Mr Tribe had, of course, intended to carry out this illegal act in that he had performed all of the actions necessary to make his act illegal, but was fortunate not to have been forced into insolvency. Imagine an assassin on a cold rooftop looking through a telescopic sight on a high calibre rifle at his 'target'. You will be familiar with this scene from American films like JFK or Matt Damon's Bourne series of movies.¹⁸³ The assassin shifts his position, feels the heft of the rifle butt against his shoulder, flexes his fingers around the trigger, and settles his breathing. He is looking at his target standing on the street below on the edge of the kerb. The target seems to be looking absent-mindedly for a taxi. The assassin knows that the target is deaf, old and slow-moving. There is no hope that he can save himself if the assassin takes the shot. The street is clear for a moment. There is nothing to interrupt the assassin's view. He takes the first pressure on the trigger as he squeezes slightly. By increasing the pressure just a little more he will loose a bullet across the street. It is a clear day with no wind. The target steps forwards from the kerb but is still in the centre of the rifle's sights. The assassin squeezes the trigger and the bullet shoots from the rifle barrel. But before the bullet can reach its target, a No.19 bus, travelling at terrific speed, hits the target with tremendous force and kills him instantly. The bullet lands harmlessly in the side of the bus. The bullet would otherwise have hit the target full in the forehead. I would suggest that Mr Tribe is morally in exactly the same position as this assassin in one very important sense. The assassin intended to kill the target and did everything necessary for him to do to kill the target. However, by chance, a bus arrived at the right moment and killed the target instead. Mr Tribe had done everything necessary for him to have committed the illegal act of putting property beyond the reach of his creditors, and it was a little good fortune which meant that all of his actions did not ultimately constitute an illegal act. Morally, however, Mr Tribe was in the same position as the assassin pulling the trigger: he willed the outcome but circumstances intervened to save him from performing the actus reus of an illegal act. It seems odd, as a result, that Millett LJ should decide to use an equitable doctrine to come to the aid of Mr Tribe. The only explanation is that his son was also a party to the conspiracy to put property beyond the reach of creditors and therefore was morally in no better position than Mr Tribe, and therefore did not deserve to take title in the property in preference to his father.

Illustrations of the principle in action

There have been a number of more recent cases which have illustrated the basic principle that a person may rely on a resulting trust, in spite of there having been some incidental illegality, providing that the illegality was not the source of the property right claimed by way of resulting trust or alternatively that the illegal act was not in the event performed. There have also been cases in which the claimant has committed an illegal act in an attempt to conceal assets from third parties and so has been prevented from relying on a resulting trust or prevented from denying a proprietary interest by way of resulting trust. The denial of rights in property is a feature of cases involving insolvency or divorce or litigation seeking to impose liabilities over a proportion of the defendant's wealth: in each case, the approach has been the same as in Midland Bank v Wyatt in that the courts have sought, in effect, to prevent the defendant from denying title to property unconscionably. In Lowson v Coombes an unmarried couple put their home in the woman's sole name in an effort to hide the man's equitable interest from his wife in matrimonial proceedings but it was held that this was an illegal act and that equity required that the man could not purport to dispose of this property.¹⁸⁴ In Collier v Collier, a father faced a large bill for costs arising from litigation and so sought to make himself appear less wealthy by transferring title in his business premises to his daughter, but it was held that the property rights would result back to him nevertheless.¹⁸⁵ In Barrett v Barrett, a bankrupt sought to conceal property from his trustee in bankruptcy in insolvency proceedings but was treated as still having those assets as part of his estate for the purposes of the insolvency proceedings.¹⁸⁶ In each of these cases the defendant's illegal act was the reason for the purported transfer of property to another person, or the purported creation of a trust, and therefore the defendant was prevented from being able to rely on his illegal act either to retain or dispose of rights in property. It is only in cases like Tinsley v Milligan where the illegal act is not bound up in the transfer of property that the defendant will be entitled to rely on an equitable doctrine like resulting trust, or alternatively the equitable doctrine of resulting trust will operate so as to bring the property back to the defendant so that the claimant can recover it in bankruptcy or other proceedings so as to prevent the defendant putting assets illegally beyond the reach of his creditors.

183 Someone looks down through a rifle sight at someone in all of these films. I am thinking particularly of Jason Bourne looking at Pamela Landy from the roof of a building opposite her office in The Bourne Ultimatum.

A large number of cases involve schemes to defraud HMRC, raising the question of at what stage an illegal act has been performed. So, in *21st Century Logistic Solutions Ltd (in liquidation) v Madysen Ltd*¹⁸⁷ a taxpayer hatched a plan to defraud HMRC of VAT payments which involved, as one of its preparatory stages, the creation of a contract to sell computer parts on which the VAT should have been payable. The taxpayer had no intention of paying VAT on those contracts but it was held that simply creating that contract was not in itself an illegal act; instead an illegal act would only be committed when a false VAT return was submitted to HMRC.¹⁸⁸ In cases of unlawful tax evasion, a claimant may be restrained from claiming an equitable remedy (such as resulting trust or proprietary estoppel) if the source of his rights is in truth an agreement to transfer property in a manner designed unlawfully to deceive HMRC. Consequently, where an old man falsely completed a tax return to conceal an interest he held in property as part of a scheme which he had concocted with his adult children, it was held that an illegal act had been performed which precluded the taxpayer from relying on a resulting trust over that property in his favour.¹⁸⁹ However, if a tax evasion scheme is concocted but never carried out (because the false documents were never shown to HMRC) then there would be no illegal act committed which would preclude the finding of a trust,¹⁹⁰ just as in Tribe v Tribe.

184 [1999] Ch 373, [1999] 1 FLR 799.

185 [2002] EWCA Civ 1095, [2002] BPIR 1057.

186 Barrett v Barrett [2008] EWHC 1061 (Ch), [2008] BPIR 817.

187 [2004] STC 1535.

188 21st Century Logistic Solutions Ltd (in liquidation) v Madysen Ltd [2004] EWHC 231 (QB), [2004] STC 1535.

189 Q v Q [2008] EWHC 1874 (Fam), [2009] 1 P & CR D12 (also sub nom S v R).

190 Painter v Hutchison [2007] EWHC 758 (Ch), [2008] BPIR 170.

11.4.7 Illegality, the Insolvency Act 1986 and resulting trust

Resulting trust, shams and illegality

One of the more common forms of illegality in this context is the avoidance of creditors when the transferor fears bankruptcy, insolvency or receivership (all varying forms of bankruptcy which occur to different classes of legal person in different circumstances). Under s 423 of the Insolvency Act 1986, the court is empowered to reverse any action which puts assets beyond the reach of creditors with the intention of avoiding or weakening their claims. The section also covers sales at an undervalue in this context. The decision in *Midland Bank v Wyatt*¹⁹¹ confirmed the decision in Re Butterworth,¹⁹² that the creditors need not be creditors at the time of the transaction – it is sufficient that they become creditors after the transfer or sale at an undervalue. Therefore, even transfers carried into effect some time before bankruptcy will be covered by this principle, provided that they are carried out in the expectation of bankruptcy to defeat the interests of creditors. The creditors can be creditors of the insolvent personally, or of a company which he intends to create. There is no need that the transaction be dishonest – it is sufficient that there was a demonstrable intention to put assets out of the reach of creditors.

*Midland Bank v Wyatt*¹⁹³ is an important case on the scope of s 423 of the Insolvency Act 1986 and on the ability of persons to transfer assets out of the reach of their creditors. The case illustrates the difficult line between organising your affairs legitimately so that the failure of a business does not mean losing your house and personal property, and creating unlawful arrangements to outwit your creditors once you have realised that your business is on the brink of insolvency. This case also indicates the ability of the court to look behind sham transactions where necessary in this context.

Mr Wyatt had decided to set up a textile business. The family home had been bought in 1981 and registered in the joint names of Mr and Mrs Wyatt, and was subject to a mortgage in favour of Midland Bank. Mr Wyatt considered this new business venture to be commercially risky and therefore created an express trust in 1987, on advice from his solicitor, under which his family home was held by him on trust for his wife and two daughters. Mr Wyatt was subsequently divorced from his wife in 1989. The business went into receivership in 1991.

Mr Wyatt had used the house as security for a number of loans for his ailing business after 1987. All the lenders and creditors were unaware of the trust, thinking that the equitable interest was held by both Mr and Mrs Wyatt. Interestingly, Mrs Wyatt's solicitors were not made aware of the express trust when preparing the divorce arrangements.

Midland Bank sought a charging order over the family home against Mr Wyatt's interest in the house. Mr Wyatt argued that the house was held on the terms of the express trust declared in 1987 and that the bank could not therefore realise its purported security. The bank contended that the trust was either void as a sham, or voidable further to s 423 of the Insolvency Act 1986. It was held that it was not necessary to establish a fraudulent motive to show that there is a sham. Neither was it necessary to show that the declaration of trust should have no effect. It would be enough to set aside the purported express trust that, acting on mistaken advice, the transaction was not in substance what it appeared to be on its face. On the facts, it was clear that at the time of creating the trust Mr Wyatt had no intention of endowing his wife or the children with his interest in the house. This was demonstrated by the fact that Mr Wyatt continued to treat the house as being entirely his own when borrowing money against it, and by the fact that his wife's solicitors were unaware of the purported express trust. Rather, the purpose of the transaction was to provide a safeguard against the commercial risk of the business. The transaction was therefore not what it purported to be. As such it must be held to have been a sham. Consequently, the express trust was held to have been void and unenforceable.

191 [1995] 1 FLR 697, [1995] 3 FCR 11. Also Agricultural Mortgage Corporation v Woodward (1995) 70 P & CR 53. Cf Choithram International v Pagarani [2000] 1 WLR 1.

192 (1882) 19 Ch D 588.

193 [1995] 1 FLR 697.

Under s 423 of the 1986 Act, the transaction was also capable of being rendered void because it sought to transfer the property gratuitously to Mrs Wyatt and the children with the purpose of avoiding creditors. The shortcoming with this second point is that there were no specific creditors which were to have been avoided. It is not evident how one could draw the line between a lawful arrangement of one's affairs and an unlawful avoidance of hitherto unknown, potential creditors. In applying the rule in Re Butterworth,¹⁹⁴ it was held not necessary to show that the sole motive of the settlement was the avoidance of creditors. It was sufficient that such motive was one of a number of identifiable motives. It would appear that all is to be presumed against the bankrupt and in favour of the creditors in an insolvency situation.

In relation to a claim to establish a resulting trust, it is possible to set aside a transfer as a sham transfer and establish a resulting trust instead. From the point of view of a creditor in a bankruptcy, the creditor will be entitled to any property held in the bankrupt's estate. It is consequently in the creditor's best interests to demonstrate that the bankrupt has property held on resulting trust for him, because a bankrupt is required to transfer to the creditors any property in which the bankrupt has beneficial title under resulting trust or otherwise. Using s 423 of the Insolvency Act 1986, the court has power to recognise that property may continue to be vested in the bankrupt's estate so that it can be realised in the administration of the bankruptcy in satisfaction of the creditor's rights.

So, in general terms, where a trust is created without any intention that the beneficiaries take any equitable interest in the settled property but rather in circumstances in which the settlor is simply seeking to hide her ownership of that property, then that trust may be void on the grounds that it is simply a sham.¹⁹⁵ A sham is any situation in which the parties' documentation and other devices are a 'pretence' or are merely 'dressing up' their true intentions to appear to be something else¹⁹⁶ so as to give 'the appearance of creating between the parties legal rights and obligations different from the actual legal rights and obligations (if any) which the parties intended to create'.¹⁹⁷ The result will be either that the settled property will

194 (1882) 19 Ch D 588.

195 Yorkshire Railway Wagon Co v Maclure (1882) 21 Ch D 309; Stoneleigh Finance Ltd v Phillips [1965] 2 QB 537; Snook v London & West Riding Investments Ltd [1967] 2 QB 786, [1967] 1 All ER 518; Midland Bank v Wyatt [1997] 1 BCLC 242; applied in Minwalla v Minwalla [2004] EWHC 2823 (Fam); Re Yates, Carman v Yates [2004] All ER (D) 373.

196 National Westminster Bank plc v Jones [2001] 1 BCLC 98, para [36], per Neuberger J, and Re Yates [2004] All ER (D) 373, para [217] et seq, applying AG Securities v Vaughan [1990] 1 AC 417.

197 Snook v London & West Riding Investments Ltd [1967] 2 QB 786, 802, per Diplock LJ.

pass back to the settlor on resulting trust¹⁹⁸ or, it is suggested more accurately, that no equitable interest will be deemed to have been created in that property on the basis that no trust ever came into existence.

The scope of s 423 of the Insolvency Act 1986

As considered, even if the resulting trust analysis were not available, the court has the power under s 423 of the Insolvency Act 1986 to set aside transactions entered into at an undervalue with a view to defrauding creditors.¹⁹⁹ Section 423 provides that:

- (1) This section relates to transactions entered into at an undervalue; and a person enters into such a transaction with another person if –
 - (a) he makes a gift to the other person or he otherwise enters into a transaction with the other on terms that provide for him to receive no consideration.²⁰⁰

This provision would include a gift of property or a declaration of trust over property in either case in which there would be no consideration paid for the transfer of property. That sub-section then also covers the situation in which:

- (c) he enters into a transaction with the other for a consideration the value of which, in money or money's worth, is significantly less than the value, in money or money's worth, of the consideration provided by himself.

This provision would cover either a declaration of trust or a transfer in relation to which there is no contractual consideration at all or a transfer in which any contractual consideration which is given is significantly less than the value of the property. It is not a requirement that the avoidance of creditors was the sole purpose of the transaction provided that putting assets beyond the reach of creditors was one of the purposes of the transaction.²⁰¹ So, where a defendant transferred his matrimonial home to his wife and claimed that she had already held an equitable interest in the property under constructive trust, it was held that he nevertheless had an intention to put property beyond the reach of his creditors and therefore the transfer was capable of being set aside under s 423 of the 1986 Act.²⁰² The court nevertheless recognised that the wife had a 50% share in the home as a result of her substantial financial contributions on repairs and improvements to the property.

The court's powers are then to make 'such order as the court sees fit'²⁰³ for the purpose of:

- (2) (a) restoring the position to what it would have been if the transaction had not been entered into, and
 - (b) protecting the interests of the persons who are the victims of the transaction.

198 Midland Bank v Wyatt [1997] 1 BCLC 242.

199 Moon v Franklin [1996] BPIR 196, 205; Trowbridge v Trowbridge [2003] 2 FLR 231; Re Yates [2004] All ER (D) 373.

200 Insolvency Act 1986, s 423(1).

201 Kubiangha v Ekpenyoung [2002] EWHC 1567 (Ch), [2002] 2 BCLC 597, [2003] BPIR 623. See also Re Schuppan (No 2) [1997] 1 BCLC 256; IRC v Hashmi [2002] EWCA Civ 981, [2002] 2 BCLC 489.

202 Ibid.

203 Insolvency Act 1986, s 423(2).

The court's power to make these orders are limited to the following circumstances where the transaction 'was entered into for the purpose':²⁰⁴

- (3) (a) of putting assets beyond the reach of a person who is making, or may at some time make, a claim against him.

Thus, the court may make an order to set aside the transaction if, for example, the defendant's creditors are in the process of making a claim against the defendant or even if in general terms they may at some point make such a claim. It was held by the Court of Appeal in *IRC v Hashmi*²⁰⁵ that for a purpose to fall within s 423(3) it does not have to be the sole nor the predominant purpose of the transaction, but rather it is sufficient if it is one of the purposes of the transaction. A purpose in this sense was taken to be an objective of the transaction rather than a collateral outcome of the transaction: put another way, it must be a 'real substantial purpose and not merely a consequence of the transaction'.²⁰⁶ It is the reason for entering into the transaction, rather than the transaction itself, which constitutes the purpose.²⁰⁷

This provision is very broadly drafted indeed and gives the court a seemingly open-ended power to reverse such transactions. So, in Trowbridge v Trowbridge,²⁰⁸ where a husband made regular payments of money to his wife, purportedly in recognition of the money which she had spent in supporting him, it was held that the payments had in fact been made with the intention of putting large amounts of money beyond the reach of his creditors and further that they were payments made for no consideration under s 423(1).²⁰⁹ Equally, even though his wife had contributed to the purchase price of the property, it was held that his purpose in allowing the house to be put into his wife's sole name was an attempt to put the house beyond the reach of creditors.²¹⁰ Beneficial ownership of the home would be apportioned according to the parties' respective cash contributions to it.²¹¹

The difficulty of organising one's affairs so as to minimise the risk of insolvency

One ramification of the Midland Bank v Wyatt decision is the difficulty of arranging one's affairs before starting a business by having that property held on trust without subsequently having that trust declared to be a sham and thus avoided. What is particular to the Wyatt case, of course, is the clear evidence that Mr Wyatt had no real intention to settle his interest in the family home on trust for his wife and daughters, whereas a genuine intention to settle property on trust for third parties would not be so treated. However, if the third parties who are benefited are related to or connected with the settlor then there will remain the possibility

204 Ibid, s 423(3).

205 [2002] BCC 943, [2002] 2 BCLC 489. See also Beckenham MC Ltd v Centralex Ltd [2004] 2 BCLC 764, [2004] BPIR 1112; Barnett v Semenyuk [2008] 2 P&CR DG 18; Hill v Spread Trustee [2005] EWHC 336, [2006] WTLR 1009; Papanicola v Fagan [2008] EWHC 3348 (Ch), [2008] BPIR 320; 4 Eng Ltd v Harper [2009] EWHC 2633 (Ch).

206 Papanicola v Fagan [2008] EWHC 3348 (Ch), [31].

207 Hill v Spread Trustee [2005] EWHC 336, [2006] WTLR 1009.

208 [2003] 2 FLR 231, [2004] FCR 79, [2003] BPIR 258.

209 Trowbridge v Trowbridge [2003] 2 FLR 231, [2004] FCR 79, [2003] BPIR 258.

210 Ibid.

211 Ibid.

that the court will interpret the trust as being a sham and so ineffective. Interestingly, then, this area of the law sees through the technical formalism which is accepted in the Tinsley decision: insolvency, as ever, prompts the law of property to develop more stringent rules.

11.4.8 A summary of these principles

This section aims to set out a summary of the principles which have been discussed in this section. If a transfer of property is made by Father to his daughter Susan or to his wife Honoria, then the presumption is that Father intended to make a gift to Susan or to Honoria. (He is called ‘Father’ in this example to underline the fact that only transfers by men on the old authorities attract this presumption in English law.) So, if there is a dispute subsequently as to the ownership of that property, then the court will presume that the property was to be advanced by Father to Susan or Honoria: that is, the court presumes he intended to make a gift of the property to them. However, it is open to Father to seek to rebut that presumption of advancement by arguing that he was only passing the property to Susan or to Honoria, for example, for safekeeping. The effect of this rebuttal, if successful, would be that Susan and Honoria would hold that property on resulting trust for Father.

The one problem which Father could face, however, would be if his rebuttal depended on adducing evidence of some illegality which he had committed, or which he intended to commit. So, like Tinsley v Milligan and Tribe v Tribe, the resulting trust would not be available to Father if he was committing an illegal act because he would be coming to equity with unclean hands. The illegality would not matter if Father acquired the property otherwise than through the illegal act – for example, if he had bought it legitimately, but not if he had stolen it – or if Father did not actually carry his illegal intention into effect, for example by avoiding going into insolvency. So, if Father transferred property to Susan which he had just stolen so as to avoid the police, then this would be an illegal act and he could not recover the property from Susan by means of a resulting trust. However, if Father did not commit an illegal act in acquiring the property – for example, if it had been given to him – then he could rely on the resulting trust.

Matters are different, however, if Father went into insolvency. It would be an illegal act to seek to put property beyond the reach of one’s creditors. Therefore, ordinarily Father could not rely on a resulting trust because Father would have committed an illegal act by avoiding his creditors. However, the law on insolvency would want Father to recover the property so that it could be distributed among his creditors. Consequently, it would be held that under s 423 of the Insolvency Act 1986 that the transfer could be undone and the property recovered by Father, or it could be held that the transfer was a sham so that the property would be recovered by Father: in either of these alternatives the property would be returned to Father so that it could be distributed among his insolvency creditors.

11.5 MISTAKE AND RESULTING TRUST

11.5.1 Recovery of property on grounds of mistake

Where property is transferred under a mistake, the transferor will wish to argue that that property should be held on trust by the transferee for the benefit of the transferor. In such a circumstance the transferor would seek to establish a resulting trust in her favour. Suppose the following situation: W makes an outright transfer of money to I under a contract which is subsequently found to be void because it was beyond I's powers. W and I were operating under a mistake as to the validity of the contract. (Essentially, those were the facts in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC.)²¹² W will seek to recover that payment. The House of Lords has held, unanimously on this point, that the payment is not held on resulting trust for W because W had intended to make an outright transfer to I. The question therefore arises in what circumstances a mistake will found a claim for resulting trust.²¹³

There are instances in which property has been transferred by mistake and the court has declared the recipient to be a trustee for the transferor.²¹⁴ Those cases have tended not to be explicit about the nature of the trust in this situation.²¹⁵ In many such cases it has been held that when the transferee has knowledge of the mistake, that transferee holds the property on constructive trust for the transferor rather than on resulting trust.²¹⁶ In two cases, though, the trust was expressly identified as a resulting trust.²¹⁷

The question therefore is: on what basis does someone recover property which originally belonged to her beneficially? As Millett J held in El Ajou:

It would, of course, be an intolerable reproach to our system of jurisprudence if the plaintiff were the only victim who could trace and recover his money. Neither party before suggested that this is the case; and I agree with them. But if the other victims of the fraud can trace their money in equity it must be because, having been induced to purchase the shares by false and fraudulent misrepresentations, they are entitled to rescind the transaction and reconstitute the equitable title to the purchase money in themselves, at least to the extent necessary to support an equitable tracing claim . . .

*But, if this is correct, as I think it is, then the trust which is operating in these cases is not some new model remedial constructive trust, but an old-fashioned institutional resulting trust.*²¹⁸

The point being made is that, in contradistinction to the issues of tracing title in property (considered in Chapter 19), perhaps the manner in which property ought to be considered as being returned to its original (or its traceable) owner is by means of a resulting trust. Millett J's opinion supports Birks's view that the resulting trust operates in a restitutionary way and that a situation such as the return of money to a person defrauded of that money is essentially a restitutionary response: a view rebutted in the Westdeutsche case.

212 [1996] AC 669.

213 Ibid.

214 Chase Manhattan Bank NA v Israel-British Bank (London) Ltd [1981] Ch 105; Leuty v Hillas (1858) 2 De GF & J 110; Craddock Brothers v Hunt [1923] 2 Ch 136, CA; Blacklocks v JB Developments (Godalming) Ltd [1982] Ch 183.

215 On this see Chambers, 1997, 23, where the argument is made that the trusts ought to be considered to have been resulting trusts because the equitable interest in property is being returned to its original equitable owner.

216 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669 in considering Chase Manhattan Bank NA v Israel-British Bank (London) Ltd [1981] Ch 105.

217 El Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings [1993] 3 All ER 717; Clelland v Clelland (1945) 3 DLR 664, BCCA.

218 [1993] 3 All ER 717, 734, emphasis added.

11.5.2 Common intention and resulting trust in cases of mistake

The difficulty with the view that the resulting trust is essentially restitutionary is the decision of the House of Lords in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC. Lord Browne-Wilkinson, speaking extra-judicially, has expressed his conception of the resulting trust as operating in the following way:

A resulting trust arises in order to give effect to the intention of the parties. Where there is an express declaration of trust which does not exhaust the whole beneficial interest in the property Equity presumes an intention that the trust property is to revert to the original settlor, ie is held on a resulting trust . . . A resulting trust then depends on presumed intention . . . Under a resulting trust, the existence of the trust is established once and for all at the date on which the property is acquired [by the resulting trustee].²¹⁹

The difficulty with Lord Browne-Wilkinson's model of the resulting trust is that he sees it as arising on the basis of the common intentions of the parties, rather than applying the intentions solely of the original owner of the property rights. Chambers confronts this problem in the following way:²²⁰

It is clear that a common intention is not a requirement for a resulting trust, which can arise even though one of the parties is unaware of the transfer.²²¹ Lord Browne-Wilkinson's speech in *Tinsley v Milligan*²²² indicates that he is mixing the requirements for resulting trusts with those for constructive trusts in the context of family home ownership. That case involved a resulting trust based on the common intention of the parties. Both parties had contributed to the purchase of a house and their intentions were relevant as providers. However, his Lordship did not distinguish between the resulting trust based on their contributions and the constructive trust based on a 'common intention acted upon by the parties to their detriment'.²²³

As considered in Chapter 15, in relation to the *Lloyds Bank v Rosset*²²⁴ form of common intention constructive trust, what is not clear is the extent to which the courts will seek to give effect to the common intention of the parties. As Chambers points out, it is similarly uncertain whether such common intention can be said to fall properly within a resulting trust arising from the contribution to the acquisition of an asset or from a constructive trust imposed by reference to the knowledge of the defendant of some factor which is said to affect his conscience. The remodelling of the resulting trust by Lord Browne-Wilkinson does appear to capture the common intention trust by encompassing situations in which the 219 1995 Holdsworth Lecture.

220 Chambers, 1997, 37.

221 Ryall v Ryall (1739) 1 Atk 59; Birch v Blagrave (1755) Amb 264; Lane v Dighton (1762) Amb 409; Childers v Childers (1857) 1 De G & J 482; Williams v Williams (1863) 32 Beav 370; Re Vinogradoff [1935] WN 68; In Re Muller [1953] NZLR 879.

222 [1994] 1 AC 340.

223 Ibid., 371.

224 [1991] 1 AC 107.

parties must be presumed to have intended that the claimant would acquire an interest in the applicable property.

The position in English law relating to recovery on grounds of mistake has been greatly expanded by the decision of the House of Lords in Kleinwort Benson v Lincoln CC,²²⁵ which reversed the old rule that there could be no recovery on grounds of mistake of law. It is now clear that recovery can take place as a result of a mistake of law as well as a mistake of fact. The question remains whether that recovery will take place on the facts of the particular case on grounds of resulting trust, constructive trust, or simply under a common law claim for money had and received.

225 [1998] 4 All ER 513.

Constructive trusts

12.1	INTRODUCTION	549
12.1.1	Fundamentals of constructive trusts	549
12.1.2	The distinction between proprietary and personal claims	551
12.1.3	Constructive trust – institutional in nature	552
12.1.4	Fiduciary obligations under constructive trust	552
12.2	CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS AT LARGE	553
12.2.1	The general potential application of the constructive trust	553
12.2.2	Constructive trusts are based on the knowledge and the conscience of the trustee	553
12.2.3	Rights in property and merely personal claims	555
12.2.4	The significant case of Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington	556
12.3	UNCONSCIONABLE DEALINGS WITH PROPERTY	558
12.3.1	Knowledge and unconscionability in general	558
12.3.2	Constructive trusts in relation to land	558
12.3.3	Constructive trusts to ‘keep out of the market’	564
12.3.4	Statute cannot be used as an engine of fraud: Rochefoucauld v Boustead	565
12.3.5	‘Doing everything necessary’: Re Rose	566
12.3.6	A constructive trust over a separate fund created to protect pre-payments for goods or services against a company’s insolvency	567
12.4	PROFITS FROM UNLAWFUL ACTS	569
12.4.1	Profits from bribery	569
12.4.2	The academic commentary after Sinclair v Versailles	584
12.4.3	Profits from killing	587
12.4.4	Profits from theft	589
12.4.5	Profits from fraud	592
12.5	FIDUCIARY MAKING UNAUTHORISED PROFITS	598
12.5.1	The development of the principle that a fiduciary may not make unauthorised profits	598
12.5.2	The application of this principle	600
12.5.3	Equitable accounting	627

12.5.4	The self-dealing principle	628
12.5.5	The fair dealing principle	629
12.6	CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS AND AGREEMENTS RELATING TO PROPERTY	629
12.6.1	Common intention constructive trusts and the home	630
12.6.2	On conveyance of property	631
12.7	VOLUNTARY ASSUMPTION OF LIABILITY	637
12.7.1	Secret trusts	637
12.7.2	Mutual wills	638
12.8	TRUSTEES DE SON TORT AND INTERMEDDLERS AS CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTEES	642
12.9	PERSONAL LIABILITY TO ACCOUNT AS A CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTEE	644
12.9.1	Introduction and scope of this discussion	644
12.9.2	Unconscionable receipt	644
12.9.3	Dishonest assistance	645
12.9.4	Interaction of these remedies with the doctrine of trustee de son tort	646
12.10	ISSUES WITH CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS	646
12.10.1	Is the doctrine of constructive trust a coherent one?	646
12.10.2	Sympathy is not conscience	648
12.10.3	The possibility of a remedial constructive trust	649
12.10.4	Constructive trusts are like the English language	650

OVERVIEW

Constructive trusts arise by operation of law. In general terms, a proprietary constructive trust will be imposed on a person who has knowledge of some unconscionable factor in relation to her dealing with property.¹ All constructive trusts can be understood as arising on the basis of this central principle, even though there are many different sub-species of constructive trust. It is important that the trustee has knowledge of the unconscionability of her actions or omissions in relation to that property before a constructive trust will be imposed. For the imposition of a proprietary constructive trust, the legal owner of property will be liable if she has knowledge of some factor which affects the conscionability of asserting beneficial title to that property.² Constructive trusts will also arise in a number of contexts in which equitable doctrines such as ‘equity shall not be used as an engine of fraud’³ or ‘equity looks upon as done that which ought to have been done’⁴ operate so as to prevent rights in property being acquired on the basis of

1 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

2 Ibid.

3 Rochefoucauld v Boustead [1897] 1 Ch 196; Paragon Finance v Thakerar [1999] 1 All ER 400.

4 Lysaght v Edwards (1876) 2 Ch D 499; Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324; Jerome v Kelly [2004] 2 All ER 835.

unconscionable conduct. Among the various types of constructive trust, the following categories are the most significant.

A trustee or fiduciary will be constructive trustee of any unauthorised profits made from her fiduciary office, even where she has otherwise acted in good faith.⁵ The purpose of this principle is to prevent a fiduciary from taking any profit from a conflict between her personal interests and her fiduciary duties. The rule is a strict rule that no profit can be made by a trustee or fiduciary which is not authorised by the terms of the trust.⁶ A fiduciary who profits from that office will be required to account for those profits.⁷ There is no defence of good faith in favour of the trustee.

*There is a hotly contested issue between different lines of authority as to whether or not a bribe should be held on constructive trust. On the one hand, it has been held by the Privy Council in Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid and subsequent cases that a person acting in a fiduciary position who receives a bribe to breach her duty will be required to hold the bribe and any property derived from that bribe on constructive trust for the beneficiary of that fiduciary duty. On the other hand, it was held in the Court of Appeal in Sinclair v Versailles that the recipient of a bribe has only to account for an amount equal to the amount of the bribe, but does not have to hold any property on constructive trust.*

Where a person receives trust property in the knowledge that that property has been passed in breach of trust, the recipient will be personally liable to account to the trust for the value of the property passed away.⁸ The requirement of knowledge in this context has been expressed in different cases as a test of actual or constructive knowledge;⁹ as a test of failing to act as an honest person would have acted;¹⁰ or as acting unconscionably.¹¹ It is a defence to demonstrate the receipt was authorised under the terms of the trust, or that the recipient has lawfully changed his position in reliance on the receipt of the property.

Where a person dishonestly assists another in a breach of trust, that dishonest assistant will be personally liable to account to the trust for the value lost to the trust.¹² 'Dishonesty' in this context requires that the defendant has acted otherwise than as an honest person in her situation would have acted in the circumstances, a test which includes fraud, lack of probity or reckless risk-taking.¹³ It also requires that the defendant understands that her conduct would have been considered to be dishonest by

5 Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46. See section 12.5 below.

6 Ward v Brunt [2000] WTLR 731.

7 Ibid.

8 Re Montagu [1987] Ch 264; Polly Peck International v Nadir (No 2) [1992] 4 All ER 769; Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley [1999] Lloyd's Rep Bank 438.

9 Re Montagu [1987] Ch 264; Baden v Société Générale pour Favoriser le Développement du Commerce et de l'Industrie en France SA [1992] 4 All ER 161; [1993] 1 WLR 509.

10 Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley [1999] Lloyd's Rep Bank 438, CA.

11 Houghton v Fayers [2000] 1 BCLC 571.

12 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378; Smith New Court v Scrimgeour Vickers [1997] AC 254; Corporacion Nacional Del Cobre De Chile v Sogemin Metals [1997] 1 WLR 1396; Fortex Group Ltd v MacIntosh [1998] 3 NZLR 171; Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep 415; Wolfgang Herbert Heintl v Jyske Bank [1999] Lloyd's Rep Bank 511.

13 Ibid.

*other reasonable people.*¹⁴ *It is not necessary that any trustee of the trust is dishonest, simply that the dishonest assistant is dishonest.*¹⁵

12.1 INTRODUCTION

12.1.1 Fundamentals of constructive trusts

In English law, a constructive trust arises by operation of law. It is imposed whenever the defendant knows that she has dealt with property in an unconscionable manner. Thus, a person who steals property will have dealt unconscionably with it;¹⁶ a person who receives a bribe in the conduct of a fiduciary office will have dealt unconscionably with the property representing that bribe;¹⁷ a person who takes property by means of fraud will have dealt unconscionably with it;¹⁸ and so on: in each of these situations, and many others considered in this chapter, the defendant is held to be a constructive trustee of that property because she has knowingly dealt with that property in an unconscionable manner. The statement in the opening sentence indicates two things. First, that the constructive trust is imposed by a court in accordance with established principle and not purely at the court's own general discretion. This English constructive trust is dubbed an 'institutional' constructive trust, which means that a constructive trust comes into existence automatically from the date of the defendant's knowledge of her unconscionable act, and that the court is merely recognising its existence as opposed to creating it out of some general discretion.¹⁹ Secondly, a constructive trust is imposed regardless of the intentions of the parties involved. While there are circumstances in which constructive trusts are enforced in accordance with the intentions of one or other of the parties, but without the necessary intention or formality to create an express trust, in many circumstances the constructive trust is imposed on a defendant without the need for her consent so as to prevent the defendant from acting unconscionably. In that sense, the constructive trust may be imposed contrary to the parties' intentions. The term 'constructive trust' itself arises from the fact that the court construes that the defendant is to be treated as a trustee of property. It is in this sense that we can say that a constructive trust does not accord with the intentions of the parties because it may be imposed by the court contrary to what the parties may otherwise have wished if the court considers that to be an appropriate response to the defendant's unconscionable behaviour.²⁰

There are a great many examples of the constructive trust. This chapter isolates the most important forms of constructive trust, attempts to allocate them to general categories for ease

14 Twinsectra v Yardley [2002] 2 All ER 377, HL.

15 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378; Smith New Court v Scrimgeour Vickers [1997] AC 254; Corporacion Nacional Del Cobre De Chile v Sogemin Metals [1997] 1 WLR 1396; Fortex Group Ltd v MacIntosh [1998] 3 NZLR 171; Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley [2002] 2 All ER 377 [1999] Lloyd's Rep Bank 438; Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep 415; Wolfgang Herbert Heintl v Jyske Bank [1999] Lloyd's Rep Bank 511; Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [2003] 1 All ER 97.

16 Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington [1996] AC 669.

17 Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324; although this decision has been doubted.

18 Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington [1996] AC 669.

19 The institutional constructive trust arises by comparison with the discretionary (or 'remedial') constructive trust used in the USA. This nomenclature arises from Maudsley, 1959, 237, drawing on Pound, 1920, 421.

20 Soar v Ashwell [1893] 2 QB 390.

of comprehension, and seeks to identify the themes that are common to each category.²¹ It is suggested that the best method for analysing constructive trust problems is to allocate the factual situation to one of these categories and then to follow the applicable principles set down for cases falling within that category.

The general approach of this book to the trust is that it is a creature of equity which has developed specific principles of its own beyond the general principles of equity. The core purpose of equity was established by Lord Ellesmere in the *Earl of Oxford's Case*²² to be to correct men's consciences.²³ In this sense, the constructive trust operates so as to prevent a benefit being taken from unconscionable conduct and to protect the rights of other people in property. The constructive trust is a form of trust most akin to those general principles of equity which prevent a person benefiting from fraud or some other unconscionable action.²⁴ In what will follow, there is a tension between those constructive trusts which are concerned to protect rights in property,²⁵ those constructive trusts which are imposed to prevent a benefit being taken from a conflict of interest,²⁶ those so-called constructive trusts which provide the claimant with only a right in money in the form of compensation for a loss caused by a breach of trust,²⁷ and those constructive trusts which appear to be penalties for wrongs which the defendant has committed which have proprietary consequences.²⁸ These subtly different approaches between categories make the area of constructive trusts both interesting and complex. Careful distinction between the categories is, it is suggested, the key.

It is worth beginning with the words of Edmund-Davies LJ in Carl Zeiss Stiftung v Herbert Smith & Co that 'English law provides no clear and all-embracing definition of a constructive trust. Its boundaries have been left perhaps deliberately vague so as not to restrict the court by technicalities in deciding what the justice of a particular case might demand'.²⁹ This statement indicates the essential truth that the constructive trust is not a certain or rigid doctrine. Rather, its edges are blurred and the full scope of its core principles is difficult to define. As considered below, the constructive trust grew rapidly in the latter part of the 20th century and is likely to continue to generate new forms of itself in the future. Some commentators have become so bewildered by it that they have recommended that the constructive trust in its current form should simply be abandoned.³⁰

In Paragon Finance plc v DB Thakerar & Co,³¹ Millett LJ did attempt a general definition of the doctrine of constructive trust:

21 See Martin v Myers [2004] EWHC 1947 (Ch) in relation to the application of the Limitation Act 1980 to the various forms of constructive trust, considering the various approaches in Paragon Finance v Thakerar [1999] 1 All ER 400 and in James v Williams [1999] 3 All ER 309.

22 (1615) 1 Ch Rep 1.

23 As discussed in section 1.1 of this book.

24 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

25 Eg, Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669; Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46.

26 Eg, Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46; Bolkiah v KPMG [1999] 1 All ER 517.

27 Eg, Polly Peck International v Nadir (No 2) [1992] 4 All ER 769; Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378.

28 Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324.

29 [1969] 2 Ch 276, 300.

30 See, eg, Millett, 1995.

31 [1999] 1 All ER 400.

A constructive trust arises by operation of law whenever the circumstances are such that it would be unconscionable for the owner of property (usually but not necessarily the legal estate) to assert his own beneficial interest in the property and deny the beneficial interest of another.³²

This breadth of principle explains why the constructive trust is likely to continue to grow because, as is considered below in relation to the decision of the House of Lords in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC,³³ the constructive trust will arise in any situation in which the titleholder of property unconscionably denies or interferes with the rights of another. As such, it is clearly a principle of potentially very broad application. However, it is suggested that even this definition will not capture the depth or variety of constructive trusts recognised in equity.

12.1.2 The distinction between proprietary and personal claims

It is vital to distinguish between personal and proprietary rights. That distinction is one which will be familiar to all students of property law and has been explored in this book already.³⁴ A proprietary constructive trust will give a right to the beneficiary in specifically identifiable property: that is, a right in the property held by the constructive trustee which is enforceable against any other person. The alternative is merely an in personam right against a constructive trustee to make that trustee personally liable for any loss suffered by the beneficiary: that is, a right to recover an amount of money from the constructive trustee equivalent to the value of the property at the time when the constructive trust came into existence, but not any right in any identified property. The forms of trust considered in sections 12.2 to 12.8 will be concerned with proprietary claims, although some in section 12.9 may have features which we will associate with personal claims.

In this context it is best to think of the office of trustee under a constructive trust being imposed on a person who has acted unconscionably. The way in which equity may deal with that constructive trustee may differ in different circumstances. Equity may require that the defendant hold specific property on the terms of a proprietary constructive trust or alternatively it may require that the defendant is simply made personally liable to account for some loss suffered by the beneficiaries, depending on the type of constructive trust at issue. The constructive trusts considered in section 12.9 and in Chapter 18 – known as the doctrines of dishonest assistance and of knowing receipt – are referred to by the courts as ‘constructive trusts’ but are in truth claims giving only a personal liability to account. The obligation imposed on the defendant in this context will be to make payment of money to the trust for the benefit of the beneficiaries. Professor Hayton has dubbed this form of claim the imposition of ‘constructive trusteeship’: that is, an obligation to compensate the beneficiaries’ loss as though an express trustee liable to account for a breach of trust. Usually there will be no specific property capable of being held on trust, only a requirement to make a payment of money. This 32 Similarly in James v Williams [1999] 3 WLR 451, 458 [1999] 3 All ER 309, per Aldous LJ: ‘As a general rule a constructive trust attaches by law to property which is held by a person in circumstances where it would be inequitable to allow him to assert full beneficial ownership of the property.’

33 [1996] AC 669.

34 Particularly in section 2.5 above. Ord v Upton [2000] Ch 352.

form of personal liability to account is the subject of Chapter 20. Otherwise, the constructive trusts on which we shall focus in this chapter are mainly proprietary constructive trusts.

12.1.3 Constructive trust – institutional in nature

It was said in the opening paragraph of this chapter that a constructive trust is ‘institutional’ in nature. That means both that the constructive trust arises by operation of law without the discretion of the court and also that a constructive trust has retrospective effect. In consequence, when a court finds that a constructive trust exists, it is in truth recognising that that trust has existed ever since the unconscionable action of the trustee which brought it into effect: the constructive trust does not come into existence from the date of the court order onwards.

The importance of the date of creation of the constructive trust is especially pronounced in the case of insolvency. For example, if it is found that a constructive trust ought to have arisen in January, but the constructive trustee goes into insolvency in March and a court makes an order recognising that proprietary constructive trust only in May, the order recognising the constructive trust will declare that the constructive trust came into existence automatically in January, and therefore that the proprietary rights of the beneficiaries pre-date the insolvency in March. If the constructive trust operated in the same manner as proprietary estoppel, that is prospectively from the date of the court order, granting whatever remedy the court considered appropriate in its discretion (as considered in Chapter 15), then it could not protect the beneficiaries against the constructive trustee’s insolvency because such a right would come into existence only in May.³⁵ The form of remedial constructive trust deployed in the USA operates on a broadly similar basis to proprietary estoppel in this sense.

12.1.4 Fiduciary obligations under constructive trust

In general terms, the office of trustee under a constructive trust is necessarily different from that under an express trust. The parties will not necessarily know with certainty whether or not a constructive trust exists until a court declares that such a trust does in fact exist. What is suggested here is that in the real world the very existence of a constructive trust will often be contested until the court makes an order declaring that it does exist. What is therefore at issue is the liability which ought to attach to the constructive trustee for the period between the time when the constructive trust came into existence and the time at which the court made the order confirming its existence.³⁶ We do know that in theory the office of trustee will arise as soon as the trustee has knowledge of some factor affecting her conscience because constructive trusts are institutional trusts.³⁷ What remains unclear is the extent to which a constructive trustee would be liable, for example, for a failure to make the best possible return on a trust investment and so forth, as would be required of a trustee under an express trust. As Millett J put the matter in Lonrho v Fayed (No 2):³⁸ ‘... it is a mistake to suppose that in every situation in which a constructive trust arises the legal owner is necessarily subject to all the fiduciary obligations and disabilities of an express trustee.’

35 The precise answer to this question will be addressed in para 12.2.2 below.

36 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1994] 4 All ER 890, per Hobhouse J, CA; and reversed on appeal [1996] AC 669, HL.

37 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

38 [1992] 1 WLR 1, [1991] 4 All ER 961.

The obligations to be imposed on a constructive trustee will depend on the context of the case. They will generally extend to stewardship and maintenance of the property to the beneficiary's account, but will probably not extend to impose positive obligations as to investment of the fund in all circumstances – particularly given that there will not be any detailed, written provisions of such a trust.

12.2 CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS AT LARGE

In broad terms a proprietary constructive trust will be imposed on a person who knows that her actions in respect of specific property are unconscionable.³⁹ It is important that the trustee has knowledge of the unconscionability of the treatment of that property. For the imposition of a proprietary constructive trust, the legal owner of property will be liable if she has knowledge of some factor which affects the conscionability of asserting an equitable interest in that property.

12.2.1 The general potential application of the constructive trust

This section considers the manner in which constructive trusts may be said to come into existence in general terms, and not necessarily only the limited categories considered in the remainder of this chapter. That is to say, the constructive trust will arise in general terms to enforce the conscience of a defendant in relation to either that defendant's treatment of the claimant's property, or the abuse of some fiduciary duty owed to the claimant.

Section 53(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925 provides that 'implied resulting or constructive trusts' do not require formalities in their creation. Rather, the constructive trust is recognised as coming into existence by operation of law. It is therefore important to recognise the principles upon which such constructive trusts may come into existence in general terms.

12.2.2 Constructive trusts are based on the knowledge and the conscience of the trustee

The most important recent statement of the core principles in the area of trusts implied by law was made by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC,⁴⁰ where his Lordship went back to basics, identifying the root of any form of trust as being in policing the good conscience of the defendant. The first of his Lordship's 'Relevant Principles of Trust Law' was identified as being that:

39 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1994] 4 All ER 890, per Hobhouse J, CA; and reversed on appeal [1996] AC 669, HL.

40 [1996] AC 669, [1996] 2 All ER 961, 988; see also Allied Carpets Group plc v Nethercott [2001] BCC 81. In Martin v Myers [2004] EWHC 1947 (Ch), para [37], Strauss QC (sitting as a Deputy Judge of the High Court), it is suggested, however, that simply knowing or suspecting that the property is held on trust for someone else is not sufficient because there must also be some relationship between the parties to make retention of that property unconscionable: it is suggested that this assertion is wrong because it is enough on the authorities that one knows of another's rights to render one liable as a constructive trustee and it is not a further requirement that one must necessarily be in a pre-existing fiduciary relationship to the claimant (although that would certainly found a constructive trust). So, for example, in Ashburn Anstalt v Arnold [1989] 1 Ch 1, a contractual licence to occupy property will not constitute a constructive trust unless the conscience of the defendant has been affected: applied in Baybut v Eccle Riggs Country Park Ltd [2006] All ER (D) 161, para [60], Pelling QC.

- (i) Equity operates on the conscience of the owner of the legal interest. In the case of a trust, the conscience of the legal owner requires him to carry out the purposes for which the property was vested in him (express or implied trust) or which the law imposes on him by reason of his unconscionable conduct (constructive trust).

As considered in Chapter 2, this notion of the conscience of the legal owner is said to underpin all trusts. In relation to the constructive trust it arises as a result of the unconscionable conduct of the legal owner. His Lordship continued with his second principle:

- (ii) Since the equitable jurisdiction to enforce trusts depends upon the conscience of the holder of the legal interest being affected, he cannot be a trustee of the property if and so long as he is ignorant of the facts alleged to affect his conscience, ie until he is aware that he is intended to hold the property for the benefit of others in the case of an express or implied trust, or, in the case of a constructive trust, of the factors which are alleged to affect his conscience.

As a result of the requirement that the conscience of the holder of the legal interest is affected, 'he cannot be a trustee of the property if and so long as he is ignorant of the facts alleged to affect his conscience'. Therefore, the defendant must have knowledge of the factors which are suggested to give rise to the constructive trust.⁴¹ Let us suppose a simple, everyday example. Nicholas is queuing at the till in his local supermarket. He has not bought very many goods and therefore his bill comes to a little less than £10. He pays with a £10 note. Mistakenly, the person working on the till thinks that Nicholas has proffered her a £20 note and so gives him change as though from a £20 note: that is, she hands him a £10 note and coins. The question would be as to Nicholas's obligations in relation to the £10 note which he has mistakenly received from the till operative. There can be little doubt that in good conscience Nicholas ought to inform the till operative of her mistake and return the £10 note to her.⁴²

The important question for the law relating to constructive trusts is the time at which Nicholas realises that he has been given £10 more than he is entitled to receive. If he realises at the moment when the till operative hands him the £10 note that she has made a mistake, and he runs from the shop laughing at his good fortune, he would be a constructive trustee of that £10 for the supermarket as beneficiary from the moment of its receipt. If he absent-mindedly received and pocketed the note (thus taking it into his possession) without realising the error, and did not ever subsequently realise that he had £10 more than he should have had, then he would never be a constructive trustee of that banknote. If he absent-mindedly pocketed the £10 note without realising the mistake but was accosted by an employee of the supermarket who informed him for the first time of the mistake, then from 41 Unless, that is, you are an anti-capitalism protester who considers retention of that £10 to be striking a blow for redistributing the wealth of corporate supermarkets, in which case your views of good conscience may be different. The question in relation to 'conscience' is then whether we ought to permit such moral relativism, or simply apply objective standards of good conscience. This so-called 'Robin Hood' defence was rejected, however, in Walker v Stones [2000] 4 All ER 412, 414; considered at para 18.4.5 below.

42 What is more complex is the following: suppose the clerk mistakenly charged Nicholas £10 too little and Nicholas then paid by credit card in full knowledge of the mistake – there would not be any money to hold on trust because Nicholas paid by credit card, and therefore the supermarket's claim would be purely a personal claim against him for money had and received, unless some portion of the goods acquired could be held on constructive trust.

the moment he was informed by that employee he would be a constructive trustee – but not before. That is the importance of the statement in Westdeutsche Landesbank that there cannot be liability as a constructive trustee until the defendant has knowledge of the facts said to affect his conscience.⁴³

12.2.3 Rights in property and merely personal claims

One further issue arises: does the constructive trust take effect by granting proprietary rights over specific property, or (given that equity acts in personam) does it simply impose a personal obligation on a person who has dealt with the property? While we may come to doubt the proposition later in this chapter, the case law is clear that the beneficiary acquires proprietary rights in the property held on constructive trust – except in relation to cases where the defendant is made personally liable to account for dishonest assistance and so forth.⁴⁴ In this respect, the third fundamental principle identified by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC operated as follows:

- (iii) In order to establish a trust there must be identifiable trust property. The only apparent exception to this rule is a constructive trust imposed on a person who dishonestly assists in a breach of trust who may come under fiduciary duties even if he does not receive identifiable trust property.

It is trite law that the identity of the property to be held on an express trust must be certain or else the trust will be void.⁴⁵ There had been a question whether the property which is the subject of the constructive trust must be certain in the same way. Older authorities consider that the property must be certain under a constructive trust.⁴⁶ This older view is upheld by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank, although his Lordship still accepts one exception to this principle in relation to ‘personal liability to account’, considered below at section 12.9.

The fourth fundamental principle sets out the manner in which the proprietary rights of the beneficiaries operate under a proprietary constructive trust:

- (iv) Once a trust is established, as from the date of its establishment the beneficiary has, in equity, a proprietary interest in the trust property, which proprietary interest will be enforceable in equity against any subsequent holder of the property (whether the original property or substituted property into which it can be traced) other than a purchaser for value of the legal interest without notice.

The constructive trust comes into effect at the date this knowledge is acquired and ‘as from the date of its establishment the beneficiary has, in equity, a proprietary interest in the trust property’. So the proprietary interest is ‘enforceable in equity against any subsequent holder of the property’. This is a concept which will be explored in Chapter 19 to the effect that the beneficiary can literally ‘trace’ those property rights through into any property which can be 43 See section 12.9 below. The claimant must be able to prove that the defendant had knowledge of the mistake alleged to give rise to a constructive trust at the material time or else the court would not even hear the claim for a constructive trust: Deutsche Bank AG v Vik [2010] EWHC 551 (Comm).

44 Re Goldcorp [1994] 3 WLR 199.

45 Re Barney [1892] 2 Ch 265, 273.

46 Chase Manhattan v Israel-British Bank [1980] 2 WLR 202.

demonstrated to derive from the trust property. That is so in relation to ‘the original property or substituted property into which it can be traced’. The only category of defendant who will not be liable in this way is equity’s darling (or the ‘purchaser for value of the legal interest without notice’). The role of equity’s darling is considered below.

The Westdeutsche Landesbank case itself concerned a number of interest rate swaps which required the plaintiff to pay a lump sum to the defendant local authority. The bank sought to prove the existence, inter alia, of a constructive trust so that it would be entitled to receive compound interest on the money paid to the authority under the void contract. The House of Lords was unanimous (on this point) in holding that none of the amounts paid to the authority by the bank was to be treated as having been held on constructive trust because, at the time when the authority had dissipated the money, the authority had no knowledge that the contract had been void. In consequence, the authority had no knowledge of any factor which required it to hold the property as constructive trustee for the bank before that money was spent. And once the money had been spent, there was no property left which could have been held on constructive trust.

A further example cited by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in the Westdeutsche appeal was that of Chase Manhattan v Israel-British Bank,⁴⁷ in which a decision of Goulding J to impose a constructive trust was re-interpreted by his Lordship. In the Chase Manhattan v Israel-British Bank case, a payment was made by Chase Manhattan to Israel-British Bank, and then that same payment was mistakenly made a second time. After receiving the second, mistaken payment, Israel-British Bank went into insolvency. The question arose whether it was entitled to have that second payment held on constructive trust for it (thus making Chase Manhattan a secured creditor), or whether Chase Manhattan was merely an unsecured creditor owed a mere debt. Goulding J found a trust on the basis of a mixture of equitable principles and restitution of unjust enrichment. This decision was overruled by Lord Browne-Wilkinson. His Lordship explained that this case was an axiomatic example of a constructive trust: where it could be shown that Israel-British Bank had had knowledge of the mistake before its own insolvency, then it would be bound in good conscience to hold that payment on constructive trust for Chase Manhattan from the moment it had realised the mistake, not from the moment of receipt of the second payment. In this way we can see that the constructive trust is capable of arising in a range of general situations which are to do with the conscience of an individual defendant and not with any larger principle. The remainder of this chapter will consider particular situations in which constructive trusts have arisen – although it is suggested that the following sub-categories of constructive trust are necessarily to be read in the light of the foregoing general principles.

12.2.4 The significant case of Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington

A summary of the decision of the House of Lords in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington would be useful at this early stage because it underpins so much of the law in this area. The facts of Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington were perfect as an arena for the debate which was at the heart of trusts law at the time. The issue was this: when Westdeutsche Landesbank (‘WDL’) paid money to Islington on the basis of a contract which unbeknownst to either party was void, on what basis could WDL recover its money? It was held that because

47 [1980] 2 WLR 202.

Islington did not know that the contract was void before all of the money was spent, then Islington's conscience had not been affected. Because a trust will only come into existence once the legal owner's conscience is affected, there was no trust (whether constructive or resulting) over the money before it was spent. (As is discussed in Chapter 19, WDL could not trace after the money passing into other people's hands because it was not possible to prove where the money went after it was paid into the authority's general bank account.) Therefore, the House of Lords held that the only recourse which WDL could have was to a personal claim at common law for 'money had and received': this meant that WDL was entitled to be paid an amount by Islington equal to its original payment to Islington. Because it was a personal action, if Islington had gone into insolvency in the meantime then WDL would have had only a personal claim against an insolvent person which would have amounted to nothing in practice: fortunately, Islington was still solvent.⁴⁸ In reading the case, it is apparent that the only issue remaining in front of the House of Lords was whether WDL was entitled to compound interest or simple interest on its money. It was held by the majority of the House of Lords that under the law at the time, compound interest would only be available to the bank if it still had some proprietary interest in the money.⁴⁹ For a discussion of the issues arising before Hobhouse J and the Court of Appeal, and for a full discussion of the issues raised by each member of the House of Lords, see Alastair Hudson, Swaps, Restitution and Trusts.⁵⁰

There had been an argument put forward by Prof Birks of the University of Oxford to the effect that if a person like Islington had been unjustly enriched (for example by receiving money under a contract that was actually void) then the payer (WDL) should be able to assert a proprietary claim on the basis of a massively enlarged conception of what constitutes a resulting trust over the money. This argument had a number of academic supporters. This writer is not one of them. The argument was rejected by the House of Lords. The weakness in the argument is that it does not account for the unfairness of entitling the payer to have a property right in money which will put it at an advantage when compared to the payee's other unsecured creditors. Furthermore, if the money has been spent then a resulting trust would not answer the question 'which property are you claiming now it's gone?'. What the majority of the House of Lords did was to re-establish our understanding of equity as being based on 48 In permitting a claim at common law, the House of Lords overruled the earlier House of Lords decision in Sinclair v Brougham [1914] AC 398 which had decided that no claim for money had and received should stand at common law in relation to a contract which had been void ab initio because that would have been to give effect to the void contract. This argument is fallacious: the void contract is not being effected but rather the parties are being returned to the position they occupied previously, in cash terms, as a result of the total failure of consideration and their mistake as to the capacity of both parties when making payment between themselves. This was Lord Browne-Wilkinson's position in Westdeutsche Landesbank in a nutshell. And yet in Haugesund Kommune v Depfa ACS Bank [2010] EWCA Civ 579 Aikens LJ considered the extent to which Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington had intended to overrule Sinclair v Brougham. Quite why so much time was lavished by Aikens LJ on this issue, in particular by reference to minority judgments in the House of Lords, is unclear. In the House of Lords in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington none of their lordships had expressed the view that no such common law claim should be allowed, with the majority overruling the decision in Sinclair v Brougham explicitly. This, in essence, was the decision to which the Court of Appeal came in Haugesund Kommune v Depfa ACS Bank.

49 The law on interest has changed significantly by virtue of a subsequent decision of the House of Lords in Sempre Metals Ltd v IRC [2008] Bus LR 49.

50 Alastair Hudson, Swaps, Restitution and Trusts, Sweet & Maxwell, 1999.

conscience. Among the other problems with Birks's argument were the following two issues: first, that it was predicated on a fallacious idea that it was based on Roman law but overlooked the fact that Roman law itself relied on a broadly-based equity ('aequitas'); and, secondly, that it was based on an elderly English case, Moses v Macferlan,⁵¹ which was in fact based on equity and not on some Romanist model of unjust enrichment. So, Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington is important because it is the most recent House of Lords case on trusts law which takes the trouble to explain the basics of English trusts law as being based on a central concept of 'conscience', and because it resolved a key academic debate of its day.

12.3 UNCONSCIONABLE DEALINGS WITH PROPERTY

Where the legal owner of property deals with that property knowingly in a manner which denies or interferes with the rights of some other person in that property, the legal owner will hold that property on constructive trust for that other person.

12.3.1 Knowledge and unconscionability in general

This category develops from the general principle set out above in section 12.2. In that paragraph the explanation given for the decision in the Chase Manhattan case by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in *Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC*⁵² revealed the potential ambit of this principle. It was said that in Chase Manhattan, the unconscionable act which led to the imposition of a constructive trust was the knowledge of the recipient of a payment that the payer had made a mistake and would therefore require repayment. Conscience here does not require that there has been some dishonesty or theft practised by the defendant, only that there be some treatment by the defendant of property in which the claimant has rights which is considered to be wrong, unconscionable or unethical in a broad sense.

12.3.2 Constructive trusts in relation to land

Constructive trusts in relation to land in general terms

Constructive trusts may arise in relation to land in three principal ways. First, by means of a common intention constructive trust, where the parties either form some agreement by means of express discussions, or demonstrate a common intention by their conduct in contributing jointly to the purchase price or mortgage over a property.⁵³ This category is considered below at para 12.6.1.

Secondly, by entering into a contract for the transfer of rights in land, there is an automatic transfer of the equitable interest in that land as soon as there is a binding contract in effect.⁵⁴ That contract would have to be in writing in one document signed by the parties which contained all the terms of the contract.⁵⁵ However, proprietary estoppel will now offer a means of evading this statutory requirement in circumstances in which the transferor made assurances to the transferee that the transferee would receive title in this land and where that 51 (1760) 2 Burr 1005, per Lord Mansfield CJ.

52 [1996] AC 669.

53 Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1990] 1 All ER 1111.

54 Lysaght v Edwards (1876) 2 Ch D 499; Jerome v Kelly [2004] UKHL 25; [2004] 2 All ER 835.

55 Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, s 2.

transferee acted to her detriment in reliance on those assurances.⁵⁶ This category is considered below at para 12.6.2.

Joint ventures in relation to land

The third context in which a constructive trust may come into existence in relation to land is in relation to parties entering into negotiations for a joint venture to exploit land and subsequently seeking to exploit that land alone when those negotiations had precluded the claimant from exploiting any interest in that land.⁵⁷ As is discussed in section 12.3.3 following, a constructive trust will be imposed in circumstances in which the claimant has refrained from exploiting some commercial opportunity in reliance on some agreement or pre-contractual understanding reached with the defendant. This doctrine is known as ‘the equity in Pallant v Morgan’⁵⁸ and has been accepted as being the basis of the constructive trust considered in this section in relation to unconscionable actions between parties to joint ventures. The most significant recent example of this doctrine arose in Banner Homes Group plc v Luff Development Ltd,⁵⁹ where two commercial parties entered into what was described as a ‘joint venture’ to exploit the development prospects of land in Berkshire. It was held that no binding contract had been formed between the parties when the defendant sought to exploit the site alone without the involvement of the claimant. Extensive negotiations were conducted between the claimant and the defendant and their respective lawyers with reference to documentation to create a joint venture partnership or company. The defendant continued the negotiations while privately nursing reservations about going into business with the claimant. The defendant decided, however, that it should ‘keep [the claimant] on board’ unless or until a better prospect emerged. It was held that the defendant could establish a constructive trust even in the absence of a binding contract to the effect that the claimant and defendant would exploit the land jointly, if the defendant had refrained from exploiting any personal interests in that land in reliance on the negotiations being conducted between the claimant and the defendant.

Significantly, there had been sufficient agreement between the parties for the claimant to have relied on the arrangement as founding some right under a constructive trust. It was enough that there had been extensive negotiations so that the claimant could reasonably have relied on the parties’ common intention to enter into a joint venture agreement.⁶⁰ The constructive trust would not have arisen if there had been no evidence of any agreement between the parties or no evidence that the claimant had made any contribution to the purchase price of property or no evidence that he had suffered any meaningful detriment.⁶¹

56 Yaxley v Gotts [2000] Ch 162; [1999] 3 WLR 1217. Cf Cobbe v Yeoman’s Row [2008] 1 WLR 1752 below.

57 Pallant v Morgan [1953] Ch 43.

58 [1952] 2 All ER 951. See the cases considered in the next section.

59 [2000] Ch 372, [2000] 2 WLR 772. Applied in Kilcarne Holdings Ltd v Targetfollow (Birmingham) Ltd [2004] EWHC 2547 (Ch).

60 A joint venture agreement may give rise to a constructive trust where a suitable relationship of trust and confidence is found to have arisen and one of the fiduciaries then seeks to make an unauthorised personal profit from the subject matter of that joint venture: Murad v Al-Saraj [2004] EWHC 1235 (Ch), Etherton J; Button v Phelps [2006] EWHC 53 (Ch), Englehart QC.

61 It is significant, however, that the parties had reached sufficient agreement to make out the constructive trust. Where the parties have reached no agreement at all on which the claimant could have relied in good conscience, then there will not be a constructive trust: Kilcarne Holdings Ltd v Targetfollow (Birmingham) Ltd [2004] EWHC 2547 (Ch); Popely v Helthfield Properties Ltd [2005] All ER (D) 287; Kirker v Ridley [2008] All ER (D) 179.

So, where the parties are in mid-negotiation and the only documentation refers to the transactions as being ‘subject to contract’⁶² or in ‘draft only’,⁶³ then the circumstances may dictate that the parties were not yet in agreement such that the constructive trust under Banner Homes would not apply. It should be noted, however, that there was not a ‘no contract’ provision in the agreement in the Banner Homes case itself. Nevertheless in that case it was found that there had been sufficient agreement between the parties on which the claimant could form a reasonable expectation that there would be a formal contract entered into between them in the future.

By contrast, at first instance in Kilcarne Holdings Ltd v Targetfollow (Birmingham) Ltd,⁶⁴ it was the parties’ legal advisors who had deliberately provided in the draft documentation which passed between the parties that there was no contract then in effect between them so that no expectation could reasonably be formed between the parties that such an agreement was then in existence. In Banner Homes, so the court considered, there was no equivalent provision included by the parties’ legal advisors. Consequently, if well-advised, the parties’ expression that there is no contract nor any form of enforceable agreement between them will be binding, whereas if the parties’ advisors do not make such a position clear (or if the parties are not advised in this way) then it may be reasonable to form an impression that there is such an agreement on which the claimant can rely so as to give rise to the Banner Homes constructive trust.⁶⁵

On appeal to the Court of Appeal in Kilcarne Holdings Ltd v Targetfollow (Birmingham) Ltd,⁶⁶ approving the decision at first instance, it was accepted that in relation to the ‘Pallant v Morgan’ equity in such cases ‘the principle required, first, that there be an arrangement or understanding between the parties that A will acquire the property and that if he does so B will obtain some interest in it; and, secondly, that B must act in reliance on that arrangement or understanding’.⁶⁷ On the facts of this case the Court of Appeal agreed with the judge at first instance that there had never been any such agreement, arrangement or understanding between the parties precisely because the parties’ legal advisors had made it clear that negotiations between the parties were always ‘subject to contract’ such that no contract was yet in place.

Other, more recent cases illustrate the same points. In *Thames Cruises Ltd v George Wheeler Launches*⁶⁸ the parties had an informal understanding that they would apply together for a licence to operate cruise boats on the Thames. However, the defendant formed a rival consortium to bid for the licence and that consortium was in time granted the licence. It was held by Peter Smith J that there had not been a legally-binding partnership formed between the parties,⁶⁹ merely a non-binding understanding, and therefore the constructive trust did

62 London and Regional Investments Ltd v TBI plc [2002] EWCA Civ 355, [2002] All ER (D) 369.

63 Kilcarne Holdings Ltd v Targetfollow (Birmingham) Ltd [2004] EWHC 2547 (Ch).

64 Ibid.

65 The principle in these cases was followed in Van Laetham v Brooker [2005] EWHC 1478 (Ch).

66 [2005] EWCA Civ 1355.

67 Adopting the submissions of Edward Nugee QC at [2005] EWCA Civ 1355 at para [21].

68 [2003] EWHC 3093 (Ch).

