455
9.8.2 Regulated activities of trustees and authorisation	455
9.8.3 Conduct of business regulation	458
9.8.4 Control of misfeasance by financial regulation	459
9.9 BREACH OF TRUST AND INVESTMENT	462
9.9.1 The concept of 'loss' and breach of trust	462
9.9.2 Measurement of liability in accordance with standard market practice	463
9.9.3 The validity of exclusion clauses under case law	464
9.9.4 Different levels of liability for different types of trustee	465
9.9.5 Limitation of liabilities arising under statute	466
9.10 THE SELECTION AND MANAGEMENT OF PARTICULAR TYPES OF INVESTMENT	467
9.10.1 The duty in general terms	467
9.10.2 When the trust property includes a controlling interest in a company	467
9.10.3 When the trust property includes a mortgage	468
9.10.4 Duty to control delegates under the case law	468

OVERVIEW

The trustee's general duties of investment can be summarised in the following principles: to act prudently and safely; to act fairly between beneficiaries; to do the best for the beneficiaries. The best interests of the beneficiaries are generally taken to be their financial interests. Therefore, non-financial considerations must not be taken into account when deciding what to invest in, except in the exceptional circumstances where all the actual or potential beneficiaries are adults with strict moral views on particular matters.

The Trustee Act 2000 sets out the statutory code relating to the investment of trust funds and the delegation of the trustees' duties to agents, custodians and nominees. Of particular significance are the duty to act with skill and care, the duty to act reasonably, the duty to take proper advice, and the duty to observe the standard investment criteria that one must both invest suitably and in an appropriately diversified manner. The Trustee Delegation Act 1999 deals with enduring powers of attorney relating to trustees' obligations.

9.1 THE USE OF TRUSTS AS INVESTMENT VEHICLES

9.1.1 The scope of this chapter¹

The trust has a complex provenance: its progenitors emerged in English history as early as the 13th century as a means of recognising that a number of people might have simultaneous rights of use over land and other property.² The rules which sustain the modern trust were developed in the mid-17th and mid-19th centuries, principally in relation to family trusts which allocated rights in the wealth of landed families.³ From these beginnings the trust became ever more institutional (that is, founded on a series of strictly observed formalities)⁴ despite its heritage as a tool of the courts of equity in recognising entitlements to property beyond the common law.⁵ By the end of the 20th century, the most visible caucus of litigation relating to the use of trusts was concerned with its application to commercial situations.⁶ In the 1990s, the moral heritage of the trust as a creature of ‘conscience’ was reclaimed by the courts in the complex matter of applying concepts generated for family law situations to the commercial context.⁷ These questions are central to the operation of the trust as an investment structure. The intervention of the Trustee Act (TA) 2000 demonstrates that the principles generated over the centuries by these various aspects of the trust do not meet the complexities of modern investment practice, the use of professional investment managers in the investment of trust funds, and the difficulties associated both with wanting trustees to be careful with trust property while also wanting them to generate the best available return for the beneficiaries.

¹ This chapter follows the structure of previous editions of this text combined with the impression of Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, Sweet & Maxwell, 2013, Chapters 8 and 9.

² On the general roots of uses and trusts, see Chapter 2 above.

The focus of this chapter is therefore on three facets of the trust as an investment tool. First, the issues surrounding the moral foundations of the trust and its application to the commercial context. Secondly, the rules of trusts law relating specifically to the investment of ordinary trust funds, the obligations of trustees in such situations, and the concomitant rights of beneficiaries, particularly as understood differently by the case law and the TA 2000. Thirdly, an analysis of the developing categories of investment trust. It will be important to bear in mind some of the mismatches between judge-made obligations on trustees and standard commercial practice, in particular those relating to professional trustees’ contractual limitation of their liability, the structure of investment trust funds, and differences between ‘professional-commercial’ and ‘informal’ trusts.⁸

9.1.2 The utility of private trusts for investment purposes

As we have considered throughout this Part 3, the office of trustee places an onerous task on the person who accepts that office. Bound up with this set of obligations are duties in 3 The importance of such arrangements to the upper middle classes is evident from great literary works of the period such as Jane Austen’s Sense and Sensibility and Charles Dickens’s Bleak House, in which the reduced circumstances of the main protagonists are caused by a fee entail and chancery litigation over a will respectively.

4 In particular rules as to certainty of subject, object and intention (eg, Knight v Knight [1925] Ch 835); the perpetuities rules (eg, Re Wood [1949] 1 All ER 1100); and rules as to completely constituted trusts (Milroy v Lord (1862) 4 De GF & J 264).

5 Maitland, 1936, Chapter 1; Hanbury, 1934, 55 et seq.

6 A plethora of banking law cases concerning the imposition of constructive and resulting trusts, including: Agip v Jackson [1990] Ch 265, 286, per Millett J, CA; [1991] Ch 547; Barlow Clowes International Ltd (In Liquidation) v Vaughan [1992] 4 All ER 22; Bishopsgate v Homan [1995] 1 WLR 31; Boscawen v Bajwa [1996] 1 WLR 328; Chase Manhattan Bank NA v Israel-British Bank (London) Ltd [1981] 1 Ch 105; Re Goldcorp [1995] 1 AC 74; Guinness Mahon v Kensington & Chelsea RLBC [1998] 2 All ER 272; Kleinwort Benson v Sandwell Borough Council [1994] 4 All ER 890, per Hobhouse J; Kleinwort Benson v South Tyneside MBC [1994] 4 All ER 972, per Hobhouse J; MacJordan Construction Ltd v Brookmount Erostin Ltd [1992] BCLC 350; Macmillan v Bishopsgate (No 3) [1996] 1 WLR 387; Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669, HL.

7 Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421, [1995] 3 WLR 352, [1995] 3 All ER 785; Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669, HL.

8 Which could be rendered as being similar to the distinction between conscious express trusts and unconscious express trusts.

relation to the treatment of the trust fund.⁹ Thus far we have seen negative obligations requiring the trustee not to act outwith the terms of the trust nor to treat the beneficiary or the trust property otherwise than in accordance with those terms. A different context arises in relation to the investment of the trust fund. In that context, as we shall see, there are positive obligations on the trustee to generate the best return on the property which is reasonable in the circumstances. As will emerge below, there is a mixture of case law and statute in this area. What is readily apparent is the surprising level of restriction in the law before 2000 as to the nature of investments that may be made and the nature of the obligations imposed on the trustee. Historically, this stringency can be attributed to the fact that the rules on investment of trusts were devised for family trusts in which the duty of the trustee was to preserve the trust fund for future generations while also ensuring that current generations would receive suitable incomes.

Those rules will cover a number of very different circumstances. A trust can be used specifically for investment purposes. Unit trusts (equivalent to the US mutual funds) or investment vehicles like hedge funds (occasionally structured as trusts, rather than companies or partnerships) are based on the ordinary principles of trust. In such a situation, the trustees will be investment professionals with suitable expertise to choose between the available investment options. The terms of the trust will be set out in the terms of the contract under which the trustees agree to offer their services. Typically, this will take the form of a Conduct of Business letter constructed to comply with Financial Conduct Authority regulatory rules.¹⁰ Alternatively, the trustee may be someone who has no expertise in financial markets but who is responsible for the trust fund. The question will therefore be as to the comparative levels of obligation to generate the best possible return from the trust. Evidently, the nature of the trust property itself will have an impact on the extent of that obligation in any particular circumstance.

The bulk of the case law considered in this chapter concerns investment in financial market securities.

9.2 INTRODUCTION TO THE PRINCIPLES OF THE TRUSTEE ACT 2000

9.2.1 The scope of the Trustee Act 2000

The Trustee Act 2000 ('TA 2000') introduces a code of provisions which relate primarily to the appointment of agents, nominees and custodians by trustees and particularly introduces provisions in relation to the investment of trust funds.¹¹ The TA 2000 does not apply generally to pension funds¹² nor to authorised unit trusts,¹³ both of which have statutory and regulatory regimes of their own. That it was considered necessary to introduce a statute to govern the investment of trust funds is interesting in itself, particularly when taken together with the statutory codes which already govern pension funds and unit trusts, because it illustrates the 9 See section 8.3 above.

10 Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, s 1.

11 See generally Hicks, 2001.

12 TA 2000, s 36; considered in Chapter 24.

13 Ibid, s 37.

perception that the general law of trusts was not sufficient to protect the beneficiaries from the misfeasance of trustees. In relation to professional trustees authorised under the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 to sell financial instruments, as with trustees of pension funds and unit trusts, there is a statutory regulator created which regulates the activities of such trustees and shortcuts the need for the beneficiary to rely on the general law of trusts when making a complaint.

Significantly, the TA 2000 provides a form of statutory long-stop and does not set out mandatory rules for the administration and investment of trusts: that is, it is possible for the provisions of a trust instrument to exclude the operation of the Act either by express provision or by inference from the construction of any such provisions.¹⁴ The TA 2000 provides that, for example, ‘the duty of care [imposed on trustees]¹⁵ does not apply if or in so far as it appears from the trust instrument that the duty is not meant to apply’.¹⁶ Thus, settlors have the freedom to create whatever arrangements they wish without the interference of mandatory, legal rules which might prohibit certain forms of action. The role of the TA 2000 is therefore to supply trust provisions where otherwise there would be a gap in the trusts provisions.

9.2.2 The meaning of ‘trustee’ in this context

What remains unclear within the terms of the TA 2000 is what exactly is meant by the term ‘trustee’ itself. The legislation itself makes general reference only to a ‘trustee’, but does not make clear whether or not that is to apply only to express trustees (that is, trustees who have accepted the office possibly subject to a detailed trust instrument) or whether it refers also to constructive trustees, trustees of resulting trusts, or trustees of implied trusts like that in *Paul v Constance*¹⁷ – the common feature between all those latter forms of trust being that the trustees may not know of their trusteeship until the court order which confirms it. Therefore, it is possible that there are trustees who do not know of their obligations and who are in breach of the positive obligations in the TA 2000 which apply in the absence of an exclusion clause – such as to produce a policy statement for the investment of trust funds and so forth.¹⁸ The structure of the Act, and its references to exclusion of liability in the trust instrument, indicate that the legislative draftsman was focused on such express trusts formed by way of an instrument.¹⁹

9.2.3 The repeal of the Trustee Investment Act 1961

The Trustee Investment Act 1961 is repealed by the TA 2000.²⁰ The 1961 Act had previously obliged trustees to split the trust fund in half and to hold each half in very conservative forms of investment as specified by that Act. The principal purpose of the 2000 Act is to permit 14 See eg ibid, Sched 1, para 7 and other provisions referred to in the text to follow.

15 Considered below at para 9.2.2.

16 TA 2000, Sched 1, para 7.

17 [1977] 1 WLR 527; considered above at para 3.3.1.

18 TA 2000, s 4.

19 Eg ibid, ss 9, 22, Sched 1, para 7, all of which make reference to existing trust instruments or provisions.

20 TA 2000, s 7(3).

trustees to act as though the absolute owners of the property and to invest in whatever investments they consider appropriate within the terms of their investment powers as set out in the trust instrument.²¹

9.2.4 A map of the law on the investment of trusts

The correct method with which to approach a question relating to the investment of a trust

This chapter is concerned with identifying the extent of the trustees' obligations when investing the trust fund and consequently with considering the circumstances in which the trustees will be liable for breach of trust if those obligations are breached. The discussion to follow may seem to be quite complex unless we introduce the various sources of the law on the investment of trusts. This short section gives you an outline of the questions you should ask – and the order in which you should ask them – when considering a problem relating to trustees' obligations in relation to the investment of the trust fund. It is suggested that you use these lists of principles as a check-list when considering any set of facts to see which issues are significant.

There are three places from which you will find the trustees' investment obligations in the following order, to see whether or not there has been a breach of trust:

- 1 The trust instrument.
- 2 The provisions of the Trustee Act 2000.
- 3 The case law on trustees' investment duties.

Then you should consider:

- 4 Any other obligations of the trustees under case law.
- 5 Defences to breach of trust.
- 6 Liability and remedies for breach of trust.

Each of these sources of the law on investment of trusts should be considered in that order.

(1) Breach of the terms of the trust instrument

If the trust instrument imposes an obligation on the trustee, then any breach of that obligation will constitute a breach of trust,²² as discussed in Chapter 8.²³ In such a situation the trustee would be reliant on one of the defences to a claim for breach of trust, as discussed in section 18.4 below, such as the defence in s 61 of the Trustee Act 1925 that she ought to be excused by the court on the basis that she acted honestly and reasonably in the circumstances.

If a trustee wants to be excused from such a prima facie breach of the terms of the trust instrument, then she will need to demonstrate that she has acted appropriately within the 21 See section 9.3 following.

22 Clough v Bond (1838) 8 LJ Ch 51.

23 Section 8.3.2.

terms of the TA 2000 or under the case law principles. Alternatively, if the trust instrument has no investment obligations provision or if there is such a provision but it omits to cover something important, then the trustee's obligations will also fail to be judged by reference to the terms of the TA 2000 or the case law principles.

(2) The structure of the Trustee Act 2000

The TA 2000 should be considered next because it was enacted after the case law and because legislation is sovereign over case law principles. At the time of writing there have been no cases on the investment provisions of the Trustee Act 2000. As is explained below, the entirety of the TA 2000 or any part of it may be expressly excluded by the trust instrument if the settlor wants to impose different types of obligation on the trustees.²⁴ However, assuming that there is no such provision in the trust instrument, the significant requirements of the TA 2000 are as follows:

- 1 The trustees have the power to act as though they were the absolute owners of the trust property themselves: that is, without any restriction (unless there is some restriction included in the trust instrument) (s 3(1)), except for investments in land (s 3(3)).
- 2 The trustees have a duty to exercise such skill and care as is reasonable in the circumstances (s 1(1)).
- 3 The trustees must have regard to the standard investment criteria when making investments (s 4).
 - a The first standard investment criterion is the need to ensure that the proposed investments are suitable for a trust of the type that the trustees are managing.
 - b The second standard investment criterion is the need to ensure that the trust's investment are sufficiently well diversified for a trust of that type.
- 4 The trustees must take proper advice as to the investment of the trust (s 5).

The first provision grants the trustees a power to act. Provisions numbered 2 to 4 in this list impose obligations on the trustees. If the trustees fail to obey these obligations they will have committed a breach of trust. If the trust suffers a loss as a consequence of that breach of trust then the trustees will be personally liable to account for that loss to the beneficiaries of the trust.

(3) The case law principles

At the time of writing there have been no cases on the interpretation of the TA 2000 and therefore it is suggested that the old case law may be used by the courts as a guide to interpretation, including those situations in which the Act is different in principle from the case law. Also there will be situations in which the TA 2000 has been excluded by the terms of the trust instrument or situations in which the issue at hand is outwith the scope of the Act: in either of these situations the case law will be decisive of the extent of the trustees' obligations. The principal obligations are:

²⁴ TA 2000, s 6.

- 1 The duty to act as though a prudent person of business acting on behalf of someone for whom one feels morally bound to provide.
- 2 The duty to make the best available financial return.
- 3 The duty to manage risk through the use of portfolio management strategies.
- 4 The duty to manage a controlling interest in a company.

(4) Any other obligations under the case law

There were 13 principal trustee obligations identified in Chapter 8. All or any of those obligations may be applicable in relation to any given trustee. Of particular significance in relation to the investment of trusts, aside from those obligations already mentioned, are:

- 1 The duty to act evenly between different classes of beneficiaries.
- 2 The duty to control delegates.

(5) Defences to breach of trust

The defences to breach of trust in general terms are considered in detail in section 18.4. In relation to breach of obligations relating to the investment of the trust fund, the principal defences are:

- 1 Acting as other market participants acted in relation to similar trust funds.²⁵
- 2 Having the court excuse the trustees for having acted honestly and reasonably further to s 61 of the Trustee Act 1925.

There are two other significant doctrines which were considered in Chapter 8 which are important in excusing trustees' liability in relation to breach of trust:

- 3 An express provision of the trust instrument excluding or limiting the liability of the trustees for breach of trust.²⁶
- 4 Set aside of the exercise of a power or discretion of the trustees on the grounds that they took into account an irrelevant factor or that they failed to take into account a relevant factor.²⁷

Thus, even if a prima facie breach of trust is established, it may be necessary to consider the extent of the statutory and of the case law interpretations of the trustees' general obligations when investing the trust fund, lest any of these defences should apply.

25 Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [2000] WTLR 795.

26 Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241; Galmerrow Securities Ltd v National Westminster Bank plc [2002] WTLR 125.

27 Re Hastings-Bass [1975] Ch 25.

(6) Liability and remedies for breach of trust

The nature of liability for breach of trust is considered below in section 9.9; and in detail in Chapter 18. In essence the trustees will be liable to return any specific property taken from the trust, or to account personally for any loss suffered by the trust so as to restore the trust to its previous worth before the breach of trust.²⁸

9.3 THE GENERAL POWER OF INVESTMENT

9.3.1 The scope of the general power of investment

In general terms

In comparison with the formalism previously imposed by the Trustee Investment Act 1961, the TA 2000 provides that ‘a trustee may make any kind of investment that he could make if he were absolutely entitled to the assets of the trust’: this is referred to in the legislation as the ‘general power of investment’.²⁹ Therefore, the trustee is not constrained as to the investments which are made by reason only of his trusteeship.³⁰ It should be remembered that the trust instrument may impose restrictions on the trustees’ powers to make investments and financial regulation may in effect preclude certain types of investment by persons who are considered to be insufficiently expert to make them.³¹ There remain restrictions on the power of trustees to make investments in land unless by way of loans secured on land (such as mortgages).³²

In creating a general power of investment, the TA 2000 also provides that that power is both in addition to anything set out in the trust instrument but also capable of being excluded by any such trust instrument.³³ Therefore, the settlor could preclude the trustees from making particular forms of investment or otherwise qualify the trustees’ powers of investment. In contradistinction to the 1961 code, this means that the trustee is presumed to be free to make any suitable investments in the absence of any express provision to the contrary, whereas the trustee was previously presumed to be capable only of making a limited range of investments in the absence of any provision to the contrary.³⁴ Therefore, the purpose of the 2000 Act is to supplement the powers of trustees in the event that the trust instrument does not deal with the matter.

28 Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421.

29 TA 2000, s 3(1).

30 Before the late 18th century, trustees were frequently conceived of as being the absolute owner of the trust property and subject only to equitable duties to account to the beneficiaries. It was during the 18th century that it was recognised that trustees could only exercise powers granted to them by a trust instrument, as opposed to treating the trustee as the absolute owner of the trust property: see, for example, Holmes v Dring (1788) 2 Cox Eq Cas 1. The law of trusts then developed a means of understanding the trustee as being hemmed in by obligations and of the beneficiary as having equitable proprietary rights. The TA 2000 could be considered in this sense as returning to a very old understanding of the rights of the trustee.

31 Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, Part 1.

32 TA 2000, s 3(3).

33 Ibid, s 6(1).

34 The 1961 code is now replaced by the TA 2000 in this regard: ibid, s 7(3).

9.3.2 The meaning of ‘investment’

The term ‘investment’ is not defined for the purposes of s 3 of the TA 2000. Its meaning in the general law of trusts has transformed from simply a consideration of income yield,³⁵ into a broader notion of the enhancement of capital value in parallel with increase in income,³⁶ and also into the desirability of the diversity of investment risk by means of portfolio investment strategies.³⁷ The Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 defines ‘investment’ in more categorical terms. That statute defines the term ‘investment’ by means of a list of broadly-defined market activities,³⁸ including dealings in shares or debt securities, government and public securities, warrants, certificates representing securities, units in collective investment schemes, financial derivatives and contracts for differences generally, contracts of insurance or participation in Lloyd’s syndicates, bank deposits, loans secured on land, or any right in an investment.³⁹ The expansion of trustees’ investment powers signalled by the TA 2000 makes no explicit reference to the enactment of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 even though that latter statute has effected wide-ranging change in the substantive law and regulation of financial services in the UK and may be used as a means of defining that term in the future.

9.4 THE TRUSTEES’ STANDARD OF CARE WHEN MAKING INVESTMENTS

9.4.1 The statutory duty of care

The TA 2000 provides for a statutory duty of care which imposes a duty of ‘such skill and care as is reasonable in the circumstances’ in s 1 in the following terms:⁴⁰

- (1) Whenever the duty under this subsection applied to a trustee, he must exercise such care and skill as is reasonable in the circumstances, having regard in particular –
 - (a) to any special knowledge or experience that he has or holds himself out as having, and
 - (b) if he acts as trustee in the course of a business or profession, to any special knowledge or experience that it is reasonable to expect of a person acting in the course of that kind of business or profession.
- (2) In this Act the duty under subsection (1) is called ‘the duty of care’.

Therefore, this ‘duty of care’⁴¹ is relative to the context in which the trustee is acting. In subsection (1) it should be noted that the courts are not limited to the matters set out in paras (a) and (b) when deciding the extent of the trustees’ liabilities. The matters set out in those paragraphs, however, operate in the following way. Where the trustee has, or holds herself out as having, any particular ‘special knowledge or experience’, then the 35 Re Somerset [1894] 1 Ch 231, 247; Re Wragg [1919] 2 Ch 58, 65.

36 Cowan v Scargill [1985] Ch 270, 287; Harries v Church Commissioners [1992] 1 WLR 1241, 1246.

37 See discussion below at para 9.6.4.

38 Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, s 22. See Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, Sweet & Maxwell, 2009, paras 9–06 et seq.

39 Ibid, Sched 2, Pt II.

40 TA 2000, s 1(1).

41 Ibid, s 1(2).

trustee's duty of care will be inferred in the light of those factors.⁴² Consequently, if the trustee pretends to have experience which she does not have, then she will be treated as though she did have that level of experience. To do otherwise would be to allow a deceitful or overly boastful trustee to induce the beneficiaries into using her services on the basis that she was capable of acting, and then to excuse that person from causing loss to the trust because they had misled the beneficiaries and was in truth incompetent. Further, if the duties of trustee are performed 'in the course of a business of profession', then the duty of care is applied in the context of any special knowledge or experience which such a professional could be expected to have.⁴³ It is worth considering what would happen, for example, in relation to an inexperienced stockbroker advising on a trust's investment policy: would that stockbroker be able to plead her lack of experience so as to avoid liability for breaching this duty of care? The statute reads so as to say that the level of special knowledge or experience is a level which 'it is reasonable to expect of a person acting in the course of that kind of business of profession': thus we must consider 'a person' acting in such a professional capacity, and not 'a person in the defendant's particular circumstances', with the result, it is suggested, that all professionals shall be held to the same standard appropriate for members of that profession or participants in that sort of business without permitting any kind of defence based on the defendant's own lack of experience. Thus the risk of liability for any losses and the burden of acting appropriately is borne by anyone who acts in the course of a business, as opposed to being borne by the beneficiaries. This is appropriate, it is suggested, because the trust will be employing a trustee on the basis of that trustee's professionalism and therefore it would be unfortunate if the trustee were able to avoid liability for failing to act as a professional in that sort of business ought to act.

It should be remembered that the provisions of the TA 2000 can be expressly or impliedly displaced by the trust instrument.⁴⁴ In consequence, this duty of care may be limited by the express provisions of the trust, or even by a construction of those provisions, which suggests that the settlor's intention was to exclude such a liability.⁴⁵

The duty of care is not expressed by the 2000 Act to be a general duty in the form of an all-encompassing statutory tort; rather, the Act provides that the duty will apply in certain limited circumstances.⁴⁶ It is instead a form of limited equitable wrong. The principal instance in which the statutory duty of care applies⁴⁷ is in relation to a trustee exercising a 'general power of investment'⁴⁸ under the Act or any other power of investment 'however conferred'.⁴⁹ Alternatively, the duty of care applies when trustees are carrying out obligations under the Act in relation to exercising or reviewing powers of investment.⁵⁰ The duty

42 Ibid, s 1(1)(a).

43 Ibid, s 1(1)(b).

44 Ibid, Sched 1, para 7.

45 Cf section 8.5 above.

46 Ibid, s 2.

47 Ibid, Sched 1, para 1.

48 As defined by ibid, s 3(2) and considered below.

49 With the effect that this provision may be only mandatory provision in the legislation because it appears to apply to powers of investment in general and not simply to that set out in s 3(2). However, the Act does permit an express exclusion in the trust to obviate the operation of any of the provisions in the Act and therefore it would appear possible to circumscribe the operation of this provision: Sched 1, para 7.

50 TA 2000, ss 4, 5.

of care also applies in relation to the acquisition of land,⁵¹ which would logically appear to cover the use of appropriate advice and appropriate levels of care in selecting the land, contracting for its purchase and insuring it.⁵² It applies in general terms in relation to the appointment of agents, custodians and nominees:⁵³ this would include the selection of reasonable agents with appropriate qualifications for the task for which they were engaged.

9.4.2 The possible meanings of ‘reasonable’ care in this context

The governing adjective which qualifies the care which must be exercised by the trustee is ‘reasonable’. The inclusion of this adjective ensures a great potential scope for the development of the duties of trustees. By contrast, the word ‘prudent’ has been used in the case law since the 19th century,⁵⁴ suggesting that caution was more important than other concerns. The underlying purpose of the TA 2000 is to liberate trustees from the overriding objective to be prudent in their investment activities to the exclusion of all else. If a trustee is required to act prudently then that means that the trustee must avoid investments which present any significant degree of risk of loss; whereas if a trustee is required to act ‘reasonably’ then that permits a trustee to make investments which take a level of risk which is appropriate for the particular trust in question. Prudence therefore limits the trustees’ choices. After all, all investment involves risk.⁵⁵ Thus if a trustee is required to act prudently then many ordinary investments may be beyond that trustee’s powers. By contrast a reasonable trustee, particularly one with a broad portfolio of investments, would take some risks so as to make a reasonable level of profit for the beneficiaries. The precise phrasing of s 1(1) of TA 2000 is important, however, because it requires that a trustee ‘exercise such care and skill as is reasonable in the circumstances’. Therefore, it is not simply that a trustee must act ‘reasonably’ but more precisely that that trustee must do three things: first, exercise skill and care; secondly, exercise that skill and care reasonably; and, thirdly, do so in a way which is appropriate to the circumstances. That a trustee must exercise skill and care requires that the trustee act skilfully and furthermore that she also act with care: thus we might consider that there remains a remnant of the old case law requirement of prudence in this requirement of care. The second element, though, is significant in that the level of care required is not absolute prudence at all times – which would suggest caution on the part of the trustee – but rather the level of care which is to be taken should be a level of care which is reasonable in the circumstances. If the requirement was for absolute caution then if the trustee took any hazardous risk at all she would be liable for breach of trust if a loss resulted; however, if a trustee is permitted to act reasonably then she may be excused liability for breach of trust if the risk she took was reasonable in the circumstances. For example, if the trust was created by a billionaire with the express purpose that the trustees invest a large sum of money so as to make as much profit as possible, then it would be reasonable for the trustees to invest in complex and risky investments because they would be expected to generate the highest levels of profit; whereas it would not be reasonable to take such risks if the trustees were

51 Ibid, Sched 1, para 2.

52 Ibid, Sched 1, para 5; TA 1925, s 19.

53 Ibid, Sched 1, para 3.

54 Learoyd v Whiteley (1887) 12 App Cas 727.

55 A point accepted explicitly by Lord Nicholls in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378.

investing only a few thousand pounds in relation to a bare trust the only beneficiary of which was an elderly widow with no other source of income and whose trustees would therefore need to be more careful not to lose the trust fund.

The upshot of this movement from ‘prudence’ to ‘reasonableness’ is that trustees may be expected to seek to generate greater profit for the trust now that they are imbued with a general investment power by the TA 2000⁵⁶ and now that trustees providing investment advice as part of a business are regulated by the Financial Conduct Authority (‘FCA’). With the increased participation of many ordinary citizens in financial market activity (whether directly through share acquisitions in public limited companies, or indirectly through participation in unit trusts or occupational pension funds), it is suggested that the culture in which trustees are investing should require a transformation in the standard expected of trustees when exercising their investment powers. That transformation should be a change from the caution which has been required historically into a power to incur a level of investment risk which is commensurate with the nature of the trust which they are administering. So, non-professional trustees’ investment of a family trust would require greater care and lower levels of investment risk than professional fund managers investing a commercially-marketed unit trust or pension fund. Under the TA 2000 regime, it is of central significance that the nature of the duty of care⁵⁷ is relative to the context in which the trustee is acting.

The most significant form of trustee in relation to investment powers will be the professional trustee who is retained to act as trustee precisely because he is a professional. It is precisely such trustees, ironically, who will generally not be covered by the TA 2000 in practice because they will generally agree to act as trustees only if the trust instrument specifies their powers, their obligations, and the precise manner in which their fees will be calculated.⁵⁸ When considering the standard of care appropriate for a professional trustee, it would be appropriate to ascertain the standard of her obligations by reference to standard market practice and by reference to standard market regulation.⁵⁹ An appropriate, objective measurement of the obligations of such professional trustees would be the provisions of the FCA’s regulatory Conduct of Business Sourcebook (‘COBS’).⁶⁰ That rulebook describes the manner in which such organisations and their employees are expected to behave, on penalty of sanction by the FCA, and therefore the appropriate rulebook constitutes a code of principles by which both professional trustee and beneficiary can reasonably expect the trustee to be judged.

It is by reference to non-professional trustees that the most difficult problems arise. Two conflicting points of principle collide at this juncture. The first concerns the level of expectation expressed by the settlor and by the beneficiaries, and the reasonableness of their reliance on the particular trustee; the second is the protection of the trustee in relation to liabilities which he may not have understood he was assuming or which he may not have considered himself sufficiently skilled to assume. The question for the courts will be whether they choose to measure reasonableness by reference to the need to compensate the beneficiary for any loss occasioned by the trustee’s action or omission, or whether the courts choose to measure reasonableness by reference to the justice of holding the individual trustee only to 56 Unless that power has been expressly excluded by the trust instrument: TA 2000, s 6.

57 Ibid, s 1(2).

58 See, for example, Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241.

59 See, for example, Bankers Trust v Dharmala [1996] CLC 252.

60 See the discussion of this FSA Conduct of Business rulebook at para 9.8.3.

obligations which he assumed voluntarily and in full cognisance of their ramifications.⁶¹ The courts have been reluctant to hold trustees to account if they have acted as other trustees would have acted in the circumstances, even if that has resulted in a poor investment return for the beneficiaries.⁶² However, in relation to inexperienced trustees, it will be difficult to adduce evidence of what other trustees would have done in the same context because such information will not be as readily available as it would be in relation to professional investment managers.

The case law relating to the investment of trust funds dealt with different concepts – in particular the requirement of ‘prudence’⁶³ – which are analysed below in section 9.6. If that case law is used by the courts to measure the obligations of trustees then, it is suggested, that would be to return to a mode of thought which prioritised care and caution over the modern approach of balancing the need to take risks with the return that the trustees are expected to generate for the beneficiaries. More recent cases have, however, begun to prioritise the standards of ‘modern portfolio investment theory’⁶⁴ over the more traditional notions of prudence.⁶⁵

9.5 THE PROCESS OF MAKING INVESTMENT DECISIONS

9.5.1 The statutory duty of care in the process of making investment decisions

The TA 2000 creates a statutory duty of care to which trustees are subject when making investment decisions. The detail of the duty of care is considered below.⁶⁶ This section of this chapter is concerned with the statutory principles governing the mechanism by which trustees make investment decisions. The duties which those trustees bear in the investment-making process are subject always to the statutory duty of care (unless the trust instrument provides to the contrary),⁶⁷ whether in relation to the general power of investment or their obligations to review the fund’s investments, as considered immediately below. Therefore, the trustees’ liability for any malfeasance or loss occasioned through their investment decisions will fall to be assessed in accordance with the duty of care and with the principles of breach of trust under the general law of trust. The following paragraphs will consider the investment decision process before turning to the detail of the statutory duty of care.

9.5.2 Standard investment criteria

The TA 2000 requires that the trustees have regard to something described in the statute as the ‘standard investment criteria’⁶⁸ when exercising their investment powers: that is, it is suggested, 61 Cf Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241.

62 Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [2000] WTLR 795.

63 Learoyd v Whiteley (1887) 12 App Cas 727.

64 Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [2000] WTLR 795.

65 See para 9.6.3.

66 See the discussion at para 9.6.3.

67 TA 2000, Sched 1, para 1(b).

68 Ibid, s 4(1).

whether making new investments or considering their existing investments.⁶⁹ The ‘standard investment criteria’ to which the trustees are to have regard comprise two core principles of prevailing investment theory which relate, first, to the need to make ‘suitable’ investments and, secondly, to the need to maintain a diverse portfolio of investments to spread the fund’s investment risk. We shall take each of these in turn. The trustees are required to consider under s 4(2):

- (a) the suitability to the trust of investments of the same kind as any particular investment proposed to be made or retained and of that particular investment as an investment of that kind, and
- (b) the need for diversification of investments of the trust, in so far as is appropriate to the circumstances of the trust.⁷⁰

The term ‘suitability’ is one familiar to investment regulation specialists⁷¹ which requires that, in general terms, investment managers are required to consider whether or not the risk associated with a given investment is appropriate for the client proposing to make that investment. In consequence, the investment manager could not sell, for example, complex financial derivatives products to inexperienced members of the general public who could not understand the precise nature of the risks associated with such a transaction. Under the terms of the TA 2000, the trustee is required to consider whether the trust fund for which she is making an investment would be dealing in a suitable manner in making the proposed investment. It is presumed that the trustee would be liable for breach of trust in the event that an unsuitable investment were made which caused loss to the trust.⁷² The FCA Conduct of Business regulations might give us some guidance as to what suitable behaviour would involve, remembering always that the steps which are required of any service provider:

will vary greatly, depending on the needs and priorities of the private customer, the type of investment or service being offered, and the nature of the relationship between the firm and the private customer and, in particular, whether the firm is giving a personal recommendation or acting as a discretionary investment manager.⁷³

Having categorised each client in this manner, the service provider is then required to treat them in a manner which is commensurate with their expertise and also to ensure that the investments sold to them are suitable for their purposes. Therefore, the requirement under s 4(2)(a) of the TA 2000 that the trustee is required to consider whether the trust fund for which she is making an investment would be dealing in a suitable manner in making the proposed investment will differ depending on the nature of the trust. Where the trust is a small family trust with a comparatively weak risk appetite, the investments to be made should be safe, whereas investments made on behalf of a trust fund created by two corporations who are expert in financial services (a not uncommon structure for highly-leveraged hedge funds) could be considerably more adventurous, and so intended to take greater risks.