69 A partnership in legal terms is an undertaking in common with a view to profit under s 1 of the Partnership Act 1890 and therefore constitutes a very particular kind of legal relationship which is very different from an informal understanding.

not arise as it had done in Banner Homes v Luff.⁷⁰ In *Button v Phelps*⁷¹ it was held that this equity was based on the equity in Pallant v Morgan (on which see the next section) and that it was a doctrine similar to proprietary estoppel. Therefore, if the parties had not suffered any detriment in reliance on an understanding between them, it was held that a constructive trust would not come into existence based on Banner Homes v Luff. So where the parties had formed an understanding that they might bid to acquire the nightclubs operated by an insolvent company, there would be no constructive trust if the defendant withdrew before any of the other parties had performed any detrimental acts in reliance on that putative understanding. The formulation of the test which was accepted by the Court of Appeal in *Kilcarne Holdings Ltd v Targetfollow (Birmingham) Ltd*⁷² (which was quoted above) is indeed very similar to proprietary estoppel and to the common intention constructive trust⁷³ in *Lloyds Bank v Rosset*⁷⁴ in its reference⁷⁵ to ‘agreement, arrangement or understanding’.⁷⁶

In relation to all of these categories of constructive trust over land, there is a superficial similarity between the constructive trust and proprietary estoppel in that the claimant has generally suffered detriment in reliance on an understanding that there is a formal contract or some similar informal agreement between the parties. The common feature in all of these claims (where estoppel can be defined as a claim) is that the claimant must have suffered some detriment to found its claim.⁷⁷ These differences will be probed further later in this chapter.

The effect of the decision in Cobbe v Yeoman’s Row

The case of *Cobbe v Yeoman’s Row*⁷⁸ concerned negotiations between two parties to develop land whereby the claimant spent a large amount of money gaining planning permission to develop the land with the knowledge of the defendant while negotiations towards a contract were proceeding between them; but once planning permission was acquired the defendant reneged on the parties’ non-binding understanding that they would develop the land together. The House of Lords held that the claimant was not entitled to any rights based on constructive trust nor on proprietary estoppel. In essence, their Lordships considered that two experienced commercial people like the claimant and the defendant should have known that the fact that there was no enforceable agreement between them meant that neither of them had 70 In Powell v Benney [2007] EWCA Civ 1283. See also McGuane v Welch [2008] EWCA Civ 785, where it was held that the claimant’s alleged detriment in relation to assisting an elderly man in his premises would not found rights on ‘constructive trust or proprietary estoppel’ principles, because there had not been any clear ‘bargain’ between the parties to the effect that the claimant would perform any detrimental acts nor that those detrimental acts were intended to acquire the claimant any interest in the property.

71 [2006] EWHC 53 (Ch).

72 Adopting the submissions of Edward Nugee QC at [2005] EWCA Civ 1355 at para [21].

73 Which is itself suggested by Lord Bridge in that case to be of a piece with proprietary estoppel.

74 [1991] 1 AC 1.

75 See para 15.4.2.

76 Grant v Edwards [1986] Ch 638.

77 Chattock v Miller (1878) 8 Ch D 177; Pallant v Morgan [1952] 2 All ER 951; London and Regional Investments Ltd v TBI plc [2002] EWCA Civ 355; [2002] All ER (D) 369; Kilcarne Holdings Ltd v Targetfollow (Birmingham) Ltd [2004] EWHC 2547 (Ch). See also Pridean Ltd v Forest Taverns Ltd (1996) 75 P & CR 447, where this concept was argued on the basis of proprietary estoppel.

78 [2008] 1 WLR 1752.

any rights against the other in constructive trust; nor were there any rights in proprietary estoppel because the defendant was not strictly alleging that any true fact was not the case (here, that she was not denying the existence of enforceable rights for the claimant because no such enforceable rights had been created). This decision is discussed in detail at para 13.3.5 in relation to proprietary estoppel. Importantly, the House of Lords retreated from the idea that proprietary estoppel should be based solely on unconscionability, where for example a defendant knowingly allows a claimant to spend large amounts of money before resiling from their common understanding. This decision throws into shadow many of the cases considered above given the lack of enthusiasm in the House of Lords for finding unconscionability sufficient to grant proprietary rights in a commercial arrangement. In relation specifically to constructive trusts, Lord Scott held that:⁷⁹

If two or more persons agree to embark on a joint venture which involves the acquisition of an identified piece of land and a subsequent exploitation of, or dealing with, the land for the purposes of the joint venture, and one of the joint venturers, with the agreement of the others who believe him to be acting for their joint purposes, makes the acquisition in his own name but subsequently seeks to retain the land for his own benefit, the court will regard him as holding the land on trust for the joint venturers. This would be either an implied trust or a constructive trust arising from the circumstances . . .

However, Lord Scott considered that, on the facts of Cobbe, there would not be a constructive trust on the same manner as Banner Homes v Luff Development because the property in question had been owned for some years before the negotiations for the joint venture began;⁸⁰ furthermore that '[d]espite the unconscionability of the appellant's behaviour in withdrawing from the inchoate agreement immediately planning permission had been obtained, this seems to me a wholly inadequate basis for imposing a constructive trust over the property in order to provide Mr Cobbe with a remedy for his disappointed expectations',⁸¹ and that the parties agreement had not been sufficient to constitute a contract.

The subsequent decision of the House of Lords in *Thorner v Major*⁸² has been significant in explaining how the Cobbe decision should be understood. Lord Walker suggested that Cobbe should be understood as merely reminding us all of the need for 'certainty of interest'. Lord Walker and Lord Rodger effectively suggested in Thorner v Major that the result of Cobbe was simply to reinforce the need for certainty as to the content of the representation and as to the property in question.

Indeed, it is not entirely clear that the decision in Cobbe has had a profound effect on the subsequent decisions of the lower courts.⁸³ Those courts have focused on the equity in Pallant v Morgan and the decision in Banner Homes instead. The agreement or understanding between the parties does not need to be as precise as a carefully drafted contract but it must be based on something more than merely the conduct of the parties. So, in *Baynes Clarke v Corless*⁸⁴ a property development in which two houses had been built in the grounds

79 [2008] 1 WLR 1752, at [30].

80 Ibid, at [33].

81 Ibid, at [36].

82 [2009] 1 WLR 776.

83 However, Cobbe was followed in Kirker v Ridley [2008] All ER (D) 179 (Dec) and in Qayyum v Hameed [2009] EWCA Civ 352, [2009] 3 FCR 545.

84 [2009] EWHC 1636 (Ch).

of a larger house in Haywards Heath in West Sussex had led to disputes about the access road to all three properties.⁸⁵ The claimants contended that the access road and adjoining land should be treated as being held on constructive trust for them by the defendants, but it was held by Proudman J that there had never been any formal agreement about that and that the claimant's contentions were therefore based merely on their impression of the parties' conduct.⁸⁶ Therefore, there was insufficient agreement between the parties to form a constructive trust. It was further held that while unconscionability is a necessary element for a constructive trust based on Pallant v Morgan, by itself unconscionability is insufficient to create a constructive trust.⁸⁷ There would also need to be some reliance on the agreement between the parties but on these facts there was neither an agreement nor evidence of reliance upon such an agreement.⁸⁸

Similarly, in *Crossco No 4 Unlimited v Jolan Ltd*⁸⁹ the Court of Appeal held that where there is no clear agreement between the parties then the principle in Banner Homes will not apply so as to create a constructive trust. The issues arose out of negotiations for the ownership and exploitation of a lease over a large retail building in central Manchester.⁹⁰ During the negotiations for a complex demerger of the entity which owned that building, the defendant sought to exercise a break clause under the lease. The claimant contended that it had not known of that break clause in the lease and therefore contended it was unconscionable for the defendant to activate the break clause such that a constructive trust should bind the defendant in this regard. It was found that there was no fiduciary duty in this context which had been breached by the defendant. Etherton LJ, in a very full judgment, held that Banner Homes continued to be good law in this context after the decision in Cobbe v Yeoman's Row, and more significantly his Lordship identified the source of the principle in Banner Homes v Luff Development and the equity in Pallant v Morgan as being based ultimately on a breach of fiduciary duty. Such a breach of fiduciary duty could not be demonstrated on these facts. Therefore, no constructive trust would be available.

However, Arden LJ in Crossco No 4 Unlimited v Jolan Ltd, having agreed with the conclusion reached by Etherton LJ, then went to the effort of disagreeing with him as to the source of the Banner Homes doctrine and identified it instead as being a 'common intention constructive trust'.⁹¹ There was also some suggestion that this principle might be limited to domestic circumstances and would need to be interpreted in the light of the decision of the 85 Originally, the parties had intended to own the land through a development company but dissatisfaction with the managing director of that company emerged later, and a breakdown of the ordinary cordialities between neighbours later still. The disputes at issue had arisen late in the process when the defendants had decided not to transfer title in the access road to the claimants nor to undertake to maintain that road for more than three years. This case was a classic of its type: neighbours becoming involved in a petty squabble over common land which escalates into aggression, allegations, solicitors being instructed and ultimately a hearing before the High Court. There was even a dispute about a single screw affixed by one party to another party's fence, with which his Lordship dealt with great calmness, at para [85].

86 [2009] EWHC 1636 (Ch), at [22] and as explored at para [25] et seq.

87 Ibid., at [23].

88 Ibid., at [24].

89 [2011] EWCA Civ 1619.

90 As Morgan J had observed at first instance, there was an irony in a 15-minute discussion between two business-people giving rise ultimately to a 35-day trial, [2011] EWHC 803 (Ch).

91 [2011] EWCA Civ 1619, at [129] et seq.

Supreme Court in Jones v Kernott.⁹² All of this suggestion by Arden LJ is simply wrong.⁹³ As Etherton LJ correctly pointed out, in disagreeing with Arden LJ, the doctrine ‘common intention constructive trust’ arose specifically in relation to trusts of homes in Pettit v Pettit and Gissing v Gissing, and as such had no part to play in the equity in Pallant v Morgan (which pre-dated it by seventeen years) nor the decision in Banner Homes.⁹⁴ This was an unhelpful intervention by Arden LJ, unfortunately followed by McFarlane LJ, and it should be ignored in the future.⁹⁵

12.3.3 Constructive trusts to ‘keep out of the market’

A constructive trust will be imposed in circumstances in which the claimant has refrained from exploiting some commercial opportunity in reliance on some agreement or pre-contractual understanding reached with the defendant. This doctrine is known as ‘the equity in Pallant v Morgan’.⁹⁶ In general terms, this is referred to as the claimant ‘keeping out of the market’. The basis of the trust is that the claimant will have suffered detriment by failing to exploit a commercial opportunity. The conscience of the defendant is affected where the claimant’s decision not to exploit that commercial opportunity is based on some understanding reached with the defendant, or some assurance made by the defendant that they would reach some other agreement: the defendant must then exploit that opportunity in some way in contravention of the parties’ understanding. The trust bites on any property which the defendant realises from exploiting the opportunity. This constructive trust will bind a purchaser of property who had previously procured the claimant’s agreement not to bid for property at auction on the basis that the defendant would sell part of that land to the claimant;⁹⁷ or bind a purchaser of land at auction who had previously agreed with the claimant not to bid against the claimant for part of that land at auction;⁹⁸ or would bind a defendant who acquired development land on its own account where it had reached an understanding with the claimant that that land would be exploited as a joint venture with the claimant.⁹⁹

92 [2011] UKSC 53.

93 See also Herbert v Doyle [2010] EWCA Civ 1095, per Arden LJ.

94 As this writer has pointed out elsewhere, it would be possible to take the non-commercial doctrine of the common intention constructive trust and to change it so that it could be made to fit commercial situations, such as Banner Homes, in which commercial people have come to some ‘agreement, arrangement or understanding’, as the concept is described in part in Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1992] 1 AC 1.

95 Arden LJ has worked through some interesting and previously unknown concepts in trusts law. Examples are: the use of subjective ideas to apply an objective concept of ‘dishonesty’ in Abou-Rahmah v Abacha [2006] EWCA Civ 1492, [16]; in Murad v Al-Saraj [2005] EWCA Civ 939 at paras [82–83] the idea that the principle in Boardman v Higgs could be tempered by a modern court, which was clearly contrary to the approach of the English senior courts, and doubted by Sir Peter Gibson in Wrexham AFC Ltd v Crucialmove Ltd [2006] EWCA Civ 237, para [51]; the decision in Pennington v Waine; in Charter plc v City Index Ltd [2008] 2 WLR 950, [64] the idea that ‘damages’ are payable for breach of trust; and the notion that a trust takes effect ‘over the legal title’ in property.

96 [1952] 2 All ER 951. See the cases considered in the next section.

97 Chattock v Miller (1878) 8 Ch D 177.

98 Pallant v Morgan [1952] 2 All ER 951.

99 Banner Homes v Luff Development [2000] Ch 372, [2000] 2 WLR 772. Cf Edwin Shirley Productions v Workspace Management Ltd [2001] 2 EGLR 16.

12.3.4 Statute cannot be used as an engine of fraud: Rochefoucauld v Boustead

It was accepted by Millett LJ in *Paragon Finance v Thakerar*¹⁰⁰ that ‘well-known examples’ of constructive trusts which are ‘coloured from the first by the trust and confidence by means of which the trustee obtained the property’ include the doctrine in Rochefoucauld v Boustead.¹⁰¹ This doctrine was considered in detail at para 5.2.2 above. In the Rochefoucauld case itself, the trustee was empowered to acquire property for the claimant but the trust was improperly recorded. It was held that for the defendant trustee to have relied on the statutory formalities for the creation of a trust in land would have been to perpetrate a fraud on the claimant for whose benefit that property had been acquired. Similarly, in Lyus v Prowsa,¹⁰² a mortgagor sought to deal with property in contravention of the mortgage on the basis that the mortgagee had failed to register the mortgage. It was held that the mortgagor held the property on constructive trust for the mortgagee nevertheless, because the mortgagor had undertaken in the mortgage contract to respect the rights of the mortgagee.¹⁰³

While the Rochefoucauld doctrine could be said to operate on the basis of a general equitable principle that statute will not be used as an engine of fraud, Millett LJ in Paragon Finance included it four-square within the head of constructive trust, an approach which is in line with cases like Lyus v Prowsa.¹⁰⁴ It is one of the core motivations of equity to balance out injustices in the literal application of common law and statutory rules. In such circumstances, there is no intention to create an express trust over the property in question.¹⁰⁵ Therefore, on the basis that a trust has been imposed by the courts to require the legal owner of that property to deal with it in a particular manner for the benefit of the beneficiary, the only viable explanation of the nature of that trust is that it forms a constructive trust in order to regulate the conscience of that common law owner which arises by operation of law.¹⁰⁶ Aspects of this doctrine relating generally to fraud are considered further below at para 12.4.4.

In essence, then, no common law or statutory rule may be used so as to defraud or take unconscionable advantage of another person.¹⁰⁷ This principle, however, conflicts with the basic principle of modern real property law that in statutorily defined circumstances no proprietary right can take effect over any other right if it is not registered. So, in Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd v Green,¹⁰⁸ a father had granted his son an option to purchase his farm, which was unregistered land. This right should have been registered under the Land Charges Act 1972 for it to be protected, but the son failed to register his option. With a view to defeating his son’s option to purchase, the father sold the farm at an undervalue to his wife. It was held that even though this sale was effected so as to defeat the son’s right, the son nevertheless had no rights in equity to prevent the defeat of his option. The purpose of this decision was to protect the integrity of the system of registration. By contrast, in Peffer v

100 Paragon Finance plc v Thakerar & Co [1999] 1 All ER 400; Lloyd v Dugdale [2002] 2 P & CR 13.

101 [1897] 1 Ch 196.

102 [1982] 1 WLR 1044.

103 See also IDC Group v Clark (1992) 65 P & CR 179.

104 [1982] 1 WLR 1044.

105 As considered in section 2.1 of this book.

106 See Oakley, 1997, 53 et seq.

107 Rochefoucauld v Boustead [1897] 1 Ch 196.

108 [1981] AC 513.

Rigg,¹⁰⁹ Mr and Mrs Peffer and Mr and Mrs Rigg bought a property, which was registered land, together. When the Riggs separated, the property was purportedly passed to Mrs Rigg who sought to dispose of the property entirely for her own benefit. The Peffers had not protected their rights by registration as required by statute. It was held by Graham J that Mrs Rigg was a constructive trustee for the Peffers because she had had knowledge of their rights and therefore could not purport to defeat those rights simply on the basis that they had not been registered. Thus, there is a clear tension on the cases between the statutory policy which requires that no unregistered right will be protected and the equitable principle which requires that a person who knows of another's rights cannot rely on another person's failure to register their rights so as to defeat them. As was considered above, Cobbe v Yeoman's Row throws doubt on the utility of 'unconscionability' as a basis for constructive trusts in commercial transactions; although it is suggested that 'fraud' is of a different order of magnitude.

12.3.5 'Doing everything necessary': Re Rose

A more contentious form of constructive trust is derived from the case of Re Rose,¹¹⁰ in which it was accepted that where the absolute owner of property intends to transfer title in that property to another person, a trust will arise in favour of the intended recipient once the transferor has completed all of the necessary formalities required of the transferor personally to effect transfer. It has been accepted by some of the commentators that this form of trust constitutes a constructive trust primarily because it does not satisfy the formalities for the creation of an express trust because no title has been vested in a trustee.¹¹¹ Further, it is to be doubted whether this could be considered to be an express trust at all, given that the transferor had no intention to create a trust: rather, he intended in Re Rose to make a gift of the property. As such, the trust is being imposed against the intentions of the parties, and therefore can only be described as taking effect by operation of law as a constructive trust. This equitable doctrine was considered in detail at para 5.4.3 above.¹¹²

In the case of Re Rose,¹¹³ Mr Rose had intended to transfer one block of shares to his wife beneficially and another to his wife and another woman on trust for them both. He had completed the appropriate transfer forms. The only formality which remained to be performed was the acceptance by the company of the transfer of ownership: this was an action outside Mr Rose's own control. It was held that Mr Rose had succeeded in transferring the equitable interest in the shares to his wife when he had completed all the formalities required of him.

The classification of this trust is not straightforward. It cannot be deemed to be an express trust because there was no intention on the part of Mr Rose to create express trusts over all of the shares. Nor does the equitable interest result back to Mr Rose. Rather, it must be said that the equitable interest passes as a result of a constructive trust by operation of law. Lord Evershed MR based his judgment not on trust, but rather on the basis of an intention to make

109 [1977] 1 WLR 285.

110 [1952] Ch 499, considered at para 5.4.3 above. Cf Re Trustee of the Property of Jan Yngre Pehrsson (A Bankrupt) (1999) 2 ITELR 230. See Youdan, 1984.

111 Oakley, 1997.

112 See now also Scribes West Ltd v Relsa Anstalt [2004] EWCA Civ 1744.

113 [1952] Ch 499.

a gift such that it would have been inequitable for Mr Rose to have, for example, sought to retain for himself any dividend paid in respect of these shares between the time that Mr Rose completed all of the formalities required of him and the ultimate acceptance by the company's board of directors to validate the transfer. Hence the inclusion of this principle as a form of unconscionable dealing with property: it is accepted by the Court of Appeal in Re Rose that the rights of the transferee are based on the unconscionability of the transferor refusing to recognise that a transfer of title in equity has taken place.

The importance of this form of constructive trust is that the formalities for the creation of a trust or the formalities required for the transfer of property can be circumvented where all the formalities required of the transferor have been completed. The problem remains the decision of Turner LJ in Milroy v Lord,¹¹⁴ which provided that 'the settlor must have done everything which, according to the nature of the property comprised in the settlement, was necessary to be done in order to transfer the property'. As provided by s 53(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925, the categorisation of this trust as a constructive trust absolves the settlor of the need to satisfy any formalities.

12.3.6 A constructive trust over a separate fund created to protect pre-payments for goods or services against a company's insolvency

There have been a number of cases in relation to companies which have gone into insolvent administration and which have received money from customers in a situation in which their officers know that the company has ceased to trade and that in consequence those customers will not receive the goods or services for which they have pre-paid. The argument based on constructive trust is that it would be unconscionable for the company to keep those pre-payments when the company's directors know that the company has ceased to trade and therefore that the pre-payments should be held on constructive trust for the customers. There are two difficulties in this area. First, the principal case on these facts, Nestle Oy v Barclays Bank,¹¹⁵ was decided on the basis of a remedial constructive trust – an approach which has been overruled by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in the House of Lords in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington.¹¹⁶ Secondly, it is difficult to square the conscionability of holding the money on trust for the customers with the pari passu principle in insolvency law that no unsecured creditor should be given an advantage over any other unsecured creditor. These issues are considered below, after we have considered the appropriate cases.

In *Nestle Oy v Barclays Bank*¹¹⁷ a company, which acted as a shipowner's agent, ceased trading shortly before receiving a payment for future services which it was not going to perform. Bingham J held that it would have been 'contrary to any ordinary notion of fairness' for the company to have kept the money and that in ordinary circumstances when the directors knew that it would not perform these services then the company's directors would have organised a repayment of that amount. Thus, it was held that the company could not have 'in good conscience' retained this payment and that 'accordingly a constructive trust is to be inferred'. Bingham J had therefore awarded what was effectively a remedial constructive trust. The particular concern being that the constructive trust in those circumstances was 114 (1862) 4 De GF & J 264.

115 [1983] 2 Lloyds Rep 658.

116 [1996] AC 669.

117 [1983] 2 Lloyds Rep 658.

being used on a remedial basis, as opposed to the institutional basis on which constructive trusts operate in English law.

A clear, recent example of this issue arose in Re Farepak Food and Gifts Ltd,¹¹⁸ a case in which the directors of Farepak Food and Gifts Ltd ('Farepak') sought to protect customers who had made pre-payments for goods or services. Farepak's directors had decided to cease trading on 11 October 2006. Farepak went into insolvent administration on 13 October 2006. By putting these pre-payments into a separate bank account Farepak's directors intended that the customers' pre-payments would be held on trust and consequently that they would be held outside the assets which were to be distributed in the company's insolvency. Farepak's directors knew that the company would cease to trade as from 11 December and the scheme involving the separate bank account was intended to operate in relation to moneys received from customers after that date. The claimant customers¹¹⁹ sought to rely on the remedial constructive trust approach in Nestle Oy v Barclays Bank, an approach which had been overruled by the House of Lords in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington,¹²⁰ as acknowledged by Mann J in Re Farepak. Consequently, Mann J held that he could not impose the constructive trust which had been asked for because the claimants had sought to rely on Nestle Oy which had been overruled. The decision in Nestle Oy had been predicated on the confused mixture of unjust enrichment and constructive trust which was found in *Chase Manhattan Bank NA v Israel-British Bank (London) Ltd*¹²¹ and which had in turn been explicitly overruled latterly by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington.¹²²

I think, however, we can slice through the Gordian knot in which those involved in Re Farepak Food and Gifts Ltd allowed themselves to become embroiled in two ways. The first cut uses the law on constructive trusts; the second cut is based on Re Kayford in the law of express trusts (which is discussed in section 3.3.1).¹²³ So, then, constructive trusts. The basis on which constructive trusts, in the ordinary case of events, come into existence after the decision in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington is that a constructive trust will be imposed on someone who deals unconscionably with property with knowledge of the unconscionability of her actions. Therefore, the only issue in Re Farepak was whether or not the directors knew at the time that Farepak received moneys from its customers (via the agents which collected on Farepak's behalf) that the company was no longer trading and that therefore it would be unconscionable to receive and take absolute title over money from those customers when the company's directors knew that none of the services for which the customers were paying would be provided. The directors knew on 11 December – the date that the company's directors decided that the company should cease to trade – that Farepak was ceasing to trade and that it was going into insolvent administration. In Nestle Oy Bingham J held that to accept money from customers in such a situation could not be done 'in good conscience'. To that extent, the result in Nestle Oy seems unremarkable: the directors knew that they were receiving money unconscionably (in that no service would ever be provided

118 [2006] All ER (D) 265 (Dec).

119 Strictly speaking, it was a single test case brought to question the nature and extent of the customers' rights.

120 [1996] AC 669.

121 [1981] Ch 105.

122 [1996] AC 669. This reasoning was accepted in Box v Barclays Bank [1998] Lloyds Rep Bank 185, per Ferris J and in Shalson v Russo [2005] Ch 281, 320, per Rimer J.

123 See para 3.3.1, 'The commercial context'.

in consideration for that payment) and therefore the requirement of ‘knowledge plus unconscionability’, set out by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington, was satisfied. It was the reasoning which was at issue. Consequently, in Re Farepak it would have been sufficient to find a constructive trust to recognise that the directors knew of the unconscionable factor: which they did from 11 December because they had already decided that the company would cease to trade from that date.¹²⁴

12.4 PROFITS FROM UNLAWFUL ACTS

Where a person committing an unlawful act and/or receiving a bribe is in a fiduciary position during the commission of such an act, the fiduciary is required to hold any property resulting from that unlawful act on proprietary constructive trust for the beneficiaries of the fiduciary duty. That proprietary constructive trust requires that any profits made are also to be held on constructive trust. Similarly, any losses made as a result of investing the bribe will be required to be made good by the constructive trustee.

This section progresses from a general category of unconscionable acts into a first category of the more specific contexts of acts which are unlawful in the sense that they are illegal under the criminal law, or that they are contrary to some norm of regulation or mandatory legal principle. In short, equity takes a particularly strict line in relation to property acquired as a result of unlawful activities. The approach of equity in this context could be said to be based on the proposition that ‘no system of jurisprudence can with reason include among the rights which it enforces rights directly resulting to the person asserting for the crime of that person’;¹²⁵ or, in other words, a criminal cannot be permitted to retain the fruits of her criminal activities. Equity has held since *Bridgman v Green*¹²⁶ that the profits of crime will be held on what is now known as a constructive trust. Two themes emerge. First, equity will seek to recover for the victim of the unlawful act full compensation for the effects of that unlawful act, both by means of proprietary constructive trust and also by means of additional personal liability to account in excess of the value of the property held on constructive trust. Secondly, this proprietary constructive trust will be ineffective against a bona fide purchaser for value of that property without knowledge of the unlawful act.

12.4.1 Profits from bribery

Introduction

The principle considered in this section is that any bribe taken by a fiduciary will be held on constructive trust by that fiduciary for the beneficiaries of her fiduciary office. This principle has, however, been doubted in recent cases. Therefore, this section considers that debate in 124 The more difficult question at that stage would be whether or not the property to be held on trust – that is, the money received after the company had gone into administration – could be sufficiently identifiable so as to constitute the subject matter of a trust. The issue of certainty of subject matter is considered below. It is only if there is no identifiable trust property but nevertheless a constructive trust were imposed so as to provide a remedy that there would be the sort of ‘frontier’ development of the law on constructive trust which concerned Mann J. This issue is considered in Chapter 3.

125 Cleaver v Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association [1892] 1 QB 147, 156.

126 (1755) 24 Beav 382.

anticipation of an appeal to the Supreme Court. At the time of writing, the legal position, which has swung like a pendulum between two points of view, can be understood as follows.

First, a decision of the Court of Appeal in Lister v Stubbs in 1890¹²⁷ held that when a bribe is received, that bribe should be treated as a debt which is an amount of money equal to the bribe which is owed at common law by the recipient of the bribe to their employer or whoever they have wronged by taking that bribe.

Second, a decision of the Privy Council in Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid in 1993,¹²⁸ in a powerful judgment by Lord Templeman, held that when a bribe is received by a fiduciary that bribe is held on constructive trust from the moment of its receipt by the fiduciary for their beneficiary, with the result that any profit which is taken from that bribe or any property which is acquired with that bribe is also held on constructive trust for that beneficiary. Moreover, held Lord Templeman, if any property acquired with that bribe decreases in value, then the fiduciary must not only hold that property on constructive trust but they must also account in cash for the decrease in that value so that the full amount of the bribe is accounted for by them. Lister v Stubbs was rejected, by a careful consideration of all of the case law which had preceded that decision.

Latterly, a decision of the English Court of Appeal in *Sinclair Investments (UK) Ltd v Versailles Trade Finance Group plc*¹²⁹ has divided between situations in which a fiduciary takes an unauthorised profit by misusing trust property (which will lead to a constructive trust over that profit and any further property acquired thereby) and cases in which a fiduciary receives a bribe without using any trust property to do so (which will not lead to a constructive trust but which will rather lead to a debt claim at common law as in Lister v Stubbs). The decision in Reid was rejected for the reasons given below. Interestingly, there is not a close analysis of the early case law and some of the reasons for preferring Lister are eccentric: that there are more articles in favour of Lister than Reid, for example.

A more recent decision of the English Court of Appeal in *FHR European Ventures LLP v Mankarious*¹³⁰ was able to distinguish Sinclair v Versailles on the facts in front of it and to find that there was a constructive trust in a situation in which a fiduciary (an agent) had taken a secret commission from a vendor of land which meant that the agent agreed on behalf of its principal to acquire the land at a higher price than would otherwise have been required to be paid. The Chancellor (Sir Terence Etherton) also expressed the view in his judgment that the Supreme Court should rule as to whether or not the Court of Appeal in Sinclair had been correct to overrule Reid. (No such judgment has been delivered at the time of writing.)

The following discussion considers the debate between these two opposing points of view. First, this is done by analysing the judgments on the Reid side of the argument and on the Sinclair side of the argument. Then the debate in the academic literature is considered.

The fundamental conceptual problem with this principle is that profits made from, for example, bribes will not have been the property of the beneficiary before they were received by the fiduciary. Furthermore, the fiduciary duties recognised by the court in Reading v Attorney-General and in *Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid*¹³¹ (considered below and

127 (1890) 45 Ch D 1.

128 Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324.

129 [2011] EWCA Civ 347.

130 [2013] 3 WLR 466.

131 [1994] 1 AC 324.

relating to a Director of Public Prosecutions who took bribes not to prosecute certain criminals) are not classically understood categories of fiduciary duty. Rather, the duties of a fiduciary are imposed on the defendant to punish her unlawful act and not to vindicate some pre-existing property right. Consequently, it can be difficult to justify in principle the reallocation of title in such bribes to the beneficiaries on constructive trust. What perhaps emerges here is that some judges are as concerned to punish the wrongdoer as to protect rights in property. The court will require that the property be held on constructive trust on the basis that the fiduciary should be required to come to equity with clean hands. One who commits an unlawful act will be treated as having acted prima facie unconscionably. However, in other cases involving insolvency, the courts are concerned to ensure that the imposition of a constructive trust does not advantage some creditors to the detriment of other unsecured creditors by taking some property out of the insolvent person's estate by holding it on constructive trust.

The common law debtor–creditor approach in Lister v Stubbs

Until 1994, it was an accepted, but much-contested,¹³² facet of English law that a fiduciary who received bribes was liable only to a personal claim to pay the cash equivalent of the bribe to the beneficiary of that fiduciary duty and not to account for any profits made on that bribe as a trustee. In the formerly leading case of Lister v Stubbs,¹³³ the defendant was a buyer for the plaintiff, the company which employed him, who accepted bribes in return for placing orders with particular suppliers. The defendant invested the bribes successfully. Therefore, the employee had more valuable property than the bribes in his possession by the time of trial. Because the defendant had generated profits from the bribes, the plaintiff wanted to establish a proprietary claim to the profitable investments which the defendant had acquired with the bribes, rather than simply receiving the cash equivalent of the original bribes. The plaintiff sought an order from the court to stop the defendant from dealing with his investments and to hold them instead on constructive trust for the plaintiff. The issue arose whether the defendant was a constructive trustee of the bribe.

The Court of Appeal held that to allow the order would be to confuse the plaintiff's entitlement to the cash amount of the bribes with ownership of the investments. The logic of the property law rules was followed closely: the plaintiff had never had any proprietary right in the bribes and therefore could not claim title to the property acquired with the bribes. However, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to require the defendant to account to the plaintiff for the value of the original bribes to prevent the fiduciary from making unauthorised profits from his office. The plaintiff was therefore entitled to an amount of cash which was equivalent to the bribes, but not to a proprietary right in the investments acquired with those bribes which had subsequently increased in value. The claim was considered to be only a personal claim between debtor and creditor for a sum of money equal to the bribes. It was held by the court that, strictly, one could not say entitlement to one form of property (an amount of cash) could be translated into rights in another form of property (the investments) in favour of a plaintiff who had never had title to that money.¹³⁴ This decision has been greatly criticised for creating a different scheme of rules from the secret profits cases considered below at section 12.5.¹³⁵ This approach has attracted the approval of the Court of Appeal in Sinclair v Versailles. The Lister v Stubbs approach was, in any event, still applied in cases in which the parties' relationship is purely that of debtor and creditor, as in situations where the defendant was contractually obliged to collect fees for the claimant but where the defendant did not hold any such sums on trust,¹³⁶ or where their contract excludes the possibility of any form of express or implied trust being imposed.¹³⁷

132 See, eg, Millett, 1993.

133 (1890) 45 Ch D 1.

The constructive trust approach in Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid

A different approach was taken by the Privy Council in Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid.¹³⁸ The former Director of Public Prosecutions for Hong Kong had accepted bribes not to prosecute certain individuals accused of having committed crimes within his jurisdiction. The bribes which he had received had been profitably invested in New Zealand. The question arose, similarly to Lister v Stubbs,¹³⁹ whether or not the property bought with the bribes and the increase in value of those investments should be held on constructive trust for the Director of Public Prosecutions's employer, or whether the Director of Public Prosecutions owed only an amount of cash equal to the bribes paid to him originally. Lord Templeman, giving the leading opinion of the Privy Council, overruled Lister v Stubbs and took a very much stricter view of the law. He held that a proprietary constructive trust is imposed as soon as the bribe is accepted by its recipient. This means that the employer is entitled in equity to any profit generated by the cash bribe received from the moment of its receipt. Similarly, Lord Templeman held that the constructive trustee is liable to the beneficiary for any decrease in value in the investments acquired with the bribe, as well as for any increase in value in such investments. As Lord Templeman has expressed this principle:¹⁴⁰

A bribe is a gift accepted by a fiduciary as an inducement to him to betray his trust. A fiduciary is undoubtedly accountable for a secret benefit which consists of a bribe. In addition a person who provides the bribe and the fiduciary who accepts the bribe may each be guilty of a criminal offence. In the present case the first respondent was clearly guilty of a criminal offence.

The fiduciary is thus liable to account to the beneficiaries for the receipt of the bribe. The moral underpinnings of the imposition of a constructive trust on such a bribe emerges from the following passage which continues on from the passage just quoted:

134 This approach has been approved in Birks, 1989, 386; Virgo, 1999, 543; Burrows, 2002, 500, on the basis that there is no proprietary basis on which to impose a constructive trust because the property has never belonged to the claimant at any time and therefore, it is said, the only action which the claimant can have is a personal action based on debt at common law.

135 These approaches are summarised in Daraydan Holdings Ltd v Solland International Ltd [2004] EWHC 622 (Ch), para [75] et seq. See also, eg, Goff and Jones, 1998, 85.

136 Ansys Inc v Lim [2001] ECDR 34.

137 Wallace v Shoa Leasing (Singapore) PTE Ltd, Re Japan Leasing [2000] WTLR 301, [1999] BPIR 911.

138 [1994] 1 AC 324, [1994] 1 All ER 1.

139 (1890) 45 Ch D 1.

140 [1994] 1 AC 324, 330–31; [1994] 1 All ER 1, 4–5.

Bribery is an evil practice which threatens the foundations of any civilised society. In particular bribery of policemen and prosecutors brings the administration of justice into disrepute. Where bribes are accepted by a trustee, servant, agent or other fiduciary, loss and damage are caused to the beneficiaries, master or principal whose interests have been betrayed. The amount of loss or damage resulting from the acceptance of a bribe may or may not be quantifiable. In the present case the amount of harm caused to the administration of justice in Hong Kong¹⁴¹ by the first respondent in return for bribes cannot be quantified.

Lord Templeman's policy motivation is clear: to punish the wrongdoer, particularly a wrongdoer in public office. He considered bribery to be an 'evil practice which threatens the foundations of any civilised society'. As such, the imposition of a proprietary constructive trust was the only way in which the wrongdoer could be fully deprived of the value of his malfeasance. This, it is suggested, is less 'restitution' than 'retribution':¹⁴² there is no proprietary right in the loss on the investments; rather there is a policy motivation both to disgorge the wrongdoer's profits and to impose punitive remedies. This is neither compensation nor restitution, rather it is control of the defendant's conscience.

The manner in which Lord Templeman constructed his proprietary remedy is perhaps not straightforward. It accords, however, with the underlying theme of this book that equity acts in personam against the defendant, even when awarding a proprietary remedy.¹⁴³ Lord Templeman held that equity looks upon as done that which ought to have been done (which is one of the core equitable principles discussed in Chapter 1) and that Reid should have given the bribes to his employer at the moment they were received: therefore, because equity looks upon as done that which ought to have been done, equity would deem that the bribes had actually been given to the employers and thereby the employers would acquire an equitable proprietary interest in the bribes. This equitable proprietary interest takes the form of a constructive trust. This knotty train of thought requires some careful deconstruction. Lord Templeman started from the premise that equity acts in personam. The defendant had acted unconscionably in accepting the bribe in breach of his fiduciary duty. In consequence of that breach of duty, it was held that the bribe should have been deemed to pass to the beneficiary of the fiduciary power at the instant when it was received by the wrongdoer. Given that equity considers as done that which ought to have been done, it was held that the bribe should have been considered to have been the property of the beneficiary from the moment of its receipt. The means by which title passes to the beneficiary in equity in such circumstances is a proprietary constructive trust. As such, the bribe, any property acquired with the bribe and any profit derived from such property fell to be considered as the property of the person wronged by virtue of being held for that person's benefit on constructive trust.¹⁴⁴ In this circuitous way, Lord Templeman justified the imposition of a proprietary remedy in *Reid*¹⁴⁵ as opposed to the personal claim upheld in Lister v Stubbs.¹⁴⁶ It has been held latterly 141 By virtue of the respondent having been Director of Public Prosecutions in Hong Kong and having taken bribes from criminals not to prosecute them.

142 Jaffey, 2000.

143 See section 1.1 of this book.

144 This approach has been followed in Corporacion Nacional Del Cobre De Chile v Interglobal Inc (2003) 5 ITELR 744, [2002] CILR 298. See also Sumitomo Bank v Thahir [1993] 1 SLR 735.

145 [1994] 1 AC 324, [1994] 1 All ER 1.

146 (1890) 45 Ch D 1.

that the reason for the constructive trust in Reid was that it would have been ‘as a fiduciary unconscionable for him to retain the benefit of it’;¹⁴⁷ even though that was not the precise rationale used by Lord Templeman in the passage quoted above, it was used by his Lordship elsewhere in his judgment.

The detail of Lord Templeman’s judgment in Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid

What emerges from much of the argument against the existence of a constructive trust is that it is based on prevented insolvencies being administered in such a way that harms some creditors (because a constructive trust put some of the insolvent person’s property beyond the reach of the unsecured creditors) and that there is only a partial analysis of the authorities. By contrast, Lord Templeman conducted a thorough analysis of the competing authorities and identified why he supported some and not others. It is important to note that he did not simply exercise unprincipled discretion in this area. Instead, he worked his way through the authorities and identified a slew of cases which supported the finding of a proprietary constructive trust in general terms. So, Keech v Sandford,¹⁴⁸ Fawcett v Whitehouse,¹⁴⁹ and *Sugden v Crosland*¹⁵⁰ (all of which pre-dated Lister v Stubbs) all held that a fiduciary was obliged to act for his principal, that that fiduciary was not permitted to allow any conflict of interest, and that that fiduciary was therefore required to hold any profit which he took for himself as part of the trust fund. In Lord Templeman’s chronological approach to the case law, several other cases were cited which come to the same conclusion.

This survey culminated in the House of Lords decision in *Boardman v Phipps*¹⁵¹ which held that any profit taken in a situation in which there is a conflict of interest (not necessarily involving misuse of the trust property itself) must be held on constructive trust. That case in itself had relied on a line of authority in the House of Lords from Keech v Sandford through *Bray v Ford*¹⁵² and Regal v Gulliver,¹⁵³ all of which had identified the cornerstone of this area of law as being the avoidance of any conflict of interest by a fiduciary as giving rise to a constructive trust. So, there are four House of Lords authorities asserting this as a general principle which gives rise to a constructive trust; the cases on bribes which went the other way (like Lister v Stubbs) were therefore considered to be anomalous exceptions. There are also decisions like that of Lord Jessel MR in *Re Caerphilly Colliery Co, Pearson’s Case*¹⁵⁴ (‘the most distinguished equity judge of his generation’) which held, in Lord Templeman’s summary, that the recipient of a bribe holds both the bribe and the property representing the bribe on constructive trust.

Lord Templeman also addressed cases which went against him. There is nothing less surprising in English law than that whenever one asserts a proposition then there will be cases decided the other way. So, in relation to *Tyrrell v Bank of London*¹⁵⁵ the court is 147 Yugraneft v Abramovich [2008] EWHC 2613 (Comm), [2008] All ER (Comm) 299, para [373], per Clarke J.

148 (1726) Cas temp King 61, [1558–1774] All ER Rep 230.

149 (1829) 1 Russ & M 132, 39 ER 51.

150 (1856) 3 Sm & G 192, 65 ER 620.

151 [1967] 2 AC 46.

152 [1896] AC 44.

153 [1942] 1 All ER 378.

154 (1877) 5 Ch D 336.

155 (1862) 10 HL Cas 26, 11 ER 934.

criticised for giving no reasons nor any authority for their observations. Admittedly, the account of *Metropolitan Bank v Heiron*¹⁵⁶ is presented with greater rhetoric than is entirely helpful: Lord Templeman tells us that it was decided ‘perilously close to the long vacation without citation of the relevant authorities’, and therefore can be treated with slightly less authority. That judgment considered that a bribe created an equitable debt but not a proprietary right. However, Brett LJ did find that a proprietary right could be declared by the court: the precise genesis of that property right puzzled Lord Templeman, unless it is in the form of a constructive trust.

So, the judgment of Lord Templeman was founded on a lengthy review of the authorities. That review of the authorities is partial in that his Lordship clearly preferred one approach to the other approach but it is nevertheless a review of the authorities. It should also be borne in mind that the other members of the Privy Council (all of whom agreed with Lord Templeman) included giants of the chancery law scene such as Lord Goff. Moreover, there is also the important moral base for the judgment. Not only does Lord Templeman identify the ‘evil’ involved in bribery but he also identified that

‘Equity however which acts *in personam*¹⁵⁷ insists that it is unconscionable for a fiduciary to obtain and retain a benefit in breach of duty.’¹⁵⁸

Therefore, unconscionability is at the heart of this judgment as one would expect from the traditional equitable language. Lord Templeman did have an explanation which justified the finding of a proprietary right which is also based on ancient equitable principle: because equity looks upon as done that which ought to have been done, when the defendant received the bribe he should have handed it over to his principal, and therefore equity will treat him as having handed the bribe over such that an equitable property right must be deemed to have passed in that bribe and consequently over any property subsequently acquired with that bribe.

Therefore, Lord Templeman based his judgment both on a moral base, and on a property law justification for finding the constructive trust which was supported by his review of the authorities. In that sense, Lord Templeman’s judgment was a classic of the equitable canon in that it married a deontological use of moral principles with a consequentialist analysis of the existing authorities. By contrast, the decision in Lister v Stubbs was located within a welter of competing authority with which it did not deal adequately.

Identifying people who will be fiduciaries

Whether or not a person will be considered to be a fiduciary will depend upon the context. There are identified categories of fiduciary office – trustee, company director, business partner and agent – in which such duties will always arise.¹⁵⁹ However, there are also other situations in which a person may be liable as a fiduciary in particular contexts. So, in Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid, the Director of Public Prosecutions was found to be a fiduciary in relation to the administration of justice in that territory, just like an army

156 (1880) 5 Ex D 319.

157 Meaning that it considers the situation of the individual defendant, in this context.

158 [1993] 1 All ER 1, 4.

159 See section 14.2 below.

sergeant assisting smugglers through army checkpoints by using his rank and uniform.¹⁶⁰ Neither category has previously been held to be a category of fiduciary office, but the misuse of their powers in particular circumstances rendered the defendant in each case a fiduciary. Within companies it is usually only the directors who will owe fiduciary duties – beyond their contract of employment – to the company. However, there may be circumstances in which less senior employees may be considered to be fiduciaries. For example, in circumstances in which a security guard received a bribe to disclose and effectively disarm the claimant's security arrangements to a gang of armed robbers, he was held to be constructive trustee of the bribe as a fiduciary.¹⁶¹ Ordinarily a security guard would not owe fiduciary duties to his employer because he does not occupy a role of sufficient seniority within a company. However, in relation to the security precautions taken by that company at its warehouses, a security guard would be held to be in a fiduciary capacity.¹⁶² The notion of fiduciary responsibility is considered in detail in Chapter 14.

A good illustration of the breadth of this doctrine is found in Reading v Attorney-General,¹⁶³ which was a case concerning a British Army sergeant stationed in Cairo who received payments to ride in uniform in civilian lorries carrying contraband so that those lorries would not be stopped at army checkpoints. It was held by the Court of Appeal that the sergeant occupied a fiduciary position in relation to the Crown in respect of the misuse of his uniform and in respect of his position as a soldier in the British Army. Therefore, it was held that any money paid to him for riding in the lorry in breach of his fiduciary duty was held on constructive trust for the Crown by way of an account of his profits. Equally, in context, a solicitor advising clients as to their legal affairs will be a fiduciary and will be a trustee de son tort if she interferes with the running of a trust.¹⁶⁴

The nature of the constructive trust in Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid

What is remarkable about the decision in Reid is that there is no requirement of any pre-existing proprietary right in the claimant for the establishment of a constructive trust. Instead it is the fiduciary relationship of good faith which means that the defendant is deemed to hold any property received in breach of that duty as a constructive trustee. In Reid itself, it is not difficult to see why on policy grounds the court would wish to impose a constructive trust so as to recover the proceeds of his unlawful act from the defendant, although it is notable that the position of Director of Public Prosecutions¹⁶⁵ and of an army sergeant¹⁶⁶ do not ordinarily fall within the ambit of fiduciary relationships. In both of these contexts, it is difficult to identify the beneficiaries of these trusts other than 'the state' or 'the Crown'.¹⁶⁷ Instead, the principles underpinning these decisions are moral principles.

160 Reading v Attorney-General [1951] 1 All ER 617.

161 Brinks v Abu-Saleh (No 3) [1996] CLC 133.

162 Ibid.

163 [1951] 1 All ER 617.

164 Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46.

165 Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324, [1994] 1 All ER 1. See generally in this regard early discussions such as Sealy, 1962; Jones, 1968, and more recently Worthington, 1999:2.

166 Reading v Attorney-General [1951] 1 All ER 617.

167 Although in Petrotrade Inc v Smith [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep 486, the claimant was not able to impose a constructive trust on employees of a shipping agent who had paid bribes to a port authority to obtain the post of port agents, so causing the claimant loss. The constructive trust was not imposed, in effect, because no fiduciary relationship existed between the parties.

The super-added personal liability to account for any diminution in the value of the property

A second very important issue arises from the judgment in Reid. Lord Templeman held that the defendant's liability does not stop with holding the bribe and any property bought with it on constructive trust, but also includes a liability to make good any diminution in the value of those investments from the constructive trustee's own pocket. By holding that the fiduciary is obliged not only to hold the bribes or any substitute property on constructive trust, but also to account to the beneficiaries for any diminution in the value of those investments, the decision in Attorney-General v Reid reaches far beyond the simple rules of property law. The additional personal liability to account which is imposed on the malfeasant fiduciary places this particular claim in the category of a wrong for which the defendant is liable to account to the claimant akin to a claim for breach of trust. As considered below in Chapter 18, trustees are liable not only to replace trust property when they commit a breach of trust, but also to account personally to the beneficiaries for any further, outstanding loss. This constructive trust has been explained in terms of requiring the fiduciary to avoid all conflicts between her personal interests and her fiduciary responsibilities,¹⁶⁸ just as the constructive trust considered below in relation to fiduciaries earning unauthorised profits operates.¹⁶⁹ It is certainly concerned with accounting for an equitable wrong.

Examples of the Reid constructive trust in operation

The approach of the Privy Council in *Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid*¹⁷⁰ has been applied in a number of High Court cases.¹⁷¹ Two of those cases are considered here. First, in Tesco Stores v Pook,¹⁷² Mr Pook had tendered invoices in an aggregate amount of about £500,000 for services which had not in fact been rendered. Out of these amounts, the case concerned a total sum of £323,749 which had allegedly been paid as a bribe indirectly to Pook, who had been appointed as a manager in Tesco's e-commerce business in South Korea, by third parties. Pook claimed that the money had been paid to him as a loan to help him start up in business. It was held by Peter Smith J that these payments should be taken to have been a bribe because they were documented by the payer by means of false invoices and a fraudulent VAT claim, rather than as an ordinary loan. His Lordship applied the decision in *Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid*¹⁷³ to the effect that this bribe should be held on constructive trust.¹⁷⁴ He approved the idea both that the bribe is held on constructive trust

168 Millett, 1993, 20.

169 See para 12.5.2 below.

170 [1994] 1 AC 324, [1994] 1 All ER 1.

171 Ocular Sciences Ltd v Aspect Vision Care Ltd [1997] RPC 289; Fyffes Group Ltd v Templeman [2000] 2 Lloyd's Rep 643 (where this case was obiter); Dubai Aluminium Company Ltd v Alawi [2002] EWHC 2051 (Comm); Tesco Stores Ltd v Pook [2003] EWHC 823 (Ch); Daraydan Holdings Ltd v Solland International Ltd [2004] EWHC 622 (Ch). In relation to interlocutory relief, such as Mareva injunctions, the Lister v Stubbs approach has also been displaced in favour of the approach in Attorney-General v Reid: Mercedes Benz AG v Leiduck [1996] AC 284, 300. This approach has not been followed in Attorney-General v Blake [1997] Ch 84, 96, per Sir Richard Scott VC; Halifax Building Society v Thomas [1996] Ch 217, 229, preferring the approach in Lister v Stubbs.

172 [2003] EWHC 823 (Ch).

173 [1994] 1 AC 324, [1994] 1 All ER 1.

174 [2003] EWHC 823 (Ch), paras [45] and [69].

and also that when there is any decrease in the value of any property acquired with the bribe then the fiduciary 'is required to make up the difference'.¹⁷⁵ On these facts, because the bribe had been made by means of a false invoice together with a fraudulent claim for recovery of VAT (that is, a claim for recovery of VAT which had purportedly been paid under this false invoice for a service rendered), it was held that the value of the bribe which should be accounted for was the amount of the invoice falsely rendered together with the VAT amount. Thus, any value received as part of the transaction comprising the bribe will be deemed to be held on constructive trust.

Secondly, in Daraydan Holdings Ltd v Solland International Ltd,¹⁷⁶ a married couple, the Sollands, who were directors of a company which was involved in the refurbishment of property in London, connived in the appropriation of a secret commission which was procured by arbitrarily increasing the budget for a refurbishment project by 10% and then diverting that extra 10% so as to pay 'kickbacks'¹⁷⁷ to Khalid. It was found as a fact that Khalid was employed by the person who ultimately controlled a group of organisations which included the company, and thus was acting as a fiduciary. The secret commission, or 'kickback', of 10% was held to have been equivalent to a bribe in this case.¹⁷⁸ Lawrence Collins J began his judgment by quoting that sentence from Lord Templeman in Reid to the effect that '[b]ribery is an evil practice which threatens the foundations of any civilised society'.¹⁷⁹ It was held that an agent ought not to put himself into a situation in which his duty and his personal interest conflict. Thus, the constructive trust here was based on avoidance of conflict of interest¹⁸⁰ as well as the need to deal with the 'evil practice' of bribery. It was explained that the constructive trust in this case was further justified because the bribes were drawn from the claimant's property (being the payments for the refurbishment) and also on the basis that the bribes were paid as part of a fraudulent misrepresentation exercised by the Sollands. It was held further that where, as on these facts, a bribe has been paid here by an employee (the Sollands) to a third party (Khalid), and when that third party is acting in a fiduciary capacity, then both parties are required to account jointly and severally for the receipt of that bribe.¹⁸¹ Consequently, the bribe was deemed to have been held on constructive trust, just as in Reid.

Secret commissions

There are occasions on which the principles relating to 'bribes' are treated together with 'secret commissions'. A secret commission is in many cases synonymous with a bribe, in

175 Ibid, para [69].

176 [2004] EWHC 622 (Ch), [2004] 3 WLR 1106; [2005] Ch 1.

177 As described in evidence: [2004] EWHC 622 (Ch), [2004] 3 WLR 1106, para [63].

178 It was found that the employee, Solland, was assisting the agent, Khalid, by permitting him to withhold a 10% secret commission. Khalid was deemed to be a fiduciary on the basis that his contractual link to the organisation was taken to have rendered him an employee of that organisation: [2004] EWHC 622 (Ch), [2004] 3 WLR 1106, para [74]. The defence to the bribe rested in part on an assertion that the bribe was a necessary inducement which had to be paid to third parties as part of the creation of the development contracts.

179 [1994] 1 AC 324, 330.

180 Considered below in section 12.5 in relation to Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46, the liability for fiduciaries earning unauthorised profits.

181 [2004] EWHC 622 (Ch), [2004] 3 WLR 1106, para [54].

that a person is in receipt of money covertly. Whereas Lord Templeman suggested that an undisclosed commission would not necessarily be treated in the same way as a bribe, it is not always clear what is meant by a 'commission' in this context because the judges have not defined their terms. A commission like the 'kickback' in Daraydan v Solland which is undisclosed to the beneficiary of the fiduciary arrangement was found to be equivalent to a bribe. By contrast, Lord Templeman suggested in Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid that an undisclosed commission would not necessarily be treated in the same way as a bribe. It is suggested that a secret commission is a payment which is made to a fiduciary unbeknownst to its principal which is usually made by a person. There have been two approaches in the cases.

The older cases took the view that secret commissions occupied a different category. That approach seemed to be followed by the Court of Appeal in Imageview Management Ltd v Jack,¹⁸² in which it was held that an agent would be required to account for profits taken from secret commissions on the basis set out in the older cases.¹⁸³ In that case a footballer's agent had taken a commission directly from the club for which his principal, a goalkeeper, had signed over-and-above his fee from his principal and without disclosing the commission to his principal. It was held that the agent's commission should be forfeited by the agent accounting to his principal for the amount of the commission. The core principle was that set out in Boston Deep Sea Fishing and Ice Co v Ansell where Bowen LJ held as follows:¹⁸⁴

Now, there can be no question that an agent employed by a principal or master to do business with another, who, unknown to that principal or master, takes from that other person a profit arising out of the business which he is employed to transact, is doing a wrongful act inconsistent with his duty towards his master, and the continuance of confidence between them. He does the wrongful act whether such profit be given to him in return for services which he actually performs for the third party, or whether it be given to him for his supposed influence, or whether it be given to him on any other ground at all; if it is a profit which arises out of the transaction, it belongs to his master, and the agent or servant has no right to take it, or keep it, or bargain for it, or to receive without bargain, unless his master knows it.

This approach can be understood in line with Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid in that the principal is deemed to acquire ownership of the commission from the moment of its receipt.¹⁸⁵

It is clear that agents acting for their principals must avoid conflicts of interest in the form of undisclosed commissions. Agents acting for their clients must avoid conflicts of interest in the form of undisclosed commissions. So, in Hurstanger Ltd v Wilson, where an agent was

182 [2009] Bus LR 1034.

183 Boston Deep Sea Fishing and Ice Co v Ansell (1888) 39 Ch D 339, CA; Andrews v Ramsay & Co [1903] 2 KB 635, DC; Rhodes v Macalister (1923) 29 Com Cas 19, CA.

184 (1888) 39 Ch D 339, 363.

185 Applied in Imageview Management Ltd v Jack [2009] Bus LR 1034 (although doubting the usefulness of the concept of fraud in this context) without citing Att-Gen v Reid but relying in part on Boardman v Phipps.

retained to act as broker for a cohabiting couple in relation to the mortgage over their home, he was acting as a fiduciary in that context and would be treated as having acted on a conflict of interest where he acquired a mortgage for the couple based in part on the commission which he stood to earn from that mortgage.¹⁸⁶ Therefore, he would be required to account for that commission and for any profits derived from that commission. The onus was on the agent to make full disclosure of the commission which he stood to earn to the customer. In this instance an award of equitable compensation was considered sufficient to right the agent's breach of fiduciary duty. Usually the purpose of such a transaction would be to induce the recipient to act in a corrupt manner. An example of patterns of secret commissions are set out in Pakistan v Zadari,¹⁸⁷ a case which – at a purely interlocutory stage – relates to allegations that unauthorised payments were made at the behest of the husband of a former Prime Minister of Pakistan through a series of companies to acquire a 350-acre estate in Surrey and in connection with a variety of other transactions. While it was not necessary to dispose of the facts at this interlocutory stage in the proceedings, in the event that it could be proved that the estate was acquired with secret commissions or bribes then Lawrence Collins J indicated that that estate would be held on constructive trust for the state of Pakistan.

In FHR European Ventures LLP v Mankarious,¹⁸⁸ the second defendant acted as the claimant's agent in the sale of a hotel business under a brokerage agreement. In the course of carrying out these duties, the second defendant accepted a secret commission to effect a sale to the first defendant. This had the effect of robbing the claimant of the chance of obtaining a better price. It was held that the brokerage agreement, which was found to be part of a larger contractual arrangement, had the effect that the opportunity which should have been open to the claimant was taken by the defendants. Consequently, the Court of Appeal held that the benefit of that contract (and thus the commission which had been taken in frustration of that opportunity) was to be held on constructive trust for the claimant. That a commercial opportunity is taken to be property which belongs to a company or another commercial entity has long been accepted in equity in cases like Bhullar v Bhullar,¹⁸⁹ as discussed in section 12.5.2 below. The court was careful not to appear to overrule the decision in Sinclair v Versailles, although the approach of the judges could not be considered to have been in favour. Instead, their lordships called on the Supreme Court to rule on the various competing lines of authority.

The approach in Sinclair Investment v Versailles Trading

The unfortunate decision of the Court of Appeal in *Sinclair Investments (UK) Ltd v Versailles Trading Ltd*¹⁹⁰ has cast doubt on the Reid principle. There has been a long line of cases dealing with the failure of the Versailles Trading group which comprised companies set up 186 Hurstanger Ltd v Wilson [2007] EWCA Civ 299, [2007] 1 WLR 2351.

187 [2006] EWHC 2411 (Comm), [2006] All ER (D) 79 (Oct).

188 [2013] 3 WLR 466.

189 [2003] 2 BCLC 241.

190 [2011] 3 WLR 1153.

by Carl Cushnie which were intended to operate a fraudulent Ponzi scheme.¹⁹¹ In essence, the Versailles companies took investments from ‘traders’ and borrowed huge amounts of money from banks on the promise that those borrowings would be invested in a commercial activity known as ‘factoring’ goods.¹⁹² In truth, the borrowed moneys were simply passed around in complex circles – a process known as ‘cross-firing’ – so as to make it appear that the companies were engaging in a large number of transactions, when in truth the companies did nothing.¹⁹³ As a result, when the fraud was uncovered, Cushnie and others were convicted of criminal offences. This particular case involved a claim over shares which had been bought through the scheme by Cushnie, then sold, and the proceeds used to buy a valuable house in Kensington. In essence, the claimant wanted to establish a proprietary constructive trust over the Kensington house. In the meantime, the companies and people involved in the scheme were insolvent and therefore the counter-argument was put that there should not be any such proprietary rights over that Kensington house so that it could be divided up among the unsecured creditors in the various insolvencies. The Court of Appeal held, inter alia, that there should not be such a constructive trust in this case.¹⁹⁴ In essence the reason for that decision was to maximise the assets available to the unsecured creditors in general, but the rationale used for that decision is important in relation to the Reid principle.

The Court of Appeal drew the following important distinction. On the one hand, there will be a constructive trust if the fiduciary had misused trust property so as to earn personal profits. For example, if the fiduciary used a house which was held on trust to earn a rental income for himself, then those rents would be held on constructive trust for the beneficiaries of that trust. On the other hand, however, if the fiduciary simply misused his office so as to earn a profit for himself – for example, by taking a bribe to allocate business to the person paying the bribe instead of other suppliers – then the fiduciary would only be liable to account to the beneficiaries for an amount of money equal to the bribe. There is therefore a distinction between the misuse of a false fiduciary’s office and the misuse of trust property.

Lord Neuberger presented three arguments in his judgment for not following Reid, and (it is suggested) not one of them is convincing in itself. First, it is said that the Court of Appeal should follow the decisions of previous Courts of Appeal as opposed to decisions of the Privy Council – and that instead it should be left to the Supreme Court to overrule those 191 A Ponzi scheme is a scheme in which a shyster takes investments from investors, pools those investments, and then pays the investors a portion of their capital investment back periodically so as to make it appear that they have made a profit on their investment, while in the meantime living off the rest of the capital themselves. Such a scheme needs a constant flow of new investors to keep the scheme’s capital high. Such schemes fail when no new investors can be found or when too many of the investors take their capital back at once. The best-known example of such a scheme in recent times was the Madoff organisation which collapsed in the wake of the 2008 financial crisis in what was dubbed a ‘$60 billion Ponzi scheme’ in the Press.

192 In essence, buying and selling debts, or packaging lots of rights to receive money together and selling those debts off as a package.

193 In JK Galbraith’s seminal book The Great Crash 1929, 1955, Prof Galbraith described how investment institutions made themselves appear to be larger than they were by using ‘leverage’, which meant the same small initial loan was invested back and forth several times by companies in the same group so as to make it appear that those companies had a huge amount of capital. Versailles Trading did the same thing in effect through cross-firing payments between companies. This also made it appear that the company was engaged in lots of trading activity, just as the Madoff enterprises had done.

194 The approach in Sinclair v Versailles Trading was followed in Cadogan Petroleum plc v Tolly [2011] EWHC 2286 by Newey J; and remarks as to the extent of fiduciary duties were recognised in Horn v Commercial Acceptances Ltd [2011] EWHC 1757 (Ch) by Smith J.

Court of Appeal judgments if it so chooses. This means that in this case decisions which were over one hundred years old were to be preferred to the judgments of House of Lords judges sitting only fifteen years previously in the Privy Council. This ignoring of decisions of the Privy Council as a matter of law is anachronistic. Second, it was said that there is a greater weight of journal literature in favour of Lister v Stubbs than Reid. However, Lord Neuberger does not consider the arguments in any of those articles; instead his Lordship simply lists the number of them. He also noted that the trusts law textbooks are generally in agreement with the decision in Reid (as this textbook has always been) and failed to note two things: first, textbook writers take a view of the entire topic of trusts law whereas, secondly, many journal articles are written by academics seeking deliberately to take a contrarian point of view in relation to the decided cases so as to make it more likely that their article will be published. It is easier for an academic to criticise a judgment in an article than to support it.

Third, and the only substantive argument, Lord Neuberger considered it significant that if a proprietary constructive trust were imposed in favour of the claimant then the assets which were held on trust would not be available to be distributed among the other creditors. This is the heart of the judgment and the real reason for it. The point is simple. If a person takes a bribe in spite of the fiduciary duties which it owes to a beneficiary, and if that bribe and the profits earned with that bribe are held on constructive trust for that beneficiary, then those profits are not to be available to be distributed among the unsecured creditors of that person if they go into insolvency. What Lord Neuberger prefers is that the amount of the bribe should be considered to be a debt, akin to Lister v Stubbs, so that the claimant becomes an unsecured creditor and so that the profits generally form part of the insolvent person's estate so that they can be distributed pari passu among the unsecured creditors. Instead, it was held that a claimant could only claim a proprietary interest in a bribe if that bribe had involved property which had previously been held on trust by the insolvent person for the claimant. Therefore, the Reid constructive trust would only work if there had been a pre-existing trust and if the bribe or similar payment involved property held on that pre-existing trust.

The situation was different in Reid because in Reid the defendant was not insolvent and therefore there were no insolvency creditors seeking access to assets so as to meet their claims; whereas in Sinclair the opposite is true. The fact of insolvency is therefore making the legal principle here.¹⁹⁵ It is suggested that it would be more satisfactory to establish the most appropriate equitable principle and then to consider how to deal with cases of insolvency as an exception to that general rule. In essence, there is a sense that the Court of Appeal in Sinclair thinks that the imposition of the constructive trust is too tenuous to justify taking valuable assets (such as a property in Kensington) out of the insolvent person's estate so as to ring-fence for the purposes of this constructive trust.

The nub of the decision in *Sinclair Investments (UK) Ltd v Versailles Trade Finance Ltd*¹⁹⁶ was set out in the judgment of Lord Neuberger MR where his Lordship held that:¹⁹⁷

195 One must be careful with this argument: it is the basis of the judgment in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington [1996] AC 669 in rejecting the argument posited by Professor Birks that resulting trusts should operate so as to effect restitution of payments made under a mistake.

196 [2011] EWCA Civ 347, [2011] 3 WLR 1151. The approach in Sinclair v Versailles Trading was followed in Cadogan Petroleum plc v Tolly [2011] EWHC 2286 by Newey J; and remarks in Sinclair as to the extent of fiduciary duties were recognised in Horn v Commercial Acceptances Ltd [2011] EWHC 1757 (Ch) by Smith J.

197 [2011] EWCA Civ 347, [2011] 3 WLR 1151, at [80].

[I]t seems to me that there is a real case for saying that the decision in Reid . . . is unsound. In cases where a fiduciary takes for himself an asset which, if he chose to take, he was under a duty to take for the beneficiary, it is easy to see why the asset should be treated as the property of the beneficiary. However, a bribe paid to a fiduciary could not possibly be said to be an asset which the fiduciary was under a duty to take for the beneficiary. There can thus be said to be a fundamental distinction between (i) a fiduciary enriching himself by depriving a claimant of an asset and (ii) a fiduciary enriching himself by doing a wrong to the claimant. Having said that, I can see a real policy reason in its favour (if equitable accounting is not available), but the fact that it may not accord with principle is obviously a good reason for not following it in preference to decisions of this court.

Therefore, Lord Neuberger held that if the defendant had used trust property to acquire the bribe, then that would create a constructive trust; whereas if the defendant had merely misused her fiduciary office then that would create a purely personal obligation to account for the amount of the bribe without a constructive trust. This has the effect that if the fiduciary invests that bribe successfully then she is able to keep the profits for herself because she is not necessarily obliged to hold those profits on constructive trust but rather, under Lister v Stubbs, only to account for the cash value of the bribe to the beneficiary. This allows fiduciaries to keep the fruits of their unconscionable actions, which is clearly inequitable. The common law is simply not equipped to punish the malfeasing fiduciary because, as Lister v Stubbs shows, the bribe is treated simply as a debt to be paid to the beneficiary. The judgment of Lord Templeman in Reid, however, demonstrates that classical equitable principles based on constructive trust are ideally suited to this role of taking the bribe from the wrongdoing fiduciary and of taking a proprietary right in any profits derived from that bribe. The judgment of the Court of Appeal should be disappplied in the future because it is bad in principle.

There are several other difficulties with Lord Neuberger's judgment. First, it is unclear which part of this transaction constitutes a bribe, and why Reid needs to be considered at all. In future, it should be considered that these remarks were obiter dicta in relation to Reid. It is settled authority that Boardman v Phipps, considered below, established a principle that a constructive trust is imposed in cases of conflicts of interest by a fiduciary, as was the case here, and therefore the conclusion which is based on a merely partial consideration of the authorities by Lord Neuberger should be ignored in the future. Second, several High Court cases have followed Reid, but none of those reasoned judgments was considered by the Court of Appeal. Third, one of the more objectionable facets of Lord Neuberger's judgment is that he did not consider the most important part of Lord Templeman's speech in which he identified the reason for imposing a constructive trust. In essence the argument advanced by Lord Templeman was that if there were an express trust in place, then there would be no doubt that the bribe and any profits would also be held on the terms of that trust, and thus be beyond the reach of any unsecured creditors. Therefore, the only argument is whether or not a constructive trust could be imposed in these circumstances where there was no such express trust. To that, Lord Templeman would say that a constructive trust is appropriate here because the receipt of the bribe was wrong, and therefore because equity requires that the fiduciary must account for any unauthorised payment received in the course of her duties then that profit should be deemed to have been accounted for by means of a constructive trust. On that basis, between solvent parties, the constructive trust is unobjectionable. Under trusts law there should be a proprietary constructive trust. Therefore, as part of trusts law the same analysis should apply between parties one of whom is insolvent. The only issue is whether as part of insolvency law there should be a different analysis. This argument is objected to in Lister v Stubbs but the reasons for that disagreement are not set out.

In truth, this is the longest-running argument in English law between commercial lawyers – who generally want insolvencies to be played out in an orderly way so that unsecured creditors receive the maximum volume of assets to meet their claims against the insolvent person – and property lawyers – who typically want to operate property concepts the same in relation to solvent and insolvent parties. For commercial lawyers, insolvency is the context which trumps all other concerns. There are no right or wrong answers, just polarised points of view. Do we protect property rights created under the general principles of trusts law, as in Reid, or do we limit the means by which property rights can be acquired so as to increase slightly the pool of assets available to the unsecured creditors? What is missing from this debate is any meaningful research into the volume of assets which would be made available to the unsecured creditors as a proportion of their total claims. In large-scale frauds as in Sinclair Investment v Versailles Trading, or the similar but much larger Madoff collapse, it is questionable whether the Court of Appeal disturbing well-established trusts law will actually have a meaningful effect on the position of those unsecured creditors in cash terms.

12.4.2 The academic commentary after Sinclair v Versailles

The argument for Lister v Stubbs

The principal argument which has been presented in favour of the decision in Lister v Stubbs in the recent academic literature is predicated on the need to administer insolvencies in such a way that some creditors do not acquire a benefit at the expense of other creditors. So, Prof Roy Goode,¹⁹⁸ who writes extensively on insolvency law, is concerned that the bribe should simply be an amount of money which its recipient owes to the beneficiary of its fiduciary duties. The argument is this: if Arthur bribes Bernard so that Bernard will sell a painting which Bernard holds on trust for Catherine at a very low price, then Goode would argue that the bribe never belonged to Catherine, and so there is no good reason why Catherine should be said to have an ownership right over it. Instead, if Bernard goes into insolvency then there will be other people who are owed money by Bernard who would lose out if some of Bernard's property is given to Catherine specifically rather than being divided up among them. Prof Graham Virgo¹⁹⁹ makes a similar argument.

Of course, this raises the question 'what if there is no insolvency?' In the example given above, if Bernard does not go into insolvency, but if Bernard had made profits for himself by investing the bribe in shares which increased in value, then Bernard would be able to keep the profits from his illegal activity. This is clearly contrary to the underlying principles of equity. Moreover, the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 were created precisely to empower the authorities to recover 'criminal property' which had been acquired by criminals from their activities: that is, the rest of our law is developing precisely so as to prevent people who 198 R Goode, 'Proprietary liability for secret profits – a reply' (2011) 127 LQR 493. The reply is to the article by Hayton J below.

199 G Virgo, 'Profits obtained in breach of fiduciary duty: personal or proprietary claim?' (2011) 70 CLJ 502.

indulge in illegal activities from keeping any profits from their misbehaviour. For the purposes of insolvency law, there should simply be a legislative carve-out for insolvent recipients of property in situations such as bribes (just as there is a carve-out under s 423 of the Insolvency Act 1986 which prevents sales at an under-value and so forth transferring property beyond the reach of insolvency creditors). However, there is no need to allow insolvency law to prevent the imposition of a perfectly principled constructive trust in other circumstances.

The arguments of the equity traditionalists

The equity traditionalists have resisted the Sinclair decision. For example, Hayton J²⁰⁰ (formerly Prof Hayton, author of Underhill and Hayton on Trusts and Trustees) and Sir Peter Millett²⁰¹ (formerly Lord Millett) have both written articles in support of the approach in Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid. Hayton identified a link between the bribe and a property right in the old principle that a trustee is bound to invest on behalf of the trust and therefore that when the trustee took a bribe and invested it then the trustee should be deemed to have made that investment on behalf of the trust.²⁰² As Kekewich J put it, the court ‘treats the trustee as having received such a bribe not on his own behalf but on behalf of and as agent for the trust’.²⁰³

Hayton criticised the distinction that was made by Lord Neuberger in Sinclair v Versailles ‘between profit made from exploitation of property and profit made from exploitation of office’ whereby ‘a proprietary remedy [is made] available in the former instance but not the latter’.²⁰⁴ As Hayton pointed out, the use of the office and of trust ‘property’ may overlap in many circumstances. For example, in Reading v Att-Gen, when the army Sergeant used his uniform to help smugglers to pass contraband through an army checkpoint, then that uniform was army property while at the same time the officer’s rank of Sergeant was a part of his office. Therefore, it will not always be possible to know whether it is office or the property which is being exploited.

Sir Peter Millett (formerly Lord Millett) took a different approach by arguing with refreshing directness that the Court of Appeal decision in Sinclair v Versailles was ‘incorrect’.²⁰⁵ He also argued that:

The duty of the trustee is to serve the interest of the principal to the exclusion of his own interest. A fiduciary who keeps a profit for himself abuses the trust and confidence placed in him by the principal. He is bound to hand it over to his principal the moment he receives it. Equity’s response to a breach of this duty is to enforce the duty by means of the constructive trust.

200 D Hayton, ‘The extent of equitable remedies: Privy Council versus Court of Appeal’ (2012) 33 Company Lawyer 161.

201 P Millett, ‘Bribes and secret commissions again’ (2012) 71 CLJ 583.

202 This point was made originally by P Millett, ‘Bribes and secret commissions’ [1993] Restitution Law Review 7, 20.

203 [1896] 1 Ch 71, 77.

204 D Hayton, op cit, 163.

205 P Millett, ‘Bribes and secret commissions again’ (2012) 71 CLJ 583. This quotation, which summarises the pith of Millett’s excellent article, is taken from the Abstract.

This approach follows the logic of Lord Templeman's judgment as to the passage of property rights from the false fiduciary to the beneficiaries. However, that misses some of the spirit of Lord Templeman's judgment. Hayton and Millett both approach this issue by identifying ways in which property law rights can justifiably be found when bribes are paid. By contrast, Lord Templeman also addresses the immorality of this situation head-on. For Lord Templeman, the constructive trust is imposed because of the 'evil' which is bound up in the taking of bribes and the harm which is done to civilised societies as a result.

There are three approaches to bribes. First, that constructive trusts should be seen as a means of avoiding insolvency, and therefore as being a bad thing. This is the approach taken by commercial lawyers like Prof Goode who see the risk of insolvency as being the most significant factor in cases of this sort. Second, that the law of trusts is a technical discipline which can establish a principled basis for a trust to be imposed over a 'false fiduciary' who misuses either their office or trust property. Third, that the law of trusts rests on a moral basis which in itself can justify the imposition of a constructive trust to prevent unconscionable benefit being taken from a breach of trust or a conflict between fiduciary duties and a fiduciary's personal interests.

Rejection of Sinclair v Versailles in the courts of other jurisdictions

The decision of the Federal Court of Australia in *Grimaldi v Chameleon Mining NL (No2)*²⁰⁶ rejected the analysis in Sinclair v Versailles in favour of the decision in Reid, albeit that the Australian constructive trust is a discretionary remedy unlike the English institutional trust. Importantly, the Federal Court of Australia found that Lister had placed an 'anomalous' limitation on the extent of the English constructive trust by which it meant that Reid is clearly in line with cases like Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington which impose constructive trusts whenever there has been unconscionable behaviour (like taking bribes or stealing property). Therefore, the decision in Sinclair v Versailles is out-of-line because it insists on not imposing a constructive trust, even though there has been unconscionable behaviour, for reasons that have nothing to do with equitable principles. Similarly, the Royal Court of Jersey held in *Federal Republic of Brazil and the Municipality of Sao Paulo v Durant International Corporation and Kildare Finance Limited*²⁰⁷ that kickbacks which had been paid during construction contracts (as in Daraydan v Solland above) should be held on constructive trust. The court expressed a preference for Reid over Sinclair v Versailles.

The obligations of company directors in relation to bribes under statute

The Companies Act 2006 introduced a statutory code of directors' general duties for the first time.²⁰⁸ The directors' duties in the Act are 'based on certain common law rules and equitable principles'²⁰⁹ and moreover those statutory duties 'shall be interpreted and applied in the same way as common law rules or equitable principles'.²¹⁰ The statutory duties are then

206 [2012] FCAFC 6.

207 [2012] JRC 211.

208 Companies Act 2006, s 170 et seq.

209 Companies Act 2006, s 170(3).

210 Companies Act 2006, s 170(4).

to be interpreted in the future in accordance with the development of those case law principles.²¹¹

Consequently, there are specific statutory rules relating to company directors, as distinct from trustees. Section 176(1) of the Companies Act 2006 provides (in relation to bribes set out in Reid) that ‘a director of a company must not accept a benefit from a third party conferred by reason of (a) his being a director, or (b) his doing (or not doing) anything as director’. In this context the term ‘third party’ ‘means a person other than the company, an associated body corporate or a person acting on behalf of the company or an associated body corporate’.²¹² Furthermore, under s 176(3) it is provided that ‘[b]enefits received by a director from a person by whom his services (as a director or otherwise) are provided to the company are not regarded as conferred by a third party’. Section 176(4) provides, however, that ‘this duty is not infringed if the acceptance of the benefit cannot reasonably be regarded as likely to give rise to a conflict of interest’. In effect, both of these provisions grant defences to directors for actions which otherwise attracted almost strict liability in equity. The authors of Lewin on Trusts have taken the view that the principle in Sinclair v Versailles Trading may apply only to company directors and not to trustees.²¹³

12.4.3 Profits from killing

It is a well-established principle of equity that killing another person will make the killer a constructive trustee of any property acquired as a result of that killing. This principle applies in general terms to all forms of killing which constitute a criminal offence.²¹⁴ In consequence, a person guilty of murder will fall within the principle,²¹⁵ as will a person convicted of inciting others to murder her husband²¹⁶ and (controversially, because it does not require intention) causing death by reckless driving.²¹⁷ It has been held that the principle will not cover involuntary manslaughter where there was no intention to kill,²¹⁸ or killing for which there is a defence such as insanity.²¹⁹ It is not necessarily a pre-requisite of the application of this principle that there have been criminal proceedings to establish the guilt of the defendant, provided that the criminal activity is proved at the civil proceedings to the criminal standard of proof.²²⁰

A murderer will not be entitled to take good title in property which is acquired solely by murdering its previous owner. Therefore, in the stuff of crime fiction, when the assassin despatches the victim so as to gain access to her personal wealth, equity will intervene and hold that the murderer holds any property so acquired as a constructive trustee for the

211 Companies Act 2006, s 170(4).

212 Companies Act 2006, s 176(2).

213 Lewin on Trusts, 2011, 2nd supplement, para 20–28A and B.

214 Gray v Barr [1971] 2 QB 554.

215 In the Estate of Crippen [1911] P 108.

216 Evans v Evans [1989] 1 FLR 351.

217 R v Seymour (Edward) [1983] AC 493.

218 Re K (Deceased) [1986] Ch 180; Re H (Deceased) [1990] 1 FLR 441.

219 Re Holgate (1971) unreported; Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964, s 1.

220 Re Sigsworth [1935] 1 Ch 89.

victim's estate. In general terms, a murderer, as with a thief (considered at para 12.4.3 below), will not acquire good title in property acquired by way of murder.²²¹

However, two problems emerge. First, what if the proceeds of crime are said to be passed to a third person? In the case of In the Estate of Crippen,²²² the infamous Dr Crippen had murdered his wife Cora Crippen.²²³ Crippen had intended to flee the country with his mistress but was, equally famously, captured on a boat while in flight by virtue of the comparatively new invention of wireless telegraphy when a description of Crippen was wired to the ship. The Crippen appeal itself considered the question whether or not property which would ordinarily have passed to Crippen as his wife's next-of-kin ought to pass to his mistress as Crippen's intended legatee. It was held that, given the context of the murder, no rights would transfer to the mistress because Crippen was deemed to hold them on constructive trust for his wife's estate and therefore could not pass them to his mistress beneficially.

The murderer becomes constructive trustee of all rights and interests in property which would have vested in him under the deceased's will,²²⁴ or even as next-of-kin in relation to a deceased who did not leave a will.²²⁵ The criminal will not acquire rights under any life assurance policy which has been taken out over the life of the deceased.²²⁶ Similarly, a murderer will not be entitled to take a beneficial interest under the widow's pension entitlements of his murdered wife.²²⁷

Secondly, what of the murderer who would have received that property in any event and only hastened its acquisition by killing its previous owner? The point is that the killer would not be acquiring property in which he would not otherwise have had any interest at all (as, for example, with the situation where a murderer steals property from the victim), but rather would be acquiring property in which he would have acquired that interest in the fullness of time in any event. Suppose, for example, that a joint tenant would have been entitled to an absolute interest on the victim's death in any event, but that she killed the victim so as to acquire that interest at an earlier date. It has been held that in such a situation, the killer would acquire the entire legal interest on the survivorship principle, but would hold that equitable interest on constructive trust for herself and for the representatives of the deceased as tenants in common.²²⁸ It has been suggested obiter that where a remainder beneficiary killed the life tenant, that remainder beneficiary should be prevented from taking the entire beneficial interest until such period as suggested by actuarial estimate would have been the time when the life tenant would probably have died.²²⁹ What emerges from *Crippen*²³⁰ is that 221 Oakley, Parker and Mellows, 1998, 356.

222 [1911] P 108.

223 In the published transcript of the trial it becomes clear that Cora had been unfaithful to her husband many times and he had been driven to extreme jealousy, so had decided to kill her and (hypocritically enough) to flee with his own mistress. It was said of Cora, by reference to her faithlessness, that she was a woman 'the path to whose affections was both easy of access and well-trodden'. Never was such an insult put so beautifully nor has a woman been so hypocritically treated by male commentators.

224 Re Sigsworth [1935] 1 Ch 89.

225 In the Estate of Crippen [1911] P 108.

226 Cleaver v Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association [1892] 1 QB 147.

227 R v Chief National Insurance Commissioner ex p Connor [1981] 1 QB 758.

228 Re K (Deceased) [1986] Fam 180.

229 Re Calloway [1956] Ch 559.

230 In the Estate of Crippen [1911] P 108.

the murderer will be deprived of such an interest where he would otherwise have taken that very interest if, for example, the victim had been knocked down accidentally on the day of the planned murder by a No 19 bus before the assassin had carried out his plan. Therefore, Crippen could not have argued that he would have received the interest later anyway if his wife had died of natural causes.²³¹

One issue which should be borne in mind is that the courts do not have any principled argument based on property law to justify this principle.²³² Suppose, for example, that the murderer could prove she would have received an interest anyway: an amoral code of property law would have to recognise the murderer's property rights. However, because equity has a moral base, it denies those property rights. The courts, it is suggested, are concerned with the punishment of the defendant. The punishment here is clearly different from that exerted by the criminal law in that there is no incarceration nor any formal power to fine the defendant. However, in the example of the defendant who acquired rights in property earlier than she would otherwise have been entitled, it is clear that if the court refuses to recognise property rights in the defendant which the defendant would otherwise have received, then the court is taking property from the defendant and so performing an act tantamount to punishment: after all, where is the practical distinction between ordering that a person is to be denied access to property which would otherwise have been hers, and fining her?

Exceptionally, in the case of Re K (Deceased), a wife, who had been the victim of domestic violence, picked up a shotgun during an attack on her by her husband which went off accidentally, killing him. Under the Forfeiture Act 1982, the court exercised its discretion to make an order not to oblige the wife to hold property received as a result of her husband's death on constructive trust. The underlying purpose of this principle, which has been accepted in Commonwealth jurisdictions, is that the criminal should simply not benefit from her wrong, as has been held in Canada,²³³ South Africa,²³⁴ Australia²³⁵ and New Zealand.²³⁶ But the case of *Re K*²³⁷ demonstrates that the killer may be excused from liability where the killing was not wholly intentional. The purpose of the constructive trust in these circumstances is to prevent a murderer – in the popular imagination perhaps the worst kind of criminal – from taking a benefit from that crime. This is, as said above, to do with retribution and not restitution.

12.4.4 Profits from theft

The further issue with reference to cases of theft is as follows: what are the obligations of a thief in relation to the original owner of the stolen property? The proper answer, drawing on Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid,²³⁸ would appear to be that the thief is liable as a constructive trustee to hold the property for the victim of the crime. That the thief holds the 231 Compare this approach with the amorality in Tribe v Tribe (in section 11.4.6) where an unconscionable intention did not prevent the finding of a resulting trust.

232 Youdan (1973) 89 LQR 235.

233 Schobelt v Barber [1967] 59 DLR (2d) 519 (Ont).

234 Re Barrowcliff [1927] SASR 147.

235 Rosmanis v Jurewitsch (1970) 70 SR (NSW) 407.

236 Re Pechar [1969] NZLR 574.

237 [1986] Fam 180.

238 [1994] 1 AC 324, [1994] 1 All ER 1.

stolen property on constructive trust has been upheld, albeit obiter, in England,²³⁹ and also in Australia²⁴⁰ and Canada.²⁴¹ In consequence, the victim of the crime acquires an equitable interest against the thief and therefore is able to establish a common law tracing claim to recover the stolen property²⁴² and an equitable tracing claim in any substitute property,²⁴³ as considered in Chapter 19.

It might be thought that this constructive trust resembles a resulting trust, but there is no suggestion that the victim of a theft could have voluntarily transferred any title to the thief: the trust must be one which is imposed by operation of law regardless of the wishes of the parties, in particular, contrary to the wishes of the thief. Indeed, it is suggested that the preferable explanation of the property law treatment of stolen property would be to find that the property rights in the stolen goods never leave the victim of crime, because it is only the original owner of property who can transfer title in that property and clearly a victim of crime does not consent to the transfer of title to a thief. In this sense, it is contended that the proper approach is for the court to make a declaration vindicating the property rights of the victim of the crime regardless of the claims of any other person.²⁴⁴

The more difficult context arises when the stolen property has been transferred to a third party. If the property were passed to someone who had notice of the fact that it was stolen, there would clearly be an offence of handling stolen goods,²⁴⁵ and that wrongful recipient of those goods must hold them on constructive trust for their original owner.²⁴⁶ So, money stolen from a bank account can be traced in equity through other bank accounts.²⁴⁷ The complication arises when the thief then purports to sell that property to an innocent third party. There are two competing equitable principles at play. First, the innocent purchaser would claim to be a bona fide purchaser for value without notice and therefore entitled to the protection of equity as being equity's darling. This approach was accepted by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC.²⁴⁸ It is a principle which operates to protect free markets in property by assuring the recipient of property that she can acquire good title in that property regardless of the root of title of that property, always provided that the purchaser does not have notice of the theft.

The general principle that a constructive trust arises on the basis of unconscionable conduct such as theft, derived from Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington, has been applied in later cases. So, it was held in *Armstrong DLW GmbH v Winnington Networks Ltd*²⁴⁹ that 239 Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale [1991] 2 AC 548, per Lord Templeman; Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669, per Lord Browne-Wilkinson. Cf the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 in relation to the recovery of the proceeds of organised crime through a statutory agency.

240 Black v S Freedman & Co (1910) 12 CLR 105.

241 Lennox Industries (Canada) Ltd v The Queen (1987) 34 DLR 297.

242 Jones (FC) & Sons v Jones [1996] 3 WLR 703.

243 Bishopsgate v Homan [1995] 1 WLR 31; Ghana Commercial Bank v C (1997) The Times, 3 March.

244 See Foskett v McKeown [2000] 3 All ER 97.

245 Theft Act 1968, s 22.

246 Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324, [1994] 1 All ER 1.

247 Bankers Trust Co v Shapira [1980] 1 WLR 1274, 1282.

248 [1996] AC 669.

249 [2012] 3 WLR 835.

where property had been acquired as a result of a phishing scam, then that property would be held on constructive trust for its original beneficial owner.²⁵⁰

Imposing a constructive trust on the thief has the ostensibly odd result of seeming to confer legal title in the stolen property on her as constructive trustee.²⁵¹ Given that the victim of crime does not consent to the transfer of title to the thief, it would be better to find that no title can be said to pass to the purchaser from the thief so that thief would have no title to give. That would be to reinforce the principle of caveat emptor (that is, ‘let the buyer beware’). The benefit of the constructive trust is that it enables the victim of the theft to use equitable principles to recover the value of the stolen property. What is particularly useful about the constructive trust in such circumstances is that it provides the victim of crime with a right to trace in equity (as the beneficiary under a constructive trust) so as to recover the traceable proceeds of the stolen property. For example, if the stolen property were used to buy a car, then that car could be subjected to the constructive trust. This issue is pursued in greater detail in Chapter 19.

A difficult case arising in criminal law was that of Attorney-General’s Reference (No 1 of 1985),²⁵² which related to a publican who leased premises from a brewery under an obligation to sell only the brewery’s products but who nevertheless used the brewery’s equipment (their pumps and so forth) to sell beer which he had bought on his own account. The question asked of the court was whether or not the publican had committed an offence under the Theft Act.²⁵³ To make out this offence, it would have been necessary to show that the money received by the publican from this venture was the property of the brewery on the basis that the money should have been held on constructive trust for the brewery. It was held that there was no proprietary constructive trust which would found liability for the criminal offence and instead that the publican was only obliged to account in civil law to the brewery for his secret profits.²⁵⁴ This decision is, it is suggested, wrong in so far as it relates to trusts law. The court’s ratio decidendi was that there were no property rights to show that the publican had stolen the brewery’s money: that may well be correct as a question of criminal law. As regards trusts law, however, the publican was found expressly to have been a fiduciary and expressly to be liable to account to the brewery for his profits: therefore, there is no possible conclusion on principle other than that he ought to have been required to account as a constructive trustee.²⁵⁵

250 Moreover, the establishment of that constructive trust would provide the basis for a tracing claim in equity: where equitable tracing is dependent on a pre-existing equitable interest on the part of the defendant, the existence of a constructive trust on the basis that the property had been stolen meant that tracing could be conducted in equity.

251 Shalson v Russo [2003] EWHC 1637 (Ch), [110], per Rimer J, where his Lordship opined that the thief cannot ordinarily be understood to acquire any proprietary interests in stolen property. Nevertheless, he was prepared to find that, in accordance with Banque Belge pour l’Etranger v Hambrouck [1921] 1 KB 321, 332, per Atkin LJ, the victim of fraud ought to be able to trace after property appropriated from him as part of the fraudulent scheme. See also Box, Brown & Jacobs v Barclays Bank [1998] Lloyd’s Rep Bank 185, 200, per Ferris J in the same vein.

252 [1986] QB 491.

253 Theft Act 1968, s 5(3).

254 See Archbold’s Criminal Pleading, Evidence and Practice, 2005, paras 21–69 and 21–70, which still refers to Lister v Stubbs and to R v Governor of Pentonville Prison ex p Tarling (1978) 70 Cr App R 77, HL, but not to Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid, as considered above.

255 Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46, considered at 12.5.2 below.

On a further point of criminal law relating to the recovery of property lost due to theft, the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 has created the Assets Recovery Agency which is empowered to confiscate property from criminals which has been used in relation to a criminal lifestyle.²⁵⁶ However, it is suggested that this Act casts little light on the civil liabilities for the recovery of stolen property except that it demonstrates that participation in money laundering is also an unlawful activity. The amount recoverable from the defendant under the 2002 Act is an amount equal to the benefit which the criminal took from his criminal lifestyle.²⁵⁷

12.4.5 Profits from fraud

Constructive trust in relation to fraud

The principle that a statute or a rule of common law cannot be used as an engine of fraud was considered above in para 12.3.4. Similarly to that principle, where a criminal, or a person not convicted of a criminal offence, acquires interests in property by means of fraud, the fraudster will be required to hold the property so acquired on constructive trust for the original owner of that property.²⁵⁸ Under general principles of constructive trust, it would be unconscionable for the fraudster to retain property acquired by fraud²⁵⁹ unless the victim acquiesced in the fraud.²⁶⁰ Fraudulent conduct in this equitable context will include representing to the occupant of a cottage that she will be entitled to live in that cottage for the rest of her life and then seeking to evict her.²⁶¹ At the other end of the spectrum there are forms of fraud which will constitute criminal offences, such as obtaining pecuniary advantage by deception which will also be recognised by equity. A defendant is not prevented from relying on his rights where, for example, the interest is not registered as required by some rule of formality,²⁶² unless there is some unconscionability in that action.²⁶³ In consequence, this equitable notion of fraud is more akin to unconscionable behaviour generally, as opposed to the more formalistic requirement at common law that fraud requires that the defendants either have known that their actions were deceitful or were reckless as to whether or not such was the case.²⁶⁴

In cases of fraud, a constructive trust will therefore be imposed over any property acquired further to that fraud. So, in *Bank of Ireland v Pexnet Ltd*²⁶⁵ the defendants presented forged instruments at a branch of the claimant bank which caused the bank to credit the defendants' accounts with approximately £2.4 million before the forgery was discovered. It was held that this constituted an unconscionable act which, further to Westdeutsche Landesbank 256 Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, s 6. The elements of such a lifestyle under Sched 2 to the Act include drug trafficking, money-laundering and directing terrorism.

257 Ibid, s 7(1).

258 Rochefoucauld v Boustead [1897] 1 Ch 196.

259 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669; Kuwait Oil Tanker Co SAK v Al Bader (No 3) (1999) The Independent, 11 January.

260 Lonrho plc v Fayed (No 2) [1992] 1 WLR 1.

261 Bannister v Bannister [1948] 2 All ER 133; Neale v Willis (1968) 110 SJ 521; Binions v Evans [1972] Ch 359.

262 Midland Bank Trust Company v Green [1981] AC 513.

263 Peffer v Rigg [1977] 1 WLR 285.

264 Peek v Gurney (1873) LR 6 HL 377.

265 [2010] EWHC 1872.

v Islington,²⁶⁶ meant that that money was to be held on constructive trust by the account holders for the bank.²⁶⁷ This was held to be a ‘classic case’ of the constructive trust in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington. Those defendants who could be proved to have known of the fraud would therefore be required to hold property on constructive trust. Some of the money had been transferred to a third party, which meant that an equitable tracing claim in respect of that money could be commenced. Similarly, in *Glen Dimplex Home Appliances Ltd v Smith*²⁶⁸ the first defendant committed a straightforwardly fraudulent act by diverting £2.8 million from her employer into bank accounts in the name of her husband and her daughter (the second and third defendants). The fraud was discovered when she was away from work. The issues concerned the second and third defendants.²⁶⁹ The money was clearly impressed with a constructive trust. Following *Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan*²⁷⁰ it was held that it would be dishonest to fail to ask questions about the money in the account and to close one’s eyes. It was held that the second defendant had been dishonest on this basis; however, it was not proven that the third defendant had appreciated that the money had been acquired by fraud. Nevertheless, the third defendant would have no defence to an equitable tracing action (further to the constructive trust imposed over those moneys) brought to recover the money held in her bank account.

In general terms, then, with the exception of fraudulent misrepresentation,²⁷¹ the commission of fraud will constitute a form of unconscionable behaviour which will found a constructive trust. As was held by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington:²⁷² when property is obtained by fraud, equity places a constructive trust on the fraudulent recipient.

In line with the general principle underpinning constructive trusts, then, a fraudulent act must be an unconscionable act such that any profits acquired from that fraud ought to be held on constructive trust for the victim of the fraud. This approach has been applied in four cases in the High Court,²⁷³ but it has not been followed in two other High Court decisions on the basis that fraudulent misrepresentations are ordinarily voidable at the election of the victim of 266 Especially the passage in the speech of Lord Browne-Wilkinson at [1996] AC 669, 715. Briggs J also referred to the summary of the law given by Lawrence Collins J in Commerzbank AG v IMB Morgan plc [2004] EWHC 2771 (Ch), [2005] 1 Lloyd’s Rep 298 rather than primarily on the decision of the House of Lords in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington, and also on Trustor v Smallbone (No 3), unreported, to the same effect.

267 [2010] EWHC 1872, [55]–[57].

268 [2011] EWHC 3392 (Ch).

229 The claimant sought an order for summary judgment – which means an order finding that the facts and liability are so clear that there is no need for a full trial. In fraud cases that requires it to be obvious that there was dishonesty, which was the case on these facts: Wrexham Association Football Club Ltd v Crucialmove Ltd [2008] 1 BCLC 508 and Antonio Gramsci Shipping Corporation v Reoletos Ltd [2010] All ER (D) 241 (May) were applied in this regard.

270 [1995] 3 All ER 97.

271 Considered immediately below.

272 [1996] AC 669, 716. Applied in Twinsectra v Yardley [2000] WTLR 527, 567; and Niru Battery Manufacturing Co v Milestone Trading Ltd [2002] EWHC 1425 (Comm), [2002] All ER (Comm) 705, 722, per Moore-Bick J.

273 Twinsectra v Yardley [2000] WTLR 527, 567, per Moore-Bick J; Collings v Lee (2001) 82 P & CR 27; JJ Harrison (Properties) Ltd v Harrison [2002] 1 BCLC 162; [2001] WTLR 1327; Niru Battery v Milestone Trading [2002] EWHC 1425 (Comm).

the fraud and therefore ought not to give rise to a constructive trust automatically.²⁷⁴ First, we shall consider two cases which have applied this principle and then, in the next section, we shall consider the counter-argument based on the voidability of fraudulent misrepresentations.

So, in Collings v Lee,²⁷⁵ an estate agent purported to take a transfer of a house from the vendors in favour of a non-existent, arm's length purchaser, but in fact procured a transfer of the land into a name which was an alias of his own. Subsequently, he refused to pay the purchase price to the vendors, claiming not to be the transferee of the property. It was held that the estate agent was constructive trustee of the property in favour of the vendors so that the vendors retained an overriding interest in that property.²⁷⁶ Similarly, in JJ Harrison (Properties) Ltd v Harrison,²⁷⁷ a director of a company procured the transfer of land owned by the company to himself personally. The transfer was made at an undervalue and therefore constituted a breach of the director's duties to the company. It was held that whereas a director of a company is not ordinarily a trustee of the company's property (because the company is the absolute owner of its own property), in circumstances in which a director has unconscionably procured the transfer of the company's property to himself in breach of his fiduciary duties, then that director will be a constructive trustee of that property in favour of the company.²⁷⁸ There are also instances of fraudulent conduct which have led to the imposition of a constructive trust over the proceeds received from the fraud: so, procuring secret commissions as a result of defrauding an employer by artificially inflating the size of a budget for a property development project would lead to those commissions (the proceeds of the fraud) being held on constructive trust.²⁷⁹

No constructive trust in relation to fraudulent misrepresentation

It is not the case, however, that a contract procured by way of fraudulent misrepresentation will found a constructive trust over any property passed under that contract.²⁸⁰ In Lonrho v Al Fayed (No 2),²⁸¹ Millett J held:

A contract obtained by fraudulent misrepresentation is voidable, not void, even in equity. The representee may elect to avoid it, but until he does so, the representor is not a constructive trustee of the property transferred pursuant to the contract, and no fiduciary relationship exists between him and the representee. It may well be that if the 274 Box, Brown & Jacobs v Barclays Bank [1998] Lloyd's Rep Bank 185, per Ferris J. See generally Sinclair Investment Holdings SA v Versailles Trade Finance Ltd [2004] All ER (D) 158, per Strauss QC (sitting as a Deputy Judge in the High Court) considering the conflicting authority but, in interlocutory proceedings, only needing to decide that there was a triable issue.

275 (2001) 82 P & CR 27.

276 Land Registration Act 1925, s 70(1)(g).

277 [2002] 1 BCLC 162, [2001] WTLR 1327.

278 Applying Russell v Wakefield Waterworks Co (1875) LR 20 Eq 474, 479, per Lord Jessel MR; Belmont Finance Corporation v Williams Furniture Ltd and Others (No 2) [1980] 1 All ER 393, 405, per Buckley LJ.

279 Daraydan Holdings Ltd v Solland International Ltd [2004] EWHC 622 (Ch), para [88], per Lawrence Collins J.

280 Daly v Sydney Stock Exchange Ltd (1986) 160 CLR 371, 387. Cf Collings v Lee (2001) 82 P & CR 3, although the opposite was accepted, without close analysis, in Daraydan Holdings Ltd v Solland International Ltd [2004] EWHC 622 (Ch), para [88], per Lawrence Collins J.

281 [1992] 1 WLR 1, [1991] 4 All ER 961.

representee elects to avoid the contract and set aside a transfer of property made pursuant to it, the beneficial interest in the property will be treated as having remained vested in him throughout, at least to the extent necessary to support any tracing claim.²⁸²

Thus, because the transaction procured by means of the fraudulent misrepresentation may be affirmed by the victim of the fraud, it is held that there ought not to be a constructive trust imposed over the proceeds of the fraud because that would preclude the right to affirm the transaction.²⁸³ So, applying this principle in Re Ciro Citterio Menswear plc (In Administration),²⁸⁴ two directors acquired land for which they paid about £250,000 with funds supplied by the company. This transfer of money was in breach of the rules in s 330 of the Companies Act 1985 (see now s 197 of the Companies Act 2006) governing loans to company directors. The company subsequently went into insolvent administration. It was held that a director would not automatically be constructive trustee of moneys loaned to her by the company in breach of the statutory code because such a loan could be made for proper purposes. The effect of the Companies Act prohibiting such loans was merely to make them voidable and not void: therefore, the loan would not found a constructive trust automatically because the company may choose such to affirm the loan subsequently. There may be other factors which would justify the imposition of a constructive trust, for example, if the director was also committing criminal offences relating to insider dealing collateral to the loan contract, as in Guinness plc v Saunders.²⁸⁵

Whether profits from fraudulent misrepresentation ought to be held on proprietary constructive trust

At first blush, the principle that profits from a fraudulent misrepresentation will not be held on constructive trust would appear to contradict the principle set out by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC, as quoted above, that a person who perpetrates a fraud will be required to hold any property acquired by virtue of that fraud on constructive trust for the representee.²⁸⁶ The distinction is made in Lonrho v Al Fayed (No 2), however, between cases of theft and fraud where there has not been any consensual transfer on the one hand, and cases where there is an underlying transaction which is voidable on grounds of misrepresentation on the other hand.²⁸⁷ The logic of this distinction is that a

282 Ibid, 11; 971.

283 However, as considered below, it is not necessary that the imposition of a constructive trust should preclude affirmation of the transaction because, being a bare trust, the beneficiary can terminate the trust using the principle in Saunders v Vautier and affirm the transaction instead.

284 [2002] 2 All ER 717.

285 [1990] 1 All ER 652.

286 This approach has not been followed, for example, in Halifax Buildings Society v Thomas [1996] Ch 217; Box, Brown & Jacobs v Barclays Bank [1998] Lloyd's Rep Bank 185, per Ferris J; Shalson v Mimran [2003] WTLR 1165, 1200, per Rimer J, (sub nom Shalson v Russo [2003] EWHC 1637 (Ch), para [106]) for the reasons given in the main text to follow. See Sinclair Investment Holdings SA v Versailles Trade Finance Ltd [2004] All ER (D) 158 and Shalson v Russo [2003] EWHC 1637 (Ch), para [106] for considerations of the conflicting positions.

287 Bristol & West Building Society v Mothew [1998] Ch 1, 23; Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley [1999] Lloyd's Rep Bank 438.

voidable transaction (such as one involving a fraudulent misrepresentation) might be affirmed by the representee, and that it would therefore be contrary to principle for the equitable interest to be held on trust given that that person may subsequently choose to affirm it for the representee. The right to rescind the transaction is a mere equity and not an equitable interest.²⁸⁸ So, someone who acquires loan moneys under a mortgage contract by way of fraudulent misrepresentation would not be required to hold any surplus proceeds from the sale of the mortgaged property on constructive trust for the mortgagee.²⁸⁹ However, it is suggested that this is no reason to absolve the representor of his fraud; instead, the constructive trust could be terminable at the instance of the representee in the same way that the transaction itself is capable of being affirmed.²⁹⁰ Indeed, there have been cases in which the acquisition of property by fraud had led to the imposition of a constructive trust. So, as considered above, in Collings v Lee,²⁹¹ where an estate agent defrauded clients by transferring land to himself acting under an alias, it was held that there had been no intention to transfer the property to the agent and further that the agent had been in breach of his fiduciary duties so as to constitute him a constructive trust of the property. Similarly, as considered above, in JJ Harrison (Properties) Ltd v Harrison,²⁹² a director of a company was held to be a constructive trustee of property which he had fraudulently obtained from the company.²⁹³

This picture is complicated by the following dicta of Millett LJ in *Paragon Finance v Thakerar*²⁹⁴ relating to frauds in which the fraudster is not an express trustee:

Equity has always given relief against fraud by making any person sufficiently implicated in the fraud accountable in equity. In such a case he is traditionally though I think unfortunately described as a constructive trustee and said to be ‘liable to account as constructive trustee’.

This form of liability is, it is suggested, a reference to liability to account as a constructive trustee for knowing receipt of property in breach of trust and dishonest assistance in a breach of trust: these heads of liability are considered in detail in Chapter 20. In neither circumstance is the defendant liable to hold any property on trust; rather, the defendant is liable to account to the beneficiaries for any loss they suffered as a result of the fraud as though she was an express trustee. This, it is suggested, is a means of providing for equitable relief in a way that is different from holding any particular property and any profits derived from that 289 Halifax Building Society v Thomas [1996] Ch 217. It is suggested that this decision is difficult to reconcile with the approach of the Privy Council in Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid to the effect that one who acquires property unconscionably should be construed to hold that original property on trust for the claimant from the moment of its receipt, such that any profits derived from that property are similarly held on constructive trust for the claimant.

288 Ibid.

290 Such an argument was raised before the Court of Appeal in Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley [1999] Lloyd’s Rep Bank 438, building on the general principle set out in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669, but rejected by the court: [1999] Lloyd’s Rep Bank 438, 461, per Potter LJ.

291 (2001) 82 P & CR 27.

292 [2002] 1 BCLC 162, [2001] WTLR 1327.

293 See also Russell v Wakefield Waterworks Co (1875) LR 20 Eq 474, 479, per Lord Jessel MR.

294 [1999] 1 All ER 400, 408.

property on trust:²⁹⁵ rather, the defendant's liability here is to make good any loss suffered by the beneficiaries from the fraud. So, if £10,000 is taken from the trust property by fraud, then the beneficiaries' loss and the defendant's personal liability is £10,000, whereas if the fraudster earned £5,000 profit from that £10,000, then a proprietary constructive trust would have netted the beneficiaries a total of £15,000.

In accordance with the decision in Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid,²⁹⁶ considered above, it would be in line with judicial policy to prevent the fraudster from keeping the £5,000 profits earned by using the trust's money by holding that the entire £15,000 be held on constructive trust. The obstacle to such a proprietary constructive trust is said to be that a fraudulent misrepresentation should give rise to a voidable contract which the beneficiaries may choose to affirm. This policy in favour of allowing the beneficiaries to affirm the transaction should not be taken to be an objection to the imposition of a proprietary constructive trust. It is suggested that the equitable doctrine of election²⁹⁷ should be applied by the court so that the beneficiaries may elect either to affirm a proprietary constructive trust over the fraudster's profits or to affirm the fraudulent transaction. In this way, the twin policies of holding unconscionable profits on proprietary constructive trust and of permitting the beneficiaries to choose to affirm contracts can be satisfied.

Constructive fraud and undue influence

Property acquired by means of a 'constructive fraud', such as duress or undue influence, will not vest in equity in the person committing that fraud.²⁹⁸ The remedy applied in this instance is the remedy of setting aside the transaction effected by virtue of the fraud.²⁹⁹ Where a transaction, which denied the claimant rights in property to which she would otherwise have been entitled, was set aside on the basis of undue influence, the property was held on constructive trust for the claimant in the proportions to which she was otherwise entitled.³⁰⁰ Clearly, exerting duress or undue influence over a person will be unconscionable conduct and therefore, it is suggested, that any benefit taken from such duress or undue influence should be held on constructive trust for the victim of that behaviour.³⁰¹

295 Selangor United Rubber Estates Ltd v Craddock (No 3) [1968] 1 WLR 1555, 1582, [1968] 2 All ER 1073, 1097, per Ungood-Thomas J; approved in Kilcarne Holdings Ltd v Targetfollow (Birmingham) Ltd [2004] EWHC 2547 (Ch), para [259], per Lewison J.

296 [1994] 1 AC 324, [1994] 1 All ER 1.

297 See Chapter 31.

298 Barclays Bank v O'Brien [1993] 3 WLR 786.

299 As considered in Chapter 20.

300 Humphreys v Humphreys [2004] EWHC 2201 (Ch), making reference to the defendant's morally reprehensible behaviour and dicta of Lord Templeman in that regard in Boustany v Pigott (1995) 95 P & CR 298, at 302.

301 This argument was attempted in Hansen v Barker-Benfield [2006] EWHC 1119 (Ch), but on the facts of that case it was not proved that a testator's second wife had exerted undue influence over her husband so as to induce him to change his will. The argument was being run by the claimant, who was the testator's daughter, that if there had been undue influence then the will was to be set aside and therefore that any property received by the second wife under the will was to be held on constructive trust.

12.5 FIDUCIARY MAKING UNAUTHORISED PROFITS

A trustee or fiduciary will be a constructive trustee of any personal profits made from that office, even where she has acted in good faith. The rule is a strict rule that no profit can be made by a trustee or fiduciary which is not authorised by the terms of the trust. A fiduciary who profits from that office will be required to account for those profits. There is no defence of good faith in favour of the trustee.

12.5.1 The development of the principle that a fiduciary may not make unauthorised profits

If a fiduciary earns unauthorised, personal profits from her fiduciary office then she will be obliged to account for those profits: in the first place by means of a constructive trust imposed over those profits; or if, the profits cannot be identified, by means of a personal account to the trust.³⁰² The purpose of this principle is to prevent fiduciaries from permitting any conflict between their personal interests and their fiduciary duties. The rule that a fiduciary cannot take an unauthorised, personal benefit from her fiduciary office emerges from the old case of Keech v Sandford,³⁰³ in which the benefit of a lease with rights to receive profits from a market was settled on trust for an infant. The trustee sought to renew the lease on its expiry, but his request was refused on the grounds that an infant could not be bound by such a lease. Therefore, the trustee sought to renew the lease in his own name with the intention that its benefit could then be passed on to the infant. As such, the trustee was benefiting personally although purporting to act in the interest of the beneficiary by use of a right not available to the beneficiary or the trust. An application was made on behalf of the infant to the court for the benefit of the lease to be held on trust for him. The Lord Chancellor held that the lease must be held by the trustee for the infant. While there had been no allegation of fraud in that case, the Lord Chancellor considered that the principle that a trustee must not take an unauthorised profit from a trust should be ‘strictly pursued’ because there were risks of fraud in allowing trustees to take, for example, the benefit of renewed leases which they had previously held on trust.

This form of trust is said to be a constructive trust here because the renewed lease is in fact a different lease from the old one, and therefore is a different piece of property from that originally held on trust: consequently, the infant’s trust would be acquiring rights in this particular lease for the first time. Given that the trust referred only to the original piece of property, a trust which attaches to a separate piece of property must be a constructive trust arising by operation of law and by order of the court, not strictly by the action of a settlor in creating a trust. It is possible to avoid a constructive trust in these circumstances only where the individual renewing the lease can demonstrate that he does not hold a fiduciary duty in respect of that property.

As this principle was expressed by Lord Herschell in Bray v Ford,³⁰⁴

302 Sinclair Investment Holdings SA v Versailles Trade Finance Ltd (No 3) [2007] EWHC 915; CMS Dolphin Ltd v Simonet [2001] 2 BCLC 704.

303 (1726) 2 Eq Cas Abr 741.

304 [1896] AC 44, at 51; [1895–99] All ER Rep 1009, at 1011.

It is an inflexible rule of the court of equity that a person in a fiduciary position . . . is not, unless otherwise expressly provided [in the terms of that person's fiduciary duties], entitled to make a profit; he is not allowed to put himself in a position where his interest and duty conflict. It does not appear to me that this rule is, as had been said, founded upon principles of morality.³⁰⁵ I regard it rather as based on the consideration that, human nature being what it is, there is danger, in such circumstances, of the person holding a fiduciary position being swayed by interest rather than by duty, and thus prejudicing those whom he was bound to protect. It has, therefore, been deemed expedient to lay down this positive rule.

So, the rule is considered to be a strict rule, as will emerge from the case of Boardman v Phipps, considered in detail in the next section. As Lord King held:³⁰⁶

This may seem hard, that the trustee is the only person of all mankind who might not have [the trust property]: but it is very proper that rule should be strictly pursued, and not in the least relaxed; for it is very obvious what would be the consequence of letting trustees have the lease.³⁰⁷

Its base is the avoidance of conflicts of interest between a fiduciary's personal and fiduciary capacities, and is not dependent on proof of bad faith. As Lord Cranworth expressed this principle:³⁰⁸ it is a rule of universal application that no one having such duties to discharge shall be allowed to enter into engagements in which he has or can have a personal interest conflicting or which possibly may conflict with the interests of those whom he is bound to protect.

Nevertheless, it is important that the defendant be shown to have been acting in a fiduciary capacity for this principle to take effect. As emerges from Lord Cranworth's dicta, it is necessary that the defendant had appropriate duties. So, in Re Biss,³⁰⁹ a son was entitled to take possession of a renewed lease where, acting in good faith, he had sought a renewal in his own name of a lease which had formerly been held by his father's business, after his father had died intestate. It was held that the son did not occupy a fiduciary position in respect of his father's business, unlike the trustee in Keech v Sandford,³¹⁰ who clearly occupied the fiduciary position of trustee in relation to the infant's settlement. Therefore, the son in Re Biss would not be subject to a constructive trust over the renewed lease in his own name. So, if those profits were not earned in a fiduciary capacity, then an account for the 305 Although see, eg, Parker LJ in Bhullar v Bhullar [2003] 2 BCLC 241, para [17] referring to the 'ethic' in these cases.

306 Keech v Sandford (1726) Sel Cas Ch 61.

307 Ie, the trustee would abscond with the valuable property.

308 Aberdeen Railway Co v Blaikie Bros (1854) 1 Macq 461, 471; [1843–60] All ER Rep 249, 252.

309 [1903] 2 Ch 40.

310 (1726) 2 Eq Cas Abr 741.

profits earned will not be ordered.³¹¹ While the decision in Keech v Sandford relates specifically to leases, its ratio has been broadened out into a more general principle that fiduciaries cannot profit personally from their office. This principle was considered in relation to the duties of trustees in para 8.3.9 above.

12.5.2 The application of this principle

The principle that a fiduciary making unauthorised profits founds a constructive trust:
Boardman v Phipps

The continued rigour of this rule against fiduciaries taking unauthorised benefits from their offices is best illustrated by the leading decision of the House of Lords in Boardman v Phipps.³¹² The respondent, Boardman, was solicitor to a trust: the ‘Phipps family trust’. As such he was not a trustee, but he was held to be in a fiduciary capacity as advisor to the Phipps family trust. The trust fund included a minority shareholding in a private company, albeit that the trust was the largest single shareholder in the company. By virtue of his position in relation to the company’s largest shareholder, over a period of about 18 months, Boardman was given access to large amounts of commercial information relating to the company’s business which was not in the public domain, including detailed accounts as to the turnover of the company’s various factories. This information was treated as being confidential in correspondence between directors of the company and Boardman. Later, Boardman procured a proxy from the trustees so that he could attend a general meeting of this private company. Armed with all of this information and the access which he had to the management of the company, Boardman hit upon the idea of asset-stripping the Australian business so as to increase the value of all of the shares in the company. Because the company was a private company, Boardman would have been unable to find out this information or to acquire shares in the company but for his role in relation to the trust. To carry out this plan required that the trust acquire a majority shareholding in the company. The trust was not able to acquire the extra shares itself, both because the trustees did not consider the trust was in sufficient funds for the purpose and because the trust would have required the leave of the court to make such an acquisition. Therefore, Boardman and one of the trustees, Fox, decided to acquire the shares personally. Boardman informed the active trustees that he intended to do this. However, it was held that Boardman had not provided them with enough information to be able to rely on the defence of their consent to his plans.

Together with the Phipps family trust’s shareholding, Boardman and the trustees were able, in effect, to control the company. With a great amount of work on Boardman’s part, the company generated a large profit for the trust, and for Boardman personally, as shareholders, because it put Boardman’s plan into effect. The issue was whether Boardman was entitled to keep the profit on his own shares, or whether he was required to hold that profit on constructive trust for the beneficiaries of the trust.

311 Experience Hendrix LLC v PPX Enterprises Inc [2003] EWCA Civ 323, [2003] 1 All ER (Comm) 830, [2003] EMLR 515, where royalties had not been paid to a musician further to a contract, but in circumstances in which the defendant was not in a fiduciary relationship to the claimant, there was a right to contractual recovery of money but no equitable accounting.

312 [1967] 2 AC 46, 67. See also Blair v Valley [2000] WTLR 615; Ward v Brunt [2000] WTLR 731.

The majority of the House of Lords held that Boardman should hold the profits on constructive trust for the beneficiaries of the existing trust. The minority, Viscount Dilhorne and Lord Upjohn, dissented on the basis that Mr Boardman had not acted in bad faith and therefore that he ought not to be subjected to a constructive trust. Mr Boardman was entitled to some compensation (known as ‘equitable accounting’) for his efforts in spite of the imposition of the constructive trust.³¹³ All of their Lordships agreed on the principles; they disagreed only as to their application to the particular facts of this case. As Lord Upjohn held:

Rules of equity have to be applied to such a great diversity of circumstances that they can be stated only in the most general terms and applied with particular attention to the exact circumstances of each case. The relevant rule for the decision of this case is the fundamental rule of equity that a person in a fiduciary capacity must not make a profit out of his trust which is part of the wider rule that a trustee must not place himself in a position where his duty and his interest may conflict. [His Lordship then quoted the passage from Bray v Ford which was quoted in the previous section in support of this contention.]

These dicta contained the central statement of principle which can be found in the speeches of all of their Lordships to the effect that the constructive trust in this case is predicated on the need to prevent conflicts of interest. Nevertheless, four issues arise: What is the basis of the constructive trust in this context? In what way can authorisation be acquired? To whom are the fiduciary’s duties owed? What is the nature of the remedy?

The basis of the constructive trust in this context: avoidance of conflict of interests

The first issue, then, is as to the basis of the constructive trust in this context. The House of Lords in Boardman v Phipps held that it was a principle of strict application that a trustee or fiduciary could not be permitted to allow a conflict between her personal capacity and her fiduciary duties.³¹⁴ Consequently, if a fiduciary does act on her own account so as to generate personal profits from her fiduciary office, then she will be required to account to the beneficiaries of her fiduciary duties for those profits. The effect of finding that the fiduciary is required to account for those personal profits is that the fiduciary is required to account for those profits, and thus in the first place to hold those profits on constructive trust for the beneficiaries of her fiduciary duties. This constructive trust will be imposed over the fiduciary’s personal profits in any situation in which a fiduciary acquires a profit in the commission of her office regardless of whether or not she acts in bad faith.³¹⁵

313 As considered at para 12.5.3 below.

314 See also, establishing this point: Keech v Sandford (1726) 2 Eq Cas Abr 741; Ex p Grace (1799) 1 Bos & P 376; Rawe v Chichester (1773) Amb 715; Aberdeen Railway Co v Blaikie Bros [1843–60] All ER Rep 249, 252, per Lord Cranworth; Bray v Ford [1895–99] All ER Rep 1009, at 1011; [1896] AC 51; Bhullar v Bhullar [2003] EWCA Civ 424, para 268, per Parker LJ. See more recently FHR European Ventures LLP v Mankarious [2011] EWHC 2308 (Ch), Simon J.

315 In accordance with the discussion of the general constructive trust considered at the beginning of this chapter, we might consider that the acquisition of an unauthorised profit from a fiduciary office is necessarily to be deemed to constitute unconscionable behaviour suitable to found a constructive trust.

The principle will emerge from the following example. If a trustee were to take property from the trust fund, without authorisation under the terms of the trust to do so, and then to invest that property so that she could keep the profits for herself personally, she would be required to hold those profits on constructive trust for the beneficiaries of the trust. The effect of the profits being held on constructive trust is that any property acquired with those profits will similarly be held on constructive trust. If that property were to increase in value, then the constructive trust would continue to bite on the property even though it has become more valuable.³¹⁶ This is the effect of a proprietary constructive trust: it bites on whatever property is held on trust from time to time. The trustee's liability is therefore not restricted to a personal remedy equal in value to the profits made, but rather is a proprietary remedy which takes effect over the traceable proceeds of this property.³¹⁷ Clearly, this would have been a breach of trust and therefore it is unsurprising that the trustee is required to account for the personal profits realised from the transaction.

To change the example slightly, as we have seen from Boardman v Phipps, this liability will take effect over someone who is not an express trustee if that person interferes with the running of the trust so as to become a trustee *de son tort*³¹⁸ (that is, a form of constructive trustee who has meddled sufficiently with the trust so as to be deemed to be an express trustee). Mr Boardman was a trustee de son tort because, even though he began as a solicitor advising the trustees rather than an express trustee, he took over the management of the trust's affairs. Even though Boardman only used his own money to acquire the shares, it was held that because he permitted a conflict of interest between his personal and his fiduciary interests, he should hold profits earned from his own shareholding on trust for the Phipps family trust. In this situation it is clear that there is no requirement that the trustee have acted unconscionably or knowingly in bad faith;³¹⁹ rather, it is sufficient that some personal profit has been earned in circumstances in which there was some conflict of interest.

To change the example once more, if a trustee invested trust property in an investment fund managed by Xavier because Xavier offered the trustee £10,000 to invest the property with Xavier rather than some other investment, then that £10,000 would be held on constructive trust on the basis either that it would have been an unauthorised profit from her fiduciary office³²⁰ or that it would have been a bribe.³²¹ Self-evidently, there would have been a breach of trust here and unconscionable behaviour. However, suppose that Xavier sent the trustee an unexpected Fortnum & Mason hamper of food at Christmas³²² as thanks for investing in Xavier's fund: would this be an unauthorised personal profit? It would certainly be a profit. It is clear from Boardman v Phipps that there need not have been any bad faith on the part of the fiduciary for the profits to be held on constructive trust; all that is required is that there has been a conflict of interest. There might be a conflict of interest if we consider that the trustee might now continue to invest in Xavier's fund rather than any other fund out of

316 Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324, [1994] 1 All ER 1.

317 See Chapter 19 for a discussion of the law on tracing.

318 Considered below at section 12.8.

319 Regal v Gulliver [1942] 1 All ER 378, 386A, per Lord Russell (approved in Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46, per Lord Guest): 'The liability arises from the mere fact of a profit having, in the stated circumstances, been made.'

320 Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46.

321 Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324, [1994] 1 All ER 1.

322 Fortnum & Mason is a shop, by Royal Appointment, on Piccadilly in London famous, inter alia, for the hampers they sell at Christmas full of salmon, champagne and so forth.

gratitude, even though the gift was unsolicited. Applying the Keech v Sandford principle strictly, the hamper of food should be held on constructive trust for the beneficiaries.

An alternative basis of the constructive trust: misuse of trust property?

The clear view of the House of Lords in Boardman v Phipps (and on this point there Lordships were unanimous and speaking in support of Keech v Sandford) is that the constructive trust in these circumstances is based on the avoidance of conflict of interests,³²³ as discussed immediately above. However, there was another argument which was raised in front of the House of Lords as to whether or not Boardman should also have been considered to have misused trust property to earn his profits. This argument runs on the basis that the confidential information obtained while on trust business should be considered to be the property of the Phipps family trust. Consequently, the profit which was generated for Boardman personally could arguably be said to have been derived from trust property (i.e. the confidential information) and therefore ought to have been considered to be trust property in itself.³²⁴

In considering this argument, Lord Upjohn rejected the idea that confidential information could be property.³²⁵ Lord Hodson expressly found that confidential information may be considered to be property in some circumstances, giving the example of ‘knowhow’.³²⁶ Similarly, Viscount Dilhorne accepted that in some circumstances information can be understood to be property, although on these facts (without much explanation) his Lordship concluded that it was not.³²⁷ Lord Cohen accepted that confidential information is ‘not property in the strict sense of that word’;³²⁸ but because Boardman had acquired the opportunity to make this profit while acting as agent (and thus fiduciary) for the trust then he was required to account for those profits due to ‘the rigour of equity’.³²⁹

What flows from all of this judicial analysis is that confidential information may or may not be property in any given circumstance in equity, although (according to this House of Lords) in the preponderance of cases it will not be. What also flows from this judicial analysis is that liability to account for profits flowing from the use of confidential information may arise in any event without the need for a pre-existing property right on the basis that a 323 Bhullar v Bhullar [2003] 2 BCLC 241, para [27], per Parker LJ.

324 Cf Satnam Investments Ltd v Dunlop Heywood & Co Ltd [1999] 3 All ER 652: where confidential information held by S was disclosed to third parties leading to the acquisition of a development site by those third parties, it was held that there was no constructive trust over the defendant because he was not in a fiduciary position in relation to S; applied in Brisby v Lomaxhall (2000) unreported.

325 [1967] 2 AC 46, 127. Importantly, Lord Upjohn did so as part of an inquiry into the circumstances in which ‘courts of equity will restrain the recipient from communicating it to another’: that is, his Lordship was reiterating the age-old equitable principle that the doctrine of confidence is not predicated on a pre-existing property right but rather on a more general obligation in conscience. The equitable doctrine of confidence is considered in detail in section 27.7 of this book.

326 [1967] 2 AC 46, 107.

327 [1967] 2 AC 46, at 89–90.

328 [1967] 2 AC 46, 102.

329 It is interesting to note that Lord Cohen referred to the information being ‘acquired’ and Lord Guest to the information being ‘obtained’ (ibid, 117): both of which words suggest the ownership or possession of an item of property.

fiduciary's obligations in conscience to the beneficiaries of a trust preclude him from permitting even the possibility of a conflict of interest.³³⁰

If the constructive trust is to be based on vindicating the property rights of the Phipps family trust, then the first problem would be identifying the precise property which Boardman was to hold on trust for the Phipps family trust. Boardman had acquired his shares in his personal capacity using his own money: they had never belonged to the Phipps family trust. (This is similar to the argument concerning bribes which was considered above.) Rather, it is suggested, because Lords Hodson and Guest found that trust property had been misused, it was intellectually more satisfying for them to find that Boardman owed a proprietary remedy (in the form of a constructive trust) to the beneficiaries because they considered that he had used trust property to earn himself those profits. Otherwise, it would have to be acknowledged that Boardman acquired his shares with his own money and not with trust money, and therefore it would be intellectually more difficult to justify the imposition of a proprietary constructive trust on Boardman.

This raises a number of interesting questions which should point to Boardman not having been liable as a constructive trustee if the decision had been based on misuse of the trust's property. First, it is not clear to whom the confidential information would have belonged. It is a central tenet of company law that the company is itself the owner of its own property – including information as to its turnover and business performance – and that the shareholders personally (in this instance, the Phipps family trust and its beneficiaries) would have had no proprietary rights in those assets nor any right to sue on behalf of the company.³³¹ Therefore, it should properly be said that Boardman was in fact benefiting from confidential information belonging to the company (to which he owed no fiduciary duties) and not any property of the Phipps family trust (to whose beneficiaries he did owe his fiduciary duties). Therefore, there would not have been a constructive trust in favour of the Phipps family trust.

Second, it is not clear that this confidential information was the thing without which Mr Boardman would not have earned those profits. The information was confidential in the sense that it had not been released to the public, but it is arguable at least that the information only generated a profit because of the analysis which Boardman placed on it. Without that analysis, the information was inert. A clear difference should be drawn between cases in which the information needs analysis to transform it into something which will generate a profit, and, for example, a secret formula which has not yet been patented. The secret formula is clearly confidential and its exploitation would lead directly to a profit; whereas, the information is only profitable once someone with Boardman's acumen analyses it and works out how a profit could be earned. Therefore, it could be said that the information by itself did not earn the profit, but rather that it was Boardman's intellect which transformed the inert information into a profitable strategy.

Boardman v Phipps is best understood as an example of the equitable principle that potential conflicts of interest must be avoided by fiduciaries. The constructive trust arises as part of the general principle that if fiduciaries do earn an unauthorised profit from their offices 330 [1967] 2 AC 46, 103, per Lord Cohen and at [112] per Lord Upjohn; predicated on Bray v Ford [1896] AC 44, at 51, per Lord Herschell.

331 They could not have had any right against the property of the company as minority shareholders without satisfying the requirements for a derivative action under the Companies Act 2006, s 994, winding up the company, and distributing its assets among them.

then that is considered by equity to be unconscionable conduct in its most general sense. It is not property law logic which gives rise to the trust, but rather general equitable principle. We could understand this decision as being based, therefore, on an understanding that it is unconscionable for a fiduciary to earn an unauthorised profit and therefore operating in accordance with Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC, an approach which is particularly attractive if we consider that Mr Boardman had misused trust property.³³²

The Court of Appeal in *Bhullar v Bhullar*³³³ reasserted the principle that the constructive trust in this context is not dependent on any interference with trust property, but rather is based on the avoidance of conflicts of interest. An Australian decision has similarly held that this form of constructive trust is based on the fiduciary's obligation to permit no conflict between his personal benefit and his duties to others,³³⁴ which again suggests an emphasis on fiduciaries' general obligations as opposed to the protection of rights in property necessarily. If the test is based on the avoidance of conflict of interest by fiduciaries, then it would not matter whether or not trust property was misused; rather, it would be enough that there had been some conflict of interest without trust property ever having been used.

The dissenting view in Boardman v Phipps

Lord Upjohn and Viscount Dilhorne dissented from the conclusion of the majority in Boardman v Phipps. Their Lordships agreed that there was a principle that fiduciaries must not permit a conflict of interest. However, in their opinions, Mr Boardman had neither acted in bad faith nor unconscionably during these transactions and furthermore they considered that Boardman's use of his own money to acquire shares meant that there had not been any conflict of interest on these facts. Lord Upjohn's view was based on the proposition that a solicitor ought to be able to act separately on her own account and on her client's account without the need to impose a constructive trust over any profits realised, provided that she does not allow any conflict of interest to develop between her fiduciary duties to her client and her own desire for personal profit. As such, his Lordship held, there ought to have been no objection to Boardman making some personal profit from these transactions.³³⁵ Furthermore it was accepted by Viscount Dilhorne that Mr Boardman's agency, acting on behalf of the Phipps family trust, ended after the first meeting of the company's shareholders which he attended, and therefore that he bore no further duties than that. It is suggested, however, that Mr Boardman is better thought of as being a trustee de son tort (as discussed in section 12.8) due to his interference with the management of the trust and consequently that his fiduciary duties extended throughout the entire time of his interaction with the trust and were not confined simply to his attendance at one particular shareholders' meeting. Furthermore, Boardman was a solicitor dealing as a fiduciary (for which he was paid) and therefore ought to have known that he was not entitled to take profits without the informed consent of the beneficiaries.

332 As considered in section 12.1.

333 [2003] 2 BCLC 241, para [27], per Parker LJ.

334 Deane J in Chan v Zacharia (1984) 154 CLR 178.

335 In other contexts, it has been suggested by Arden LJ in Murad v Al-Saraj [2005] EWCA Civ 939 at paras [82–83] that equitable principle in relation to the liability of fiduciaries could be tempered by a modern court. This is an obiter remark which is clearly contrary to the approach of the English senior courts, and it was doubted by Sir Peter Gibson in Wrexham AFC Ltd v Crucialmove Ltd [2006] EWCA Civ 237, para [51].

No requirement that the profit be made directly from the fiduciary office

It has been held that there is no need to demonstrate that the profit was earned ‘from the fiduciary office’ as opposed to being made in general terms in a manner which caused a conflict between the fiduciary’s personal interest and her fiduciary duties.³³⁶ So, as Morritt VC has put this point:³³⁷

If there is a fiduciary duty of loyalty and if the conduct complained of falls within the scope of that fiduciary duty as indicated by Lord Wilberforce in *NZ Netherlands Society v Kuys*³³⁸ then I see no justification for any further requirement that the profit shall have been obtained by the fiduciary ‘by virtue of his position’. Such a condition suggests an element of causation which neither principle nor the authorities require. Likewise it is not in doubt that the object of the equitable remedies of an account or the imposition of a constructive trust is to ensure that the defaulting fiduciary does not retain the profit; it is not to compensate the beneficiary for any loss.

Therefore, if, for example, a trustee took some advice from the stockbrokers advising a trust that there was only one remaining parcel of shares in a company which were expected to realise a massive profit, and if the trustee acquired those shares for herself rather than for the trust, it would not be open to the trustee to argue that she acquired the shares on her own account and not while working for the trust. Otherwise it would be too simple for fiduciaries to argue that they were acting in a different capacity when taking direct or indirect advantage of their office. Instead, the strict principle in Keech v Sandford and Bray v Ford is to be enforced so that no possible conflict of interest can be allowed to exist. This, it is suggested, is the reason for supporting the decision of the majority of the House of Lords in Boardman v Phipps: if Boardman had been permitted to retain his profits, then the purity of the principle derived from Keech v Sandford and from Bray v Ford would have been fatally compromised.