⁶⁹ Ibid, s 4(2).

⁷⁰ Ibid.

⁷¹ See para 9.8.3 below for a discussion of this term. See Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, Sweet & Maxwell, 2009, paras 10–46 et seq.

⁷² Target Holdings v Redfems [1996] 1 AC 421, [1995] 3 WLR 352, [1995] 3 All ER 785.

⁷³ FCA, Conduct of Business Rules, para 5.3.4.

It is presumed that the trustee would be liable for breach of trust in the event that an unsuitable investment were made which caused loss to the trust.⁷⁴

Secondly, the trustees must pay heed to ‘the need for diversification of investments of the trust, in so far as is appropriate to the circumstances of the trust’.⁷⁵ Two points arise from this provision. First, the question as to the amount of diversification necessary is dependent on the nature of the trust. For example, a trust which requires the trustees to hold a single house on trust for the occupation of a named beneficiary does not require that the trustees make a range of investments: rather, the trustees are impliedly precluded from making a range of investments. Secondly, a trust with only a small amount of capital could not afford to buy a large number of investments.

Therefore, the need for diversification itself is bound up with need to dilute the risk of investing in only a small number of investments. This is frequently referred to as ‘portfolio theory’⁷⁶ and is predicated on the theory that if an investor invests in a number of investments in different markets, the impact of any individual market or investment suffering from a fall in value is balanced out by the investments made in other markets which will not have suffered from that particular fall in value. Let us imagine a trust with a general power of investment. If that trust fund was comprised of £10 million, diversification would require that the trustees do not simply invest in shares in a single company. Equally, diversification would require that the trustees do not invest in a number of companies which all deal in the same market, for example computer manufacture, because if there were a fall in that market then the entire value of the trust would fall. Therefore, diversification would involve acquiring shares in a number of companies in a number of different markets. However, diversification would also require investment in a number of different types of investments – for example, bonds, derivatives, land, foreign exchange and commodities, as well as shares – so that if there were a fall in UK share markets then the investments in other markets would balance out the fall in the trust’s investment in shares. The assumption is that in modern marketplaces there will be volatility in all investment markets and therefore that this volatility – meaning that investments may increase and decrease greatly in value over comparatively short periods of time – carries with it the risk of investments falling in value. Investment professionals rely on volatility to generate profits: if different investments within markets, as well as the markets generally, rise and fall in value then a skilful investment professional will take advantage of opportunities to buy investments when they are cheap and to sell them when they have risen in value. In previous centuries it was generally supposed that investments would move slowly in value and therefore that prudence was an appropriate approach to investment; this assumption fell away in the late 20th century. Thus we come to the requirement expressed by judges such as Hoffmann J⁷⁷ that trustees should take account of ‘modern portfolio theory’ when making investments so that a range of different investments will insulate the trust against the fall in any individual market or investment.⁷⁸

74 Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421, [1995] 3 WLR 352, [1995] 3 All ER 785.

75 TA 2000, s 4(2)(b).

76 Considered below at para 9.6.4.

77 Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [2000] WTLR 795.

78 The point made about portfolio investment by Warren Buffett of Berkshire Hathaway (possibly the world’s most successful investor) is that it is a poor short-term strategy because it assumes that some investments will fail, as opposed to selecting successful, long-term investments carefully on the basis of strong fundamentals and good management.

However, when thinking about the appropriate level of diversification it is also important to consider the size and nature of the trust. As was considered above, if the trust instrument clearly requires that the trustee invest in only a limited form of investments, then the trustee would be in breach of trust if she sought to diversify the trust's investments into any other forms of investments which were not permitted by the precise terms of the trust instrument. If the settlor's intention that, for example, a trust was invested only in 'technology companies in the UK' failed to anticipate a period in which technology companies lost lots of money due to changes in the technology marketplace, then it would seem illogical to require that the trustee continue to obey the terms of the trust instrument and thus lose the trust a lot of money. Instead, s 33 of the Trustee Act 1925, as discussed in Chapter 18, might give the trustees an 'excuse' for committing a technical breach of trust so as better to protect the trust fund. The trustee should ideally seek a variation under the Variation of Trusts Act 1958 or under s 57 of the Trustee Act 1925. Nevertheless, if the trust fund were comprised of only £10,000 in free cash, then it would be unreasonable to expect that a trustee would be able to diversify the trust's investment portfolio as broadly as a trust containing £10 million because clearly the larger trust can afford many more different types of investment and can better afford the fees involved with buying that number of investments. Therefore, diversification in relation to the trust fund containing £10,000 will necessarily require the trustees to diversify only to the extent that the trust can afford to do so. Thus a trust fund comprising £10 million may include hundreds of different investments in its portfolio, whereas a trust fund including only £10,000 may have only six or seven different, carefully-selected investments in different markets. These questions are impossible to decide in the abstract. Rather, they must be considered on a case-by-case basis by reference to these principles.

9.5.3 The obligation to take professional advice

Trustees are under a positive obligation to take professional advice on the investments which they propose to make on behalf of the trust.⁷⁹ It is the TA 2000 which imposes this positive obligation on the trustees to seek out professional advice on the investments to be made.⁸⁰ This obligation is set out in s 5 of TA 2000 in the following terms:

- (1) Before exercising any power of investment, whether arising under this Part or otherwise, a trustee must (unless the exception applies) obtain and consider proper advice about the way in which, having regard to the standard investment criteria [set out in the preceding section], the power should be exercised.
- (2) When reviewing the investments of the trust, a trustee must (unless the exception applies) obtain and consider proper advice about whether, having regard to the standard investment criteria, the investments should be varied.

Thus, under subsection (1), before the trustees make any investment they are required to seek 'proper advice'. This advice must be taken before the exercise of any investment power.⁸¹ Similarly, under subsection (2), when considering whether or not to vary the investments which the trust has made, the trustees are also required to take qualified investment advice,⁸² unless it appears reasonable to the trustees in the circumstances to dispense with such advice.⁸³ The type of advice which the trustee must acquire is ‘proper advice’: that is, advice from someone whom the trustee reasonably believes is qualified to give such advice.⁸⁴ There may, therefore, be interesting questions as to the sort of advice which qualifies as being ‘proper advice’. It is suggested that consulting a professional in the field in which the investment is to be made would definitely constitute ‘proper advice’ if the professional was consulted on ordinary business terms and paid in the ordinary manner.

⁷⁹ TA 2000, s 5(1).

⁸⁰ Ibid, s 5(1).

⁸¹ TA 2000, s 5(4).

There may be more difficult questions, for example, if a trustee sought to take advice from a professional one weekend at a barbecue in a mutual friend’s garden when both had been drinking and neither party had had a chance to discuss the matter in a normal professional manner. It is suggested that this might not constitute ‘proper advice’ if the professional were not able to consider all of the necessary issues in a professional manner as would ordinarily be expected of someone in her profession; whereas asking a professional, for example, what sort of investments had been recommended for a particular type of client in the previous week might come closer to being proper advice because that professional would not necessarily need to consider any other matters before dispensing that sort of advice. So, if, for example, the professional was a land management professional then a question as to the time at which pruning was conducted on valuable trees on trust land would not require the estate manager necessarily to do a large amount of investigative work in advance of giving advice. By contrast, in relation to the investment of a pension fund of £10 million, an investment professional would need to comply with FCA regulation as to the terms on which the advice was given, the current nature of the trust’s portfolio and so forth: thus off-the-cuff advice would not be appropriate in that context. The requirement of taking ‘proper advice’ would, it is suggested, not be satisfied by simply reading a newspaper article if the decision being made was how to invest millions of pounds in financial markets without taking specific advice as to the needs of the particular trust. Again, by contrast, if the trustees were simply researching a simple question – such as the manner in which a speedboat held on trust should be moored – then reading an article in an appropriate journal or consulting the internet might be sufficient. Nevertheless, best practice for trustees would be to seek professional advice from a professional advisor (or from a number of professional advisors) on ordinary commercial terms such that the advisor was able to assess all of the relevant information and to give sufficiently well-considered advice.

Once the advice has been obtained, the trustees are required to consider it and its bearing on the manner in which their investment power should be exercised.⁸⁵ There is no statutory obligation on the trustees to follow the advice which they receive and so it is open to them to follow whichever path they consider appropriate. Consequently, trustees may well seek advice from different professionals before making up their own minds as to which course of action they consider to be most appropriate for the trust. Different stockbrokers might, for example, suggest different courses of action for a trust seeking to invest its cash. The trustees may have their own views as to the need to conserve the trust’s capital for its infant beneficiaries as opposed to seeking profits in a hurry by means of taking big risks. Thus, the

82 Ibid., s 5(2).

83 Ibid., s 5(3).

84 Ibid., s 5(4).

85 Ibid.

trustees may reject advice given to them by aggressive stockbrokers and instead prefer to take the advice of more cautious stockbrokers who fit in with the trust's general ethos. So, taking advice does not necessarily mean that that advice must be followed slavishly. Megarry VC held the following in relation to the trustees' obligations in relation to the advice they receive:

Although a trustee who takes advice on investments is not bound to accept and act on that advice, he is not entitled to reject it merely because he sincerely disagrees with it, unless in addition he is acting as an ordinary prudent man would act.⁸⁶

There is nothing in the statute to preclude trustees from taking advice from a number of sources, or to take advice from one source as to a range of different investment decisions which could be taken, before then selecting the strategy which most appeals to them in the context of their fiduciary responsibilities.

9.5.4 Investment in land

Trustees are empowered to acquire freehold and leasehold land for any purpose.⁸⁷ The TA 2000 provides that the acquisition can be for the purposes of investment or for the occupation of a beneficiary, but also provides that it may be made for 'any other reason'.⁸⁸ The purpose of listing the two specific contexts is to avoid any doubt that those two reasons are permissible. The trustee has the powers of 'the absolute owner in relation to the land'.⁸⁹ This presumably means that the trustee is free to deal with the land on behalf of the trust in terms of conveying it, securing it and so forth. However, it is not supposed that this could be taken to mean that the trustee is entitled to ignore the equitable interests of any beneficiaries in that land when held on trust.

In line with the general scheme of the 2000 Act, the legislation provides for additions to any terms of any trust instrument so that there are default provisions if a trust should lack them.⁹⁰ However, it is open to the settlor to exclude the operation of the statute in any particular circumstances, reinforcing the point yet again that the Act does not impose mandatory rules as to the behaviour of trustees.

9.6 CASE LAW ON THE TRUSTEES' DUTIES IN THE INVESTMENT OF TRUSTS

9.6.1 The interaction of the Trustee Act 2000 and the old case law

This chapter has considered the general principles of trust investment. It should be borne in mind that these principles apply generally to ordinary, private trusts but that there are specific ⁸⁶ Cowan v Scargill [1985] Ch 270, 289.

⁸⁷ These particular powers do not apply to land that was settled land before 1996: ibid, s 10.

⁸⁸ Ibid, s 8(1).

⁸⁹ Ibid, s 8(3).

⁹⁰ Ibid, s 9.

principles which apply to the specialist forms of trust which are considered elsewhere: pension fund trusts⁹¹ and unit trusts.⁹²

The trustee's general duties of investment can be summarised as being bound up in the following three obligations: to act prudently and safely;⁹³ to act fairly between beneficiaries;⁹⁴ and to do the best for the beneficiaries.⁹⁵ This ties in with the preceding discussion and the understanding in the case law of the trust as being an equitable doctrine operating on the conscience of the trustee rather than the more formal institution which investors and investment managers typically have in mind when creating a trust for commercial purposes. However, the case law has taken a mercenary turn in considering the standard of investment management expected of trustees in even the most rudimentary of trusts and so the best interests of the beneficiaries are generally considered to be their financial interests.⁹⁶ Therefore, non-financial considerations must not be taken into account when deciding what to invest in, except in the exceptional circumstances where the trust instrument permits only particular types of investment or where all the actual or potential beneficiaries are adults with strict moral views on particular matters.⁹⁷ The source of this principle is in the conception of trusts in the 19th century as a means of protecting family wealth over a number of generations and the need to maximise the family's total income from long-term investments.

Otherwise the law is concerned with negative duties on the trustees to refrain from making unauthorised personal profits⁹⁸ and from committing breaches of trust more generally.⁹⁹ Therefore, there is a mixture of negative obligations dealing with the prevention of breach of trust and there are positive obligations in relation to the investment of trusts requiring the trustee to generate the best available return on the property in the circumstances.

9.6.2 The duty to make the best available return

The issue then arises: to what extent is a trustee obliged to realise the maximum reasonable return? There are three different senses in which this duty could be said to operate. The first, simply put, would be to require the trustees to seek the highest possible market return on the trust's capital. It is suggested that such an approach would require the trustees to seek the most risky available investments so as to acquire as high a return as possible. The second approach, subtly different from the first, would be to require the trustees, when choosing between a range of available investments, to select that investment which offered the highest available yield made possible by the investment criteria which the trustees have created for the trust. In this situation, the trustees would not be seeking investments which promised a high return at a potentially unacceptable level of risk, but rather, once a field of suitable 91 Chapter 24.

92 See Thomas and Hudson, 2004, Chapter 51, and the essay on unit trusts on www.alastairhudson.com.

93 Ibid.

94 Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [1994] 1 All ER 118.

95 Cowan v Scargill [1985] Ch 270.

96 Ibid.

97 Ibid., as considered below.

98 Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46; see section 12.5 below.

99 Target Holdings v Redfems [1996] 1 AC 421; see section 18.1 below.

investments had been identified, the trustees would be required to choose the most remunerative of those suitably low-risk investments. The third approach would be to recognise that non-financial considerations ought not to be taken into account. This third approach would therefore suggest that trustees ought not to allow ethical or other considerations to sway their financial decisions.

The relevant principle is probably more elegantly expressed as an obligation to make the optimum return for trust. This issue arose in the case of Cowan v Scargill,¹⁰⁰ in which the defendant was one of the trustees of the miners' pension fund and also President of the National Union of Mineworkers. The board of trustees was divided between executives of the trade union and executives from the Coal Board. The most profitable investments identified by the trustees were in companies working in oil and also in South Africa. The defendant refused to make such investments on the grounds that it was ethically wrong for the fund to invest in apartheid South Africa and also contrary to the interests of the beneficiaries to invest in an industry which competed with the coal industry, in which all the beneficiaries worked or had worked previously.

Megarry VC held that: 'When the purpose of the trust is to provide financial benefits for the beneficiaries, the best interests of the beneficiaries are their best financial interests.' Therefore, the duty of the trustees to act in the best interests of the beneficiaries is to generate the best available return on the trust fund regardless of other considerations. The scope of the duty of investment was summarised by his Lordship as the need to bear in mind the following: 'The prospects for the yield of income and capital appreciation both have to be considered in judging the return from the investment.'

His Lordship therefore focused on the objections which the defendant trustee had raised in respect of the particular form of investment which had been suggested. He held that while 'the trustees must put on one side their own personal interests and views . . .', and later that ' . . . if investments of this type would be more beneficial to the beneficiaries than other investments, the trustees must not refrain from making the investments by reasons of the views that they hold'. The irony is that, in relation to the moral nature of the obligations on the trustee to deal equitably with the trust fund, the trustee is not permitted to bring decisions of an ethical nature to bear on the scope of the investment powers. As his Lordship put it: 'Trustees may even have to act dishonourably (though not illegally) if the interests of their beneficiaries require it.'

Thus, there is a positive duty to invest regardless of ethics and yet Megarry VC was expressly prepared to accept that a sui juris set of beneficiaries with strict views on moral matters (for example, condemnation of alcohol) would be entitled to prevent the trustees from investing in companies involved in the production of alcohol; thus suggesting that ethics can control investment powers. The question which comes to mind is whether Megarry VC simply did not agree with the particular form of political belief advanced by an avowedly Marxist leader of the trade union, in this case Arthur Scargill.¹⁰¹ For example, why should refusing to invest in apartheid-controlled South Africa not be considered as valid exercise of a trustee's discretion as a decision in favour of beneficiaries who all formed part of a Methodist temperance movement to refrain from investing in a whisky distillery? What is not clear from the judgment is what the court's approach would have been if the trust had expressly excluded investment in South Africa. It must be the case that such an express provision would have had to be enforced.

100 [1984] 3 WLR 501.

101 Scargill appeared in person the High Court.

Megarry VC decided that the argument that the oil industry competed with coal was not well-founded. His principal objection was that many of the beneficiaries under the pension trust fund had retired and therefore that their income was no longer dependent on the comparative performance of coal over oil. That the communities in which these people lived were dependent entirely on the coal industry eluded his Lordship. It was therefore held that the trustees could not refuse to invest in an industry which competes with the interest of some of the pension fund members. Therefore, of the three possible senses of the duty to realise the optimum return for the trust, the third sense (not to take into account non-financial considerations) will be generally applicable except in limited situations. As will emerge in the next section, however, it is the second sense (to make the optimum return taking only suitable risks) which applies too.

9.6.3 The standard of care of the prudent businessperson

The duty to invest as though a prudent businessperson acting for someone for whom one feels morally bound to provide

Having established that there is an obligation to avoid hazardous investments, there is a counter-balancing duty in the old case law on the trustee to generate the best possible return from the trust property in the circumstances. The trustee's general duties of investment can be summarised in the following three core principles: to act prudently and safely;¹⁰² to act fairly between beneficiaries;¹⁰³ and to do the best for the beneficiaries financially.¹⁰⁴ Evidently, there is a contradiction in these principles between acting prudently and making the maximum possible return on the property. In most cases, there will be an increased element of risk required in seeking to generate a higher investment return. The general encapsulation of this obligation is that the trustee bears a duty to invest as though she were a prudent businessperson acting for someone for whom she felt morally bound to provide.¹⁰⁵

Under the old authority of Learoyd v Whiteley,¹⁰⁶ when the trustee is investing trust property, she must not only act as a businessperson of ordinary prudence, but must also avoid all investments of a hazardous nature. The difficulty with this approach is that all investment necessarily involves some risk and therefore it is impossible for the trustees to make investments which are completely risk-free. A trustee can invest in less risky securities, or other property, such as deposit bank accounts, but that is still not entirely free of the risk, for example, that the bank would go into insolvency. Therefore, the old approach was modified slightly in Bartlett v Barclays Bank,¹⁰⁷ in which a distinction was drawn between a prudent

102 Learoyd v Whiteley (1887) 12 App Cas 727.

103 Bartlett v Barclays Bank [1980] Ch 515.

104 Cowan v Scargill [1984] 3 WLR 501.

105 Learoyd v Whiteley (1887) 12 App Cas 727.

106 Ibid.

107 [1980] Ch 515.

degree of risk and something which amounted to 'hazard'. The former, prudently taken risk, would be acceptable, whereas to put the trust fund in hazard would be unacceptable.

As this concept was put by Megarry VC, the trustees are required to:

take such care as an ordinary prudent man would take if he were minded to make an investment for the benefit of other people for whom he feels morally bound to provide.¹⁰⁸ This duty includes the duty to seek advice on matters which the trustee does not understand, such as the making of investments, and, on receiving that advice, to act with the same degree of prudence. Although a trustee who takes advice on investments is not bound to accept and act on that advice, he is not entitled to reject it merely because he sincerely disagrees with it, unless in addition he is acting as an ordinary prudent man would act.¹⁰⁹

The approach taken here is that the trustees are to focus primarily on the protection and maintenance of the trust fund, whilst also allowing it to grow steadily. The modern expectation of perpetual growth in investments, which has shored up the market in personal pensions and the UK housing market, suggests a contrary expectation.

The irony behind this search for the perfect conceptualisation of the trustee's investment obligations is that it will only be possible to know whether or not an investment is a good one when it has expired: until then, all is quite literally speculation. Furthermore, the trustees were required to take advice where necessary. Under s 6 of the Trustee Investments Act 1961, there was a statutory duty to consider the suitability of particular investments, especially in the light of the need for diversification: see now section 9.2 above for the general investment power created by the TA 2000. What is clear is that a trustee will not be allowed to invest in anything in which she has a personal interest.¹¹⁰

The duty to act fairly between beneficiaries

The duty to act fairly between the beneficiaries is primarily a product of the history of these trusts as family settlements in which the life tenant and the remainderman would both want to ensure that the trustees dealt equally as between income generation and the protection of capital under the trust. This rule is still observed in the modern case law, as in Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc,¹¹¹ where it was held that a trustee must act fairly where there are different classes of beneficiaries. As between life tenant and remainderman, the trustee must be aware of the interests of the remainder beneficiary. However, it was held that 'it would be an inhuman rule which required trustees to adhere to some mechanical rule for 108 A rendering of the concept of prudence in relation to trustees in Guernsey, a Francophile system of law based on Norman law at root, is put somewhat more lyrically as an obligation to act 'en bon père de famille': or, to put that into English, to act as though a good parent acting for his family. With all of the time-bound, gendered notions to one side, that gives a flavour of the trustee acting for someone for whom he or she felt morally bound to provide.

109 [1985] Ch 270, 289.

110 Re David Feldman Charitable Foundation (1987) 58 OR (2d) 626.

111 (1988): [2000] WTLR 795, per Hoffmann J; [1994] 1 All ER 118 CA. (This case was reported at first instance only some years after it was heard.)

preserving the real value of the capital when the tenant for life was the testator's widow who had fallen upon hard times and the remainderman was young and well-off⁷.

In the case of Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc,¹¹² the court held that the trustees were entitled to invest cautiously in a way which would not simply generate high levels of income but which would also maintain the fund's capital. In that instance, it appeared in evidence that the value of the fund after 60 years of management by the trustees was worth about a quarter of the prevailing market investment rate.¹¹³ Nevertheless, the trustees were able to demonstrate that their careful investment strategy was the sort of investment strategy which was adopted by most professional trustees when managing family trusts with an eye to the maintenance of the capital value of the fund for future generations and to the avoidance of risk so far as possible. Hoffmann J held that:

A trustee must act fairly in making investment decisions which may have different consequences for differing classes of beneficiaries. . . . The trustees have a wide discretion. They are, for example, entitled to take into account the income needs of the tenant for life or the fact that the tenant for life was a person known to the settlor and a primary object of the trust whereas the remainderman is a remoter relative or stranger. Of course, these cannot be allowed to become the overriding considerations but the concept of fairness between classes of beneficiaries does not require them to be excluded. It would be an inhuman rule which required trustees to adhere to some mechanical rule for preserving the real value of capital when the tenant for life was the testator's widow who had fallen upon hard times and the remainderman was young and well-off.¹¹⁴

In consequence, the rule permitted some reference to the precise issues which faced the trustee in the context of his own trust obligations and did not simply require that the trustees live up to an objective standard of proper performance. Ordinarily, then, the trustees and the life tenants are responsible to prevent the trust fund from falling into disrepair with the aim that the value of the trust fund be maintained for remainder beneficiaries. There are circumstances in which the preservation of the capital value of the asset may not depend upon the life tenant and the trustee maintaining that property if, for example, in the case of real property, the real value of the capital asset is bound up in the development potential of the land and not in the state of repair of a house on that land occupied by the life tenant.¹¹⁵ Therefore, it does appear that there is some flexibility in the operation of this principle.¹¹⁶

112 [2000] WTLR 795.

113 This case is considered in greater detail in the next paragraph.

114 Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [2000] WTLR 795, 802.

115 On the facts of an Australian case, it was held that where the life tenant had allowed a house on a large piece of land to fall into disrepair, there was no need to consider whether or not the life tenant was obliged to maintain the property so as to preserve its value for the capital beneficiaries, on the basis that the property's value rested on the development potential of the land rather than on the condition of the house on that land. Therefore, on these facts the life tenant's failure to maintain the property had caused no loss to the remainder beneficiaries: Perpetual Trustees WA Ltd v Darvell [2002] WTLR 1349.

116 Re Pauling's ST [1964] Ch 303.

The meaning of the concept of 'prudence'

The concept of 'prudence' is generally taken by trustees – especially the trustees of pension funds – to require that they act with caution and great care. It is thought that that is the natural meaning of the concept of prudence. However, the dictionary definition of 'prudence' is broader than that. The dictionary definitions include concepts of 'wisdom' and 'earning a profit'. Significantly, a prudent person is a person who has the wisdom to earn a profit; not simply a person who avoids all risks. More specifically, however, the standard of prudence in the case law is a concept which requires that a trustee act 'as a prudent man of business acting for someone for whom he feels morally bound to provide'.¹¹⁷ The idea that one acts for someone for whom one feels 'morally bound to provide' means that one must provide for those people, and therefore there is an obligation to make a profit bound up in that duty. This militates against prudence meaning only caution. It may also mean 'taking an appropriate level of risk, without incurring too much hazard'.¹¹⁸ Therefore, the idea of prudence is one which can be brought easily into the modern age in which investment managers are expected to manage risks – that is, to prevent losses being taken by reason of taking too much risk, and also to earn profits by taking suitable risks.

9.6.4 The management of risk through portfolio investment strategies

The courts have begun to accept the need to adapt to the manner in which financial markets and finance professionals operate in the modern context; that is, that such professionals will typically only agree to be retained for a fee, in accordance with existing regulation of financial services, and on the terms of conduct of business letters entered into between the advisor and the lay client. In this way, principles of equity relating to the investment powers and obligations of trustees have altered. So, in Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc,¹¹⁹ the beneficiaries alleged that the trustees who had managed the investment of a family trust between 1922 and 1986 had failed to generate sufficient profit. It was alleged that while the trust amounted to £269,203 in 1986, if properly invested over that same period, it should have amounted to over £1 million; even if it had risen only in line with the cost of living, then it would have amounted to £400,000. The trustee bank defended its management of the trust on the basis that it had generated a broadly similar return on capital for its clients as other banks investing large family trusts had generated for theirs. On these facts the judge at first instance had found that the bank had done no less than what had been expected of a trustee in managing such a fund. However, it was also found that the trustee would have been able to generate a much healthier return if it had realised that the fund would not have been subject to estate duty (such that the capital did not need to be maintained in the manner it was) and if it had realised that it should have switched a number of the investments into gilts (government index-linked securities). Importantly, the Court of Appeal held that there was no default committed by the trustees; rather, the plaintiff was contending that there had been a failure to do better, which is not the same thing. If the plaintiff could have demonstrated some misfeasance in the management of the trust, then liability would have been easier to demonstrate. However, the 117 Speight v Gaunt (1883) 9 App Cas 1; Learoyd v Whiteley (1887) 12 App Cas 727; Cowan v Scargill [1985] 2 Ch 270, 289, per Megarry V-C.

118 Cf Bartlett v Barclays Bank Trust Co Ltd. [1980] Ch 515.

119 [1993] 1 WLR 1260, [1994] 1 All ER 118.

trustee could not be shown to have acted wrongly in a manner which caused loss, only to have acted less profitably, which did not cause loss so much as it failed to generate a larger return.

In effect, the trustee bank was able to demonstrate that its management of the trust was broadly in line with the management policies of other trustees of private, family trusts (in which the risk appetite is usually small) and therefore that it had acted perfectly properly. Hoffmann J, in delivering judgment in Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc at first instance, held that:¹²⁰

Modern trustees acting within their investment powers are entitled to be judged by the standards of current portfolio theory, which emphasises the risk level of the entire portfolio rather than the risk attaching to each investment taken in isolation.¹²¹

In pursuing this point, his Lordship found that a trustee is required to act fairly between all the beneficiaries of the trust fund which he was empowered to invest. However, the reference back to the behaviour of trustees acting in the context of the modern financial markets indicates the appropriateness of trustees balancing their investments between different types of product to even out risk, as well as taking into account the necessary risk required to make the maximum return for the trust.

The position which the trustee is placed in by equity – that is, to achieve the highest return possible at the lowest reasonable level of risk – appears to be a deeply invidious one, unless some reference is made to common market practice; that is, unless the trustee is able to rely on the fact that comparable investors had adopted similar investment strategies. Otherwise, at every crash in a financial market, all trustees would be prima facie liable for failing to generate a high investment return.¹²² The duty to act evenly between different categories of beneficiaries requires a difficult balancing act between generating short-term return and protecting the integrity of the long-term fund. High-risk, short-term investments are necessary to satisfy the requirements of the rule to make the maximum possible return for the trust.¹²³ However, within that doctrine of maximum gain there is a requirement to act as a prudent person of business would act specifically with reference to someone for whom the trustee felt morally bound to provide (that is, over and above dealings in that person's own affairs).¹²⁴ The types of transaction available for the trustee's investment without stricture may be limited by the trust instrument¹²⁵ and by common law (aside from the requirement of prudence, there are prohibitions on lending on personal security).¹²⁶

The trustee is similarly required to supervise professionals to whom delegation of the investment function is made. The principle in *Learoyd v Whiteley*¹²⁷ indicates that the trustee 120 [2000] WTLR 795, approved at [1993] 1 WLR 1260; see also Thomas and Hudson, 2004, 1609; Underhill and Hayton, 2002, 598.

121 A discretionary portfolio manager is someone who is given freedom to decide what investments are made and what risks are taken – see generally Hudson, 1999:1.

122 See immediately above the discussion of Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [1993] 1 WLR 1260 in relation to 'current portfolio theory'.

123 Cowan v Scargill [1985] Ch 270.

124 Speight v Gaunt (1883) 22 Ch D 727.

125 Bartlett v Barclays Bank Trust Co Ltd [1980] Ch 515.

126 Holmes v Dring (1788) 2 Cox Eq Cas 1; Khoo Tek Keong v Ch'ng Joo Tuan Neoh [1934] AC 529.

127 (1887) 12 App Cas 727.

when investing trust property must not only act as a businessperson of ordinary prudence, but must also avoid all investments of a hazardous nature; whereas in Bartlett v Barclays Bank,¹²⁸ a distinction was drawn between a prudent degree of risk and unacceptable hazard: the former would be acceptable whereas the latter would not. In consequence, it is difficult to establish liability for a trustee who fails to generate a large return on the trust's capital. It is only in circumstances in which the trustee can be shown to have made some mistake or to have acted wrongly that there will seem to be any liability.

This reflection of current portfolio theory in the 2000 Act underlines the need for the trustee to walk a narrow line between modern practice and long-established equitable obligations. In this field, perhaps as in no other, the particular nature of the trust is important. The trust occupies a place somewhere between rules of property and rules of personal obligation. Whereas equity operates on the property that is held as the trust fund by means of proprietary principles, there are also a raft of personal claims against the trustee in connection with the manner in which the function of managing and safeguarding the trust fund is carried out.¹²⁹ There are obligations for a trustee making too little profit, making profits for herself which were not open to the trust,¹³⁰ and taking risks to make greater profit which then caused loss to the trust.¹³¹

9.6.5 Liability in accordance with standard market practice

Liability where the profit is too small can be defended if in accordance with standard market practice

The beneficiaries may seek to complain that while the trustees may have generated a profit, the profit is nevertheless too small. This particular line of attack was taken in Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc,¹³² in which the beneficiaries argued not that the trustees had lost them money, but rather that the trustees' surfeit of caution had caused a much reduced return on their capital than average market investment would have realised. Hoffmann J held that the trustees were entitled to have their actions measured in accordance with current portfolio theory and, furthermore, that they were entitled to have their actions compared with other market professionals. On the basis that the trustees had spread the investments and invested in the same manner as other market professionals, they were held not to have breached their duties. In this manner, the objectivity of the case law is fixed by reference to the activities or opinions not of any one trustee, but rather by reference to the practice of the market. Consequently, the trustees were held not to be liable for breach of trust on the basis that they had acted as other trustees in the same position would have acted. Similarly in Galmerrow Securities Ltd v National Westminster Bank plc,¹³³ trustees had

128 [1980] Ch 515.

129 As to the nature of trusteeship in this context, see Hayton, 1996, 47, emphasising the core of the nature of the trust being the ability of the beneficiary to enforce the trust by personal obligations enforceable against the trustee.

130 Cowan v Scargill [1985] Ch 270. See section 12.5 also.

131 Bartlett v Barclays Bank [1980] Ch 515.

132 [2000] WTLR 795.

133 [2002] WTLR 125.

invested in the UK property market in relation to an investment fund created specifically to invest in that market. Therefore, the investments which the trustees made were investments which were of a type which was specifically envisaged when the trust was created. The market fell in value and the beneficiaries sued the trustees for breach of trust. It was held, inter alia, that the trustees would not be liable for breach of trust because all participants in the marketplace had lost money and because the investments for which the trust had been set up were simply a type of investment which had the risk of loss inherent in them.¹³⁴

In a contradiction of the old requirement of prudence, it has been held that a failure to diversify a holding of government bonds into shares would itself be a breach of trust which would make the trustees liable to pay equitable compensation to the beneficiaries.¹³⁵ Identifying the level of compensation payable would be a difficult matter. It has also been suggested that one might look to the average return which would have been obtained by a reasonable investment professional over the same period of time.¹³⁶

The difficulty with identifying the 'market' with which to effect comparison

Attempting to defend oneself against a charge of failing to make insufficient profit based on an assertion that the entire market had acted in the same way raises the problem of identifying the market in question. If the trustee is a professional fund manager, then it may be possible to demonstrate in evidence the sorts of investment return which had been realised by similar market professionals, governed by the same regulation and dealing in very similar investments. However, there will not be such a market in relation to non-professional trustees. Even when considering professional trustees, it may be difficult to know whether to take as a comparator the entire investment market, or only professionals dealing in a defined market (such as shares quoted on the London Stock Exchange) but acting for all sorts of clients, or whether to consider only professionals dealing on such a market who were advising only trusts of the type in question. The answer which may be received for different market segments may be very different. Even if the market segment were limited, what variable ought to be included for pure chance: that is, what account does one take of the fact that one company may have gone into bankruptcy due to circumstances which were unforeseen (such as a fire at one of its factories) and so unbalance the investment portfolio when compared to other investment portfolios? The courts have, as yet, given no guidance on these questions and instead it will be a matter of adducing evidence and seeking to convince the court in each circumstance.

In relation to Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc itself, the evidence suggested that this process of measuring the trustees against the average market performance would not, however, be an entirely objective matter: rather, the court would look to other trustees investing on behalf of a similar type of risk-averse, family trust rather than taking as a comparator the entire equities market. It is suggested that such a process then becomes entirely circular. In deciding the question 'what sort of investment professionals should be taken as a 134 See para 9.9.3 for further discussion of this case.

135 Guerin v The Queen [1984] 2 SCR 335, (1984) 13 DLR (4th) 321; cited with approval in Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [1993] 1 WLR 1260, 1268, per Dillon LJ.

136 Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [1993] 1 WLR 1260, at 1268, per Dillon LJ and at 1280, per Staughton LJ.

comparator for the trustees in this instance?', the court will necessarily be asking the general question: 'is the investment performance of these trustees to be measured against the market generally or against a risk-averse, specialist investment community which would have performed as weakly as this particular trust?' It is the general question which needs to be addressed first because the more specific question is dependent upon it.¹³⁷ A large part of this question involves identifying the appropriate market: is it the entire stock market? Or is it just the market of private trustees investing on behalf of trusts of the sort at issue? Or is it to be measured by reference to some external market index? Once the court in Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc decided to limit its survey to trustees of the same type as the defendants, that necessarily produced the answer that the defendants had not acted inappropriately nor in breach of their investment duties. If any objective market index had been taken then the defendants would have seemed to be far behind the average. One other point remains: if the measurement is taken by reference to an average, then by definition there are likely to be as many people below the average as there were people above the average; and therefore that does not really answer the question whether or not there was a breach of trust, just whether or not the trustees underperformed approximately one half of other people in the market.

9.7 EXPRESS INVESTMENT POWERS

9.7.1 Priority of express powers of investment over statutory principles

An express power on a trustee to make an investment may be general, giving the trustees power to invest in whatever they wish, or limited to specific types of investment. The trustee will nevertheless be subject to certain limitations. Although in Re Harari's ST,¹³⁸ it was held that such a power would not be interpreted restrictively, the case of *Re Power's WT*¹³⁹ established that the word 'invest' implied a yield of income and, thus, non-income producing property would not be permissible as an investment. Therefore, while there is a permissive approach to interpreting investment clauses, it is important that it is 'investment' which is taking place. In Re Power, the trustee was relying on the investment provision to justify the acquisition of a house for the beneficiaries to live in. It was held that this acquisition did not include the necessary element of income generation for the trust. Thus, in Re Wragg,¹⁴⁰ it was permitted to acquire real property on the basis that that property was expected to generate income. It should be remembered that the trustee will have powers of investment both under any express power and under the TA 2000, as considered above at section 9.2.

137 The further point mentioned in Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc is that if the trustees choose investments which lose money from a selection of investment possibilities of which other possibilities would have made gains, the trustees will not be liable for a breach of trust provided that their investment decisions were reasonable in the context. The alternative view was advanced in Robinson v Robinson (1851) 1 De GM & G 247 to the effect that trustees could be liable for breach of trust if they selected the wrong investments. It is suggested that this goes too far and means that trustees could, in effect, become liable for breach of trust in any circumstance in which their investment choices lead to a loss without the trustees having acted negligently or inappropriately. It would replace a fault-based liability with a nearly strict liability.

138 [1949] 1 All ER 430.

139 [1951] Ch 1074; distinguishing Re Wragg [1919] 2 Ch 58.

140 [1919] 2 Ch 58.

9.7.2 Strict construction of powers of investment

The authorities are inconclusive on the manner in which powers of investment are to be construed. In general terms, provisions which have sought to enlarge the trustees' powers of investment have tended to be construed strictly,¹⁴¹ whereas other forms of trust power have not always been construed restrictively.¹⁴²

9.7.3 Power to confer investment powers on the trustees

Section 57 of the TA 1925 gives the court power to confer investment powers on the trustees. That section provides that:

Where in the administration of any property vested in trustees [any investment] is in the opinion of the court expedient, but the same cannot be afforded by reason of the absence of any power for that purpose vested in the trustees by the trust instrument, if any, or by law, the court may by order confer upon the trustees, either generally or in any particular instance, the necessary power for the purpose.

Therefore, the court is entitled to permit investments of a broad range, from mortgages and loans through to purchase or sales of assets generally, where the court considers it to be expedient. There are cases which have suggested that that power can be exercisable on a one-off basis or can almost be by way of an effective variation of the terms of the trust. However, recent authority has been concerned to prevent any alteration in the nature or scope of the beneficial interests under a trust by way of a s 57 application, precisely because the Variation of Trusts Act 1958 exists for that purpose.¹⁴³ Such transactions must be for the benefit of all of the beneficiaries and not for any particular beneficiary.¹⁴⁴ In cases involving large funds, the court may permit a large expansion of the trust investment powers to enable the retention of a professional fund investment manager. Thus, in Anker-Peterson v Anker-Peterson,¹⁴⁵ the investment powers of the trustees of a fund containing £4 million were expanded in this way so that the investment manager would be able to invest the fund in a commercially reasonable manner. Each case must be treated on its own merits, something which may be necessary even after the TA 2000 if the trust instrument had some express restriction on investment.¹⁴⁶ This provision is considered in greater detail at section 10.4.5 below.

141 Re Maryon-Wilson's Estate [1912] 1 Ch 55; Re Harari's Settlement Trusts [1949] WN 79.

142 Re Peczenik's Settlement Trusts [1964] 1 WLR 720.

143 Southgate v Sutton [2011] EWCA Civ 637.

144 Re Craven's Estate [1937] Ch 431.

145 (1991) LS Gaz 32.

146 Trustees of the British Museum v Attorney-General [1984] 1 WLR 418.

9.8 TRUSTEES AS AUTHORISED PERSONS UNDER THE FINANCIAL SERVICES AND MARKETS ACT 2000

9.8.1 The purpose of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000

The Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 ('FSMA 2000') is the principal legislation concerning the regulation of financial activity in the UK. By that Act, the Financial Conduct Authority ('the FCA') was created as the single principal regulator for financial activity in the UK. The objectives of the FCA, as established by that legislation, are to promote 'market confidence, public awareness, the protection of consumers, and the reduction of financial crime'.¹⁴⁷ For the purposes of this discussion, we are concerned with those circumstances in which trustees will be required to acquire authorisation from the FCA to sell investments to their beneficiaries (through the medium of the trust) whether in the form of a necessarily regulated structure like a unit trust or through a private express trust arrangement. On the concepts of finance law see Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance generally.¹⁴⁸ The Financial Services Act 2012 amended the FSMA 2000 so as to replace the Financial Services Authority with the Financial Conduct Authority and various subsidiary entities of the Bank of England,¹⁴⁹ although the detailed regulatory rules are continuing in effect in the same terms for the most part under the stewardship of these new regulatory entities where they have been implemented further to EU directives. Therefore, the following outline of the regulatory principles will continue to hold good as to their fundamentals.

9.8.2 Regulated activities of trustees and authorisation

The scope of the regulation of trustees by the FCA

Any person who carries on a regulated activity in the UK is required to obtain authorisation to do so from the FCA.¹⁵⁰ Therefore, one is not entitled to carry on investment activity as a business without authorisation,¹⁵¹ nor is one entitled to advertise the sale of any investment without FCA authorisation,¹⁵² nor is one entitled (in effect) to do any preparatory or inchoate act connected with engaging in investment activity.¹⁵³ The penalties for acting without authorisation vary from the unenforceability of any agreements formed by an unauthorised person¹⁵⁴ to criminal penalties for the breach of the code prohibiting financial promotion and advertisement.¹⁵⁵

147 FSMA 2000, s 2(2).

148 Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, 2nd edn, Sweet & Maxwell, 2013.

149 Various aspects of the FCA's work will be divided between the Financial Conduct Authority, the Prudential Regulatory Agency and also the Serious Fraud Office.

150 FSMA 2000, s 19.

151 Ibid.

152 Ibid., s 21.

153 Ibid., s 26.

154 Ibid., s 26.

155 Ibid., ss 21, 23.

In this discussion we shall first consider the case law on what it means to conduct investment activities by way of business such that one falls within the regulatory ambit of the FCA; and secondly we shall consider the terms of the Regulated Activities Order (RAO), which specifies which forms of trustee activity will be excluded from regulation and, by inference, which will not.

Trustees will be regulated under the FSMA 2000 by the FCA in circumstances in which they are conducting ‘regulated activities’¹⁵⁶ of a specified kind¹⁵⁷ and always providing that they do so ‘by way of business’.¹⁵⁸ The meaning of ‘activities carried on by way of business’ is defined by Treasury regulation, further to s 419 of the FSMA 2000, such that it applies to persons who deal in investments either as principal or as agent, including those safeguarding or administering investments, as well as those advising on investments within the context of the RAO. However, the appropriate regulation is very vague about the content of ‘business’ for these purposes, providing only that it applies to those dealing in investments either as principal or as agent, or safeguarding or administering investments, or advising on investments within the context of the Regulated Activities Order. The FCA rulebooks are similarly non-committal as to the meaning of the term ‘business’.¹⁵⁹ The only case in which the meaning of ‘business’ was considered within the financial services context was (in relation to s 63 of the old Financial Services Act 1986) in the case of Morgan Grenfell & Co v Welwyn Hatfield DC.¹⁶⁰ In that case, Hobhouse J suggested that there was no reason to impose a narrow meaning on that term for these purposes and that ‘it should not be given a technical construction but rather one which conformed to what in ordinary parlance would be described as a business transaction as opposed to something personal or casual’.¹⁶¹

This has been the tenor of most of the case law considering the meaning of the term ‘business’ in other contexts.¹⁶² The frequency of the investment activity might be a guide to, but not conclusive of, the question whether or not a business of investment is being carried on.¹⁶³ While many of the decided cases on the meaning of the term ‘business’ have emphasised the frequency with which the activity must be carried on to constitute a business, there are three other factors which must be of importance: whether or not the trustee takes a personal benefit beyond any fee ordinarily accruing to her under the terms of the trust, the amount of money involved in the trust fund, and the quantity and sophistication of the investment choices made.¹⁶⁴ Therefore, it is 156 Ibid, s 22(2), giving effect to s 22(1) by way of Sched 2.

157 That is, those listed in ibid, Sched 2, as considered below.

158 Ibid, s 22(1).

159 FCA, AUTH Module, Block 3, Chapter 2 (Regulatory Processes).

160 [1995] 1 All ER 1.

161 Ibid.

162 American Leaf Blending Co Sdn Bhd v Director General of Inland Revenue [1979] AC 676.

163 Morgan Grenfell & Co v Welwyn Hatfield DC [1995] 1 All ER 1.

164 Re Brauch [1978] 1 Ch 316, in which case it was accepted that for a business to be conducted, the defendant would need to be acting on behalf of other people. Cf R v Wilson [1997] 1 All ER 119, in which to be carrying on an insurance business one had to be acting for one’s own benefit and not for the benefit of others.

suggested that there are four general badges of business in this context: time,¹⁶⁵ volume,¹⁶⁶ profit¹⁶⁷ and quality.¹⁶⁸

The excluded categories of trustee activity under the Regulated Activities Order (RAO)

A rough rule of thumb would operate as follows: trustees will be covered by FCA regulation (under FSMA and the RAO) if they fall within any of the specified activities in the RAO; unless they benefit from any one of the six categories of exclusion (set out below) and provided they are not remunerated for their activities.

Trustees will be liable to regulation under FSMA 2000 if they carry on an activity which falls within the RAO. Trustees' liability to regulation will be excluded, however, if they fall within any of the exclusions provided by Article 66 of the RAO, dealing with 'Trustees, nominees and personal representatives'. In outline, those categories of person are fivefold. First, bare trustees (who are not acting as a principal in the transaction) will not fall within FCA regulation for the purposes of Article 25 of the RAO (dealing with making deals in investments on behalf of another), provided that such a bare trustee does not hold himself out as providing a service of buying and selling investments.¹⁶⁹ Secondly, a trustee will not be subjected to FCA regulation in relation to a transactions carried out in the administration of testamentary trusts.¹⁷⁰ Thirdly, a trustee will not be caught under Article 37 of the RAO (in relation to managing investments) unless 'he holds himself out as providing a service' or the assets are held as part of an occupational pension scheme.¹⁷¹ Fourthly, a trustee will not be caught under Article 40 of the RAO (in relation to safeguarding and administering investments) unless 'he holds himself out as providing a service' in that regard.¹⁷² Fifthly, a trustee will not be caught by FCA regulation under Article 45 of the RAO (in relation to sending dematerialised instructions) provided that the instruction relates to an investment held by him as trustee or as personal representative.¹⁷³ Sixthly, a trustee will be excluded from FCA

165 Smith v Anderson (1880) 15 Ch D 247 (speculative activity carried on frequently and over a long period of time is likely to indicate a business); Re Debtor ex p Debtor (No 490 of 1935) [1936] Ch 237. See also American Leaf Blending Co Sdn Bhd v Director General of Inland Revenue [1979] AC 676 (occasional dealings with capital assets may nevertheless indicate a business is the underlying purpose); Morgan Grenfell & Co v Welwyn Hatfield DC [1995] 1 All ER 1.

166 Re Griffin ex p Board of Trade (1890) 60 LJ QB 235; CIR v Marine Steam Turbine Co Ltd [1920] 1 KB 193 (where an activity is conducted only rarely it is unlikely to be a business, whereas regular repetition of activity is more likely to indicate a business).

167 Rolls v Miller (1884) 27 Ch D 71 (pleasure is not business); R v Crayden [1978] 1 WLR 604 (the generation of profit ordinarily indicates a business).

168 Eg, Calkin v IRC [1984] 1 NZLR 1, in which the New Zealand Court of Appeal considered that the term 'business' concerned 'the nature of the activities carried on including the period over which they are engaged in, the scale of operation and the volume of transactions, the commitment of time, money and effort, the pattern of activity and the financial results'.

169 The Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 (Regulated Activities) Order 2001, art 66(1).

170 Ibid, art 66(2).

171 Ibid, art 66(3).

172 Ibid, art 66(4).

173 Ibid, art 66(5).

regulation for the purposes of Article 53 of the RAO (advising on investments) if the advice is given to a fellow trustee or to a beneficiary.¹⁷⁴

However, there is an important limitation on these exclusions. In general terms, except for the first exclusion relating to bare trustees, none of these exclusions from regulatory oversight will apply so as to exclude that trustee from FCA regulation if the trustee is remunerated for supplying these services over and above any remuneration for acting as trustee in the ordinary way: that is, it would seem, if he is acting by way of business in relation to the investments.¹⁷⁵

It should be remembered that, under English law, many forms of trustee will not be caught by FCA regulation because their ordinary activities do not involve investment of the sort envisaged by the RAO: for example, trustees of land holding that land for the occupation of the beneficiaries. Only trustees involved in investment of the trust property will potentially fall within FCA regulation, in the manner considered above. The central question will therefore be whether or not a trustee, aside from these exemptions, falls within the scope of the business activities which are covered by the RAO.

9.8.3 Conduct of business regulation

If a professional trustee conducts business which falls within FCA regulation, then that trustee will be required to obey the Conduct of Business Sourcebook ('COBS'), which is the regulatory rulebook published and created by the FCA.¹⁷⁶ COBS implements the principles in the Markets in Financial Instruments Directive (MiFID). Specifically, COBS sets out the manner in which financial institutions are required to deal with their customers. The watchword of conduct of business regulation is 'suitability': that is, the trustee must deal with the customer in a suitable manner and the investments which are provided for the customer must be suitable for that customer's purposes. Therefore, as considered thus far in this chapter, the trustee will be held to the context in which she operates: so, complex investment activities will be inappropriate for risk averse family trusts and so forth. The trustee faces regulatory penalties and liability in tort for failure to sell appropriate investments to the trust, as well as potential liabilities as considered thus far for failure to perform the obligations of trustee properly.

Under COBS, regulated trustees are required, inter alia, to act 'honestly, fairly and professionally in accordance with the best interests of their clients',¹⁷⁷ which is referred to as the 'client's best interests' rule; the trustees are required to classify the level of expertise of the client against the regulatory categories and to treat the customer accordingly;¹⁷⁸ the trustees are required to ensure 'best execution' of each transaction for the customer, including obtaining the best available price.¹⁷⁹ The general requirement which underpins COBS is that when the seller communicates information to a customer, it must do so in a way which is 'clear, fair and not misleading'. The regulations provide that the seller must have regard to

174 Ibid, art 66(6).

175 Ibid, art 66(7).

176 FCA Handbook, Conduct of Business Sourcebook ('COBS') was introduced in 2007 to account for the Markets in Financial Instruments Directive (MiFID).

177 MiFID, art 19(1).

178 MiFID, art 19(4).

179 MiFID, art 21.

the level of knowledge which the buyer has of the transaction at issue when making written or oral communications. Further, the seller must ensure that its officers do not take any inducements or ‘soft commissions’ in effecting transactions. At the outset, the seller must provide a private customer with its terms of business before any designated business is conducted,¹⁸⁰ whereas intermediate customers must only be so informed within a reasonable period of the beginning of designated business being conducted.¹⁸¹ Those terms of business should include mention of the commencement of the terms of business, the applicable regulator, the investment objectives, any restrictions on the relevant designated business, which services will be provided, how payment for services will be effected, disclosure of any polarisation, whether the seller is to act as investment manager, any conflicts of interest, and whether or not the client has a right to withdraw.¹⁸² Conduct of business regulation imposes active obligations on regulated trustees above and beyond any in the trust instrument or in general trusts law.

9.8.4 Control of misfeasance by financial regulation

Market abuse

The market abuse code was introduced by the FSMA 2000 in order to expand the powers of the FCA to prosecute any market participants for any misfeasance in financial dealings. The importance of this regime is that it carries punitive penalties but that it does not replicate all of the protections and rights which are characteristic of the criminal law.¹⁸³ The market abuse regime relates to ‘qualifying investments’ traded on LIFFE, the London Stock Exchange and other markets¹⁸⁴ where the behaviour in question would be regarded by ‘a regular user of that market’ as a failure ‘to observe the standard of behaviour reasonably expected of a person in. . . their position in relation to the market’.¹⁸⁵ A ‘regular user’ is someone who is a ‘reasonable person who regularly deals on that market in investments of the kind in question’; the term ‘regular user’ appears frequently in this code.¹⁸⁶ More specifically, the behaviour in question must exhibit three further features. First, it must be based on information which is ‘not generally available to those using the market’ but which would be considered by a ‘regular user’ of the market to be ‘relevant’ to entering into transactions on that market.¹⁸⁷ Secondly, it must be ‘likely to give a regular user of the market a false or misleading impression’ as to the supply of, demand for and value of the investments in question.¹⁸⁸ Thirdly, the behaviour must be of a kind that would be ‘likely. . . to distort the 180 Except where the client is habitually resident outside the UK.

181 COB, 4.2.5.

182 COB, 4.2.15.

183 This in itself may cause difficulties in relation to Art 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights and its guarantees of a right to a fair trial. Its legislative purpose was therefore to make successful prosecutions for market abuse easier to obtain than had been the case under the pre-existing criminal law.

184 FSMA 2000, s 118(1).

185 Ibid, s 118(3).

186 Ibid, s 118(10).

187 Ibid, s 118(2)(a).

188 Ibid, s 118(2)(b).

market' in question.¹⁸⁹ To supplement this statutory code, there is a code of conduct (referred to as 'MAR 1' in the FCA Handbook)¹⁹⁰ which is required to be created by the FCA under the auspices of the FSMA 2000.¹⁹¹

Making misleading statements

The offence of making misleading statements is contained in s 397 of the FSMA 2000.¹⁹² That offence is committed in one of three circumstances. First, where a person makes a statement, promise or forecast which 'he knows to be misleading, false or deceptive in a material particular'.¹⁹³ What is not made clear in this context is what will constitute knowledge; that is, whether one can be taken to 'know' a statement is misleading only if they have actual knowledge, or whether it would be sufficient to have constructive notice of its misleading nature, or whether it would be sufficient that one has wilfully and recklessly failed to make the inquiries which an honest and reasonable person would have made in that context.¹⁹⁴ Secondly, where such a person 'dishonestly conceals any material facts' in relation to a statement, promise or forecast.¹⁹⁵ Again, it is unclear whether dishonesty in this context would require actual fraud or whether it could be established in circumstances in which the defendant fails to act as an honest person would have acted in the circumstances.¹⁹⁶ It is suggested that the latter would accord most closely with the 'reasonable user' test within the market abuse code more generally. Thirdly, where such a person 'recklessly makes (dishonestly or otherwise) a statement, promise or forecast which is misleading, false or deceptive in a material particular'.¹⁹⁷

Money laundering

The development of money laundering is significant in relation to trusts because trusts are an otherwise unregulated means by which ownership of assets can be hidden or obfuscated. The regulation of institutions, such as professional trustees, which operate accounts includes money-laundering regulation. In the UK, the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 ('POCA 2002') seeks to make provision for the treatment of the proceeds of criminal activity and the Terrorism Act 2000 makes provision for the treatment of funds which it is suspected will be applied for the purposes of terrorism. The POCA 2002 criminalised two principal activities: first, the receipt of any benefit from 'criminal property';¹⁹⁸ and, secondly, 'tipping off' a money 189 Ibid, s 118(2)(c).

190 Published under the Financial Services Authority, Market Conduct Sourcebook Instrument 2001 (MAR 1).

191 FSMA 2000, s 119.

192 Cf R v De Berenger (1814) 3 M & S 66.

193 FSMA 2000, s 397(1)(a).

194 Eg, Re Montagu's Settlement [1987] Ch 264.

195 FSMA 2000, s 397(1)(b).

196 Eg, Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378.

197 FSMA 2000, s 397(1)(c).

198 The principal offences under s 327 of POCA 2002 apply where a person either conceals, disguises, converts or transfers 'criminal property', or removes it from the jurisdiction. There are therefore five offences contained within this subsection, all of which relate to 'criminal property'. Criminal property is defined as being 'a person's benefit from criminal conduct or it represents such a benefit' or if 'the alleged offender knows or launderer. A third, and significant, purpose of the Act and regulations created in relation to it is to require the disclosure of specified types of dealing to the authorities. Sections 330, 331 and 332 of the POCA 2002 provide for a range of criminal offences in the event that there is a failure to disclose instances of money laundering, where the defendant knows or is suspicious of, or if the defendant has reasonable grounds to believe that money laundering offences have taken place.

For financial institutions which operate as trustees of complex trusts, there is a strict regulatory framework governing their activities to seek out money laundering. The Money Laundering Regulations 2007 ('MLR 2007')¹⁹⁹ implemented the EC Third Money Laundering Directive 2005.²⁰⁰ These regulations are then implemented and supplemented by the FCA in its Money Laundering Sourcebook in relation to regulated firms. The MLR 2007 impose standards of behaviour on financial institutions governing 'know your client' regulation in relation to customers. The entities which are governed by these regulations are the sorts of entities through which large or small amounts of cash, or in some cases securities, could be passed and so laundered more efficiently than in other contexts. The 'know your client' regulation at issue here is a requirement that the regulated entities confirm the identity of their customers and keep records in an appropriate fashion through their appropriately trained staff. The intention, in effect, is to erect a structure for observing client conduct so that a documentation trail will be prepared for any subsequent prosecution or investigative activity. The heart of the regulations is the set of obligations imposed on regulated persons to keep records and to report certain types of action. The regulated persons are required to conduct due diligence in relation to their customers. This must be done by using documents or other information which has been acquired from a reliable source. Regulated persons are required to ensure that they keep appropriate records of their dealings with their customers. This in turn requires that the regulated persons have staff who are suitably trained in their responsibilities to maintain such records.

Insider dealing

The legislative code on insider dealing was established under Part V of the Criminal Justice Act 1993 and is intended to deal with any situation in which a market participant abuses price-sensitive information which she acquires when acting as an insider when dealing in price-affected securities.²⁰¹ Further to the enactment of the FSMA 2000, the FCA has the power to prosecute any allegations of insider dealing.²⁰² suspects that it constitutes or represents such a benefit' (Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, s 340(3)). There is a separate offence under s 328 of POCA 2002 for any person who 'enters into or becomes concerned in an arrangement' which she 'knows or suspects facilitates (by whatever means) the acquisition, retention, use or control of criminal property by or on behalf of another person'. There is a further offence under s 329(1) of POCA 2002 if 'a person . . . (c) has possession of criminal property'.

199 SI 2007/2157.

200 Directive 2005/60/EC of 2005, which came into effect on 26 October 2005.

201 Criminal Justice Act 1993, s 52.

202 FSMA 2000, s 402. See Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, Sweet & Maxwell, 2009, Chapter 14.

9.9 BREACH OF TRUST AND INVESTMENT

9.9.1 The concept of 'loss' and breach of trust

Breach of trust in general terms

The leading case of Target Holdings v Redfern,²⁰³ discussed in detail in Chapter 18, sets out the nature of the trustee's liability for breach of trust. Target Holdings identifies three categories of liability: the liability to replace the trust fund; the liability to replace a cash equivalent to the value of the trust fund; and a liability to provide equitable compensation to the beneficiaries.²⁰⁴ In relation to investment, however, more complex questions arise as to whether or not there has been a loss suffered at all, for example, if an investment has been made in unauthorised investments when authorised investments might have realised a larger profit, or where another investment strategy altogether might have realised a greater profit. In such circumstances, it is not evidently an out-of-pocket loss but rather a loss of opportunity which has been suffered.

Investment in unauthorised investments

The core issue arising in this context revolves around the following problem: what if a trustee invests in something which is outside the scope of his authority? The question is whether or not the trustee should be required to replace the trust fund. In the context of investments in financial securities, the issue is whether the trustees are required to replace the stock which they have sold in breach of trust, or simply repay the cash equivalent of the sale. The answer suggested by the case of *Re Massingberd*²⁰⁵ is that the trustees should replace the stock that is sold and not simply provide a mere cash equivalent. This appears to coincide with the general right of the beneficiary in the property held in the trust and not simply an interest in an amount of value, which is dependent on the market value of the securities at any particular time, thus returning us to the core debate considered in Chapter 18 as to whether this area of law is concerned with rights in specific property or rights merely in relation to a given value attaching to different property from time to time.

Where unauthorised investments made a profit but a lesser profit than authorised investments

The issue nevertheless remains as to the value of unauthorised investments which must be replaced by authorised investments, particularly in circumstances in which the unauthorised investments generated a profit but arguably a lesser profit than authorised investments would have done. Usually, the trustee's duty is to restore the trust to the value it contained before the breach of trust,²⁰⁶ in which case the acquisition of an unauthorised investment which made a smaller profit than might have been made by an authorised investment would not disclose any loss. That is the first possible analysis. However, there is another possible analysis. The trustee might be held liable to account to the trust for the difference between 203 [1996] 1 AC 421, [1995] 3 WLR 352, [1995] 3 All ER 785.

204 Ibid.

205 (1890) 63 LT 296.

206 Nocton v Lord Ashburton [1914] AC 932, 952, per Lord Haldane LC.

the profit which was actually made from the unauthorised investments and the profit which would have been made by authorised investments on the basis that the trust lost the opportunity to make the larger profit. It has long been held that trustees can offset gains made, even through breaches of trust, against losses made through the same breach of trust, and therefore it is only for the difference in amounts of profit for which the trustee could be liable.²⁰⁷

It has been suggested in Australia that it would be open to the beneficiaries to surcharge the trustees' accounts for the failure to acquire the return on appropriate investments.²⁰⁸ The requirement on the trustee is that the trust fund be placed in the position it would have been in but for the trustees' breach of trust.²⁰⁹ In that sense, the trust would have been in possession of a greater profit but for the trustees' breach of trust and therefore that the trustees be required to fund the difference between those two amounts.

The practical difficulty would be in demonstrating as a matter of fact that the trustees would have been compelled to acquire a particular set of investments, which would have realised the profit contended for, from among the range of possible investments which would otherwise have been possible.²¹⁰ Suppose that within the class of authorised investments, investment x would have generated a larger profit than the unauthorised investments actually acquired, but that investment y from the class of authorised investments would have made a lower profit. How can the beneficiaries demonstrate that they have suffered an opportunity loss? After all, it is unlikely that all of the possible investments from the class of authorised investments would have generated the same level of profit and therefore the opportunity loss to the fund would be equally difficult to prove. Where some authorised investments would have generated a profit and others a loss, it is suggested that it would be impossible to prove as a matter of fact that the trust did in fact suffer a loss through the unauthorised investments.

9.9.2 Measurement of liability in accordance with standard market practice

As was considered above at para 9.6.5, to establish that a trustee – in particular a professional trustee – has acted in breach of her general duties to invest the trust property, it is often necessary to demonstrate that that trustee has acted differently from the rest of the investment market. Or, to put the point more precisely, the trustee will frequently be able to defend any suggestion that she has failed to act in accordance with her general duties of investment by demonstrating that her investment strategy was similar in its material respects with the rest of the investment market investing trust funds of a similar kind.²¹¹

207 Wiles v Gresham (1854) 2 Drew 258, 271; Fletcher v Green (1864) 33 Beav 426; Vyse v Foster (1872) 8 Ch App 309, affirmed at (1874) LR 7 HL 318; Re Deare (1895) 11 TLR 183.

208 Glazier v Australian Men's Health (No 2) [2001] NSW SC 6.

209 Re Dawson [1966] 2 NSWLR 211.

210 If the unauthorised investments were in bonds, whereas the class of authorised investments was limited exclusively to share markets, it would be difficult to prove that the trustees would have acquired shares which made a profit as opposed to shares which made a loss. Furthermore, it would be impossible to know precisely which shares would have been acquired and, because different shares would make different levels of profit, it would be impossible to demonstrate with exactitude the extent of the trust's loss. Alternatively, a broadbrush approach would be to use an index of bonds against an index of equities to estimate the loss.

211 Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [1993] 1 WLR 1260.

9.9.3 The validity of exclusion clauses under case law

Exclusion clauses in general terms

A provision in a trust instrument, or a contractual provision entered into between a trustee and some person employed to act on behalf of the trust, which restricts the liability of either the trustee or that other person will be valid unless it purports to limit that person's liability for dishonesty. Ordinarily, professional trustees will not agree to act unless their obligations are limited by contract. Paradoxically, this has the result that in the former situation, the trustee is punished for a lack of expertise if the trust does not generate a reasonable return, whereas in the latter, the professional trustee is absolved from any failure to generate a profit precisely by virtue of her expertise.²¹² The case of *Armitage v Nurse*²¹³ (decided before the enactment of the TA 2000, discussed above) held that a clause excluding a trustee's personal liability would be valid even where it purported to limit that trustee's liability for gross negligence. In explaining the limit of the trustee's obligations, Millett LJ had the following to say:

[T]here is an irreducible core of obligations owed by the trustees to the beneficiaries and enforceable by them which is fundamental to the concept of a trust. If the beneficiaries have no rights enforceable against the trustees there are no trusts. But I do not accept the further submission that their core obligations include the duties of skill and care, prudence and diligence. The duty of trustees to perform the trusts honestly and in good faith for the benefit of the beneficiaries is the minimum necessary to give substance to the trusts, but in my opinion it is sufficient . . . a trustee who relied on the presence of a trustee exemption clause to justify what he proposed to do would thereby lose its protection: he would be acting recklessly in the proper sense of the term.

The approach of the court would have been different if the trustees had acted dishonestly or fraudulently: in such a situation, the exclusion clause would have had no effect in the opinion of the court. To demonstrate that there has been fraud would be difficult to prove in a situation in which the trustee did not take any direct, personal benefit. The more likely ground for any claim brought by the beneficiaries would be that the trustee had breached a duty to act fairly between the beneficiaries or to do the best possible for the beneficiaries within the limits of current portfolio theory, all of which were considered above.²¹⁴ This area of law was analysed in detail in section 8.5.

Exclusion of liability where there is negligence in the management of investments

The issue of the exclusion of liability in an investment contract was considered in Galmerrow Securities Ltd v National Westminster Bank plc,²¹⁵ a case in which the fiduciaries in a unit trust scheme, here the National Westminster Bank, had expressly excluded their liability for 212 Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241.

213 Ibid.

214 See para 9.5.2 above.

215 [2002] WTLR 125, at 155.

the exercise of their investment obligations except in cases of negligence or fraud. The beneficiaries contended that the scheme managers had been negligent in their investment of the bulk of the fund in the real property market. The scheme managers contended that it would have been impossible to have amended their investment powers so as to have avoided the investment objectives of the unit trust and to have extracted the fund's investments from the real property market before it collapsed. The court held that:

The venture was a speculation and like all speculations carried with it the risk of failure. It would not be right to visit the consequences of that misjudgment of the market upon NatWest which is not shown to have had any power open to it which would remedy or mitigate the consequence . . . it is not negligent to fail to act where no alternative course of conduct to the continuance of the present arrangement is proved to have been available to the person who has a power to act.

Therefore, the circumstances precluded the trustees from suffering liability because there was no other course of action open to them. The trust's objective of speculating on the property market was, quite simply, a speculation which failed. It was, perhaps, a result of the intractability of the terms of the trust and of the requirement that those terms be sufficiently rigid to attract the approval of the fund's regulators that this speculation could not be undone.

9.9.4 Different levels of liability for different types of trustee

A trust can be used specifically for investment purposes. Unit trusts, pension funds (considered in Chapter 24) or even investment vehicles like hedge funds (occasionally structured as trusts, rather than companies or partnerships) are all based on the ordinary principles of trust. In such a situation, the trustees will be investment professionals with suitable expertise to choose between the available investment options. The terms of the trust will incorporate specific provisions (forming a contract with those professional trustees) under which the trustees agree to offer their services. As considered above, this contractual limitation in investment situations generally takes the form of a 'conduct of business' letter constructed to comply with the FCA's regulatory rules.

Alternatively, the trustee may be someone who has no expertise in financial markets but who is responsible for the trust fund. The question will therefore be as to the comparative levels of obligation to generate the best possible return from the trust. In considering unit trusts and pension funds, there are particular regulatory and statutory regimes which cover those particular entities over and above the general rules of trustee liability. Evidently, the nature of the trust property itself will have an impact on the extent of that obligation in any particular circumstance: land has different investment qualities from financial securities from valuable oil paintings. Necessarily different forms of property will necessitate subtly different forms of investment obligation.