It is not necessary for the defendant to occupy one of the traditional fiduciary categories for this principle to apply. So, in *Cobbetts LLP v Hodge*³³⁹ a ‘salaried partner’ within a solicitors’ firm, which meant that he was an employee working for a limited liability partnership who was not himself a full partner, was held to owe fiduciary duties to the firm because his role was as a ‘senior lawyer’, albeit not a partner, whose duties included bringing investors and business into the firm. That employee had, however, diverted a private placement of shares issued by a client of the firm to himself while purportedly on the firm’s business. Therefore, Floyd J held that the defendant employee would be liable to hold any profits from this unauthorised activity on constructive trust for the benefit of the firm. It was found that the defendant had not made a full disclosure of the share placement and its terms to anyone at the firm, but rather had made only partial and misleading disclosures: therefore, the defence of authorisation was not open to him.

336 United Pan-Europe Communications NV v Deutsche Bank [2000] 2 BCLC 461; Button v Phelps [2006] EWHC 53 (Ch).

337 United Pan-Europe Communications NV v Deutsche Bank [2000] 2 BCLC 461, para [47]; approved in Button v Phelps [2006] EWHC 53 (Ch), para [66].

338 [1973] 1 WLR 1126.

339 [2009] EWHC 786 (Ch), [2010] 1 BCLC 30.

The defence of authorisation

The second issue arising from the appeal in Boardman v Phipps surrounds the possibility of Boardman being relieved of any liability under constructive trust if he had made it known to the trustees and beneficiaries that he would be acquiring shares on his own behalf on the basis that the Phipps family trust could not and would not acquire those shares. Some of their Lordships indicated that they would have been prepared to find for Boardman if he could have demonstrated that he had made it clear to the trustees that he was acting on his own behalf, even though he had first acquired the confidential information as a fiduciary of the Phipps family trust. There is, as will emerge from the discussion to follow, a defence to an action for constructive trust on grounds of making personal profits that the fiduciary had authorisation so to do. On the facts of Boardman v Phipps, Mr Boardman did not disclose his purpose to all of the trustees: on the facts, one of the trustees was extremely ill and therefore such disclosure would have been impossible. Furthermore, the detail of the scheme had not been disclosed to all of the beneficiaries so that they could have given informed consent to the plan so as to release Boardman from his fiduciary duties in that regard. The majority of the House of Lords proceeded, as a result, on the basis that there was no authorisation given on the facts by the trustees nor that there was any release of liability nor assent given by the beneficiaries.

In the Privy Council decision in Queensland Mines v Hudson,³⁴⁰ the defendant had been managing director of the plaintiff company and had therefore been in a fiduciary relationship to that company. The defendant had learned of some potentially profitable mining contracts. The board of directors of that company decided not to pursue these possibilities after having been made aware of all the relevant facts. The company was not able to pursue the opportunity and the board of directors decided not to do so, knowing that the managing director intended to do so on his own account. Importantly, then, one director received the informed decision of the remainder of the board that this opportunity would not be pursued by the company, thus impliedly giving that individual director the authorisation to pursue the opportunity on his own account. The managing director resigned and pursued the business possibilities offered by the contracts on his own account, taking great personal risk in so doing. The company sought to recover the profits generated by the contract from the director. The court held that the repudiation of the contracts by the company meant that the director was entitled to pursue them on his own account without a conflict with his fiduciary responsibility to the company, even though the opportunity had come to the managing director by means of the fiduciary office.

The mainstream English law has remained rigidly on course, however. In similar circumstances to Queensland Mines v Hudson, in Industrial Development Consultants Ltd v Cooley,³⁴¹ a managing director was offered a contract by a third party. The offer was made expressly on the basis that the third party would deal only with the managing director, not with his employer company. Without disclosing this fact to the company and claiming to be in ill-health, the managing director left his employment and entered into a contract with the third party within a week of his resignation. It was held that the managing director occupied a fiduciary position in relation to his employer company throughout. He was therefore 340 (1977) 18 ALR 1. See also Framlington Group plc v Anderson [1995] BCC 611.

341 [1972] 2 All ER 162.

required to disclose all information to the company and to account for the profits he made under the contract under constructive trusteeship. Equally, if a director sought to tempt a client away from her employers, it has been held that that would constitute a breach of fiduciary duty with the effect that any profits so earned would have to be accounted for by way of constructive trust to the employer company.³⁴²

This rule is clearly set out in a number of contexts other than simply in relation to trusts and trustees. In Regal v Gulliver,³⁴³ which was approved by the House of Lords in Boardman v Phipps, it was held that directors of companies are fiduciaries and therefore similarly liable to account for profits made in the conduct of their duties. In Regal, four directors of the plaintiff company subscribed for shares in another company which the board of directors had intended to be acquired by the plaintiff company itself. The directors had acquired the shares personally because the company was not able to afford them, even though it did have the legal capacity to have acquired them. It was held that the directors' profits on these shares were profits made from their offices as directors. Therefore, they were required to account for them to the company. The four directors were not able to rely on their purported grant of authorisation to themselves to pursue this opportunity on their own account. Equally, if a director seeking authorisation from the other directors fails to make sufficiently full disclosure of all the relevant facts, then that director will not be taken to have acquired authorisation to earn personal profits.³⁴⁴

The defence of authorisation is considered in greater detail below concerning the 'corporate opportunity doctrine' in relation to which most of the decided cases on authorisation have arisen. The distinction between companies cases and trusts cases in this context has been that the director of a company may not divert a corporate opportunity to herself, whereas such commercial concerns do not arise in relation to ordinary trusts which do not carry on a trade. The principal distinction between trusts and companies is as follows: if a board of directors makes an informed decision not to pursue a business opportunity suggested to them by one solitary director (providing they have been given all of the available information without deceit or concealment), then that decision has been made by adults with commercial experience and access to legal and other professional advice,³⁴⁵ whereas when beneficiaries under a family trust make such decisions, they may not have the experience or knowledge to make informed decisions, particularly if they do not have impartial, professional advice to help them to reach their decisions as to their personal affairs in relation to the trust. Therefore, it will be easier to suggest that a single company director had authorisation to act, whereas a trustee will find it more difficult to prove that she had proper authorisation from the beneficiaries of a family trust.

To whom are the fiduciary's duties owed?

The third issue is: to whom does the fiduciary owe this duty of disclosure before the profits can be authorised? There appear to be three possibilities. The duty of the solicitor to a trust 342 Item Software (UK) Ltd v Fassihi [2002] EWHC 3116 (Ch), [2003] 2 BCLC 1.

343 [1942] 1 All ER 378.

344 IDC v Cooley [1972] 1 WLR 443; Gwembe Valley Development Co Ltd v Koshy (No 3) [2004] 1 BCLC 131, where the managing director of a company formed to farm in Zambia failed to disclose his personal interest in activities in which the company was engaged and therefore was held to be liable to account to the company for the profits which he had made.

345 As in Queensland Mines v Hudson (1977) 18 ALR 1.

could be said to be owed to the trustees, or simply to all of the beneficiaries, or to those beneficiaries affected by the profit-making. In Boardman, there appeared to be an assumption on the part of the House of Lords that this obligation was owed by the fiduciary to the trustees, and that it was the relationship primarily with the active trustee that was of most importance. In Queensland Mines v Hudson, the assumption was that consent could be acquired from the other directors (although it was the case that the two majority shareholders were represented on that board in any event). Now, s 170 of the Companies Act 2006 provides that directors owe their duties to the company (on which see below).

Only the strict application of Regal v Gulliver appears to suggest that fiduciaries cannot simply rely on the permission of other fiduciaries. In consequence, the duty of disclosure would be a duty to disclose to the shareholders of a company or to the beneficiaries of a trust respectively. This was the approach taken in the New Zealand decision in Equiticorp Industries Group Ltd v The Crown,³⁴⁶ which held that it was the shareholders of a company who were competent to authorise a fiduciary making such profits on a personal basis. However, even where no authorisation is given, if the fiduciary takes their benefit in a different capacity (for example, as a beneficiary under a will), there will be no liability to account. So, where, for example, a partner in a farming partnership was offered the chance, in the capacity of a beneficiary under the reversioner's will, to acquire the reversion over the agricultural tenancy held by the partnership, she was not liable to account because she was found to be benefiting from her status as a beneficiary and not exploiting her fiduciary office.³⁴⁷

Therefore, it would appear that a fiduciary acting in her fiduciary capacity must seek authorisation from the beneficiaries: any other point of view would open itself up to abuse. If the trustees had delegated their authority to a particular fiduciary, then there may be grounds for suggesting that the duty is owed primarily to those trustees. This situation might arise in circumstances in which a solicitor is appointed as in Boardman, or where a fund manager is appointed for the delegation of investment obligations. The risk with this approach is that fiduciaries may make decisions in their own interests and thus grant one another permission to act in certain circumstances, without necessarily concerning themselves with the interests of the beneficiaries. As Hayton suggests, the primary relationship of the trust is that between trustee and beneficiary, so that trustees must be considered to owe their duties primarily to the beneficiaries.³⁴⁸ As such, any fiduciary role in respect of a trust ought to be centred on an obligation ultimately owed to the beneficiaries. Therefore, if duties ought properly to be owed to the beneficiaries, it should be the beneficiaries who authorise any activities which are beyond the powers granted to the trustees under the trust instrument.

The appropriate equitable response

The fourth issue is the nature of the trust which should be enforced against the fiduciary pursuant to the previous discussion of the nature of the trust. It is clearly accepted that a fiduciary making a personal profit from her fiduciary office will hold those profits on constructive trust for the beneficiaries of that fiduciary duty.³⁴⁹ However, on the decided cases, some issues have arisen as to exactly how that trust operates. This section considers those issues.

346 [1998] 2 NZLR 485.

347 Ward v Brunt [2000] WTLR 731; Hancock Family Memorial Foundation Ltd v Porteous [2000] WTLR 1113 (Sup Ct (WA)).

348 Hayton, 1996.

If the fiduciary had used trust property to generate a profit, that profit would be said to derive from that property. As such, the trust would be entitled to a proprietary remedy against the fiduciary. That much seems uncontroversial.³⁵⁰ The Privy Council in *Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid*³⁵¹ took the view that, where a bribe is received in the course of employment, all profits connected to that property are held on proprietary constructive trust by the fiduciary for the employer.³⁵² Therefore, in relation to the rule against profit-making by fiduciaries, the profit ought to be held on proprietary constructive trust for the trust by the fiduciary. Whether or not there is identifiable property of the trust involved is not important, by analogy with Reid.³⁵³

The nature of the remedy of account for unauthorised profits

The proper approach to the nature of the remedy when a fiduciary acquires an unauthorised profit is set out by Rimer J in *Sinclair Investment Holdings SA v Versailles Trade Finance Ltd (No 3)*³⁵⁴ and by Lawrence Collins J in CMS Dolphin Ltd v Simonet,³⁵⁵ as set out variously below.³⁵⁶ The remedy has always been generally described by the courts on the basis that the fiduciary is liable to hold the profits on constructive trust or (where no such property remains) that the fiduciary is ‘liable to account’ to the beneficiaries for the unauthorised profit. The question then is: what is meant by the obligation to account? It could relate either to a proprietary right in relation to the profits themselves or simply a personal obligation to pay an amount of money equal to the profits earned.

Rimer J has explained this doctrine accurately in *Sinclair Investment Holdings SA v Versailles Trade Finance Ltd (No 3)*³⁵⁷ in the following terms:

... any identifiable assets acquired by fiduciaries in breach of their fiduciary duty are, and can be declared to be, held upon constructive trust for the principal (Boardman

349 As in Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324.

350 The liability for breach of trust in this context is considered in Chapter 18.

351 [1994] 1 AC 324, [1994] 1 All ER 1.

352 As discussed above at para 12.4.1.

353 Professor Burrows has argued that this doctrine ought to be considered to be restitutionary (Burrows, 2002, 409), although this form of constructive trust is more usually expressed as being a proprietary trust arising on the basis of good conscience. Burrows’s viewpoint is based on the premise that the fiduciary is unjustly enriched by making an unauthorised profit. The potential weakness with considering this constructive trust to be restitutionary is that there is no restitution, in the sense of some restoration, of property to the beneficiaries because the beneficiaries would have had no pre-existing rights in the property aside from the chimerical confidential information. As set out by Lord Templeman in Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid, the constructive trust arises on the basis of equitable principle and not unjust enrichment.

354 [2007] EWHC 915, 10 ITELR 58.

355 [2001] 2 BCLC 704.

356 This discussion is set out below at the end of this section in relation to the ‘corporate opportunity doctrine’ in company law.

357 [2007] EWHC 915, 10 ITELR 58.

v Phipps, AG Hong Kong v Reid, Daraydan Holdings Ltd v Solland) . . . There will in practice often be no identifiable property which can be declared by the court to be held upon such a constructive trust, in which case no declaration will be made and the principal may at most be entitled to a personal remedy in the nature of an account of profits. In Boardman's case the court made a declaration that the shares that had been acquired by the fiduciaries were held on constructive trust (a proprietary remedy), and directed an account of the profits that had come into their hands from those shares (a personal remedy). Boardman's case can be said to have been a hard case as regards the fiduciaries, whose integrity and honesty was not in doubt; and it well illustrates the rigours of the applicable equitable principle. The recovery by the trust of the shares was obviously a valuable benefit to it; and equity's softer side was reflected in the making of an allowance to the fiduciaries for their work and skill in obtaining the shares and profits. On the very different facts of Reid's case, there was no question of any such allowance being made.

Therefore, the position is clear: the primary remedy is for a proprietary constructive trust over the personal profits; the secondary remedy (if there is no property over which the constructive trust can take effect) is for a personal remedy in the form of an account of profits; and thirdly the court may make some equitable accounting to reduce the amount of any such account if the court considers the circumstances to be appropriate for the equitable relief of such a defendant.³⁵⁸

The primary form which the liability to account takes is in the form of a constructive trust, whereby a proprietary right is imposed over those profits such that the fiduciary becomes a constructive trustee over those profits. Because the claimant-beneficiary³⁵⁹ acquires a proprietary right over the profits, that beneficiary also has a proprietary right over any property that is acquired with those profits. This constructive trust right also means that even if those profits are mixed with other money, then the beneficiary acquires a right to trace into that mixture or into any substitute property and to impose a proprietary right over it, as discussed in Chapter 19 'Tracing'. The secondary form which the liability to account takes is predicated on the idea either that the profits cannot be traced or that the property substituted for the profits can be traced but has become worthless. In such a situation, the proprietary right would be worthless. In this second context, the fiduciary's liability is to account for the amount of the unauthorised profits personally by paying money or money's worth to the trust equal to the amount of the profits. This chapter focuses primarily on the constructive trust.

However, perhaps the easiest way to understand how this head of liability works is to think about what it means to be a 'constructive trustee'. A 'constructive trust' is a trust which the court 'construes' or 'constructs' in circumstances in which the legal owner of property has behaved unconscionably in relation to property. Thus, a "constructive trustee" is a person who is construed to be a trustee. There is an important distinction between a fiduciary's liability to account for unauthorised profits and the liability of an express trustee to account for breach of trust (where the latter liability is based on the decision of the House of Lords in *Target Holdings v Redferns*³⁶⁰). An express trustee is liable to reconstitute the trust fund and to compensate the beneficiaries for any loss which flows from a breach of trust; whereas a fiduciary's liability to account for unauthorised profits does not require that the beneficiaries have suffered a loss. So, in the leading case of *Boardman v Phipps*³⁶¹ the beneficiaries had suffered no loss but were nevertheless entitled to force Boardman to account for his unauthorised profits. Consequently this is not a restitutionary remedy because the fiduciary need not have earned her profits at the beneficiaries' expense, as the theory of restitution of unjust enrichment requires. Instead, it is enough that the equitable wrong of earning unauthorised profits from a fiduciary office has been committed. The basis of this liability is predicated on an actual or even a potential conflict between the fiduciary's personal interests and her fiduciary office.³⁶² The fiduciary must then account for those profits by means of a constructive trust or secondarily by means of a personal liability to account.

358 See also Markel International Insurance Co Ltd v Surety Guarantee Consultants Ltd [2008] EWHC 1135 (Comm) illustrating the principle that secret profits made by a fiduciary must be accounted for.

359 The 'claimant-beneficiary' in relation to fiduciary duties generally is a general reference to whoever takes the benefit of that fiduciary relationship, whether a beneficiary under a trust or the company in relation to a director, and so forth.

The precise nature of the remedy was subtly differently expressed by some of their Lordships. Lord Cohen held that the fiduciary should be 'accountable to the respondent for his share of the net profits which they derived from the transaction', which could theoretically be explained as being either a proprietary or a personal remedy. Lord Guest was clear, however, that he had 'no hesitation in coming to the conclusion' that the profits were to be held on constructive trust. Lords Hodson and Guest were bolstered in their decisions in finding inter alia that the confidential information obtained by Boardman was the property of the Phipps family trust, thus justifying the existence of a constructive trust. What is also clear was that the House of Lords was asked specifically on the appeal whether or not the profits were to be held on constructive trust, and therefore their Lordships can be understood as having found a proprietary constructive trust, just as Wilberforce J had done at first instance.

Other possible approaches would be simply to make good the amount lost to the trust in money terms. This would not amount to a proprietary remedy necessarily.³⁶³ By contrast, an alternative argument might be that in circumstances in which the fiduciary had made a profit in advising the trust without using trust property, any harm which resulted to the beneficiaries could be resolved by a personal claim against the fiduciary for the money received by way of equitable compensation. In Target Holdings v Redferns,³⁶⁴ Lord Browne-Wilkinson identified three possible remedies in connection with trustees' liability for a breach of trust. The first was equitable compensation; the second was the reinstatement of the trust fund, a proprietary remedy; and the third was a payment of money to the trust equal to the value of the amount lost by the trust fund.

The corporate opportunity doctrine

Many of the cases discussed this far relate specifically to company law and therefore it may be useful to identify some of the differences between company law and trusts law in this regard. There are three circumstances in which a company director may earn personal profits:

360 [1996] 1 AC 421.

361 [1967] 2 AC 46.

362 Eg Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46.

363 So, in Canada, the appropriate award has been held to be damages for breach of duty rather than an account of profits or a constructive trust: Canadian Aero Service Ltd v O'Malley (1973) 40 DLR (3d) 371.

364 [1996] 1 AC 421, [1995] 3 WLR 352, [1995] 3 All ER 785.

first, if she has authorisation to do so; secondly, if she has resigned from her employment before commencing the activities which led to the profit; and, thirdly, if the director had no powers at all to act as a director in practice before then making those personal profits. Each of these approaches is then taken in turn. First, the complex question of the acquisition of authorisation in relation to companies. Before considering this question in detail, it is important to understand the subtle differences between companies and trusts.

The modern company grew out of trusts in the late 19th century. The principal difference between the two institutions is that companies have distinct legal personality,³⁶⁵ whereas trusts do not.³⁶⁶ Therefore, a company is absolute owner of its own property; the directors of the company take no title in the company's property and are therefore not trustees in that sense of the term.³⁶⁷ Directors are nevertheless fiduciaries. Directors owe their fiduciary duties to the company, but do not owe fiduciary duties to the shareholders of the company in the same way that trustees owe duties to their beneficiaries. Significantly, whereas beneficiaries are the equitable owners of the property held on trust, shareholders are not recognised as having any equitable ownership of the company's property. Rather, any rights of ownership which the shareholders might have are restricted to ownership of their individual shares in the company and to any rights they may have to the company's property under the company's constitution if the company is wound up. It is worth noting also that a business partner³⁶⁸ who earns unauthorised, personal profits in relation to a partnership's property or commercial opportunities, will also be required to account as a constructive trustee to her fellow partners for those profits.³⁶⁹ Thus, we will need to make a division here broadly between commercial situations, for example those involving company directors and business partners, and non-commercial situations, for example those involving family trusts. The principle in the abstract remains the same – a fiduciary may not permit a conflict of interest – but, as we shall see, that principle may operate slightly differently in commercial situations.

Given that company law is based historically in trusts law, there is no surprise that the *Keech v Sandford*³⁷⁰ doctrine has been extended to preclude company directors from making unauthorised profits in the same way as trustees.³⁷¹ One principal difference between company law and trusts law is that the trustees would, it appears, be required to seek authorisation from the beneficiaries as equitable owners of the trust fund, whereas company shareholders do not have equivalent equitable title in the company's property and therefore the directors' duties are not owed to the shareholders in the same way that trustees owe their duties to beneficiaries.³⁷² Consequently, for company directors to seek authorisation requires

365 Salomon v A Salomon & Co Ltd [1897] AC 22.

366 Smith v Anderson (1880) 15 Ch D 247.

367 Although the courts in company law cases do occasionally express the role of company directors as being akin to that of a trustee on occasion: eg, Re Lands Allotment Co [1894] 1 Ch 616; Re Duckwari plc [1999] Ch 253, [1998] 2 BCLC 315.

368 Under English law, a partnership is an undertaking in common with a view to profit (Partnership Act 1890, s 1) and therefore English law partnerships always involve commercial activity of necessity. Partnerships are not companies, however, and have no legal personality. Partners owe each other fiduciary duties in English law in general terms.

369 Lindsley v Woodfull [2004] 2 BCLC 131

370 (1726) Sel Cas Ch 61.

371 Cook v Deeks [1916] 1 AC 554.

372 Percival v Wright [1902] 2 Ch 421. Cf Allen v Hyatt (1914) 30 TLR 444, where the directors undertook exceptionally to act as the agents of the shareholders as well as in the capacity of directors of the company.

that to acquire authorisation they approach either the board of directors – as the organ of management in the company – or the company’s shareholders in general meeting. This bifurcation in control of the company is a complex feature of modern company law. The directors are taken to be the management of the company with control of its day-to-day affairs, but the Companies Act 2006 retains a variety of powers, including the power to remove individual directors from office,³⁷³ for the company’s shareholders in general meetings or extraordinary general meetings.

Consequently, the complex issue in *Regal v Gulliver*³⁷⁴ (considered above) was whether or not the directors could be said to have given authority to themselves as private individuals to pursue a business opportunity in their own names. On the one hand, the directors were solely responsible for the management of the company and therefore it could have been said that they were perfectly competent to grant this authorisation. However, the House of Lords was concerned, amongst other things, to prevent the management from perpetrating a fraud on the shareholders by diverting a business opportunity to themselves which ought properly to have been exploited on behalf of the company. Company law has, in consequence, developed a concept known as the ‘corporate opportunity’ doctrine whereby the directors will be liable to hold any profits on constructive trust for the company if those profits were made from an opportunity which the company could have exploited or which the company would have exploited but for the actions of the directors in diverting the opportunity for their own, personal benefits. Contrariwise, it is suggested by the corporate opportunity doctrine that if the director were not diverting a maturing business opportunity to herself, then there will be no liability to hold any personal profits on constructive trust for the company. That means, that if the director took advantage of commercial activity which the company itself did not intend to exploit, then it would not be a breach of the director’s fiduciary duties if she took advantage of it.

Therefore, in Queensland Mines v Hudson,³⁷⁵ the managing director sought authorisation to develop this business opportunity for his own benefit only once it had become clear that the company would not be able to pursue the opportunity and further that the board of directors had decided that it was not an opportunity which the company would then pursue, knowing of the managing director’s personal interest in the transaction. The rejection of the opportunity by the board of directors meant that Hudson was not appropriating a corporate opportunity for his own purposes, precisely because the board of directors had decided that it would not be an opportunity which the company should have pursued. If the board of directors has given informed consent to a director to exploit a business opportunity on her own account, then the director will be absolved from liability as constructive trustee.³⁷⁶ Provided that the company has not been misled,³⁷⁷ the board of directors may release a director from liability as a constructive trustee.³⁷⁸ By contrast, in Regal v Gulliver, even though there is a suggestion that the directors considered the company to be unable to procure the requisite finance to pursue the opportunity, the court nevertheless decided that the opportunity was one which the company would have wanted to pursue and therefore that 373 See Morse, Hudson, et al, Guide to the Companies Act 2006, Sweet & Maxwell, 2006, generally.

374 [1942] 1 All ER 378.

375 (1977) 18 ALR 1.

376 Peso Silver Mines Ltd v Cropper (1966) 58 DLR (2d) 1, Supreme Court of Canada.

377 See IDC Ltd v Cooley [1972] 1 WLR 443 considered below.

378 New Zealand Netherlands Society 'Oranje' Inc v Kuys [1973] 1 WLR 1126, [1973] 2 All ER 1222, PC.

it was a corporate opportunity. That the directors in Regal v Gulliver sought to give themselves permission to pursue an opportunity on their own account was evidently too self-serving to constitute a valid release of liability; on the decided cases, there is only authorisation when the majority of the board of directors has made a decision not to pursue an opportunity in the face of the suggestion made by a minority of directors who subsequently leave their employment to pursue the opportunity which the remainder of the board of directors had not wished the company to pursue.

Recent cases in company law have suggested that this corporate opportunity doctrine will be pursued so that a director may be absolved from liability for secret profits if the company is not intending to pursue the opportunity.³⁷⁹ So, in Island Export Finance Ltd v Umunna,³⁸⁰ the company had a contract with the government of Cameroon to supply the government with post boxes. Mr Umunna resigned from the company once the contract was completed, having worked on that contract and acquired a great deal of expertise in that particular activity. The company ceased pursuing this line of business and after his resignation Mr Umunna entered into a similar contract on his own behalf. The company sued him for the personal profits which he made for himself under this second contract. The court held that Mr Umunna's fiduciary obligations towards the company did not cease once he resigned from its employment. This makes sense: if it were not the case, then no fiduciary could ever be bound by their fiduciary office if they had the good sense to resign immediately before breaching their duties. However, in this instance, the court found that the company had not been seeking to develop this sort of business opportunity at the time Mr Umunna had done so and therefore he had not interfered with a corporate opportunity.

Secondly, we should consider the position of directors who have resigned from their employment. In Balston v Headline Filters Ltd,³⁸¹ a director had resigned from a company and leased premises with a view to starting up in business on his own account before a client of the company approached him and asked him to work for the company. Falconer J held that there was no breach of duty in these circumstances because there was nothing wrong with a director leaving his employment and setting up in business on his own account and, furthermore, there had not been any maturing business opportunity in this case which the director had diverted to himself. Therefore, in company law, it has been held that company directors may, assuming nothing in their contracts to the contrary prohibiting such an action under contract law, resign from their posts and on the next day begin activities which would previously have been in breach of their fiduciary duties.³⁸² Although, a director may not, even after resigning from her post, use either the company's property or information which she had acquired while still a director of the company to generate personal profits.³⁸³ Clearly, if such behaviour were possible then it would constitute all too easy a method for eluding the principle against fiduciaries earning unauthorised profits: one could learn commercially useful information at work on Monday, resign on Tuesday, and make a huge personal profit on Wednesday from that information. Instead, the law of contract permits a person to leave 379 See generally Lowry and Edmonds, 2002.

380 [1986] BCC 460.

381 [1990] FSR 385.

382 CMS Dolphin v Simonet [2001] 2 BCLC 704 (Lawrence Collins J); Quarter Master UK Ltd v Pyke [2005] 1 BCLC 245, 264 (Mr Paul Morgan QC) and British Midland Tool Ltd v Midland International Tooling Ltd [2003] 2 BCLC 523 (Hart J).

383 Ultraframe UK Ltd v Fielding [2005] EWHC 1638 (Ch), [2005] All ER (D) 397, per Lewison J.

one employment and begin work elsewhere, but the law on constructive trust prevents that person also taking advantage of a conflict between her personal interests and her fiduciary office for that previous employer.

Thirdly, we must consider the position of directors who have no effective powers to act as a director. In the case of *In Plus Group Ltd v Pyke*³⁸⁴ Mr Pyke was a director of a company, In Plus Ltd, but he had ‘fallen out with his co-director’ and in consequence he had been ‘effectively excluded from the management of the company’. Mr Pyke decided to set up a company on his own while he was still a director of In Plus Ltd. So, he set up his own company and that company entered into contracts on its own behalf with a major customer of In Plus Ltd. Remarkably, the Court of Appeal held that Mr Pyke was not in breach of his fiduciary duties to In Plus Ltd because he had not used any property belonging to In Plus Ltd and also because he had not made any use of any confidential information which he had acquired while he was a director of In Plus Ltd. As Sedley LJ held:

Quite exceptionally, the defendant’s duty to the claimants had been reduced to vanishing point by the acts (explicable and even justifiable though they may have been) of his sole fellow director and fellow shareholder Mr Plank. Accepting as I do that the claimants’ relationship with Constructive was consistent with successful poaching on Mr Pyke’s part, the critical fact is that it was done in a situation in which the dual role which is the necessary predicate of [the claimants’] case is absent. The defendant’s role as a director of the claimants was throughout the relevant period entirely nominal, not in the sense in which a non-executive director’s position might (probably wrongly) be called nominal but in the concrete sense that he was entirely excluded from all decision-making and all participation in the claimant company’s affairs. For all the influence he had, he might as well have resigned.

It is suggested that this is an exceptional decision and it is difficult to square with the strictness of the approach in cases such as Regal v Gulliver. Had Mr Pyke been a non-executive director of In Plus it would still have been difficult to see how he could have used information acquired while on company business for his personal gain without there being some suggestion that there was at the very least a conflict between his personal interests and the fiduciary duties which he owed to the company.

This case does raise a more general point which is of importance in relation to company law – and one which is little discussed in the cases: how should equity deal with people who are directors of more than one company? If a director is a director of X Ltd and also a director of Y Ltd – something which is common in practice – then that director may learn information while acting for one company which would be beneficial to the other company. Is the director to be precluded from passing on that information learned while working for X Ltd to her fellow directors of Y Ltd? On the one hand, she owes a duty to X Ltd to keep its confidential information secret. On the other hand, it may be said that she owes another duty to Y Ltd to bring all her knowledge to bear so as to make profits for Y Ltd. If she is not required to do so then she owes little duty to Y Ltd; but if she is required to do so then this effectively destroys her duties of confidentiality to X Ltd. Where the information is confidential then it is suggested that she would be obliged to keep that information confidential and to say nothing to anyone at Y Ltd. If the rule were a different one then money-laundering regulation and insider dealing regulation would be at odds with the case law because confidential information could be passed at law, even if it was required to be dealt with differently by statute.

384 [2002] 2 BCLC 201; considered in Ultraframe UK Ltd v Fielding [2005] EWHC 1638 (Ch), [2005] All ER (D) 397.

The more difficult situation would revolve around information which was not confidential. Suppose that the fiduciary attended training paid for by X Ltd and learned of a new method for earning money: would that general knowledge be something which she could use when working for Y Ltd? If it is not confidential, then why not? If she learned a marketplace rumour while working for X Ltd and then went to Y Ltd and shared that non-confidential information with co-workers, could that constitute an abuse of her fiduciary duty? It is difficult to see why if that information was not confidential to X Ltd, although she might be helping Y Ltd, a competitor, to make profits which otherwise X Ltd might have been able to corner a market in. These questions are difficult to answer with complete certainty, they are little discussed in the cases on constructive trusts, and yet they arise frequently in the commercial world.

In practice such matters would be dealt with by a well-drafted contract of employment for that director or by the company's constitutional documents (in the form of its articles of association) and so may not be a question for equity to resolve necessarily. The question is still likely to arise in practice. In part it is resolved by the law relating to constructive trusts in relation to confidential information, which is considered below, whereby a fiduciary is bound by duties of confidentiality and therefore ought to respect the confidence of the company on whose business that confidential information was learned. It is still difficult, however, for a human being to forget confidential information and to act in relation to the second company as though she did not know it. Suppose the information were 'confidential' in the sense that it constituted know-how learned on a training course as to a means of constructing a new type of successful investment portfolio: if that director used that new-found know-how when working for a company which had not paid for the training course, or which had not provided that information, then would it be a breach of duty? How could this director forget her new-found knowledge and pretend to act less knowledgeably when working for the second company?

The importance of restrictions on the freedom of fiduciaries, in spite of dissentient rumblings in recent cases relating to directors' duties

In two other recent cases there have been signals that the Court of Appeal is reluctant to persist with the strict approach of the principle against secret profits being made by fiduciaries. This section considers the reasons behind those decisions and demonstrates that they are ill-founded. The principal concern among these judges has been the perceived strictness of the test. Nevertheless, it is suggested, fiduciaries may not earn secret profits from their fiduciary duties nor may they permit any possible conflict between their personal interests and their fiduciary duties: that is central to being a fiduciary. It is common to consider that the decision in Boardman v Phipps was harsh in its treatment of an honest and hard-working solicitor who risked his own money; however, the long-standing point of fiduciary duties is that they must be carried out selflessly in the interests of the beneficiaries. Professional fiduciaries like Boardman are entitled to organise the trust instrument (or the company's articles of association) so that they are paid, their expenses covered and their liabilities limited (as in *Armitage v Nurse*³⁸⁵): but in the absence of such limitations, it is simply prohibited for fiduciaries to take personal profits from any activity even indirectly connected to their fiduciary duties so as to ensure that all fiduciaries carry out their fiduciary duties entirely faithfully and selflessly. Boardman earned profits in the performance of his fiduciary duties, and therefore there was a conflict between those two interests because he was not acting entirely selflessly in the interests of the beneficiaries, but rather also in his personal capacity.

Nevertheless, in *Murad v Al-Saraj*³⁸⁶ Arden LJ chose to cast doubt on the suitability of the doctrine in Boardman v Phipps to the extent that that doctrine imposed liability to hold property on constructive trust on people who had not been demonstrated to have acted wrongly. She expressed a preference for liability being based on some fault by the defendant. However, speaking in the Court of Appeal she acknowledged that it was not open to her to overrule Boardman v Phipps.³⁸⁷ It should be noted that the majority in Boardman v Phipps were all-too-aware that they were imposing a constructive trust on a person who had acted in good faith. Rix LJ in *Foster v Bryant*³⁸⁸ was similarly equivocal to Arden LJ about the inflexibility of the test in Boardman v Phipps. His Lordship, with respect, became overly concerned in his survey of the cases with the notion that the defendant must be misusing trust (or company) property in some way so as to be liable to hold his profits on constructive trust, and thus overlooked the central point of the principle reiterated by Lord Upjohn in Boardman v Phipps that its purpose was to prevent both conflicts of interest and even the possibility that there was a conflict of interest. The purpose of that principle is to provide that once one acts in a fiduciary capacity it is simply impossible to take personal profits from a transaction in which the trust (or company) has or may have a direct or an indirect interest.

In *Foster v Bryant*³⁸⁹ the defendant director of a company was effectively forced to resign by his co-director (who was also the majority shareholder of the company). The defendant resigned from the company after his co-director ‘truculently’ made the defendant’s wife redundant. The defendant was found to have been excluded from the operation of the business, just like the defendant in In Plus above. One of the company’s principal clients wanted to retain the services of both directors. Before the defendant’s resignation came into effect (that is, while he was still technically a director but after he had tendered his resignation) the client began to talk to the defendant about the way in which the defendant could work with this client. Importantly, the defendant had resigned at this stage. When the defendant’s resignation took effect, he began to work for the client. The company sued the defendant on the basis that he had been a director of the company when the business opportunity came to light and therefore it was argued that any profits earned from that opportunity should be subject to an account in favour of the company. While it was the company which brought the action, in practice it was the majority shareholder (who was also the defendant’s co-director) who 385 See section 8.5.

386 [2005] EWCA Civ 959.

387 In that case, the Murad sisters entered into a joint venture with Al-Saraj to buy a hotel but Al-Saraj did not disclose that he stood to earn personal profits in the form of a commission from the vendor for setting up the transaction. It was found that he had committed fraudulent misrepresentations in relation to the Murad sisters and furthermore that he had stood in a fiduciary capacity in relation to them. The profits had been earned from his fiduciary office without authorisation. Accordingly, he was held liable to account to the Murad sisters for his profits. On the facts, the principle was not one which was at all harsh.

388 [2007] Bus LR 1565.

389 Ibid.

was driving the litigation. It was the same person who had driven the defendant to resign his directorship. Consequently, the sympathy of Rix LJ was evidently with the defendant. He sought to distinguish the decided cases on the basis severally that they concerned a misuse of the company's property, that many of them concerned 'faithless fiduciaries' who took wrongful or deceitful advantage of their employers (as in Cooley), or that they were diversions of maturing business opportunities by the fiduciary. Rix LJ did not doubt that a director needed to deal in good faith with the company nor that a fiduciary could not earn profits in secret from her office from an opportunity which belonged to the company or for which the company was negotiating. However, those principles must be applied in a 'fact-sensitive' way – considering the ripeness of the business opportunity, the specificity of the opportunity, and thus whether the director had diverted the specific opportunity open to the company. It was held that the position changed in this company after the defendant's resignation such that he was excluded from the business and thus had only to act honestly in his role as director, and therefore that he was not required to account for his subsequent profits. Importantly, while agreeing with Rix LJ, Buxton LJ pointed out that just because a fiduciary had not sought to create a conflict of interest that did not necessarily mean that there was no conflict of interest. Furthermore, the fiduciary is required to account for profits in general terms even if no loss is suffered by the company.

Three points emerge, however, it is suggested. First, when one is a fiduciary then one may not take an unauthorised profit from one's fiduciary capacity: end of story. We live in a world where we expect to be able to take whatever we want, to earn quick profits, and to please ourselves. The idea of fiduciary duty comes from the idea that in some contexts people should be required to act selflessly for others, especially where they have voluntarily accepted that office and are being paid for it (like directors of trading companies). As Moses LJ put it in Foster v Bryant,³⁹⁰ the need to take a 'fact-sensitive' approach to each case might almost 'make one nostalgic for the days in when there were inflexible rules, inexorably enforced by judges who would have shuddered at the reiteration of the noun-adjective [fact-sensitive]'. One such inflexible rule is the rule that a fiduciary may not take an unauthorised profit in circumstances in which there may possibly be a conflict between her personal interests and her fiduciary duties. Secondly, this rule is not so strict as all that. Equity does have an ability to relieve a worthy defendant (as in Boardman v Phipps) by requiring some account to be given to her. Thirdly, for those who argue that equity is too uncertain for commercial use, it is not open to them to criticise the ancient doctrine which was put to work in Boardman v Phipps which unquestionably has the virtue of predictability about it.

Furthermore, in understanding what equity takes 'unconscionability' to mean, it is simply the case that equity considers it to be unconscionable for a fiduciary to permit even the possibility of a conflict between her personal and her fiduciary capacities by taking an unauthorised profit from that office. Just as we might think that murder or theft are examples of things which are unconscionable in almost all circumstances, equity takes the same prudent attitude to fiduciaries taking personal profits from their offices. If you are acting in a fiduciary capacity, then you are obliged to work selflessly for the company and for your contractually agreed salary. In Umunna, in Foster v Bryant and in In Plus the judges were convinced that on the facts before them there was no interest belonging to the company which the fiduciary had diverted away from it. By contrast in Cooley there had been deceit and in Regal v

390 [2007] Bus LR 1565, 1598.

Gulliver there had clearly been a diversion of an opportunity to the directors personally. Where the context suggests that there is no risk of a conflict of interest, then the doctrine does not apply to the duties of those directors. Such a distinction between the obligations of a trustee would be more difficult to prove than in relation to a trading company where one would expect all of the parties to be clearer about their respective rights and duties.

The maintenance of the strict approach in company law cases

The company law cases considered in the previous section seemed to suggest a weakening of the principle against conflict of interests. This is not the case, on the basis of the cases considered in this section, including some more recent cases. Furthermore, as considered below, a new statutory code has been introduced for company directors in the Companies Act 2006. Nevertheless, the stricter approach derived from Keech v Sandford considered above still appears to hold sway for the most part in England.³⁹¹ There will only be a defence to liability for constructive trust in exceptional cases where either the director has acquired authorisation from the board of directors, without the board acting in bad faith in so doing,³⁹² or where the company is not pursuing the opportunity in question. This defence will not be available to any fiduciary who can be demonstrated to have been acting in bad faith.³⁹³ So, in IDC Ltd v Cooley,³⁹⁴ a managing director of an architectural practice failed to win a construction contract for the company but was subsequently offered the contract in his personal capacity. The clients had not wanted to offer the work to that consultancy but did want to use the defendant personally. The defendant then left his employment with the company, lying to them that he was in ill-health, and then pursued the contract on his own account. Roskill J held that the defendant should be liable to account to the company for the whole of his personal profits. Here the defendant had deliberately misled his employer while attempting to divert a business opportunity to himself.³⁹⁵ Similarly, in Crown Dilmun v Sutton,³⁹⁶ the controlling mind of a company learned of an opportunity to develop a football ground which he exploited on his own account once his contract of employment had been terminated. It was found that he had not made full disclosure to the claimant company of the extent of the opportunity. Consequently, he was liable to account to the claimant for the personal profits realised from the transaction. Company law may alter its direction now that s 175 of the

391 IDC Ltd v Cooley [1972] 1 WLR 443; Carlton v Halestrap (1988) 4 BCC 538.

392 As in Regal v Gulliver [1942] 1 All ER 378; [1967] 2 AC 134n.

393 Although cases such as IDC Ltd v Cooley [1972] 1 WLR 443 indicate a continued affection for the stricter approach.

394 [1972] 1 WLR 443.

395 The contentious element of this case is the suggestion that the client would not have used the company but only the defendant personally. The deceit involved appears to have been significant in this instance. It is suggested, however, that that would be to look at the wrong aspect of the case. That an employee seeks to resign her employment and even that she misleads the employer as to her reasons for doing so is not in itself a reason for the imposition of a constructive trust. What is significant is whether or not the fiduciary is trying to divert to herself an opportunity which ought to have been exploited for the benefit of the company. The good or bad faith of the fiduciary cannot matter if the principle is to be strictly applied in any event. It cannot be the purpose of this doctrine that it be used so as to punish lies in the abstract: its purpose is to prevent the shareholders of a company and the company itself from having business opportunities filched from them by venal or by otherwise faithful fiduciaries.

396 [2004] 1 BCLC 468.

Companies Act 2006 has introduced a general duty for company directors not to permit conflicts of interest: the courts may interpret this in accordance with the corporate opportunity doctrine or may return to the stricter approach in Boardman v Phipps.

Three more recent cases have reverted to the traditional approach after Foster v Bryant, Murad v Al-Saraj (considered below) and In Plus Ltd. So, the Court of Appeal in *Re Allied Business and Financial Consultants Ltd*³⁹⁷ returned to the traditional ‘no conflict’ principle in Aberdeen Railway and Regal v Gulliver to the effect that company directors owe an undivided loyalty to the company akin to the obligations of a trustee. Here a director had diverted a business opportunity to an undertaking under his control when it had been difficult to interest any of the company’s clients in investing in the opportunity. The strictness of the traditional principle was nevertheless upheld.

A comparatively straightforward case of diverting business opportunities away from a company arose in Berryland Books Ltd v BK Books Ltd.³⁹⁸ However, this is not simply a case involving diversion of a business opportunity, but rather it also involved the use of the company’s assets. The defendant director managed the UK operation of an international publishing company. The director then set up a new company which took over the first company’s business opportunities and solicited its staff to work for the new company. In essence, the defendant used all of the first company’s assets and staff under a new company name, even to the extent of using the first company’s resources to set up competing websites and to market the new company’s products at industry conferences. It was held that the defendant had breached the ‘fundamental duty of loyalty’ bound up with being a director.

In *PNC Telecom plc v Thomas (No 2)*³⁹⁹ it was held that there would be a conflict of interest when the defendant director voted in a situation where there was a clear conflict of interest: the vote related to a proposal for a change in control of the company which would affect whether or not that director was removed as a director. It was held that the conflict of interest principle still applied, even though this was clearly the sort of case on exclusion from participation in the management of the business which had motivated Rix LJ in Foster v Bryant.

In reading each of these cases, it is clear that the judges could have adopted the trend established by Sedley, Arden and Rix LJ in Foster v Bryant and In Plus Ltd, as discussed above. In each case, it could possibly have been argued that the directors had been excluded from the management of the business or that they had sought to leave the directorship before exploiting an opportunity. Alternatively, Rix LJ might even have considered that the defendant in Berryland Books was a ‘false fiduciary’. However, the important point is that in each case the courts returned to the leading cases and to the strict version of the rule.

Another illustration of a return to the strict approach to this principle (and referring to the principle as set out in the Companies Act 2006) appears in the Court of Appeal in *Towers v Premier Waste Ltd*⁴⁰⁰ where a director of a waste management company accepted a free loan of machinery from a customer which he used in the renovation of a dilapidated farmhouse and outbuildings belonging to himself and his wife. Mummery LJ took a particularly strict line in holding that the company had a right to consider whether or not it considered this transaction to be a diversion of an opportunity away from the company, and thus to require an account

397 [2009] 2 BCLC 666.

398 [2009] 2 BCLC 709.

499 [2008] 2 BCLC 95.

400 [2011] EWCA Civ 923, [2011] IRLR 73.

from the director. Under the Companies Act 2006, the director owed a duty of loyalty to the company, which included an obligation to avoid conflicts of interest and a duty not to make unauthorised profits. In consequence, the director's contentions that this was a purely private matter between himself and the customer which had no bearing on his relationship with the company that employed him did not find favour with the Court of Appeal. It signals a return to the strict interpretation of this principle. It was difficult to see what the company was losing by the director's use of machinery owned by a customer which was in bad repair so as to refurbish his own property. In essence, the court considered that the company was owed the opportunity to assess the potential benefits which the company could have taken from the transaction. The trial judge had found that the director should account to the company for the hire charge which the customer would have charged the company itself for the hire of this machinery. This is clearly in the form of holding the director strictly to his duties to the company because it is not actually a loss suffered by the company, nor could the director be shown to have acted in bad faith. Instead, the amount for which the director had to account was not even a profit which the director had earned (although perhaps it could be thought of as a cost which he had avoided, which comes to the same thing). Nevertheless, the opportunity which is diverted away from the company in this situation is difficult to identify.

The nature of the remedy as discussed in company law

The company law texts have a tendency to overlook the precise nature of the equitable remedies which are imposed over company directors.⁴⁰¹ As is discussed in Chapter 21, company directors owe a range of duties to the company. We shall focus on the obligations of directors as fiduciaries not to earn unauthorised profits. The way in which Lawrence Collins J conceived of the liability of directors under company law in *CMS Dolphin Ltd v Simonet*⁴⁰² was explicitly by way of analogy with the law of trusts. So, in *CMS Dolphin Ltd v Simonet*⁴⁰³ Simonet left a company, an advertising agency, after a falling-out with his co-founder of that agency, Ball. Both men had been directors of that company. Simonet established a rival agency and attracted clients from his former employer. The first advertising agency claimed that Simonet was in breach of his fiduciary duties as a director in diverting business opportunities from the first advertising agency to his new agency. Lawrence Collins J upheld Simonet's liability for diverting a corporate opportunity and so made him liable to account as a constructive trustee for the profits that had been earned from this activity. What is particularly important for present purposes is that manner in which Lawrence Collins J concluded his judgment by explaining the operation of this doctrine, as his Lordship saw it:

In my judgment the underlying basis of the liability of a director who exploits after his resignation a maturing business opportunity of the company is that the opportunity is to be treated as if it were property of the company in relation to which the director had fiduciary duties. By seeking to exploit the opportunity after resignation he is appropriating for himself that property. He is just as accountable as a trustee who retires without 401 See for example Gower and Davies, Modern Company Law (2008) 577, which omits to mention constructive trust or account at all.

402 [2001] 2 BCLC 704.

403 Ibid.

properly accounting for trust property. In the case of the director he becomes a constructive trustee of the fruits of his abuse of the company's property, which he has acquired in circumstances where he knowingly had a conflict of interest, and exploited it by resigning from the company.

The context of the trust may be very different in practice, however. For example, it will be easier to demonstrate that one has the informed consent and authorisation of other company directors – who are likely to be commercial people whom a court will believe will have understood the necessary risks – than it will be to demonstrate that ordinary people who are the beneficiaries of a family trust were able to give similarly informed consent for the activities of trustees. Even if a trustee calls a meeting of the beneficiaries and tries to explain the situation, it may be difficult to demonstrate that the beneficiaries understood what they were being told so that they could be said to have given informed consent, as opposed to the sort of well-meaning but uninformed consent a dog might give when you suggest the word 'walk' or the word 'biscuit' to it.⁴⁰⁴ By contrast, company directors could be expected to form a meaningful understanding of the circumstances much more easily as in Queensland Mines v Hudson, as could commercial people acting on behalf of corporate beneficiaries. So much will depend upon the context. Nevertheless, the general principle is evident from cases like Boardman v Phipps,⁴⁰⁵ in which everything will be assumed against the trustee to ensure the protection of the beneficiaries. However, it remains to be seen whether or not in the future the courts may yet come to treat family trusts differently from commercial, investment trusts. The trust in Boardman v Phipps was a family trust in relation to which it might be inappropriate to think in terms of the trust having any 'corporate purpose' and making informed decisions as to which opportunities it will pursue and not pursue. Nevertheless, the Phipps family trust was investing in private companies. Indeed, in many such trusts, the trustees are necessarily making decisions whether or not to invest in one opportunity or another on behalf of the beneficiaries. In relation to pension funds, the Pensions Act 1995 requires the trustees to draw up investment strategies and the TA 2000⁴⁰⁶ requires ordinary trustees to have regard to 'standard investment criteria'⁴⁰⁷ and to the diversification of investments.⁴⁰⁸

In consequence, different types of trustees are already required by statute to choose between opportunities which they wish to pursue and those which they do not. In relation to unit trust structures and similar structures which are created solely for speculation and investment of capital, the gap between trusts and companies carrying on trading activities is narrower than the gap between family trusts created simply to maintain assets like real 404 While a dog will happily respond to the word 'walk' or 'biscuit' that is not because the dog necessarily understands everything that the word involves – rather, it remembers the pleasant associations which accompanied those words on the previous occasions on which they were mentioned. I am aware now that I have strayed into large philosophical and epistemological questions as to what dogs can be taken to know and not know, as well as whether or not they truly understand all that is being said. If you have a dog of your own, you will doubtless believe (or probably feel you know) that your little friend understands everything you say. I think I will leave this footnote just as it is, even though it might be more prudent to change the analogy in the text given all the philosophical problems it raises, because I have enjoyed this little patch of time we have spent together quite so much.

405 [1967] 2 AC 46.

406 See para 9.2.1 above.

407 TA 2000, s 4(1).

408 Ibid, s 4(2).

property and trading companies. Therefore, one might be tempted to suggest that the advances in company law in relation to the Keech v Sandford principle could be adopted into trusts law in relation to commercial trusts structures, particularly given the suggestion that trusts law might yet come to differentiate between commercial trusts and traditional trusts.

For the moment it appears, however, that the Boardman v Phipps principle will continue to apply across the whole of trusts law. In consequence, it would appear that profits can only be authorised either in the terms of the trust itself or by the agreement of all of the beneficiaries. This position mirrors that for a trustee's liability for breach of trust whereby the only defences available in the case law refer to the acquiescence of the beneficiaries in the trustee's actions.⁴⁰⁹ To draw parallels between breach of trust and liability as a constructive trustee for secret profits also highlights the link between these two areas as species of equitable wrong;⁴¹⁰ that is, imposing liability on the defendant on account of the defendant's unconscionable action in breaching a trust or making unauthorised profits respectively.

The duties of directors under the Companies Act 2006

The Companies Act 2006 introduced a statutory code of directors' general duties for the first time.⁴¹¹ The underlying purpose of the legislation was to improve the understanding of directors' legal duties among directors generally. The directors' duties set out in the Act are 'based on certain common law rules and equitable principles'⁴¹² and moreover those statutory duties 'shall be interpreted and applied in the same way as common law rules or equitable principles'.⁴¹³ The statutory duties are therefore to be interpreted in the future in accordance with the development of those case law principles.⁴¹⁴ Therefore, the statutory code should be thought of as being a statutory expression of the developing case law principles and will develop as the case law develops in the future. These duties are owed to the company, not to its shareholders.⁴¹⁵ Those duties on each director in outline are: a duty to act within the terms of her powers under the company's constitution;⁴¹⁶ a duty to promote the success of the company as the director sees it in good faith;⁴¹⁷ a duty to exercise independent judgment;⁴¹⁸ a duty to exercise reasonable care, skill and diligence;⁴¹⁹ a duty to avoid conflicts of interest;⁴²⁰ a duty not to accept benefits, such as bribes and secret commissions;⁴²¹ and a duty to declare interests in transactions.⁴²² These last three remedies are predicated on the equitable doctrines relating to prevention of conflicts of interest (as in Boardman v Phipps)

409 Lyall v Edwards (1861) 6 H & N 337; BCCI v Ali [2000] 3 All ER 51; para 18.2.5.

410 The expression 'equitable wrong' used, for example, by Lord Nicholls in discussing personal liability to account as a constructive trustee in Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [2003] 1 All ER 97, para 9.

411 Companies Act 2006, s 170 et seq.

412 Ibid., s 170(3).

413 Ibid., s 170(4).

414 Ibid., s 170(4).

415 Ibid., s 170(1).

416 Ibid., s 171.

417 Ibid., s 172.

418 Ibid., s 173.

419 Ibid., s 174.

420 Ibid., s 175.

421 Ibid., s 176.

422 Ibid., s 177.

and bribes (as in Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid) as discussed already in this chapter. The 2006 Act expressly incorporates these long-standing equitable doctrines to provide remedies to breach of these director's duties.⁴²³

Section 175 of the Companies Act 2006 deals specifically with the duties of directors in relation to conflicts of interest. The purpose of this provision is to codify the existing case law principles discussed above in this chapter, and to develop in parallel to those same principles. Section 175(1) provides that 'a director of a company must avoid a situation in which he has, or can have, a direct or indirect interest that conflicts, or possibly may conflict, with the interests of the company'.⁴²⁴

Section 175(2) goes further and provides that:

- (2) This applies in particular to the exploitation of any property, information or opportunity (and it is immaterial whether the company could take advantage of the property, information or opportunity).

The principle is therefore not limited to the use of corporate opportunities, as the case law had tended to suggest. This duty does not relate to 'a conflict of interest arising in relation to a transaction or arrangement with the company' on the part of the director.⁴²⁵ There are then two means of eluding this provision, as set out in s 175(4):

This duty is not infringed—

- (a) if the situation cannot reasonably be regarded as likely to give rise to a conflict of interest; or
 (b) if the matter has been authorised by the directors.

Therefore, the first means of avoiding liability under the Boardman v Phipps principle for a company director is if 'the situation cannot reasonably be regarded as likely to give rise to a conflict of interest'.⁴²⁶ It is suggested that the case law does not give much guidance on what this provision may mean, although cases like Balston v Headline Filters would seem to satisfy it.

Section 175(4) provides that there is no breach of this principle if either the profit is authorised or 'if the situation cannot reasonably be regarded as likely to give rise to a conflict of interest'. In relation specifically to the defence of authorisation for a director, authorisation may be given by the directors under statute now:⁴²⁷ therefore, directors may explicitly now rely on authorisation being given by the board of directors, provided that the meeting which does so is quorate and that the votes of any directors with such a conflict of interest are discounted.⁴²⁸ The second means depends upon 'authorisation'. This concept was

423 Ibid, s 178.

424 Ibid, s 177 provides also that: 'If a director of a company is in any way, directly or indirectly, interested in a proposed transaction or arrangement with the company, he must declare the nature and extent of that interest to the other directors.'

425 Companies Act 2006, s 175(3).

426 It is provided in Companies Act 2006, s 175(7) that '[a]ny reference in this section to a conflict of interest includes a conflict of interest and duty and a conflict of duties'.

427 Companies Act 2006, s 175(5).

428 Ibid, s 175(6).

considered earlier in this chapter, although the statute does provide a more formal means of showing authorisation than does the case law: s 175(5) provides that:

Authorisation may be given by the directors—

- (a) where the company is a private company and nothing in the company's constitution invalidates such authorisation, by the matter being proposed to and authorised by the directors; or
- (b) where the company is a public company and its constitution includes provision enabling the directors to authorise the matter, by the matter being proposed to and authorised by them in accordance with the constitution.

Therefore, depending on the nature of the company, the matter must be authorised by the directors in accordance with the articles of association. Section 175(6) provides that the directors are only deemed to have given authorisation in the following circumstances:

- (6) The authorisation is effective only if—
 - (a) any requirement as to the quorum at the meeting at which the matter is considered is met without counting the director in question or any other interested director, and
 - (b) the matter was agreed to without their voting or would have been agreed to if their votes had not been counted.

Therefore, directors may explicitly now rely on authorisation being given by the board of directors, provided that the meeting which does so is quorate and that the votes of any directors with such a conflict of interest are discounted.⁴²⁹

The obligations of agents

The principles relating to unauthorised profits taken as part of the fiduciary's discharge of her duties applies to agents as it applies to all other forms of fiduciary. So, in *Imageview Management Ltd v Jack*⁴³⁰ Kelvin Jack, the goalkeeper for Trinidad and Tobago, engaged Mr Berry, a football agent and the controlling mind of the Imageview agency, to secure him a transfer to a UK football club. Jack agreed to pay the agency 10% of his salary in return. A transfer was agreed with Dundee United Football Club further to the agency arrangement. However, Mr Berry also negotiated a secret fee of about £3,000 for the agency from Dundee United to obtain a work permit for Jack which Jack required to play in the UK. This fee was not disclosed to Jack. When Jack learned of the secret fee which had been paid to the agency he sought an account from the agency for the amount of that fee. The agency was acting as a fiduciary for Jack. In essence, the agency argued that the fee arrangement was 'none of Jack's business', that it was unconnected to its agency for Jack, and therefore that it was not accountable for it. Jacob LJ noted that the law imposes high standards on fiduciaries like agents,⁴³¹ and that those standards even apply to football agents.⁴³² Throughout the discussions with Dundee United, Berry had been working for Jack and therefore there was a potential conflict of interest between the agency's own interests and its obligations to Jack. There was also evidence that Berry had lied to Jack about the entirety of his dealings with Dundee United, which prompted his Lordship to wonder why there would be a need to lie if there was nothing to hide. Jacob LJ applied the strict principle, and noted that it was not as harsh as it may otherwise appear given that all Berry would have needed to do to escape the liability to account for the secret fee was to have told Jack about it. Disclosure in this instance would have caused the fee to have been authorised.

429 Companies Act 2006, s 175(6).

430 [2009] Bus LR 1034.

12.5.3 Equitable accounting

In circumstances in which a fiduciary is considered entitled to some recompense for work done for the beneficiaries, in spite of being held liable as a constructive trustee for unauthorised profits, it will be possible for the fiduciary to acquire some equitable accounting. This doctrine of account permits a court of equity in its discretion to adjust any amount owed by one party to another, or provides in relation to a proprietary constructive trust in favour of the beneficiaries for those beneficiaries to pay some amount to that fiduciary. The House of Lords in *Boardman v Phipps*⁴³³ was conscious of the hard work done by Boardman to generate a windfall profit for the beneficiaries. Therefore, the court ordered that there ought to be some equitable accounting by the trust in recognition of the work done by the fiduciary. It was held that Boardman was entitled to be compensated on a 'liberal scale' for the work and skill involved in acquiring the shares for the Phipps family trust and turning the private company into profit. The precise amount of that recognition was something left to be ascertained after the hearing of the appeal.

By way of contrast, in Guinness v Saunders,⁴³⁴ a director of Guinness plc, Ernest Saunders, had made personal profits from criminal insider dealing in connection with a takeover bid for the company in breach of his fiduciary duty. The company sought to recover the payments made to Saunders amongst other issues as to Saunders' criminal activities in relation to a takeover bid. The company sought to recover the profits made by Saunders from his fiduciary office on constructive trust principles. Saunders, however, sought to suggest that his work for the company over the period of his directorship had enriched the shareholders such that his liability as a constructive trustee in relation to unauthorised or unlawful profits ought to take into account the broader context of his work for the company. Therefore, Saunders claimed entitlement to a quantum meruit, or entitlement to some equitable accounting in recognition of his services.

As to the issue of liability as constructive trustee of the profits, it was held that the appropriate remedy was the imposition of a 'restitutionary constructive trust' over the wrongfully-acquired profits made by Saunders from his fiduciary duty. As to the question of equitable 431 In reliance on, and with praise for, Boston Deep Sea Fishing v Ansell (1888) 39 Ch D 339 and Rhodes v Macalister (1923) 29 Com Cas 19: see also the praise lavished on them by Mummery LJ at [64].

432 [2009] Bus LR 1034, at [6]. There could be no doubt that football agents are to be treated the same as any other agent, but I rather like the ironic sense one gets from this part of the judgment as to the legendary disconnection which some people in football have from ordinary commercial mores.

433 [1967] 2 AC 46, 67.

434 [1990] 2 AC 663.

accounting for the work done as a director, Lord Templeman was not prepared to allow Saunders to take any personal benefit from such wrongful acts. Indeed, this accords with the core equitable principle that a claimant must come to equity with clean hands.⁴³⁵ Therefore, it is clear that equitable accounting will only be made available for defendant fiduciaries like Boardman who have acted in reasonably good faith to generate profits for the beneficiaries.

The defendant in *Cobbetts LLP v Hodge*⁴³⁶ had sought an accounting (an ‘equitable allowance’⁴³⁷) for the work he had done in acquiring a private placement of shares for himself. However, this was not allowed because the defendant had misled the firm and therefore would not receive equitable assistance. His failure to make a disclosure constituted unclean hands.

12.5.4 The self-dealing principle

The foregoing paragraphs have considered the obligations of fiduciaries when making unauthorised profits from their office in general terms. The material in this section was considered in greater detail in para 8.3.9 above regarding the obligations of fiduciaries when dealing with the beneficiaries of their power as a third party,⁴³⁸ for example, where a trustee seeks to buy property from the trust. In that instance the trustee would be acting on behalf of the trust as well as on her own behalf. Such a transaction bears the risk that the trustee will acquire the property from the trust at an advantageous price and thus exploit the beneficiaries. By the same token, it might be that the price which the trustee obtains would have been the same price which the beneficiaries would have obtained on the open market. The basis of this principle is expressed in the following dicta of Lord Cranworth in Aberdeen Railway Co v Blaikie Bros:⁴³⁹ it is a rule of universal application, that no one, having such [fiduciary] duties to discharge, shall be allowed to enter into engagements in which he has, or can have, a personal interest conflicting, or which possibly may conflict, with the interests of those whom he is bound to protect.

The self-dealing principle entitles the beneficiary to avoid any such transaction on the basis, set out in the *Keech v Sandford*⁴⁴⁰ rule, that even the possibility of fraud or bad faith being exercised by the trustee is to be resisted.⁴⁴¹ Megarry VC in *Tito v Waddell (No 2)*⁴⁴² enunciated the self-dealing principle in the following terms: ‘If a trustee purchases trust property from himself, any beneficiary may have the sale set aside ex debito justitiae, however fair the transaction.’ The right of the beneficiary is therefore to set aside the transaction. There is no defence against the exercise of such a right that the transaction was entered into as though 435 Saunders’ hands, as evidenced by his subsequent criminal trial, were dirty.

436 [2009] EWHC 786 (Ch), [2010] 1 BCLC 30.

437 Ibid., at [113].

438 This issue was considered in detail in relation to trustees’ general duties.

439 (1854) 2 Eq Rep 1281.

440 (1726) 2 Eq Cas Abr 741.

441 Exp Lacey (1802) 6 Ves 625; see Hollis v Rolfe [2008] EWHC 1747. See, however, the more liberal Australian approach in Beale v Trinkler [2008] NSWSC 347, 11 ITEL 53.

442 [1977] Ch 106. Cf Prince Jefri Bolkiah v KPMG [1999] 1 All ER 517 – with reference to ‘Chinese walls’.

between parties at arm's length. The same principle applies to purchases by directors from their companies,⁴⁴³ although most articles of association in English companies expressly permit such transactions.⁴⁴⁴ Where the beneficiary acquiesces in the transaction, that beneficiary is precluded from seeking to have that transaction set aside.⁴⁴⁵

The trustee will not be able to avoid this principle simply by selling to an associate or a connected company or similar person – although the authorities on this point relate primarily to sales to relatives,⁴⁴⁶ the trustee's children⁴⁴⁷ and the trustee's spouse.⁴⁴⁸ It is suggested that in any event, such a transaction would be a sham transaction and therefore capable of being set aside,⁴⁴⁹ or treated as an attempt to effect a fraud on the power.⁴⁵⁰

12.5.5 The fair dealing principle

The fair dealing principle is similar to the self-dealing principle considered immediately above, and is also considered at para 8.3.9 in greater detail.⁴⁵¹ The fair dealing principle validates acquisitions by trustees of the interests of their beneficiaries and finds that they will be enforceable provided that the trustee does not acquire any advantage attributable to his fiduciary office: otherwise, any unconscionable profits will be held on constructive trust.⁴⁵² This principle also applies to fiduciary relationships such as acquisitions by agents of the interests of their principals.⁴⁵³ To demonstrate that the transaction was not procured as a result of any abuse of position, the trustee will be required to demonstrate that no details were concealed, that the price obtained was fair and that the beneficiary was not required to rely entirely on the trustee's advice.⁴⁵⁴ The fair dealing principle is necessarily less strict than the self-dealing principle, because the trustee is able to seek justification of the former by demonstrating that the transaction was not procured in bad faith. It is an unconscious aspect of the principle nevertheless that the beneficiaries are required to authorise the transaction rather than permitting the trustee to act entirely alone: this accords with the principles on authorisation considered above at para 12.5.3. Where the beneficiary is an infant, the trustee will not be able to demonstrate that the beneficiary made an informed decision.⁴⁵⁵

12.6 CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS AND AGREEMENTS RELATING TO PROPERTY

The constructive trusts considered in this section arise not contrary to the intentions of the parties, but rather in accordance with their common intention (either express or implied) by 443 Aberdeen Railway Co v Blaikie Brothers (1854) 1 Macq 461.

444 See Jaffey, 2000.

445 Holder v Holder [1968] Ch 353.

446 Coles v Trecothick (1804) 9 Ves 234 – which may be permitted where the transaction appears to be conducted as though at arm's length.

447 Gregory v Gregory (1821) Jac 631.

448 Ferraby v Hobson (1847) 2 Ph 255; Burrell v Burrell's Trustee 1915 SC 333.

449 Cf Street v Mountford [1985] 2 WLR 877; Midland Bank v Wyatt [1995] 1 FLR 697.

450 Rochevoucauld v Boustead [1897] 1 Ch 196.

451 This issue was considered in detail in relation to trustees' general duties.

452 Chalmer v Bradley (1819) 1 J & W 51; Tito v Waddell (No 2) [1977] Ch 106. Cf Clay v Clay [2001] WTLR 393.

453 Edwards v Meyrick (1842) 2 Hare 60.

454 Coles v Trecothick (1804) 9 Ves 234.

455 Sanderson v Walker (1807) 13 Ves 601.

operation of law. The common intention constructive trust properly so called arises only in relation to trusts of homes by fastening either on an agreement of the parties, or on the conduct of the parties. This form of trust is considered in great detail in Chapter 15. The other form of constructive trust considered in this section is one which arises in relation to contracts (constituting the common intention of the parties that property be transferred between the contracting parties). Equity recognises that title passes automatically on the creation of the contract without the need for further formality, irrespective of the position at common law or under statute.

12.6.1 Common intention constructive trusts and the home

The nature of the common intention constructive trust is considered in detail in Chapter 15 Trusts of homes. The common intention constructive trust has been held to exist only in relation to the family home. The decision of the House of Lords in *Gissing v Gissing*⁴⁵⁶ held that when deciding which members of a household should have which equitable interests in the home, the court should consider the common intention of the parties. This marked a profound change in the law relating to rights in the family home, which had previously operated on the basis of the rules relating to presumptions of resulting trust and the unenforceability of agreements between husband and wife.

The later House of Lords decision in *Lloyds Bank v Rosser*⁴⁵⁷ provided a more rigid statement of the nature of this common intention constructive trust. It arises in two circumstances. First, where the parties can adduce evidence of express discussions to establish common intention by means of an agreement formed, usually, before the date of acquisition of the property.⁴⁵⁸ Secondly, where the parties demonstrate a common intention by dint of those claiming an equitable interest having contributed to the purchase price or to the mortgage repayments in respect of the land. In both cases, the claimant would be required to demonstrate detriment. The second form of constructive trust appears to be identical to that form of resulting trust accepted in Dyer v Dyer.⁴⁵⁹

Further, in Lloyds Bank v Rosset, Lord Bridge clearly intended to compact constructive trust and proprietary estoppel together in this single doctrine: an approach which is criticised at section 15.3 below. The common intention constructive trust grants the successful claimant an equitable proprietary right in the home which will be calculated as a proportion of the total equity which corresponds to the claimant's financial contribution to the property.⁴⁶⁰

While the common intention constructive trust applies only in relation to the home, it might be argued that such a trust could be developed so as to apply similarly in relation to commercial contracts where the parties necessarily formulate an intention as to the allocation of title in property. In commercial contracts, it is more likely, even if the contract is not fully valid, that the parties will have applied their minds more closely to issues of title in

456 [1971] AC 886.

457 [1991] 1 AC 107. See now Stack v Dowden [2007] UKHL 17.

458 Always presuming that there is no express intention to the contrary: Robinson v Reeve [2002] EWHC 1179 (Ch).

459 (1788) 2 Cox Eq Cas 92; Mollo v Mollo [2000] WTLR 227.

460 Huntingford v Hobbs [1993] 1 FLR 736. Cf Stockert v Geddes (2000) 80 P & CR 11.

property than is commonly the case in family home situations.⁴⁶¹ So, in Lloyd v Pickering,⁴⁶² the Lloyds Bank v Rosset common intention constructive trust was used by Blackburne J to decide whether or not an alleged agreement to co-own a gymnasium business granted the claimant an equitable interest under a constructive trust in that business. Thus, the Rosset approach has indeed been used in a commercial, as opposed to a domestic, context. Commonwealth jurisdictions have turned against the common intention constructive trust in relation to the home, precisely because it requires the court to try to find a common intention which has frequently never been considered at all by the parties.⁴⁶³ The difficulty involved with proving such an intention in many cases has caused the English Court of Appeal to favour allocating equal shares in circumstances in which the home has been held by a family for a long period of time – particularly when the litigation is commenced by mortgagees seeking to enforce their security and dispossess the family.⁴⁶⁴

12.6.2 On conveyance of property

Where a contract is effected for the sale or transfer of property, that contract will operate so as to transfer equitable interest in that property from the original owner to the other contracting party.⁴⁶⁵ The transfer of the equitable interest takes effect by means of a constructive trust.⁴⁶⁶ Similarly, an unexecuted court order for the transfer of property creates a constructive trust over that property until the time of transfer.⁴⁶⁷ The rationale behind the operation of this principle is as follows. Once the contract is formally created, the contracting parties acquire rights of specific performance to force the other party to perform its part of the bargain. On the basis that each party has a right in equity to specific performance, and on the basis further that the contract is one to transfer title in property, it is said that the party so entitled acquires a right to the entire equitable interest in that property.⁴⁶⁸ Therefore, once such a binding contract has been formed for the transfer of property, it is said that the equitable interest in that property passes to the buyer automatically on the creation of the contract.⁴⁶⁹ The automatic vesting of the equitable interest is said to arise due to the equitable principle that equity looks upon as done that which ought to have been done: therefore, equity considers that because the contract requires transfer of title, transfer of title must be deemed to have taken place automatically.⁴⁷⁰

For this constructive trust to be effective, it is necessary that the contract is capable of being specifically enforced, as considered in Chapter 26. On the basis that equity would award specific performance, equity will recognise as done that which ought to have been done. Therefore, if the transfer ought to have been specifically enforced, equity will recognise the transferor as holding the property on constructive trust for the transferee until the 463 As considered at section 15.8 below.

461 Hudson, 2000:2; Hudson, 1999:1.

462 [2004] EWHC 1513 (Ch).

464 See Midland Bank v Cooke [1995] 4 All ER 562.

465 Lysaght v Edwards (1876) 2 Ch D 499; Oughtred v IRC [1960] AC 206; Neville v Wilson [1997] Ch 144.

466 Chinn v Collins [1981] AC 533; Neville v Wilson [1997] Ch 144.

467 Mclurcan v Mclurcan (1897) 77 LT 474; Mountney v Treharne [2002] EWCA Civ 1174, [2002] BPIR 1126.

468 Ibid.

469 Chinn v Collins [1981] AC 533.

470 Walsh v Lonsdale (1882) 21 Ch D 9.

transfer is actually enforced.⁴⁷¹ The constructive trust arises from this equitable principle on the basis that it would be unconscionable for one of the contracting parties to refute its specifically enforceable obligation to transfer title to the other party.⁴⁷²

Contract for the sale of land

This rule that a contract for the sale of property transfers an equitable interest in that property applies to land in the same way that it applies to other items of property,⁴⁷³ provided that the contract is in writing containing all of the terms of the agreement in one document which is signed by all the parties.⁴⁷⁴ Once that contract has been created, the equitable interest in the land is deemed to have transferred automatically to the purchaser of that interest.⁴⁷⁵ This constructive trust comes into operation, as considered above, by extension of the equitable principle that ‘Equity looks upon as done that which ought to have been done’, such that a specifically enforceable obligation by contract to transfer rights in land is deemed in equity to effect an automatic transfer of those rights.⁴⁷⁶ The vendor holds the property on constructive trust for the purchaser until completion of the sale or transfer.⁴⁷⁷ Furthermore, in the period of time between the formation of a contract for the sale of land and the registration of the buyer as proprietor on the land register, the former proprietor holds the interests which are the subject of the sale on constructive trust for the buyer until re-registration. Similarly, a contract to grant a lease creates leasehold rights which will be recognised by equity.⁴⁷⁸

There are competing authorities as to whether this trust comes into existence on execution of the contract of sale⁴⁷⁹ or on completion of the contract of sale.⁴⁸⁰ Similarly, there is authority to effect that the vendor of the property is a trustee sub modo rather than a constructive trustee, given (it was suggested) that the contract might not be effected even after an agreement for sale has been reached.⁴⁸¹ However, in the modern context, a contract for sale of land is only effective if it complies with s 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 and at that stage should be capable of specific performance. At the point that the contract is capable of specific performance, it is suggested, the constructive

471 Ibid.

472 Neville v Wilson [1997] Ch 144.

473 Lysaght v Edwards (1876) 2 Ch D 499; Rayner v Preston (1881) 18 Ch D 1.

474 Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, s 2.

475 Lysaght v Edwards (1876) 2 Ch D 499. No similar obligation is owed to a further subpurchaser: Berkley v Earl Poulett (1977) 242 EG 39. Although a purchase by another person would require the vendor to hold the sale proceeds on trust for the initial purchaser under contract: Lake v Bayliss [1974] 1 WLR 1073; Shaw v Foster (1872) LR 5 HL 321.

476 Lysaght v Edwards (1876) 2 Ch D 499; Walsh v Lonsdale (1882) 21 Ch D 9. See also Kinane v Mackie-Conteh [2004] EWHC 998 (Ch); [2004] 19 EGCS 164.

477 This operates in parallel, it is suggested, to the doctrine which provides that the vendor acts as trustee of the fee simple absolute in possession over land between the time of completion of sale and the re-registration of the proprietorship of that land in the name of the purchaser.

478 Parker v Taswell (1858) 27 LJ Ch 812; Walsh v Lonsdale (1882) 21 Ch D 9.

479 Paine v Meller (1801) 6 Ves 349; 31 ER 1088, per Lord Eldon; Broome v Monck (1805) 10 Ves 597, 32 ER 976.

480 Shaw v Foster (1872) LR 5 HL 321.

481 Wall v Bright (1820) 1 Jac & W 494 at 501, 37 ER 456 at 459, per Lord Plumer MR.

trust comes into existence and the vendor becomes a constructive trustee. In Jerome v Kelly,⁴⁸² Lord Walker considered the dispute on the authorities as to the precise nature of the trustee's obligations under such a constructive trust. It has been suggested that a trustee in such a situation is a peculiar kind of trustee (as considered below) because she has a personal interest, in its colloquial sense, in the property at issue⁴⁸³ and that the true essence of the arrangement is the contract between the parties.⁴⁸⁴ Nevertheless, the existence of a contract is the essence of this form of constructive trust and therefore the fiduciary obligations associated with such a constructive trust will take effect in any event: the question is as to the terms of those fiduciary obligations.

The precise nature and scope of this constructive trust is worthy of closer examination. The constructive trust in these circumstances frequently grants more complex powers to the trustee than an ordinary bare trust, although the rights of the beneficiary are typically limited to those of a beneficiary under a bare trust. The limited notion of the constructive trust in these circumstances arises from cases such as Lloyds Bank v Carrick,⁴⁸⁵ in which the defendant vendor contracted with his sister-in-law to sell a lease over a residential property to her. The transaction required the sister-in-law to sell her own home, to pay those sale proceeds to the defendant, and then to move into property over which the defendant was lessee, at which time he would assign his interest in the lease to her. The defendant took out a charge with the plaintiff bank without informing his sister-in-law. The question turned on whether or not the sister-in-law had a right under a merely bare trust, such that her right did not require registration and so could not be unenforceable against the bank for want of registration. It was held that the contract became specifically enforceable when the sister-in-law began to perform her obligations under the contract by entering into possession of the lease and paying the purchase price.⁴⁸⁶ Consequently, it was held that the sister-in-law's interest arose by virtue of the specific enforceability of the contract and therefore was void as against the bank for want of registration.⁴⁸⁷ Her right was the right of a person under a bare trust in relation to that interest in property for which she had contracted. Thus, the right is said to be a limited right: the trustee simply holds the property as nominee for the purchaser. This right would, however, grant a priority right in the vendor's insolvency.⁴⁸⁸

The fiduciary obligations of the vendor are limited. The ordinary model of this constructive trust is limited to equity transferring the equitable interest in the property which has been contracted to be sold and does not impose greater obligations on the trustee than that. However, as considered in the next section, it may be that the parties' contract is entered into as part of a more complex network of commercial obligations, such that the vendor does not 482 [2004] 2 All ER 835, [2004] UKHL 25.

483 Shaw v Foster (1872) LR 5 HL 321, 338, per Lord Cairns; Lysaght v Edwards (1876) 2 Ch D 499, 506, per Lord Jessel MR.

484 Chang v Registrar of Titles (1976) 137 CLR 177, 189, per Jacob J.

485 [1996] 4 All ER 630.

486 Significantly, however, this particular contract remained executory at the time that the charge was created in favour of the bank: ibid, 637.

487 Ibid.

488 Freevale Ltd v Metrostore (Holdings) Ltd [1984] 1 All ER 495; Re Coregrange Ltd [1984] BCLC 453; subject always to any statutory power to disclaim contracts inter alia as a fraud on the creditors of the insolvent person.

agree simply to transfer her property rights without some action of the vendor or some condition precedent being performed. After all, if the contract were not performed by the purchaser, then the vendor would wish to recover absolute title to the land without the purchaser acquiring rights for which she has not paid. So, if the purchase price for the property remains unpaid, it does not constitute the vendor a constructive trustee in general terms of, for example, all rents and other income received in relation to that property before the purchase price is actually paid.⁴⁸⁹ Furthermore, the vendor is entitled to protect her interests in the property prior to sale, and therefore is not obliged to act only in the best interests of the purchaser, as would be the case with an ordinary trustee.⁴⁹⁰ Indeed, the vendor in such circumstances has been described as being a mere ‘quasi-trustee’ as a result, inter alia, of these limitations on her obligations.⁴⁹¹ So, the vendor, as constructive trustee, is entitled to protect her own position and rescind the contract if some condition precedent has not been performed, just as the purchaser could rescind the contract if some condition precedent had not been performed (such as the acquisition of planning permission to develop the land).⁴⁹² This point is taken up in the next section.

Nature and the time of the creation of the constructive trust in relation to sale of land

The process of selling land involves a lengthy contractual process in which the parties usually create an oral understanding which will not be a contract,⁴⁹³ following which written contracts are exchanged which usually constitute a binding contract, although the contract is not completed until a later date specified in the contract, and then the new proprietor’s interest is ultimately registered on the Land Register. In the House of Lords in Jerome v Kelly,⁴⁹⁴ the question arose as to the point in time at which the constructive trust came into existence during such a complex contractual arrangement.⁴⁹⁵ There are a number of times at which the constructive trust could possibly arise. It might be that it is when contracts are exchanged that the equitable interest passes, alternatively it could be when sale is completed, or it could be (under the Land Registration Act 2002) when the new proprietor’s interest is registered on the Land Register.⁴⁹⁶ It is important to know, as in Jerome v Kelly, when the 489 Rayner v Preston (1881) 18 Ch D 1, 6, per Cotton LJ. The precise point in that case having been altered by the Law of Property Act 1925, s 47. Also J Sainsbury plc v O’Connor (Inspector of Taxes) [1991] STC 318. Cf Paine v Meller (1801) 6 Ves J 349.

490 Shaw v Foster (1872) LR 5 HL 321, 338, per Lord Cairns. See also Royal Bristol and Permanent Building Society v Bomash (1887) 35 Ch D 390.

491 Cumberland Consolidated Holdings Ltd v Ireland [1946] KB 264, 269, per Lord Greene MR; Berkley v Poulett (1977) 242 EG 39.

492 Jerome v Kelly [2004] UKHL 25, [2004] 2 All ER 835.

493 Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, s 2.

494 [2004] UKHL 25, [2004] 2 All ER 835.

495 The particular point in that case related to the defendants’ liability to capital gains tax in relation to a contractual arrangement (which it appears had been organised to minimise liability to tax) whereby the vendor and the purchaser of the land did not contract directly such that it was unclear when or whether a ‘Lysaght v Edwards model’ constructive trust came into existence.

496 The position in land law is now that registration constitutes the transfer of title at law, whereas Jerome v Kelly concerned itself only with execution, exchange of contracts and completion, missing out the vital stage under the Land Registration Act 2002 that there be registration before there is a complete transfer of absolute title.

equitable interest passes because that is the time at which capital gains tax becomes payable on the disposal of the equitable interest.⁴⁹⁷

The answer posited by Lord Walker to the question ‘when does the equitable interest pass?’ was that it depends upon the circumstances and the terms of the contract. So, on the facts of Jerome v Kelly itself, the purchaser’s acquisition of the property was dependent on the acquisition of planning permission to develop the land and, therefore, if planning permission was not obtained, the contract of sale could have been rescinded by the purchaser.⁴⁹⁸ On this basis, the purchaser would not wish to have an equitable interest in the property, nor would the vendor wish to have transferred any equitable interest in the property if the contract of sale was ultimately to be rescinded. Thus, it would have been unsatisfactory to have held that the entire equitable interest must pass to the purchaser on exchange of contracts between the parties, so that the vendor became constructive trustee. In the older case of Lysaght v Edwards,⁴⁹⁹ it had been held that the equitable interest passed when the contract was executed. However, questions were raised in subsequent cases as to the nature of the trusteeship in such circumstances given that the vendor has a right in the land up to the time of transfer which she is entitled to protect.⁵⁰⁰ Consequently, this is not the ordinary sort of constructive trusteeship in which the trustee has no personal interests which can conflict with her fiduciary duties;⁵⁰¹ it is not a situation in which the vendor is simply obliged to hold the property solely for the benefit of the beneficiary. Rather, the purpose of the constructive trust here is to ensure equitable protection for the purchaser’s contractual rights until the transfer is formally completed by means of registration.

The principal problem which Mason J identified in *Chang v Registrar of Titles*⁵⁰² with the Lysaght v Edwards approach was that the purchaser may not have the money to complete the purchase or the vendor may not have valid title which can be transferred to the purchaser. In such a situation, the obligations of the constructive trustee would have to be called into question because the trustee, in her capacity as vendor of the property, would wish to exercise her rights to rescind the contract and to recover any damages from the purchaser (if appropriate), whereas ordinarily a trustee would be required to act entirely in the best interests of the beneficiary. Consequently, Mason J suggested, as was accepted by Lord Walker in Jerome v Kelly,⁵⁰³ that the trustee is not a constructive trustee under an ordinary bare trust but rather must be accepted as having a very particular kind of trusteeship which will differ from circumstance to circumstance. The further dimension not considered by the courts in these cases is the Banner Homes form of constructive trust considered above, whereby one or other of the contracting parties may also have performed acts to their detriment in reliance 497 The argument, for capital gains tax purposes, was raised on behalf of the taxpayer that until the date of completion of the contract, the property should be considered to remain absolutely the property of the vendor so that no chargeable disposal of any interest had been made for tax purposes.

498 [2004] UKHL 25, para [36], per Lord Walker.

499 (1876) 2 Ch D 499, 506, per Sir George Jessel MR.

500 See Shaw v Foster (1872) LR 5 HL 321, 338, per Lord Cairns; Rayner v Preston (1881) 18 Ch D 1, 6, per Cotton LJ.

501 This ordinary form of fiduciary obligation was considered in para 8.3.9 of this book.

502 (1976) 137 CLR 177, 184.

503 [2004] UKHL 25, para [31].

on the contract and therefore there may be further liabilities to equitable compensation even if the contract is rescinded.⁵⁰⁴

It is suggested that the best approach to this form of trusteeship is as follows. The vendor holds whatever interest she validly owns and which she purports to transfer to the purchaser on constructive trust for the purchaser from the moment when the contract of sale is specifically enforceable. That is usually on exchange of contracts. If the vendor transpires not to have sufficient title to effect the transfer for which the parties have contracted, then the vendor owes the purchaser damages for breach of contract for the difference between the interest contracted for and the interest actually transferred. If the contract fails, for whatever reason, then in equity there is no conscionable basis on which the vendor is required to continue to hold any part of the equitable interest in the property on constructive trust for the purchaser. The purpose of the constructive trust is to protect the rights of the purchaser to the extent that the vendor may not act in breach of the contract of sale – while such a contract for sale continues in existence – so as to transfer the rights which are to be sold to some third person or to perform some other act which would reduce the effective value of those rights.⁵⁰⁵ The constructive trust does not necessarily transfer the entirety of the equitable interest immediately if the parties' contract, for example, contains provisions which suggest that the contract is not to be immediately enforceable due to some condition precedent. The constructive trust here is therefore a form of equitable protection of the purchaser's rights under the contract for sale until that contract is completed by means of the registration of the rights of the new proprietor of that property. That protection is achieved by means of a transfer of some equitable interest in the land to the purchaser, albeit that that interest will lapse if the contract fails for some reason.

It is suggested, therefore, that the better answer is that the equitable interest passes at whatever time the contract becomes specifically enforceable. After all, it is the specific enforceability of the contract which causes the equitable interest to pass (on the basis that equity looks upon as done that which ought to have been done): therefore, it should be by reference to the specific enforceability of the contract that one should decide when the equitable interest passes by means of constructive trust. On the facts of Jerome v Kelly, if the parties' contract was subject to a condition precedent (express or implied) that the contract would only be effective if the purchaser acquired planning permission to develop the property, then there would not be a specifically enforceable contract until that condition precedent was satisfied and therefore the constructive trust would come into effect at that time. This is what Sir George Jessel MR meant, it is suggested, when he held that 'the moment you have a valid contract for sale the vendor becomes in equity a trustee for the purchaser of the estate sold, and the beneficial ownership passes to the purchaser'.⁵⁰⁶ As soon as the contract is specifically enforceable, the purchaser becomes an equitable owner of the property by means of a constructive trust.

Contract for the sale of personalty

The basis of the doctrine is that an automatic transfer of the equitable interest occurs where otherwise the former owner of that title would seek to renege on her obligations under contract. However, the notion of automatic transfer has been used particularly in tax planning to effect automatic transfers of the equitable interest in property – and thereby the most valuable part of the absolute title in that property – without the need to effect transfer by means of any documentation or other act which might trigger liability to tax or stamp duty before the more valuable part of the title had been disposed of. This reversal of the core understanding of the *Walsh v Lonsdale*⁵⁰⁷ principle into an offensive rather than a defensive mechanism has the weight of authority. Thus, in Oughtred v IRC,⁵⁰⁸ a mother and son wished to exchange title in valuable shareholdings so that the mother could consolidate a larger shareholding in one particular company. Both sets of shares were held on trust for the mother and son respectively. To have effected the documentary transfers of the shares necessary to transfer legal title would have attracted liability to stamp duty. The parties' intention was to transfer their interests without the need for the documentary transfers, and further by avoiding the need for signed writing under s 53(1)(c) of the Law of Property Act 1925 necessary to dispose of their equitable interests in the shares to one another.⁵⁰⁹ Therefore, the mother and son created a contract between them by which they agreed to exchange their respective shareholdings. It was held that such a specifically enforceable contract was sufficient to constitute an automatic transfer of their shareholdings. That this structure has been held⁵¹⁰ to effect an automatic transfer of the equitable interest means that the stamp duty levied on the document of transfer of the legal title is levied on a nil amount on the basis that all of the value in the shareholdings moves with the equitable interest and in turn the equitable interest moves as soon as there is a specifically enforceable contract in place between the parties.⁵¹¹ Until the document transfers legal title to the intended recipient, the legal owner is constituted a constructive trustee of the equitable interest in that property.⁵¹²

504 See para 12.3.2 above.

505 This is recognised by Lord Walker at [2004] UKHL 25, para [37].

506 Lysaght v Edwards (1876) 2 Ch D 499, 506.

12.7 VOLUNTARY ASSUMPTION OF LIABILITY

The categories of constructive trust assembled in this section are said to arise on the basis of voluntary assumption of liability, where a person is deemed to be a constructive trustee because of some relationship or some course of dealing into which she entered voluntarily.

12.7.1 Secret trusts

The subject of secret trusts was considered in detail in Chapter 6. Secret trusts arise in circumstances in which, for whatever reason, a testator decides to leave ostensible legacies to someone whom the testator really wants to act as trustee for an intended but undisclosed beneficiary of that legacy.⁵¹³ Frequently this is done so as to benefit mistresses or illegitimate

507 (1882) 21 Ch D 9.

508 [1960] AC 206.

509 See also Neville v Wilson [1997] Ch 144.

510 The leading speech of Lord Radcliffe in Oughtred v IRC [1960] AC 206 itself was somewhat elliptic on this point. His Lordship's intention was to find the taxpayers liable to stamp duty under the then-applicable stamp duty legislation at the least, although he did appear to concede that the equitable interest in the shares did pass on the creation of the contract, even if that had no effect on the stamp duty position ultimately.

511 See Chinn v Collins [1981] AC 533; Neville v Wilson [1997] Ch 144.

512 Ibid.

513 Provided always that the obligation is a trust obligation and not a merely moral obligation: Kasperbauer v Griffith [2000] 1 WTLR 333.

children after the testator's death in a way that does not require them to be disclosed in the will. The nature of secret trusts is complicated and falls, on the cases, into two kinds. The fully secret trust is not mentioned on the face of the will at all, whereas the existence of a half-secret trust is revealed on the face of the will, although its precise terms remain undisclosed. Fully secret trusts are frequently identified as constructive trusts,⁵¹⁴ whereas half-secret trusts are often considered to be a species of express trust because they are disclosed on the face of the will.⁵¹⁵ There is some debate between the commentators as to this.⁵¹⁶

The argument raised in Chapter 6 was that all secret trusts ought to be considered to be constructive trusts effected to provide an exception to the Wills Act 1837 and thus prevent a legatee under a will from asserting an unconscionable beneficial title to property. A secret trust is a trust not properly constituted by the settlor but the substance of which was communicated to persons who are named as legatees under the settlor's will. As such, the enforcement of the settlor's promise could not be an express trust because the settlor retains the right to change her will, something which would not be permitted if an express trust had already been created over that property. The only viable trusts law analysis is therefore that the secret trust must be a form of constructive trust. One other possible rationale for the enforcement of secret trusts by the courts is based on the equitable principle that statute and common law should not be used as an engine of fraud, which is presented as a form of constructive trust in this chapter in any event.⁵¹⁷

12.7.2 Mutual wills

As with secret trusts, equity is prepared to effect testamentary arrangements which do not comply strictu sensu with English probate law and s 9 of the Wills Act 1837. The doctrine of mutual wills applies to wills created by two or more people in a particular form with the intention that the provisions of those wills shall be irrevocably binding. Ordinarily a will would be capable of amendment or repeal; mutual wills are subtly different because the parties intend that their wills be binding. When the first of the parties to the mutual wills dies, the arrangement becomes binding on any surviving parties. In the event that any survivor should have attempted to change her will or to break the mutual will arrangement, her personal representatives after her death would be required to hold her estate as constructive trustees subject to the terms of the mutual wills. Lord Camden expressed the doctrine in the following way in Dufour v Pereira: '... he, that dies first, does by his death carry the agreement on his part into execution. If the other then refuses, he is guilty of a fraud, can never unbind himself, and becomes a trustee of course. For no man shall deceive another to his prejudice.'⁵¹⁸ On this model, the essence of the doctrine is the prevention of a fraud being committed by the survivor in failing to comply with the terms of the mutual will arrangement.⁵¹⁹ A mutual will arrangement is dependent on there being clear and satisfactory

514 Oakley, 1997, 260; Martin, 1997, 162.

515 Martin, 1997, 162.

516 See section 6.6 above. [1997] 2 WTLR 333.

517 See para 12.3.4 above.

518 (1769) 1 Dick 419. Cf Birch v Curtis [2002] 2 FLR 847.

519 The principles governing mutual wills, and the indemnification of the personal representatives, was considered in Shovelar v Lane [2011] EWCA Civ 802, [2011] 4 All ER 669.

evidence of a contract between two testators to the effect that each would make wills in a particular form and that neither party would revoke that will without informing the other testator.⁵²⁰ The doctrine of mutual wills operates in such a way that ‘the conscience of the survivor’s executor’ is bound by a trust which arises out of ‘the agreement between the two testators not to revoke their wills’.⁵²¹ That trust comes into effect when the first of the two dies without having revoked her will.⁵²² For example, a husband and wife may agree that the survivor be obliged to leave all the matrimonial home to their only child absolutely. Thus, if the husband were to predecease his wife, and if his wife were to have a further child by a subsequent marriage and purport to leave the home after her death on trust for her two children in equal shares, her personal representatives would be obliged to hold that property on constructive trust for the child of her first marriage.

A mutual wills arrangement takes effect by means of a constructive trust in that the arrangement between the two testators by reference to which neither of them alters their will operates on the conscience of the surviving testator once that arrangement has been made, as the Court of Appeal has confirmed in Olins v Walters.⁵²³ This understanding of the mutual wills doctrine is generally taken from the judgment of Deane J in Birmingham v Renfrew:⁵²⁴

... a contract between persons to make corresponding wills gives rise to equitable obligations when one acts on the faith of such an agreement and dies leaving his will unrevoked ... the doctrines of equity attach the obligation to the property. The effect is, I think, that the survivor becomes a constructive trustee and the terms of the trust are those of the will he undertook would be his last will.

The basis of this doctrine in contract and in constructive trust is therefore clear.

An important case relating to mutual wills with a slightly novel twist came in front of the Court of Appeal in Olins v Walters.⁵²⁵ It concerned an agreement entered into in 1998 between an elderly married couple that they would create mutual wills. The arrangement had been explained to them (correctly) by their grandson, who was a solicitor, to the effect that they agreed not to alter their wills from the form into which they had been amended by codicil in 1998 without the agreement of the other person. When the wife died, after the relationship between the parties had deteriorated, the widower did not wish to be bound by the terms of their agreement. He contended that he had no recollection of the agreement formed in 1998. At first instance,⁵²⁶ Norris J found on the facts that on the balance of probabilities⁵²⁷ the parties had formed an agreement between themselves which constituted a mutual wills arrangement. Relying on the documents and on two grandsons’ memories of the meeting in 1998, his Lordship found that that had been the arrangement. The novel twist in this case was that it was one of the parties to the mutual wills arrangement which was 520 Olins v Walters [2009] 2 WLR 1. See also Birmingham v Renfrew (1937) 57 CLR 666.

521 Thomas and Agnes Carvel Foundation v Carvel [2007] EWHC 1314 (Ch), [2007] 4 All ER 81; and Olins v Walters [2009] 2 WLR 1, 10, per Mummery LJ.

522 Ibid.

523 [2009] 2 WLR 1, at [37], per Mummery LJ.

524 (1937) 57 CLR 666, 683.

525 [2009] 2 WLR 1.

526 [2007] EWHC 3060, [2008] WTLR 339.

527 Which is the standard of proof applicable to private law questions of this sort.

contesting its validity, and even its existence,⁵²⁸ whereas usually it would be other family members who would be protesting about this after both parties had died.

Olins v Walters was appealed to the Court of Appeal on two grounds: first, that there was insufficient evidence of a mutual wills arrangement and, secondly, that the terms of the ‘contract’ between the parties were insufficiently clear. The appeal was framed in terms of ‘contract’⁵²⁹ and the Court of Appeal tended to adopt that language, although Mummery LJ in delivering the only judgment of the court did identify very clearly that the doctrine is based on constructive trust.⁵³⁰ Mummery LJ found that Norris J had had sufficient material on the facts to find that the parties had created a mutual wills arrangement on the balance of probabilities. His Lordship also corrected the misapprehension on behalf of the appellant that this area of law was based on contract law and therefore that there must be a contract capable of specific performance. Instead, Mummery LJ explained that this was an equitable obligation imposed on the surviving testator not to alter his will:

It arises by operation of law on the death of the first testator to die so as to bind the conscience of the surviving testator in relation to the property affected.⁵³¹

The keynote of this doctrine is therefore the impact on the conscience of the surviving testator which imposes a constructive trust over the property to be left by him,⁵³² which in practice prevents him from altering his will without the agreement of the other testator.

It is frequently the case that mutual wills are effected with the intention that X shall benefit Y and that Y shall benefit X, no matter who dies first. In effect, they are ‘mutual’ in the sense that they are mutually beneficial and not simply mutually binding. However, in the wake of the decision in Re Dale,⁵³³ it was held that there was no requirement that each party to the arrangement take a personal benefit. Rather, it is possible that there be benefits to third parties.

The question is how this intention to create mutual wills would arise. In Re Hagger,⁵³⁴ a husband and wife made separate wills, but both of those wills contained recitals that the 528 Mummery LJ explained that no case on the authorities had involved a surviving party to the agreement seeking to repudiate it.

529 The appellant argued, inter alia, that there should not be a mutual wills arrangement found on these facts because not all of the terms of that contract were known and because there was no contract which could have attracted specific performance. As Mummery LJ held, however, all that is required is an agreement between the parties that neither should be entitled to alter their wills after the death of the other such that their wills and the property referenced in them are to be held on constructive trust. It is suggested that any property which was not within the terms of the will (because it was outside the wills as drafted or because it came into the hands of a testator at a later stage and was not referenced in the will) could be disposed of differently. All turns on the terms of the will. That does not mean that the contract is incomplete, but rather it means that the contract refers only to the property referenced in the two wills which are the subject matter of the mutual wills arrangement. The language of contract in this context tends only to divert attention away from the real focus of this doctrine, which is a constructive trust which prevents the surviving testator from purporting to alter his or her will. The language of contract also tends to cause claimants to argue that they were not parties to this contract and therefore that its terms cannot bind them; whereas in truth it is the constructive trust over the property covered by the will which binds the world, and not the contractual agreement itself.

530 [2009] 2 WLR 1, at [37].

531 Ibid.

532 Ibid.

533 [1994] Ch 31.

534 [1930] 2 Ch 190.

parties had agreed to the disposal of their property in accordance with those wills and that they intended their wills to be irrevocable. It was held that this constituted sufficient intention to create mutual wills. That case should be juxtaposed with Re Oldham,⁵³⁵ in which a husband and wife created substantially similar wills with identical treatment of their property, but those wills were not expressed as being irrevocable, nor was there any evidence of such an intention, and therefore it was held that these were not mutual wills. Similarly, in Birch v Curtis,⁵³⁶ it was found that a couple could not be proved to have intended to make their wills irrevocable and therefore the doctrine of mutual wills was held not to apply.

In cases of mutual wills it may often happen that one party is on her death bed when the wills are created and therefore the question will arise whether or not that testator had the requisite capacity to make a valid will. In Baker v Baker,⁵³⁷ the testator in question was dying in hospital and suffering with hepatic encephalopathy. One of the doctors expressly recorded in the patient's medical notes that in the doctor's opinion he did not have the requisite capacity to make a will. Consequently, it was held that the patient's will would not be admitted to probate and therefore that the mutual will arrangement failed. On the facts, an argument based on proprietary estoppel (to the effect that the other party had created her will in reliance on the death-bed will) was rejected, in part, so as not to give effect to a will which could not have been properly created.

The most important aspects in establishing a mutual will arrangement are an intention expressed by the parties that their wills be irrevocable⁵³⁸ and that the parties considered that their wills would be binding on one another after death.⁵³⁹ This is so even if a literal reading of the terms of the wills indicates something other than a mutual will. There will be a mutual will arrangement where evidence from the couple's solicitor indicates that their true intention was to bind one another irrevocably.⁵⁴⁰ In general terms, the court is entitled to infer such an intention from the general circumstances of the case.⁵⁴¹

The mutual wills do not become binding, as intimated above, until one of the parties dies, because the arrangement can be broken up to that moment by all the parties in any event.⁵⁴² Where the parties terminate the agreement before the death of any of them, all of the parties are relieved of their obligations under it.⁵⁴³ Until the death of one of the parties, the arrangement takes effect simply as a contract between the parties and has no effect in equity.⁵⁴⁴ In the event that the first to die did not leave property as she was obliged to under the agreement, the survivor is entitled to damages for breach of contract from the deceased's estate.

The obligations of the survivor under the arrangement will clearly depend on the terms of the will and on the parties' intention under the mutual wills arrangement. It is generally 535 [1925] Ch 75; approved in Gray v Perpetual Trustee Company [1928] AC 391 and Birmingham v Renfrew (1937) 57 CLR 666.

536 [2002] 2 FLR 847.

537 [2008] 2 FLR 767.

538 Re Green [1951] Ch 158; Re Cleaver [1981] 1 WLR 939.

539 Re Goodchild (Deceased) [1996] 1 WLR 694.

540 Ibid.

541 Dufour v Pereira (1769) 1 Dick 419; Stone v Hoskins [1905] P 194.

542 Martin, 1997, 308.

543 Stone v Hoskins [1905] P 194.

544 Robinson v Ommalley (1883) 23 Ch D 285.

assumed that the survivor acquires the property as its absolute owner during her lifetime, subject to a fiduciary duty to settle the property by will in accordance with the arrangement after her death.⁵⁴⁵ In this respect, the obligation of the survivor is a form of ‘floating’ trust,⁵⁴⁶ or one that is ‘in suspense’:⁵⁴⁷ that is, it will not become fully binding until death. The weakness in this arrangement is that it will not be binding on bona fide purchasers without notice of the mutual will arrangement.⁵⁴⁸ In creating the wills as part of a mutual wills arrangement, it is of course important that the wills themselves are properly executed. The Court of Appeal in *Gill v Woodall*⁵⁴⁹ considered a mutual will arrangement in which it was contended that the wife suffered from a nervous anxiety disorder⁵⁵⁰ which would have meant that when the will was drafted and the mutual wills arrangement created that she would not have understood its meaning and that as a result she would have been unduly influenced into making it. It was held by the Court of Appeal that, on these facts, the will had been drafted by a solicitor and read to the wife such that it could be inferred that she had understood the terms of the will and the arrangement, that she had given her knowledge and approval to it, and that there was a ‘strong presumption’⁵⁵¹ on these facts that that will constituted her ‘testamentary intentions’⁵⁵² at the moment of executing it. Therefore, the mutual wills arrangement stood, and in consequence the claimant charity⁵⁵³ which stood to benefit from the mutual wills arrangement being invalidated took nothing.

12.8 TRUSTEES DE SON TORT AND INTERMEDDLERS AS CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTEES

This section examines situations in which people interfere with the activities of an express trust to such an extent that they are deemed to be trustees themselves. On the basis that these people are not expressly declared by the settlor to be trustees but rather are deemed to be trustees by operation of law on account of their meddling with trust affairs, it is argued that they are constructive trustees.⁵⁵⁴

This doctrine is comparatively straightforward to state. Where a person who has not been officially appointed as a trustee of an express trust interferes with or involves herself in the business of the trust so as to appear to be acting as a trustee, that person shall be deemed to be a trustee. Smith LJ stated the nature of this form of constructive trust in the following way:

545 Birmingham v Renfrew (1937) 57 CLR 666; Re Cleaver [1981] 1 WLR 939; Goodchild v Goodchild [1996] 1 WLR 694.

546 Hayton, 1992.

547 Ottaway v Norman [1972] Ch 698.

548 Pilcher v Rawlins (1872) LR 7 Ch App 259.

549 [2011] 3 WLR 85.

550 Stemming from a fear of her husband’s temper, this manifested itself in agoraphobia and a ‘panic disorder to a serious degree’, which meant that she would rarely go outside and would not attend social events: at [40].

551 In several cases it had been held that a ‘grave and strong presumption’ arose that a will constituted the testamentary intentions of the testator if it had been read over to or by the testator: Fulton v Andrew (1875) LR 7 HL 448, 469, per Lord Hatherley; and in particular in In re Morris, decd [1971] P 62, 77, per Hill J. This approach was approved in Fuller v Strum [2002] 1 WLR 1097 and in Perrins v Holland [2011] 2 WLR 1086.

552 The expression is culled from Fuller v Strum [2002] 1 WLR 1097, at [59], per Chadwick LJ.

553 One of the wills had provided that unallocated property should be held for the RSPCA as residuary legatee.

554 Harpum, 1994.

If one, not being a trustee and not having authority from a trustee, takes upon himself to intermeddle with trust matters or to do acts characteristic of the office of trustee, he may therefore make himself what is called in law trustee of his own wrong – ie, a trustee de son tort, or, as it is also termed, a constructive trustee.⁵⁵⁵

Therefore, a trustee de son tort is a trustee who intermeddles with trust business. What does not emerge from that statement is the usual pre-requisite that the trustee de son tort must have trust property in her possession or control before this form of constructive trust will obtain.⁵⁵⁶ If the property were not vested in the defendant, then the appropriate form of liability would be that considered in para 12.9.3 below: that of a dishonest assistant. A dishonest assistant is one who assists in a breach of trust in a manner in which an honest person would not have acted, or who was reckless as to some risk being caused to the trust fund.⁵⁵⁷ The liability is a personal liability to account for any loss suffered by the trust fund.⁵⁵⁸ A constructive trustee (that is, in this context, as trustee de son tort), on the other hand, will be responsible for the maintenance of the trust property in her possession, as well as personally liable for loss to the trust arising from a breach of trust.

So, in Blyth v Fladgate,⁵⁵⁹ Exchequer bills had been held on trust by a sole trustee. That trustee had deposited the bills in the name of a firm of solicitors, thus putting the bills within the control of the solicitors. The trustee died and, before substitute trustees had been appointed, the solicitors sold the bills and invested the proceeds in a mortgage. In the event, the security provided under the mortgage was insufficient, and accordingly the trust suffered a loss. It was held that the firm of solicitors had become constructive trustees by dint of their having dealt with the trust property then within their control.⁵⁶⁰ As such, they were liable to account to the beneficiaries for the loss occasioned to the trust.

Similarly, where a manager of land continued to collect rents in respect of that land after the death of the landlord, without informing the tenants of their landlord's death, that manager was held to be a constructive trustee of those profits which had been held in a bank account.⁵⁶¹ Similarly, in relation to Boardman v Phipps considered earlier in this chapter,⁵⁶² where a solicitor interferes with the management of a trust, then we could consider him to be a trustee de son tort: that is, a constructive trust as a result of his assumption of control of the management of the trust.

While the responsibilities of constructive trustees will not always equate to those of an express trustee, it has been held that because a trustee de son tort acts as though an express trustee, she is to be treated as bearing all the obligations of an express trustee.⁵⁶³

555 Mara v Browne [1896] 1 Ch 199, 209.

556 Re Barney [1892] 2 Ch 265.

557 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378.

558 Barnes v Addy (1874) 9 Ch App 244.

559 [1891] 1 Ch 337.

560 Re Bell's Indenture [1980] 1 WLR 1217.

561 Lyell v Kennedy (1889) 14 App Cas 437; see also English v Dedham Vale Properties [1978] 1 WLR 93.

562 Section 12.5.

563 Soar v Ashwell [1893] 2 QB 390.

12.9 PERSONAL LIABILITY TO ACCOUNT AS A CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTEE

12.9.1 Introduction and scope of this discussion

What follows is only a truncated discussion of personal liability to account as a constructive trustee for knowing receipt or dishonest assistance. The full discussion of this material takes place in Chapter 20. Nevertheless, there is a brief mention of these doctrines here because it is clear that the courts do describe liability for knowing receipt and dishonest assistance as being constructive trusts.⁵⁶⁴ The reason for that is perfectly clear: in such cases, the defendants are deemed to be trustees because of their involvement in breaches of trusts, and thus are described as constructive trustees because the court is ‘construing’ them to be liable to account to the beneficiaries as though they were trustees. Significantly, the defendants will hold no property on trust; rather, their liability is a personal liability to make good any loss suffered by the beneficiaries as though they were trustees who had committed a breach of trust (as discussed in Chapter 18).⁵⁶⁵ This section also includes a fuller discussion of the liabilities of a person who makes herself a trustee de son tort, as considered in the preceding section, by interfering with the running of the trust such that she effectively assumes the powers of the trustees.

There are two distinct categories of liability in this context: strangers who receive trust property transferred in breach of trust; and strangers who do not receive trust property but merely assist its transfer in breach of trust. Evidently there is a narrow line between the categories of claim. The claims for ‘unconscionable receipt’ and ‘dishonest assistance’ are personal claims for money brought on behalf of the beneficiaries and predicated on the notion that the original trust property cannot be recovered.⁵⁶⁶ However, it may be the case that the beneficiaries of the trust will seek a proprietary claim in respect of the lost property, as well as personal claims against those involved in transferring that property in breach of trust.

12.9.2 Unconscionable receipt

Where a person receives trust property in the knowledge that that property has been passed in breach of trust and acts unconscionably in so doing, then, the recipient will be personally liable to account to the trust for the value of the property passed away. It is a defence to demonstrate that the receipt was authorised under the terms of the trust, or that the recipient has lawfully changed her position in reliance on the receipt of the property.

Unconscionable receipt concerns people who are not trustees but who nevertheless receive trust property beneficially when it has been paid away in breach of trust; and where that person receives the trust property knowing that that property has been passed to her in breach of trust.⁵⁶⁷ Whether or not there has been receipt will generally be decided by asking whether 564 Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [2002] 3 WLR 1913; [2003] 1 All ER 97.

565 Target Holdings v Redfern [1996] 1 AC 421; [1995] 3 All ER 785, HL.

566 See Chapter 19 on this point.

567 Polly Peck International v Nadir (No 2) [1992] 4 All ER 769, 777, per Scott LJ.

or not the defendant had the trust property in her possession or under her control at any time after the breach of trust and after she had the requisite knowledge.⁵⁶⁸ The only available defences against a claim for knowing receipt are bona fide purchaser for value without notice,⁵⁶⁹ change of position,⁵⁷⁰ or potentially passing on.⁵⁷¹

12.9.3 Dishonest assistance

Where a person dishonestly assists another in a breach of trust, that dishonest assistant will be personally liable to account to the trust for the value lost to the trust. 'Dishonesty' in this context does require that there be some element of fraud, lack of probity or reckless risk-taking. It is not necessary that any trustee of the trust is dishonest; simply that the dishonest assistant is dishonest.

Dishonest assistance concerns the liability of strangers who assist in a breach of trust or in the transfer of property away from a trust. The distinction from knowing receipt is that there is no requirement for the imposition of liability that the stranger has had possession or control of the property at any time. Therefore, some commentators have doubted whether or not this form of liability should really be described as a 'constructive trust' in any event.⁵⁷² However, the courts have continued to use the terminology of constructive trust and the imposition of constructive trusteeship despite this conceptual problem.⁵⁷³

Liability for dishonest assistance in a breach of trust arises in situations when there has been a breach of trust and in which the defendant's involvement has been dishonest. Lord Nicholls in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan held that a breach of trust by a trustee need not have been a dishonest act on the part of the trustee.⁵⁷⁴ Rather, it is sufficient that some accessory acted dishonestly for that accessory to be fixed with liability for the breach. The test set out by Lord Nicholls was an objective test which requires the court to consider what an honest person would have done in the circumstances. If the defendant has failed to do what an honest person would have done, then the defendant is deemed to have been dishonest under this objective test. In the subsequent decision of the House of Lords in Twins v Yardley,⁵⁷⁵ the House of Lords seemed to suggest that the defendant must also have realised that an honest person would have considered the defendant's actions to have been dishonest. This approach imported a level of subjectivity to the test. However, Lord Nicholls in Dubai Aluminium v Salaam reinforced the purely objective nature of this test, as confirmed by the Privy Council in Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust.⁵⁷⁶

568 El Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings [1993] BCLC 735; and below in Chapter 19.

569 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

570 Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale [1991] 3 WLR 10.

571 Kleinwort Benson v Birmingham CC [1996] 4 All ER 733, CA.

572 Oakley, 1997, 186 et seq.

573 Agip (Africa) v Jackson [1991] Ch 547; Polly Peck International v Nadir (No 2) [1992] 4 All ER 769; Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

574 [1995] 2 AC 378; applied in Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [2003] 1 All ER 97.

575 [2002] 2 All ER 377.

576 See section 32.2 below.

12.9.4 Interaction of these remedies with the doctrine of trustee de son tort

As considered in section 12.8, where a person intermeddles with trust property in such a way that she begins to act in fact as a trustee, and that person causes a loss to the trust, that person is held liable to the trust as a trustee de son tort.⁵⁷⁷ The expression means, literally, a trustee as a result of one's own wrong. Such a person will be treated as a constructive trustee.⁵⁷⁸ That person differs from the two categories of personal liability to account considered immediately above because her intermeddling relates to the treatment of the trust property or some interference with the business of the trust: her treatment as a de facto trustee arises from the fact that she acts as though she is a trustee – it is not simply that she has committed a wrong in relation to the trust fund. The latter state of affairs applies to personal liability to account as a knowing recipient or as a dishonest assistant.

This pairing of equitable claims which oblige third parties to trusts (that is, people who are neither trustees nor beneficiaries) to account to the beneficiaries of a trust for their part in a breach of trust differs from the liability of intermeddlers considered in section 12.8 above in two ways. First, the liability is a personal liability to account and not a proprietary liability to hold any specific property on trust. Secondly, the third parties (or strangers) are not deemed to be trustees who have meddled with the trust's business. Rather, they are strangers who have either received property with knowledge that that was done in breach of trust, or dishonestly assisted in a breach of trust with receiving any trust property.⁵⁷⁹ In short, this is a form of equitable wrong which those strangers have committed, or to which they have been party. It is important to distinguish this form of liability from the proprietary forms of constructive trust which have been considered hitherto in this chapter.

12.10 ISSUES WITH CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS

12.10.1 Is the doctrine of constructive trust a coherent one?

It has been suggested that constructive trusts may serve only to confuse the law because it is not clear on what basis they arise, because they are sometimes personal and sometimes proprietary, and because they do not constitute a coherent doctrine.⁵⁸⁰ I disagree with the idea that constructive trusts cause confusion: on the contrary, I think that constructive trusts offer a vital means for English private law judges to ensure that justice is done on the facts before them as they see it – having listened to the witnesses and examined the evidence – on the basis of preventing unconscionable conduct. That, it seems to me, is not to impose constructive trusts on a random basis: rather, it is to ensure that an ethical notion of good conscience is maintained in English law. The weakness of the competing doctrine of restitution on grounds of unjust enrichment, advanced by some academics, is precisely that it has ⁵⁷⁷ Selangor United Rubber Ltd v Craddock (No 3) [1968] 1 WLR 1555; Rowe v Prance [1999] 2 FLR 787; James v Williams [1999] 3 All ER 309.

⁵⁷⁸ Mara v Browne [1896] 1 Ch 199, 209; Carl Zeiss Stiftung v Herbert Smith (No 2) [1969] 2 Ch 276, 289; see also Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [2003] 1 All ER 97, per Lord Millett.

⁵⁷⁹ Birks, 1993:1, 318; Gardner, 1996, 56.

⁵⁸⁰ Birks, 1989, 89.

no mechanism for achieving just conclusions but instead seeks to bind the courts into narrow, technical rules.⁵⁸¹

Nevertheless, the question as to whether or not constructive trusts are a coherent doctrine is an interesting one. There are two possible points of view, it seems to me. The first point of view would argue that constructive trusts do not arise on a coherent basis. The point is this. If one looks at all of the various types of constructive trust considered in this chapter, and also looks at the doctrines of dishonest assistance and knowing receipt (which arise on the basis of constructive trusteeship) in Chapter 20, and also the common intention constructive trusts in Chapter 15, then it is plain that they are not identical. The constructive trust in Boardman v Phipps arises so as to prevent conflicts of interest; the constructive trust in Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid arises on the basis of equity looking upon as done that which ought to have been done so as to take possession of a bribe; the common intention constructive trust in Lloyds Bank v Rosset arises so as to effect mutual understandings or in relation to conduct in the form of contributions to the purchase price of property; the constructive trust in Jerome v Kelly arises as a trust sub modo in relation to a contract to transfer property; the personal ‘constructive trusteeship’ in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan arises in response to dishonesty. All of these cases are at the House of Lords or Privy Council level and do not include the many decisions of more junior courts: and yet it is apparent that they do not arise on exactly the same basis. These various courts do not even refer to each other – rather they seem to be deciding points which are specific to their own particular form of constructive trust. The key words they use in reaching their judgments – conscience, dishonesty, conflict of interest, that which ought to be done, and so forth – are different. Therefore, we could say that constructive trusts lack a little coherence.

The second point of view would require us to return to another House of Lords decision: Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington. As was discussed at the beginning of this chapter, Lord Browne-Wilkinson reminded us that equity has always operated on the basis of conscience; since the Earl of Oxford’s Case in 1615 this has been the case, as considered at the very beginning of this book.⁵⁸² Constructive trusts are therefore said to arise on the basis of the defendant knowing of some factor which affects her conscience in relation to property. That is a perfectly viable, underpinning principle on which to base a legal concept like the constructive trust. The challenge is then to set out the circumstances in which the court will consider there to have been unconscionable behaviour. Looking at the House of Lords and Privy Council cases listed in the previous paragraph it would be possible to stand back from them slightly and say that, while they do not use exactly the same terminology all of the time, all of their principles operate on a set of concepts which are very similar to saying that the defendant has acted unconscionably. That is so whether the test applied is one of allowing a conflict of interest, or acting dishonestly, or seeking to deny someone rights in a home for which they have paid in part, or seeking to renege on a contractual obligation to transfer property: each of these tests could be understood as responding at root to a requirement that the defendant act in good conscience, just as Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington and the Earl of Oxford’s Case required.

Either you are convinced that this area is sufficiently explicable on the basis of a deep, underpinning notion of conscience – as discussed in detail in section 32.2 of this book and on-line⁵⁸³ – or you consider it to be based on no valid organising concept and instead comprised of a scattering of unconnected doctrines. This issue receives lengthy consideration on the companion websites to this book.⁵⁸⁴

581 See section 31.3, and www.alastairhudson.com/trustslaw/restitutionofunjustenrichment.pdf.

582 See para 1.1.

12.10.2 Sympathy is not conscience

It is perhaps a trite point but nevertheless one that is worth making: imposing trusts on the basis of conscience does not mean that the court should in some way feel sorry for every claimant who feels that she has been hard done by. There is a tendency among some academics to think that there is something deficient in an area of law which they think operates randomly on the basis of ‘right and wrong’ or a general notion of ‘conscience’; there is a different tendency among some students to think that equity is simply about giving the claimant whatever she wants if she thinks she has been mistreated in some indefinable way. Equity, as should have become clear already in this book, is a fascinating hybrid of technical, intricate principles of law combined with a very stylised notion of conscience which falls into well-understood categories. A good example of equity insisting on technical entitlement to property, and not simply deciding on the basis of sentiment, arose in *Re Farepak Food and Gift Ltd*⁵⁸⁵ a case which arose very shortly before Christmas 2006. A large number of predominantly low income families had contributed monthly amounts of money to a Christmas club which was run, commercially, by Farepak Food and Gift Ltd (‘F’). The contributors were entitled to receive food hampers and vouchers with which to buy Christmas presents from F and its various suppliers. F went into insolvent administration in October 2006 and, as was reported at length in the national press, the customers were not going to receive their Christmas parcels at all. In the eyes of the national press this seemed like a sob story in which Christmas was being ruined for thousands of ordinary families. Mann J heard an application for a distribution of F’s remaining assets to identified classes of customers at great speed shortly before Christmas, and held the following:⁵⁸⁶

There is no doubt whatsoever that the customers of Farepak deserve an enormous amount of sympathy, and as far as I am concerned they have it. They are also entitled to all the assistance which the court can properly give them, in terms of procedural matters and assistance in having their proper claims speedily determined, including some at least of some of the corner-cutting that has occurred in the present application. That is doubtless why Briggs J ordered that this matter should come on so quickly, and why representative creditors have agreed to be joined and why they and their representatives have acted so expeditiously. Mr Lopian [counsel on behalf of Her Majesty’s Revenue and Customs] quite properly made it clear that HMRC was not advancing its points with any enthusiasm, but they were points which had to be made. However, at the end of the day their claims have to be based in law, not sympathy. I have to be satisfied that their claims have been made out to a sufficient level at this stage. If I am not then no amount of sympathy can entitle them to be paid moneys to which they are not, or may not be,

583 See www.alastairhudson.com/equity/conscience.pdf

584 See www.alastairhudson.com/trustslawindex.htm

585 [2006] All ER (D) 265 (Dec).

586 Ibid, para [28].

legally entitled. There are a large number of insolvencies in respect of which various creditors have to be treated with sympathy, but in all cases it is legal claims which have to rule the day.

The law on constructive trusts, as with all of equity, is not based on some anti-intellectual or emotional sense of ‘nice’ and ‘nasty’. Instead it is a very particular and subtle way of thinking about law. It requires jurists – whether judges, academics or practitioners – to understand the nuances which inform the general principles of equity and to apply them appropriately to individual cases. It is not a form of legal thinking which sets out concrete rules in advance and permits of no exceptions – as some might caricature the common law⁵⁸⁷ – but it is no less scrupulous a way of thinking about law for that. The general idea of conscience is considered in detail in section 32.2.

12.10.3 The possibility of a remedial constructive trust

Usually a remedial constructive trust is taken to be a constructive trust the terms of which are decided by the judge at the date of trial so that the successful claimant acquires a property right in the manner described by the trust from that time forwards. It was held by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in *Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington*⁵⁸⁸ that remedial constructive trusts do not form part of English law, although his Lordship conceded that they might become part of English law in the future.⁵⁸⁹ In a dissenting judgment in the House of Lords in Thorner v Major,⁵⁹⁰ Lord Scott suggested that cases like Thorner v Major should be decided by using a ‘remedial constructive trust’. His Lordship did not deign to define what he meant by this term. Lord Scott suggested that proprietary estoppel should be limited to circumstances in which ‘the representations relied on relate to the acquisition by the representee of an immediate, or more or less immediate, interest in the property in question’⁵⁹¹ such that the representor is ‘estopped from denying that the representee has the proprietary interest that was promised’.⁵⁹² By contrast it is said that a remedial constructive trust should be used where ‘the representation has related to inheritance prospects’ because those cases are ‘difficult . . . to square with proprietary estoppel’ and instead should be understood as relating to the common intention of the parties as in cases like Gissing v Gissing. It is suggested that this is a distinction without a meaningful difference. The facts in Thorner v Major fit the matrix of representation, reliance and detriment perfectly neatly; whereas the common intention cases relate more specifically to situations in which the parties intend to co-own property as opposed to one party intending to bequeath the property to another. It is suggested that Lord Scott’s approach ought not to be favoured. Proprietary estoppel has long been understood as arising on the basis of a representation (or assurance), reliance and 587 Although see the thesis in Cotterrell, The Politics of Jurisprudence, 2005, as to the flexible basis of the common law.

588 [1996] AC 669.

589 The law continues to be set against the remedial constructive trust after Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington: Clarke v Meadus [2010] EWHC 3117 (Ch).

590 [2009] 1 WLR 776.

591 [2009] 1 WLR 776, para [20].

592 Ibid.

detriment, and not simply on the antique notion that it involves denying the truth of a statement (as explained in section 13.1 and the rest of that chapter) as Lord Scott asserted. The remedial constructive trust adds nothing here.

12.10.4 Constructive trusts are like the English language

As was discussed in Chapter 7,⁵⁹³ studying equity is very like learning the English language. At first blush, it seems that every rule has an exception and that most of the language is an entirely random collection of separate idioms and ideas. In fact, to a native Englishman the English language is made up of a very large number of strict grammatical rules and idiomatic structures which, if broken, really do jar on the ear. It is suggested that the doctrine of constructive trusts is similar. While it may seem at first glance that this area is comprised of doctrines moving in entirely random motion, in truth each species of constructive trust is based on its own well-understood principles. The principle of conscience, identifiable in equity from the Earl of Oxford's Case through to Westdeutsche Landesbank and beyond, operates as a high-level principle around which all of these constructive trusts revolve. There is in truth nothing more English than a constructive trust, along with the novels of PG Wodehouse, long games of cricket on June afternoons, and the English language itself.

Equitable estoppel

13.1	INTRODUCTION	651
13.2	A SINGLE DOCTRINE OF ESTOPPEL?	652
13.3	PROPRIETARY ESTOPPEL	655
13.3.1	Proprietary estoppel and mistake	656
13.3.2	The various approaches in modern proprietary estoppel	657
13.3.3	The three elements of the modern test for proprietary estoppel	661
13.3.4	Identifying the appropriate remedy for proprietary estoppel	670
13.3.5	Proprietary estoppel in commercial joint ventures: Cobbe v Yeoman's Row	677
13.4	ESTOPPEL LICENCES: FROM CONTRACT TO PROPERTY RIGHTS	680
13.5	PROMISSORY ESTOPPEL	682
13.6	OTHER FORMS OF ESTOPPEL IN COMMERCIAL CONTEXTS	683
13.6.1	Common law estoppel and the nemo dat principle	683
13.6.2	Estoppel by representation	683
13.7	IN CONCLUSION	684

13.1 INTRODUCTION

The expression 'equitable estoppel' has been used by the judges in a number of leading cases in this area (on which see *Gillett v Holt*¹ and *Yaxley v Gotts*²) and so I am content to adopt it here as a general title for this chapter. In truth, though, there is no such thing as a single 'estoppel' on the decided cases: rather, there are a number of different estoppels which operate in different contexts both at common law and in equity.³ This chapter will tease out

1 [2000] 2 All ER 289.

2 [2000] 1 All ER 711.

3 There are other cases in which the expression has been dismissed as being meaningless because it discloses no particular kind of estoppel. This simply discloses a difference in opinion as to whether there is a single doctrine of estoppel in equity revolving around a single concept of good conscience, or whether there are still to be many different kinds of estoppel operating on different bases. That point is considered in greater detail through this chapter.

some of the commonalities and some of the differences between some of the more significant forms of estoppel.⁴

The word ‘estoppel’ itself comes from the French ‘estouppail’ and ‘estoupper’, which are also the source of the English word ‘stop’; both have a stem in the Latin ‘stoppa’ which relates to tallow or flax used to plug a hole (itself the rarer usage of the English word ‘stop’). Quite simply, an estoppel is something which stops a defendant from doing some act, just as a plug prevents liquid from escaping through a hole. Wilken and Villiers⁵ quote the words of Coke on estoppel in describing the legal doctrine as being based on the following proposition: ‘. . . a man’s owne act or acceptance stoppeth or closeth his mouth to alleage or plead the truth.’ Therefore, an estoppel was aimed at preventing a defendant who had asserted that x was the case from relying on the truth which subsequently transpired that y was really the case. The defendant was still required to do x if that is what the claimant had been led to believe. Many judges were concerned that this doctrine would mean that the truth would be ignored.⁶ This literal sense of the word is in effect the sense in which Lord Scott used it in Cobbe v Yeoman’s Row.⁷ Despite this initial misgiving in the case law, latterly judges have come to recognise that estoppel in its many forms is ‘perhaps the most powerful and flexible instrument to be found in any system of court jurisprudence’.⁸ The reason for this enthusiasm is a recognition that estoppel enables the court to prevent injustice being suffered by individual claimants regardless of the precise legal relations which might otherwise have been created between the parties.

13.2 A SINGLE DOCTRINE OF ESTOPPEL?

The doctrinal position as to the impossibility of the recognition of a single doctrine of estoppel, based on the decided cases, can be simply stated.⁹ There is no single doctrine of estoppel; nor would it be possible to create one out of the existing categories, despite some suggestions to the contrary by Lord Denning.¹⁰ First, there is a distinction between the common law and equity, and estoppel is recognised at common law as well as in equity,

4 Some of those discussions have taken place at paras 3.4.2 (certainty in the creation of trusts); 5.4.3 (informal creation of equitable interests); 12.3.2 (comparison with constructive trusts); 12.6.1 (within common intention constructive trusts); 15.7 generally (operation of proprietary estoppel within the law on trusts of homes); 21.4.4 (estoppel and the nemo dat principle in commercial law).

5 Wilken and Villiers, 1999, 103.

6 The doctrine was considered ‘odious’ by Bramwell LJ precisely because it gave a claimant a remedy even though the facts on which that claimant relied were not true; Baxendale v Bennet (1878) 3 QBD 578.

7 [2008] 1 WLR 1752.

8 Canada and Dominion Sugar Company Ltd v Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Ltd [1947] AC 46, 56 quoting Sir Frederick Pollock.

9 Lord Walker referred to the following sources on the possibility of a single doctrine of equitable estoppel in Thorner v Major [2009] 1 WLR 776, at [67], while refusing to comment definitively on the question: ‘The index to the first (1923) edition of George Spencer Bower’s Law Relating to Estoppel by Representation contains in its index the entry “EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL”, a meaningless expression’, a view which is developed at length in the text, with Lord Selborne LC attracting particular criticism (at p 14) that ‘a jurist so nice and discriminating in his phraseology’ should have used the expression in Citizens’ Bank of Louisiana v First National Bank of New Orleans (1873) LR 6 HL 352 at 360.

10 Amalgamated Investment & Property Co Ltd (In Liquidation) v Texas Commerce International Bank Ltd [1982] 1 QB 84. A view which also appealed to other judges: eg, Hiscox v Outhwaite (No 1) [1992] 1 AC 562, 574, per Lord Donaldson; John v George and Walton (1996) 71 P & CR 375, 385, per Morritt LJ.

where it is based on principles of commercial propriety (as considered in Chapter 21) Therefore, there cannot simply be an equitable estoppel which accounts for all forms of estoppel.

Secondly, there is no single explanation for the manner in which all estoppels operate. Estoppel in all its forms is based on a variety of underlying conceptions, varying from honesty¹¹ to common sense¹² to common fairness.¹³ What emerges just from this short list is that common principles underpinning all estoppel can be identified only at the most rarefied levels – that of fairness, justice and so forth.¹⁴ Some academics argue that estoppel arises on the basis of ‘unconscionability’,¹⁵ but acknowledge elsewhere that there is nevertheless a distinction between those forms of proprietary estoppel (let alone the others) which arise variously on the basis of avoidance of detriment,¹⁶ enforcement of promise,¹⁷ or on grounds of mistake.¹⁸ There are various forms of estoppel with boundaries so thin that arguments have been led in the cases for their amalgamation.¹⁹

Nevertheless, despite this doctrinaire position, there has been a powerful argument put by Professor Elizabeth Cooke for the establishment of a single doctrine of estoppel predicated on a concept of good conscience.²⁰ In general terms, Cooke considers the doctrine of estoppel to be a means of preventing a person from changing her mind in circumstances in which it would be unconscionable so to do.²¹ What might be problematic in this conception of estoppel, as Cooke discusses, is deciding on the range of acts and omissions which might be thought ‘unconscionable’ and so render otherwise ordinary, non-actionable examples of people changing their minds into those sorts of changes of mind which are actionable by estoppel. That point can be made in the following way. If estoppels arise on the basis of unconscionability, then there is only a narrow class of acts of what might be ordinarily recognised as unconscionable behaviour which is legally actionable. Therefore, if you promise to telephone me but know when you make the promise that you really do not want to telephone me and that you probably never will telephone me, we might consider that action to have been unconscionable, in that your lying to me is not the act of a completely honest person, but it is unlikely that we would consider it to be legally actionable. Here there is a disjunction between our notion of ‘good conscience’ and our notion of ‘good conscience which is legally actionable’. The fundamental weakness of purporting to base these doctrines on the abstract notions of ‘justice’ or ‘fairness’ is that none of the jurists actually intends to

11 Re Exchange Securities & Commodities Ltd [1988] Ch 46, 54, per Harman J.

12 London Joint Stock Bank Ltd v Macmillan [1918] AC 777, 818, per Lord Haldane.

13 Lyle-Meller v A Lewis & Co [1956] 1 WLR 29, 44, per Morris LJ.

14 The arguments for an all-embracing estoppel are based on such concepts: see, eg, the various dicta of Lord Denning in Amalgamated Investment & Property Co Ltd v Texas Commerce International Bank Ltd [1982] 1 QB 84; Lyle-Meller v A Lewis & Co [1956] 1 WLR 29; Moorgate Mercantile Co Ltd v Twitchings [1976] 1 QB 225.