What is complex about the investment trust is that the beneficiary is frequently only interested in the return which the investment promises and not particularly interested in establishing meaningful ties of ownership with the property which comprises the trust. In relation to trusts over a house which the beneficiaries occupy as their home,²¹⁶ there will necessarily be close ties of 216 Considered in Chapter 16.

ownership such that the beneficiaries will be particularly concerned to ensure that the trustees maintain the home for their benefit and also for their occupation. By contrast, participants in a unit trust scheme are comparatively uninterested in forging emotional bonds with the scheme property and instead are almost entirely concerned with the profit which the scheme manager (or, for our purposes, trustee) can generate on their behalf. Participants in a unit trust are beneficiaries and the scheme property is held on trust for them, but there is also an investment contract between the scheme manager and the participants which is the core of their relationship in commercial terms. Therefore, the topic of investment of trust funds cuts to the heart of the nature of trusteeship because the manner in which the fund is invested and the property maintained will differ markedly from context to context. The standard of behaviour expected from a professional investment manager acting as a trustee therefore ought to reflect both its expertise and the parties common intention in generating the maximum possible profit; by contrast, family trusts relating to land will be concerned to maintain the land and family trusts over money and will generally wish to take less risk in their investment portfolio than commercial parties would.²¹⁷

9.9.5 Limitation of liabilities arising under statute

Liabilities under the Trustee Act 2000

The provisions of the TA 2000 can be expressly or implied displaced by the trust instrument.²¹⁸ In consequence, this duty of care may be limited by the express provisions of the trust, or even by a construction of those provisions which suggests that the settlor's intention was to exclude such a liability. The duty of care is not expressed by the 2000 Act to be a general duty in the form of an all-encompassing statutory tort. Rather, the Act provides that the duty will apply in certain limited circumstances.²¹⁹ The principal instance in which the statutory duty of care applies²²⁰ is in relation to a trustee exercising a 'general power of investment'²²¹ under the Act or any other power of investment 'however conferred'.²²² Alternatively, the duty of care applies when trustees are carrying out obligations under the Act in relation to exercising or reviewing powers of investment.²²³ The duty of care also applies in relation to the acquisition of land,²²⁴ which would logically appear to cover the use of appropriate advice and appropriate levels of care in selecting the land, contracting for its purchase and insuring it.²²⁵ It applies in general terms in relation to the appointment of agents, custodians and nominees:²²⁶ which would include the selection of reasonable agents with appropriate qualifications for the task for which they were engaged.

217 Cf para 22.4.3 below.

218 TA 2000, Sched 1, para 7.

219 Ibid, s 2.

220 Ibid, Sched 1, para 1.

221 As defined by ibid, s 3(2) and considered below.

222 With the effect that this provision may be only mandatory provision in the legislation because it appears to apply to powers of investment in general and not simply to that set out in the TA 2000, s 3(2). However, the Act does permit an express exclusion in the trust to obviate the operation of any of the provisions in the Act and therefore it would appear possible to circumscribe the operation of this provision: TA 2000, Sched 1, para 7.

223 TA 2000, ss 4, 5.

224 Ibid, Sched 1, para 2.

225 Ibid, Sched 1, para 5; TA 1925, s 19.

226 Ibid, Sched 1, para 3.

Authorised persons under the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000

The principles relating to the trustees' ability to exclude or limit their liability by contract were considered in Chapter 8.²²⁷ In relation to trustees who are regulated by the FCA, there are regulations as to the conduct of investment business which prevent the regulated (or, authorised) person from relying on contractual provisions which are inappropriate for that type of customer, as described under the conduct of business regulations.²²⁸

9.10 THE SELECTION AND MANAGEMENT OF PARTICULAR TYPES OF INVESTMENT

9.10.1 The duty in general terms

The extent of the trustee's obligation to intervene in the investments held by the trust is illustrated starkly by *Bartlett v Barclays Bank*²²⁹ in which, despite a near-total shareholding, the trustees failed to be forewarned about a disastrous property speculation made by the company in which the trustees had invested. The questions arose as to the scope of the duty of the trustee; the extent to which the trustee bank had been in breach of that duty; whether any such breach of duty had caused the loss suffered by fund; and the extent to which the trustee bank was liable to make good that loss.

It was held that the standard of observation and control in relation to the investments was the 'same care as an ordinary prudent man of business would extend towards his own affairs'. That left the question as to the nature of the obligation: it was held that 'the duty rather is to take such care as an ordinary prudent man would take if he were minded to make an investment for the benefit of other people for whom he felt morally bound to provide'. Therefore, the trustee's obligation is to treat the beneficiaries as though they were effectively dependant children for whom the trustee would be required to provide. The trustee would be permitted to take risks but not to expose the beneficiaries to hazard within the scope of that investment policy.

Given that the trustees in that case had been investing in a private company, the trustees' obligation was to 'ensure an adequate flow of information in time to make use of controlling interest'. In other words, in some situations the trustee will be required to intervene and ensure that she is able to amass sufficient information to manage the investment. All that can be said in summary of this area of the law is that it will depend on the context; where the trustee has access to some control of a company, then the trustee would be expected to procure some control in return for that significant investment, whereas a trustee holding only a small investment in a large public company would not have such control (unless a trustee of a particularly large pension fund, for example) and therefore would not be expected to exert such control.

9.10.2 When the trust property includes a controlling interest in a company

The application of these general principles to the situation in which trust property includes a controlling interest in a company was considered in Re Lucking's WT.²³⁰ It was said that the

227 See para 8.5.1 above.

228 See generally Thomas and Hudson, 2004, 1505 et seq.

229 [1980] Ch 515.

230 [1968] 1 WLR 866.

trustee should not simply consider the information she receives as shareholder, but should, in some way, ensure that she is represented on the board. The extent of such representation will depend upon the circumstances: she may be required to act as managing director or she may only need to ensure that she has a nominee on the board who can report back. This principle was interpreted more liberally in Bartlett v Barclays Bank,²³¹ in which it was said that the trustee need not always be represented on the board if the circumstances did not require this, provided that the trustee retained a sufficient flow of information from the company in accordance with the size of the shareholding. Other methods of control over the company's affairs may be sufficient depending on the context.

9.10.3 When the trust property includes a mortgage

There has been much discussion as to whether power to invest in mortgages allows investment in equitable and second mortgages. In view of the objections to the latter put forward in Chapman v Browne,²³² it seems unlikely that the latter, at least, are permissible notwithstanding the removal of the objection concerning protection by the Land Charges Act 1972.

Section 8 of the TA 1925 provides guidelines for a trustee investing in a mortgage to follow. If she does so, she will not subsequently be liable if the security later proves to be insufficient, in line with the following: the trustee must invest on the basis of a report prepared by an able and independent surveyor or valuer as to the value of property;²³³ the amount of the loan must not exceed two-thirds of the value as stated in the report;²³⁴ and the report expressly advises the loan, in which case the trustee is entitled to presume that this advice is correct.²³⁵

If the only aspect of non-compliance with s 8 is the amount loaned, s 9 of the TA 1925 still offers some protection in that the trustee will only be liable for the difference between the amount in fact lent and the amount which should have been lent. In addition to following the general principles, a trustee must limit the investments to those authorised either by the trust instrument or by statute.

9.10.4 Duty to control delegates under the case law

In section 9.2, the specific context of the delegation of trustee powers was considered in relation to the TA 2000. It is possible to exclude those provisions expressly in the trust instrument. This discussion considers the way in which the case law has developed principles to govern the manner in which trustees are to be held responsible for any failure to control the actions of anyone to whom their powers are delegated. In the context of delegating authority to investment, the classic statement of the trustee's obligation is set out in *Speight v Gaunt*²³⁶ in the decision of Lord Jessel MR:

231 [1980] Ch 515.

232 (1801) 6 Ves 404.

233 TA 1925, s 8(1)(a).

234 Ibid, s 8(1)(b).

235 Ibid, s 8(1)(c); Shaw v Cates [1909] 1 Ch 389.

236 (1883) 9 App Cas 1.

It seems to me that on general trust principles a trustee ought to conduct the business of the trust in the same manner that an ordinary prudent man of business would conduct his own, and that beyond that there is no liability or obligation on the trustee.

Exceptionally in Re Vickery,²³⁷ where a trustee had given money to solicitor who absconded with it, Maugham J considered the central issue to be whether the trustee was negligent in employing the solicitor or permitting money to remain in his hands. It was held that there was no liability on the trustee unless there had been some ‘wilful default’ by him, being something more than a mere lack of care. This test has come in for much academic criticism,²³⁸ being based on Re City Equitable Fire Insurance,²³⁹ which was a company law case looking at the obligations of company directors and auditors in the context of specific articles of association.

Jones contends that the better test is one based on ‘want of reasonable care’ rather than ‘wilful default’. It is said by some commentators that the test for trustees ought to be higher. Similarly, Hayton argues that there are problems with delegation to market makers or to finance professionals who will deal on their own account, as well as providing financial products for their clients; that is, market makers sell their clients securities which the market maker already owns rather than going to buy securities on the open market to the client’s order. Consequently, there is a conflict of interest between such market makers’ desire to offload at a profit securities which they have already bought instead of focusing entirely on identifying securities in the broader marketplace which might have been more advantageous to the client. In his suggestion, it would be better to subject this area to control by established market regulators such as the FCA.

The core issue appears to be whether or not the law should recognise that the beneficiaries (ultimately) have to rely on market professionals to do things which trustees cannot do. Within that recognition must be some recognition of the role of market regulators and the shortcomings of regulation. The requirement of equity that beneficiaries under trusts should be insulated from risk of market movement and personnel default (whether by trustees or market professionals) in making investment decisions does not accord with the basis upon which financial professionals are prepared to enter into terms of business. The client is required to accept the risk of loss as well as the possibility of gain. In this context, equity must also consider how to balance the need to make best profit against requirement not to lose trust money. One solution might be to grant an automatic trustee indemnity where the trustee is able to obtain an indemnity from the market professional, thus freeing trustees from the need to control that which they cannot control in generally standard form ‘terms of business’ letters.

The context of risk is therefore problematic in equity. The courts have imposed near strict liability in the context of fiduciaries.²⁴⁰ The decision of the Privy Council in *Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan*²⁴¹ indicates a growing acceptance of reckless risk-taking as part

237 [1931] 1 Ch 572.

238 Jones, 1968; Hayton, 1990:2.

239 [1925] Ch 407.

240 Bartlett v Barclays Bank [1980] Ch 515; Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [1993] 1 WLR 1260, [1994] 1 All ER 118.

241 [1995] 2 AC 378.

of the unconscionable behaviour against which equity will act.²⁴² However, the attitude of the House of Lords in *Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington*²⁴³ (for example) failed to accept the commercial context of risk management as something which ought similarly to be encompassed in granting remedies. The context of equitable proprietary remedies remains outwith the ambit of these developing principles, except for the protection of beneficiaries.

242 See Chapter 12.

243 [1996] AC 669.

The powers of trustees and the variation of trusts

10.1	GENERAL POWERS OF TRUSTEES	472
10.1.1	The nature of trustees' powers	472
10.1.2	Power to give receipts	472
10.1.3	Power to compromise	472
10.2	POWERS OF MAINTENANCE AND ADVANCEMENT	473
10.2.1	Powers of maintenance in relation to infant beneficiaries	473
10.2.2	Powers of advancement	477
10.3	DELEGATION OF TRUSTEES' DUTIES	479
10.3.1	The appointment of agents, custodians and nominees by the trustees	479
10.3.2	Agents	480
10.3.3	Nominees and custodians	481
10.3.4	Powers of attorney	481
10.3.5	Liability for the acts of delegates	482
10.3.6	The applicable standard of care for trustees under the case law	482
10.3.7	An alternative approach	482
10.3.8	The devolution of powers or trusts	483
10.4	VARIATION OF TRUSTS	484
10.4.1	Variation of trusts	484
10.4.2	Duty not to deviate from the terms of the trust	485
10.4.3	The Variation of Trusts Act 1958	486
10.4.4	The general principle governing identification of a variation as opposed to a resettlement	488
10.4.5	There must be a benefit in the variation	490
10.4.6	Variation of trusts as part of divorce proceedings	492
10.4.7	Disagreement between different beneficiaries	493
10.4.8	Other statutes permitting deviation from terms of the trust	494
10.5	LIMITS ON THE EXERCISE OF POWERS	496
10.5.1	Excessive exercise of a power	496
10.5.2	Fraud on a power	496

10.1 GENERAL POWERS OF TRUSTEES

10.1.1 The nature of trustees' powers

This chapter is concerned with trustees' powers, whereas the previous two chapters have focused primarily on the trustees' obligations and only considered their powers in relation to the investment of the trust property. There are two contexts in which trustees have powers.¹ The first context was considered in Chapter 3 in relation to the powers granted to trustees or other fiduciaries in relation to the administration of property: that is, the distinction between trust obligations, discretionary trust powers, fiduciary mere powers and personal powers. The second context relates to the inherent capabilities of trustees in general terms, beyond any specific provision in a trust instrument. This chapter is concerned with this second form of power.² The trustee is the legal owner of the trust property and as such must have a number of powers to use that property, beyond any rights or powers set out in the trust instrument. General powers granted by the law of trusts supplement the trust instrument,³ where those powers are not expressly excluded by the trust instrument or are not inconsistent with the terms of that instrument.⁴ Of particular importance in practice are the powers of maintenance and advancement, considered in section 10.2 below, and the power to delegate, considered in section 10.3.

10.1.2 Power to give receipts

Trustees have an implicit power to give receipts. The question is then as to the ability of such receipts to discharge third parties from any liability owed to the trust. Under statute, however, the giving of a receipt is a sufficient discharge from liability for the misapplication of trust property for anyone dealing with a trust.⁵

10.1.3 Power to compromise

Trustees are empowered under statute to compromise in litigation. Two trustees or a trust corporation may reach such a compromise; a sole trustee may only do so as permitted by statute generally (and so may not accept sale proceeds in relation to land for example).⁶ The trustees personally will incur no liability provided that they have acted with due care as required by the duty of care under s 1(1) of the TA 2000.⁷ There may be an adequate

1 The discussion in this chapter draws both on previous editions of this work and also on the discussion variously in Thomas and Hudson, 2004. The section on powers draws also on Thomas, 1998 generally.

2 It was during the 18th century that it was recognised that trustees could only exercise powers granted to them by a trust instrument, as opposed to an earlier understanding of the trust which conceived of the trustee as the absolute owner of the trust property: Holmes v Dring (1788) 2 Cox Eq Cas 1. The doctrine of powers is a means of understanding the trustee as having capabilities limited to the particular rights granted to them by the settlor and then as seeing the trustee as having capabilities rather than being hemmed in by obligations.

3 TA 1925, s 69(2).

4 IRC v Bernstein [1961] Ch 399, 412, per Lord Evershed MR.

5 TA 1925, s 14(1).

6 Ibid, s 15(1).

7 Ibid. Previously, before the 2000 Act, the trustee had been required to act prudently and in good faith: Re Owens (1882) 47 LT 61.

compromise if the trustees would, for example, resolve a long-standing dispute, even if the compromise did not in itself achieve equal financial benefits between all of the interested parties.⁸ Thus, a suitable compromise may be one which is suitable in all the circumstances and not simply in the best financial interests of the beneficiaries (provided that no unnecessary loss is suffered).⁹ The trustees therefore have a complete discretion to act as they see fit, provided that they can justify their actions.¹⁰

10.2 POWERS OF MAINTENANCE AND ADVANCEMENT

The issues considered in this section concern the powers of trustees to deal flexibly with the trust fund so that they can best meet the needs of their beneficiaries. It must be remembered that the trustees are required to carry out the terms of the trust, or face liability for breach of trust. Furthermore, the trustees will be liable (as considered further below) to act without favour or prejudice between all the beneficiaries so that no particular individual or class receives preferential treatment, again on pain of liability for breach of trust. However, those precise trusts provisions may prove too rigid in circumstances in which the settlor had not anticipated that beneficiaries may, for example, suffer hardship in the short term as a result of a trust provision which requires the trustees to accumulate income rather than pay it out immediately to beneficiaries. Therefore, it is necessary to examine the powers which trustees have under general trusts law to apply trust property for the maintenance of beneficiaries. The issue of the variation of trusts to protect vulnerable beneficiaries is considered in section 10.4 below.

10.2.1 Powers of maintenance in relation to infant beneficiaries

Trusts created for the maintenance of particular beneficiaries attract a specific statutory regime. Sections 31 and 32 of the TA 1925 give trustees wide powers to use income and capital for the maintenance of infant beneficiaries and for the advancement and benefit of all beneficiaries. These principles apply provided that the trust instrument shows no contrary intention. The following discussion divides between general entitlement to income, entitlement to income in particular situations and entitlement to capital.

Income under a trust held for infant beneficiaries

In the absence of any express power, income under a trust can be used for the benefit of a beneficiary who is not in receipt of such income under s 31 of the TA 1925. Alternatively, such an order may be made under the court's inherent jurisdiction. The statutory power provides as follows:

- (1) Where any property is held by trustees in trust for any person for any interest whatsoever, whether vested or contingent, then, subject to any prior interests or charges affecting that property –

8 Re Earl of Stafford [1980] Ch 28, 33, per Megarry VC.

9 See, eg, Re Ridsdel [1947] Ch 597.

10 Ibid, and Partridge v Equity Trustees Executors and Agency Co Ltd (1947) 75 CLR 149.

- (i) during the infancy of any such person, if his interest so long continues, the trustees may, at their sole discretion, pay to his parent or guardian, if any, or otherwise apply for or towards his maintenance, education, or benefit, the whole or such part, if any, of the income of that property as may, in all the circumstances, be reasonable, whether or not there is –
 - (a) any other fund applicable to the same purpose; or
 - (b) any person bound by law to provide for his maintenance or education.¹¹

Clearly, therefore, this provision grants great largesse to the trustees in relation to infant beneficiaries. The courts have accepted that even though a settlor has postponed the beneficiaries' rights to property, it is nevertheless open to the courts to infer an intention on the settlor's part to provide for the maintenance of any children.¹² It has been accepted that this is the only situation in which a court will interfere with a testator's intention as set out in her will.¹³ The potential issue for the trustee is the need to demonstrate that the decision taken was indeed reasonable. This may raise issues concerning the need to deal evenly between different beneficiaries. Section 31 continues to consider the position of minors to income:

- (ii) if such person on attaining the age of eighteen years has not a vested interest in such income, the trustees shall thenceforth pay the income of that property and of any accretion thereto . . . to him, until he either attains a vested interest therein or dies, or until the failure of his interest.¹⁴

Therefore, trustees are able to circumvent restrictions on entitlement to income being precluded before the beneficiary reaches the age of majority. In general terms, it is provided that ' . . . the trustees shall have regard to the age of the infant and his requirements and generally to the circumstances of the case . . .'.¹⁵ The power under s 31 is covered by a proviso in the following terms:

Provided that, in deciding whether the whole or any part of the income of the property is during a minority to be paid or applied for the purposes aforesaid, the trustees shall have regard to the age of the infant and his requirements and generally to the circumstances of the case, and in particular to what other income, if any, is applicable for the same purposes; and where trustees have notice that the income of more than one fund is applicable for those purposes, then, so far as practicable, unless the entire income of the funds is paid or applied as aforesaid or the court otherwise directs, a proportionate part only of the income of each fund shall be so paid or applied.¹⁶

The principal function of s 31 'appears to be to supply a code of rules governing the disposal of income, especially during a minority, in cases where a settlor or testator has made dispositions of capital and either (a) being an unskilled draftsman has not thought about income, or 11 TA 1925, s 31(1)(i).

12 Re Collins (1886) 32 Ch D 229, 232, per Pearson J.

13 Chapman v Chapman [1954] AC 429, 456, per Lord Morton.

14 TA 1925, s 31(1)(ii).

15 Ibid, s 31(1)(i).

16 Ibid, s 31(1).

(b) being a skilled draftsman, has been content to let the statutory code apply'.¹⁷ The trustees can use the income for the 'maintenance, education or benefit' of an infant beneficiary under a trust whose interest carries 'intermediate income', as defined below.

Section 31 can be ousted where there is an express or implied contrary intention in the trust instrument. Such provisions are generally interpreted strictly, and therefore such a provision will not be effected where that would be inconsistent with the purposes of the trust instrument.¹⁸ In Re Delamere's ST, an appointment of income to six minors 'in equal shares absolutely' was held to reveal an intention that each was to take an indefeasible share even if dying before reaching the age of 18.

To the extent that it is not so used, the income must be accumulated and added to the capital of the trust fund.¹⁹ If the infant dies before reaching the age of 18 or marrying, her estate will not be entitled to these accumulations even if her interest is vested.²⁰ At the age of 18, or if there is a marriage at an earlier age, the income (but not the accumulated income) will be paid to the beneficiary.²¹ The beneficiary becomes entitled to the accumulation when she becomes entitled to the capital.

It is necessary to make a time apportionment when there is an alteration in the class of income beneficiaries. The case of *Re Joel*²² concerned a fund which was held upon trust for the testator's grandchildren contingent on their attaining 21, and where the gift carried the intermediate income, which could be applied for the benefit of the grandchildren. Goff J held that each time a member of the class died under the age of 21, or a new grandchild was born, the income of the trust ought to be apportioned so that each member of the class enjoyed only that part of the income attributable to the period for which she was alive.

Application of income during the infancy of the beneficiary

It is provided in s 31(2) of the TA 1925 that during a beneficiary's infancy the property is to be accumulated in the following manner:

During the infancy of any such person [as mentioned in s 31(1) above], if his interest so long continues, the trustees shall accumulate all the residue of that income by investing it, and any profits from so investing it, from time to time in authorised investments, and shall hold those accumulations as follows –

- (i) If any such person –
 - (a) attains the age of eighteen years, or marries under that age, and his interest in such income during his infancy or until his marriage is a vested interest; or
 - (b) on attaining the age of eighteen years or on marriage under that age becomes entitled to the property from which such income arose in fee simple . . . or for an entailed interest;

¹⁷ Re Delamere's ST [1984] 1 WLR 813.

¹⁸ Ibid.

¹⁹ TA 1925, s 31(2).

²⁰ Re Delamere's ST [1984] 1 WLR 813.

²¹ Ibid.

²² [1943] Ch 311.

the trustees shall hold the accumulations in trust for such person absolutely, but without prejudice to any provision with respect thereto contained in any settlement by him made under any statutory powers during his infancy, and so that the receipt of such person after marriage, and though still an infant, shall be a good discharge; and

- (ii) In any other case the trustees shall, notwithstanding that such person had a vested interest in such income, hold the accumulations as an accretion to the capital of the property from which such accumulations arose, and as one fund with such capital for all purposes, and so that, if such property is settled land, such accumulations shall be held upon the same trusts as if the same were capital money arising therefrom;

but the trustees may, at any time during the infancy of such persons if his interest so long continues, apply those accumulations, or any part thereof, as if they were income arising in the then current year.

Thus, the trustees are obliged to accumulate income during the beneficiary's infancy in the context set out above.

'Maintenance, education or benefit'

The trustees are empowered to employ trust property for the maintenance, education or benefit of a beneficiary – consequently, it is important to know what these words mean. Generally, they are given a broad meaning.²³ The property may be applied directly to the benefit of the beneficiary or held on trust for that beneficiary absolutely,²⁴ or held contingently on the beneficiary's majority.²⁵ When deciding whether to use the income for such purposes, the trustees must consider the age and requirements of the infant, whether other income is available for her maintenance and the general circumstances of the case. If the discretion is exercised in good faith, the court will not interfere.²⁶ The trustee is required to consider what use of the property would be in the best interests of the beneficiary. This will include a consideration, in many circumstances, of the circumstances of the infant's parents, as set out in the following dicta:

In considering [the benefit of the infant], they should take into account that the father is not of sufficient ability properly to maintain his child, and that it is for her benefit not merely to allow him enough to pay her actual expenses, but to enable him to give her a better education and a better home. They must not be deterred from doing what is for her benefit because it is also a benefit to the father, though, on the other hand, they must not act with a view to his benefit apart from her.²⁷

On reaching the age of majority, an accumulated, unapplied income then passes to the formerly-infant beneficiary.²⁸

23 Re Heyworth's Contingent Reversionary Interest [1956] Ch 364, 370.

24 Re Vestey's Settlement [1951] Ch 209.

25 Pilkington v IRC [1964] AC 612.

26 Bryant v Hickley [1894] 1 Ch 324.

27 Re Lotfhouse (1885) 29 Ch D 921, 932, per Cotton LJ.

28 Stanley v IRC [1944] 1 KB 255, 261, per Lord Greene MR.

'Intermediate income'

A vested gift will always carry intermediate income, whereas, ordinarily a contingent gift will not. A gift will carry intermediate income, and thus s 31 of the TA 1925 will apply in the following circumstances. First, under s 175 of the Law of Property Act (LPA) 1925, a specific gift of realty or personalty or a residuary gift of freehold land will carry intermediate income. Secondly, a gift of residuary personalty carries intermediate income.²⁹ Thirdly, if the settlor stands in loco parentis to the infant beneficiary and the contingency is attaining the age of 18 or earlier marriage, the gift will carry intermediate income. Fourthly, where the gift is directed in the instrument to be set aside. Fifthly, if the instrument shows an intention that the income should be used for the maintenance of an infant beneficiary.³⁰

The court's inherent jurisdiction

Under the court's inherent jurisdiction, a court order may allow income to be used for an infant's maintenance.³¹ The court's inherent jurisdiction can also be used to enable the trustees to provide for the maintenance even when the beneficiary is not an infant, where the court considers that to be just.³²

Capital

In the absence of any express power, trust capital can be used for the benefit of a beneficiary who is not yet entitled to such capital, as considered in the following section.³³

10.2.2 Powers of advancement

The power of advancement refers to the power in the trustees to advance capital to a beneficiary, that is to pay out amounts of capital rather than holding them intact to generate income. Where the trust contains an express power permitting the trustees to advance the capital of the trust fund to specified beneficiaries, that express power will be decisive of the matter. In the absence of an express power, s 32 of the TA 1925 makes provision for powers of advancement, as follows:

Trustees may at any time or times pay or apply any capital money subject to a trust, for the advancement or benefit, in such manner as they may, in their absolute discretion, think fit, of any person entitled to the capital of the trust property or any share thereof, whether absolutely or contingently on his attaining any specified age or on the occurrence of any other event.³⁴

29 Green v Ekins (1742) 2 Atk 473.

30 Re Selby-Walker [1949] 2 All ER 178.

31 Wellesly v Wellesly (1828) 2 Bli (NS) 124.

32 Revel v Watkinson (1748) 27 ER 912.

33 TA 1925, ss 32, 53.

34 Ibid, s 32(1).

It should be noted that s 32 does not apply to Settled Land Act 1925 settlements.³⁵ The particular parts of this provision are considered below.

A contingent future gift carries with it the intermediate income.³⁶ There is a need to distinguish between gifts which are immediate specific gifts and gifts which are future specific property.³⁷ Where the gift is, for example, a testamentary bequest of personal property held over as residue, all the intermediate income passes with that gift. However, where that income is expressly deferred to a date in the future, the income does not pass with the gift. There may, however, be an incongruity if an order under s 175 of the LPA 1925 allows immediate rights in the case of contingent future gifts against the settlor's wishes.

'Advancement or benefit'

The expression applying money for the 'advancement or benefit' of the beneficiaries has been explained by the courts as connoting setting up the beneficiary in life.³⁸ Within the compass of setting the beneficiary up in life falls the discharge of the beneficiary's debts and a resettlement of capital to avoid tax. There are restrictions on the power of advancement set out in s 32 of the TA 1925. The trustees must ensure that the advancements are applied for the purposes for which they are made.³⁹ The restrictions are as follows. First, the trustees must not advance more than half of the beneficiary's presumptive or vested share or interest.⁴⁰ Secondly, when the beneficiary becomes absolutely entitled to their interest the advancement must be taken into account.⁴¹ Thirdly, an advancement must not be made if it prejudices a prior interest unless the person with such an interest gives consent to the advancement. If the life tenant under a protective trust gives consent, the protective trust will not be determined under s 33 of the TA 1925.⁴²

In Re Pauling's ST,⁴³ the bankers Coutts & Co were trustees of a fund which was held on trust for a wife for her life, with remainder on her death to her children. The trust instrument contained an express power for the trustees to advance to the children up to one-half of their share, with the consent of their mother. The husband of the life tenant, who was the father of the children, lived beyond his means and sought to obtain part of the trust moneys by means of advancements to his children. A series of advancements were made, nominally to the children, but the money was used for the benefit of their father or generally for the family. The Court of Appeal held that:

the power of advancement can be exercised only if it is for the benefit of the child or remoter issue to be advanced or, as was said during argument, it is thought to be a 'good ³⁵ Ibid, s 32(2).

³⁶ LPA 1925, s 175.

³⁷ Re McGeorge [1963] 2 WLR 767.

³⁸ Pilkington v IRC [1964] AC 612. In Southgate v Sutton [2011] EWCA Civ 637 it was held that there may be a re-settlement of the trusts applicable to part only of the trust which is partitioned, in accordance with Pilkington v IRC.

³⁹ Re Pauling's ST [1964] 3 WLR 742.

⁴⁰ TA 1925, s 32(1)(a).

⁴¹ Ibid, s 32(1)(b).

⁴² Ibid, s 32(1)(c).

⁴³ [1964] 3 WLR 742.

thing' for the advanced person to have a share of capital before his or her due time. . . . [A] power of advancement [can] be exercised only if there was some good reason for it. That good reason must be beneficial to the person to be advanced; the power cannot be exercised capriciously or with some other benefit in view.

Therefore, to obtain advancements other than for the benefit of the beneficiaries would not be a proper advancement. There is also a need to distinguish between a beneficiary seeking an advancement and a trustee stipulating the form of the advancement. To leave the payee free to decide how it should be applied may lead to a misapplication of trust property. Unless the trust makes a specific stipulation as to the use of the money once advanced to the beneficiary, it may be difficult to prevent such a misuse.

Power to make loans

Ordinarily trustees may not lend money, unless the trust instrument contains such a power or unless such a power can be implied in relation to a trust which conducts a business in relation to which such a power would be normal.⁴⁴

Inherent jurisdiction of the court

There is a statutory jurisdiction for the court to exert a power of advancement and maintenance also. Under s 53 of the TA 1925, the court has power to order the use of capital for an infant's maintenance where the infant is 'beneficially entitled to any property'. This, it is submitted, is in addition to the court's inherent jurisdiction to make orders in relation to the treatment of the trust property.

10.3 DELEGATION OF TRUSTEES' DUTIES

10.3.1 The appointment of agents, custodians and nominees by the trustees

Frequently, the trustees will wish to appoint professionals to act on their behalf. The trustee will seek to delegate to such professionals their trusteeship responsibilities. The question will then arise as to any liability for breach of trust, or failure to achieve the best possible results for the trust, when the trustees' powers were being carried out by delegates: whether agents, custodians or nominees. The trustees can only appoint agents, nominees or custodians in one of the following circumstances:⁴⁵ if those appointees carry on business in that capacity, or if the appointee is a body corporate (such as an ordinary company) controlled by the trustees themselves,⁴⁶ or the delegates are a body corporate recognised under s 9 of the Administration of Justice Act 1985.⁴⁷ Charitable trustees are required to seek the guidance

⁴⁴ Re A Trust Ltd [2008] WTLR 377.

⁴⁵ TA 2000, s 19(1).

⁴⁶ As defined by analogy with the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, s 840: TA 2000, s 19(3).

⁴⁷ TA 2000, s 19(2).

of the Charity Commissioners in this context.⁴⁸ It is open to the trustees to decide on the remuneration of such delegates.⁴⁹

10.3.2 Agents

An agent is a form of fiduciary officer who acts, subject to principles of contract, on behalf of a principal. The TA 2000 provides that the trustees are permitted to ‘authorise any person to exercise any or all of their delegable functions as their agent’.⁵⁰ The functions which are capable of being delegated to an agent are expressed as being any trustee functions except:⁵¹ a decision as to the distribution of trust assets; the power to decide whether fees should be payable out of income or capital; any power to appoint some person to be a trustee; or any power to delegate trustee responsibilities. Therefore, the statute carves out a list of functions which are considered to be the core powers which a trustee is not entitled to delegate to someone acting as their agent: in other words, the trustee must remain responsible for them. In relation to charitable trusts, the trustees are entitled to appoint agents in relation to raising funds (which does not include the conduct of a trade which forms the primary purpose of the trust), any function which involves a decision which the trustees have taken, or any function involving the investment of the trust’s funds.⁵²

The trustees can appoint one of the trustees to act on their behalf.⁵³ The trustees are not entitled to authorise a beneficiary to act as their agent.⁵⁴ This last provision is clearly in accordance with principle where there is more than one beneficiary, because if one beneficiary could act as the trustee’s agent, it would be possible for that beneficiary to advantage herself at the expense of the other beneficiaries. However, there is no general rule of trusts law to preclude a trustee from being a beneficiary. Similarly, under the rule in Saunders v Vautier,⁵⁵ an absolutely entitled beneficiary would be able to direct the trustees how to act with the property.

One significant provision of the 2000 Act is that the agent is to be subject to the same duties as the trustees when the agent is exercising those powers.⁵⁶ However, these powers can be excluded by the terms of the trust instrument, as considered above. Further, the trustees are empowered to decide on the level of the agent’s remuneration.⁵⁷

In relation to ‘asset management functions’, the trustees are only entitled to appoint agents if the terms of the agency are ‘evidenced in writing’.⁵⁸ The ‘asset management functions’ of the trustees relate to the investment of assets under the trust, the acquisition of property to be held on trust and the management of interests in property held on trust.⁵⁹ Further to the obligation to detail the agency in writing, the trustees are required to prepare a written⁶⁰ ‘policy

48 Ibid, s 19(4).

49 Ibid, s 20.

50 Ibid, s 11(1).

51 Ibid, s 11(2).

52 Ibid, s 11(3).

53 Ibid, s 12(1).

54 Ibid, s 12(3).

55 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

56 TA 2000, s 13.

57 Ibid, s 14(1).

58 Ibid, s 15(1).

59 Ibid, s 15(5).

60 Ibid, s 15(4).

statement' which guides the agent as to how to exercise the powers which are delegated to them.⁶¹ The agent must then be obliged under the terms of the agency to act in accordance with the terms of the policy statement. The difficulty with this provision is that the trustees themselves are not required to have a policy statement for their own cognisance and therefore the trustees would be required to develop their own such policy statement from scratch, requiring the agent to act in 'the best interests of the trust'.⁶²

10.3.3 Nominees and custodians

The trustees are empowered to appoint a nominee, or bare trustee, to act in relation to any of the assets of the trust as they determine.⁶³ Similarly the trustees have a power to appoint a custodian to take custody of any trust assets they may consider appropriate for such treatment.⁶⁴ If the trust acquires bearer securities⁶⁵ then it is mandatory that those securities be deposited with a custodian.⁶⁶

What is not immediately apparent is the difference between a nominee and a custodian within the terms of the 2000 Act. Neither term is expressly defined. A 'nominee' could refer to a person who assumes all of the rights of the trustee. Alternatively, a nominee could be a person who holds title in the trust property on behalf of the trustees, in which case, it would be difficult to distinguish them from a custodian. A 'custodian' could be a form of trustee required to hold, and possibly to maintain, the trust assets in the exercise of some trust discretion as to the manner in which those assets are maintained. In this sense, a custodian is someone who is responsible for protecting the trust property from theft, fraudulent conversion or other harm, as with bearer securities considered immediately above.⁶⁷ Alternatively, a custodian may be simply a bailee of the trust property with no fiduciary powers over that property other than holding the property for safekeeping⁶⁸ – a little like a warehouse.