15 Mee, 1999; Cooke, 2000.

16 Lim v Ang [1992] 1 WLR 113.

17 Pascoe v Turner [1979] 2 All ER 945.

18 Wilmot v Barber (1880) 15 Ch D 96.

19 Crabb v Arun DC [1976] Ch 179, 193, per Lord Scarman; Taylor Fashions Ltd v Liverpool Victoria Trustees Co Ltd [1982] 1 QB 133, 151, per Oliver J.

20 Cooke, 2000 generally.

21 Eg, Amalgamated Investment and Property Co Ltd v Texas Commerce International Bank Ltd [1982] 1 QB 84, 104, per Robert Goff J.

capture all unconscionable behaviour: only unconscionable behaviour which falls into established legal and equitable categories.²²

The tension here between the historical truth that there are many forms of estoppel and the nagging sense nevertheless that they are all based on similar notions of conscionability is encapsulated in Lord Denning's apparent shift in emphasis when in 1980 he likened the many forms of this doctrine to 'a big house with many rooms' where 'each room is used differently from the others',²³ and then in 1981 when his Lordship suggested that while 'the doctrine of estoppel . . . has evolved during the last 150 years in a sequence of separate developments . . . [a]ll these can now be seen to merge into one general principle shorn of limitations'.²⁴ It is this drift from separation between many technical forms of estoppel towards the recognition of a central operating principle which Cooke observes. In common with the project of this book in examining the roots of a principle of 'good conscience' in much of equity, a principle which draws on the role of the Lords Chancellor as keepers of the monarch's conscience and from procedural notions of consentia in early courts of equity, there is a pleasing symmetry in identifying a form of estoppel which can be grounded in the notion that the defendant should be prevented from asserting that y is the case in any circumstance in which it would be unconscionable to deny that x was what the defendant had led the claimant to believe was the case, thus causing the claimant detriment, loss or harm.

In common among the various forms of estoppel is the notion of detrimental reliance: that is, some reliance by the claimant on some act, representation or similar assurance of the defendant. The requirement for reliance is weaker in promissory estoppel than in proprietary estoppel. In both of these doctrines, there is some requirement that the defendant has acted unconscionably in some way.²⁵ The idea that all of estoppel ought to be understood as responding to a general notion of 'unconscionability' (even if the various forms of estoppel cannot be collapsed into one general doctrine) does, however, have some senior judicial support. As Lord Goff put it: 'In the end, I am inclined to think that the many circumstances capable of giving rise to an estoppel cannot be accommodated within a single formula, and that it is unconscionability which provides the link between them.'²⁶ The principal difference between the doctrines is that of the belief required of the claimant. In promissory estoppel the claimant must have been led to believe by the defendant that her rights will not be enforced: proprietary estoppel requires the claimant to believe that she will acquire some right in property. Estoppel by representation,²⁷ which is generally merely a rule of evidence,²⁸ issue estoppel,²⁹ and estoppel by convention,³⁰

22 Cooke, 2000, 2.

23 McIlkenny v Chief Constable of the West Midlands [1980] 1 QB 283, 317.

24 Amalgamated Investment and Property Co Ltd v Texas Commerce International Bank Ltd [1982] 1 QB 84, 122.

25 Cooke, 2000, 54 et seq. Wilson v Truelove [2003] WTLR 609.

26 Johnson v Gore Wood & Co (No.1) [2002] 2 AC 1, [2001] 2 WLR 72, [2001] BCC 820 at 842, per Lord Goff.

27 Jorden v Money (1854) 5 HLC 185, (1854) 10 ER 868: a doctrine recognised both by common law and by equity.

28 Oliver v Bank of England [1902] 1 Ch 610.

29 This form of estoppel prevented the same claim being brought twice between the same parties in R (Coke-Wallis) v Institute of Chartered Accountants [2011] 2 WLR 103.

30 Co-operative Bank v Tipper [1996] 4 All ER 366; Wilson v Truelove [2003] WTLR 609. In Trustee Solutions Ltd v Dubery [2006] EWHC 1426 (Ch) it was held that where there had been no common, shared misunderstanding between members of a pension scheme trust that the terms of the trust would necessitate a change after a ruling of the European Court of Justice as to equal retirement dates between the sexes: because there was no common misunderstanding there could not be estoppel by convention.

likewise a rule of evidence,³¹ require the claimant to believe that a given state of affairs exists.³² It is not sufficient, for example, for a defendant to contend that the simple payment of money to her constituted a representation that it was owed – particularly where a contract between the parties provided expressly to the contrary – unless there was some other factor which justified the claimant’s belief in that state of affairs.³³

Thirdly, there is a distinction between those estoppels which operate only in relation to the past and those which make actionable some representation about the future. Promissory and proprietary estoppel will reflect on future conduct, whereas estoppel by deed and others will relate only to past conduct. In relation to those estoppels which take into account the future there is then the issue of whether or not the defendant’s promise will be enforced. Promissory estoppel is a shield which will protect the claimant only from the effects of the detriment caused by the defendant’s representation. There is a line carefully drawn between equity’s prevention of uncompensated detriment and the enforcement of contract: the former is the sole interest of promissory estoppel, but never the latter.³⁴ A promise as to future conduct is enforceable only as a contract, and then only if consideration is present.³⁵ Proprietary estoppel, however, enforces representations as to the future, provided that they are linked specifically to rights in property and not generally as to performance of something akin to a contract. However, it is clear that the various forms of estoppel are combining, at least in the modern judicial mind, ever more closely into a single estoppel based on a notion of good conscience.³⁶

The one fly in the ointment here is the decision of the House of Lords in *Cobbe v Yeoman’s Row*³⁷ which is discussed in detail below, which suggests that unconscionability alone is not enough. This is, it is suggested, completely in line with the earlier decided cases if what is meant is that the claimant must also demonstrate for proprietary estoppel that there has also been a representation, reliance and detriment, coupled with unconscionability on the part of the defendant. Lord Scott returned to the notion in Ramsden v Dyson that estoppel is based on preventing a person from alleging that something was the case when it was not, and so if no such allegation of fact was made, no claim in estoppel lies. Lord Walker and Lord Rodger effectively suggested in *Thorner v Major*³⁸ that the result of Cobbe was simply to reinforce the need for certainty as to the content of the representation and as to the property in question.

13.3 PROPRIETARY ESTOPPEL

First we shall consider the most significant form of estoppel: proprietary estoppel. This doctrine is also considered in the context of trusts of homes in Chapter 15.³⁹ In general terms, 31 Lokumal v Lotte Shipping [1985] Lloyd’s Rep 28.

32 Scottish Equitable v Derby [2000] 3 All ER 793.

33 Philip Collins v Davis [2000] 3 All ER 808.

34 Jorden v Money (1854) 5 HLC 185, 10 ER 868.

35 Ibid.

36 Eg, Amalgamated Investment and Property Co Ltd v Texas Commerce International Bank Ltd [1982] 1 QB 84, 122; Yasley v Gotts [2000] 1 All ER 711; Gillet v Holt [2000] 2 All ER 289.

37 [2008] 1 WLR 1752.

38 [2009] 1 WLR 776.

39 See section 15.7 below.

the earliest forms of estoppel were not intended to constitute a cause of action; rather, they were intended to prevent a defendant from reneging on some form of representation on which the claimant had placed detrimental reliance. However, the growth of the proprietary estoppel doctrine has seen the establishment of something which is now akin to a claim, in that the court will frequently award the claimant an interest in property which that claimant would not otherwise have held.⁴⁰ Therefore, this is a sword and not merely a shield: it now creates new rights as a distinct cause of action. The doctrine is still avowedly based on the avoidance of detriment,⁴¹ and therefore it would be possible to explain these far-reaching proprietary remedies as being concerned with the avoidance of detriment and not with the establishment of a positive claim.⁴² It is true to say that the claimant will acquire any rights under proprietary estoppel only if there has been some assurance, reliance and detriment,⁴³ but it is suggested that there is only a scintilla of difference between that and a doctrine which actively creates new rights.

13.3.1 Proprietary estoppel and mistake

The doctrine of proprietary estoppel was first most clearly observed in the speeches of the House of Lords in Ramsden v Dyson.⁴⁴ This approach is not usually applied in modern estoppel cases, as will emerge in the next section. In the speech of Lord Cranworth, the doctrine was stated as operating on the basis of some mistake being formulated in the claimant's mind by the defendant such that the claimant acts detrimentally in reliance on it. So:

if a stranger begins to build on my land supposing it to be his own, and I, perceiving his mistake, abstain from setting him right, and leave him to persevere in his error, a Court of Equity will not allow me afterwards to assert my title to the land on which he had expended money on the supposition that the land was his own.⁴⁵

The doctrine is here based exclusively on the mistake which the defendant knowingly permits the claimant to nurture. So in the restatement of this approach in Wilmot v Barber,⁴⁶ those dicta are distilled into the 'five probanda' of Fry J:

- (a) the claimant must have made a mistake as to his legal rights;
- (b) the claimant must have expended some money or done some act on the faith of his mistaken belief;
- (c) the defendant must know of the existence of his own right which is inconsistent with the right claimed by the claimant;
- (d) the defendant must know of the claimant's mistaken belief in his right; and 40 Wayling v Jones (1993) 69 P & CR 170; Pascoe v Turner [1979] 2 All ER 945.

41 Lim Teng Huan v Ang Swee Chuan [1992] 1 WLR 113, PC; Walton Stores v Maher (1988) 164 CLR 387.

42 As, eg, with Ramsden v Dyson (1866) LR 1 HL 129, per Lord Cranworth, and subsequently Wilmot v Barber (1880) 15 Ch D 96, in which the doctrine is based on the mistake on which the claimant acted and not with any substantive, pre-existing property right.

43 Re Basham [1986] 1 WLR 1498.

44 (1866) LR 1 HL 129.

45 Ibid, 140.

46 (1880) 15 Ch D 96.

- (e) the defendant must have encouraged the claimant in the expenditure of money, or in the other acts which he has done, either directly or by abstaining from asserting his legal right.

In short, this ‘mistake approach’ was based on the avoidance of fraud, whereas the more modern approach considered below is focused on the avoidance of detriment being suffered by the claimant. The presence of fraud is said to exist when the defendant attempts to benefit from the mistake which he knows that the claimant is making.⁴⁷ Where the mistake doctrine therefore differs in detail from the form of proprietary estoppel considered below is that it does not account for the situation in which the claimant is led to believe that something will be the case in the future – for example, that the claimant will acquire rights in the defendant’s property if she nurses him through an illness⁴⁸ – where there has been no mistake acted on by the claimant. If the claimant is not mistaken as to her rights but is merely disappointed in her expectation, she would have no prima facie claim under Wilmot v Barber.⁴⁹ While this approach had gone out of fashion in the modern law of estoppel, it was somewhat controversially exhumed by Lord Scott in Yeoman’s Row v Cobbe,⁵⁰ as considered below.

13.3.2 The various approaches in modern proprietary estoppel

The following sections consider the differing goals which the courts appear to have been trying to achieve in modern estoppel cases. These goals vary between: dealing with frustration of expectation, enforcing the promise, compensating the detriment suffered by the claimant, and the prevention of unconscionability. The courts have not announced any sea-changes in their approaches: rather, the shifts between these differing goals can be observed from a close reading of the cases. Then, in paragraph 13.3.3 we shall consider the modern test for estoppel based on representation, reliance and detriment.

Frustration of expectation

Most of the modern cases are concerned with frustration of an expectation which the defendant permitted the claimant to form by means of either an express representation or some implied assurance that she would acquire rights in property.⁵¹ The remedy is addressed to compensate the claimant for any detriment which was suffered in reliance on that representation or assurance. Indeed, proprietary estoppel is best understood as requiring, first, that the claimant prove entitlement to the estoppel and then, secondly, that the appropriate remedy be identified to fit the circumstances. The source of this ‘expectation approach’ is 47 This approach was broadly followed in Coombes v Smith [1986] 1 WLR 808.

48 As in Re Basham [1986] 1 WLR 1498.

49 See, eg, Mee, 1999, 96. See now Cobbe v Yeoman’s Row [2008] 1 WLR 1752 below.

50 See the discussion below.

51 The principal modern authorities identifying this broad reading of the proprietary estoppel doctrine, not requiring proof of the five probanda, are as follows: Taylor Fashions v Liverpool Victoria Trustees Co Ltd [1982] QB 133; Habib Bank Ltd v Habib Bank AG Zurich [1981] 1 WLR 1265; Re Basham (Deceased) [1986] 1 WLR 1498; John v George (1996) 71 P & CR 375; Lloyds Bank v Carrick [1996] 4 All ER 630; Jones v Stones [1999] 1 WLR 1739; Gillett v Holt [2001] Ch 210; Jennings v Rice [2003] 1 P & CR 100. Cases which have suggested that this approach need not be followed include Swallow Securities Ltd v Isenberg [1985] 1 EGLR 132, 134, per Cumming-Bruce LJ; Matharu v Matharu (1994) 68 P & CR 93, per Roch LJ.

typically identified with the speech of Lord Kingsdown in Ramsden v Dyson,⁵² where his Lordship referred to a situation in which the claimant:

under an expectation, created or encouraged by [the defendant], that he shall have a certain interest . . . upon the faith of such promise or expectation, with the knowledge of the landlord . . . lays out money upon land, a Court of Equity will compel the landlord to give effect to such promise or expectation.

These dicta are generally taken to be the root of the modern doctrine of proprietary estoppel, as formalised in the cases which are discussed in the following sections. There are three different bases on which proprietary estoppel might be said to operate: either to give effect to the promise contained in the representation, to compensate the detriment suffered by the claimant, or to prevent unconscionable behaviour. Each of these approaches – all of which have some support on the decided cases – are considered in turn in the sections which follow.

Giving effect to the promise

If the estoppel was concerned to give effect to the representation or promise made by the defendant, then the court's purpose would be to identify the property rights which the claimant was expected to receive. Consequently, this conception of the doctrine refers to a remedy aimed at giving 'effect to such promise' rather than at allowing the detriment suffered by the claimant to pass without compensation. An early formulation of this understanding of the doctrine was set out in *Taylor Fashions v Liverpool Victoria Trustees Co Ltd*⁵³ by Oliver J such that:

it would be unconscionable for a party to be permitted to deny that which, knowingly or unknowingly, he has allowed or encouraged another to assume to his detriment.⁵⁴

So, in the case of Pascoe v Turner,⁵⁵ a woman had been promised that she would be entitled to live in a house for the rest of her life. In reliance on that promise, she expended a small amount of money on decorating the property. The representor failed to leave her an interest in the property. The court found that there was no way of protecting the right of her continued occupation under ordinary land law principles. It was held that she had acted to her detriment in reliance on the representation. The only remedy which would protect her reliance on the promise was a transfer of the freehold interest in the property to her. Similarly, in Re Basham,⁵⁶ a woman had been promised that a house would be left to her in the proprietor's will. In reliance on that representation, she performed a number of acts to her detriment which were connected to the property and in the expectation that she would receive a right in that property. When the proprietor died without leaving the property to her by will, it was held that she would be entitled to the interest which she had expected to receive. The case of

52 (1866) LR 1 HL 129, 170.

53 [1982] QB 133.

54 Ibid., 151.

55 [1979] 2 All ER 945.

56 [1986] 1 WLR 1498.

*Wayling v Jones*⁵⁷ demonstrated a similar tendency. The plaintiff had been in a relationship with the proprietor of a hotel and, in reliance on the understanding that he would be left the property in the proprietor's will, worked for the proprietor for low wages in the proprietor's business. This detrimental act of working for lower wages than otherwise he would have received led to the Court of Appeal awarding the claimant the right in the hotel which he had expected to receive. In each of these cases, it is suggested, the court was giving effect to the claimant's expectation by means of granting the claimant what she had been promised.

Compensating the detriment suffered by the claimant

The alternative approach is not to grant the claimant whatever the claimant may have been promised – particularly where this would result in the transfer of the absolute title in property when only a small amount of detriment had been suffered – but is rather to identify the detriment which the claimant has suffered and to provide equitable compensation for that amount.⁵⁸ So, as quoted above, in Taylor Fashions v Liverpool Victoria Trustees Co Ltd,⁵⁹ Oliver J preferred to focus on the detriment suffered by the plaintiff as opposed to some 'formula serving as a universal yardstick for every form of unconscionable behaviour'.⁶⁰ This approach has received general approbation⁶¹ in preference to those few cases which have sought to apply the probanda based on proof of fraud and mistake as set out in Wilmot v Barber.⁶² The clearest example of a court looking to compensate the detriment suffered by the claimant was in Baker v Baker,⁶³ where the Court of Appeal was asked to consider the position of an elderly man who had been induced to give up his home and to contribute to the purchase price of a house together with his son and daughter-in-law. Evidently the elderly man was entitled to an equitable interest in the house because he had contributed to the purchase price. When the court came to consider how best to conceive of the elderly man's rights, it was decided that the man needed sufficient monetary compensation to buy him sheltered accommodation for the rest of his life, due to his age and infirmity, rather than a declaration that he owned a given percentage of the equity in the house. Thus, the court may seek to identify both the claimant's detriment and his needs as a result.

An example might serve to highlight the distinction. Suppose that a promise was made by Peter to Mary that if Mary paid for renovation works on Peter's house, Peter would leave the freehold interest in the house to Mary in his will. Suppose further that the renovation works cost £10,000 and that the house cost £250,000. If the court is concerned with the claimant's detriment, then the court's approach is to measure the value of the detriment. So, Mary might only receive compensation of £10,000 in cash. By contrast, if the court were concerned to 58 Walton Stores v Maher (1988) 62 AJLR 110; Lim v Ang [1992] 1 WLR 113, 117, per Lord Browne-Wilkinson.

57 (1995) P & CR 170.

59 [1982] QB 133.

60 Ibid.

61 Habib Bank Ltd v Habib Bank AG Zurich [1981] 1 WLR 1265, CA; Amalgamated Investment & Property Co Ltd v Texas Commerce International Bank [1982] QB 84, CA; Attorney-General of Hong Kong v Humphrey's Estate (Queen's Gardens) Ltd [1987] 1 AC 114, PC; Lim Teng Huan v Ang Swee Chuan [1992] 1 WLR 113, PC; Lloyds Bank v Carrick [1996] 4 All ER 630, CA.

62 Coombes v Smith [1986] 1 WLR 808; Matharu v Matharu (1994) 68 P & CR 93; also Orgee v Orgee (1997) unreported, 5 November.

63 (1993) 25 HLR 408.

carry out the promise, then Mary would receive the freehold interest in the house. It might be that if Peter was still alive but had changed his mind, then compensating Mary might be appropriate,⁶⁴ whereas if Peter had died intestate then granting Mary the freehold might be the more appropriate means of providing her with the minimum equity necessary in the context.⁶⁵

Preventing unconscionable behaviour

A third, alternative basis on which one might understand the operation of proprietary estoppel is to prevent unconscionable benefit being taken from the detrimental reliance of a person on a representation made to her.⁶⁶ The aim of the equity in this context might be said, on existing authority, to do the minimum necessary⁶⁷ in the light of the unconscionability of allowing the defendant to benefit or the claimant to suffer from the claimant's uncompensated detrimental reliance on the defendant's representation.⁶⁸ So, in the Court of Appeal in Jennings v Rice,⁶⁹ it was held that the aim of the estoppel was 'to do justice' between the parties.⁷⁰ This third basis for the estoppel, however, does not help us to know whether the remedy is intended to fulfil the promise or to compensate the detriment suffered. A general notion of unconscionability has always been contained in modern explanations of the doctrine. By way of example, the doctrine of proprietary estoppel was explained in *Taylor Fashions v Liverpool Victoria Trustees Co Ltd*⁷¹ by Oliver J such that:

it would be unconscionable for a party to be permitted to deny that which, knowingly or unknowingly, he has allowed or encouraged another to assume to his detriment.⁷²

However, rather than base proprietary estoppel on a general notion of unconscionability, Oliver J preferred to focus on the detriment suffered by the claimant as opposed to some 'formula serving as a universal yardstick for every form of unconscionable behaviour'.⁷³ It is a difficult matter to know how the principle of unconscionability would operate as a single form of proprietary estoppel.

As considered at the beginning of this chapter, there is no single explanation for the manner in which all estoppels operate given that estoppel is based on a range of bases varying from honesty⁷⁴ to common sense⁷⁵ to common fairness.⁷⁶ It is only possible to identify 64 Baker v Baker (1993) 25 HLR 408. It might also be important to know whether or not Mary had alternative accommodation and whether or not she required further compensation to replace the home which she had expected to have once Peter died.

65 Re Basham [1986] 1 WLR 1498.

66 Sledmore v Dalby (1996) 72 P & CR 196.

67 Crabb v Arun DC [1976] 1 Ch 179; Pascoe v Turner [1979] 1 WLR 431; Bawden v Bawden [1997] EWCA Civ 2664, per Robert Walker LJ.

68 Jennings v Rice [2002] EWCA Civ 159.

69 [2002] EWCA Civ 159.

70 Jennings v Rice [2002] EWCA Civ 159, para 36, per Aldous LJ.

71 [1982] QB 133.

72 Ibid., 151.

73 Ibid.

74 Re Exchange Securities & Commodities Ltd [1988] Ch 46, 54, per Harman J.

75 London Joint Stock Bank Ltd v Macmillan [1918] AC 777, 818, per Lord Haldane.

76 Lyle-Meller v A Lewis & Co [1956] 1 WLR 29, 44, per Morris LJ.

common principles underpinning all forms of estoppel at the most general levels,⁷⁷ perhaps on the basis of unconscionability or fairness.⁷⁸ That ‘the essence of the doctrine of proprietary estoppel is to do what is necessary to avoid an unconscionable result’ was asserted by Walker LJ in *Jennings v Rice*⁷⁹ and accepted by the Privy Council in Knowles v Knowles.⁸⁰ What is significant about the development of a principle of unconscionability in this area is that it is difficult to know in advance the nature of the remedy which will be awarded in response to a claim for proprietary estoppel: in general terms, it seems that this approach enables the court to calculate an amount of compensation entirely in the abstract which is appropriate to meet merits of the case. An example of this tendency is Jennings v Rice,⁸¹ as considered in detail below, where the judge decided on the round sum of £200,000 entirely in the abstract as meeting the merits of the case without necessarily quantifying any particular amount of unpaid wages, or money spent, or opportunities lost which were required to be compensated. Therefore, we are left with the question, considered below, as to how the appropriate remedy should be identified. First, we shall turn our attention to the three requirements for demonstrating proprietary estoppel.

13.3.3 The three elements of the modern test for proprietary estoppel

The three elements of proprietary estoppel

The court upheld the threefold test for proprietary estoppel which has become familiar in the cases: that there be a representation (or assurance), reliance and detriment.⁸² These three elements were set out most cogently by Edward Nugee QC in *Re Basham*⁸³ as being set out in circumstances in which:

one person, A, has acted to his detriment on the birth of a belief, which was known to and encouraged by another person, B, cannot insist on his strict legal rights if to do so would be inconsistent with A’s belief . . . where the belief is that A is going to be given a right in the future, it is properly to be regarded as giving rise to a species of constructive trust, which is the concept employed by a court of equity to prevent a person from relying on his legal rights where it would be unconscionable for him to do so. The rights to which proprietary estoppel gives rise, and the machinery by which effect is given to them, are similar in many respects to those involved in cases of secret trusts, mutual wills, and other comparable cases in which property is vested in B on the faith of an understanding that it will be dealt with in a particular manner . . . In cases of proprietary

77 The argument to the effect that all forms of estoppel could be understood as being based on a single notion of unconscionable was set out by Professor Cooke (Cooke, 2000).

78 The arguments for an all-embracing estoppel are based on such concepts: see, eg, the various dicta of Lord Denning in Amalgamated Investment & Property Co Ltd (In Liquidation) v Texas Commerce International Bank Ltd [1982] 1 QB 84; Lyle-Meller v A Lewis & Co [1956] 1 WLR 29; Moorgate Mercantile Co Ltd v Twitchings [1976] 1 QB 225.

79 [2002] EWCA Civ 159, para [56].

80 [2008] UKPC 30, para [27], per Sir Henry Brooke (reading the judgment of the entire court).

81 [2002] EWCA Civ 159.

82 Taylor Fashions Ltd v Liverpool Victoria Trustees Co Ltd [1982] 1 QB 133; Re Basham (Deceased) [1986] 1 WLR 1498; Wayling v Jones (1993) 69 P & CR 170; Gillett v Holt [2000] 2 All ER 289.

83 [1986] 1 WLR 1498.

estoppel the factor which gives rise to the equitable obligation is A's alteration of his position on the faith of a similar understanding.

Each of those elements is considered in the sections which follow.

The first element of the estoppel: assurance or representation

The first requirement for the demonstration of proprietary estoppel is that there has been a representation made by the defendant to the claimant.⁸⁴ It is important that the assurances of the representor have been intended by their maker to lead the claimant to believe that he would acquire rights in property. So, for example, it would not be sufficient that the representor was merely toying with the claimant without either of them forming a belief that the claimant would in fact acquire any rights in property. For, as Robert Walker LJ put it, 'it is notorious that some elderly persons of means derive enjoyment from the possession of testamentary power, and from dropping hints as to their intentions, without any question of any estoppel arising'.⁸⁵ In other words, representations may be made which the defendant does not intend to be relied upon by the claimant. The clearest example of a representation would be a single promise made by one party to another which can be proven in court. More often in the cases, there have been a pattern of assurances made by one party to another over a period of time. The claimant's contention will be that the aggregation of these assurances amounted to a representation. So, in Re Basham,⁸⁶ the claimant had made representations that she would receive a house on the proprietor's death made to her frequently over time.

The breadth of the doctrine of proprietary estoppel in this context was demonstrated by the Court of Appeal in Gillett v Holt.⁸⁷ That case concerned a friendship between a farmer, Mr Holt, and a young boy of 12, Gillett, which lasted for 40 years, during which time the boy worked for the farmer. Gillett left his real parents and moved in with Holt when aged 15: there was even a suggestion that the farmer would adopt the boy at one stage. On numerous occasions, the claimant, Gillett, was assured by Holt that he would inherit the farm. The claimant's wife and family were described as being a form of surrogate family for the farmer. In time a third person, Wood, turned Holt against Gillett which led to Gillett being removed from Holt's will.⁸⁸ Robert Walker LJ held that there was sufficient detriment by Gillett in the course of their relationship over 40 years evidenced by the following factors: working for Holt and not accepting other job offers, performing actions beyond what would ordinarily 84 In Sinclair v Sinclair [2009] 926 EWHC (Ch) the point was re-affirmed that there cannot be a remedy under proprietary estoppel principles unless a representation can be demonstrated. So, where in that case the claimant could not demonstrate that a representation had been made to him that he would acquire any rights of ownership in a yard, Proudman J did not find an estoppel in his favour even though the claimant had spent a lot of money on the yard in the hope of acquiring such a right. Similarly, in Walsh v Singh [2009] EWHC 3219 (Ch), [2010] 1 FCR 177 the claimant could not demonstrate that any clear representation had been made to her that she was to acquire rights in property, even though she had made contributions to the work of finding a property and of renovating it. Consequently her detriment, in leaving the Bar, could not have been said to have been suffered on the basis of a clear representation that she would acquire rights in the property.

85 Gillett v Holt [2000] 2 All ER 289, 304.

86 [1986] 1 WLR 1498.

87 [2000] 2 All ER 289. This case was followed in Van Laetham v Brooker [2005] EWHC 1478 (Ch), para [61].

88 The nature of their relationship is a fascinating matter for conjecture.

have been expected of an employee, taking no substantial steps to secure for his future by means of pension or otherwise, and spending money on a farmhouse (which he expected to inherit) which had been almost uninhabitable at the outset. The combination of these factors over such a long period of time were considered by the Court of Appeal to constitute ample evidence of detriment sufficient to found a proprietary estoppel. On the facts of Gillett v Holt,⁸⁹ it was clear that the assurances had been repeated frequently and were sincerely meant when made at various family celebrations and so forth. Thus, the courts will infer a representation from the circumstances, even over a long period of time, without the need for there necessarily to have been a single representation made. Similarly, in *Thorner v Curtis*⁹⁰ in front of the Court of Appeal the claimant had worked on the deceased's farm for many years for no wages and had an expectation that he would inherit the farm. The claimant's work had increased its value greatly. The deceased had created a will bequeathing the farm to the claimant but that will was destroyed before the deceased died intestate. It was held that the claimant had formed the impression that he would inherit the farm over time and furthermore that it would have been unconscionable to deny the claimant rights on proprietary estoppel principles. This decision was appealed to the House of Lords, under the name Thorner v Major.

Thorner v Major followed only shortly after the decision in Cobbe v Yeoman's Row. The claimant contended that a representation had been made to him over time by the deceased to the effect that the claimant would become the owner of the deceased's farm after the deceased's death; however, the deceased died without leaving the farm by will to the claimant. The facts were these. Jimmy and Peter were cousins, and David was Jimmy's adult son. David worked for no pay for 29 years on Peter's farm, as well as working for no pay on Jimmy's farm. David's lifestyle was one of hard physical work for about sixteen hours a day for seven days a week. While it is remarkable to work in this way for another person, that does not in itself entitle that worker to ownership of the other person's property. It was held that what is required under proprietary estoppel principles is a representation which suggests a promise of ownership of that property together with clear identification of the property involved.⁹¹ In this case, the evidence was unclear. One day in 1990, Peter gave David a document relating to insurance policies over Peter's life, which David took as an indication that he was intended to become the future owner of Peter's property including the farm after Peter's death. Otherwise the pair did not tend to say much to one another about anything despite working together for so much time. Their Lordships, especially Lords Walker and Rodger, made much of the fact that was found by the trial judge that farmers in this part of Somerset could be naturally taciturn, that these two men in particular spoke very few words to one another about anything, and therefore that the absence of any more explicit representation should not necessarily be read as denying the presence of a suitable understanding between these parties that the claimant's work was being done (to his evident detriment because he received no pay) in reliance on that understanding. Ironically, the court in Thorner v Major found that a representation was impliedly made even though nothing, by definition, was said between two parties too taciturn to discuss their respective rights.

⁸⁹ Ibid.

⁹⁰ [2008] WTLR 155.

⁹¹ [2009] 1 WLR 776, para [61] et seq., per Lord Walker.

The House of Lords held that on the facts of Thorner v Major there had been a sufficient assurance made by Peter to David on which it was reasonable for David to have formed the impression in these circumstances that he would become the owner of Peter's farm after his death, in reliance on which he worked to his detriment on Peter's farm. As Lord Rodger put it, there does not need to be a 'signature event' on which a clear representation was made.⁹² Instead it is sufficient, for Lord Rodger⁹³ and Lord Walker,⁹⁴ that the 'relevant assurance' which was made was 'clear enough' in the context. Lord Hoffmann and Lord Neuberger concurred in general terms with Lord Walker. So, if the representor was 'standing by in silence' aware that the claimant was acting to his detriment on the belief that he was thus acquiring a right in the property, then that would be enough to grant him rights on the basis of proprietary estoppel.⁹⁵ (The House of Lords was unanimous in finding the existence of a right on these facts, although Lord Scott dissented in part on the basis that this case should have been decided on the basis of a remedial constructive trust, and not proprietary estoppel, as is discussed in Chapter 12.) It is suggested that Cobbe is to be understood as being limited to commercial joint ventures as a result of Thorner v Major.

It is clear that in general terms, it will be sufficient if the defendant makes an express representation to the defendant,⁹⁶ but it would also be sufficient to establish an estoppel if some implied assurance were made in circumstances in which the defendant knew that the claimant was relying on the impression she had formed.⁹⁷ That an implied assurance will constitute a representation is, in any event, in line with the older form of proprietary estoppel which is based on mistake: that is, to lead someone mistakenly to believe that she will receive some property by means of implied assurances would satisfy either form of estoppel.⁹⁸ It has been suggested that there need not be a clear representation at all provided that a common understanding arose between the parties that one of them would acquire rights of some kind if the other acted to her detriment.⁹⁹ What is important is that the defendant intended the claimant to rely on the representation, assurance or understanding and that the defendant knew that the claimant was so relying.¹⁰⁰ While the courts may infer

92 [2009] 1 WLR 776, para [24].

93 Ibid, para [26].

94 Ibid, para [56]. Relying on Hoffmann LJ in Walton v Walton, [1994] CA Transcript No 479 (unreported) to the effect that: 'The promise must be unambiguous and must appear to have been intended to be taken seriously. Taken in its context, it must have been a promise which one might reasonably expect to be relied upon by the person to whom it was made.'

95 [2009] 1 WLR 776, para [55], per Lord Walker.

96 Taylor Fashions Ltd v Liverpool Victoria Trustees Co Ltd [1982] 1 QB 133; Re Basham (Deceased) [1986] 1 WLR 1498; Wayling v Jones (1993) 69 P & CR 170; Gillett v Holt [2000] 2 All ER 289.

97 Crabb v Arun DC [1976] Ch 179.

98 Ramsden v Dyson (1866) LR 1 HL 129, per Lord Cranworth; Wilmot v Barber (1880) 15 Ch D 96; Coombes v Smith [1986] 1 WLR 808.

99 John v George (1996) 71 P & CR 375; Gillett v Holt [2001] Ch 210. Although in Kellwark Properties Ltd v Waller [2002] EWCA Civ 1076, [2002] 48 EG 142, a long-standing practice between landowners in relation to the renewal of leases at a ground rent was not taken to have constituted such a common understanding capable of founding a representation. In Kastner v Jason [2004] EWCA Civ 1599, para [2], it was suggested that a representation or understanding that one would abide by an arbitration award would give rise to 'proprietary estoppel, itself amounting to a constructive trust' (the point was not necessary for the dismissal of the issues in that case which was primarily concerned with conflict of laws).

100 Crabb v Arun DC [1976] Ch 179, 188, per Lord Denning; JT Developments v Quinn (1990) 62 P & CR 33, 46, per Ralph Gibson LJ; Barclays Bank v Zaroovabli [1997] Ch 321, 330, per Scott VC.

representations from the facts of a case, nevertheless a general promise to support the claimant financially in the future would not give rise to proprietary estoppel if the promise was not explicitly connected to some property in relation to which the claimant would acquire proprietary rights in the event that she acted to her detriment in reliance on the promise.¹⁰¹ General promises as part of a romantic relationship will not in themselves suppose that rights in property will be created if those promises made no reference to any property.

An interesting illustration of this last principle arose in *Lissimore v Downing*¹⁰² when a very rich rock musician started a relationship ‘on the rebound’ with a married woman after they met in a pub one evening. They began a very casual, sexual relationship in which she was cheating on her husband. He had taken her to a gate at the edge of his large country estate worth millions of pounds and said to her, words to the effect of ‘how would you like to be lady of this estate?’ She claimed that she had interpreted this to be a representation that she would acquire an equitable interest in this property, particularly when this was taken in common with the couple’s comparatively shortlived, ensuing relationship. However, the court noted the fact that she had continued living with her husband after this statement had been made to her, that she had maintained her job working in a chemist’s shop, and considered it unlikely in the circumstances that the rock musician would have intended to give her a share of his hard-earned country estate. Taking all of these circumstances into account, the court held that no representation had been made to the effect that she would acquire proprietary rights in the rock musician’s country estate. So, common sense will be applied so that not every slip of the tongue accidentally grants rights in property.

Similarly, it is not enough to acquire an interest in her mother’s house that a daughter who was educationally challenged believed she would have a house bought for her by her mother when there was no other evidence to suggest that that had been her mother’s intention.¹⁰³ Instead, in that case, it appeared that the mother had simply been placating her daughter and not purporting to make her any legally-binding promises. It was held that there had not been any binding representation made which would entitle the daughter to take absolute title in the house after her mother’s death when her mother had left the house by will to her third husband. So, for example, where a father promises his son that the son will acquire an equitable interest in a house owned by his father and in reliance on that promise (and with the agreement of his father) the son sells his house so as to pay for renovation works on his father’s house, there would be a representation, reliance and detriment (where the detriment was in the form of selling the house to pay for the renovations) sufficient to found a claim for proprietary estoppel.¹⁰⁴

A claimant cannot argue that she has relied on a representation by performing an action which she was contractually obliged to perform in any event, and furthermore if it would be unreasonable to purport to have relied on a representation then no estoppel will be found.¹⁰⁵

101 Lissimore v Downing [2003] 2 FLR 308.

102 Ibid.

103 Turner v Jacob [2006] EWHC 1317 (Ch).

104 S v R [2008] EWHC 1874 (Fam), [2009] 1 P & CR D12 (also sub nom Q v Q). In those circumstances, however, the judge expressed himself as finding that the events gave rise to a ‘constructive trust’ in the son’s favour, after some inconclusive discussion about whether ‘proprietary estoppel and constructive trust’ should be treated as the same doctrine or as two separate doctrines: at para 115.

105 Hunt v Soady [2007] EWCA Civ 366.

The decision of the Court of Appeal in *Jennings v Rice*¹⁰⁶ demonstrates, in tandem with Gillett v Holt, that there need not be a clear representation made at any particular time nor that the representor be proved to have understood that she was making a binding representation; rather, it is sufficient that a 'representation' appears to emerge over time. In Jennings v Rice, Mr Jennings began working for Mrs Royle, a widow, as a gardener (for 30 pence an hour) in 1970 on Saturdays and for three evenings per week in summer. Over time Mr Jennings' duties expanded so that he carried out maintenance work, took Mrs Royle shopping and starting running errands for her. By the late 1980s, Mrs Royle had stopped paying Mr Jennings, but he continued with the work. In 1993, Mrs Royle was burgled and Mr Jennings took to sleeping every night at Mrs Royle's house on a sofa in the living room so that she would not be alone in the house, something she feared after the burglary. From the 1970s onwards, the amount of time which Mr Jennings spent at Mrs Royle's house had caused problems with his wife, Mrs Jennings. Before Mrs Royle's death in 1997, Mrs Jennings had begun to help care for the old woman with her husband. There was no evidence that Mrs Royle had ever made a clear representation in the form of a binding contract with Mr Jennings that he would acquire a right in her house, although it was suggested that there were occasions when she said words to the effect 'this will all be yours one day'. It was found that the pattern of the parties' relationship was such that Mrs Royle would be deemed to have made sufficient representation to Mr Jennings over time to found a right under proprietary estoppel. As discussed below, it was not considered that the circumstances would justify granting Mr Jennings the entire interest in the house, but Mr Jennings was entitled to a payment of £200,000 as the minimum equity necessary in the circumstances. It is unclear precisely why that amount of money was appropriate in the circumstances other than that the Court of Appeal wanted to prevent unconscionability and wanted to do the minimum equity which it considered necessary in the circumstances.

Thus, the representation can be divined from the circumstances. In Gillett v Holt and in Jennings v Rice, there was behaviour over a long period of time which the court (principally Robert Walker LJ) considered would give rise to an unconscionable treatment of the claimant if it were uncompensated. In these cases, as considered in more detail below, the court considered it appropriate to make an award of compensation which, it is suggested, was concerned to compensate the claimant's detriment. By contrast, in Lissimore v Downing, there was also only a vague representation, but the court considered that the claimant could not have considered that in such a short relationship (compared to the decades which had passed in Gillett v Holt and in Jennings v Rice) she could have placed any reasonable reliance on the representation as having been meant seriously. It is suggested that the short, casual relationship in Lissimore v Downing, taken together with the comparative lack of detriment (compared to a rent-free life with a rock musician in a huge house), simply did not convince the court that the circumstances were sufficient to justify an award under proprietary estoppel. In effect, the courts have come to focus on the general fairness of the circumstances and whether or not the defendant would be taking an unconscionable advantage of the claimant.

Equitable estoppel will also be available where the defendant would take an unconscionable benefit from the claimant's mistake as to the defendant's representation. So, in relation to the right to seek rectification of a contract on grounds of mistake, it has been held that where one party to the transaction knows of the mistake and nevertheless allows the other party to enter into transactions in reliance on those mistaken assumptions, then equitable estoppel will prevent the defendant from resisting a claim for rectification.¹⁰⁷ It is sufficient for the operation of this form of estoppel that the defendant recklessly shut her eyes to the fact that a mistake has been made – it is not necessary that actual knowledge of the mistake be demonstrated.¹⁰⁸ This latter principle accords with equity's general purpose to avoid unconscionable behaviour¹⁰⁹ and dishonesty in a broad sense.¹¹⁰ There is no need for an active representation: it is enough to know that the other person is relying on a mistake that would have been obvious to someone who has not refrained from making reasonable inquiries. Furthermore, it is not a requirement that the representation have been an irrevocable representation. So, contrary to earlier authority,¹¹¹ the representation does not have to constitute, for example, a binding contract between the parties nor does it have to be an irrevocable representation.¹¹² Rather, it is sufficient that the representation was one on which the claimant could reasonably rely to her detriment in the manner considered in the following sections.¹¹³ Thus, in *Sutcliffe v Lloyd*¹¹⁴ where the defendants made representations to the claimant that they would participate jointly in the acquisition and development of disused petrol stations with him, such that the defendant acted to his detriment in reliance on their negotiations, it was no defence to argue that the representations had not themselves constituted binding, contractual or similar obligations in the documentation between the parties. Rather it was enough that they constituted representations on which the claimant could have relied to his detriment such that it would be unconscionable to deny him a remedy based on equitable estoppel.

The second element of the estoppel: reliance on the representation or assurance

The court will look to the context to decide whether or not it was reasonable for the claimant to have relied on the particular representor in relation to that particular representation.¹¹⁵ This is expressed variously as being 'mutual understanding' between the parties that the actions of the claimant were a quid pro quo in relation to the promise made.¹¹⁶ It is essential that the claimant be able to demonstrate a nexus between the actions which were performed and the representations which were made. Therefore, where a claimant can demonstrate that she worked for lower wages than her trade would ordinarily have attracted with a view to acquiring rights in property, then she would be entitled to a remedy based on proprietary estoppel, whereas if she had accepted lower wages out of love for her employer who was

107 Whitley v Delaney [1914] AC 132; Monaghan CC v Vaughan [1948] IR 306; A Roberts & Co Ltd v Leicestershire CC [1961] Ch 555; Thomas Bates and Sons Ltd v Wyndham's (Lingerie) Ltd [1981] 1 WLR 505.

108 Commission for New Towns v Cooper [1995] Ch 259; Templiss Properties v Hyams [1999] EGCS 60.

109 Riverlate Properties Ltd v Paul [1975] Ch 133.

110 Cf Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378; Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley [1999] Lloyd's Rep Bank 438.

111 Kinane v Mackie-Conteh [2005] EWCA Civ 45, at para [29], per Arden LJ.

112 Sutcliffe v Lloyd [2007] EWCA Civ 153, para [38], per Wilson LJ.

113 Ibid.

114 [2007] EWCA Civ 153.

115 Gillett v Holt [2000] 2 All ER 289, 306. So, false reliance or reliance on false information will not make out the estoppel: Willis v Willis [1986] 1 EGLR 62; Gonthier v Orange Contract Scaffolding Ltd [2003] EWCA Civ 873.

116 Re Basham (Deceased) [1986] 1 WLR 1498.

also her partner, then she would not.¹¹⁷ The greater difficulty is those situations in which the claimant suffers only personal detriment, such as moving house, and therefore finds it difficult to demonstrate that the agreement to move house was based on the representation that she would acquire rights in property and was not simply based on love and affection.¹¹⁸

The third element of the estoppel: detriment suffered by the claimant

It is necessary that the claimant has suffered some detriment for there to be a proprietary estoppel because equity will not assist a mere volunteer who has neither given consideration nor suffered detriment.¹¹⁹ The question is then as to the type of behaviour which will constitute detriment, and how restrictively this requirement of detriment will be interpreted. The Court of Appeal in *Gillett v Holt*¹²⁰ explained the principle of proprietary estoppel as being based on preventing unconscionable behaviour. The court refused to accept that proprietary estoppel should be seen as confined to narrow categories, preferring instead to recognise that it is based on that underlying concept of good conscience.¹²¹ Similarly, it was suggested that there was no requirement that detriment be considered in a narrow, technical fashion. Rather, different types of representation or assurance could connote different forms of detriment which would stretch beyond spending money.¹²² Therefore, it had been suggested that in assessing detriment, one should look in the round at the circumstances of the parties. Lawrence Collins J held in Van Laetham v Brooker that:

[d]etriment is not a narrow or technical concept. The detriment need not consist of the expenditure of money or other quantifiable financial detriment, so long as it is something substantial. The requirement must be approached as part of a broad inquiry as to whether repudiation of an assurance is or is not unconscionable in all the circumstances.¹²³

Nevertheless, in spite of the statements made in recent cases to the effect that proprietary estoppel should be understood as arising on a broad basis, it has also been suggested that the detriment on which the claimant seeks to rely must be something substantial. So, spending money will be a clear demonstration of detriment,¹²⁴ unless it is expenditure (relating to the acquisition of rights in the home) which is indirectly related to the property such as paying for household bills.¹²⁵ Also accepted as constituting detriment will be settling a boundary dispute relating to the property at issue,¹²⁶ giving up alternative accommodation in reliance

117 Wayling v Jones (1993) 69 P & CR 170.

118 Coombes v Smith [1986] 1 WLR 808; Watts v Storey (1983) 133 NLJ 631, [1983] CA Transcript 319. Cf Grant v Edwards [1986] Ch 638.

119 In Re Basham (Deceased) [1986] 1 WLR 1498, it was suggested that merely the existence of unconscionable behaviour, without a correlative suffering of detriment, would not make out the estoppel.

120 [2000] 2 All ER 289.

121 See also Jennings v Rice [2002] EWCA Civ 159 in this regard.

122 Grant v Edwards [1986] Ch 638. Cf Coombes v Smith [1986] 1 WLR 808.

123 [2005] EWHC 1478 (Ch), [2006] 2 FLR 495, [74].

124 Even if it is not a large amount of money: Pascoe v Turner [1979] 2 All ER 945.

125 Burns v Burns [1984] Ch 317; Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1991] 1 AC 107.

126 Re Basham [1986] 1 WLR 1498.

on the availability of the property at issue,¹²⁷ working for reduced wages in reliance on the acquisition of some right in the property at issue,¹²⁸ providing unpaid services in the defendant's home in reliance on the acquisition of some rights in the property,¹²⁹ and continuing to work unpaid for someone who had previously made payment for gardening work in reliance on a promise that the gardener would inherit the property.¹³⁰ Paying for extensive building work on the property will constitute detriment,¹³¹ although merely supervising building work will not.¹³² In each of these instances it can be seen that the detriment suffered was connected in some way to the acquisition of rights in the property.

By contrast, there is the more difficult question as to whether suffering detriment which is purely personal – as opposed to financial – will constitute detriment sufficient to found proprietary estoppel. There are competing authorities, for example, on the question whether leaving one romantic relationship to begin another, on the basis that one might expect some property rights in the home established in that second relationship: some cases taking the view that this would not constitute detriment because it was purely personal,¹³³ whereas other cases have considered this to be detriment when there were children involved because the children also had to move home.¹³⁴ Similarly, in Gillett v Holt,¹³⁵ it was accepted that a combination of otherwise minor acts of detriment could amount to a suitable basis for the estoppel: so, deciding not to continue with schooling, working on the renovation of a building, and working generally on a farm (albeit for a wage) in the expectation of acquiring some rights in property, would cumulatively constitute detriment. A typically erudite discussion of the authorities is set out by Sir Peter Gibson in Powell v Benney.¹³⁶ In that case, the claimant's alleged detriment simply on the basis of assisting an elderly man in his premises was contended to have awarded them some rights in those premises on 'constructive trust or proprietary estoppel' principles. It was held by the Court of Appeal, however, that there had not been any clear 'bargain' between the parties to the effect that the claimant would perform any detrimental acts nor that those detrimental acts were intended to acquire the claimant any interest in the property, and so no right to an estoppel was found.

127 Ibid. See also Jones v Jones [1977] 1 WLR 438; Maharaj v Shand [1986] AC 898, where accommodation was given up so that the plaintiff could live closer to the proprietor of the land in question.

128 Wayling v Jones (1995) 69 P & CR 170. Also where the duties were beyond the ordinary course of employment: Gillett v Holt [2001] Ch 210.

129 Greasley v Cooke [1980] 1 WLR 1306; Re Basham [1986] 1 WLR 1498; Campbell v Griffin [2001] EWCA Civ 990.

130 Jennings v Rice [2003] 1 P & CR 100. The claimant in this case also gave up a large amount of his spare time to sit with the elderly lady who had previously paid him for his gardening work.

131 Inwards v Baker [1965] 2 QB 29; Griffiths v Williams (1977) 248 EG 947. A small amount of money spent on decoration has even been held to constitute detriment: Pascoe v Turner [1979] 1 WLR 431.

132 Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1991] 1 AC 107.

133 Coombes v Smith [1986] 1 WLR 808. This approach, in general terms, was also taken in Lissimore v Downing [2003] 2 FLR 308 to the effect that actions which formed the ordinary part of behaviour within a relationship would not in themselves constitute detriment for the purposes of establishing rights under proprietary estoppel.

134 Grant v Edwards [1986] Ch 638.

135 [2001] Ch 210.

136 [2007] EWCA Civ 1283. See also McGuane v Welch [2008] EWCA Civ 785.

13.3.4 Identifying the appropriate remedy for proprietary estoppel

The court's discretion: ranging from proprietary remedies to financial compensation

Proprietary estoppel is best thought of as a two-step process: the first step in the process is to establish whether or not the estoppel can be demonstrated on the facts of the case; the second step in the process is to establish the most appropriate remedy to fit those circumstances. Whereas constructive trusts, considered in Chapter 12, were said to arise on an institutional basis (that is, retrospectively from the time of the unconscionable act and automatically without any discretion on the part of the court), proprietary estoppel arises on a remedial basis (that is, prospectively from the date of the court order with the precise nature of the remedy being at the court's discretion).¹³⁷ Even though the constructive trust appears to be a flexible doctrine, its avowedly institutional nature does not match the scope of remedy permitted by proprietary estoppel.¹³⁸ What has become clear is that proprietary estoppel will give a claimant a substantive form of action with which to acquire rights in property which she had not had before and that it will not operate like promissory estoppel merely so as to defend that claimant from suffering detriment as the hands of the defendant.¹³⁹

What is most significant is that the court will have complete freedom to frame its remedy once it has found that an estoppel is both available and appropriate.¹⁴⁰ Thus the two-stage process develops: first, find whether or not there is an estoppel and, second, decide on the most appropriate and proportionate remedy in the context both in the light of the assurance made and the most effective method of compensating the claimant's detriment.¹⁴¹ The nature of the remedies available in cases of proprietary estoppel can range from the award of the entire interest in the property at issue¹⁴² to a mere entitlement to equitable compensation.¹⁴³ They may be enforceable not only against the person who made the assurance but also against third parties, thus underlining the proprietary nature of such remedies in circumstances where the court considers such a remedy appropriate.¹⁴⁴ This indicates the nature of estoppel as a pure form of equity: the court is entirely at liberty to grant personal or proprietary awards which operate only against the defendant or also against third parties (as proprietary rights ought to).¹⁴⁵

137 See recent cases such as Gillett v Holt [2001] Ch 210, 235; Jennings v Rice [2003] 1 P & CR 100. See Moriarty (1984) 100 LQR 376, suggesting that estoppel merely perfects and imperfect gift; although Thompson [1986] Conv 406 suggests that Moriarty's suggestion is contrary to principle and that the cases advocate a variety of remedies from context to context.

138 As illustrated by Sledmore v Dalby (1996) 72 P & CR 196, per Roch J. See also Campbell v Griffin [2001] EWCA Civ 990, [2001] WTLR 981.

139 See, eg, Hearn v Younger [2002] WTLR 1317 in particular, as well as the cases considered in this section in general whereby claimants establish rights in property which had not previously been vested with them.

140 An approach approved as long ago as Lord Cawdor v Lewis (1835) 1 Y & C Ex 427, 433; Plimmer v Wellington Corp (1884) 9 App Cas 699, 713. Gardner, 'The Remedial Discretion in Proprietary Estoppel' (1999) 115 LQR 438; Gardner, 'The Remedial Discretion in Proprietary Estoppel – again' (2006) 122 LQR 492.

141 See, eg, Gillett v Holt [2001] Ch 210, 235; Jennings v Rice [2003] 1 P & CR 100, para 56.

142 Pascoe v Turner [1979] 2 All ER 945; Re Basham (Deceased) [1986] 1 WLR 1498.

143 Baker v Baker (1993) 25 HLR 408, CA; Sledmore v Dalby (1996) 72 P & CR 196; Gillett v Holt [2001] Ch 210, CA; Campbell v Griffin [2001] EWCA Civ 990, [2001] WTLR 981; Jennings v Rice [2002] EWCA Civ 159; and also Raffaele v Raffaele [1962] WAR 29.

144 Hopgood v Brown [1955] 1 WLR 213; Inwards v Baker [1965] 2 QB 29.

145 See para 31.2.2.

One example of the range of remedies available would arise where a claimant was assured that she would have a home available for her occupation for the rest of her life. Proprietary remedies will be awarded where that is required to do the minimum equity necessary between the parties.¹⁴⁶ Where it was considered impossible to protect the rights of the claimant to occupy the property for the remainder of her life without transferring the entire fee simple to her, the court decided to award her the entire fee simple.¹⁴⁷ Alternatively, the court may award an irrevocable licence to occupy where that would have been considered indefeasible by any other person to protect a claimant who was considered entitled to occupy property for the remainder of her life.¹⁴⁸ Yet further, where the court was concerned to ensure that an elderly or infirm claimant be provided with appropriate accommodation in her twilight years, it was held that she should receive compensation calculated at a level sufficient to provide her with appropriate accommodation.¹⁴⁹ Compensation can be based on the actual cost of improvements together with interest.¹⁵⁰ Alternatively, where a person has performed detrimental acts in relation to leased premises in the hope of acquiring the lease, the court may order a charge on the lease compensating him for his expenditure in respect of the property.¹⁵¹

That proprietary estoppel permits non-proprietary remedies reflects the difficulties which may face a court in deciding the most appropriate method for dealing with any given case. As an example of this phenomenon in *Cobbe v Yeoman's Row Management Ltd*¹⁵² at first instance (subsequently reversed by the House of Lords) the claimant had spent a large amount of money applying for planning permission for the development of land in reliance on the defendant's representation that she would acquire the development land from the claimant. It was held that there had been representation, reliance and detriment and therefore that the estoppel was proved. However, there were difficulties with the remedy. Lewison J considered it inappropriate to make a proprietary award because the claimant's expectation had only been that he would subsequently enter into a contract, after appropriate negotiations, with the defendant and therefore the precise rights which the claimant stood to receive had always been open to negotiation and change. Nevertheless, it was held that the defendant had taken unconscionable advantage of the claimant in allowing the claimant to make the application for planning permission. Consequently, the appropriate remedy was held to be a lien in favour of the claimant equal to half the value of the land once planning permission had been granted.¹⁵³ This approach followed the decision of Goff J in Holiday 146 Crabb v Arun DC [1976] Ch 179. See Dent v Dent [1996] 1 All ER 659, the court will consider the appropriateness of awarding a right of occupation in all the circumstances. See generally Dillwyn v Llewelyn (1862) 4 De GF & J 517 on the award of the fee simple, or alternatively Griffiths v Williams (1977) 248 EG 947 on the award of a lease; or Plimmer v Mayor of Wellington (1884) 9 App Cas 699, Dodsworth v Dodsworth (1973) 228 EG 1115; Re Sharpe (A Bankrupt) [1980] 1 WLR 219 on the award of a perpetual licence to occupy the property.

147 Pascoe v Turner [1979] 2 All ER 945.

148 Greasley v Cooke [1980] 1 WLR 1306. This will be particularly so where the claimant has contributed substantially to the mortgage repayments in reliance on representations made as to the acquisition of rights in the property by the defendant: Sleebush v Gordon [2004] All ER (D) 148.

149 Baker v Baker (1993) 25 HLR 408; Burrows & Burrows v Sharpe (1991) 23 HLR 82.

150 Morris v Morris [1982] 1 NSWLR 61. Cf Re Whitehead [1948] NZLR 1066.

151 McGuane v Welch [2008] EWCA Civ 785.

152 [2005] All ER (D) 406 (Feb).

153 A lien is a right to possession of the land until such time as the amount of money was paid.

*Inns Inc v Broadhead*¹⁵⁴ where, after considering a question of withdrawal from a transaction once planning permission was awarded, his Lordship had ordered equal division of the equity. Thus, the claimant's right was a right to money and not to any particular right in property. On similar facts, in Pridean Ltd v Forest Taverns Ltd a publican had begun development work on a pub in expectation of the fulfilment of a joint venture agreement with the other party being solemnised in the form of a contract.¹⁵⁵

This case was appealed to the Court of Appeal in Yeoman's Row Management Ltd v Cobbe.¹⁵⁶ Mummery LJ held that the first two and the final grounds of appeal did not raise any meaningful argument on these facts. On the third ground of appeal the judge at first instance had not relied on this being a binding contract, and the second agreement was not in any event expressed as being subject to contract. On the fourth ground, Mummery LJ held that the judge at first instance was entitled to hold that the appellant's behaviour had been unconscionable, particularly given the timing of the withdrawal from the transaction when the property had increased markedly in value. Mummery LJ then considered the nature of the remedy which should be made here. He relied on an article by Dr Gardner¹⁵⁷ and on the judgment of Goff J in *Holiday Inns Inc v Broadhead*¹⁵⁸ where after considering a question of withdrawal from a transaction once planning permission was awarded his Lordship had ordered equal division of the equity as the only feasible means of dealing with the case. It was held by Mummery LJ that where it is not clear what the claimant's expectations would have been, as in this case because it could not be known what level of profit could have been anticipated, then the remedy could not be concerned to meet that person's expectations. Equally, on these facts it was held that it would have been inadequate merely to have reimbursed Cobbe's expenses in the application for planning permission because that would not have taken into account the great increase in the value of the property after planning permission was awarded in which he would have expected to share. Mummery LJ held that Lewison J at first instance had reached an appropriate conclusion on the facts of that case in dividing the equity in the property equally between the parties, as Goff J had done in Holiday Inns Inc v Broadhead. This again demonstrates the remedial nature of proprietary estoppel. Dyson LJ agreed with Mummery LJ, focusing on the principle that 'the court must look at the circumstances in each case to decide in what way the equity can be satisfied'.¹⁵⁹ Dyson LJ pointed out that '[t]he courts often do not explain why one remedy is adopted rather than another':¹⁶⁰ this is very true, and therefore we have had to map those different approaches in this chapter.¹⁶¹

As Cobbe v Yeoman's Row Management Ltd indicates, recent cases have taken a broader approach than simply awarding rights in property, preferring instead to award both a right in some property and also some compensation in cash terms as considered necessary to meet the unconscionability exerted over the claimant. The Courts of Appeal in Yeoman's Row v Cobbe and in Jennings v Rice were concerned to look at all of the circumstances and then to reach an appropriate, equitable result. This is the way of modern proprietary estoppel. The

154 (1974) 232 EG 951.

155 Pridean Ltd v Forest Taverns Ltd (1996) 75 P & CR 447.

156 [2006] EWCA Civ 1139.

157 See Gardner, 'The Remedial Discretion in Proprietary Estoppel' (1999) 115 LQR 438.

158 (1974) 232 EG 951.

159 Taken from Plimmer v Mayor of Wellington (1884) 9 App Cas 699, 714.

160 [2006] EWCA Civ 1139, para [121].

161 This approach has been followed by the Court of Appeal in Sutcliffe v Lloyd [2007] EWCA Civ 153.

House of Lords in Cobbe v Yeoman's Row,¹⁶² as considered below, has taken a less expansive approach in relation to commercial contracts; although the subsequent decision of the House of Lords in *Thorner v Major*¹⁶³ appears to have returned matters to their previous condition in other circumstances.

The decision in Cobbe aside, the different approaches of the courts indicate a general equitable jurisdiction. As Lord Denning put it, 'equity is displayed at its most flexible' in relation to proprietary estoppel.¹⁶⁴ Thus, in Gillett v Holt, the claimant, who had worked on the defendant's farm and who had been promised to inherit the farm, was awarded the freehold in a farmhouse, 42 hectares of farmland and £100,000. In Jennings v Rice, it was suggested by Robert Walker LJ that the appropriate methodology was 'to do what was necessary to avoid an unconscionable remedy' by means of a proportionate remedy and consequently the claimant was awarded £200,000 in response to about 27 years of casual labour and care for the deceased woman.¹⁶⁵ In Campbell v Griffin,¹⁶⁶ the claimant's detrimental reliance was held to entitle him to a payment of £35,000 instead of granting him a right in the property which would 'hold up the administration of the estate for a generation',¹⁶⁷ thus considering the needs and rights of all of the people involved in a case and not just the claimant and defendant. This general approach is similar to Sir Arthur Hobhouse's dicta to the effect that the court should 'look at the circumstances in each case to decide in what way the equity can be satisfied'.¹⁶⁸ It is suggested that the more that the cases come to focus on the detriment suffered by the claimant, the more likely it is that the courts will seek to compensate that detriment by payment of money. This approach has the advantage of meeting the needs of the claimant (as in Baker v Baker) while ensuring that other people who might be entitled to inherit property from the representor do not lose those rights (as in Campbell v Griffin). So, at one end of the spectrum the claimant may acquire the entire absolute interest in the property, while at the other end she may only receive equitable compensation in the form of a personal right to money.

Normal service in the application of proprietary estoppel to domestic situations in the wake of Thorner v Major has been resumed (after the decision of the House of Lords in *Cobbe v Yeoman's Row*¹⁶⁹). For example, in *Porntip Stallion v Albert Stallion Holdings*¹⁷⁰ Porntip Stallion claimed that she had been promised that she could live in premises owned by her former husband, Albert. After Albert died, his subsequent wife, Lilibeth, became his executrix in relation to a will which left no such rights to Porntip. After their divorce, Porntip had continued to live in that property with Albert and Lilibeth. Following Thorner v Major,¹⁷¹ Judge Asplin QC found¹⁷² that 'on the balance of probabilities' such representations

162 [2008] 1 WLR 1752.

163 [2009] 1 WLR 776.

164 Crabb v Arun DC [1976] Ch 179, 189F.

165 [2003] 1 P & CR 100, para 56.

166 [2001] EWCA Civ 990, [2001] WTLR 981.

167 Ibid, at 991, per Robert Walker LJ.

168 Plimmer v Wellington Corporation (1884) 9 App Cas 699, 714; approved by Robert Walker LJ in Gillett v Holt [2001] Ch 210, 235.

169 [2008] 1 WLR 1752.

170 [2009] EWHC 1950 (Ch), [2010] 1 FCR 145.

171 [2009] UKHL 18.

172 [2010] 1 FCR 145, [110] et seq.

had been made to Porntip¹⁷³ and that Porntip had relied upon those representations to her detriment in agreeing not to contest the divorce nor to acquire the protection of a financial settlement in court. It was ordered that Porntip would be entitled to occupy the property rent-free for the remainder of her life. There was, however, an important caveat to the effect that Porntip would not be granted exclusive possession of the property, but rather she would be required to occupy the property in common with Lilibeth (and Lilibeth's new husband and daughter).¹⁷⁴ On the facts it was found that the parties would be able to live together in tolerable harmony given their history of cohabitation.¹⁷⁵ This demonstrates the remarkable flexibility which is available in cases of proprietary estoppel.¹⁷⁶

An illustration of the continued affection for older authorities like *Crabb v Arun DC*¹⁷⁷ arises in the decision in Ashby v Kilduff.¹⁷⁸ The court considered whether or not the claimant was entitled to rights on constructive trust or estoppel principles in a flat he had previously shared with the defendant. While citing both Stack v Dowden and Thorner v Major, Judge Livesey QC nevertheless turned ultimately to the much-quoted principle in the estoppel case of *Crabb v Arun DC*¹⁷⁹ that 'the claim is to be satisfied by the minimum award necessary to do justice'.¹⁸⁰ On that basis it was held that 'it seems to me that the court has a discretion to determine how the equity can best be satisfied in order to avoid the unconscionable result which would otherwise prevail'.¹⁸¹

173 The judge spends some time on the respective levels of credibility of the various witnesses, who contradict themselves and one another greatly in giving their evidence. As is common in trusts of homes cases, the witnesses are generally impassioned and partial, and occasionally incredible.

174 [2010] 1 FCR 145, [137] and [138]. Porntip had given evidence that they had lived under the same roof 'but separately' before.

175 As the judge held at para [138]: 'In this regard, I appreciate that it is an unusual step to create a situation in which the equity requires a claimant to continue to live in premises with the defendant. However, in this case, Porntip and Lilibeth appear to have done so for a considerable time both before and after Albert's death.' With respect, one cannot help but think that the surprising element is not that claimant and defendant will continue to live together but rather that the former wife and the widow would be expected by the High Court to live together. In that sense it is a very 'modern', even 'progressive' judgment; and a testament to the inherent flexibility of the doctrine of proprietary estoppel.

176 A female friend whom I was boring with an account of this, and other cases, wondered whether the fact that the judge was a woman might have led to this interesting judgment on the facts of this case, and its acceptance of an alternative mode of organising the parties' living arrangements.

177 [1976] Ch 179.

178 [2010] EWHC 2034 (Ch). A married Conservative MP, Ashby, had entered into a homosexual relationship with Kilduff which became the subject of a story in The Sunday Times, which in turn was the subject of an unsuccessful libel action on the part of Ashby in 1995. Mrs Ashby had given evidence against her husband at that trial. The two men had lived in flats one on top of the other so as to appear to be merely neighbours while carrying on a relationship. Mr Ashby decided to 'put his flat into the name of' Kilduff by means of a purported sale of that flat. Kilduff purported to sever any joint tenancy over these properties, which prompted Ashby to secure ownership of what had been his former flat. Up until that point, the two men had been living together in one of the two flats. The issues arose whether or not this was a genuine sale or if that flat should be deemed to be held on resulting or constructive trust for Ashby.

179 [1976] Ch 179.

180 Ibid at 198.

181 [2010] EWHC 2034 (Ch), at para [73]. It was a complex business to understand the context in which the two men had organised their property rights in the context of concealing their relationship during a libel trial and in the shadow of the possibility that Mrs Ashby would seek to divorce her husband. Disappointingly, Judge Livesey QC decided to leave it until after judgment was delivered to hear written evidence on the appropriate allocation of property rights between the parties.

A vitiating doctrine ensuring the conscionable application of statute

Proprietary estoppel underlines one of the key tenets of equity: that it can do justice between the parties where the ordinary rules of the common law or of statute would have been unfair or unconscionable. While some commentators seek to restrict proprietary estoppel to cases involving land,¹⁸² its remit is much broader. Proprietary estoppel will operate in relation to any form of property in relation to which the defendant has made assurances to the claimant that the claimant will acquire interests in that property and in reliance on which the claimant acts to her detriment.

Moreover, proprietary estoppel will operate to subvert ostensibly mandatory rules of law¹⁸³ in some situations. An example of this broader sweep of proprietary estoppel is provided by Yaxley v Gotts,¹⁸⁴ in which a joint venture was formed for the acquisition of land. The joint venture did not comply with the requirement in s 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 that the terms of any purported contract for the transfer of any interest in land being in writing. The defendant therefore contended that the claimant could have acquired no right in contract to the land because there was no writing in accordance with the formal requirements of the statute. However, the court was prepared to uphold that between the parties there had been a representation that there would be a joint venture between the parties in reliance on which the claimant had acted to its detriment. It was held by the Court of Appeal that a constructive trust had arisen between the parties on the basis of their common intention – and that this constructive trust was indistinguishable in this form from a proprietary estoppel.¹⁸⁵ The doctrine of constructive trust is therefore outwith the ambit of s 2 of the 1989 Act.¹⁸⁶

The general issue arose as to whether or not the general public policy underpinning the statutory formalities ought to be rigidly adhered to so as to preclude the activation of any estoppel on the basis that it was a principle of fundamentally important social policy.¹⁸⁷ It was held that in deciding whether or not a parliamentary purpose was being frustrated, one should ‘look at the circumstances in each case and decide in what way the equity can be satisfied’.¹⁸⁸

The court is able to apply the doctrine of proprietary estoppel where it was necessary to do the minimum equity necessary between the parties.¹⁸⁹ In effect, this opens the way for the return of the part performance doctrine¹⁹⁰ in the guise of proprietary estoppel and 182 See Mee, 1999, 99.

183 That is, civil law rules which preclude the validity of certain acts or which require a certain action in certain circumstances. Although those rights can be overreached: Birmingham Midshires Mortgage Services Ltd v Sabherwal (2000) 80 P & CR 256.

184 [2000] 1 All ER 711; L Smith, 2000; Tee, 2000. The principles in this case were applied in Kinane v Mackie-Conteh [2005] EWCA Civ 45, [2005] 2 P & CR D9, [25], per Arden LJ. See also S v S [2006] EWHC 2892 (Fam), Sumner J.

185 Ibid, 721 et seq, per Robert Walker LJ.

186 Kilcarne Holdings Ltd v Targetfollow (Birmingham) Ltd [2004] EWHC 2547 (Ch), para [219], per Lewison J.

187 Kok Hoong v Leong Cheong Kweng Mines Ltd [1964] AC 993; Godden v Merthyr Tydfil Housing Association [1997] NPC 1.

188 Plimmer v Mayor of Wellington (1884) 9 App Cas 699, 714, per Sir Arthur Hobhouse.

189 Crabb v Arun DC [1976] Ch 179, 198, per Scarman LJ. It is interesting to note that their Lordships are prepared to find a means of eluding straightforwardly mandatory norms of statute to give effect to some higher purpose contained in the case law.

190 Whereby any contract which had been partly performed would be perfected by equity.

constructive trust. While the doctrine of the creation of equitable mortgages by deposit of title deeds was deemed to have been removed by the 1989 Act,¹⁹¹ the equitable doctrine of proprietary estoppel remained intact,¹⁹² even where it would appear to offend the principle that an ineffective contract ought not to be effected by means of equitable doctrine.¹⁹³

Given that proprietary estoppel is an equitable doctrine, it is a requirement that the claimant be entitled to an equitable remedy. So, where a claimant has fabricated evidence to make it appear that she had suffered detrimental reliance on a purported representation, the court will hold that that claimant has not come to equity with clean hands and therefore will not be entitled to proprietary estoppel.¹⁹⁴ Where a first mortgagee acquiesces in the detriment of a second mortgagee in relation to property, the doctrine of proprietary estoppel may operate so as to relegate the priority of that first mortgage behind the rights of the second mortgagee.¹⁹⁵

A difficulty arose with this doctrine as a result of the judgment of Lord Scott in Cobbe v Yeoman's Row.¹⁹⁶ Lord Scott suggested that it was not the role of proprietary estoppel to avoid legislation, as had happened in Yaxley v Gotts. The decisions in *Herbert v Doyle*¹⁹⁷ and in *Whittaker v Kinnear*¹⁹⁸ have indicated that the dicta of Lord Scott in Yeoman's Row v Cobbe relating to the extent of s 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 were obiter dicta and that proprietary estoppel should continue to operate so as to prevent detrimental reliance being unconscionably overlooked just as it did in Yaxley v Gotts. Given the more relaxed approach taken to proprietary estoppel by the House of Lords in Thorner v Major,¹⁹⁹ this optimism may be well placed. These issues are considered in the next section.

Similarly, Warren J has held in *Clarke v Meadus*²⁰⁰ that proprietary estoppel can operate so as to deal with detrimental reliance on a representation beyond the rights which are set out in an express trust. As Warren J put it: 'it is clear that the express trusts declared in the [deed of appointment] are capable of being overridden by a proprietary estoppel in favour of [the claimant] as a result of promises and representations made after' the deed was executed.²⁰¹ In essence, the claimant had given up her home in Kent and moved to a property in Turners Hill, West Sussex in reliance on a representation that it would be left to her. Goodman v Gallant took the approach that the express trust would be definitive of the parties' interests, but the distinction in Clarke v Meadus is that representations were made after the deed was executed and so could be said to constitute an entirely new claim separate from the deed which created that express trust.

191 United Bank of Kuwait plc v Sahib [1997] Ch 107.

192 King v Jackson [1998] 1 EGLR 30; and McCausland v Duncan Lawrie Ltd [1997] 1 WLR 38.

193 Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669; Kleinwort Benson v Sandwell BC [1994] 4 All ER 890.

194 Gonthier v Orange Contract Scaffolding Ltd [2003] EWCA Civ 873.

195 Scottish & Newcastle plc v Lancashire Mortgage Corporation Ltd [2007] EWCA Civ 684.

196 [2008] 1 WLR 1752.

197 [2010] EWCA Civ 1095.

198 [2011] EWHC (QB) 1479, per Bean J.

199 [2009] 1 WLR 776.

200 [2010] EWHC 3117 (Ch).

201 Ibid, at [56].

13.3.5 Proprietary estoppel in commercial joint ventures: Cobbe v Yeoman's Row

The decision in Cobbe v Yeoman's Row

The decision of the House of Lords in *Cobbe v Yeoman's Row*²⁰² has, however, disturbed the emerging understanding of proprietary estoppel as being based on the prevention of unconscionability – an idea which had been accepted by the High Court and by the Court of Appeal in that case (as considered above).²⁰³ However, since the subsequent decision of the House of Lords in Thorner v Major, it is suggested that Cobbe v Yeoman's Row, which is an unfortunate decision for many reasons which are considered here, should be understood as being limited to cases involving commercial development transactions. I would ask you to imagine that a woman called Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring and a man called Mr Cobbe had discussions about developing a property such that Cobbe spent a huge amount of money in reliance on their 'agreement in principle', with Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring's knowledge, on getting planning permission, engaging architects and so on; imagine then that Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring refused to go ahead with their putative arrangement once planning permission for the development was granted. It was found by the judge at first instance as a fact that Mrs Zipporah Lisle-Mainwaring had encouraged Cobbe to believe that the transaction would go ahead and it was consequently found as a fact that she had taken unconscionable advantage of him. Would you think that Cobbe would have some sort of remedy against Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring, particularly a remedy based on proprietary estoppel, in these circumstances? If your answer is 'yes', then you might be surprised to find that the House of Lords did not agree with you.

It was held that the parties had not formed a binding contract and therefore that Cobbe could not make out a claim for proprietary estoppel precisely because the Lisle-Mainwaring was not asserting something that was not the truth in arguing that she was not bound any pre-contractual negotiations with Cobbe. The House of Lords held that it is not enough to make out a claim for proprietary estoppel simply to allege that the defendant's action was unconscionable. Rather there needs to be some fact as to the rights of the parties which the defendant could be estopped from denying. (This proposition is considered below in more detail.) Lord Scott held that it is inappropriate for estoppel to be used to subvert formal requirements of statute simply on the basis of unconscionability (such as s 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 requiring that all contracts transferring an interest in property must be in writing). The case of Cobbe v Yeomans Row concerned a situation in which the parties had not created a binding contract between them, but rather had merely entered into detailed negotiations sufficient for Cobbe to commence work and employ expensive professional services.²⁰⁴ Lord Walker considered that it would introduce too much uncertainty to commercial contracts if parties who had refrained from finalising a formally valid contract were found to have given effect to their negotiations by means of proprietary estoppel. One can see his Lordship's point: if we have rules as to when contracts are binding, then those rules ought to be enforced. However, we do also have another set of rules which say that a defendant may not unconscionably rely on the formal rules of common law (such as contract law) so as to take advantage of, for example, the £2 million worth of 203 Applied in Brightlingsea Haven Ltd v Morris [2008] EWHC 1928 (QB).

202 [2008] 1 WLR 1752.

204 Cobbe was followed in Qayyum v Hameed [2009] EWCA Civ 352, [2009] 3 FCR 545.

work which a person has invested in a project with the defendant's knowledge in reliance on the understanding that they will both deal in that property together in the future, even if that understanding is not contractually binding. That Lord Walker and Lord Scott, two chancery specialists, should come to the conclusion that they did is frankly staggering.

Difficulties with the decision in Cobbe v Yeoman's Row

Let us recap. The purpose of equity, from Aristotle onwards, has been to ensure that strict legal rules, whether formal rules as to the creation of land contracts or contract law generally, will not act as smokescreen behind which one person will be able to take unconscionable advantage of another. Etherton J was clear at first instance that that was what Mrs Lisle-Mainwaring had done in relation to Cobbe; and the Court of Appeal agreed with Etherton J. We might have thought that the judge in Gillett v Holt and Jennings v Rice, Lord Walker, would have upheld the notion that a claimant would be entitled to proprietary estoppel in a situation in which large payments increasing the value of the property by up to £2 million on the mooted project were purportedly ignored by a defendant who sought to renege on the parties' formative understanding that they would enter into a contract in the future. Cobbe was instead forced to learn a lesson on behalf of commercial people everywhere: do not start to do preparatory work unless you have a formally valid contract.

Lord Scott's speech is littered with surprising comments on the nature of proprietary estoppel. First, it is said that proprietary estoppel is a claim to a remedy constituting a proprietary right in property.²⁰⁵ This is not so. There have been many cases in which the remedy received by the successful claimant was merely a right in money (that is, equitable compensation as in Campbell v Griffin) to compensate the claimant for her detriment. Therefore, Cobbe could have been awarded compensation on the basis of proprietary estoppel. This would also have overcome the objection that Cobbe would otherwise have been achieving the enforcement of the never-finalised contract by the back door. Second, as set out at the start of this chapter, the term 'estoppel' is based etymologically on the notion of 'stopping' a person from denying that something is the case: however, this is not a notion of estoppel which has been used in the English case law for decades and therefore for Lord Scott to unearth it seems a little out-of-step.

Thirdly, proprietary estoppel is said to be a 'sub-set' of promissory estoppel.²⁰⁶ No authority is given for this surprising proposition. Unless we accept, as Lord Scott does not, that all forms of estoppel are based on a single form of equitable estoppel, then these two estoppels are not linked in this way. Fourthly, estoppel is said by Lord Scott to be based on 'some fact or facts, or, sometimes, something that is a mixture of fact and law, that stands in the way of some right claimed by the person entitled to the benefit of the estoppel'.²⁰⁷ This fits in with the definition of 'estop' given at the beginning of this chapter. It was the absence of such a fact that was being denied by the defendant which lost the claimant any right: that is, because there was no binding contract between the parties there was no fact of there being a contract which the defendant was denying and from which she should have been estopped. Older cases on estoppel (such as Crabb v Arun DC and Taylor Fashions) were distinguished on the basis that they concerned a defined interest whereas Cobbe had no such defined interest because no contract had been completed nor any such defined right agreed between the parties. Instead reliance was placed on the old (and generally discarded) form of estoppel in Ramsden v Dyson which was based on a wrongful denial of an interest (considered earlier in this chapter). In cases like Gillett v Holt and Jennings v Rice there was no defined right claimed by the claimant but the Court of Appeal nevertheless awarded proprietary estoppel and used the estoppel's remedial reach to design an appropriate remedy. Lord Scott's approach is in truth at odds with most of the estoppel case law for twenty years: something which, it is suggested, required closer attention in his Lordship's speech.

205 Ibid., para [4].

206 Ibid., para [14].

207 Ibid.

Fifthly, a claim based on unconscionable conduct in the negotiation of a contract is said not to give rise to a constructive trust and so is said to be 'misconceived': but, interestingly, no explanation as to why it was misconceived was given (except for the repetitious discussion of the non-enforceability of uncertain contracts set out before). Sixthly, in relation to unjust enrichment it is said by Lord Scott that no value in the property is created by the acquisition but rather that its value was unlocked. This is syllogistic misdirection. While there is no planning permission there is no development value in the land: just as until the existing buildings are demolished and new buildings constructed, there will be no development profit. Whether the acquisition of planning permission created or unlocked the land's development value, there can be no doubt that Cobbe spent money on acquiring that permission and therefore that it was Cobbe's expenditure and work which in fact increased the value of the land: it was money which someone had to spend to realise that value, whether that person was Cobbe or not. After all, there is no point in saying that Geoff Hurst deserves no credit for scoring in the 1966 World Cup Final because someone else could have scored: because it was after all Geoff Hurst who scored. Similarly, it was Cobbe who did this work with the knowledge of Lisle-Mainwaring. Therefore Cobbe deserves credit for having done that work on these facts.

A better approach to the decision of this case might have been as follows. Cobbe received assurance from Lisle-Mainwaring (in word, and in deed in the form of her allowing him to do all of this work and spend all that money) in reliance on which he relied to his detriment in spending large amounts of money on the property. The combination of representation, reliance and detriment on the basis of the decision in Re Basham and the other modern cases on proprietary estoppel should have given rise to an estoppel in favour of Cobbe. It is to be hoped in time that this decision is seen as being limited to the specific question of whether or not contracts in negotiation may give rise to proprietary estoppel and that it is not extended to other contexts, for example the acquisition of rights in the family home. Otherwise the purpose of proprietary estoppel as it has been developed since Crabb v Arun DC will be ruined.

The purpose of equitable estoppel

Lord Walker had the following to say about the nature and purpose of the doctrine of equitable (not proprietary) estoppel:²⁰⁸

My Lords, equitable estoppel is a flexible doctrine which the court can use, in appropriate circumstances, to prevent injustice caused by the vagaries and inconstancy of human nature. But it is not a sort of joker or wild card to be used whenever the court disapproves of the conduct of a litigant who seems to have the law on his side. Flexible though it is, the doctrine must be formulated and applied in a disciplined and principled way. Certainty is important in property transactions.

208 Ibid, para [46].

One is tempted to wonder why. If it is indeed a general equitable estoppel, as opposed to narrow proprietary estoppel, then why should not the courts impose a remedial set of responses to circumstances in which there has been representation, reliance and detriment which is deemed to be unconscionable? The reference to equitable estoppel, it is suggested, has itself been advanced by academics such as Prof Cooke who have sought to transform this doctrine into a single principle and away from being the splintered plethora of doctrines which have existed historically in equity and at common law. On the facts of Cobbe, the fact that both of the parties were experienced in property development is a factor which caused the House of Lords to think that ultimately there was no harm here because both parties should have realised that neither of them had any specific contractual rights while the documentation was in negotiation between them.

The subsequent decision of the House of Lords in *Thorner v Major*²⁰⁹ has been significant in understanding how the Cobbe decision should be understood. Lord Walker's speech effectively dampened speculation in the academic commentary on Cobbe that the doctrine of proprietary estoppel had been effectively gutted.²¹⁰ Instead, Lord Walker suggested that Cobbe should be understood as merely reminding us all of the need for 'certainty of interest': that is, proprietary estoppel remains unchanged, except that we are reminded of the need for the representation and the right which is to be acquired being identified with sufficient certainty by the parties. It is difficult to see how the requirements of certainty are promoted in that judgment by finding a representation where none was ever made expressly. Instead, it is suggested, this decision is closer to a doctrine of unconscionability, of the sort identified by Walker LJ (as he then was) in Jennings v Rice, whereby the claimant's extensive detriment would have caused an unconscionable benefit to have been bestowed on the farm and on the deceased man, as well as an unconscionable and unrewarded burden being imposed on the claimant. This appears, in truth, to be a doctrine concerned with the avoidance of unconscionability and uncompensated detriment, as opposed to a doctrine predicated on certainty. In truth, Thorner v Major has seen proprietary estoppel function on far more traditional principles than Cobbe might have suggested.

13.4 ESTOPPEL LICENCES: FROM CONTRACT TO PROPERTY RIGHTS

The doctrine of proprietary estoppel has been used in many situations to attempt to elevate purely personal claims into proprietary claims. One clear example of this tendency relates to estoppel licences – another project of Lord Denning in the field of estoppel. Within the general development of the new model constructive trust, Lord Denning sought to award proprietary remedies to those claimants who had been given only licences (purely personal rights against the licensor) and therefore had no protection against eviction. Lord Denning's particular concern was in situations in which the licensed premises were the licensee's home.

209 [2009] 1 WLR 776.

210 See Macfarlane and Robertson, 'The Death of Proprietary Estoppel' [2008] LMCLQ 449.

His Lordship contended that a contract which granted a licence to the licensee constituted a representation that the licensee would acquire rights effectively equivalent to a leasehold interest for the duration of the licence.²¹¹ The general application of this rule – seeking to enlarge licences to the status of leases – was roundly rejected by the Court of Appeal²¹² in favour of a more traditional test which asserted that the licensee might be able to acquire rights by virtue of proprietary estoppel or constructive trust.

So, for example, where a person entered into a verbal agreement with a landlord in which the landlord assured that person that she would be granted an interest in the land, such that she expended money in reliance on that assurance, that person would acquire rights in the land under estoppel.²¹³ It is important that any detriment suffered, or money expended, must have been in the expectation of receiving some right in the property of which the landlord was aware.²¹⁴ It is also important that the landlord acquiesced in the claimant's actions, and not merely that the claimant acted without the landlord's knowledge.²¹⁵ There is a drift in the cases which focuses on the unconscionable act of the defendant in more general terms concerning the promise of some interest in the property,²¹⁶ and even being based on a principle of unjust enrichment.²¹⁷ In short, a licensee may acquire estoppel rights against property where a rightholder in that property has made some assurance to that licensee that she would acquire some rights in the property, whether by way of a lease or otherwise.

The remedy available to a claimant is effectively drawn on the same canvas as for proprietary estoppel – as considered above. This may lead to the acquisition of limited rights of secure occupation. Where a licensee had spent £700 on improvements to a bungalow in reliance on representations made to them that they would be able to remain in occupation, the court held that they could remain in secure occupation until their expenditure had been reimbursed²¹⁸ or generally 'for as long as they wish to occupy the property'.²¹⁹ Alternatively, the claimant may simply be entitled to an amount of money to compensate her for her detriment.²²⁰ In exceptional cases, a transfer of the entire fee simple has been ordered to protect the claimant from suffering detriment:²²¹ this may be because the contribution was so large that a transfer of the fee simple was the only suitable remedy,²²² or because that would be the only means of securing the claimant's occupation in the light of a representation that she could occupy in perpetuity.²²³ What is most significant is that the court will have complete freedom to frame its remedy once it has found that an estoppel is both available

211 Errington v Errington [1952] 1 QB 290.

212 Ashburn Anstalt v Arnold [1988] 2 WLR 706.

213 Ramsden v Dyson (1866) LR 1 HL 129, 170, per Lord Kingsdown.

214 Western Fish Products Ltd v Penwith DC [1981] 2 All ER 204; Brinmand v Ewens [1987] 2 EGLR 67.

215 Jones v Stones [1999] 1 WLR 1739.

216 Taylor Fashions Ltd v Liverpool Victoria Trustees Co Ltd [1982] QB 133; Elitestone Ltd v Morris (1995) 73 P & CR 259; Lloyds Bank v Carrick [1996] 4 All ER 630.

217 Sledmore v Dalby (1996) 72 P & CR 196, 208, per Hobhouse LJ.

218 Dodsworth v Dodsworth (1973) 228 EG 1115; Burrows and Burrows v Sharpe (1991) 23 HLR 82.

219 Inwards v Baker [1965] 2 QB 29.

220 Baker v Baker (1993) 25 HLR 408.

221 Pascoe v Turner [1979] 1 WLR 431; Voyce v Voyce (1991) 62 P & CR 290.

222 Dillwyn v Llewelyn (1862) 4 De GF & J 517.

223 Pascoe v Turner [1979] 1 WLR 431.

and appropriate.²²⁴ Thus, whereas Lord Denning sought originally to raise personal rights in contract to the status of rights in property, the possibilities for contractual licences to constitute rights in property now rest on ordinary principles of proprietary estoppel.

13.5 PROMISSORY ESTOPPEL

The foundation of the contractual doctrine of promissory estoppel can be found in Hughes v Metropolitan Railway,²²⁵ in which case a landlord had been negotiating with his tenant for the renewal of a lease. The lease provided for a specified time within which the tenant would be entitled to serve notice of an intention to renew. The negotiations were continuing during that period until the landlord unilaterally stopped negotiations and sought to terminate the lease. The court held that the landlord would be estopped from terminating the lease on the basis that he had led the tenant to believe that their negotiations would lead to the novation of the lease in any event. The more modern root of this doctrine was in a decision of Lord Denning in Central London Property Trust Ltd v High Trees House Ltd,²²⁶ in which his Lordship held that an agreement not to renegotiate the level of rental payments under a lease for the duration of the 1939–45 war estopped the landlord from seeking to rely on a term in the lease that he could rely on at a higher level of rent during that period after a rent review.

The principle which emerges from this vague doctrine is that a party to a contract will be estopped from reneging on a clear promise where it would be inequitable to do so and where the other party has altered its position in reliance on the promise. The promise is required to be clear,²²⁷ but it can be implied from the conduct or words used by the parties.²²⁸ In terms of the inequity of the action, it is within the court's discretion to decide whether it would be conscionable for the defendant to insist on her strict contractual rights.²²⁹ The alteration of position is broadly equivalent to the detriment required in proprietary estoppel, and would include a party waiving her strict legal rights in reliance on a promise by another person that she would similarly waive her own rights.²³⁰

What promissory estoppel will not do is replace the doctrine of consideration and lead to the creation of contracts without such consideration.²³¹ The concern would be that, even though there were no valid consideration, X could claim that Y had made a promise to X in reliance on which X had altered her position, thus entitling her to rely on promissory estoppel. Promissory estoppel will not be used as a sword: that is, it will not create new rights but will only protect the claimant's existing rights. This is different from proprietary estoppel which appears to grant entirely new rights to the claimant – for example, rights in property which the claimant had not previously held – and adds to the assertion made at the beginning of this 224 An approach approved as long ago as Lord Cawdor v Lewis (1835) 1 Y & C Ex 427, 433; Plimmer v Wellington Corporation (1884) 9 App Cas 699, 713.

225 (1877) 2 App Cas 439; Birmingham and District Land Co v L & NW Railway (1888) 40 Ch D 268.

226 [1947] KB 130.

227 Scandinavian Trading Tanker Co AB v Flota Petrolera Ecuatoriana [1983] QB 549; Youell v Bland Welch & Co Ltd [1990] 2 Lloyd's Rep 423.

228 Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Humphrey's Estate [1987] 1 AC 114.

229 D & C Builders v Rees [1966] 2 QB 617.

230 Société Italo-Belge v Palm and Vegetable Oils [1982] 1 All ER 19.

231 Combe v Combe [1951] 2 KB 215; Brikom Investments Ltd v Carr [1979] QB 467.

chapter that there cannot be a single doctrine of estoppel, without some alteration to existing doctrine, in spite of the initial similarities between the many forms of estoppel recognised both in equity and at common law.²³²

13.6 OTHER FORMS OF ESTOPPEL IN COMMERCIAL CONTEXTS

13.6.1 Common law estoppel and the nemo dat principle

Estoppel operates both in common law and in equity. Those forms of estoppel considered thus far have been primarily equitable.²³³ The common law has long had a notion of estoppel in pais,²³⁴ whereby a person who ‘wilfully causes another to believe a certain state of things, and induces him to act on that belief, so as to alter his own previous position, . . . is [prevented from suggesting that] a different state of things existed at the same time’.²³⁵ One example of a common law estoppel is considered in Chapter 21, and arises in relation to sale of goods contracts. The common law estoppel is based on dicta of Ashurst J in Lickbarrow v Mason,²³⁶ that ‘wherever one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third, he who has enabled such third person to occasion the loss must sustain it’.²³⁷ In truth, this estoppel should be considered as an exception to the nemo dat principle which arises in circumstances in which there is an express or an implied representation made by an agent that she has authority from the owner to sell goods as the agent of that owner.²³⁸ In cases involving hire purchase agreements, the estoppel has been invoked in circumstances in which a person has purported to sell a vehicle to a car dealer (the seller) and then sought to purchase it back under a hire purchase agreement, while both purchaser and seller have represented to the finance company that the seller had a good title to the vehicle.²³⁹ Where a shyster purported to buy a car on hire purchase from C, thus entitling him to take the car away, and then sold that same car to another dealer, M, and where M then sold the car to U, it was held that C was not precluded from denying the shyster’s authority to sell by virtue of its own prima facie negligence in giving the car’s document of registration to the shyster.²⁴⁰

13.6.2 Estoppel by representation

Estoppel by representation has been enforced both at common law and in equity.²⁴¹ However, recent applications of the principle have demonstrated that its basis is one of good conscience

232 Crabb v Arun DC [1976] Ch 179; Amalgamated Investment & Property Co Ltd v Texas Commerce International Bank Ltd [1982] 1 QB 84; Williams v Roffey Bros & Nicholls (Contractors) Ltd [1991] 1 QB 1.

233 Although it is not always possible to draw such clear distinctions in the modern law of estoppel: Cooke, 2000, 57 et seq.

234 Ibid., 16.

235 Pickard v Sears (1837) 6 A & E 469, 474. See also Freeman v Cooke (1848) 2 Exch 654 and Heane v Rogers (1829) 9 B & C 576. I am grateful to Elizabeth Cooke for these references.

236 (1787) 2 TR 63.

237 Commercial lawyers treat this statement with some contempt; Professor Bridge describes it as a ‘worn dictum’: Bridge, 1996, 101.

238 Henderson v Williams [1895] 1 QB 521; Farquharson Bros & Co v King & Co [1902] AC 325.

239 Eastern Distributors Ltd v Goldring [1957] 2 QB 600.

240 Central Newbury Car Auctions Ltd v Unity Finance Ltd [1957] 1 QB 371.

241 Jorden v Money (1854) 5 HLC 185, (1854) 10 ER 868.

and fairness. In National Westminster Bank plc v Somer International,²⁴² the bank mistakenly credited a payment of US$76,708 to Somer when that amount had been intended for another of its account holders with a similar name. In reliance on the receipt of the money, Somer shipped £13,180 worth of goods to a client from which it had been expecting a payment in a similar amount. The bank sought to recover the mistaken payment. Somer argued that it was entitled to an estoppel by representation because the bank had represented to it that the money belonged to Somer, that Somer had acted to its detriment in reliance on that representation, and that it was therefore entitled to retain the whole of the moneys paid to it by the bank. In a reversal of previous authority suggesting that Somer could have retained the entire payment,²⁴³ the Court of Appeal held that the doctrine of estoppel by representation would prevent retention of the entire sum where that would have been unconscionable. Therefore, on these facts, Somer could retain only an amount equal to the value of the goods which it had shipped in reliance on the representation.²⁴⁴

The similarities between proprietary estoppel and estoppel by representation are clear: both operate to prevent unconscionable retention of a benefit and both operate (arguably) to prevent the suffering of uncompensated detriment.²⁴⁵ It would therefore be easy to see how a unified equitable estoppel could be achieved. The familiar triptych of representation, reliance and detriment is common to both doctrines, and therefore it would be possible, without doing too much violence to either doctrine, to subsume them within a general equitable estoppel. Nevertheless, there are differences between these doctrines. Estoppel by representation has been both a common law and an equitable doctrine, and therefore cannot be said to operate currently solely on the basis of equitable principles of good conscience. Furthermore, estoppel by representation appears to operate primarily as a defence, whereas proprietary estoppel grants property rights as a claim. Estoppel by representation is generally taken to function as a rule of evidence, whereas proprietary estoppel is acquiring a personality of its own as a substantive doctrine.

13.7 IN CONCLUSION

Estoppel achieves justice by preventing a person from going back on her word. The difference between an ordinary promise and a promise giving rise to an estoppel is that it is a requirement of the latter that the claimant must have suffered some detriment in reliance on that promise. Where that estoppel is unfortunate is where it is deployed so as to enable the courts to overturn the mandatory rules set out by Parliament in legislation – from the Statute of Frauds to the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989. At some level there must be a concern that this permits the courts to overrule Parliament.

This discretionary power is in common with the fundamental tenets of equity that it should do justice between the parties in individual cases. In that sense, equitable estoppel is in line with the doctrine in *Rochefoucauld v Boustead*²⁴⁶ and doctrines like secret trusts. It accords

242 [2002] QB 1286, CA.

243 Avon County Council v Howlett [1983] 1 WLR 605.

244 Scottish Equitable v Derby [2001] 3 All ER 818 applied.

245 Cf First National Bank plc v Thompson [1996] Ch 231, 236, where Millett LJ contrasts species of estoppel by representation with the common law principle that a grantor is precluded from disputing the validity of her own grant.

246 See para 5.2.2 above.

with Aristotle's attitude to 'equity' in that it achieves a better result than abstract rules of common law in cases where it is applied between the parties. As with many equitable doctrines, its shortcoming is that it sees the actionable detriment as being focused primarily on expenditure of money and less often on 'detrimental' acts which have no pecuniary effect.

Importantly, estoppel need not be restitutionary. It is not necessary that the defendant has been enriched at the expense of the claimant. All that is required is that the claimant has suffered some detriment. So in cases like *Grant v Edwards*²⁴⁷ the detriment suffered by the claimant is directed simply at the personal inconvenience of leaving settled accommodation to live with the defendant and the personal inconvenience of undertaking to have a family with the defendant. It is not possible to say that there has been an 'enrichment' there in the financial sense usually required by restitution. In the Canadian sense of enrichment we might consider that the defendant has taken some general 'benefit' from the parties' life history together, but that is not the usual English restitutionary approach. Restitution lawyers have been slow to turn their attention to the family homes cases precisely because there are messier questions at issue than the certainties of restitution of unjust enrichment, the precisions of tracing and the neatness of subrogation will permit.

247 [1986] Ch 638.

Essay – Thinking about the law on fiduciaries

14.1 THE ROLE OF THE FIDUCIARY	686
14.2 A QUESTION OF DEFINITION	686
14.3 ESTABLISHED CATEGORIES OF FIDUCIARY RELATIONSHIP	687
14.4 THE ADVANTAGES OF REMEDIES BASED ON FIDUCIARY RESPONSIBILITY	690
14.5 SCOPE FOR THE DEVELOPMENT OF NEW CATEGORIES?	692
14.6 CONCLUSIONS – THE TRADITIONAL CONTEXT	697

14.1 THE ROLE OF THE FIDUCIARY

This short essay aims to pull together some of the threads relating to fiduciary responsibility so as to put the subject into a little more focus. What is perhaps most worthy of mention at the outset is the fact that more and more classes of claimant are seeking to argue that they are the beneficiaries of fiduciary relationships. The reason for this mooted expansion of the category is that the remedies available to the beneficiaries of fiduciary relationships are more wide-ranging than the remedies generally available for tort law or contract law claims, in the ways considered in this essay.

A further benefit to be derived from imposing fiduciary liability on another person is that the person thus classified as a fiduciary acquires a different status from that which they held previously. They acquire a recognition from the legal system that they ought to be considered as holding a particular set of rights as a mark of their own social significance. So, for example, if employers were accepted as being fiduciaries in relation to the employment contracts created with employees, that would reverse the power relation which would otherwise exist between employer and employee: the employer would cease to be simply the ‘master’ in a master-and-servant relationship (the precursor of what we now call ‘employment law’ or ‘labour law’) and instead would become a person owing duties to the employee which would also carry wide-ranging legal consequences.

14.2 A QUESTION OF DEFINITION

The word ‘fiduciary’ is itself a rarely used word in ordinary speech, let alone its very particular definition in legal usage. I can do no better than to quote Professor Ian Kennedy, when he describes the problem of definition in the following terms: ‘Of ancient pedigree, and somewhat shrouded in mystery, it cannot be an overstatement that the fiduciary relationship is a legal concept of indistinct features and defining characteristics.’¹ So, we begin by acknowledging that the term fiduciary is difficult to define despite being familiar to lawyers for some centuries. A little like an elephant, we think we would know one when we saw one but find it difficult to describe in the abstract.

A dictionary definition of the word fiduciary, beyond a coy reference to the legal sense, is ‘relating to or based on a trust’ – but the etymology of the word is more enlightening: ‘Late 16th century, via Latin fiduciarius “(holding) in a trust” from, ultimately, fides “trust”.’² In this sense the word ‘trust’ has a link in the Latin with ‘faith: fides’ which is also the root of the English word ‘confide’, literally to have faith in someone or to have confidence in someone. There is therefore a clear connection between the ordinary use of the word ‘fiduciary’ with notions of ‘faith’, ‘belief’, ‘confidence’ and ‘trust’.

To return to one of the key points in Chapter 2 above, the use of the word ‘trust’ in English law reverses the way in which that word is ordinarily understood.³ To trust someone is usually to have faith in them, or to have a belief that they can be trusted. A fiduciary is someone who is believed to be faithful in this sense. Consequently, the common law and equity have developed strict rules to govern the behaviour of those who are fiduciaries precisely to protect those who place such simple faith in others and to ensure that their trust is not abused. The result of this legal development has been a subjugation of the fiduciary to the legal rights of the beneficiary, such that the beneficiary appears to be the powerful one and the fiduciary to be the bearer of weighty obligations.

The question at issue is whether or not a given person ought to be deemed to act as a fiduciary for some other person. The logically subsequent question is then as to the content of those fiduciary duties. First things first, though: who will be a fiduciary?

14.3 ESTABLISHED CATEGORIES OF FIDUCIARY RELATIONSHIP

There are four established categories of fiduciary relationship: trustee and beneficiary, company directors, partners inter se (within the terms of the 1890 Partnership Act), and principal and agent.⁴ The nature of fiduciary responsibility was considered in Chapter 2⁵ and the detailed nature of the obligations of trustees as fiduciaries were considered in detail in Chapter 8.⁶ Examples of other situations in which fiduciary relationships have been found are as follows:⁷ where a solicitor acts on behalf of his client⁸ when advising that client as to

1 Kennedy, 1996.

2 Encarta World Dictionary, 1999.

3 Cotterrell, 1993:1.

4 The nature of fiduciary duties is considered in Thomas and Hudson, 2004, para 25.15 et seq.

5 See para 2.3.3.

6 See the introduction to section 8.1 for an outline of the many specific obligations.

7 These examples have arisen primarily in England and Wales, whereas other jurisdictions have accepted that a doctor may owe fiduciary duties to his patient (McInerney v MacDonald (1992) 93 DLR (4th) 415) and that a parent who has abused his child is taken to have breached fiduciary duties to that child (M(K) v M(H) (1993) 96 DLR (4th) 449; H v R [1996] 1 NZLR 299).

8 Nocton v Lord Ashburton [1914] AC 932; McMaster v Byrne [1952] 1 All ER 1363; Brown v IRC [1965] AC 244; Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46; Maguire v Makaronis (1997) 144 ALR 729. By contrast, the Law Society owes no fiduciary duties to the solicitors whom it represents: Swain v Law Society [1983] 1 AC 598.

the client's affairs within the scope of the solicitor's retainer;⁹ in relation to senior employees holding sensitive positions with reference to their employers,¹⁰ or where any employee exploits his office to generate a personal profit by way of a bribe;¹¹ between the promoter of a company and the company itself;¹² in relation to those who occupy public office whether as members of the secret service,¹³ or as members of the armed forces using their rank to obtain passage for contraband through army roadblocks,¹⁴ or a Director of Public Prosecutions in particular when taking a bribe not to prosecute an alleged criminal.¹⁵

The following definition of a fiduciary suggests that a range of duties to avoid conflicts of interest¹⁶ and so forth flow from any situation in which a person is in a position of loyalty and confidence in relation to another person:

A fiduciary is someone who has undertaken to act for or on behalf of another in a particular matter in circumstances which give rise to a relationship of trust and confidence. The distinguishing obligation of a fiduciary is the obligation of loyalty. The principal is entitled to the single-minded loyalty of his fiduciary. The core liability has several facets. A fiduciary must act in good faith; he must not make a profit out of his trust; he must not place himself in a position where his duty and his interest may conflict; he may not act for his own benefit or the benefit of a third person without the informed consent of his principal. This is not intended to be an exhaustive list, but it is sufficient to indicate the nature of fiduciary obligations. They are the defining characteristics of the fiduciary.¹⁷

What emerges from this definition of a fiduciary is that the categories of fiduciary are open. So, while there are four clear categories of fiduciary office, as set out at the beginning of this section, it is always possible to find that fiduciary duties exist in new contexts on a case-by-case basis. If we understand that the number of fiduciary offices is potentially infinite, and that the category of fiduciary relationships is therefore an elastic one, it should be recognised

- 9 Marks & Spencer plc v Freshfields Bruckhaus Deringer [2004] 3 All ER 773, [2004] EWHC 1337; Bolkiah (Prince Jefri) v KPMG [1999] 2 AC 222. This limitation has two senses, it is suggested. First, that the fiduciary obligations terminate when the retainer terminates: Bolkiah v KPMG. Secondly, that the solicitor is obliged to observe the obligations of a fiduciary in relation to the client's legal affairs but not as to his choice of socks, where the latter falls outwith the scope of the duties forming a part of his retainer.
- 10 Canadian Aero-Services Ltd v O'Malley (1973) 40 DLR (3d) 371 at 381, per Laskin J; Sybron Corporation v Rochem Ltd [1984] Ch 112 at 127, per Stephenson LJ; Neary v Dean of Westminster [1999] IRLR 288. However, this does not relate to ordinary employees and does not form a necessary part of the employment contract: Nottingham University v Fishel [2000] IRLR 471.
- 11 Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324.
- 12 Erlanger v New Sombrero Phosphate Company (1878) 3 App Cas 1218. See Hudson, 'Capital issues', in Morse (ed), Palmer's Company Law, para 5–113.
- 13 A contentious category whereby it was accepted in Attorney-General v Guardian Newspapers Ltd (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109 that such a person would be a fiduciary (in that case, when publishing his memoirs), but in Attorney-General v Blake [1998] 1 All ER 833, CA, [2000] 4 All ER 385, HL, it was considered that such a person would not always be fiduciary of necessity, although his position may be akin to that of a fiduciary.
- 14 Reading v Attorney-General [1951] 1 All ER 617.
- 15 Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324.
- 16 Considered in detail in section 12.5 above and in relation to the obligations of trustees specifically in para 8.3.9 above.
- 17 Bristol and West Building Society v Mothew [1998] Ch 1 at 18, per Millett LJ.

that the obligations befitting a fiduciary will differ from circumstance to circumstance. As Lord Browne-Wilkinson has held:

the phrase ‘fiduciary duties’ is a dangerous one, giving rise to a mistaken assumption that all fiduciaries owe the same duties in all circumstances. That is not the case. Although so far as I am aware, every fiduciary is under a duty not to make a profit from his position (unless such profit is authorised), the fiduciary duties owed, for example, by an express trustee are not the same as those owed by an agent.¹⁸

So it is with the precise obligations borne by a constructive trustee:¹⁹ the precise obligations of the trustee will fall to be defined from context to context.

The office of fiduciary can be imposed in addition to other legal obligations. So, for example, partners have contractual obligations between them as set out in their partnership agreement. Similarly, agents stand in a contractual relationship to their principals. However, both partners and agents bear fiduciary obligations above and beyond their contractual bonds. A trustee of an occupational pension fund, as considered in Chapter 24, will often be a professional investment manager acting as a trustee on the basis of a contract with the employer who has created the scheme, but she also owes fiduciary duties over and above any contractual obligations. As will be discussed, the precise nature of many of the fiduciary obligations owed by that trustee will be defined by that contract. A professional trustee will only agree to act if sufficient limitations on her potential liability for breach of duty are included in the contract.²⁰ In consequence, the professional trustee will be authorised to take a commission from the management of the fund and the trustee’s general obligations to achieve the best possible return for the fund will be circumscribed by a contractual variation on the usual legend ‘this investment may go down as well as up’. In all of the situations, there will also be another kind of obligation owed beyond that of contract.

In consequence, when considering the nature of fiduciary obligations, it will frequently be necessary to examine the context to decide precisely what those fiduciary obligations mean in that particular situation. Such an atomisation of fiduciary obligations into particular factual circumstances contributes to our difficulty in defining precisely what is meant by labelling someone as a fiduciary. We return to the general ideas of good faith and loyalty outlined above for a more general understanding of what it means to be a fiduciary. A beneficiary is entitled (in the legal sense of having a ‘right’) to expect that the fiduciary will not permit that beneficiary to suffer loss. So, where does that insight take us? It means that the fiduciary responsibility is something greater than either contractual or tortious liability, even though the content of the fiduciary liability may be limited by the fiduciary’s express contractual refusal to adopt certain forms of liability. To be a fiduciary attracts liability for all loss suffered by the beneficiary and is not restricted simply to contractually anticipated forms of loss or even to the tests of causation and remoteness of damage under the duty of care in the tort of negligence. The following section examines the particular benefits which result from successfully identifying a defendant as owing fiduciary duties to a claimant.

18 Henderson v Merrett Syndicates [1995] 2 AC 145 at 206.

19 Whether under a resulting trust or a constructive trust.

20 For the court’s willingness to accept the efficacy of such provisions, see Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241.

14.4 THE ADVANTAGES OF REMEDIES BASED ON FIDUCIARY RESPONSIBILITY

The responsibilities of the fiduciary are based on a standard of utmost good faith in general terms. The older case law took the straightforward attitude that if there were any loss suffered by a beneficiary then the fiduciary would be strictly liable for that loss.²¹ This attitude has been promulgated by the decisions in *Regal v Gulliver*²² (concerning directors of a company) and *Boardman v Phipps*²³ (concerning a solicitor advising trustees), which imposed strict liability for all unauthorised gains made by the fiduciaries deriving, however obliquely, from their fiduciary duty.

The company directors in Regal were prevented from making a profit from a business opportunity which it was felt by the court ought to have been exploited on behalf of the company rather than on behalf of the directors personally. At one level this personal gain for the directors constituted a fraud on the shareholders, who might otherwise have benefited in increased dividends from the investment in question. In Boardman, the obligations of fiduciary office were extended to a solicitor using his own money to exploit an opportunity which the trust could not have taken and which the solicitor himself realised – the only nexus with the trust was the fact that he learned of the possibility while attending a meeting on behalf of his clients,²⁴ the trustees. Despite the tenuous link between the solicitor's personal profits and the proprietary rights of the beneficiaries (who had all benefited directly from the solicitor's skills), the court held that the strict rule against fiduciaries profiting from their office should be upheld. When a court of Equity asks for good faith it really does mean good faith.

We should also consider the instructive example of Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid,²⁵ in which a public official was required to hold property on constructive trust for an unestablished category of beneficiaries in circumstances in which that property had never belonged to any person who could possibly have been considered to be a claimant. The money used to bribe the Director of Public Prosecutions had only ever belonged to those whom the Director of Public Prosecutions had refused to prosecute. In some general sense the bribes were held on trust for the people or the government of Hong Kong. The niceties of trusts – that is, the need for title in property and for identified beneficiaries – were overlooked in the court's enthusiasm to find a justification for taking the proceeds of the bribes off the defendant.

There are two possible bases for this decision: disgorging an enrichment from the defendant who had clearly acted in bad faith, and punishing a wrong committed by that defendant which the criminal law in itself cannot punish sufficiently (that is, that the law of property is required to recover the proceeds of this particular crime). The difficulty remains that the enrichment disgorged from the defendant did not make restitution to the claimant for some direct proprietary loss suffered by the claimant. The bribes were not taken from the claimant (who was the succeeding Attorney-General suing on behalf of Hong Kong). The claimant's loss was as a victim of crime – the defendant's criminal refusal to prosecute criminals who paid him bribes. There is no properly restitutionary basis for this decision.

21 Keech v Sandford (1726) Sel Cas Ch 61.

22 [1967] 2 AC 134n.

23 [1967] 2 AC 46.

24 Together with the use of confidential information.

25 [1994] 1 AC 324, [1993] 3 WLR 1143.

Rather, the decision is to do with equity's moral condemnation of the defendant's unconscionable actions and with the nature of the fiduciary duty which the defendant owed to the people of Hong Kong.

The case of Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid,²⁶ considered at length in Chapter 12, demonstrates two important facts of fiduciary responsibility. First, liability as a fiduciary can be imposed in entirely novel circumstances; there is no need to demonstrate a close analogy with any existing category of fiduciary. In Reid, there was no prior case law relating to the position of an Attorney-General, although there were cases relating to people in public office more generally defined (for example, the army sergeant in Reading v Attorney-General).²⁷ It would be disingenuous to suggest that Reid broke entirely new territory: rather, it resolved the long-running skirmish in the academic journals in relation to the legal treatment of bribes.²⁸ That a constructive trust was imposed was a novel departure for the law – albeit one well-trailed in the scholarly literature. That constructive trust was founded on equity's determination that that which ought to have been done is looked upon as having been done: in other words, that the bribes once received ought to have been held on trust from the moment of their receipt.

Secondly, the liability imposed on a trustee is not necessarily linked to any pre-existing relationship but may arise in relation to some subsequent act and relate only to that act. The liability imposed on the defendant in Reid was imposed not only in relation to property used in breach of the fiduciary duty, but also in relation to an obligation to make good any loss on the investment of such property. The strict nature of fiduciary liability was observed once again. Beyond any precise contractual obligations owed by the Director of Public Prosecutions to the government which employed him, there were the fiduciary obligations of a constructive trust in the receipt of the bribes alone – that action of receipt of a bribe generated fiduciary obligations (to hold the bribes on constructive trust) from that moment onwards.²⁹ Boardman was a slightly different situation, because the solicitor was already in a fiduciary relationship to his client before making unauthorised profits; although it could be argued that the constructive trust was a new aspect to those fiduciary obligations once the unauthorised profits had been made.

The beneficiary acquires a range of equitable claims and remedies under the law on fiduciaries. The fiduciary will hold any property received in breach of some duty on trust for the beneficiary. That also grants the beneficiary rights to any property acquired with that original property, whether in the form of an income stream (such as dividends from shares) or in the form of substitute property (that is, a replacement capital asset). The beneficiary is also entitled to be compensated for any loss made by the fiduciary in dealing with property which was held on a constructive trust for the beneficiary as a result of some breach of duty. The beneficiary can acquire compound interest on any judgment received against the fiduciary for breach of duty. Furthermore, the general result of finding that the fiduciary is indeed a fiduciary is that everything is assumed against the fiduciary. This is what Boardman and Regal indicate: the fiduciary will always be liable for any loss suffered by the beneficiary and also responsible for generating the best possible return for that beneficiary. So one of the principal benefits of imposing fiduciary obligations on a defendant from the perspective of

26 Ibid.

27 [1951] 1 All ER 617.

28 Eg, Maudsley, 1959.

29 Cf Attorney-General v Blake [2000] 4 All ER 385.

the claimant is the creation of a virtual land of milk and honey in which the fiduciary owes everything to the beneficiary.

So what does this discussion tell us about the nature of established categories of fiduciary relationships? It tells us that fiduciary obligations will be said to arise in prescribed circumstances, but it also tells us that those obligations can be shaped and limited by agreement between the parties. It tells us that fiduciary obligations in the form of trusts implied by law can be imposed on defendants outside those well-established categories – generally with a purpose typically limited to dealings with specific property. It tells us that the courts will protect the interests of the beneficiaries to an extent which removes any possibility of harm being suffered by those beneficiaries or of the fiduciary being enriched. What is most important to note is that the fiduciary duty raises in the court a heightened suspicion of anything which may conceivably benefit the fiduciary without sufficient authorisation under cover of an abstract standard of good faith and loyalty.

The beneficiary rides in an equitable sedan chair borne by the fiduciary, cushioned against every bump in the road. Hence the difficulty in reaching any precise definition of the term ‘fiduciary’ – it is a deliberately fluid concept permitting of addition and atomisation. As such it is at one with the underlying theory advanced in this book of equity as constituting a means of ensuring fairness in individual cases in mitigation of potential injustices that would otherwise be caused by literal application of the common law.

14.5 SCOPE FOR THE DEVELOPMENT OF NEW CATEGORIES?

So much for the established categories of fiduciary: what of the future? The utility for the beneficiary of the fiduciary concept means that there will always be pressure in a common law system for further categories of fiduciary to be added, or for other relationships to be accepted as being closely analogous to fiduciary duties. Claimants will continue to press for new forms of relationship to be accepted as giving rise to fiduciary duties. The advantages of fiduciary status for the beneficiary have been set out above.

The principal question is: ‘how do we add to the categories of fiduciary liability?’ Perhaps this may also cause us to ask ‘how were the existing categories formulated and in what way can future additions be made?’ Such a change in the recognition of a particular category of person as a fiduciary for the first time will constitute a paradigm shift in the legal treatment of other defendants occupying the same position, because an entirely new range of remedies and structures become available to the claimant. So, for example, if one employer was accepted as occupying a fiduciary relationship in relation to her employees, that would potentially alter the legal relationship between all employers and all employees by granting employees a new range of remedies against their employers.

However, that is not to suggest that a change in the law will necessarily change the entirety of such a relationship. There will be some aspects of a relationship in which there will be fiduciary responsibilities and other aspects of the same relationship where there are not. An example taken from employment law would be the recognition that non-executive employees owe fiduciary responsibilities to their employers in relation to the treatment of confidential information and in relation to theft of the employer’s property, but not in relation to their ordinary duties which do not involve their employer’s property or confidential processes.³⁰

30 Hivac Ltd v Park Royal Scientific Investments Ltd [1946] Ch 169.

As considered above, fiduciary obligations may arise only in limited circumstances within any given relationship. A further example might be the recognition that there is a fiduciary obligation imposed on a solicitor in advising a client on matters of law and dealing with that client's money, but an absence of such fiduciary obligations on a solicitor when advising a client on her choice of hat: the former activity is clearly in furtherance of the particularly sensitive relationship between solicitor and client, whereas the latter is a purely personal interaction which bears no relation to their respective fiduciary duties.

Maybe our social mores require that certain forms of activity are recognised as being so important that fiduciary status follows, for example, the sensitive relationship of trustee to beneficiary or directors in relation to their company. That being the case, we must try to identify what forms of social need ought to be accepted in future as establishing fiduciary relationships.

As mentioned earlier, the other advantage of according fiduciary status to any particular relationship is that the relationship is redefined. The fiduciary is subjugated to the legal entitlements of the beneficiary. The fiduciary is obliged to consider the exercise of any of her powers in the light of the obligations generally imposed in favour of a beneficiary. The fiduciary becomes a person in whom the beneficiary is entitled to have faith – with all the delicacy that the law requires from such a simple faith. For example, the fiduciary is not entitled to act in the pursuit of her own interests if she is also a fiduciary for the other person. Rather, the fiduciary is precluded from making any unauthorised personal gain from the relationship. Furthermore, the remedies available to the beneficiary accord with the trust-based and strict liability obligations considered above. Akin to Reid, the fiduciary runs the risk of being made liable both to disgorge any enrichment from the relationship and to account for all loss suffered by the beneficiary.

Mortgagee–mortgagor

A mortgagee acquires extensive powers of repossession and sale of mortgaged property, as discussed in Chapter 23. The right of repossession is said to obtain even before the ink is dry on the mortgage contract,³¹ whereas the statutory power of sale does not obtain until the mortgagor has been in breach of the mortgage agreement or is in arrears for at least two months on payments of interest.³² The question which arises in the cases is the precise nature of the obligations, if any, which are imposed on the mortgagee when exercising the statutory power of sale. The common law has long accepted that the mortgagee owes no fiduciary obligations to the mortgagor in exercising this power of sale.³³ The only fiduciary obligation arises when the property has been sold, when the mortgagee is deemed to hold the sale proceeds as trustee to discharge the expenses of the sale, then the mortgage debt and finally to transfer any surplus to the mortgagor.

In a departure from this line of authority it was accepted in *Palk v Mortgage Securities*³⁴ by Nicholls VC that the mortgagee owes duties which are ‘analogous to fiduciary duties’ when both refusing to sell the property and dealing with that property prior to any future sale in a manner which is oppressive of the mortgagor. In Palk, the mortgagee refused to consent

31 Four Maids v Dudley Marshall [1957] Ch 317.

32 Law of Property Act 1925, s 103.

33 Cuckmere Brick v Mutual Finance [1971] Ch 949.

34 [1993] 2 WLR 415.

to a sale at a time of low property prices until the value of the property rose to match the amount owing to the mortgagee. In consequence the debt owed by the mortgagor, who was unable to repay the mortgage, rose by about £30,000 annually, with no end then in sight given the depressed state of the property market at the time. His Lordship considered this situation to be oppressive of the mortgagor and so ordered a sale of the property.

What is interesting is precisely what Nicholls VC meant by finding that the obligation of the mortgagee was analogous to that of a fiduciary. A fiduciary would have been unable to profit from the relationship except in so far as contract permitted. Therefore, the mortgagee would have been entitled to receive interest payments and repayment of the capital but not to make any excess profits. It could be argued that waiting until the value of the house rose to be able to meet the mortgage debt would not have been to generate an excess profit but only a profit permitted by the mortgage contract. What the mortgagee would have been obliged to do as a fiduciary would have been to act in the best interests of the mortgagor: that is, to prevent the debt escalating year on year while both parties waited for the property market to improve. Here the obligation on the quasi-fiduciary is focused solely on avoiding taking action that would have been oppressive of the beneficiary of that duty. As such it falls some way short of the sensitivity evident in cases considered hereto.

Doctor–patient

The relationship of doctor and patient (in circumstances in which the doctor is treating the patient for some medical complaint) is one of particular sensitivity. The clearest disparity between the two is that the doctor has all the knowledge of medicine which most patients will not. Consequently, the patient is particularly dependent on the doctor. Furthermore, the patient is usually ill when consulting a doctor, and therefore bears anxieties and weaknesses over and above the usual imbalance of power between a person with technical knowledge and a person without such knowledge.³⁵

Bearing that context in mind, the law is confronted by a difficulty when resolving disputes between doctor and patient. The law of tort usually resolves questions to do with misdiagnosis or mistreatment under the heading of medical negligence and through the doctrine of the ‘best interests’ of the patient.³⁶ These approaches have a number of shortcomings. In practice such litigation will settle if the doctor has clearly been negligent, but in more marginal cases the individual litigant will have to face the powerful interests of the NHS trusts. That disparity in expertise, knowledge and access to evidence is exacerbated in particular if the claimant cannot obtain legal aid or negotiate a suitable conditional fee arrangement.

The question is then whether the imperfections of the law of tort could be remedied by developing a conception of the doctor as owing fiduciary obligations to the patient. In an insightful survey of this area, Kennedy sets out those common law jurisdictions in North America which accept that the doctor–patient relationship is a fiduciary relationship in some circumstances. In those jurisdictions it is typically in relation to the question whether or not the doctor must give information to the patient that fiduciary obligations are imposed. The rationale for the imposition of fiduciary obligations is that the law of tort will not impose affirmative obligations (for example, an obligation to give information to the patient on which informed consent to treatment can be reached) but fiduciary obligations do impose such affirmative obligations.³⁷

³⁵ Kennedy, 1996.

³⁶ Ibid.

In English law the doctor–patient relationship is not a fiduciary one.³⁸ This is so even in relation to confidentiality which would usually connote a fiduciary responsibility,³⁹ as has been apparently accepted in Canada,⁴⁰ although this has been doubted by judges in Australia.⁴¹ As Kennedy explains, these developments in the law relating to confidentiality in the Commonwealth are examples of equity seeking to provide a remedy where none would otherwise exist – that is, for example, in preventing the doctor from disclosing confidential patient information (perhaps by injunction) and by compensating such disclosure.⁴² Quoting Sopinka J in International Corona Resources Ltd v LAC Minerals Ltd,⁴³ ‘fiduciary obligation must be reserved for situations that are truly in need of the special protection which equity offers’. This is perhaps the acid test for future developments in the field of fiduciary liability.

Employer–employee

In general terms, company directors will owe fiduciary duties to the company not to, for example, make personal profits or divert contracts which the company could have exploited to their own personal gain.⁴⁴ The legal treatment of more junior employees is not so straightforward. Clearly, any employee would be liable for assisting in a breach of trust in, for example, diverting assets owned by the employer to a competitor.⁴⁵ Employees will also be restricted qua fiduciaries from sharing confidential information owned by the employer with competitors or other persons. That liability will attach more easily to expert employees with knowledge of the employer’s secret processes or know-how, than to employees without access to such material.⁴⁶ This is said to form part of a general duty of fidelity⁴⁷ which Lord Greene MR considered to be an implied term of the employment contract,⁴⁸ and even extends to preventing an employee from working in her spare time in a manner which would cause harm to her employer. Breach of this duty can be remedied by dismissal of the employee if the action constitutes a sufficiently material breach of the contract of employment⁴⁹ over and above the more general remedies considered above. The liability of that employee will depend on the precise terms of that person’s employment contract and the general law relating to the employer’s ability to restrain the employee’s trade by including a term in the contract preventing that employee from working for competitors for a specified period of time.

Beyond these particular contexts, are there fiduciary duties created by the contract of employment simpliciter? This raises two issues. First, does the employee owe general duties

37 Canterbury v Spence (1972) 464 F 2d 772; Reibl v Hughes (1980) 114 DLR (3d) 1.

38 Sidaway v Governors of Bethlem Royal Hospital [1984] 1 QB 515.

39 Kennedy, 1996, 123.

40 McInerney v McDonald (1992) 93 DLR (4th) 415; Norberg v Wyrinb (1992) 92 DLR (4th) 449.

41 Breen v Williams (1996) 70 ALJR 772.

42 Kennedy, 1996, 130.

43 (1989) 2 SCR 574, 596.

44 Regal v Gulliver [1942] 1 All ER 378, [1967] 2 AC 134n; Horcal v Gatland [1983] IRLR 459.

45 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378.

46 Hivac Ltd v Park Royal Scientific Investments Ltd [1946] Ch 169.

47 Adamson v B & L Cleaning Services [1995] IRLR 193.

48 Hivac Ltd v Park Royal Scientific Investments Ltd [1946] Ch 169, 174.

49 Boston Deep Sea Fishing Co Ltd v Ansell (1888) 39 Ch D 339.

to the employer as a fiduciary always to do the best for the employer? This would extend, in theory, to liability for lost production on each illicitly taken sick-day when not really ill, or for each personal telephone call made from the employer's telephone.⁵⁰ In consequence, it would seem that there will be fiduciary liability only in the limited contexts outlined above. Secondly, does the employer owe fiduciary duties to the employee, for example, to safeguard her employment or to make the largest possible profit to pay to her in bonuses? The short answer is: no. The law does not accept a general fiduciary duty owed by the employer to the employee at all. The employer is free to fire the employee at will under the principles attaching to fiduciaries (for example, to do the best for the beneficiary) and is constrained only by the laws on unfair dismissal and so forth which are outside the purview of equity.

Abuser–abused

This particular context relates to the uncomfortable subject of the sexual abuse of children. The question arises whether or not there is any remedy which the law can provide for the victim of such abuse against the abuser. Part of the uncomfortable nature of this topic in this particular context should be examined at the outset. Namely, is it appropriate for the law to seek to provide a remedy based on financial equitable compensation or common law damages in an effort to 'compensate' the victim of such abuse as though money could somehow remove that problem? What is being suggested here is not an apology or a cure-all but rather a form of contribution which the law could make to the activities which the victim may be required to undertake as part of the process of coping with a history of abuse.

First, let us consider the alternative to fiduciary liability. The tort of battery would provide for cash damages in relation to out-of-pocket loss. Similarly, the tort of negligence would require breach of a duty of care. Both remedies would require two things. First, proof that the loss suffered flowed directly from the actions of the defendant. In relation to the possibility of many years of psychiatric treatment, it might not be easy to demonstrate how much of the expenditure constituted a loss flowing directly from the actions of the defendant. Secondly, there would be the problem of estimating the likely future expense from the date of trial.

In relation to the development of fiduciary law into the realm of sexual abuse, it would seem most straightforward to facilitate this development in cases involving parents and their own children, on the basis that equity has accepted a fiduciary responsibility between parent and child from the early development of the presumptions of advancement in Bennet v Bennet.⁵¹ Where the provenance of this new form of liability is more problematic is in relation to abuse by persons other than the victim's parents, where those parents were not necessarily in a position to prevent such abuse from occurring. A further issue may be caused by different intensities of abuse, or between contexts in which that abuse has occurred for longer or shorter periods of time. It is contended that if we do accept that fiduciary liability ought to exist between an adult who abuses and a child who suffers that abuse, then the natural flexibility in the law relating to fiduciaries ought to be able to define the particular duties owed and remedies resulting in any set of circumstances.

50 The cartoonist Scott Adams has a suitable response for overworked employees in the 21st century when confronted with complaints about making personal phone calls: that is to invoice the employer for all the unpaid overtime usually put in by the employee.

51 (1879) 10 Ch D 474.

Related issues were raised in Sidaway v Governors of Bethlem Royal Hospital,⁵² in which the Court of Appeal suggested that English law would only use fiduciary liability to protect the economic interests of claimants and not to protect them, for example, from sexual exploitation. The reluctance of English law to develop in this direction will result from the fact, which I freely acknowledge, that this context is far from the paradigm case of the fiduciary: that is, the trustee holding property on the terms of an express trust. What may seem particularly objectionable in this approach is the determination of the courts to protect claimants' property rights and financial interests but not to look to the protection of the claimant's long-term medical, psychiatric and welfare interests by means of identical remedies. Thus, if X was sexually abused by her trustee and also had her trust fund looted by that same trustee, X would have an action in equity for recovery of her lost money but not for the cost of future treatment or any resultant personal difficulties stemming from the abuse. It should be remembered that the criminal law will punish the trustee but it will not make any strides towards compensating X.

The primary advantage of the creation of a fiduciary obligation in English law to cater for such situations would be that equity has a lower threshold of liability in such circumstances. As considered above, the fiduciary becomes almost strictly liable for all loss flowing from his actions once fiduciary liability is accepted. The important corollary is the obligation on the fiduciary 'to do the best possible' for the beneficiary – which offers a broader range of liabilities than that contained within the narrowness of the duty of care.⁵³ While vulnerability will not in itself found fiduciary liability,⁵⁴ it is suggested that a breach of a relationship of trust (in the vernacular sense of that term) should found such a liability. As such, in line with the dicta of Sopinka J in *International Corona Resources Ltd v LAC Minerals Ltd*⁵⁵ that 'fiduciary obligation must be reserved for situations that are truly in need of the special protection which equity offers', this context could be said to be one in which fiduciary liability would permit a new form of remedy for an aspect of our lives which (while anticipated by the early works of Freud) appears to claim an ever more significant part of our understanding of human biographies.

14.6 CONCLUSIONS – THE TRADITIONAL CONTEXT

In a powerful essay, Professor Hayton suggests that the fiduciary liability provided by equity should not be used simply as a 'firefighter' in cases in which common law principles of contract and tort will not provide sufficient remedy.⁵⁶ Rather, it is said that equity and the common law should proceed on principled bases and not in a way that leads to equitable ideas being 'bandied about in common law courts as though the Chancellor still had only the length of his own foot to measure when coming to a conclusion'.⁵⁷

Professor Hayton does end his essay on a forward-looking note by suggesting that 'the "survival of the fittest" mentality of the common law is appropriate for a capitalist society dedicated to economic efficiency but in today's more caring and European-law-influenced

52 [1984] 1 QB 515, 519.

53 As considered generally in Chapter 8.

54 Mabo v Queensland (No 2) (1992) 175 CLR 1.

55 (1989) 2 SCR 574, 596.

56 Hayton, 1997.

57 Campbell Discount Co Ltd v Bridge [1961] 1 QB 445, 459, per Harman LJ.

times such mentality needs to change'.⁵⁸ In Chapter 17, we will compare human rights thinking (drawing on a European jurisprudence) with the traditional attitudes of equity. What we will see is that the sort of concentration on property rights which has prevented many of the possible developments in the law on fiduciaries may be displaced by other ideological totems, such as the right to a family life and to integrity of the person which are contained in the European Convention on Human Rights. While the Human Rights Act 1998 did not include the usual commitment under the European Convention on Human Rights to ensure that domestic law provides protection for all rights contained in the Convention, it is likely that the angle of attack on the development of equitable principles in areas such as the family, the family home and integrity of the person will switch now to the language of human rights. For that reason, a discussion of the conservative approach to equity-as-fire-fighter must be postponed until we have examined trusts over the home and human rights to property and a family life in the following chapters.

⁵⁸ Hayton, 1997.