10.3.4 Powers of attorney

Trustees are empowered to delegate their powers by means of a power of attorney.⁶⁹ The donor of the power (for example, the trustee transferring the power) is liable for acts of the donee (that is, the attorney acting on behalf of the trustee) as though they were his own acts.⁷⁰

61 Ibid, s 15(2).

62 Ibid, s 15(3).

63 Ibid, s 16(1).

64 Ibid, s 17(1).

65 Ie, securities for which the holder of the security document is entitled to receive payment and which are, consequently, always vulnerable to theft and conversion into cash by the thief without much difficulty (a little like a banknote).

66 TA 2000, s 18(1).

67 Perhaps in the sense of a 'custodian trustee' within the Public Trustee Act 1906.

68 An expression used in relation to unit trusts and open-ended investment companies.

69 Trustee Delegation Act 1999, s 5; by amendment to the TA 1925, s 25.

70 Trustee Delegation Act 1999, s 5(7).

10.3.5 Liability for the acts of delegates

The TA 2000 provides for a code to decide the allocation of liability in circumstances in which agents, nominees or custodians have been appointed validly under the terms of the Act. The trustees are required to ‘keep under review’ the arrangements under which the delegate acts and to consider any ‘power of intervention’ which they may have.⁷¹ Such a power of intervention includes a power to revoke the delegate’s authorisation or a power to give directions to the delegate.⁷² If the trustees decide that there is a need to intervene, then they are required to intervene.⁷³

A trustee will not be liable for ‘any act or default of the agent, nominee or custodian unless he has failed to comply with the duty of care applicable to him’.⁷⁴ Therefore, the trustee is in general terms not liable for any breach of duty carried out by the delegate unless the trustee failed to comply with his duty of care in relation to the appointment of suitable agents considered in section 9.5.⁷⁵

10.3.6 The applicable standard of care for trustees under the case law

The question is therefore the notion of when a trustee will be acting in good faith. The leading case is that of Speight v Gaunt,⁷⁶ in which cheques were given to a broker (who had been retained by the trustees as an agent) in return for a bought note. The broker misappropriated the funds and absconded. The question arose whether or not there would be an action against the trustee. The trustee contended that he could not be fixed with responsibility on the basis that a prudent man of business would have treated the broker in exactly the manner that the trustee had. Lord Jessel MR considered the appropriate test to be as follows:

It seems to me that on general trust principles a trustee ought to conduct the business of the trust in the same manner that an ordinary prudent man of business would conduct his own, and that beyond that there is no liability or obligation on the trustee.

Therefore, the trustee will not be liable when acting in the ordinary manner of the business being conducted. On the facts, the trustee could demonstrate that business was normally conducted in this manner and that the trustee was not required to comply with any higher set of principles.

10.3.7 An alternative approach

A different approach was adopted in Re Vickery, which was decided on the basis of the old s 23 of the TA 1925.⁷⁷ The trustee gave money to a solicitor in the course of trust business.

71 TA 2000, s 22(1).

72 Ibid, s 22(4). Interestingly, the 2000 Act does not require that such powers be expressly included in the documentation required for any effective delegation.

73 Ibid, s 22(1).

74 That is, the duty of care under the TA 2000, Sched 1, para 3.

75 Ibid, s 23(1).

76 (1883) 9 App Cas 1.

77 [1931] 1 Ch 572.

The solicitor absconded with the money. The question arose whether or not there was a valid claim against the trustee on behalf of the beneficiaries to recover the loss suffered by the trust. Maugham J defined the issue as being whether or not the trustee had been negligent in employing the solicitor or permitting money to remain in the solicitor's hands. The appropriate test for the presence or absence of good faith was found to have been whether or not there had been 'wilful default' on the part of the trustee.⁷⁸

To set the test as high as 'wilful default' is evidently a higher standard than 'mere lack of care'. His Lordship's understanding of the appropriate duty was either a consciousness of negligence or breach of duty on the part of the trustee, or a recklessness in the trustee in the performance of a trust duty. Maugham J adopted the decision in the company law case of Re City Equitable Fire,⁷⁹ which had been based on the consideration of the specific articles of association of the company in question, rather than on general principles of trusts law.

The decision in Re Vickery has been criticised by much of the academic literature. It has been argued that the better test would be a more general 'want of reasonable care' rather than the restrictive 'wilful default'.⁸⁰ It is argued that the Re Equitable Fire case was decided very much on its own facts and therefore should not have been applied to this area of trustee discretion. Consequently, it is said that the test for trustees ought to be higher. To apply a general test of 'want of reasonable care' would require trustees to act more carefully, whereas a test of 'wilful default' would permit a greater number of examples of mismanagement by trustees to pass without remedy for the beneficiaries.

There remains the more general issue of the manner in which ordinary trustees are to be expected to control the activities of professionals to whom they delegate their powers. By definition, trustees will appoint professionals to perform functions which the trustees are unable to perform themselves. As such, the delegate has all the applicable expertise. This concern would favour the Re Vickery approach in that it would only make trustees liable if the trustees themselves had exhibited some wilful default. After all, the trustees would still be able to sue the delegate for negligence, fraud or breach of contract for failure to perform its functions properly. This issue is considered further in Chapter 9.

10.3.8 The devolution of powers or trusts

Where a trust power is given to trustees as joint tenants of that power, in the event of the death of one of those trustees, the survivor is entitled to exercise that power alone.⁸¹ Where one trustee dies, the personal representatives shall exercise their powers. Where there is some failure of inter vivos transfer, the property reverts to the settlor, or remains in the personal representatives of the settlor, to be held upon the trusts of the settlement or the will as the case may be.⁸²

78 This was a case relating to the TA 1925, s 23: in relation to liability for delegates in dealing with trust property, the trustee only bears liability for losses occurring by reason of the trustee's 'own wilful default'. It is important to bear in mind that s 23 refers to general delegations of responsibility, whereas s 30 refers to receipts for trust property comprising money and securities.

79 Re City Equitable Fire Insurance [1925] Ch 407.

80 Jones (1968) 84 LQR 474.

81 TA 1925, s 18.

82 Mallott v Wilson [1903] 2 Ch 494.

The alternative analysis is that a disclaimer of the transfer to a trustee should make the transfer void and the trust should fail. Alternatively, one may choose to treat this as a constructive trust where all has been done that ought to have been done.⁸³

10.4 VARIATION OF TRUSTS

The Variation of Trusts Act 1958 gives discretion to the court to sanction variations of trust in relation to infant beneficiaries, incapacitated beneficiaries, and others whose beneficial rights have not vested in them, provided that the applicant will not derive any unjust benefit from the variation. Other statutory discretions permit variations for the maintenance of infant beneficiaries, and for the extension of trustees' powers where it is expedient.

Under common law, the court has inherent jurisdiction to sanction variation in relation to the maintenance of, and accumulation of capital for, infant beneficiaries, as considered below. Alternatively, the principle in Saunders v Vautier enables absolutely-entitled beneficiaries to call for delivery of the absolute title to the trust property, effectively terminating the trust.

10.4.1 Variation of trusts

When a trust is created, its terms become binding on the subsequent actions of the trustees in relation to the trust property. That trust, once created, remains set in stone, unless there is some provision in the trust which permits an alteration in the manner of its exercise.⁸⁴ However, there may be occasions when it becomes advantageous to the parties to alter the terms of the trust. For example, suppose that the tax treatment of a particular trust structure was changed by legislation, so rendering the structure originally selected by the settlor less appropriate than it had seemed. In such circumstances the beneficiaries and the trustees would consider it advantageous to vary the terms of the trust to reflect this change in the law. A well-drafted trust would permit variations to accommodate exactly this form of alteration.

There is a distinction to be made between slight variations to a trust and actions which are equivalent to the creation of a completely new trust. What is envisaged in this section are changes which constitute mere variations to the trust. What is not envisaged are attempts to introduce changes which are so fundamental to the operation of the trust that they amount, in truth, to a resettlement of property (that is, the transfer of the trust fund onto effectively new trusts).⁸⁵ It is clearly difficult to set out hard-and-fast rules, given that it will be necessary to examine each trust to consider its underlying motivation and the extent to which the proposed alteration goes to the heart of that issue.

83 Re Rose [1952] Ch 499, [1952] 1 All ER 1217.

84 Paul v Paul (1882) 20 Ch D 742.

85 Vandervell v IRC [1967] 2 WLR 87.

10.4.2 Duty not to deviate from the terms of the trust

The general principle

The fundamental duty of the trustees is to observe the terms of the trust and not to deviate from those terms. As considered below in Chapter 18, any deviation from the terms of the settlement constitutes a breach of trust which exposes the trustees personally to liability to restore the property, or to restore the financial equivalent of the trust property lost through equitable compensation. It is therefore important to understand the extent to which the trustees are entitled to tinker with those fundamental terms. Given this central principle, the statutes and case law considered below constitute, in reality, exceptions from the rule that trustees are not permitted to deviate from the terms of the trust.

The court's inherent jurisdiction to permit a deviation

There remains an inherent power in the court to permit departure from the precise terms of the trust, in contradistinction to the general rule just set out.⁸⁶ The purpose and extent of this inherent jurisdiction is to enable the court and the trustees to manage 'emergencies'⁸⁷ which arise in the administration of the trust. 'Emergencies' include anything which is not provided for, or catered for, in the terms of the trust but which is necessary to ensure its proper administration. Therefore, a trust provision which permits investment only in a particular type of share may be deviated from (with the sanction of the inherent power of the court) to permit the trustees to invest in shares which are issued to replace those specified in the terms of the trust. As such, the court's inherent power will not be of general application but rather is limited to situations which cut to the heart of the proper administration of the trust.

The exceptions in Chapman v Chapman

The decision of the Court of Appeal in *Chapman v Chapman*⁸⁸ set out four exceptions to the general principle that the trustee cannot deviate from the terms of the trust. First, cases in which the court has effected changes in the nature of an infant's property (for example, by directing investment of his personalty in the purchase of freeholds). Secondly, cases in which the court has allowed the trustees of settled property to enter into some business transaction which was not authorised by the settlement. Thirdly, cases in which the court has allowed maintenance out of income which the settlor or testator directed to be accumulated. Fourthly, cases in which the court has approved a compromise on behalf of infants and possible after-born beneficiaries.

These four categories clearly constitute narrow contexts in which variations are to be permitted. The issue of compromise is one which is to be distinguished from the *Saunders v Vautier*⁸⁹ principle, although there are hints of the latter in the former. Thus in Allen v Distillers Co (Biochemicals) Ltd,⁹⁰ a case arising out of the thalidomide drugs tragedy, the 86 Re New [1901] 2 Ch 534.

87 Ibid, per Romer L.J.

88 [1954] AC 429.

89 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

90 [1974] QB 384.

courts were able to order the postponement of a payment to a beneficiary even though that beneficiary had reached the age of majority, on the basis of a compromise reached between all the potential beneficiaries as to the manner in which the indisposed beneficiary ought best to be treated. Similarly, compromise has been achieved in relation to pension funds which have sought wider investment powers to enable a substantial capital fund to provide greater benefits for its members.⁹¹

Otherwise the court retains a case law power to act in cases of emergency to sanction the alteration of the terms of the trust. An example of the use of this power was in Re Jackson,⁹² where buildings were on the brink of collapse. The court ordered variation so that trust property could be applied to save the buildings from final collapse. The power has also been used in Re New to permit the reconstruction of a company's share capital and to empower the trustees to take newly allotted shares.⁹³ Subsequently, Re New was described as the furthest extent to which this jurisdiction will stretch.⁹⁴

10.4.3 The Variation of Trusts Act 1958

Introduction

The role of the Variation of Trusts Act 1958 is to permit variations of trusts in relation to specific types of beneficiaries which are identified in the statute itself.⁹⁵ The court's jurisdiction is then limited to variations and revocations to the extent that they interact with those categories of persons.

Scope of persons covered

The scope of persons covered by the 1958 Act is set out in s 1(1):

Where property, whether real or personal, is held on trusts arising, whether before or after the passing of this Act, under any will, settlement or other disposition, the court may if it thinks fit by order approve on behalf of –

- (a) any person having, directly or indirectly, an interest, whether vested or contingent, under the trusts who by reason of infancy or other incapacity is incapable of assenting, or
- (b) any person (whether ascertained or not) who may become entitled, directly or indirectly, to an interest under the trusts as being at a future date or on the happening of a future event a person of any specified description or a member of any specified class of persons, so however that this paragraph shall not include any person who would be ⁹¹ Mason v Fairbrother [1983] 2 All ER 1078.

⁹² (1882) 21 Ch D 786; Conway v Fenton (1888) 40 Ch D 512; Re Montagu [1897] 2 Ch 8.

⁹³ [1901] 2 Ch 534.

⁹⁴ Re Tollemache [1903] 1 Ch 457, per Kekewich J.

⁹⁵ D (A Child) v O [2004] 3 All ER 780 (life insurance policies held on trust for miners in equal shares fell within the 1958 Act).

- of that description, or a member of that class, as the case may be, if the said date had fallen or the said event had happened at the date of the application to the court, or
- (c) any person unborn, or
 - (d) any person in respect of any discretionary interest of his under protective trusts where the interest of the principal beneficiary has not failed or been determined,
- any arrangement . . . varying or revoking all or any of the trusts, or enlarging the powers of the trustees of managing or administering any of the property subject to the trusts.

Therefore, the focus of the legislation is on infants and incapacitated persons (for example, those suffering from mental health problems, as considered below). It also includes those people who might yet become beneficially entitled under the trust fund (either because their interest has not yet been awarded to them under some fiduciary discretion, or because they have not yet been born). With reference to these categories of person, the court has a discretion to permit variations of trust. However, other questions do arise.

The nature of the court's jurisdiction

The term 'arrangement' is used in the final paragraph of the section deliberately to connote a very broad range of methods of dealing with the trust, to enable the broadest range of proposals to be put into action if the court deems them suitable.⁹⁶ However, as Wilberforce J made plain in Re T's Settlement Trusts,⁹⁷ the court will not be permitted to sanction a proposed arrangement which constitutes a resettlement of the trust property rather than a mere variation of its terms.

Megarry J has held on the same subject that 'if an arrangement, while leaving the substratum, effectuates the purpose of the original trust by other means, it may still be possible to regard that arrangement as merely varying the original trusts, even though the means employed are wholly different, and even though the form is completely changed'.⁹⁸ Therefore, it will clearly be necessary to examine the true purpose of the trust (or its 'substratum') and identify whether or not that is changed to such an extent as to constitute a resettlement on new terms. Thus, in Goulding v James,⁹⁹ a proposal to re-effect trusts such that the great-grandchildren who took interests only in remainder ought to be entitled to a settlement of 10% of the capital was considered to be contrary to the stated intention of the settlor at the time of the creation of the settlement.

The approach to variation is explained by Lord Reid in *Re Holmden's ST*¹⁰⁰ as being a consent given by the beneficiaries to the variation, rather than something imposed on them by the court. Beneficiaries not of full age at the time of the variation are bound by such variations, it is said, because the court was empowered by the 1958 Act to take action on their behalf. Otherwise, a beneficiary will not be bound by a variation where she did not accede to it as a sui juris beneficiary. This explanation appears to locate the notion of the variation made under ⁹⁶ Re Steed's WT [1960] Ch 407.

⁹⁷ [1964] Ch 158, 162.

⁹⁸ Re Holt's ST [1969] 1 Ch 100, 111.

⁹⁹ [1997] 2 All ER 239, per Mummery LJ. Merely adding another life interest has been considered to be acceptable, however: Ridgwell v Ridgwell [2008] WTLR 527.

¹⁰⁰ [1968] AC 685, [1968] 1 All ER 148.

the 1958 Act as being orientated around the consensus of the beneficiaries and therefore as a cousin to the *Saunders v Vautier*¹⁰¹ principle. Under that principle, considered at section 4.1 all the beneficiaries acting together can call for the delivery of the trust and thus terminate it. As Lord Reid considered the matter in Re Holmden's ST,¹⁰² the beneficiaries have a right of veto such that no variation is capable of being enforced against them without their consent.¹⁰³

One point which remains¹⁰⁴ is the interaction between such a change in beneficial interest and the provisions of s 53(1)(c) of the Law of Property Act 1925 – in short, the question is whether or not such a variation constitutes a disposition of an equitable interest requiring signed writing. There is some confusion. In the light of Neville v Wilson,¹⁰⁵ it appears that there is an argument that the variation takes effect by way of an implied trust outwith the scope of s 53(1)(c). However, it seems equally valid to look to the mischief of the 1958 Act as being a statute necessarily permitting variations of trusts without the need for any further formality than that contained in the statute. Consequently, the statute ought properly to be considered as an exception to the rule in s 53(1)(c), otherwise it would be of comparatively limited utility and invalid on its own internal logic. The real answer must be that no one considered the point when drafting the 1958 Act.

Precluding the applicant's own benefit

The class of variations and persons in s 1(1) of the 1958 Act is subject to a proviso, also contained in s 1(1), which seeks to ensure that the applicant for the variation will not benefit unjustly from it:

Provided that except by virtue of paragraph (d) of this subsection [in relation to protective trusts] the court shall not approve an arrangement on behalf of any person unless the carrying out thereof would be for the benefit of that person.

Therefore, where it is the case that such a variation or revocation would benefit any person involved in a protective trust, created to ring-fence property in favour of a susceptible beneficiary, it shall not be granted by the court. The term 'benefit' has been given a broad meaning beyond simply financial benefit, to include moral and social benefit too.¹⁰⁶

10.4.4 The general principle governing identification of a variation as opposed to a resettlement

There is, as stated above, a clear problem with deciding whether a trust has been merely varied, or whether it has been effectively terminated and new trusts declared. Clearly, the beneficiaries acting together do have the power to resettlement the trust. As Megarry J has stated

101 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

102 [1968] AC 685, [1968] 1 All ER 148.

103 See Goulding v James [1997] 2 All ER 239, per Mummery LJ.

104 Pettit, 1997, 473.

105 [1996] 3 All ER 171, [1996] 3 WLR 460.

106 Re Holt's ST [1969] 1 Ch 100, per Megarry J.

this proposition¹⁰⁷ in relation to the ability of beneficiaries using the rule in *Saunders v Vautier*¹⁰⁸ to re-arrange the terms of a trust:

If under a trust every possible beneficiary was under no disability and concurred in the re-arrangement or termination of the trusts, then under the doctrine in Saunders v Vautier those beneficiaries could dispose of the trust property as they thought fit; for in equity the property was theirs. Yet if any beneficiary was an infant, or an unborn or unascertained person, it was held that the court had no general inherent or other jurisdiction to concur in any such arrangement on behalf of that beneficiary.

The case of *Re Holt*¹⁰⁹ is instructive in this regard. An originating summons was served under the 1958 Act by which the settlor's daughter sought to surrender her life interest in one half of the income of the trust so that she could both reduce her own liability to surtax and increase the entitlement of her children to the life interest. However, she sought ('not surprisingly' in the opinion of Megarry J) to restrict the ability of her children to access the capital of the fund before reaching the age of 25 because, in her own words, '... I believe it to be most important that young people should be reasonably advanced in a career and settled in life before they are in receipt of an income sufficient to make them independent of the need to work'. The principal issue which arose was whether the trust was varied automatically by the order of the court (other issues are considered elsewhere in this book).

The doctrine in Re Hambleton's Will Trusts,¹¹⁰ as set out by Wynn-Parry J, stated that the order of the court ipso facto altered the trust. This reversed the decision in Re Joseph's Will Trusts,¹¹¹ where Vaisey J had held that it was necessary for the judge to include words in the court order permitting the trustees to alter the trusts, rather than acknowledging that the court order necessarily had that effect automatically without anything more. While this may appear to be of little immediate importance, it was held in Re Holt that the automatic nature of the court order obviated the need for the trustees to perform any formality to secure the variation. For example, the surrender by the settlor's daughter in Re Holt constituted a disposition of her equitable interest to her children which, in line with Grey v IRC,¹¹² would have required some signed writing before it could have been effected. However, the automatic nature of the order, accepted in Re Hambleton,¹¹³ meant that the equitable interest passed to the disponent's children without the need for signed writing.

The court must be satisfied that the proposal made to it is an 'arrangement', and not a complete resettlement of the entire trust fund. It was held in *Wyndham v Egremont*¹¹⁴ that an alteration to the perpetuity period in a trust did not constitute a resettlement of that trust. Nor did alterations to the line of future beneficiaries. This particular trust related to an estate

107 Ibid, 111.

108 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

109 Re Holt's ST [1969] 1 Ch 100.

110 [1960] 1 WLR 82.

111 [1959] 1 WLR 1019.

112 [1960] AC 1.

113 [1960] 1 WLR 82.

114 [2009] EWHC 2076 (Ch), 12 ITEL 461.

which included Petworth House in Sussex, which is still the home of the Wyndham family¹¹⁵ in spite of that splendid, stately pile being made over to the National Trust in 1947.¹¹⁶ The perpetuity period was the death of ‘the last survivor of the issue of George V’,¹¹⁷ who was the Princess Alexandra, aged 72 at the time of this case. Mr Wyndham, son of the current Lord Egremont, would have taken the property absolutely on the death of Princess Alexandra, but preferred that the trust continue in existence not least because of the tax charges which would have fallen on the family¹¹⁸ (hence the change in the perpetuity provision) and that the property should continue to pass in future with the male heir as opposed to passing in default absolutely to his Lordship’s son or grandson. It was held by Blackburne J that the change to ensure that the property pass with the male heir was not a complete resettlement of the trust, but rather only a variation of that trust.

10.4.5 There must be a benefit in the variation

The court must be satisfied that the proposal will be beneficial to the beneficiaries. This benefit may not be apparent at first but it must be demonstrable that there will be some benefit in time. So in *Re RGST Settlement Trust*¹¹⁹ it was held that a proposal to vary the trusts so as to provide for a life interest for a spouse would appear to disadvantage the interests of any children whose interests might therefore appear to be delayed, but the court was convinced that this proposal provided for greater flexibility for the trustees when making advancements to the children (and to any children as yet unborn), and for more coherent inheritance tax and capital gains tax planning for the trust as a whole, and for the prospect of cheaper life insurance in future, all of which Judge Behrens considered would be to the long-term benefit of the beneficiaries. While the ‘benefit’ which is ordinarily sought is a financial benefit,¹²⁰ the mitigation of tax is taken to fall within this sort of benefit.¹²¹

When considering whether or not a benefit would have been conferred upon a child, Rory (a ‘minor’), Norris J gave us the following insight in *Wright v Gater*¹²² as to the subtleties of the judicial thought process:

- (a) I approach the task with what Megarry J in *Re Wallace’s Settlements*¹²³ described as ‘a fair cautious and enquiring mind’.
- (b) What I am doing is not redistributing property according to some wise scheme of which I approve. The Court of Chancery never claimed a power to direct a 115 As Blackburne J explained, Mr Wyndham is heir to Lord Egremont and thus to two baronetcies, of Egremont and Leconfield.

116 The house, with its remarkable collection of paintings by Turner and others, its parkland, and the teas and lunches which are provided (at reasonable cost) by the National Trust are enthusiastically recommended. The small town of Petworth itself also repays a visit. But I digress.

117 This was a very common ‘royal lives’ clause by reference to which perpetuities were often defined.

118 And which would have necessitated the sale of much of the family property.

119 Re RGST Settlement Trust; Ridgwell v Ridgwell [2007] EWHC 2666 (Ch), [2008] STC 1883.

120 Re Drewe’s Settlement; Drewe v Westminster Bank Ltd [1966] 1 WLR 1518 at 1520.

121 Re Chapman’s Settlement Trusts (No 2) [1959] 1 WLR 372; Re Holt’s Settlement; Wilson v Holt [1969] 1 Ch 100 at 120–121; and Re Weston’s Settlement [1969] 1 Ch 223 at 232, per Stamp LJ, as accepted in Re RGST Settlement Trust [2008] STC 1883.

122 [2011] EWHC 2881 (Ch), [2012] 1 WLR 802.

123 [1968] 1 WLR 711 at 718 H.

settlement of the property of a minor, and the 1958 Act did not alter this: see Re T's Settlement Trusts.¹²⁴ Rather, I am supplying consent on behalf of Rory: Re S.¹²⁵ The question to be asked is therefore: 'Should Rory consent to this arrangement?' That question is answered in the sense 'Only if the judge is satisfied that it is for his benefit.' So it is never enough that the proposal does Rory no real harm: to elicit his consent it must always confer on him a real benefit.

- (c) 'Benefit' is generally financial in nature: and when it is the Court it will be concerned in 'a practical and business-like consideration of the arrangement, including the total amounts of the advantages which the various parties obtain, and their bargaining strength'.
- (d) But 'benefit' need not be financial: and when it is not . . . business-like considerations do not provide a sure guide, though the recognition of risk will still have some part to play. In such cases the assessment of benefit and advantage must be approached with caution (as Wilberforce J recognised in *Re T*¹²⁶) lest the process simply becomes a reflection of the perceptions and preferences of the individual judge. The difficulties inherent in the task are perhaps illustrated by Re Weston's Settlement.¹²⁷
- (e) One step towards objectifying the assessment of non-financial benefit would be to pose the question (based on that posed under different legislation in *Re Irving*¹²⁸): 'Would a prudent adult, motivated by intelligent self-interest, and after sustained consideration of the proposed trusts and powers and the circumstances in which they may fall to be implemented, be likely to accept the proposal?'

Therefore, the court is acting in the best financial interests of the child in ensuring that the variation is genuinely expected to confer a real benefit on the child. On the facts of that case, a saving in tax of £89,000 was considered to be a benefit for that beneficiary. By contrast with this acceptance of tax avoidance as a motive for effecting variations, the difficulties to which his Lordship referred which arose in *Re Weston's Settlement*¹²⁹ were that an application was brought to vary a trust which had a child as its beneficiary, inter alia, so that those trusts could be exported outside the UK so as to avoid a charge to UK tax.¹³⁰ While the avoidance of tax was not unlawful, the Court of Appeal held that when it was the sole purpose of the application for variation then it was entitled to inquire more closely into the trustees' objectives. On those facts, because it was the sole motivation for the application, it was refused. As Lord Denning put it:¹³¹

Many a child has been ruined by being given too much. The avoidance of tax may be lawful, but it is not yet a virtue. The Court of Chancery should not encourage or support

124 [1964] Ch 158, at 161.

125 [2006] WTLR 1461, at para [16].

126 Re T [1964] Ch 158 at 161.

127 [1969] 1 Ch 234.

128 (1975) 66 DLR (3d) 387.

129 [1969] 1 Ch 234.

130 Broadly speaking, a trust is taken to be resident wherever its trustees are resident: therefore, replacing UK resident trustees with non-UK resident trustees is a common mechanism for attempting to avoid UK tax. Tax law in this context is very complex – being a web of charges to tax and anti-avoidance provisions – so generalisations are difficult to make.

131 [1969] 1 Ch 234, at 245.

it – it should not give its approval to it – if by so doing it would imperil the true welfare of the children, already born or yet to be born.

This, I would suggest, is a little closer to the spirit of trusts law being based in conscience; albeit that the conscience on display here is a public conscience rather than a private one. It just serves to show that even in the most unprepossessing areas of the law, in amongst the seemingly duller of applications, there are still matters of tremendous ethical importance.

10.4.6 Variation of trusts as part of divorce proceedings

One significant context in which trusts may need to be varied is in relation to divorce. The parties may have created a marriage settlement which will need to be unpacked once the married couple divorce, or trusts may have been created during the marriage in relation to which one partner or both partners may have had interests, or trusts may have been created before the marriage in which only one partner has an interest. On divorce it will be important to consider whether those trusts should be considered to be part of the ‘matrimonial property’ which the court should take into account when settling the terms of the divorce. In this sense it is important to consider whether or not the settlement which is to be varied is a ‘nuptial’ settlement or a ‘non-nuptial’ settlement in divorce proceedings. In essence, where the settlement is a nuptial settlement then the property will be considered to be matrimonial property which is capable of being dealt with by way of a variation of the settlement as part of the divorce settlement under the broad powers of the court under the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973. Waite LJ considered that the powers of the court under the 1973 Act were almost ‘limitless’ in Thomas v Thomas.¹³² In such circumstances, as for example in *Charman v Charman*¹³³ and in Whaley v Whaley,¹³⁴ the court will embark on a detailed examination of the situation of the parties, of the role which the trusts play as part of the parties’ matrimonial property, and of the comparative justice between parties of making a variation of the sort suggested by the applicant.¹³⁵ The trust must have continued in existence at the time of making the order.¹³⁶

So, in *BJ v MJ (Financial Remedy: Overseas Trust)*¹³⁷ after a divorce, Mostyn J considered two trusts in the light of the dispositive powers of the court under the 1973 Act which are ‘unfettered and, in theory, unlimited’.¹³⁸ In essence, the court is not supposed to interfere

132 [1995] 2 FLR 668.

133 [2007] EWCA Civ 503.

134 [2011] EWCA Civ 617. Among the issues in Whaley v Whaley, among the various items of property which imposed business liabilities on the parties as well as constituting assets, there were questions about identifying which assets belonged to which of two family trusts where one spouse had never been a beneficiary under one of those trusts. On appeal on the facts of that case it was argued that the judge at first instance erred in including assets as belonging to the husband which had been part of a trust fund in which the husband had no rights. These arguments were not borne out on the facts. There is also the different question as to whether the trustees are likely to observe the wishes of the parties (for example, as to taking property in equal shares) unless an order for a variation of the trust is made.

135 It was also noted in Charman v Charman [2007] EWCA Civ 503, Sir Mark Potter P, at para [106] et seq that the impact of the change in divorce law in Miller v Miller [2001] 1 AC 596 had been that divorced wives would have expectations of much larger settlements than hitherto.

136 C v C [2004] EWHC 742 (Fam), [2004] Fam 141.

137 [2011] EWHC 2708 (Fam).

138 Ben Hashem v Al Shayif [2009] 1 FLR 115, per Munby J, at [290].

with a trust which has been created after a marriage any more than is necessary to do justice between the parties in dividing property on a divorce. Given that this is part of the scheme for dividing property on divorce, it must correlate with any developments in divorce law and so now it 'must be read in the light of the new distributive régime mandated by the House of Lords in *White v White*¹³⁹ and Miller v McFarlane.^{140,141} On these facts it was important to recognise that the settlements created after the marriage had been created for the benefit of future family members and also to be efficient for capital gains tax purposes. Therefore, in relation to the settlements from which the former spouses took some personal benefit there was to be a division in equal shares between the parties on the basis that that property was properly to be considered to be matrimonial property. Variation of the trusts would be effected so as to remove the wife as a beneficiary once the division of property on equal shares had taken place so as to achieve a final settlement between the parties. In relation to non-nuptial settlements it would be a question of fact to consider whether or not either spouse was intended to take a benefit from such a trust, and consequently whether or not that property should be considered to be matrimonial property.¹⁴²

10.4.7 Disagreement between different beneficiaries

What is more difficult to know is how to deal with an application in which not all of the beneficiaries are in agreement, even if the application is not necessarily contested. In particular, what is to happen if the beneficial interests will be altered. Section 57 is important because it allows trusts to be operated appropriately in the best interests of the beneficiaries. The question, necessarily, is whether any particular proposed course of action would indeed be expedient in this sense. In *Southgate v Sutton*¹⁴³ Mummery LJ explained s 57 as operating in the following way:

The court must be satisfied on two main points before it can exercise its discretion to confer the powers requested: first, that the powers sought are for the purpose of a transaction 'in the management or administration of any property vested in trustees'; and, secondly, that the transaction is, in the opinion of the court, 'expedient', meaning that it must be in the interests of the trust as a whole.

The notion of the power being 'expedient' must be read in the context of the management of the trust as a whole. This is different from the variation of trusts, where an application must be made under the Variation of Trusts Act (discussed above), because the purpose of s 57 is not to alter the beneficial interest under the trusts but rather to allow the trustees to take expedient action. In Southgate v Sutton the application was unopposed, which in itself made Mummery LJ 'nervous' because the court prefers in such situations to hear from both sides about whether

139 [2001] 1 AC 596.

140 [2006] 2 AC 618.

141 Ben Hashem v Al Shayif [2009] 1 FLR 115, per Munby J at [290].

142 See generally Thomas v Thomas [1995] 2 FLR 668; Charman v Charman No.1 [2006] 2 FLR 442, CA; TL v ML [2006] 1 FLR 1263; A v A & St George Trustees Ltd [2007] 2 FLR 467; Charman v Charman (No 4) [2007] 1 FLR 1246; SR v CR [2009] 2 FLR 1083; B v B (Ancillary Relief) [2010] 2 FLR 887; D v D [2011] 2 FLR 29 and Whaley v Whaley [2011] EWCA Civ 617.

143 [2011] EWCA Civ 637.

or not the application is indeed expedient and proper; although it might be thought that if an application was unopposed because it was uncontroversial that that might reassure the court as to the suitability of the trustees' proposed course of action. In that case the proposal was to 'appropriate and partition' the trust fund so that, in effect, one group of beneficiaries would in the future only enjoy income from a part of the trust fund as opposed to enjoying income from the entire trust fund: the difference being that it was expected that the total amount of income which they would receive in cash terms would be the same as the amount they had enjoyed previously. The court was concerned that this would effectively change the beneficial interests, even though the position in cash terms would remain much the same.¹⁴⁴ Nevertheless, the Court of Appeal was prepared to make the order which Mann J would not by distinguishing the authorities on which Mann J had relied; by hearing fresh evidence about the administrative problems facing the trustees without this order; and by seeing this as a problem to do with the management of the trusts which effected only an incidental change to the beneficiaries' equitable interests as opposed to being an application to vary those trusts.¹⁴⁵

10.4.8 Other statutes permitting deviation from terms of the trust

The following are the primary statutory exceptions to the trustees' obligation to perform, slavishly, the terms of the trust, outside the Variation of Trusts Act 1958.

The maintenance of infants

Section 53 of the TA 1925 provides that the court may make orders for the benefit of infants. This may involve the variation of a trust.

Section 57(1) of the Trustee Act 1925

Section 57 empowers the court to make orders which enable the trustees to act in a way which is 'expedient' in the management of the trust but without varying the terms of the beneficiaries' equitable interests in any meaningful way.¹⁴⁶ Section 57(1) of the TA 1925 provides as follows:

Where in the management or administration of any property vested in trustees any sale, lease, mortgage, surrender, release, or other disposition, or any purchase, investment, 144 These concerns had been voiced at first instance by Mann J in Southgate v Sutton [2009] EWHC 3270 (Ch), consequently Mann J had not made the order which had been requested.

145 Mann J had relied at [2009] EWHC 3270 (Ch), inter alia, on the decision of Goff LJ in Re Freeston's Charity [1978] 1 WLR 741, which had related to an application under s 57 TA 1925 in relation to a perpetual trust dating from 1597 in favour of two charities (one of which was University College, Oxford) and which had not actually proposed a split in the capital of that trust on the same basis and there would have been an impact of the equitable interests of the beneficiaries, and therefore that case was considered to be distinguishable by the Court of Appeal in Southgate v Sutton. Reference was made in the Court of Appeal to the decision in the Grand Court of the Cayman Islands in MEP v Rothschild Trust Cayman Limited (Cause Nos 128 of 2009 and 576 of 2005) in which a similar order on very similar facts had been made. Mann J had also not considered Re Downshire [1953] Ch 218, relating as it did to variation of trusts.

146 Southgate v Sutton [2011] EWCA Civ 637.

acquisition, expenditure, or other transaction, is in the opinion of the court expedient, but the same cannot be effected by reason of the absence of any power for that purpose vested in the trustees by the trust instrument, if any, or by law, the court may by order confer upon the trustees, either generally or in any particular instance, the necessary power for the purpose, on such terms, and subject to such provisions and conditions, if any, as the court may think fit and may direct in what manner any money authorised to be expended, and the costs of any transaction, are to be paid or borne as between capital and income.

This provision was considered in section 9.7.3 with reference to investment powers, although clearly it extends further than that. In relation to the categories of property and power set out in s 57, the court is empowered to extend such powers of the trustees to deal with that property. The only explicit criterion for the exercise of that discretion is that it be 'expedient', although, clearly, that expediency would have to be within the general terms and purposes of the trust.

One significant context in which such powers may be sought is in relation to a re-organisation of the trust fund so as to manage it better or to meet the competing needs of different classes of beneficiaries.¹⁴⁷

Miscellaneous exceptions

Section 96 of the Mental Health Act 1983 gives the Court of Protection the power to vary trusts created in relation to persons falling within its ambit. Section 96(1)(d) gives that court power to make a settlement in relation to the property of a patient falling within the 1983 Act. The powers of variation relate, primarily, to instances in which incorrect information has been supplied in connection with a settlement created under the Act, where the circumstances of the patient have changed substantially. The power of variation itself is a broad one, permitting the court to make any variation it sees fit in the circumstances.

There are also powers in the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 to alter trusts in cases of divorce or separation.¹⁴⁸ These powers relate to institutions such as ante-nuptial and post-nuptial settlements.¹⁴⁹ Thus, in Brooks v Brooks,¹⁵⁰ a variation to a postnuptial settlement was permitted to allow for the creation of a pension for a wife in such a relationship. That case constituted a slightly exceptional circumstance, relating as it did to a pension trust under which the husband was the sole member. The variation permitted the diminution of the husband's entitlement as beneficiary in favour of his wife, by way of a new pension for her benefit. It is clear that the court was prepared to permit this variation only on the basis that there were no other beneficiaries who would be affected by it. In relation to the broader context of pension funds, see Chapter 24 below and the provisions of the Family Law Act 1996.

There are provisions under the Settled Land Act 1925 which relate to variations as between life tenant and other beneficiaries. It is not proposed to deal with those provisions in detail. These provisions are unaffected by the 1958 Act. Section 64(1) of the 1925 Act permits 147 Re Thomas [1930] 1 Ch 194.

148 See also Jones v Jones [1972] 1 WLR 1269.

149 Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, s 24(1)(c), (d).

150 [1996] 1 AC 375.

variations in relation to settled land ‘which in the opinion of the court would be for the benefit of the settled land, or any part thereof, or the persons interested under the settlement’, such that the tenant for life is able to enter into a transaction which could be validly effected by the absolute owner.

10.5 LIMITS ON THE EXERCISE OF POWERS

10.5.1 Excessive exercise of a power

In general terms, where a power is exercised properly and then also exercised to excess, the proper exercise of the power is valid but the excessive portion is void.¹⁵¹ This is so unless it is impossible to distinguish between the proper and the excessive portion of the exercise. Suppose a power exists to advance £1,000 out of a fund from which the fiduciary advanced £1,100: it would be possible to separate the excessive £100 from the proper advancement of the £1,000. However, suppose a power exists to transfer a house to two or more of a class of objects: if the house were advanced only to one of the objects, then it would be impossible to segregate the valid from the void portion of the exercise of the power and so the entire exercise of the power would be void.

10.5.2 Fraud on a power

A fraud on a power does not require that the power-holder acts fraudulently, but rather that that person acts deliberately beyond the terms of the power.¹⁵² Where dishonesty or fraud is present, then a fiduciary holding the power will be liable to account for any loss to the beneficiaries of the power and to account for unauthorised profits earned from that act, as considered in Chapter 12.

151 Thomas, 1998, 434. See Alexander v Alexander (1755) 2 Ves Sen 640; Re Holland [1914] 2 Ch 595.

152 Vatcher v Paull [1915] AC 372, 378, per Lord Parker.

Part 4

Trusts implied by law

This page intentionally left blank

Resulting trusts

11.1	INTRODUCTION – WHAT IS A RESULTING TRUST?	500
11.1.1	Beginnings	500
11.1.2	Resulting trusts in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC	501
11.1.3	Common intention in resulting trusts	504
11.1.4	The division between ‘automatic’ and ‘presumed’ resulting trusts	505
11.1.5	Doubting the automatic/presumed categorisation	507
11.1.6	Structure of this chapter	508
11.2	AUTOMATIC RESULTING TRUSTS	508
11.2.1	No declaration of trust, by mistake	509
11.2.2	Failure of trust	510
11.2.3	Surplus property after performance of trust	511
11.2.4	Upon dissolution of unincorporated association	512
11.3	QUISTCLOSE TRUSTS	514
11.3.1	The Quistclose trust in outline	514
11.3.2	The decision in Barclays Bank v Quistclose	515
11.4	PRESUMED RESULTING TRUSTS	517
11.4.1	Introduction	517
11.4.2	Presumption of advancement – special relationships	519
11.4.3	Voluntary gift	522
11.4.4	Contribution to purchase price	524
11.4.5	Rebutting the presumption	526
11.4.6	Illegality and resulting trust	530
11.4.7	Illegality, the Insolvency Act 1986 and resulting trust	538
11.4.8	A summary of these principles	542
11.5	MISTAKE AND RESULTING TRUST	542
11.5.1	Recovery of property on grounds of mistake	542
11.5.2	Common intention and resulting trust in cases of mistake	544

OVERVIEW

Resulting trusts arise in favour of Y beneficially in the following situations: where Y has purported to create an express trust but has failed to identify the person for whom that property is to be held;¹ where Y has provided part of the purchase price of property with an intention to take an equitable interest in that property;² where X has acquired property intended beneficially for Y using money provided by Y.³

There are other situations in which presumptions of advancement operate to deem that rights in property have passed by way of gift between husband and wife, and between father and child.⁴ A resulting trust will arise in favour of the donor where that presumption of advancement can be rebutted on the facts.⁵

No resulting trust will arise over property in favour of a person who has committed an illegal act in relation to that property.⁶ However, a person who has committed an illegal act can nevertheless take beneficially under a resulting trust where she does not have to rely on the illegal act itself to assert beneficial title in the property.⁷

Resulting trusts are of particular importance in relation to the acquisition of rights in the home; a topic considered in detail in Chapter 15.

11.1 INTRODUCTION – WHAT IS A RESULTING TRUST?

11.1.1 Beginnings

There are circumstances in which the ownership of property will not be clear because a transfer of property has failed or is incomplete, or because a group of people have contributed to the acquisition of that property without allocating title clearly. In such situations, the doctrine of resulting trusts operates to resolve those questions of ownership. Resulting trusts arise in two quite different contexts: either to restore the equitable interest in property to its original beneficial owner in circumstances in which a transfer of that property has failed;⁸ or to recognise the equitable proprietary rights of someone who has contributed to the purchase price of property with an intention that she take some property rights in that property.⁹ While the most satisfactory definition of the resulting trust remains a subject for debate, it is suggested that the resulting trust is best thought of as being limited to these two categories.¹⁰ It is suggested that, by extrapolation from the majority judicial opinion,¹¹ these contexts should be recognised as being in truth two very different forms of trust within the blanket expression ‘resulting trust’.

The term ‘resulting’ itself may seem a little obscure. Professor Birks suggests that the term ‘resulting trust’ is derived from the Latin ‘resalire’, meaning to ‘jump back’ – that is, the equitable interest in property ‘jumps back’ to its original beneficial owner.¹² This is a convenient explanation of that form of resulting trust which arises when a transfer has failed,

1 Vandervell v IRC [1967] 2 AC 291.

2 Dyer v Dyer (1788) 2 Cox Eq Cas 92.

3 Ibid.

4 Bennet v Bennet (1879) 10 Ch D 474.

5 Fowkes v Pascoe (1875) 10 Ch App Cas 343. See now Stack v Dowden [2007] UKHL 17.

6 Tinsley v Milligan [1994] 1 AC 340; Tribe v Tribe [1995] 3 WLR 913.

7 Ibid.

8 Vandervell v IRC [1967] 2 AC 291, HL; Air Jamaica Ltd v Charlton [1999] 1 WLR 1399, PC.

9 Dyer v Dyer (1788) 2 Cox Eq Cas 92.

10 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

11 Ibid.

12 Birks, 1989, 62.

but is less obviously a complete explanation of that form of resulting trust which arises by means of a contribution to the purchase price of property. These distinctions will be explored in detail in the discussion to follow.

This chapter will do two things. First, it will consider the decided cases dealing with resulting trusts and will attempt to categorise those decisions. Secondly, it will examine the competing academic and judicial explanations of the underlying rationales of resulting trusts which veer broadly between one view asserting a broadly restitutionary role for resulting trusts and another which seeks to limit the resulting trust to those few categories set out in the decided cases. Before considering the decided case law it will be useful to consider the general statements made by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in the House of Lords in the leading case of *Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC*¹³ as to the different types of resulting trust.

11.1.2 Resulting trusts in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC

Two categories of resulting trust

The leading speech of Lord Browne-Wilkinson in *Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC*¹⁴ set out the two situations in which his Lordship considered that a resulting trust would arise. This section sets those categories out; later sections will consider how desirable these categories are. The first category of resulting trusts relates to situations in which a person makes a contribution to the purchase price of property, and the second category relates to situations in which the settlor has failed to explain the allocation of equitable interests in property.¹⁵

Purchase price resulting trusts

Purchase price resulting trusts arise so as to recognise that a person who has contributed to the purchase price of property acquires an equitable interest in that property in proportion to the size of her contribution. That equitable interest is held on resulting trust for the contributor. Lord Browne-Wilkinson expressed the first category as follows:

(A) where A makes a voluntary payment to B or pays (wholly or in part) for the purchase of property which is vested either in B alone or in the joint names of A and B, there is a presumption that A did not intend to make a gift to B: the money or property is held on trust for A (if he is the sole provider of the money) or in the case of a joint purchase by A and B in shares proportionate to their contributions. It is important to stress that this is only a presumption, which presumption is easily rebutted either by the counter-presumption of advancement or by direct evidence of A's intention to make an outright transfer.¹⁶

13 [1996] AC 669.

14 [1996] 2 All ER 961, [1996] AC 669.

15 In Elsen v Elsen [2011] BCCA 314, 14 ITELR 133 the issue arose as to whether a resulting trust could be implied so as to reverse the effect of an express trust for which the beneficiary had given no consideration. It was held that a resulting trust could not operate in this way; and that the express trust, once its existence had been found, would continue in existence. Ordinarily, a resulting trust would only be implied in circumstances in which there were otherwise no proprietary rights in existence.

16 Hayton, 1995, 317 et seq; White v Vandervell Trustees Ltd [1974] Ch 269, 288 et seq.

This first category affirms the long-standing principle in *Dyer v Dyer*¹⁷ that where a person contributes to the acquisition of property, that person receives a corresponding proportion of the total equitable interest in that property on resulting trust. This resulting trust is said to be a presumed resulting trust because it will not always be clear that the contributor is intended to acquire an equitable interest in the purchased property: all that equity is doing, when ownership of the property is contested, is presuming that joint contribution to the purchase price constitutes all of the contributors equitable owners of the property. It is an important part of the operation of this form of resulting trust that the claimant has contributed to the purchase price with an intention that she should acquire proprietary rights in that property. Otherwise people such as mortgagees lending money for the acquisition of property might seem to acquire ownership in equity of the mortgaged property instead of merely the rights of a secured creditor. In short, equity presumes that there is a resulting trust, although that presumption can be rebutted if it can be proved that the contributor intended something other than the acquisition of property rights.

For example, if A Bank lends money to B so that B can buy a car, it will typically be the case that A Bank will have a loan contract with B entitling A Bank to a personal claim to repayment but not for A Bank to acquire any proprietary right in the car.¹⁸ When there is a loan the lender does not acquire a right in any property bought with that money; rather the lender is entitled to a chose in action entitling her to a personal claim for the repayment of the debt (in the form of the repayment of the loan in cash).¹⁹ However, if A and B are husband and wife, and A contributes 50% of the purchase price for the acquisition of the matrimonial home, it will be presumed by equity that A should acquire 50% of the total equitable interest in that matrimonial home because a couple's intention is more likely to be that both acquire equitable title in the home. On this specific point see also the discussion of Stack v Dowden in section 15.9.

Resulting trust where no adequate disposal of the equitable interest

The other form of resulting trust arises where there is a 'gap' in the equitable title. For example, if S declares a trust over property but fails to explain who will be the beneficiary

17 (1788) 2 Cox Eq Cas 92.

18 Somewhat unsatisfactorily in Blue Sky One Ltd v Blue Airways LLC [2009] EWHC 3314 (Comm) at [255] Beatson J suggested that a contract of loan does not exclude the possibility of there being a trust in equity by relying on Barclays Bank v Quistclose, even though his Lordship was considering the point that a purchase price resulting trust and a loan are usually taken to be opposites. Of course, his Lordship had elided very different concepts in this unfortunate remark. A Quistclose trust (considered below) is a means of taking security by inserting a term providing for the specific use of loan moneys into a loan contract; whereas a purchase price resulting trust is a presumption which arises from the use of a person's money to acquire property to the effect that they are to take an equitable interest in that property. The circumstance in which a purchase price resulting trust will not arise is a circumstance in which the parties intended the contributor of the purchase price to be making a loan as opposed to taking an equitable interest in the property. A loan contract creates a contractual right at common law to be repaid capital and interest, unless something else is specified; whereas a resulting trust acquires a proprietary right in equity in the property.

19 Thus a mortgagee or chargee over property has only a personal right to receive a sum of money in the first instance, and it is only in default of payment that the chargee's right to possession of the charged property crystallises: the chargee does not take a vested equitable interest in the property in the same way as a beneficiary under a bare trust.

under that trust then the property will be held on resulting trust for S. The underlying rationale for the law of trusts declaring such an automatic resulting trust is the underlying policy of English property law that there cannot be property which does not have an owner. Equity abhors a vacuum and therefore will fill any gap in the title with a declaration that the property is held for its previous owner on resulting trust. As a matter of public policy it would be unfortunate if the owners of property could simply refuse to be bound by any obligations to maintain their property once it became burdensome to them. Suppose, for example, that a bicycle was held on trust but that it became rusty and valueless, such that the trustees and the beneficiaries decided that it should be thrown in the canal and abandoned: English property law would consider that the trustees and the beneficiaries retained all of the benefits and the burdens of the ownership of that property thus preventing them from denying responsibility for the bicycle. More significantly, perhaps, the owners of factories which were found to be generating harmful pollutants might otherwise be able to disclaim any obligations to remedy the effects of the pollution they had caused if it were not for this rule.

Lord Browne-Wilkinson explained this second category of resulting trust in the following terms:

(B) Where A transfers property to B on express trusts, but the trusts declared do not exhaust the whole beneficial interest.²⁰

This form of resulting trust is considered below at para 11.1.4 in the section headed ‘Automatic resulting trust’, particularly in relation to the decision in Vandervell v IRC.²¹ What is also considered below is the appropriateness of the reference to this resulting trust giving effect to the ‘common intention’ of the parties. As considered immediately below, this division of the resulting trust into two halves was significantly different from the division set out by Megarry J in *Vandervell (No 2)*²² which had held sway previously.

The foundations of resulting trusts

Lord Browne-Wilkinson used his leading speech in *Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC*²³ as an opportunity to state his judicial view not only of the law but also of the underlying foundations of the law of trusts. His Lordship explained the ideology behind the resulting trust in the following terms, in a passage which followed on immediately from those set out above:

Both types of resulting trust [as set out above] are traditionally regarded as examples of trusts giving effect to the common intention of the parties. A resulting trust is not imposed by law against the intentions of the trustee (as is a constructive trust) but gives effect to his presumed intention.

20 [1996] 2 All ER 961, 990–91; Hayton, 1995, 317 et seq; White v Vandervell Trustees Ltd [1974] Ch 269, 288 et seq; Barclays Bank Ltd v Quistclose Investments Ltd [1970] AC 567.

21 [1967] 2 AC 291.

22 [1974] Ch 269, [1974] 1 All ER 47.

23 [1996] AC 669.

There are some difficulties with this explanation. First, as Dr Chambers points out, it is difficult to see how the resulting trust arises in all cases to enforce the common intention of the parties: that is, the intentions not only of the settlor but also of the trustees.²⁴ In Vandervell v IRC,²⁵ for example, there is only the intention of Mr Vandervell which can have been remotely important when Mr Vandervell decided to settle a parcel of valuable shares on trust for the Royal College of Surgeons and subject to an unallocated option to reacquire those shares in the future.²⁶ It is the titleholder in property who decides how that property is to be treated – it cannot be the intention of the recipient which is important.²⁷ In a case like Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC,²⁸ where there is a vitiated commercial contract between two parties acting at arm's length, it might seem appropriate to talk of a common intention, but that is not true of all cases. Secondly, it is difficult to see what business it is of the trustee to decide the terms of the trust; it is the settlor's intention alone which is significant.²⁹ Thirdly, that the trust is said not to be enforced against the intentions of the trustee indicates merely that it is the constructive trust which arises by operation of law irrespective of the intentions of the parties where the defendant has performed some unconscionable act (as considered in Chapter 12). That indicates that the resulting trust is a limited category of trust which relates only to the two situations indicated by his Lordship and to no other. These issues are discussed in more detail below.³⁰

11.1.3 Common intention in resulting trusts

The reference to 'common intention' in the creation of a resulting trust is a commonly used one. Its meaning is that a resulting trust is a mixture of the intention of the settlor and the trustee's own knowledge that she is not intended to take the property beneficially. The idea is expressed as follows by Peter Gibson J in Carreras Rothmans Ltd v Freeman Mathews Treasure Ltd:³¹

The principle in all these cases is that the equity fastens on the conscience of the person who receives from another property transferred for a specific purpose only and not, therefore, for the recipient's own purposes, so that such person will not be permitted to treat the property as his own or to use it for other than the stated purpose . . . if the common intention is that property is transferred for a specific purpose and not so as to become the property of the transferee, the transferee cannot keep the property if for any reason that purpose cannot be fulfilled.

It is suggested that this understanding of the resulting trust, framed in the context of Quistclose trusts (considered at section 11.3 below), renders it almost indistinguishable from 24 Chambers, 1997, Chapter 1.

25 [1967] 2 AC 291.

26 Discussed in detail at para 5.7.3 above.

27 This is so particularly if the recipient is a volunteer. In the event that the recipient has given consideration, the law of contract and the principle of specific performance are applicable.

28 [1996] AC 669.

29 Re Brooks' ST [1939] 1 Ch 993.

30 The various theories of resulting trusts are discussed by the New Zealand Court of Appeal in Re Reynolds: Official Assignee v Wilson [2007] NZCA 122, (2007–08) 10 ITELR 1064.

31 [1985] Ch 207, 217.

the broad-ranging constructive trust set out by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC,³² considered in Chapter 12, and is therefore an inadequate explanation of all forms of resulting trust. What sets the resulting trust apart from other forms of trust is that the equitable interest in property reverts to the settlor on resulting trust on the basis that the settlor did not have sufficient intention, or did not perform formally necessary acts, to transfer that property beneficially to some other person in the first place. The concept of ‘common intention’ in relation to resulting trusts is useful, it is suggested, only in relation to purchase price resulting trusts in relation to which two or more people have evinced an intention to hold the equitable interest in property in common, regardless of who is expressed to be the owner of the legal title in that property.

The assertion made by Peter Gibson J that the resulting trust effects the common intention of the parties does not provide a suitable explanation of the *Vandervell v IRC*³³ form of automatic resulting trust, considered below. Such automatic resulting trusts come into existence because of the settlor’s failure to transfer an equitable interest effectively. The intention of the trustee is meaningless because the trustee, in her capacity merely as a trustee, has no entitlement to decide how the owner of property should deal with that property.³⁴ The only issue is the original titleholder’s intention as to the ownership of the equitable interest. That problem is resolved by returning the title to the settlor on resulting trust.

11.1.4 The division between ‘automatic’ and ‘presumed’ resulting trusts

The alternative statement of the categorisation of types of resulting trust, and one which had seemed to hold sway up to 1996, was found in the judgment of Megarry J in Vandervell (No 2).³⁵ Megarry J divided resulting trusts between ‘automatic resulting trusts’ and ‘presumed resulting trusts’. In his judgment, he began with a consideration of the manner in which a resulting trust might come into existence. There is no better way to examine these issues than to read the relevant portion of that judgment in detail. In Re Vandervell (No 2), Megarry J explained the law on resulting trusts as operating as follows (each of the points made are commented on in turn):

- (1) If a transaction fails to make any effective disposition of any interest it does nothing. This is so at law and in equity, and has nothing to do with resulting trusts.³⁶

This first point is straightforward. If the settlor has failed to transfer away any interest in the property which forms the trust fund then the situation remains exactly the same: the settlor remains absolute beneficial owner of all of the property sought to be settled on trust:

- (2) Normally the mere existence of some unexpressed intention in the breast of the owner of the property does nothing: there must at least be some expression of that intention before it can effect any result. To yearn is not to transfer.³⁷

32 [1996] AC 669.

33 [1967] 2 AC 291.

34 Re Brooks’ ST [1939] 1 Ch 993.

35 [1974] Ch 269, 294, [1974] 1 All ER 47, 64.

36 Ibid.

37 Ibid.

So, as considered in Chapter 5, it is necessary for the settlor to make a declaration of trust before any express trust will come into existence. Similarly, before there is any transfer of any right in property, the transferor must perform the necessary act to effect that transfer, whether that requires vesting legal title in the property in the trustee or delivering physical possession of a chattel to its donee in the case of a gift:

- (3) Before any doctrine of resulting trust can come into play, there must at least be some effective transaction which transfers or creates some interest in property.³⁸

Therefore, for there to be any question of a resulting trust coming into existence (that is, returning property rights to the settlor), it is necessary that those rights must have passed away from the settlor in the first place. The question then is, as considered in the following passage, what form of events will lead to the creation of a resulting trust once a transfer of some proprietary rights has been effected.

Presumed resulting trust

Presumed resulting trusts constitute a means by which equity will supplement unclear factual circumstances by presuming that the equitable interest in property results (or jumps back) to its previous owner. That means that, in a case where the evidence adduced by the witnesses will not conclusively support one or other of the parties such that the court cannot know which party to believe, the court will rely on one of its case law presumptions to imply an answer. Those presumptions operate in the following manner:

- (4) Where A effectually transfers to B (or creates in his favour) any interest in any property, whether legal or equitable, a resulting trust for A may arise in two distinct classes of case . . . (a) The first class of case is where the transfer to B is not made on any trust. If, of course, it appears from the transfer that B is intended to hold on certain trusts, that will be decisive, and the case is not within this category; and similarly if it appears that B is intended to take beneficially. [. . .] The question is not one of the automatic consequences of a dispositive failure by A, but one of presumption: the property has been carried to B, and from the absence of consideration and any presumption of advancement B is presumed not only to hold the entire interest on trust, but also to hold the beneficial interest for A absolutely. The presumption thus establishes both that B is to take on trust and also what that trust is. Such resulting trusts may be called ‘presumed resulting trusts’.³⁹

This first category of presumed resulting trust arises where no trust is created. Rather, there are a number of situations in which the case law raises a presumption that property passes between prescribed categories of individual. The example which arises most frequently is the situation in which property is transferred from father to child. The presumption which the law applies is that the father intends to make an outright gift of that property to the child.⁴⁰

³⁸ Ibid.

³⁹ Ibid.

⁴⁰ Bennet v Bennet (1879) 10 Ch D 474.

Therefore, in a case in which a father has transferred property to his child such that the child claims that this was an intended gift, but where the father claims that he transferred the property only for some other purpose, the court will not know whom to believe and consequently will revert to its presumption that in any case where a father transfers property to a child the father can be deemed to have intended to make a gift in the child's favour.⁴¹ This presumption can be displaced by evidence that that was not the father's intention. Where such rebuttal of the presumption takes place, the child holds the property on resulting trust for the father. These resulting trusts are considered at section 11.4 below.

Automatic resulting trust

The second category of resulting trust is the automatic resulting trust, which arises (as its name suggests) automatically on the happening of a suitable set of circumstances. Megarry J expressed the category as obtaining in the following circumstances:

(b) The second class of case is where the transfer to B is made on trusts which leave some or all of the beneficial interest undisposed of. Here B automatically holds on a resulting trust for A to the extent that the beneficial interest has not been carried to him or others. The resulting trust here does not depend on any intentions or presumptions but is the automatic consequence of A's failure to dispose of what is vested in him. Since ex hypothesi the transfer is on trust, the resulting trust does not establish the trust but merely carries back to A the beneficial interest that has not been disposed of. Such resulting trusts may be called 'automatic' resulting trusts.⁴²

The automatic resulting trust operates, in fact, on the basis of the equitable principle that equity abhors a vacuum. In practice this means that property rights must belong to some person; they cannot exist in a vacuum. Where there is no other equitable owner, those equitable rights are deemed to result automatically to the settlor: this appears sensible in principle given that the settlor was the last person to own those proprietary rights.

11.1.5 Doubting the automatic/presumed categorisation

This discussion has presented the arguments of both Megarry J and Lord Browne-Wilkinson because Lord Browne-Wilkinson takes issue with the categorisation set out by Megarry J. Lord Browne-Wilkinson, in his speech in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC,⁴³ doubted that the division set out by Megarry J between automatic and presumed resulting trusts could be said to be correct in all circumstances:

Megarry J in *Re Vandervell's Trusts (No 2)*⁴⁴ suggests that a resulting trust of type (B) does not depend on intention but operates automatically. I am not convinced that this is 41 See the discussion of Tribe v Tribe [1995] 4 All ER 236, [1995] 3 WLR 913, [1995] 2 FLR 966, at para 11.4.6 below for just such a situation.

42 Re Vandervell's Trust (No 2) [1974] Ch 269, 294.

43 [1996] AC 669.

44 [1974] Ch 269.

right. If the settlor has expressly, or by necessary implication, abandoned any beneficial interest in the trust property, there is in my view no resulting trust: the undisposed-of equitable interest vests in the Crown as bona vacantia.⁴⁵

Lord Browne-Wilkinson is therefore taking issue with the categorisation of some resulting trusts as being ‘automatic’. His Lordship considers that where the settlor has sought to divest himself absolutely of his right, there should not be a resulting trust in favour of the settlor. There are two issues which arise here. The first is that English property law has never expressly recognised that it is possible to ‘abandon’ rights in property.⁴⁶ English law has taken the view that one cannot dispose of property other than by transferring or terminating rights in it. What is generally considered to be impossible is simply to say that those rights of ownership which continue to exist belong to no one. The one principal exception to this could be said to operate in relation to the division of assets held by moribund unincorporated associations.⁴⁷ Therefore, Lord Browne-Wilkinson is either altering the principle that it is impossible to abandon rights in property, or is suggesting that where rights are purportedly disposed of it is incorrect to apply a resulting trust analysis to those rights. Secondly, it is not clear why those rights ought to revert to the Crown in preference to the original titleholder (or her estate) recovering any title in property which was not adequately disposed of. The intervention of rights of the Crown here is a remedy of convenience rather than a logical outcome in property law terms in the modern era – it does remind us, though, of the roots of English property law in the medieval assertion that all land and other property belonged ultimately to the Crown, and therefore that title in unclaimed property necessarily ought to revert to the Crown in recognition of this fundamental, ‘reversionary’ title.

11.1.6 Structure of this chapter

This chapter will nevertheless follow the division identified by Megarry J in broad terms, because that was the basis on which much of the case law considered in this chapter was decided. In what follows there is a consideration first of automatic resulting trusts and then of presumed resulting trusts. It should be borne in mind that this layout is itself controversial in the wake of the decision in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC. The discussion to follow will differ slightly from the arrangement suggested by Megarry J, in that Quistclose trusts are considered separately from the other forms of presumed resulting trusts. One further change is a separation out of the treatment of mistake in the cases from the remainder of resulting trusts.

11.2 AUTOMATIC RESULTING TRUSTS

This category of resulting trust arises automatically by operation of law. Where some part of the equitable interest in property is unallocated by the settlor after transferring property to 45 See Re West Sussex Constabulary's Widows, Children and Benevolent (1930) Fund Trusts [1971] Ch 1.

46 AH Hudson, 1993.

47 Re West Sussex Constabulary's Widows, Children and Benevolent (1930) Fund Trusts [1971] Ch 1; see para 11.2.4 below.

the trustee, the equitable interest automatically results back to the settlor. So, for example, if S purported to transfer 100% of the equitable interest in land on which three houses were built to T to hold on trust, but S failed to declare a trust over one of those houses, the equitable interest in that one house would be held by T on resulting trust for S. This is the simplest form of resulting trust. The broad range of examples of automatic resulting trusts are considered below. Automatic resulting trusts are, it is suggested, to be considered to be a part of the law of property in that they seek to fill any gaps in the title by restoring that title to the previous owner of the property. This form of resulting trust is not restitutionary in that there is no requirement for there to have been an unjust factor in the transfer of the property to the resulting trustee. It could be considered to fall under the general notion that trusts arise on the basis of conscience, in that it would be unconscionable for any person who was not so intended to take beneficial title in the property to seek to act as such and so that person is required to act as resulting trustee of the property for the benefit of the settlor in the event that the settlor's intended disposition of the property fails for whatever reason. The well-understood categories of automatic resulting trust follow.

11.2.1 No declaration of trust, by mistake

The most straightforward form of resulting trust is that which arises when a settlor seeks to create a trust but does not declare the manner in which all of the property at issue is to be held on trust. Therefore, there is some property in relation to which no express trust has been declared. In this situation, the equitable interest in that property is said to be held on resulting trust for the settlor. The case of Vandervell v IRC,⁴⁸ which was considered in detail in Chapter 5, is authority for this proposition.

In Vandervell v IRC, Mr Vandervell sought to benefit the Royal College of Surgeons (RCS). The way in which Vandervell decided to benefit the RCS was by means of a transfer of shares to the RCS, such that the annual dividend on those shares would be paid to the RCS. Vandervell wanted to recover the shares after the dividend had been paid to the RCS. Therefore, Vandervell reserved an option for his trust to repurchase the shares from the RCS on payment of £5,000. The option constituted a form of equitable interest in those shares.⁴⁹ However, the owner of this equitable interest was not identified. In line with one of the core equitable principles identified in Chapter 1, the reader will recall that equity abhors a vacuum – which means that someone must be the owner of each equitable interest; that interest cannot exist in a vacuum, instead someone must own it. The equitable interest represented by the option to repurchase the shares could not exist in a vacuum. Consequently, it was said that the unallocated equitable interest personified by the option to repurchase the shares must be held on resulting trust for Vandervell.

This is the clearest example of an automatic resulting trust arising on the decided cases. There are further contexts in which this same principle could arise. Where the equitable interest in property has not been disposed of properly, in accordance with the formalities for transfer appropriate to that form of property, that equitable interest will be held on resulting 48 [1966] Ch 261, [1967] 2 AC 291.

49 All options contracted with the owner of property to buy specific property constitute proprietary interests in that property in equity.

trust for the settlor. Therefore, it is assumed that a valid declaration of trust has been effected but that the necessary formality to transfer the equitable interest on trust has not been effected. The principle is therefore akin to that in Vandervell considered above, in that the settlor would be deemed to be the beneficiary under a resulting trust over that property.

11.2.2 Failure of trust

Where a trust fails for any reason the equitable interests purportedly allocated by the failed trust must pass to someone, on the basis that equity abhors a vacuum in the equitable ownership. A trust may fail because some condition precedent fails – for example, that the beneficiaries must marry but they do not – or because some condition subsequent in the trusts fails – for example, that the beneficiaries must remain married but they do not. In such situations where the trust fails, the equitable title in the trust fund passes automatically on resulting trust to the previous beneficial owner.⁵⁰

It was said in Chapter 5 that once an express trust is created, that trust cannot be undone by the settlor.⁵¹ However, there may be some trusts which come into existence only for a given reason: where that reason is not fulfilled it may be that the trust is deemed ineffective. For example, in the situation where a couple had intended to marry and to have certain property held on the terms of a marriage settlement, but where the marriage never took place in spite of the fact that the couple lived together and had children, it was held that the marriage settlement must fail because there was no marriage.⁵² The property purportedly held on the terms of the marriage settlement passed back to the couple on resulting trust.⁵³ In consequence, it can be seen that where the trust fails for any reason, the property intended to be held on trust will be held by the trustees on resulting trust instead. This principle can be distinguished from that in Paul v Paul,⁵⁴ on the basis that the marriage took effect in Paul v Paul and therefore the trusts did not fail even though the marriage subsequently did.

This principle is illustrated in Re Cochrane's Settlement Trusts,⁵⁵ in which a marriage settlement was created. Both of the parties to the marriage brought property to the marriage settlement. Under the terms of the marriage settlement, the income of the trust was to be paid to the wife provided that she continued to reside with her husband. In the event that either of them should die, the trust provided that the survivor acquired the entirety of the property in the fund beneficially. The wife left her husband who died subsequently. The issue therefore arose whether the wife would be entitled to succeed to the entirety of the trust fund, or whether her interest ceased once she left her husband. It was held that the wife received the equitable interest in the property which she had contributed to the marriage settlement on resulting trust, but that the property which the husband had contributed to the marriage settlement passed to his estate on resulting trust after his death. The basis for this decision was the failure of the purpose of the marriage settlement (that is, that they should stay together) giving rise to a return of the property to the original settlor on resulting trust.

50 Vandervell v IRC [1967] 2 AC 291; Chichester Diocesan Fund v Simpson [1944] AC 341; Re Ames' Settlement [1964] Ch 217.

51 Paul v Paul (1882) 20 Ch D 742.

52 Essery v Cowlard (1884) 26 Ch D 191.

53 Ibid.

54 (1882) 20 Ch D 742.

55 [1955] Ch 309.

Similarly, in Re Ames' Settlement,⁵⁶ a marriage was declared null and void. The question arose as to the treatment of property held on a marriage settlement. The marriage settlement itself provided for beneficiaries to whom the property should pass on failure of the marriage and so forth. On the basis that the marriage was held to have been void ab initio – that is, treated as though it had never taken place – the marriage settlement was treated as having failed. On the basis that the marriage was never valid it was held that the marriage settlement was similarly never in existence, and therefore that no term of the marriage settlement as to default beneficiaries could be effective. In consequence Vaisey J found that the property held on the terms of that marriage settlement was held on resulting trust.

The traditional rule relating to gifts made to charity in circumstances in which that charitable purpose fails is that any property purportedly passed under such a failed gift is held on resulting trust for the donor.⁵⁷ Where the gift itself is found to be worded so as not to disclose a charitable purpose (for example, where it is expressed to be for a ‘benevolent or charitable purpose’ and therefore not a purely charitable purpose) then again that property is held on resulting trust for the donor.⁵⁸ In similar fashion, if a gift is purportedly made to someone who is not able to receive that gift on grounds of her own incapacity to act, that gift will be held on resulting trust for the donor.⁵⁹

11.2.3 Surplus property after performance of trust

What happens once the purpose of the trust has been performed and there is still property left over? Many of the cases in this area have already been considered in Chapter 4 in relation to the distinction between purpose trusts and trusts for the benefit of people. Related issues arose: should the property be distributed among potential human beneficiaries, or does it fall instead to be held for the donor of the property on resulting trust? The general rule is that such property will be held on resulting trust for the settlor,⁶⁰ unless the court can find an intention to benefit specific individuals instead.⁶¹

Thus, in Re Trusts of the Abbott Fund,⁶² a trust fund was created in favour of two elderly ladies, and subscriptions were sought from the public. The aim underlying the trust was not fully performed before the two ladies died. It was held that the trust property remaining undistributed at the time of death should be held on resulting trust for the subscribers. A similar approach was taken in *Re Gillingham Bus Disaster Fund*⁶³ in considering a subscription fund for which money was raised from the public in the wake of a bus crash. The victims of the crash did not require all of the money raised. The issue arose as to treatment of the surplus money raised from the public but not needed by the victims of the disaster. The court held that the surplus should be held on resulting trust for the subscribers.⁶⁴ Had the money

⁵⁶ [1964] Ch 217.

⁵⁷ Chichester Diocesan Fund v Simpson [1944] AC 341.

⁵⁸ Morice v Bishop of Durham (1805) 10 Ves 522.

⁵⁹ Simpson v Simpson [1992] 1 FLR 601.

⁶⁰ Re Trusts of the Abbott Fund [1900] Ch 326.

⁶¹ Re Osoba [1979] 2 All ER 393.

⁶² [1900] Ch 326.

⁶³ [1958] Ch 300.

⁶⁴ Re Hillier [1954] 1 WLR 9; affirmed in part [1954] 1 WLR 700.

been held on a charitable trust then it could have been applied cy-près (as considered in Chapter 25).

The rule in Hancock v Watson,⁶⁵ however, will prevent a resulting trust in any event if an absolute gift is made to a person subject to a trust which fails. Instead, the absolute gift takes effect without the trust to the exclusion of any residuary beneficiary.⁶⁶

The rule may be summarised in the following way. If a trust's objectives are performed but there is still money remaining to be held on trust by the trustees, that property is to be held on resulting trust for the people who subscribed it in the first place. Suppose, for example, that S created a trust over a sum of money so that his daughter B's fees for dance lessons could be paid out of the trust. If the fees were paid in full but there was still money left over, there would be two theoretical possibilities: either the surplus money could pass to B absolutely, or that surplus money could be returned to S. The case law has taken the view that the surplus money should pass back to S on resulting trust. There are two alternative principles to consider. First, could B invoke the rule in *Saunders v Vautier*⁶⁷ as the absolutely-entitled beneficiary so that the property became vested in her absolutely? In principle there is no reason why this rule should not operate, unless S structured the trust so that B took no vested right in the trust property but was entitled only to the benefit of the dance lessons acquired with the trust money. Secondly, on a different point, the rules set out below in relation to unincorporated associations suggest that where money is given to such an association it will not pass back to the settlor on resulting trust.⁶⁸ Instead, that property will be distributed according to the terms of the contract between the members of that association.

11.2.4 Upon dissolution of unincorporated association

The context of the unincorporated association was considered in Chapter 4 in relation to purpose trusts. In that chapter an unincorporated association was defined as an association of people which does not itself have legal personality – thus raising problems as to the manner in which property subscribed to such an association is to be treated by the law. A particular problem arises on the dissolution of an unincorporated association as to the ownership of such property formerly held for the purposes of that association. There are two competing approaches: first, that the property should be held on resulting trust for the people who subscribed it; or, secondly, that the contract executed between the members of the association ought to be decisive of the manner in which that property is then distributed.

The classical view emerges from the decision in Re West Sussex, etc Fund Trusts,⁶⁹ which held that there may be situations in which a resulting trust will be imposed where money has been raised from the public. In that case it was held that, in relation to large donations attributable to identified individuals, such gifts should be held on trust for their donors. However, in relation to property in respect of which it would be difficult or impracticable to trace its donor, the classical view was that the property should pass bona vacantia to the Crown.⁷⁰

65 [1902] AC 14.

66 This rule was considered in detail at para 3.4.4 above.

67 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

68 Re Bucks Constabulary Benevolent Fund [1978] 1 WLR 641, [1979] 1 All ER 623.

69 Re West Sussex Constabulary's Widows, Children and Benevolent (1930) Fund Trusts [1971] Ch 1.

70 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

Re West Sussex must be considered to be of doubtful authority in the light of the development of a more modern view.⁷¹ In relation to other contributions, such as payment for entertainments or participation in raffles, the approach has been taken that the contract between the donors and the association for the provision of the entertainment disposed of any right which the donors might claim to have had in the property – on the basis that they had got what they paid for.⁷²

On older authority, in circumstances in which the donor could not be said to have retained any equitable interest on the basis that her intention had been to make an outright transfer, it has been held that any property left in the hands of a moribund association would not be held on resulting trust for that donor but rather would pass bona vacantia to the Crown.⁷³ This approach was accepted as being conceivable still in Westdeutsche Landesbank. However, the notion of a donor ceasing to have any title in property once that property has been transferred, for example, under the terms of a contract, finds its resolution in a more modern view.

This modern view, propounded by Walton J in Re Bucks Constabulary Fund,⁷⁴ is that the dissolution of a society and the distribution of property held for its purposes is a matter purely of contract. Therefore, it is the contract between the members which should decide how the property is to be distributed without the need for the intervention of any equitable doctrines (like resulting trust). Where there are specific contractual provisions dealing with the distribution of the property, those provisions would be decisive; whereas if there were no specific provisions, the property should be divided among the members in equal shares.⁷⁵ In Davis v Richards & Wallington Industries Ltd,⁷⁶ this approach led to the finding that where a pension trust deed provided that any surplus in the pension fund belonged to the employer, when the pension fund was wound up the surplus passed to the employer rather than being held on resulting trust for the pensioners who had contributed funds to the pension trust. This solution was reached on the basis that it would enforce the contractual intention bound up in the deed: another example of the primacy of contract law over property law.⁷⁷

This alteration in approach indicates two things. First, it demonstrates the important role played by contract in English law in allocating rights in property – an issue probed further in Chapter 21 on the relationship between commercial contracts and trusts. Secondly, it demonstrates that where a person intends to make a gift of property to another person, that donor retains no further property in the gift because the intention to make a gift itself terminates those property rights in the hands of the donor if the gift is completely constituted.

However, the bona vacantia principle in relation to property held on moribund trusts or for the purposes of moribund associations was upheld, albeit by way of obiter dictum in the speech of Lord Browne-Wilkinson in the House of Lords in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC,⁷⁸ a subsequent decision of the Privy Council has taken a different approach. So, in Air Jamaica v Charlton,⁷⁹ a provision had been inserted in the trust instrument over an 71 Re Bucks Constabulary Benevolent Fund [1978] 1 WLR 641.

72 Ibid.

73 Cunnack v Edwards [1896] 2 Ch 679; Braithwaite v Attorney-General [1909] 1 Ch 510.

74 [1979] 1 All ER 623.

75 Ibid.; see also Re GKN Sports Club [1982] 1 WLR 774.

76 [1990] 1 WLR 1511.

77 See para 2.4.1 above.

78 [1996] AC 669.

79 [1999] 1 WLR 1399.

occupational pension fund which provided expressly that no moneys were to be returned to the company in any circumstances. The purpose of that provision had been to preserve the company from any liability for tax arising from an inference that the company might otherwise have appeared to have been beneficially entitled to that trust fund. The trust was subsequently held to have been void for offending the rule against perpetuity. The question then arose whether or not property held on the terms of the void trust should result back to the company or whether that property should pass bona vacantia to the Crown. Given the provision of the trust which denied any right in the trust property to the company, it was argued that no sums could result to the company. In spite of the express term in the trust instrument, Lord Millett held that the surplus in the pension fund could be treated as belonging in equity to the company and the members of the pension fund scheme on resulting trust principles. Consequently, the funds remaining in the pension trust would not be treated as bona vacantia such that they would have passed to the government of Jamaica. The finding of a resulting trust instead provided that the company and the members of the scheme took title in them in accordance with the size of their contributions to the scheme. This approach accords more closely with the idea that property is privately held by private citizens and is not held simply at the will of the state.

11.3 QUISTCLOSE TRUSTS

A Quistclose trust is imposed over loan moneys if those moneys were lent subject to a condition that they were to be used only for a specified purpose but the borrower misapplied those loan moneys.

11.3.1 The Quistclose trust in outline

This short section is intended only to give an outline of the nature of Quistclose trusts, whereas Chapter 22 considers these complex trusts in much greater detail.⁸⁰ The reader is referred to that discussion for a closer analysis of the issues surrounding this notoriously intricate aspect of trusts law. The following sections consider the case law's general assertion that these trusts are properly considered to be a form of automatic resulting trust (although it should be remembered that that categorisation is in itself controversial in the eyes of many commentators).

Quistclose trusts, like any idea, can be made simple first. In short, a Quistclose trust⁸¹ arises in a situation in which a lender lends money to a borrower subject to a condition that the borrower will use that money only for a specified purpose provided in the loan contract. If the loan moneys are used for some other purpose in breach of that condition, equity deems that a trust has been created over the loan moneys in favour of the lender. The lender's rights under that trust will defeat the rights of any third person to whom the borrower may have transferred those moneys in breach of that condition. This trust has been categorised in two House of Lords decisions as being a form of automatic resulting trust such that the equitable interest in the loan moneys passes back automatically on resulting trust to the lender as soon as those moneys are misapplied.⁸² As will emerge, the proper categorisation of this form of trust is a matter for debate.

⁸⁰ See sections 22.3 and 22.4.

⁸¹ Barclays Bank v Quistclose Investments Ltd [1970] AC 567.

First, a worked example might be useful. Suppose Laura agrees to lend money to Bill. Bill is facing personal bankruptcy. His business is the manufacture and sale of modern, metal furniture. Bill has been unable to sell enough of his furniture but he thinks that if he were able to adapt his machinery to manufacture a particular type of fashionable furniture then he would be able to move back into profit. Laura therefore agrees to lend Bill £10,000 on the condition that the money is only to be used to adapt that machine.⁸³ The money is transferred to Bill. The next week, Bill is declared insolvent and his trustee in bankruptcy seeks to divide up the £10,000 among Bill's creditors. The Quistclose trust means that the £10,000 is held on trust for Laura because the loan contract specified that the money should be used only to adapt the machine: therefore, the loan money does not form part of Bill's estate for insolvency purposes. Consequently, Laura will be able to recover the loan money (and using the rule in Saunders v Vautier, as the sole beneficiary under the Quistclose trust, she will be able to compel the trustee to transfer the money to her absolutely).

11.3.2 The decision in Barclays Bank v Quistclose

The first modern statement of the above proposition arose in the decision of the House of Lords in *Barclays Bank v Quistclose*⁸⁴ and which therefore gives its name to that trust. Much of the difficulty in relation to Quistclose trusts revolves around the search for a satisfactory explanation of the working of these trusts which fit uneasily into any categorisation as express trust, or resulting trust, or even constructive trust. While these trusts are commonly known as Quistclose trusts their source can be traced to the older principle established in *Hassall v Smither*⁸⁵ that equitable title vests in a lender where conditions are attached to the use of loan moneys by their borrower.

In Barclays Bank v Quistclose a contract was formed by which Quistclose lent money to a company for a specific purpose, and then sought to recover its loan after the borrower's insolvency on the basis that the purpose had not been carried out. Memorably, Harman LJ described the company as being 'in Queer Street' – referring to the fact that the company had already exceeded its overdraft limit on its general bank account with Barclays Bank and was clearly in financial difficulties. The specific purpose for the loan, after negotiation between Quistclose and the company, was to enable the company to pay a dividend to its preferred shareholders but was subject to an express contractual provision that the loan moneys were not to be used for any other purpose. Importantly, then, the loan was made solely for use for payment of the dividend. It transpired that that purpose could not be performed because the company went into insolvency before paying the dividend to shareholders. At the same time, the company had a large overdraft with Barclays Bank on its general bank account. The loan 82 Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley [1999] Lloyd's Rep Bank 438; R v Common Professional Examination Board ex p Mealing-McCleod (2000) The Times, 2 May.

83 Let us suppose that Laura believes that if the money is used for this purpose then Bill will make profits and therefore this is the most likely way that the loan capital and interest will be paid.

84 [1970] AC 567, [1968] 3 All ER 651, [1968] 3 WLR 1097.

85 (1806) 12 Ves 119.

moneys had been paid into the company's share dividend bank account with Barclays Bank and therefore segregated from its general assets.

Subsequently, the company went into liquidation and Quistclose sought to recover the loan money. Barclays Bank contended that the money held in the share dividend account with Barclays should be set off against the company's overdraft with the bank in its general account on the basis that the money belonged beneficially to the company. Quistclose, therefore, needed to demonstrate that it had a proprietary interest in the loan moneys or else the money would be used to discharge the company's overdraft with the bank.

It was held that the loan money, held separately in a share dividend bank account, should be treated as having been held on resulting trust for the lender. The House of Lords held unanimously that the money in the share dividend account was held on trust for Quistclose on the basis that the specified purpose of the loan had not been performed.

Lord Wilberforce upheld the resulting trust in favour of Quistclose on the basis that it was an implied term of the loan contract that the money be returned to the lender in the event that it was not used for the purpose for which it was lent. Lord Wilberforce found that there were two trusts: a primary trust (to use the money to pay the dividend) and a secondary trust (to return the money to the bank if it was not used to pay the dividend). As his Lordship held:

In the present case the intention to create a secondary trust for the benefit of the lender, to arise if the primary trust, to pay the dividend, could not be carried out, is clear and I can find no reason why the law should not give effect to it.

The principle has been alternatively stated in Carreras Rothmans Ltd v Freeman Mathews Treasure Ltd to be that:⁸⁶ equity fastens of the conscience of the person who receives from another property transferred for a specific purpose only and not therefore for the recipient's own purposes, so that such person will not be permitted to treat the property as his own or to use it for other than the stated purpose.

However, this second description of the trust could be taken to be authority for one of three competing understandings of the Quistclose arrangement, considered in section 22.4. As considered in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington, to define the Quistclose trust as operating solely on the conscience of the recipient of the money is merely to place the situation within the general understanding of the trust as part of equity, rather than to allocate it to any particular trust categorisation.

Categorising Quistclose trusts

The principal problem in this context is identifying the proper analysis of the Quistclose trust. This weighty task is undertaken in detail in sections 22.3 and 22.4. The real problem is explaining the nature of the rights of the lender, the rights of the borrower and the time at which those rights come into existence, and the form of trust which best explains these features.

86 [1985] Ch 207, 222.

Acquiring commercial security other than under a Quistclose arrangement

The rights created under a Quistclose trust appear to be similar to the Romalpa clause⁸⁷ at common law under which a person who transfers property to another for the purposes of a contract expressly retains title in that property during the life of the contract. Indeed, this is the analysis which was advanced by Lord Millett in Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley.⁸⁸

These issues are considered in detail in Chapter 22, as mentioned above.

11.4 PRESUMED RESULTING TRUSTS

11.4.1 Introduction

Presumptions of advancement and resulting trusts

As considered above, there are situations in which English law presumes that particular personal relationships give rise to outright gifts when property passes between people in those relationships. The situations in which a presumption is important are those cases in which neither party is able to prove to the court's satisfaction what their true intentions were. Suppose two people, S and T, who are not related to one another. In a situation in which S hands his watch to T there are a number of possible explanations of the parties' intentions. It may be that S is making a gift of the watch to T. Alternatively, it may be that S has asked T to look after his watch while S goes swimming. Yet again, it may be that S has asked T to be trustee of the watch for S for life and then for his children after S's death. If the parties fall out and the matter comes to court, it will be very difficult for the judge to decide what S intended in respect of the watch: T may well insist that S made a gift of the watch, whereas S may argue that T was only to have it for safekeeping. In such situations, equity has developed presumptions as to what the parties intended. That means that if neither party can prove conclusively what was intended, the court will go back to its presumption and deem that that is what happened. In the case of S and T, equity would presume that S did not intend to make a gift of the valuable watch to T because T is not a person for whom S would usually be expected to provide.⁸⁹ Therefore, T would hold that watch on resulting trust for S.

The presumptions are a default setting which the courts fix on in cases of uncertainty. A little like a computer which, when you exit all of the software packages, returns to its default setting at the log-on screen. It is the result which the court plumps for when it cannot know on the evidence which is the correct result. As Lord Upjohn held in Vandervell v IRC:⁹⁰ 'in reality the so-called presumption of a resulting trust is no more than a long-stop to provide an answer where the relevant facts and circumstances fail to reach a solution.'

Suppose that S and T are husband and wife and therefore fall within one of the categories covered by the presumptions.⁹¹ Where S transfers property to T, the presumption is that S intended to make a gift of that property to T. This process of assuming an intention to make

87 Aluminium Industrie Vaassen BV v Romalpa Aluminium Ltd [1976] 1 WLR 676.

88 [2002] 2 All ER 377.

89 Bennet v Bennet (1879) 10 Ch D 474.

90 [1967] 2 AC 291, 313.

91 Bennet v Bennet (1879) 10 Ch D 474.

a gift when a husband passes property to his wife is known as ‘the presumption of advancement’. The other relationship which gives rise to a presumption of advancement is the situation between father and child. However, suppose that S and T are not married, and do not fall within any of the categories of presumption; where S transfers property to T without intending T to take that property beneficially (because there is no presumption of advancement) there will be a presumed resulting trust over that property in favour of S on the basis that S is not presumed to intend to make a gift of that property to T.

In more modern cases, even where a presumption of advancement exists, the courts are likely to accept evidence to disprove (or rebut) any such intention to make an advancement of the property. The court would often prefer to find a conclusive answer on the facts and the evidence given by witnesses rather than simply have recourse to the presumption. In such a case, where there is sufficient evidence, the presumption of a gift between S and T would be rebutted. In its place, a resulting trust comes into existence, because T holds the legal title in the property after the transfer in circumstances in which T was never intended to take that property beneficially.

Before discussing the detailed rules in this area, it is worth considering the social context of these principles. The operation of presumptions in English law is problematic. There are situations established by case law in which it is presumed that a transfer of property manifests an intention to create a gift of that property. The two more usual presumptions are in the cases of transfer from father to child and from husband to wife. This use of presumptions in the modern age is possibly questionable. There is no logic to assume that transfers between father and child should necessarily have a presumption of advancement attached to them where there is no such presumption in the case of transfers between mother and child. In the times when the presumptions were created it was usual for the court to assume that a man would be obliged to provide for his wife and his children. Therefore, it was presumed that any transfer of property to a wife or a child was an act undertaken as part of this obligation to maintain them. The presumption did not operate in relation to a transfer by a wife to her husband because women did not usually have much property of their own, husbands and wives being considered to be one person such that the wife was merely the ‘shadow of her husband’.⁹²

The importance of the resulting trust in this context is that if the presumption does not operate to transfer property between the purported donor and donee, the principle of resulting trust provides that the equitable interest in the property is held on resulting trust for the donor. The cases which we will examine in the following sections therefore consider whether a presumption applies, or whether that presumption can be rebutted so that a resulting trust arises. In short, where S transfers legal title to T, S will want to rebut any presumption that a gift has been made and demonstrate that the property should be held on resulting trust for S.

Purchase price resulting trusts

Purchase price resulting trusts have been considered to fall within the category of presumed resulting trusts. They do not in fact correspond to the presumed resulting trust category. The basis on which purchase price resulting trusts should be understood is that it would be unconscionable for the person in whose name the legal title is placed to deny the beneficial interests of the other people who have contributed to the purchase price of the property. This principle is considered below at para 11.4.4.

92 See Counce v Counce [1969] 1 WLR 286.

11.4.2 Presumption of advancement – special relationships

This section considers some of the specific relationships which the case law considers give effect to deemed outright transfers of property in the absence of evidence to the contrary, by way of presumption. The presumption of advancement will be removed by statute for the future, and has been overruled in relation specifically to cases involving the home. This brief survey is useful to understand much of the case law on resulting trusts which were affected by the presumption of advancement.

The abolition of the presumption of advancement for the future

The Equality Act 2010 has abolished the presumption of advancement prospectively. So, under s 199 of that Act it is provided that ‘the presumption of advancement is abolished’ but that abolition applies only to ‘anything done’ after the Act has come into effect. Under s 198 of the Act it is provided that ‘[t]he rule of common law that a husband must maintain his wife is abolished’. The reference to an obligation to ‘maintain’ a wife meant an obligation to provide her with all of the material things in life which she required (and a presumption to that effect) and not an obligation to ‘maintain’ her physically as one might ‘maintain’ the brickwork of an old house.⁹³ Furthermore, in relation to ownership of the home, the Supreme Court has held in *Jones v Kernott*⁹⁴ that the presumption of advancement should not apply in that context, but that the Equality Act will have the effect of removing it in any event.

Father and child

Where a father transferred property to a child, it was presumed that the father intended to make an outright gift of that property to that child.⁹⁵ In the absence of any cogent evidence to rebut this presumption of advancement, no resulting trust would be imposed on the property in favour of the father.⁹⁶ The presumption was that a father would want to care for his child and therefore would make transfers of property to that child for the purposes of its 93 A weak joke perhaps but it does capture something of the oddness of an idea of a human being needing to be maintained as though a chattel or a building. Unlike Dickens in A Christmas Carol I cannot see wisdom in this metaphor and, while we can all take some pleasure in the gendered assumptions in these case law rules having been removed at last, I think we must think about what was hidden in this idea of a wife needing to be kept as though something decorative or something owned, rather than being enabled to live a useful life as a human being.

94 [2011] 3 WLR 1121.

95 Bennet v Bennet (1879) 10 Ch D 474; Re Roberts [1946] Ch 1; Lavelle v Lavelle [2004] EWCA Civ 223. Cf Re Cameron [1999] 3 WLR 394, 409, suggesting that perhaps mothers ought also to be included.

96 Rebuttal of the presumption is considered at para 11.4.5 below.

maintenance.⁹⁷ The relationship of mother and child did not give rise to a presumption of advancement because there was no necessary implication that a mother was required to provide for the financial well-being of the child.⁹⁸ (In Australia, the presumption has been held to apply equally to mothers as to fathers.)⁹⁹ There was another presumption which arose where the donor stood in loco patris to the child (that is, as though the child's father).¹⁰⁰

However, it has been held in Canada that the presumption of advancement will apply only in relation to transfers made by parents to minor children and not to transfers to adult children. This accords with the understanding that the presumption of advancement applies where fathers are expected to take care of their children, which is not the same position when those children are adults.¹⁰¹

Husband and wife

Where a husband made a transfer of property to his wife, the presumption was that the husband intended to make an outright gift of such property.¹⁰² In determining title to property, a transfer made on the breakdown of a relationship would frequently create the following type of conflict between them: one party would assert a resulting trust over the property, whereas the other would wish to argue that the property was the subject of an outright gift. Usually a combination of their conflicting evidence and the fact that few couples would have recorded in writing their true intentions would have meant that the court would be hard-pressed on the facts to decide conclusively how the property should be treated. The husband would seek to argue that he intended the property to be held on resulting trust for him, whereas his wife would have argued that the presumption of advancement should apply to the effect that she took the property as a result of an outright gift. The husband's reasons for effecting a transfer not meant as a gift might be to avoid creditors (as discussed immediately below) or to avoid tax. The rules relating to divorced couples applied equally to couples who were previously engaged.¹⁰³

The clearest modern application of the presumption of advancement between husband and wife was in the decision of the Court of Appeal in Tinker v Tinker.¹⁰⁴ Mr Tinker transferred 97 The question arises in relation to the presumption of advancement as to how far it extended. In Sansom v Gardner [2009] EWHC 3369 (QB) it was argued that a man who stood in loco parentis to a younger man (but who was not actually his biological nor his adoptive father) should be subject to the presumption of advancement. It was held that in theory it was possible. The difficulties here were in demonstrating that the older man had assumed a responsibility to support the younger man and the persistence of such a relationship. However, it is suggested that the presumption does not rest on the assumption of a responsibility but rather on innate presumption that there was a type of relationship which automatically called such a duty into existence: therefore, if the relationship between the men was not of a type which automatically called the existence of the presumption into play, but rather if it was one which depended upon the assumption of that role by the older man, then it did not fall within the presumption of advancement but rather within the ambit of equitable estoppel or the law of contract.

98 Bennet v Bennet (1879) 10 Ch D 474.

99 Brown v Brown (1993) 31 NSWLR 582, 591.

100 Re Paradise Motor Company Ltd [1968] 2 All ER 625.

101 Pecore v Pecore [2007] WTLR 1591, Supreme Court of Canada.

102 Tinker v Tinker [1970] P 136.

103 Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1970, s 2(1).

104 [1970] P 136.

land into the name of Mrs Tinker, avowedly to put the land out of the reach of the creditors of his garage business. Mr Tinker then sought to recover the property from his wife when their relationship broke down. Lord Denning held that Mr Tinker could not argue against his wife that the property was held on resulting trust for him while also arguing against his creditors that the property was vested in his wife. Lord Denning found, therefore, that the presumption fell to be applied that the transfer was intended to effect an outright advancement in favour of Mr Tinker's wife. It was clear on the evidence before the Court of Appeal that the wife was intended to acquire the beneficial interest under the transfer and that the husband sought to avoid the rights of his creditors as a priority.

Despite the application of the presumption as set out in Tinker, the modern view is to move away from its automatic application, particularly in respect of the family home, even in the case law and not even in the statute. In Pettitt v Pettitt,¹⁰⁵ Lord Diplock held that:

It would in my view be an abuse of the legal technique for ascertaining or imputing intention to apply to transactions between the post-war generation of married couples 'presumptions' which are based upon inferences of fact which an earlier generation of judges drew as the most likely intentions of the earlier generations of spouses belonging to the propertied classes of a different social era.¹⁰⁶

Similarly, in Gissing v Gissing,¹⁰⁷ it was held that the principles determining equitable ownership of the family home as between the respective contributions of husband and wife, raised different concerns from the application of the age-old presumptions. (The details of the rules concerning implied trusts in respect of the family home are considered in Chapter 15.) The foregoing principles were applied by Goff J in Re Densham,¹⁰⁸ where a husband was convicted of theft from his employers and made bankrupt. The issue arose as to whether or not his wife would acquire an equitable interest in the property on the basis that their joint savings had been put towards the purchase. Goff J held that the wife did acquire an equitable interest on resulting trust principles given that her money had been applied in the purchase.

No presumption of resulting trust in relation to the home; presumption instead that equitable ownership follows the legal title

Following the decision of the House of Lords in Stack v Dowden,¹⁰⁹ the Supreme Court in *Jones v Kernott*¹¹⁰ has held that the presumption of a resulting trust in relation to the equitable ownership of the home is not to be applied in future. Instead, equitable ownership of the home, in the absence of an express trust, will be presumed to follow the allocation of the legal title. As with all presumptions, the presumption that the equitable ownership follows the legal title can be rebutted by sufficient evidence of a different intention on the part of the parties, resolving itself into a question as to the identification of the 'objectively inferred

105 [1970] AC 777.

106 Ibid., 824.

107 [1971] AC 886.

108 [1975] 3 All ER 726.

109 [2007] 2 WLR 831.

110 [2011] 3 WLR 1121.

intention' of the parties, or else into doing what the court considers to be fair in the circumstances. In a dissenting judgment in the House of Lords in Stack v Dowden, Lord Neuberger had followed the traditional methodology of allocating the equitable interest by reference to a resulting trust following contributions to the purchase price, and then using constructive trust principles to accommodate subsequent changes of intention, but this analysis was rejected by the other members of the House of Lords. On the current state of the authorities, the resulting trust will not apply to cases involving the family home. These issues are considered in detail in Chapter 15.

11.4.3 Voluntary gift

The first applicable category of presumption is where one party makes a gift voluntarily. That is, without any consideration having been provided by the donee.

Personal property

The presumption in respect of personalty is that a voluntary transfer gives rise to a resulting trust. By way of example, the case of *Re Vinogradoff*¹¹ concerned a grandmother who had a war loan for £800 in her name. (A war loan was in effect a security or bond, whereby the subscriber lent money to the government for the war effort and received a payment of interest and a future promise of repayment to whoever held the security at the time of redemption.) The grandmother transferred the war loan into the joint names of herself and her granddaughter. Unfortunately, she did not make plain her reasons for doing this. In consequence, it was unclear whether the grandmother continued to own the war loan outright, or whether she was now a joint tenant of it with her granddaughter. The grandmother continued to receive the dividends from the war loan until her death. When the grandmother died the issue arose whether or not the war loan formed part of the dead woman's estate or belonged to her granddaughter beneficially. Farwell J held that the property should be presumed to be held on resulting trust for the grandmother. His reasoning was that she did not fall within the usual category of the presumptions because she was not the child's father but only her grandmother. Furthermore, the fact that she continued to receive the dividends on her own without passing any of them to her granddaughter suggested that she had not intended to make a gift in her granddaughter's favour such that her granddaughter could claim the war loan absolutely on her grandmother's death.

Aside from the tortured logic of these presumptions, there are a number of possible objections to this decision in principle. First, the granddaughter was a minor at the time of the purported transfer, and therefore could not have acted as a trustee in any event because she was under-age. Secondly, it is not clear how this resulting trust can be said to accord with the intention of the settlor. Her intention in transferring the war loan into their joint names was ostensibly to benefit her granddaughter in some form. A resulting trust did not achieve that objective because it returned all of the equitable interest to the grandmother. While the testamentary rules of the Wills Act 1837 had not been observed (thus preventing a testamentary gift), it is not clear why there could not have been an inter vivos gift of rights in the property by means of the creation of a joint tenancy,¹¹² or a trust in favour of the grandmother and the granddaughter in remainder.

In Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC,¹¹³ Lord Browne-Wilkinson explained *Re Vinogradoff*¹¹⁴ and related cases as operating in circumstances where there was no intention to make an immediate gift. His Lordship held that the conscience of the recipient is affected when she discovers the intention of the settlor not to create any personal benefit in the recipient's favour. The resulting trust is said to be imposed at the moment of the acquisition of this knowledge. As such, the resulting trust comes closer to the constructive trust set out by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in that same case – discussed below in Chapter 12. As Martin points out, it is difficult to see how Vinogradoff supports this analysis given the infancy of the resulting trustee at all times during the case.¹¹⁵

Real property

Prior to the enactment of s 60(3) of the Law of Property Act 1925, it was necessary to specify a particular use governing the land in the conveyance. Where no such use was specified, the property was subject to a resulting trust in favour of the transferor. Section 60(3) provides that: 'In a voluntary conveyance a resulting trust for the grantor shall not be implied merely by reason that the property is not expressed to be conveyed for the use or benefit of the grantee.' As a result, there is no automatic resulting trust on the ground that no use is specified. However, this does not prevent the possibility of resulting trust (as in Hodgson v Marks, below). Rather, it restricts the automatic imposition of such a resulting trust.

The case of *Hodgson v Marks*¹¹⁶ is generally taken to have imposed a resulting trust over land where the intention of the transferor was not effected.¹¹⁷ Mrs Hodgson was an elderly woman who had a lodger, Evans. Evans was a rogue of the old school. Readers may be reminded of the bounders played by the actor Terry-Thomas in films like School for Scoundrels, in Ungood-Thomas J's description of him as 'a very ingratiating person, tall, smart, pleasant, self-assured, 50 years of age, apparently dignified by greying hair and giving the impression . . . of a retired colonel'. Evans put it about that Mrs Hodgson's nephew disapproved of Evans and that the nephew wanted to throw the lodger out. As we shall discover, Mrs Hodgson would have been well advised to have done so. Mrs Hodgson, however, developed an affection for Evans and transferred her freehold interest in the house to him so that he would be protected from her nephew's purported plan to evict Evans. The transfer was accompanied by an oral agreement that Mrs Hodgson would remain beneficial owner of the property. Evans became the registered proprietor of the property. The nephew's concerns were borne out. Evans sold the freehold to Marks, a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of Mrs Hodgson's rights.

The question was whether or not Mrs Hodgson was protected against the purchaser, Marks. The Court of Appeal held that Mrs Hodgson had an overriding interest under 112 Fowkes v Pascoe (1875) 10 Ch App Cas 343.

113 [1996] AC 669.

114 [1935] WN 68.

115 Martin, 1997, 246.

116 [1971] Ch 892.

117 Ibid, per Russell LJ; Birks, 1992, 335 and Chambers, 1997, 25.

s 70(1)(g) of the Land Registration Act 1925. Further, although Mrs Hodgson could not have claimed a declaration of an ordinary express trust under s 53(1)(b) of the Law of Property Act 1925 in the oral agreement, that agreement did prove Mrs Hodgson's intention in respect of the equitable interest and therefore formed 'a resulting trust of the beneficial interest to the plaintiff, which would not, of course, be affected by section 53(1)'.¹¹⁸

Hodgson v Marks is an adventurous application of the resulting trust, which might now be covered by the constructive trust as explained by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank (considered in Chapter 12). Its basis is that Mrs Hodgson did not intend to transfer the whole of the equitable interest, which she held previously beneficially, to Evans. Rather, she intended to reserve some of those rights to herself during her lifetime. Consequently, it was said that those rights ought to be restored to her by means of resulting trust when Evans breached their arrangement. It is suggested that the court was beguiled by the symmetry of the resulting trust and its rhetoric of returning rights to their original owner. However, the constructive trust appears to fit more comfortably with the facts of that case, given that Hodgson does not accord with the usual categories of resulting trust but rather with the underlying aim of the constructive trust to do justice on a broad scale.

An alternative analysis of this case has been advanced by Swadling.¹¹⁹ Swadling argues that the statement of Russell LJ that the trust was a resulting trust is in fact an obiter dictum. Rather, it is contended that Hodgson v Marks is predicated on the doctrine in Rochefoucauld v Boustead,¹²⁰ which provides that statute cannot be used as an engine of fraud. Therefore, it is accepted by the Court of Appeal in Hodgson v Marks that Evans could not have relied on s 53(1)(b) of the Law of Property Act 1925 to argue that no trust was created over the land which bound Evans, because that would be to permit Evans to benefit from his own fraud on Mrs Hodgson. Swadling argues that the form of trust created in Rochefoucauld was an express trust and therefore that the trust in Hodgson v Marks ought to have been found to be an express trust in the same way, which Mrs Hodgson created in her discussion with Evans and from which Evans would be prevented from resiling when selling the property to Marks.¹²¹

11.4.4 Contribution to purchase price

The clearest form of presumed resulting trust, accepted both by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in *Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC*¹²² and by Megarry J in Vandervell (No 2),¹²³ is the situation in which a person contributes to the acquisition price of property and is therefore presumed to take a corresponding equitable interest in that property. The core principle in respect of purchase cases can be identified from the judgment of Eyre CB in Dyer v Dyer,¹²⁴ where his Lordship held that:

118 Ibid., 933, per Russell LJ.

119 Swadling, 2000, 61.

120 [1897] 1 Ch 196; considered at para 1.4.18 above and also para 5.2.2.

121 As considered at para 5.2.2 above.

122 [1996] AC 669.

123 [1974] Ch 269.

124 (1788) 2 Cox Eq Cas 92.

The clear result of all the cases, without a single exception, is that the trust of a legal estate, whether freehold, copyhold or leasehold; whether taken in the names of the purchasers and others jointly, or in the names of other without that of the purchaser; whether in one name or several; whether jointly or successive – results to the man who advances the purchase money.

Where a contribution to the purchase price is intended to acquire some property right for the contributor then that contributor receives an equitable interest proportionate to the size of her contribution in the property on resulting trust. However, where the financial contribution is not directed at the acquisition of the property, that contribution will not ground an equitable interest under resulting trust.¹²⁵

In relation to real property constituting a home, a number of specific rules have been developed. Some of those adaptations for that context include an understanding of the nature of the contribution which will give rise to a resulting trust. Therefore, contributions to the mortgage will suffice to create some equitable interest for the contributor¹²⁶ in proportion to the size of the contribution relative to the total value of the land,¹²⁷ whereas contributions only to domestic expenses will not.¹²⁸ These particular principles are considered in Chapter 15. In that chapter it will emerge that the arithmetical certainties generally associated with resulting trusts will often be disturbed in line with some greater notion of justice.¹²⁹ It has been suggested that the presumptions of advancement should not have any part to play in decisions as to rights in the family home, where other considerations such as the rights of children come into play.¹³⁰

It is a pre-requisite for the establishment of such a resulting trust that the claimant demonstrates that the contribution to the purchase price is not made for any purpose other than acquisition of a right in the property. For example, where it could be demonstrated that the contributor intended only to make a loan to some other person for the purpose of buying a house, that would not acquire the lender any rights in the property. Similarly, an intention to make a gift of money to someone so that they could buy a house would not grant the donor any right in the property. Thus, in Sekhon v Alissa,¹³¹ a mother transferred title in a house into her daughter's name with the intention of avoiding capital gains tax. It was held that she had no intention to benefit her daughter; rather, she had the intention of tax avoidance (or, evasion on those facts) which rebutted the presumption of intention to benefit the daughter. Therefore, whereas the property had been transferred into the name of her daughter, a resulting trust over the property was necessarily said to arise in favour of the mother on the basis of the true, demonstrable intentions of the parties.

125 Winkworth v Edward Baron [1987] 1 All ER 114, 118.

126 Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1990] 1 All ER 1111.

127 Springette v Defoe [1992] 2 FLR 388.

128 Burns v Burns [1984] 1 All ER 244; Nixon v Nixon [1969] 1 WLR 1676.

129 Swadling, 2000, 61.

130 Pettitt v Pettitt [1970] AC 777; Gissing v Gissing [1971] AC 886; Calverley v Green (1984) 155 CLR 242.

131 [1989] 2 FLR 94.

It will always be a question of proving that both parties are intended to take beneficial interests in the property.¹³² This can lead to odd results. Few are odder than Elithorn v Poulter,¹³³ where Madeline put up all of the money for the purchase of a house to be occupied by Madeline and Alick as their home in Oxford. That house was put into joint names because Madeline believed that Alick would sell his house in London and pay her back for having paid the full purchase price upfront. Rimer LJ interpreted this as being a loan relationship between Madeline and Alick whereby Alick was to pay Madeline back in due course.¹³⁴ In essence, it was found that she was lending him the money to acquire his half-share, and not that she was acquiring the entire interest for herself. It was held by Rimer LJ, relying on the facts as found by the judge at first instance, that the proper interpretation to be put on the fact that both parties were intended ultimately to contribute half of the purchase price of the property was that the parties had intended to own the property jointly beneficially under resulting trust principles.¹³⁵ So, in spite of paying the entire purchase price, she acquired only half of the equitable interest. (Interestingly, throughout this case Madeline is referred to as ‘Madeline’ by Rimer LJ and Alick is referred to as ‘Dr Elithorn’, which somewhat diminishes her by reducing her to her first name and elevates him to the level of his medical qualification. That is not the least satisfactory aspect of this case.)

11.4.5 Rebutting the presumption

Given the judicial reluctance to apply the ancient presumptions to cases involving family homes, this section considers the situations in which courts have found that the presumptions have been successfully rebutted.

Generally

The application of the presumptions is clearly capable of outcomes which bear little or no relation to the intentions of the parties. Therefore, the courts have frequently sought to rebut the presumptions. In the old authority of Finch v Finch,¹³⁶ Lord Eldon suggested that the court should not accept a rebuttal of the presumption unless there was sufficient evidence to 132 In Close Invoice Finance Ltd v Abaowa [2010] EWHC 1920 (QB) it was found that when the claimant contributed the amount of a deposit to the purchase price of property then the claimant was entitled to an equitable interest on resulting trust principles in proportion to the size of that deposit relative to the total purchase price. On those facts it was found that the parties’ intention had been for ownership in common and not that this deposit had been a loan. The remainder of the equitable interest was therefore owned by the defendant who had paid for the remainder of the purchase price.

133 [2008] EWCA Civ 1364.

134 There was much confusion as to the facts because Alick appeared in person and so the process was somewhat irregular.

135 Madeline died, and therefore the case was litigated between Alick and Madeline’s other relatives. Let us suppose, however, that Madeline still lives: if that were the case, what rights does she have? The upshot would be that Madeline awaits payment from Alick for his half share, although this loan appears to be unsecured and therefore it is unclear whether she can sell the property and have recourse to the sale proceeds to satisfy Alick’s obligation to her. Her recourse ultimately, it is suggested, would be either to seek specific performance of this loan contract whereby Alick is obliged to sell his house and forward to her the sale proceeds, or for Madeline to sell the Oxford property and then to set off the amount to which Alick is entitled from those sale proceeds against the loan repayment which he owes to her, as in Owen v Wilkinson (1858) 5 CB(NS) 526.

136 (1808) 15 Ves Jr 43.

justify such rebuttal. The more modern approach, indicated by cases like McGrath v Wallis,¹³⁷ is to accept a rebuttal of the presumption of advancement in family cases on the basis of comparatively slight evidence – even in a situation where an unexecuted deed of trust was the only direct evidence indicating the fact that a father intended a division of the equitable interest rather than an outright transfer when conveying land into his son’s name.¹³⁸

The presumption of resulting trust, which arises when a person has contributed to the purchase price of property, can be rebutted by interpretation of the surrounding circumstances. So, when a couple from different religious backgrounds started a relationship which later collapsed, the court rebutted a presumption of resulting trust to the effect that they were co-owners of a house which the couple had bought when together on the basis that one party collected and kept rents on the property for himself, that the parties had formed separate romantic relationships, and that the parties had never lived together in the property.¹³⁹ It was decided by the court that the inference to be drawn was that the parties had never intended that the property be held on resulting trust for them both to be used as their joint home.¹⁴⁰

The clearest general statement of principle surrounding rebuttals of the presumptions was made by James LJ in Fowkes v Pascoe,¹⁴¹ where his Lordship held as follows: ‘Where the Court of Chancery is asked, as an equitable assumption of presumption, to take away from a man that which by the common law of the land he is entitled to, he surely has a right to say: “Listen to my story as to how I came to have it, and judge that story with reference to all the surrounding facts and circumstances.”’¹⁴² In that case, Mrs B had purchased shares in the names of herself and her grandson S. There was no personal nexus which would have brought S (although her grandson) within the ambit of the usual presumption of advancement. Therefore, the usual presumption in such a case as this would have been that the property was held on resulting trust for the settlor. Nevertheless, the court illustrated English law’s occasional willingness to infer such presumptions of advancement. On the facts the Court of Appeal was prepared to hold that Mrs B’s intention must have been to make a gift to S of half of the value of those shares. Therefore, the presumption of a resulting trust in favour of Mrs B would be rebutted.

Bank accounts

Where property is paid into a bank account by a husband with the intention that that property shall be held on a joint tenancy basis by the husband and his wife, the account is so held on joint tenancy and will pass absolutely to the survivor of the two.¹⁴³ Similarly, property acquired with funds taken from that joint bank account would belong to them both as joint tenants,¹⁴⁴ unless they were expressly taken in the name of one or other of them.¹⁴⁵ The 137 [1995] 2 FLR 114.

138 Ibid.

139 Vajpeyi v Yusaf [2003] EWHC 2339 (Ch).

140 It is suggested that this decision puts the horse before the cart. That the parties’ subsequent behaviour did not demonstrate that they had clung to an intention to remain a couple and to occupy a house together is not evidence that at the time the property was acquired, their common intention was not that it be owned jointly beneficially.

141 (1875) 10 Ch App Cas 343; Abrahams v Trustee in Bankruptcy of Abrahams (1999) The Times, 26 July.

142 (1875) 10 Ch App Cas 343, 349.

143 Marshall v Crutwell (1875) LR 20 Eq 328; Re Figgis [1969] Ch 123.

144 Jones v Maynard [1951] Ch 572; Rimmer v Rimmer [1952] 2 All ER 863.

145 Re Bishop [1965] Ch 450.

difficulty arises either in situations where the intentions of the husband are not made clear, or in situations in which the husband transfers the bank account into the joint names of himself and his wife but continues to use the account for his own personal use. In the latter circumstance it would appear that the presumption of advancement is to be rebutted.¹⁴⁶ These same factual issues would arise in relation to any purported joint tenancy over a bank account, but the question of the presumption of advancement will arise only in relation to jointly-held bank accounts between husband and wife or father and child.

It has been held possible for a husband to rebut the presumption of advancement to his wife in circumstances where he agreed merely to guarantee her bank account.¹⁴⁷ For the wife it would be contended that such a guarantee was to be interpreted as an advancement made by the husband for the wife's benefit. The husband would argue that this was merely a guarantee, that no money had actually been transferred until the wife's account fell into arrears, and any money spent in that way was intended to be returned to the husband in any event. In a decided case the court accepted that the husband could recover the amount of the guarantee from his wife when it was called in because there had been no intention to make a gift of the sum to her.¹⁴⁸

The case of bank accounts is generally a difficult one to assess. Where accounts are opened in joint names with the intention that money is to be used jointly, or even jointly and severally, the owners of the account will be joint tenants. In Re Figgis,¹⁴⁹ Megarry J was called on to consider joint bank accounts which had been held for 50 years. The accounts were both a current account and a deposit account. Megarry J held that a current account might be held in common for the sake of convenience so that bills and ordinary expenditure could be paid out of it. The deposit account was a different matter, because money in that account would usually be held for a longer period of time and only used in capital amount for specific purposes. It would, however, be possible for either type of account to be deemed at a later stage to have become an advancement in favour of the wife if the circumstances of the case suggested that that was the better inference. Megarry J therefore held that the presumption of advancement should operate in the wife's favour even though the account had been operated by the wife only during the First World War and during her husband's final illness. A different result was reached in Marshall v Crutwell,¹⁵⁰ where the account was opened merely for the sake of convenience and contained only money provided by the husband.¹⁵¹

Tax avoidance

Tax avoidance is an expression encapsulating the lawful organisation of a person's tax affairs so as to reduce liability to tax. Frequently, it may be that a taxpayer will transfer property to a family member so as to reduce his own liability to tax. Subsequently, he may seek to have that property retransferred to him once the revenue authorities have been satisfied. The family member may refuse to retransfer the property, thus requiring the 146 Young v Sealey [1949] Ch 278.

147 Anson v Anson [1953] 1 QB 636.

148 Ibid.

149 [1969] Ch 123.

150 (1875) LR 20 Eq 328.

151 Cf Re Harrison [1918] 2 Ch 59.

taxpayer to come to court alleging that the property is held on resulting trust. In Sekhon v Alissa,¹⁵² a mother transferred property into her daughter's name with the intention to evade or avoid liability to capital gains tax. The mother sought to argue that the property should be held on resulting trust for her because she had no intention to benefit her daughter by the transfer. The mother, in the event, did not have to carry out any illegal action in evading liability to tax in respect of the transfer. Therefore, it was held that the mother was entitled to rely on her intention to rebut any argument that she intended to transfer the money outright to her daughter and thus demonstrate that the equitable interest in the house should remain with her on resulting trust. It remains unclear whether there is a presumption of gift in cases involving mother and daughter which mirrors the established rule in cases between father and child. It would appear that there remains a distinction in relation to the operation of the presumptions between transfers from fathers and those from mothers which is difficult to explain in the modern context.

In Shephard v Cartwright,¹⁵³ where a father divided shares in his successful companies between his three children, the issue arose as to whether those transfers of shares constituted advancements or whether the father was entitled to rely on his intention to divide them between his children so as to reduce the amount of tax payable on dividends declared over those shares. In that context Viscount Simonds held that the father could not pray in aid his subsequent treatment of the shares and the dividends; neither could he rely on the fact that the children signed documents at their father's instruction plainly without understanding what those documents meant. In consequence, the father's executors were required to hold the shares on trust for the children to give effect to the presumed advancement.

The decision in Shephard can be contrasted with that in Warren v Gurney,¹⁵⁴ in which a father bought a house which was conveyed into his daughter Catherine's name prior to her marriage. The father retained the title deeds to the property (which title deeds Morton LJ accepted were 'the sinews of the land', adopting Coke's phrase), and this the court took to indicate that the father did not intend to part with all of the rights in the house in favour of Catherine; rather, the father had written a document headed 'my wish' which purported to have the house divided equally between his three daughters. The court took the retention of the title deeds and the document together to rebut any presumption of advancement in favour of Catherine. In consequence, Catherine was deemed to hold the house on resulting trust for her father. The difference between these two cases is difficult to isolate in the abstract. Rather it is only on the facts of each individual set of facts that one can consider them and one must put oneself in the position of the judge deciding that particular case on the basis of the evidence presented to him.

The situation of tax avoidance should now be considered in the light of the doctrine in Furniss v Dawson,¹⁵⁵ whereby the court will ignore artificial steps which form part of a scheme designed solely to avoid tax. The courts' reluctance to support tax avoidance schemes is also evident from the decision in Vandervell v IRC.¹⁵⁶

152 [1989] 2 FLR 94.

153 [1955] AC 431.

154 [1944] 2 All ER 472.

155 [1984] AC 474.

156 [1967] 2 AC 291.

11.4.6 Illegality and resulting trust

The law concerning illegal transfers of property was clear before the decision of the majority in the House of Lords in Tinsley v Milligan¹⁵⁷ that equity would not intervene to find an equitable interest on resulting trust in favour of a person who had transferred property away in furtherance of an illegal purpose.

This area of the law has undergone a radical overhaul in recent years. In short, the problem is this: where a person seeks to rebut the presumption of advancement but is required to rely on some illegal or unlawful act to demonstrate the intention that there be a resulting trust, will that illegality preclude the operation of the equitable resulting trust? Suppose, for example, that a husband had transferred property to his wife with the intention of putting that property unlawfully beyond the reach of his creditors; could the husband claim that the presumption of advancement should be rebutted in favour of a resulting trust? It is a core principle that one who comes to equity (for example, to prove a resulting trust) must come with clean hands. In consequence, equity would not find a resulting trust in circumstances in which the claimant was required to rely on an illegal act to prove the existence of that resulting trust. Therefore, the presumption of advancement would apply, or else the common law title would be decisive of the question.¹⁵⁸ That rule subsists in a subtly different form.

The long-established principle is illustrated by Gascoigne v Gascoigne,¹⁵⁹ where the court automatically effected the presumption of advancement in connection with the transfer of property by a husband to his wife with the intention of avoiding creditors. The plaintiff had leased land and built a house on it using his own money. The property was transferred into the name of his wife with the intention of eluding creditors. This transfer raised the presumption of advancement, which the plaintiff was required to rebut to demonstrate that his wife was intended to hold the property on resulting trust for the plaintiff. The only reference to actual fraud in the judgment of Lush J was that the plaintiff had refused to pay taxes in respect of the land on the basis that it belonged equitably and in law to his wife, the defendant. It was held, however, that the court would not allow a transferor to rely on an illegal or fraudulent purpose to rebut the presumption of advancement and establish an entitlement to the imposition of an equitable interest under a resulting trust. This approach was adopted as an instinctive response by the courts in these types of case. This principle can be traced back into older cases such as Holman v Johnson where in the words of Lord Mansfield: ‘No court will lend its aid to a man who founds his cause of action upon an immoral or an illegal act.’¹⁶⁰

A new direction

The long-established principles of equity in this context were subtly redrawn by the House of Lords in the case of Tinsley v Milligan.¹⁶¹ The appeal concerned a lesbian couple who had

157 [1994] 1 AC 340, [1993] 3 All ER 65, [1993] 3 WLR 126.

158 Muckleston v Brown (1801) 6 Ves 52.

159 [1918] 1 KB 223. See also Collier v Collier [2002] EWCA Civ 1095.

160 (1775) 1 Cowp 341, 343, per Lord Mansfield CJ; as applied by Lord Goff in Tinsley v Milligan [1994] 1 AC 340. See also Roberts v Roberts (1818) Dan 143, 150; and Ayerst v Jenkins (1873) LR 16 Eq 275, 283, per Lord Selborne.

161 [1994] 1 AC 340.

concocted a fraudulent scheme to ensure that one of them would receive state benefits to which she would not otherwise have been entitled. Milligan and Tinsley used the house as a lodging house which they ran as a joint business venture. This business provided the bulk of both parties' income. The property was registered in the sole name of Tinsley, although both parties accepted that the property was owned jointly in equity. The purpose for the registration in Tinsley's sole name was to enable Milligan to claim state benefits with Tinsley's full knowledge and assent. The relationship broke down and Tinsley moved out. Tinsley claimed absolute title to the house. Milligan claimed that the house was held on trust for the parties in equal shares. Tinsley argued that Milligan would be required to rely on her illegal conduct to establish this claim and that equity should not therefore operate to give Milligan the benefits of her wrongdoing. It was held that Milligan was entitled to an equitable interest in the property on resulting trust in proportion to her contribution to the purchase price.¹⁶² In short, the rationale for this decision was that Milligan was able to prove that her interest arose from the contribution to the purchase price (a lawful act) and not from the fraud on the social security system (an unlawful act). That thinking requires some closer examination.

In Tinsley v Milligan, Lord Browne-Wilkinson held that the following were the core applicable principles:

- (a) Property in chattels and land can pass under a contract which is illegal and therefore would have been unenforceable as a contract.
- (b) A claimant can at law enforce property rights so acquired, provided that he does not need to rely on the illegal contract for any purpose other than providing the basis of his claim to a property right.
- (c) It is irrelevant that the illegality of the underlying agreement was either pleaded or emerged in evidence: if the claimant has acquired legal title under the illegal contract, that is enough.

His Lordship considered the long-standing principle of Lord Eldon in Muckleston v Brown,¹⁶³ that in cases where the claimant seeks to rely on illegality to establish a trust, the proper response is to say 'Let the estate lie where it falls' with the owner at common law rather than holding it on resulting trust. However, his Lordship found that the earlier cases also showed that the claimant ought to be entitled to rely on a resulting trust where she did not have to rely on her illegality to prove it. Relying on principles of trusts of homes set out in *Gissing v Gissing*¹⁶⁴ and *Lloyds Bank v Rosset*¹⁶⁵ (considered in Chapter 15), Milligan was able to argue that she had acquired an equitable interest in the property. The illegality was raised by Tinsley in seeking to rebut Milligan's claim. Milligan did not have to rely on her own illegality because she was entitled to an equitable share in the property in any event since she had contributed to the purchase price. The illegality was therefore not the source of her equitable rights; rather, her contribution to the purchase price was the source of those rights.

Lord Browne-Wilkinson did describe the cases on trusts of homes as establishing the rule that the 'creation of such an equitable interest does not depend upon a contractual obligation

¹⁶² Dyer v Dyer (1788) 2 Cox Eq Cas 92.

¹⁶³ (1801) 6 Ves 52, 68–69.

¹⁶⁴ [1971] AC 886.

¹⁶⁵ [1991] 1 AC 107.

but on a common intention acted upon by the parties to their detriment'. The form of trust which his Lordship appeared to have in mind is a common intention constructive trust (considered in Chapter 15) rather than a resulting trust as normally understood. It is submitted that the appropriate form of trust on the facts was a purchase price resulting trust arising from Milligan's contribution to the acquisition of the property. To return to the earlier discussion of the nature of resulting trusts, it does appear that his Lordship was seeking to develop a resulting trust based on 'the common intention of the parties' rather than one which, strictu sensu, gives effect to the intention of the settlor alone. The whole drift of the law on resulting trust is therefore moving towards the establishment of resulting trusts in accordance with technical property law rules as opposed to being based on purely discretionary principles. In Tinsley v Milligan, Lord Browne-Wilkinson focused carefully on the source of the claimant's rights – in the contribution to the purchase price of the property – as opposed to the unconscionability of the claimant's entire course of dealing in relation to the property – particularly the illegal claim for social security benefits. This marks a movement away from traditional, moral principles towards a more modern and scrupulous approach based on the protection of validly-acquired property rights. However, Lord Keith and Lord Goff dissented in the House of Lords in terms which rehearsed the traditional approach, as is considered in the next section.

The dissenting view

The dissenting speech of Lord Goff in Tinsley v Milligan cited a number of authorities,¹⁶⁶ including *Tinker v Tinker*¹⁶⁷ and Re Emery,¹⁶⁸ as establishing the proposition that equity will not assist someone who transfers property to another in furtherance of a fraudulent or illegal design to establish an interest in the property disposed of. This approach is founded primarily on the ancient equitable maxim that 'he who comes to equity must come with clean hands'¹⁶⁹ and the fear that an extension of the principle propounded by Lord Browne-Wilkinson would 'open the door to far more unmeritorious cases'. While there is a moral attraction to this approach, it does not deal with the fundamental property law issue, 'who else can assert title to the property?'¹⁷⁰ Where the recipient has knowledge of the illegality bound up in the transfer, there would appear to be no objection to removing any proprietary rights transferred on purely moral grounds. However, where there was no intention to transfer rights absolutely to the recipient, it would appear to cut to the heart of the nature of the resulting trust if the intentions of the settlor are not to be observed. Indeed, the distinction between Lords Goff and Browne-Wilkinson is that the former prefers a moral approach to the law whereas the latter prefers an approach based on an amoral intellectual rigour.

166 Among the older authorities were (1775) 1 Cowp 341, 343, per Lord Mansfield CJ; Roberts v Roberts (1818) Dan 143, 150; and Ayerst v Jenkins (1873) LR 16 Eq 275, 283, per Lord Selborne.

167 [1970] 2 WLR 331.

168 [1959] Ch 410.

169 Following Groves v Groves (1829) 3 Y&J 163, 174, per Lord Chief Baron Alexander; Tinker v Tinker [1970] P 136, 143, per Salmon LJ.

170 Furthermore, Tinsley would have acquired complete title in this property despite being a conspirator in Milligan's illegal actions, thus making it equally undesirable that Milligan's rights be ignored.

The judgment of Nicholls LJ in the Court of Appeal in Tinsley v Milligan was particularly interesting in considering the nature of equity.¹⁷¹ It was argued by Nicholls LJ that there ought to be a ‘public conscience’ test in cases such as Tinsley v Milligan. A public conscience test would mean that the judge could decide whether, in all the circumstances, that particular judge thought that the defendant’s behaviour was sufficiently unconscionable to justify denying the award of property. This conscience would be equity in its purest sense: without reference to precedent or statute, the judge would be able to balance, in the words of Nicholls LJ, ‘the adverse consequences of granting relief against the adverse consequences of refusing relief’.¹⁷² Even Lord Goff, however, was not prepared to extend equity this far so as to allow the judge to act entirely as she thought fit on a case-by-case basis. One final point, on the facts of Tinsley v Milligan, however: we might want to observe that if Lord Goff had spoken for the majority, then surely the result would have been that one of the parties to the criminal conspiracy would have become the absolute owner of the property whereas her fellow conspirator would have received nothing despite having contributed to the purchase price. This would not seem to have generated a fairer result on the facts, even if it would have produced the satisfaction of having refused equitable relief to someone who had committed a criminal act.¹⁷³

The question of intention

The decision of the majority in Tinsley v Milligan therefore marked a new departure in the law relating to illegality and the availability of equitable doctrines such as resulting trust: this new departure relied on a technical identification of the source of the claimant’s property rights. Subsequently, in Tribe v Tribe the Court of Appeal also took into account the claimant’s intention. In Tribe v Tribe,¹⁷⁴ T owned 459 out of a total of 500 shares in a family company. He was also the tenant of two leases used by the family company as licensees for the conduct of its business. The lessor served a notice of dilapidations on T which, it appeared at the time, would have required T to meet the cost of extensive works on the properties. T was advised that the costs of these works could lead him to lose the assets of the business and would cause him to go into bankruptcy. To avoid liability to his creditors, T purported to sell his shares in the family business to his son for £78,030. To put your assets beyond the reach of creditors in expectation of bankruptcy in this way was an illegal act. T transferred the shares to his son. In the event, no money was actually paid by the son in consideration for the transfer of the shares. Meanwhile, the lessor agreed to a surrender of the lease, which meant that T was not required to sell any assets to repair the property or to satisfy his creditors. T then sought to recover his shares once he knew that his creditors would not need access to them, but T’s son refused to retransfer the shares to his father.

The issue arose whether the shares were held on resulting trust for T, or whether the presumption of advancement should lead the court to find that equitable ownership had been passed to T’s son. T was therefore required to plead his own illegal act (that is, intentionally

171 [1992] Ch 310.

172 [1992] Ch 310, 319.

173 To do justice to Lord Goff, he does mention this point in his speech but nevertheless considers that he is obliged to follow the traditional principles.

174 [1995] 4 All ER 236, [1995] 3 WLR 913, [1995] 2 FLR 966.

putting his assets beyond the reach of his creditors) to rebut the presumption of advancement.

The Court of Appeal held that T was entitled to a resulting trust in his favour because his illegal purpose had not been carried into effect. The lessor had not required T to pay for refurbishment works which would have put T into insolvency, and therefore T had not had any creditors on insolvency to deceive. Therefore, despite T doing acts in the full expectation that they would turn out to be illegal acts, T was entitled to rebut the presumption of advancement to his son because by staying solvent he had not actually carried through his illegal purpose.

The current status of the law is set out in the judgment of Millett LJ in Tribe v Tribe.¹⁷⁵

- (1) Title to property passes both at law and in equity even if the transfer is made for an illegal purpose. The fact that title has passed to the transferee does not preclude the transferor from bringing an action for restitution.
- (2) The transferor's action will fail if it would be illegal for him to retain any interest in the property.
- (3) Subject to (2) the transferor can recover the property if he can do so without relying on the illegal purpose. This will normally be the case where the property was transferred without consideration in circumstances where the transferor can rely on an express declaration of trust or a resulting trust in his favour.
- (4) It will almost invariably be so where the illegal purpose has not been carried out. It may be otherwise where the illegal purpose has been carried out and the transferee can rely on the transferor's conduct as inconsistent with his retention of a beneficial interest.
- (5) The transferor can lead evidence of the illegal purpose whenever it is necessary for him to do so provided that he has withdrawn from the transaction before the illegal purpose has been wholly or partly carried into effect. It will be necessary for him to do so (i) if he brings an action at law or (ii) if he brings proceedings in equity and needs to rebut the presumption of advancement.
- (6) The only way in which a man can protect his property from his creditors is by divesting himself of all beneficial interest in it. Evidence that he transferred the property in order to protect it from his creditors, therefore, does nothing by itself to rebut the presumption of advancement; it reinforces it. To rebut the presumption it is necessary to show that he intended to retain a beneficial interest and conceal it from his creditors.
- (7) The court should not conclude that this was his intention without compelling circumstantial evidence to this effect. The identity of the transferee and the circumstances in which the transfer was made would be highly relevant. It is unlikely that the court would reach such a conclusion where the transfer was made in the absence of an imminent and perceived threat from known creditors.

This statement of the law relating to resulting trusts and illegality still applies the principle in *Gascoigne v Gascoigne*¹⁷⁶ that a claimant cannot rely on an illegal act in seeking to establish a resulting trust. What is important to rebut the finding of a resulting trust is that there is a direct link between the interest sought under the resulting trust and the illegal act. What is plain is that the equitable principle here is being drawn very tightly. The ancient principle that ‘he who comes to equity must come with clean hands’ is being eschewed in favour of Lord Browne-Wilkinson’s more focused approach in Tinsley on identifying the source of the interest under resulting trust and seeing if that flows directly from an illegal act. Lord Goff favoured a more broad-brush approach which required action in good faith throughout, in line with the classical understanding of the principles of equity. Indeed, that the older principle is being displaced is evident from the decision in Tribe v Tribe in which Mr Tribe clearly intended to commit an illegal act and did all the acts preparatory to its commission: it was down primarily to good fortune that he did not have to carry his illegal purpose through. From this tendency in the cases it is evident that any strict attention to the principle of requiring good conscience from the defendant has been replaced by a more formalistic thinking which promotes technical precision over the broad sweep of ancient equitable principle. This was evident in Tinsley v Milligan precisely in the distinction between the speeches of Lords Browne-Wilkinson and Goff, where the former preferred a careful analysis of the sources of the parties’ property rights and the latter a general view based on morality. A litigant will be required to rely on her illegal act and will therefore be prevented from relying on a resulting trust in circumstances in which, for example, an unmarried couple put their home in the woman’s sole name in an effort to hide the man’s equitable interest from his wife in matrimonial proceedings;¹⁷⁷ or where a father transferred title in his business premises to his daughter so as to avoid a claim for costs in litigation by making himself seem less wealthy;¹⁷⁸ or where a bankrupt sought to conceal property from his trustee in bankruptcy in insolvency proceedings.¹⁷⁹ In each of these cases the defendant’s illegal act was the reason for the purported transfer of property to another person or the purported creation of a trust. It is only when in cases like Tinsley v Milligan where the illegal act is not bound up in the transfer of property that the defendant will be entitled to rely on an equitable remedy.¹⁸⁰ In cases of unlawful tax evasion, a claimant may be restrained from claiming an equitable remedy (such as resulting trust or proprietary estoppel) if the source of her rights is in truth an agreement to transfer property in a manner designed unlawfully to deceive HM Revenue and Customs (‘HMRC’): so, by falsely completing a tax return to conceal an interest in property, as part of a scheme concocted by an old man with his adult children, an illegal act is performed which precludes the taxpayer from relying on a resulting trust in his favour.¹⁸¹ However, if a tax evasion scheme is concocted but never carried out (because the false documents were never shown to HMRC) then there would be no illegal act committed which would preclude the finding of a trust,¹⁸² just as in Tribe v Tribe.

175 [1995] 4 All ER 236, 257.

176 [1918] 1 KB 223.

177 Lowson v Coombes [1999] Ch 373, [1999] 1 FLR 799.

178 Collier v Collier [2002] EWCA Civ 1095, [2002] BPIR 1057.

179 Barrett v Barrett [2008] EWHC 1061 (Ch), [2008] BPIR 817.

180 See also 21st Century Logistic Solutions Ltd (in liquidation) v Madyson Ltd [2004] EWHC 231 (QB), [2004] STC 1535, where an attempt was made to defraud HMRC of VAT payments: the judge held that creating a contract to sell computer parts (on which it was intended not to account ultimately for the VAT) as a preparatory part of that scheme was not an illegal act, but that an illegal act would be performed when a false return was submitted to HMRC.

181 Q v Q [2008] EWHC 1874 (Fam), [2009] 1 P & CR D12 (also sub nom S v R).

182 Painter v Hutchison [2007] EWHC 758 (Ch), [2008] BPIR 170.

The ethics of the resulting trust in cases of illegality