Part 5

Equity, trusts and the home

This page intentionally left blank

Trusts of homes

15.1	INTRODUCTION	704
15.1.1	Understanding the legal treatment of the home	704
15.1.2	A survey: a taste of what is to come	704
15.1.3	The social context of the law	705
15.1.4	The principles set out in Stack v Dowden and in Jones v Kernott	706
15.1.5	The approach taken in this chapter	708
15.2	EXPRESS TRUSTS OF HOMES	710
15.3	RESULTING TRUSTS AND THE EMERGENCE OF COMMON INTENTION	711
15.3.1	Traditional resulting trust principles	711
15.3.2	The birth of common intention	713
15.3.3	The central text	715
15.4	CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS – ACQUISITION OF EQUITABLE INTERESTS BY CONDUCT OR AGREEMENT	717
15.4.1	Foundations of the common intention constructive trust	717
15.4.2	Lloyds Bank v Rosset – the common intention constructive trust	719
15.4.3	Application of the common intention constructive trust concept	725
15.4.4	The difficulties with a strict application of the Rosset test	729
15.5	THE BALANCE SHEET APPROACH	731
15.5.1	Introduction	731
15.5.2	Calculating the size of the equitable interest	731
15.5.3	What can be taken into account?	733
15.6	THE FAMILY ASSETS APPROACH	740
15.6.1	Explaining the approach	740
15.6.2	Where equality is equity	741
15.6.3	Communal undertakings	743
15.7	PROPRIETARY ESTOPPEL	744
15.7.1	The test underlying the doctrine of proprietary estoppel	745
15.7.2	The nature of the interest awarded under proprietary estoppel	749
15.7.3	The nature of the remedies awarded under proprietary estoppel	750

15.8	THE UNCONSCIONABILITY APPROACH	753
15.8.1	The nature of the unconscionability approach	753
15.8.2	The consensual approach taken in Oxley v Hiscock	755
15.8.3	Proprietary estoppel and unconscionability: Jennings v Rice	758
15.8.4	Seeking fairness in all the circumstances: Cox v Jones	759
15.8.5	A model of the general constructive trust combined with the common intention constructive trust	762
15.8.6	The ‘excuses’ cases: rights not based on common intention	763
15.9	THE PRINCIPLES IN STACK v DOWDEN AND JONES v KERNOTT	764
15.9.1	Introduction	764
15.9.2	What the House of Lords decided in Stack v Dowden	764
15.9.3	What the House of Lords did not decide in Stack v Dowden	766
15.9.4	Who agreed with whom about what in Stack v Dowden	766
15.9.5	The legacy of Stack v Dowden and Jones v Kernott	773
15.9.6	The development of the principles in Stack v Dowden in subsequent cases	774
15.9.7	The decision in Jones v Kernott	777
15.9.8	Three persistent problems	784
15.9.9	(1) Real property, real relationships and real people	784
15.9.10	(2) Imputation, inference and judge-made decisions	788
15.9.11	(3) The last resort: going to the fair	789
15.10	DIFFERENT APPROACHES ELSEWHERE IN THE COMMONWEALTH	789
15.10.1	Canada and ‘unjust enrichment’	790
15.10.2	Australia and ‘unconscionability’	791
15.11	TRENDS IN THE ACADEMIC DISCUSSION OF TRUSTS OF HOMES	793
15.11.1	Framing the problem	793
15.11.2	Conceptual issues with the common intention constructive trust	793
15.11.3	Answering a problem question on the law on trusts of homes	799
15.11.4	Conclusions – rethinking the law on trusts of homes	800

OVERVIEW

Where there has been an express trust declared over land, the terms of that trust will be decisive of the division of the equitable interest in land.¹ Such a declaration of trust must satisfy s 53(1)(b) of the Law of Property Act 1925.

*If there is no express trust declared the courts will look for the common intention of the parties as to the equitable ownership of the home. The decision of the majority of the Supreme Court in Jones v Kernott, as it interpreted the earlier decision of the majority* of the House of Lords in Stack v Dowden, held that where the legal title is in joint names, there will be a presumption that the equitable interest is similarly held jointly; whereas if the legal title is held in one person's sole name, then the presumption will be that that person is the sole owner of the equitable interest. Either presumption may be rebutted. If the facts do not disclose a clear common intention then the court will seek objectively to infer a common intention from the evidence; but if that evidence is not conclusive then the court will seek to achieve fairness between the parties. Ordinarily, a resulting trust will no longer be used in this regard. The previous case law has not been overruled and therefore will still be significant in relation to establishing a common intention or in establishing what constitutes a fair outcome.

¹ Goodman v Gallant [1986] Fam 106; Re Gorman [1990] 1 WLR 616; Harwood v Harwood [1991] 2 FLR 274.

The position established in Lloyds Bank v Rosset in the earlier House of Lords' decision was as follows: where the parties have formed an agreement, arrangement or understanding as to the beneficial ownership of the home then the court will give effect to that common intention by means of constructive trust or proprietary estoppel ('common intention constructive trust' by agreement) if the claimant has also suffered detriment.² The second means, in the absence of an agreement, will be to give effect to the common intention of the parties where the claimant has contributed to the purchase price of the property or to the mortgage instalments, again by way of 'constructive trust or proprietary estoppel' ('a common intention constructive trust by conduct').³

However, this approach in Lloyds Bank v Rosset had not commanded complete obedience in the lower courts nor did it accord with preceding doctrine. Thus, some Court of Appeal decisions held that where a person contributed to the purchase price of the home, an amount of the total equitable interest proportionate to the size of the contribution would be held on resulting trust for that person.⁴

Alternative Court of Appeal decisions developed two further approaches. First, a balance sheet approach based on resulting trust which favours a measurement of financial contributions over the life of a relationship to calculate proportionate equitable rights in the home.⁵ Secondly a family assets approach, akin to the approach of a family court in divorce proceedings, which undertakes a survey of the parties' entire course of dealing – thus going far beyond the approach in Lloyds Bank v Rosset – which suggested that property should be deemed to be held equally between couples.⁶

The doctrine of proprietary estoppel will grant an equitable interest to a person who has been induced to suffer detriment in reliance on a representation that she would acquire some rights in the property as a result.⁷ Proprietary estoppel is a remedial doctrine whereby the court may award any one of a number of rights ranging from the entire freehold through to merely equitable compensation in money.⁸

2 Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1991] 1 AC 107; Ivin v Blake [1995] 1 FLR 70.

3 Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1991] 1 AC 107.

4 Dyer v Dyer (1788) 2 Cox Eq Cas 92; Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

5 Springette v Defoe [1992] 2 FLR 388; Huntingford v Hobbs [1993] 1 FLR 736; McHardy v Warren [1994] 2 FLR 338.

6 Hammond v Mitchell [1991] 1 WLR 1127; Midland Bank v Cooke [1995] 4 All ER 562.

7 Taylor Fashions Ltd v Liverpool Victoria Trustees Co Ltd [1982] 1 QB 133; Re Basham (Deceased) [1986] 1 WLR 1498; Wayling v Jones (1993) 69 P & CR 170; Gillett v Holt [2000] 2 All ER 289.

8 Crabb v Arun DC [1976] Ch 179; Baker v Baker (1993) 25 HLR 408.

*A more recent trend in the case law had been to develop an approach based on avoiding unconscionability if the defendant were permitted to deny the claimant an equitable interest in the property.⁹ These cases tended to seek first an agreement between the parties and then secondly to undertake a survey of the entire course of dealing between the parties. The ultimate aim is to reach a 'fair' result and to supply the parties with a common intention if that is necessary, an approach which has the tacit approval of Stack v Dowden. This is an uncomfortable fusion of the preceding doctrines. This approach also seeks to fuse constructive trusts with proprietary estoppel.*

15.1 INTRODUCTION

15.1.1 Understanding the legal treatment of the home

There can be few more psychologically loaded concepts than that of the home. As the anthropology of property law, and indeed the whole sweep of human history, demonstrates there are few things more important to human beings than land. The means by which access to land and protection of rights to use land are provided constitute a central part of all world cultures. Under English law, the legal treatment of trusts of land, specifically in relation to family homes, is particularly vexed: so much so that the subject commands its own individual treatment in this Part 5 of the book. The treatment of the family home is clearly of enormous sociological, political, economic, spiritual and psychological importance in any system of law – that is quite a list.

15.1.2 A survey: a taste of what is to come

What will emerge from this discussion is that the treatment of resulting trusts and of constructive trusts in relation to the home is very different from that discussed in Chapters 11 and 12 respectively. Resulting and constructive trusts are said in the cases to arise on the basis of strict principles of law, acting retrospectively and imposing institutional trusts.¹⁰ That strict trusts law approach then falls to be compared with proprietary estoppel, which is a remedial doctrine capable of providing a range of proprietary and personal remedies at the discretion of the court which are prospective and which do not impose institutional trusts.¹¹ The development of the 'common intention constructive trust' in this area is a unique one which is specific to the socially sensitive treatment of the family home.¹² The common intention constructive trust plays fast and loose with a mixture of concepts borrowed from resulting trusts, constructive trusts and proprietary estoppel.¹³

9 See variously Jennings v Rice [2002] EWCA Civ 159; Oxley v Hiscock [2004] 3 All ER 703; Stack v Dowden [2005] EWCA Civ 857, [2006] 1 FLR 254 and other cases referred to in the chapter below.

10 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669; considered in Chapters 11 and 12.

11 Considered at section 15.7 below.

12 Gissing v Gissing [1971] AC 886; Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1990] 1 AC 107.

13 Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1990] 1 AC 107.

15.1.3 The social context of the law

The social context

The right to occupy the home is an issue about which everyone has opinions, whether a lawyer or not. With the regular diet of soap operas, kitchen sink dramas and tabloid sensations which occupy our popular culture, we are all aware of the sorts of issues which accompany battles for rights in the home, whether by relationship breakdown, death, birth or otherwise. In dealing with the legal issues which follow in Part 5, we should never lose sight of the human dramas which are played out beyond the concepts which are used in the courtroom.

The most common set of circumstances which arises in the cases is that of a couple who have occupied a home and run through the gamut of human experiences: children, redundancy, riches, poverty, and separation. In these situations it is difficult to know who should acquire rights in the home either to prevent third parties from purchasing it, or to prevent mortgagees from repossessing it, or to decide between the couple whether the property should be sold or whether a part of the family unit should continue to live in it. As we shall see, the trust is the legal mechanism used in English law to allocate property rights in the home. Typically, those rights will revolve around the amount of money that is contributed to the purchase of the property, or to its maintenance throughout the relationship. At the back of our minds, it will be important to recognise a central issue as to whether or not it is right that financial contributions are the only form of contribution which ought to count in many circumstances, because that is typically the basis on which such property rights are allocated.¹⁴

In short, the law relating to the home is an extraordinary mixture of these ingredients. The case law relating to trusts of homes appears to be very complicated because different judges have such different views on how the law should operate. The many available doctrines become tangled up with one another to such an extent that they often defy tidy categorisation. The discussion in this chapter follows what is considered by this writer to be a combination of the classical and most comprehensible divisions between the doctrines. At the end of the chapter the academic discussion is drawn together of the law's treatment of rights in the home, and some of the broader questions are introduced.

Cohabitees – a neutral expression

This area of law potentially covers relationships as distinct as married couples; unmarried couples with children in permanent relationships; heterosexual couples who have for the sake of convenience taken to living together, as much out of sexual desire as anything else, but who have no firm intention of establishing a permanent relationship; homosexual couples in similar senses; or people who are simply sharing accommodation which they have bought communally. Between these various core intentions are millions of shades of possible other intentions. Children conceived by accident, couples thrown together out of circumstances, doomed relationships wracked by illness, or poverty or bad luck: all fall to be discussed by the law. Chaos is not so much a feature of the law as of the circumstances on which the court is asked to rule.¹⁵ This chapter will use the term ‘cohabitees’ as a deliberately neutral term which can encapsulate all of the foregoing possible types of relationship.¹⁶

¹⁴ Burns v Burns [1984] Ch 317; Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1990] 1 AC 107.

15.1.4 The principles set out in Stack v Dowden and in Jones v Kernott

This section sets out the principles which have been set out in the recent leading cases in this area. Because those principles necessarily require familiarity with the earlier case law (which has not been overruled for the most part), this chapter sets out these principles briefly here, before analysing the trends in the earlier case law and the concepts to which they gave rise, and then drawing everything together with a more detailed analysis of these leading cases in section 15.9 below.

The principles set out by Lady Hale in Stack v Dowden

There have been two decisions of the highest court in this area in recent years: by the House of Lords in *Stack v Dowden*¹⁷ and by the Supreme Court in Jones v Kernott.¹⁸ The decision in Jones v Kernott was concerned primarily with interpreting Stack v Dowden and attempting to iron out problems which had emerged in the cases which had followed Stack v Dowden. This section sets out the key principles from those cases. However, the decision in *Stack v Dowden*¹⁹ has had only a marginal effect on the detail of the law on trusts of homes in the sense that very little in the previous case law has been overruled. What we have as a result of Jones v Kernott is a central statement of the principles which should be applied in the future set out by Lady Hale and by Lord Walker in a joint judgment, which still permits the use of many of the old case law doctrines to define what might constitute a ‘common intention’ or ‘fairness’ between the parties. Therefore, this section will summarise the key principles set out in Stack v Dowden and Jones v Kernott – which draw on a variety of concepts from earlier cases and which are a response to those earlier cases – before proceeding through those earlier cases and coming chronologically to Stack and to Kernott.

There are three core principles which were established in Stack v Dowden in the judgment of Lady Hale: the detail of the decision in that case is considered below in section 15.9. First, if there is a valid express trust created over land, then that express trust will be decisive of the parties’ equitable interests in that property, assuming that there is no common intention to the contrary between the parties. Secondly, if only one of the parties is entered on the legal title of property, then there is a presumption that the equitable interest in the property is held by that person. Thirdly, if more than one of the parties is entered on the legal title of the property, then there is a presumption that the equitable interest in the property is held by the parties in equal shares.

15 Dewar, 1998.

16 There is a better term used in the television series The Beiderbecke Affair, written by Alan Plater, where the unmarried couple who act as the ironic heroes (played by James Bolam and Barbara Flynn) refer to themselves as ‘spousal analogues’, by which they mean that they are not married but their relationship is analogous to a marriage.

17 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831. A casenote on the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Stack v Dowden is on my personal website (www.alastairhudson.com/trustslawindex.htm).

18 [2011] UKSC 53, [2011] 3 WLR 1121.

19 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831. A casenote on the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Stack v Dowden is on my personal website (www.alastairhudson.com/trustslawindex.htm).

Importantly, these presumptions can be rebutted by evidence to the contrary that the parties' 'common intention' was something else. To rebut those presumptions, we are required to consider the law before Stack v Dowden because the House of Lords in Stack v Dowden did not overrule the bulk of those earlier cases, and because that earlier case law set out different understandings of what the term 'common intention' might involve. That the presumption can be rebutted by evidence that the ownership of the legal title did not reflect the parties' common intention has been accepted explicitly by the Court of Appeal.²⁰ The presence of a common intention will be important even where there may otherwise appear to be a good conveyance of a home at common law. Just because someone receives a conveyance of property to herself alone, that will not defeat an agreement between that person and others that some other person is to have an equitable interest in that land.²¹ The earlier cases are frequently in contradiction to one another. It was held by Lord Walker and Lady Hale in Jones v Kernott that the court should seek to 'objectively infer the intentions of the parties' by reference to the evidence that does exist. If the evidence is not conclusive as to the parties' common intention, then further to the joint judgment of Lord Walker and Lady Hale in Jones v Kernott, the court will consider what would be 'fair' between the parties in the light of the evidence.

The core principles set out by the Supreme Court in Jones v Kernott

The decision of the Supreme Court in *Jones v Kernott*²² attempted to clarify the judgment of Lady Hale in Stack v Dowden (in particular by reference to whether the court could impute or merely infer a common intention from the parties' conduct). Lord Walker and Lady Hale delivered a joint judgment, with each of the other members of the Supreme Court delivering judgments in slightly different terms, as is set out in detail below in section 15.9.7.

Lord Kerr attempted to identify the principles which had been agreed between the members of the Supreme Court. That summary is set out here, with the detail of the various judgments being considered in section 15.9.7 below:²³

(i) In joint names cases [where the legal title in the property is put into joint names], the starting point is that equity follows the law [such that the parties are deemed to be joint owners of the equitable interest]. One begins the search for the proper allocation of shares in the property with the presumption that the parties are joint tenants and are thus entitled to equal shares.

This means that where the legal title in the property has been put in the joint names of the parties then it is presumed that parties will own the equitable interest jointly. This presumption can be rebutted on the following terms:

(ii) That presumption can be displaced by showing (a) that the parties had a different common intention at the time when they acquired the home or (b) that they later formed the common intention that their respective shares would change.

20 Laskar v Laskar [2008] EWCA Civ 347, [2008] 2 FLR 589. See Hollis v Rolfe [2008] EWHC 1747 (Ch) applying the presumptions.

21 Bannister v Bannister [1948] 2 All ER 133; Staden v Jones [2008] EWCA Civ 936, [2008] 2 FLR 1931.

22 [2011] UKSC 53, [2011] 3 WLR 1121, [2011] 3 FCR 495.

23 [2011] UKSC 53, [2011] 3 WLR 1121, [2011] 3 FCR 495, at [68].

The rebuttal of the presumption can take effect either before purchase or at a later date. Resulting trusts focused on the parties' financial contributions are relegated from their primacy in earlier cases. What is unclear here, significantly, is what sort of common intention would be required to rebut this presumption after the purchase, especially given that the parties are likely to present different evidence at trial if equitable ownership is contested between them. The question then is as to the way in which the common intention is to be identified. There was a great deal of discussion at the hearing (and a lot of discussion in the judgments in the Supreme Court) as to whether the court could impute an intention to the parties or whether the court must simply infer such an intention from the actual intentions of the parties. As his Lordship put it:

- (iii) The common intention, if it can be inferred, is to be deduced objectively from the parties' conduct.

This complex idea means that a subjective intention is impossible to prove definitively, and therefore the court must rely on evidence such as documentation, proof of any discussion the parties had as to their equitable rights (whether through e-mail, text or evidence of personal conversations), much of which will be contested between the witnesses, and so forth. Moreover, the ways in which the parties conduct themselves, what each party pays for (including the mortgage and other household outgoings), how the parties organise their living arrangements, and so forth, will all be conduct suggesting their intentions as to the equitable ownership of the property. In that sense, what the parties must have intended is deduced objectively from the parties' conduct because it throws light on what the parties must have intended. In many cases where the evidence is inconclusive, the court will have recourse to the final principle of fairness:

- (iv) Where the intention as to the division of the property cannot be inferred, each is entitled to that share which the court considers fair. In considering the question of what is fair the court should have regard to the whole course of dealing between the parties.

Thus, ultimately, the court will have to have recourse to what is 'fair' between the parties. This will require, it is suggested, that the courts will potentially have recourse to all of the earlier authorities considered in this chapter in deciding what constitutes fairness between the parties. It should be recalled that Stack v Dowden overruled very little case law explicitly and the same is true of the decision in Jones v Kernott. Therefore, aside from setting out the presumptions above and giving an order to the questions which the courts will ask, these two decisions have effected very little change in circumstances in which the parties are in disagreement and the evidence is inconclusive.

15.1.5 The approach taken in this chapter

The underlying thesis of this chapter is that it is not possible to reconcile the many cases on trusts of homes with one another. The aim of the claimant in each case is to establish as large an equitable interest in the home as possible, either because of a separation from a partner or because of a mortgagee seeking repossession of that home by a mortgagee or some other secured creditor. In line with traditional trusts law, it might have been possible before 1991 to divide between the express trusts law rules on acquisition of rights in the home, then the resulting trust rules, and then the constructive trust rules. However, since the decision of the House of Lords in Lloyds Bank v Rosset in 1991, there has been a splintering of the doctrines into many mini-doctrines. The aim of this chapter is to distinguish between them and to help to categorise them for you. Even after the judgments in Stack v Dowden and in Jones v Kernott, these contradictory currents in the earlier cases remain good law potentially. Each of them takes a position on what is meant by the parties' 'common intention' in this context. There are, I would suggest, six doctrines of importance. This is the order in which they are considered in this chapter.

First, if there has been an express trust created, then that express trust will be enforced. All of the other approaches assume no express trust has been created. If there is no express trust then there are two alternative presumptions: the first assumes that multiple ownership of the legal title presumes equal ownership of the equitable interest; whereas sole ownership of the legal title presumes sole ownership of the equitable interest. However, these presumptions can be rebutted by evidence supporting any of the following approaches.

Secondly, the strict, 'common intention' approach set out by the House of Lords in Lloyds Bank v Rosset looks either for an agreement between the parties or appropriate conduct to acquire an equitable interest, which means either contribution to the purchase price or payment of the mortgage instalments. This appeared to be a strict test but nevertheless most subsequent cases have refused to apply it scrupulously.

Thirdly, subsequent Court of Appeal cases have relied on resulting trust principles and concerned themselves only with the amount of money which each party has contributed to the property. Exceptionally, these resulting trusts may be adjusted to accommodate later work done on the property. This approach is referred to in this chapter as the 'balance sheet approach'.

Fourthly, a family court judge overlooked the niceties of the Lloyds Bank v Rosset test and instead undertook a survey of the parties' entire course of dealing, with the result that the property rights may be frequently divided equally between them. This approach is referred to as the 'family assets approach'. It has been influential on the subsequent cases.

Fifthly, proprietary estoppel is a remedial doctrine which permits the court to award any remedy it chooses (ranging from mere financial compensation through to the grant of the fee simple absolute in possession in the home) if the claimant has acted to her detriment in reliance on some representation made to her by the defendant. This doctrine is not considered in detail in Jones v Kernott but continues in rude health due to the decision of the House of Lords in Thorner v Major.

Sixthly, more recent cases have been concerned to avoid unconscionability. In doing so, the Court of Appeal in particular has sought to reconcile all of the preceding approaches. The courts are prepared to 'supply' the parties' common intention, and more generally to seek to achieve a 'fair' result. This is referred to in this chapter as the 'unconscionability approach'.

These approaches are radically different from one another and offer a fascinating study of the way in which a common law legal system can splinter into a number of different principles even when some of the judges are desperately seeking certainty. The decision of the Court of Appeal in Oxley v Hiscock attempted unconvincingly to reconcile these many approaches by requiring that the courts should impute a common intention to the parties, where it could not be proved to have been created expressly, by undertaking a survey of the parties' entire course of dealing and by doing what is fair. This approach was influential in Stack v Dowden and in Jones v Kernott, although not followed dogmatically. All of these cases should now be read in the light of Jones v Kernott.

The approach taken in the following discussion is to conduct a broadly chronological survey of the decided cases, but with those cases divided into their appropriate groups. We begin with the simplest case: where an express trust has been declared over the equitable interest in the property.

15.2 EXPRESS TRUSTS OF HOMES

Where there has been an express trust declared over land, the terms of that trust will be decisive of the division of the equitable interest in land. Such a declaration of trust must satisfy s 53(1)(b) of the Law of Property Act 1925.

When attempting to decide which of a number of co-owners is to acquire equitable rights in the home, the most straightforward factual situation is that where there has been an express declaration of trust dealing with the whole of the equitable interest in the land. Such a trust may arise under the terms of the conveyance of the property to the co-owners,²⁴ or as a result of an express declaration of trust between the parties,²⁵ or in a situation in which the property is provided for the co-owners under a pre-existing settlement.²⁶

The most straightforward authority in this context is the case of Goodman v Gallant,²⁷ where the conveyance of property included the express trust which allocated the entire equitable interest between the parties. The trust provided that the property was to be held on trust for the parties as joint tenants. The issue arose as to what interest each party had on the break-up of the relationship, given their differing financial contributions towards the property up to that time. It was held by the Court of Appeal that the express trust in the deed of conveyance was decisive of all of the interests of all parties to land, and therefore that the wife took a half of the interest in the property as the deed provided.²⁸ It was held by Slade LJ in Goodman v Gallant that:

If, however, the relevant conveyance contains an express declaration of trust which comprehensively declares the beneficial interests in the property or its proceeds of sale, there is no room for the application of the doctrine of resulting implied or constructive trusts unless and until the conveyance is set aside or rectified; until that event the declaration contained in the document speaks for itself.²⁹

In short, there is no need to consider any surrounding circumstances in the context in which the equitable interest in the property has been allocated between the parties on express trust.

24 Goodman v Gallant [1986] Fam 106. This principle was set out in Pettitt v Pettitt [1970] AC 777, at 813, per Lord Upjohn and Gissing v Gissing [1971] AC 886, at 905, per Lord Diplock, and has been accepted in cases such as Painter v Hutchison [2007] EWHC 758 (Ch), [2008] BPIR 170. An express trust created between parties establishing that the survivor would be absolutely entitled to the proceeds of sale would be enforced between a married couple and against third parties: Bindra v Chopra [2008] EWHC 1715, Smith J.

25 Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1990] 1 AC 107.

26 Pettitt v Pettitt [1970] AC 777.

27 [1986] FLR 513; Re Gorman [1990] 1 WLR 616; Harwood v Harwood [1991] 2 FLR 274. A solicitor may even be negligent where she does not ensure that she has properly recorded the parties' intentions as to the beneficial interest in property: Walker v Hall [1984] FLR 126, 129, per Dillon LJ.

28 A deed will bind all parties to that deed: City of London Building Society v Flegg [1988] AC 54. It is suggested that the binding nature of the declaration by way of deed is based on the doctrine of estoppel by deed: Mee, 1999, 32.

29 [1986] Fam 106, 110; emphasis added.

This principle will apply even where the parties to the conveyance had neither read nor necessarily understood it, provided that the declaration was formally valid.³⁰ The only exception to this rule would be in a situation in which, under the principle in Saunders v Vautier,³¹ the absolutely entitled beneficiaries under such a trust had directed that the equitable interest be dealt with by the trustees in some other way. Commonwealth attitudes to this principle are less fixated on the necessary decisiveness of the deed of conveyance.³² There have been English cases in which the courts have held that statements as to the parties' interests in the conveyance which do not reflect the parties' own intentions may be held not to constitute effective declarations of trust at all.³³ The court will therefore be required to consider whether or not there was a sufficient intention to create an express trust.

It should be remembered that in order for there to be a valid declaration of trust over land, the declaration must comply with s 53(1)(b) of the Law of Property Act 1925: '... a declaration of trust respecting any land or any interest therein must be manifested and proved by some writing signed by some person who is able to declare such trust or by his will.' Failure to comply with that formality requirement will lead to a failure to create a valid express trust over land. It should also be remembered that under s 53(2), there is no formality requirement in relation to constructive, resulting or implied trusts.

15.3 RESULTING TRUSTS AND THE EMERGENCE OF COMMON INTENTION

*Where a person contributes to the purchase price of the home, an amount of the total equitable interest proportionate to the size of the contribution will be held on resulting trust for that person. Alternatively, this might be expressed as a constructive trust based on the mutual conduct of the parties evidenced by their contribution to the purchase price or the mortgage repayments. However, the role of the resulting trust has been doubted in Stack v Dowden and in Jones v Kernott.*

15.3.1 Traditional resulting trust principles

The core principle in this area was set out in Dyer v Dyer,³⁴ where Eyre CB held that there is a resulting trust in favour of a person who contributes to the purchase price of property in the following terms: 'The clear result of all the cases, without a single exception, is that the trust of a legal estate . . . results to the man who advances the purchase money.'³⁵ That 30 Pink v Lawrence (1978) 36 P & CR 98; although there is authority to suggest that there is an exception to this principle where cogent evidence could be advanced to demonstrate that the parties' intentions were other than those contained in the deed: Huntingford v Hobbs [1993] 1 FLR 736.

31 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

32 Hayton, 1988, 259.

33 See Harwood v Harwood [1991] 2 FLR 274; Huntingford v Hobbs [1993] 1 FLR 736; Stack v Dowden [2005] EWCA Civ 857; [2006] 1 FLR 254, [8]–[9].

34 (1788) 2 Cox Eq Cas 92. See also Dewar v Dewar [1975] 1 WLR 1532, 1537; Tinsley v Milligan [1994] 1 AC 340, 371, contributing money to the purchase price raises a presumption that you are to acquire an equitable interest in that property.

35 Ibid., 93.

resulting trust takes effect at the date of its creation and ordinarily cannot be altered after that time.³⁶

That principle received support in the speech of Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC, when his Lordship recognised the purchase price resulting trust as being one of only two forms of resulting trust in existence.³⁷ As Lord Browne-Wilkinson held in Tinsley v Milligan: ‘Although for historical reasons legal estates and equitable estates have differing incidents, the person owning either type of estate has a right in property, a right in rem and not merely a right in personam.’³⁸ Therefore, where a person contributes to the purchase price of land, that person will be entitled to a proportionate part of the beneficial interest in that land on resulting trust principles: that right is a proprietary right and not merely a personal claim.³⁹

The most straightforward rule in situations where there is no express trust over land is that any person who contributes to the acquisition price of property will acquire an equitable interest in that property. That interest will be expressed as a percentage of the total equitable interest in the property, in proportion to the cost of acquiring the total interest in the property. The only exceptions to such a finding would occur in situations in which the contribution to the purchase price was made by way of a gift of money to the purchasers, or by way of a loan to the purchasers, either of which would negate any presumption that the donor was intended to take an equitable interest in the property,⁴⁰ otherwise banks lending money under mortgage agreements would acquire equitable interests in property beyond their statutory right to repossession.⁴¹ Similarly, a gift of money involves an outright transfer to the donee but does not entitle the donor to any rights in property acquired with the money.⁴² So, a gift of money to a couple on their wedding day to enable them to buy a house would not grant the donor any interest in the house which the couple subsequently bought with that money in circumstances in which the donor had intended to make an outright transfer of that money.⁴³ It is always important to ascertain the purpose underlying the advancement of money to acquire the property.

The following sections will consider the detail of the rules relating to the operation of resulting trusts in this area, and in particular the form of contribution which will acquire rights in property on resulting trust principles. That discussion will focus on two pivotal decisions in the House of Lords which altered this area of law throughout the Commonwealth.

One of the principal problems with the resulting trust is that it is supposed to take effect at the date of the purchase of the property and to be set in stone from that date. The problem is that this resulting trust cannot take into account changes in the parties’ circumstances in the future. For example, if Arthur has agreed to make all of the mortgage repayments while Bertha pays for half of the purchase price in cash, we would suppose that each of these

36 Curley v Parkes [2004] All ER (D) 344. Cf Huntingford v Hobbs [1993] 1 FLR 736, considered below at para 15.5.2.

37 [1996] AC 669; IRC v Eversden [2003] STC 822; [2003] 75 Tax Cas 340.

38 [1994] 1 AC 340.

39 See also Walker v Hall [1984] FLR 126, 133, per Dillon LJ.

40 Grant v Edwards [1986] Ch 638.

41 This would interfere with the equity of redemption necessary in the law of mortgages. For the mortgagee to acquire an equitable interest would mean that the mortgagor would not be able to recover unencumbered possession of his rights. Samuel v Jarrah Timber Corp [1904] AC 323, and so forth, considered in Chapter 23.

42 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

43 McHardy v Warren [1994] 2 FLR 338.

parties would take the equitable interest equally on resulting trust principles. However, if Arthur became ill and was made redundant five years later, then Bertha would be required to assume responsibility for the mortgage repayments. Consequently, it would seem inequitable to deny Bertha an increased share in the equitable interest in the property. However, to do this will require a different group of principles from those traditionally associated with the resulting trust precisely because the resulting trust is usually considered to be set in stone at the time of the purchase of the property. Primarily, this will require a constructive trust to re-calibrate the resulting trust, as considered below.⁴⁴

15.3.2 The birth of common intention

The decision of the House of Lords in *Pettitt v Pettitt*⁴⁵ was the first to begin the process of staking out a modern code of rules to deal with the allocation of equitable interests in the family home under resulting trust principles. In that case, Mrs Pettitt had been bequeathed the entire beneficial interest in a cottage. Her husband performed renovation works on that cottage which cost him £730, and which were agreed to have increased the value of the property by about £1,000. Mr Pettitt contended that he had acquired some equitable interest in the cottage by virtue of those works, and sought an order under s 17 of the Married Women's Property Act 1882 to reflect those contentions. It was argued by Mr Pettitt that the presumption of advancement would require that the wife be deemed to have intended that some equitable interest pass to the husband in return for the work undertaken in the property.⁴⁶ On these facts, Mr Pettitt had not contributed to the purchase price of the property because his wife had been bequeathed it. It was held that Mr Pettitt had not performed sufficiently important works to be entitled to an equitable interest in the property: a stream of thought which persists to this day and which denies equitable interests to those who perform only minor works of repair or alteration and who have not contributed directly to the purchase price of the property.

Previously, the law on resulting trusts held that there should be a presumption to the effect that any transaction between husband and wife should raise a presumption that the husband intended to make a gift to his wife. As to the operation of the presumptions of advancement,⁴⁷ Lord Reid held that they should be taken to belong to a different era and should not have any place in deciding modern cases concerning the family home. This approach has been supported by the Court of Appeal in *Lavelle v Lavelle*⁴⁸ to the effect that the court should instead seek to ascertain the real intention of the transferor of the property. As 44 This was the approach taken in Huntingford v Hobbs [1993] 1 FLR 736 and in Australia in Giumelli v Giumelli [1999] HCA 10.

45 [1970] AC 777.

46 While criticised in Pettitt v Pettitt [1970] 1 AC 777, 793, per Lord Reid, the presumption is defended by Lord Upjohn, and considered by Deane J to be too well entrenched to be completely ignored: Calverley v Green (1984) 155 CLR 242, 266.

47 It should be recalled from the discussion of resulting trust that a presumption of advancement operates when a husband transfers property to a wife to the effect that the husband is presumed, unless the contrary can be proved, to have intended to make a gift of the property to the wife, as opposed to requiring that his wife hold that property on resulting trust for him or be required to deal with it in some other way: see section 11.4.2.

48 [2004] EWCA Civ 223, per Lord Phillips MR. See also Kyriakides v Pippas [2004] EWHC 646 (Ch), [2004] 2 P & CR D10; and Crossley v Crossley [2005] EWCA Civ 1581, [9], per Sir Peter Gibson, CA.

discussed in Chapter 11, the Equality Act 2010 has abolished the presumption of advancement. However, vestiges of the old outlook continued in Pettitt v Pettitt. It was held by Lord Upjohn that: ‘Nor can the meaning of the [Married Women’s Property Act 1882] have changed merely by reason of a change in social outlook since the date of its enactment; it must continue to bear the meaning which upon its true construction in the light of the relevant surrounding circumstances it bore at that time.’⁴⁹ In other words, in Lord Upjohn’s opinion, the statute of 1882 was to be interpreted in accordance with the presumption and the social mores of the time in which it was enacted. For Lord Upjohn it was not enough to argue that the world had changed between 1882 and 1970, and that the courts should treat rights in the home differently as a result.⁵⁰

The presumption of advancement between husband and wife belonged to an era in which men were expected to care for women on the basis that women were not presumed to have property or incomes of their own. It should be recalled that it was only in 1969 that English law accepted, finally, that wives were not to be considered simply as the shadows of their husbands – a development which meant that wives were entitled to have rights in property separate from their husbands for the first time.⁵¹ Lord Reid proposed a more enlightened attitude to rights between spouses in the family home. In Pettitt v Pettitt, it was considered that, for the first time, the court should consider all the surrounding circumstances in recognising the existence of rights in the home, even at a time when wives did not acquire rights independent of their husbands.

A number of important questions arose in this appeal. The first issue was whether a spouse could acquire rights in property by doing acts or defraying expenditure which enabled the other spouse to maintain the home. The simple answer was that only expenditure directed at the acquisition of rights in the property at the time of purchase would generate any such equitable interest.⁵² Simply paying for repair or maintenance work to the premises would not constitute expenditure directed solely at the acquisition of rights in the property. The focus of this thinking was therefore clearly on the direct acquisition of property rights, and not on any more general question of justice between the parties to a marriage or other relationship.

The second issue was as to the status of agreements between spouses. It had long been a vexed question whether or not spouses could form enforceable contracts between themselves – such contracts having been considered immoral and contrary to the notion that husbands and wives formed one legal unit which could not have rights against one another. However, as Lord Reid decided, just because an agreement may not be enforceable in itself does not mean that the performance of an act undertaken in reliance on such an agreement does not have legal consequences. So, for example, even if husbands and wives could not form contracts between themselves as to the use of their home, their common intentions as to the use of that home might raise rights in equity.

The third issue was therefore the extent to which the parties can reach some agreement as to the allocation of the total equitable interest in the property, without forming a binding contract or a formally valid express trust, and make that agreement binding both between

49 Ibid, 813.

50 This despite Philip Larkin’s lament that the 1960s in particular constituted such a sea change in our social life: ‘Sexual intercourse began/In nineteen sixty-three/(Which was rather late for me)/Between the end of the Chatterley ban/And the Beatles’ first LP.’ Larkin, ‘Annus Mirabilis’, 1974.

51 Caunce v Caunce [1969] 1 WLR 286.

52 [1970] AC 777, 794, per Lord Reid.

themselves and on third parties. As we will see at para 15.3.3 below in relation to the case of Gissing v Gissing,⁵³ the House of Lords came to accept that such an agreement would be enforceable in equity where it constituted a ‘common intention’ formed between the parties. The nature of that common intention was said to be either as to the equitable interest which each party would receive (‘interest consensus’), or as to the size of the contribution which each party would make to the purchase price of the property (‘money consensus’), as conceived of by Bagnall J in Cowcher v Cowcher.⁵⁴ These various forms of common intention are considered in more detail below.

The final issue is whether or not the law of restitution of unjust enrichment (as formulated in the book The Law of Restitution by Goff and Jones shortly before this appeal in 1966) has any part to play in deciding whether or not any person who has expended money ought to be entitled to some equitable interest in return. Briefly put, this claim would have meant that one party to a relationship could have claimed an interest in the home if the other party was unjustly enriched in some way by the first party’s actions, for example, where the first party repaired or maintained the property. Lord Reid considered such an action would result only in a ‘money claim’ in any event: that is, a right to be paid an amount of money to compensate that person for the work done rather than a ‘beneficial interest in the property which has been improved’.⁵⁵

On the facts Mr Pettitt’s claim failed because the improvements were of a purely ephemeral nature⁵⁶ and because ‘do-it-yourself’ jobs in themselves ought not to ground rights in property.⁵⁷ Therefore, it is only contributions to the purchase price of the property, or substantial financial contributions to the property itself, which will grant rights under resulting trust to the contributor. The limitation on the forms of contribution formed part of the judicial concern that insubstantial contributions should not be accepted as creating rights in property. Adopting the words of Coke, Lord Hodson suggested that total judicial discretion in this area would not be appropriate: ‘this would be to substitute the uncertain and crooked cord of discretion for the golden and straight metwand of the law.’⁵⁸ In other words, the law should always strive for certainty and principle as opposed to permitting judges to do as they thought fit in any case. These words may appear ironic given the complexities which were to follow.

15.3.3 The central text

The leading case in this area still appears to be Gissing v Gissing.⁵⁹ I say ‘appears’ because the case law takes a variety of different directions subsequently, as we shall see in the discussion to follow. While there have been a number of decisions in the House of Lords and Court of Appeal coming after Gissing, as well as significant developments in a number of

53 [1971] AC 886.

54 [1972] 1 WLR 425.

55 [1970] AC 777, 795, per Lord Reid.

56 Ibid, 796, per Lord Reid.

57 A view expressed variously in cases like Nixon v Nixon [1969] 1 WLR 1676; Burns v Burns [1984] Ch 317.

58 Pettitt v Pettitt [1970] AC 777, 808. I admit I do not know precisely what a ‘metwand’ is, nor can I find a dictionary definition of it, but I rather like the expression: it indicates an intention that equity in this area should be a straight staff which is principled, reliable and very English.

59 [1971] AC 886, [1970] 3 WLR 255.

Commonwealth jurisdictions, all those judges have used Gissing as a starting-point for judgments which have then tended to contradict one another.⁶⁰ As such, this decision has become the central text in this area, which establishes the principle that the common intention of the parties is to be taken as the root of any equitable interest in the property. From that seed equity has taken many different directions.

Mrs Gissing had worked as a secretary and married in 1935. Her husband could not find work after the 1939–45 war, but she procured him a position with the firm where she worked. Her husband did well and prospered in his new position. The couple bought a house in 1951 which was registered in the husband's name. The purchase price was provided predominantly by a mortgage in the husband's name together with a loan from the couple's employers. Mrs Gissing spent £220 on laying a lawn at the house and on furnishings for the house. Her husband left her in 1961 to live with another woman. The wife sought a declaration that she had some equitable interest in the property.

It was held, unanimously, that Mrs Gissing acquired no beneficial interest in the property on the grounds that she had made no contribution to the purchase price of the property. Expending money on ephemeral items was not the same as contributing to the purchase price. The House of Lords in Gissing v Gissing accepted that the common intention of the parties played an important part, but the court was concerned that such common intentions should not be too loosely defined. Lord Diplock, significantly, held that Pettitt was not correct to the extent that his Lordship found it impossible to impute a common intention in circumstances where there was no direct evidence of any express agreement between the parties.⁶¹ As a general statement, Lord Diplock acknowledged that: '[The parties'] common intention is more likely to have been concerned with the economic realities of the transaction than with the unfamiliar technicalities of the English law of legal and equitable interests in land.'⁶² These dicta indicate that the court is to look to the circumstances as the parties saw them and not to restrict the parties to any particular legal formula. This approach recognises that, in the detail of their lives, ordinary people will not tend to be overly formalistic in their dealings with their homes. Consequently, a common intention can be imputed to the parties by reference to the evidence or inferred from their conduct, as well as from direct discussions between the cohabitantes.⁶³

The importance of the decision in Gissing v Gissing is that it breaks out of the mould which restricts the parties only to the acquisition of rights under resulting trusts. Instead of restricting the parties only to rights which flowed directly from a contribution to the purchase price, the focus on the broader common intention of the parties meant that there could be some other factor which would permit the founding of some equitable interest. Significantly, Lord Diplock's dicta restricted the possible forms of such common intention. Nevertheless, to permit rights to be formed on the basis of common intention, even if only a narrow range of intentions can be included,⁶⁴ does mean that the parties are not limited only to rights founded on the Dyer v Dyer principle. As a result, there is less formality required in the creation of such trust arrangements in an attempt to recognise and enforce the genuine, 60 Cases as different as Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1991] 1 AC 107 and Midland Bank v Cooke [1995] 4 All ER 562 have all prayed Gissing in aid.

61 [1971] AC 886, 904.

62 Ibid, 906.

63 Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1991] 1 AC 107.

64 As considered in section 15.4 below.

underlying intention which is constituted by the relationship between the parties. The adoption of the language of ‘common intention’ by Lord Diplock opened the way for the use of the constructive trust for the granting of rights in land, rather than the more mathematical precision of the purchase price resulting trust which would grant them only an equitable interest in proportion to the plaintiff’s contribution to the purchase price. This use of the constructive trust has been adopted by the courts in preference to the resulting trust – perhaps, in part, because of the comparatively large discretion which is given to the court.

15.4 CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS – ACQUISITION OF EQUITABLE INTERESTS BY CONDUCT OR AGREEMENT

Where a person contributes to the purchase price of the home, this might be expressed as a constructive trust based on the mutual conduct of the parties evidenced by their contribution to the purchase price or the mortgage repayments (‘common intention constructive trust by mutual conduct’).

Where there is no such contribution nor an express declaration of trust, the equitable interest in the home will be allocated according to the common intention of the parties by means of constructive trust (‘common intention constructive trust by agreement’), based on an express agreement between the parties which need not constitute an express declaration of trust.

15.4.1 Foundations of the common intention constructive trust

Roots of common intention constructive trusts

As considered above, the speeches in the House of Lords in *Gissing v Gissing*⁶⁵ created the possibility of looking behind the formal arrangements between the parties to uncover their informal, common intentions as to the allocation of rights in their home. It was held that this common intention ought to be the element which was decisive of the division of equitable interests between them. As mentioned above, the use of the constructive trust gives the court greater leeway in declaring the respective interests of the parties, when compared with the resulting trust which measures their cash contribution without more. However, the problem remains that the intentions of the parties will remain unclear in many cases. The courts are therefore often asked to allocate equitable interests in circumstances in which it is very difficult to discern whether or not the parties ever did manifest or form a common intention. So, bound up in this discussion is a shadow of Lord Hodson’s sentiments in Pettitt v Pettitt,⁶⁶ quoted at para 15.3.2 above, that the law should strive for certainty (to preserve its ‘golden metwand’) and not permit too much uncertainty so that judges are able to decide cases on an entirely discretionary basis without reference to principle. Therefore, the form of constructive trust which is to be used is an institutional constructive trust as opposed to a remedial constructive trust.⁶⁷ Again, we see the perennial to-ing and fro-ing between certainty and flexibility.

65 [1971] AC 886.

66 [1970] AC 777.

67 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669 – as considered in Chapter 12.

Mapping constructive trusts

The decision of Bagnall J in *Cowcher v Cowcher*⁶⁸ sought to conceptualise the different possible approaches to the form of constructive trust used in cases of common intention. This approach had not been followed explicitly for some time until the decision of the Court of Appeal in Midland Bank v Cooke,⁶⁹ where Waite LJ adopted it as a suitable exposition of the principles in Gissing v Gissing. It is considered here as a reasonable introduction to the development of the principle of constructive trust in this context. Bagnall J began by explaining that proprietary rights are not to be determined simply on the basis of what is considered to be ‘reasonable, fair and just in all the circumstances’, thus underlining the courts’ determination to avoid the development of a remedial constructive trust approach in relation to family homes. That a decision appeared to be ‘unfair’ did not make it ‘unjust’. Consequently, the courts ought not to be concerned to do fairness between the parties, but rather to uncover their real intentions and reflect them through the constructive trust.

It was held, furthermore, that the concepts of resulting and constructive trust could be taken to be synonymous, although the category of constructive trust ought more usually to be reserved for situations in which a fiduciary had sought to benefit from his office. The heart of the analysis is then that the cases resolve into the two basic categories considered at para 15.3.2 above: ‘interest consensus’ and ‘money consensus’. To take each concept one at a time: the interest consensus constituted an expression of the common intention of the parties as to the extent of one another’s interest in the property regardless of their financial contributions. The interest consensus would therefore be an agreement as to the equitable interest which each party is to receive, which would be derived from the conduct of the parties if no express agreement could be proved. Such conduct need not be evidenced solely at the date of acquisition but could also develop subsequently.⁷⁰ The money consensus would derive from the parties agreeing how much money each would contribute to the purchase price of the property. The money consensus is not derived from conduct, but rather is based on an express agreement as to the amount of money provided by each party for the purchase of the property.⁷¹

This form of common intention constructive trust appears to be a mixture of a resulting trust (which measures the parties’ contributions to the purchase price of the property) and a constructive trust properly so-called (which would evaluate the conscionability of allowing one party to take an unfair benefit from some understanding reached between the parties as to ownership of the property). The common intention constructive trust is different from the model of constructive trust considered in Chapter 12, in that the leading authority on the operation of the common intention constructive trust, *Lloyds Bank v Rosset*⁷² considered immediately below, restricts its operation to a particular form of conduct to do with contribution to the purchase price and does not allow it to operate on the basis of a general test of good conscience (as do the courts in Australia).⁷³

68 [1972] 1 All ER 948, 948–51, 954–55.

69 [1995] 4 All ER 562.

70 Although this is not permitted in Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1991] 1 AC 107, it is accepted in cases like McHardy v Warren [1994] 2 FLR 338.

71 Springette v Defoe (1992) 24 HLR 552, [1992] 2 FLR 388.

72 [1991] 1 AC 107.

73 Considered below at para 15.10.2.

15.4.2 Lloyds Bank v Rosset – the common intention constructive trust

The context of Lloyds Bank v Rosset

The decision in the House of Lords in *Lloyds Bank v Rosset*⁷⁴ both tidied and confused this area of law. The case law surrounding the decision in Gissing v Gissing offered a scattered reading of the nature of the constructive trust. The decisions in cases such as Cowcher v Cowcher,⁷⁵ *Grant v Edwards*⁷⁶ and *Coombes v Smith*⁷⁷ offered a variety of readings of the concept of ‘common intention’ which ranged from divisions between the forms of consensus, the need for common intention to be coupled with detriment, and proprietary estoppel respectively. In the light of this welter of contradictory and difficult authority, there was some momentum for rationalisation of the law. Particularly in an area of such great social importance, there was also some momentum for clearing up the difficulties and making the law more straightforward. Just such a rationalisation was set out in the leading speech of Lord Bridge in Lloyds Bank v Rosset.⁷⁸ Lord Bridge appointed himself the task of setting out the terms on which a claimant may acquire an equitable interest in the home on grounds of ‘constructive trust or proprietary estoppel’. It is worth noting that the form of constructive trust set out in this area bears very little relation to the general constructive trust which was set out in *Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington*⁷⁹ to operate in all other contexts.⁸⁰

The facts of Lloyds Bank v Rosset were as follows. A semi-derelict farmhouse was put in H’s name. The house was to be the family home and renovated as a joint venture. H’s wife, W, oversaw all of the building work. W had been led to believe that the property was to be acquired without a mortgage. However, H did acquire the property with a mortgage registered in his sole name. H fell into arrears on the mortgage and the mortgagee bank sought repossession in lieu of money owed by H under the mortgage. W sought to resist an order for sale in favour of the mortgagee, inter alia, because of her equitable interest in the property which she claimed granted her an overriding interest on grounds of actual occupation.⁸¹ It was held that W had acquired no equitable interest in the property on the basis that activities like supervising renovation work were too peripheral to acquire an equitable interest. Lord Bridge delivered the only speech in the House of Lords, in which he sought to redraw the basis on which a common intention constructive trust would be formed. The test fell into two halves and therefore created two distinct forms of common intention constructive trust: common intention based on conduct; and common intention based on agreement.

Common intention evidenced by agreement

Building on the advances made in Gissing v Gissing,⁸² the court accepted that common intention could arise from some agreement between the parties. The issue is therefore as to

74 [1991] 1 AC 107.

75 [1972] 1 All ER 948.

76 [1986] Ch 638.

77 [1986] 1 WLR 808.

78 [1991] 1 AC 107.

79 [1996] AC 669.

80 See section 12.1 et seq.

81 Land Registration Act 1925, s 70(1)(g); see now the Land Registration Act 2002, Sched 3, para 2.

82 [1971] AC 886.

the form of agreement which the parties must reach to constitute a trust. If that intention needed to be in writing then it might constitute evidence of an express declaration of trust. It is the exceptional case in which the parties have gone to such pains to make their intentions so clear. In most of the cases there will only be evidence as to conversations between the parties, which may or may not have been explicit about their intentions as to rights in the property. On the basis that such an agreement would not be sufficient to constitute an express trust on the ground that it would not satisfy s 53(1)(b) of the Law of Property Act 1925, it would have to be enforced by some form of trust implied by law.⁸³

The first limb of the Rosset test provided that there would be an agreement between the parties sufficient to constitute a common intention on the following terms, in the words of Lord Bridge:⁸⁴

The first and fundamental question which must always be resolved is whether, independently of any inference to be drawn from the conduct of the parties in the course of sharing the house as their home and managing their joint affairs, there has at any time prior to acquisition, or exceptionally at some later date, been any agreement, arrangement or understanding reached between them that the property is to be shared beneficially.

This is the court's first inquiry on this model of the common intention principle.⁸⁵ The type of situation which is envisaged by Lord Bridge is an occasion on which the couple sat down to discuss how the rights in the property were to be divided between them. Perhaps his Lordship had in mind an intense conversation over dinner one evening, Vivaldi playing on the stereo and the pepper pots strewn across the tabletop to represent the parties' various interests. The issue remains as to the type of conversation or consensus which would be sufficient to constitute such an 'agreement'. It is clear that it need not form a binding contract.⁸⁶ In the words of Lord Bridge:⁸⁷

The finding of an agreement or arrangement to share in this sense can only, I think, be based on evidence of express discussions between the partners, however imperfectly remembered and however imprecise their terms.

Two points are worthy of note. First, the discussions are expected to have been carried out in advance of the purchase. Subsequent discussions between the parties are not important, or at least are of less importance. It is suggested that this approach does not seem to recognise the reality of relationships in which intentions alter over the years with the birth of children, the death of family members, the bane of unemployment and the thousand other shocks that flesh is heir to. Similarly, the agreement is related to each property individually (subject to what is said below about deposits and the use of sale proceeds of previous properties). Suppose a couple buy a house, then sell it and move to a second house: it is not clear to what extent conversations about the second house can override agreements formulated as to title

83 Law of Property Act 1925, s 53(2).

84 [1990] 1 All ER 1111, 1116.

85 Savill v Goodall [1993] 1 FLR 755.

86 See now in any event the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, s 2.

87 [1990] 1 All ER 1111, 1117.

in the first house, although it is clear that the courts will impute intentions relevant to the first house to subsequent purchases.⁸⁸

Secondly, the assumption is that there are express discussions, rather than an emerging but unspoken intention between the parties. For example, where one party ceases work to bring up children, thus interrupting the ability to earn money to be applied to the mortgage instalments, the intention of the parties will be impliedly recalibrated when the other partner assumes the burden of paying off the mortgage. It is unlikely that there will be an express discussion as to rights in the property which each is intended to receive, although it is likely that the parties will adjust their lifestyle to accommodate the need to meet their household expenses and so forth. The second limb of the test is the only one which permits for this type of flexibility, which is considered immediately below.

An example of such an agreement would be where a husband and wife prepared a transfer form such that the entire interest in the property would be transferred to the wife. In the event the form was not presented to the Land Registry and therefore there was no transfer at common law. However, the court was prepared to find that this was evidence of the parties' intentions to transfer title to the wife.⁸⁹ It is presumed that the result would have been different if the failure to present the form was a result of the parties having changed their minds: nevertheless, it would still have constituted evidence that at one time their intention was to transfer rights to the wife. It would usually be the case that the intentions of the parties are more difficult to isolate. So where a woman left Poland, thus 'burning her boats', to come and live in England with the defendant, it was held that she had understood that she would have a home for life even though there was no demonstrable intention that all of the rights in the property be transferred to her. Therefore, the woman would be entitled to have the property held on trust for her occupation during her lifetime.⁹⁰ In general terms, the courts will be reluctant to draw inferences of such agreements if they are not evident on the facts of the case.⁹¹

The High Court in *Ledger-Beadell v Peach*⁹² has, however, held that there was sufficient ground for granting a constructive trust when a house was acquired and put in A's name on the basis that the parties would decide later whether or not other parties who had put up the purchase price would have a beneficial interest in that property and, if so, what form that interest would take.⁹³ It was held on the facts that it was appropriate to apply a constructive trust, as opposed to a resulting trust in these circumstances, to give effect to the parties' developing intentions. Interestingly, of course, this contravenes the literal force of Lord Bridge's dicta in Rosset to the effect that this agreement must have been formed before the acquisition of the property: a point which was not considered in the High Court. Instead the court relied on the 'unconscionability approach' case of Oxley v Hiscock,⁹⁴ as considered in detail below in section 15.8, which permitted a survey of the whole course of the parties'

88 McHardy v Warren [1994] 2 FLR 338.

89 Barclays Bank v Khaira [1993] 1 FLR 343.

90 Ungarian v Lesnoff [1990] Ch 206 – under the Settled Land Act 1925. Also Costello v Costello [1996] 1 FLR 805. Cf Dent v Dent [1996] 1 All ER 659.

91 '... our trust law does not allow property rights to be affected by telepathy', Springette v Defoe [1992] 2 FLR 388, 392, per Steyn LJ; Evans v Hayward [1995] 2 FLR 511. Although the family assets approach is prepared to permit such unspoken intentions to be enforced, as considered at section 15.6 below.

92 [2006] All ER (D) 245.

93 Ledger-Beadell v Peach [2006] All ER (D) 245, Nicholas Strauss QC.

94 [2005] Fam 211.

dealings so as to reach a fair result. This is just a hint of the uncertainty which will yet attend the otherwise clear prescriptions of the House of Lords in Rosset when describing the common intention constructive trust. A draft trust (which was never executed) setting out the parties' equitable interests has been accepted by the Court of Appeal as being evidence which may be used in establishing the contents of the parties' agreement;⁹⁵ although presumably this could only be used if the parties' intentions could not be shown to have changed from the contents of that draft trust.

Nevertheless, the principal line of cases has required clear evidence of an agreement, arrangement or understanding.⁹⁶ So, when a claimant sought an equitable interest in the defendant's home on the basis that she had lent money to the defendant's business, it was held that there had been no agreement, arrangement or understanding that the claimant would acquire any interest in the defendant's home and therefore the claimant acquired no such interest.⁹⁷ Equally, if a widowed mother asked her 19-year-old son to co-sign a mortgage over their home, that would not in itself suggest an agreement that the son should have an equitable interest in that home when his signature had only been added to make the mortgage easier to obtain and when he made few or no payments at all towards the property latterly.⁹⁸ Evidently, where there is no evidence to substantiate the existence of an agreement, the court will not create one out of thin air.⁹⁹

Common intention evidenced by conduct

The second form of common intention constructive trust arises in the absence of an express agreement or arrangement to share the beneficial ownership. Where there is no such agreement the court will consider the conduct of the parties. In this situation it is payments towards the initial purchase price of the property or towards mortgage instalments 'which justify the inference necessary for the creation of a constructive trust'. As Lord Bridge set out the test:¹⁰⁰

In sharp contrast with [the common intention constructive trust by agreement] is the very different one where there is no evidence to support a finding of an agreement or arrangement to share, however reasonable it might have been for the parties to reach such an arrangement if they had applied their minds to the question, and where the court must rely entirely on the conduct of the parties both as the basis from which to infer a common intention to share the property beneficially and as the conduct relied on to give rise to a 95 Williamson v Sheikh [2008] EWCA Civ 990.

96 See Kean v McDonald [2006] All ER (D) 348 where the parties agreed in 1997 to transfer title in property on payment of £10,000: this agreement was found to constitute a common intention constructive trust, even though the parties seemed to have agreed that there would be an outright transfer of title in the property as opposed to a trust, and even though there had not been a proper conveyance of title at common law (simply a purported payment of money further to the agreement, which would not have constituted a valid contract for a sale of an interest in land). Furthermore, it did not matter to the court (Crystal QC), it seems, that some of the parties were involved in criminal activities and that the Crown Prosecution Service were objecting to the constructive trust. No point was taken by the court as to whether or not the parties here had acted with clean hands.

97 Koulias v Makris [2005] All ER (D) 352; Popely v Helfield Properties Ltd [2005] All ER (D) 287; Lightfoot v Lightfoot-Brown [2005] All ER (D) 115.

98 Abbey National v Stringer [2006] EWCA Civ 338.

99 Churchill v Roach [2002] EWHC 3230, [2004] 3 FCR 744.

100 [1990] 1 All ER 1111, 1117.

constructive trust. In this situation direct contributions to the purchase price by the partner who is not the legal owner, whether initially or by payment of mortgage instalments, will readily justify the inference necessary to the creation of a constructive trust. But as I read the authorities it is at least extremely doubtful whether anything less will do.

Thus the parties' conduct in respect of the property is capable of forming a common intention sufficient for the finding of a constructive trust. The type of conduct envisaged by Lord Bridge is, however, very limited. He has in mind 'direct contributions to the purchase price' only. Any other conduct which indicates a common intention to own the property jointly in some way, such as selecting the decorations together or sending out invitations to the house-warming party in joint names, will not be sufficient to demonstrate a common intention.

One further problem arises: most people are not able to afford to buy their homes for cash and are therefore required to take out mortgages which are paid back over a period of (usually) 25 years. In recognition of the reality of those families who finance the purchase of the property by mortgage, rather than by cash purchase, Lord Bridge tells us that it is sufficient for the contributions to be made either 'initially [that is, by cash purchase or cash deposit] or by payment of mortgage instalments'.¹⁰¹ The limitation of these means of contribution is underlined when Lord Bridge explicitly holds that 'it is at least extremely doubtful whether anything less will do'. It is suggested below that this last sentence is of pivotal importance.

It is assumed, but not explicit in the judgment, that it is possible for B to acquire rights in the property when B begins to pay off the mortgage instalments as a result of A becoming unemployed or taking maternity leave to bring up children.¹⁰² This issue is considered in sections 15.5 and 15.6 below in the 'balance sheet approach' and the 'family assets approach'.

The ghost of this approach, it is suggested, lives on in the line of authority which led to Oxley v Hiscock and Stack v Dowden: it is clearly antipathetic to the sort of formalism seen in Lloyds Bank v Rosset. Nevertheless, the decision in Jones v Kernott seems concerned with the same task of introducing order as the court in Lloyds Bank v Rosset.

The need for detriment in common intention constructive trust

It was held in Rosset that it is also necessary for the claimant to demonstrate that she has suffered detriment before being able to demonstrate a common intention constructive trust. In Grant v Edwards,¹⁰³ Browne-Wilkinson VC sought to expatiate on the core principles of the common intention constructive trust, set out by Lord Diplock in Gissing v Gissing. In his opinion, there were three important principles to be analysed:

- (a) the nature of the substantive right, which required that there must be a common intention that the claimant was to have a beneficial interest and that the claimant had acted to her detriment;
- (b) proof of the common intention, requiring direct evidence or inferred common intention;
- (c) the quantification of the size of that right.

101 [1990] 1 All ER 1111, 1117.

102 Ibid.

103 [1986] Ch 638. See now also Hyett v Stanley [2003] EWCA Civ 942, [2003] 3 FCR 253; Lalani v Crump [2007] EWHC 47.

The formulation of the principle which was set out by Browne-Wilkinson VC in Grant v Edwards was as follows:¹⁰⁴

If the legal estate in the joint home is vested in only one of the parties ('the legal owner') the other party ('the claimant'), in order to establish a beneficial interest, has to establish a constructive trust by showing that it would be inequitable for the legal owner to claim sole beneficial ownership. This requires two matters to be demonstrated: (a) that there was a common intention that both should have a beneficial interest; (b) that the claimant has acted to his or her detriment on the basis of that common intention.

The requirement for detriment in the context was mirrored in Midland Bank v Dobson,¹⁰⁵ where it was held insufficient to create an equitable interest that there be simply a common intention unless there was also some detriment suffered by the claimant.

In *Grant v Edwards*¹⁰⁶ it was held that there must be an agreement or conduct on the part of the non-property-owning party which could only be explained as being directed at acquiring rights in property. While the claimant in that case had not made a financial contribution directly towards the purchase of the property, the defendant had made excuses to her for not putting her name on the legal title, which was held to indicate an intention that she would otherwise have acquired rights in the property but for the defendant's subterfuge. In short, he had sought to keep her off the title through deceit, indicating that otherwise she would probably have had formal rights.¹⁰⁷

Further, it was found that her contributions to family expenses were more than would otherwise have been expected in the circumstances and thereby enabled the defendant to make the mortgage payments. It was held that this behaviour could not have been expected unless she understood that she would acquire an interest in the property. Consequently, she acquired an equitable interest by dint of facilitating payment for the house and in accordance with, effectively, an imputed common intention. The roots of the modern approach are discernible in this double-barrelled focus both on any agreement made between the parties and also on an analysis of the parties' conduct in respect of the purchase of the property and on its mortgage repayments.

The somewhat heretical conclusion reached in that case was that it is possible that purely personal acts will be evidence of an intention that a proprietary interest is to be acquired by the claimant. However, *Coombes v Smith*¹⁰⁸ took the view that for the claimant to leave her partner to have children with the defendant would not lead to the acquisition of a right in property because that was purely personal detriment, not the sort necessary to acquire rights in property. As considered below, it is generally the case that detriment which is suffered merely as a part of a claimant's personal life (for example, where that person leaves her current partner on the promise that the defendant will give her a right in property) will not be sufficient to grant a right in property. Nonetheless, it must be noted that detriment is an

104 [1986] Ch 638, 654D.

105 [1986] 1 FLR 171.

106 [1986] Ch 638; Lloyd v Dugdale [2002] 2 P & CR 13.

107 Eves v Eves [1975] 1 WLR 1338.

108 [1986] 1 WLR 808.

important part of demonstrating rights under a common intention constructive trust – a feature which makes it appear similar to proprietary estoppel.¹⁰⁹

With an admirable affection for the strict rules of company law, the Court of Final Appeal in Hong Kong has held that where a property is owned by a company then a human being cannot make representations to a woman which will bind the company if that woman suffers detriment in reliance on that representation.¹¹⁰ That is so even if the representor is a shareholder in that company because under company law the company itself is a person distinct from its shareholders.¹¹¹

15.4.3 Application of the common intention constructive trust concept

Approaches in the wake of Rosset

The courts have not slavishly followed the very clear test set out in Rosset.¹¹² While that test may not be entirely desirable on principle, as discussed at para 15.4.4 below, it does have the merit of greater clarity than many of the other decided cases. The decisions in subsequent cases have tended to favour an approach based on calculation of the proportionate interests acquired by the parties from the cash amounts which they have contributed to the purchase of the property. For example, the decision of the Court of Appeal in Huntingford v Hobbs,¹¹³ particularly in the judgment of Sir Christopher Slade, demonstrated an attitude based not on ‘an abstract notion of justice’ but on a rough approximation of what each party had contributed with adjustments for outstanding obligations: this approach will be dubbed below the ‘balance sheet approach’, which seeks merely to add up all the contributions made by the various parties to the household and then to calculate them as a proportion of the total expenditure on the property.

In Huntingford v Hobbs,¹¹⁴ there were two contributors to the purchase price of the property: one party had contributed cash, whereas the other had undertaken to pay off the mortgage on the property. In part the Court of Appeal, without express reference to the doctrinal issues considered above, was relying on resulting trust principles to grant interests equivalent to the cash contributions made. However, the court did not restrict itself to resulting trust principles. Rather, it also inferred a common intention from the conduct of the parties that the plaintiff would be responsible for the mortgage, and therefore that it would accord him with an interest in proportion to the size of that undertaking. This was despite the fact that both parties were legally responsible for the mortgage – that is, while only the person who makes the repayments is awarded the proprietary rights, both are potentially legally liable under the terms of the mortgage contract. The court preferred to concentrate on the parties’ agreement as to who should pay off the mortgage, rather than on their respective legal obligations which could have made them liable to the mortgagee to make repayments. It is clear that the court will not consider itself bound simply by the cash contributions made by the 109 As considered below at section 15.7.

110 Luo v The Estate of Hui (2007) 11 ITELR 218.

111 Salomon v A Salomon & Co Ltd [1897] AC 22.

112 Although there are cases which have applied Lloyds Bank v Rosset: eg, Ivin v Blake [1995] 1 FLR 70; Buggs v Buggs [2003] EWHC 1538 (Ch) and McKenzie v McKenzie [2003] EWHC 601. There are more cases such as H v M [2004] 2 FLR 16, which did not cite Rosset at all.

113 [1993] 1 FCR 45.

114 Ibid.

parties, but rather will also consider any other understanding reached between them as to the equitable interests which they intended each to receive.¹¹⁵

The further issue which arose was the need to account for the amount of the mortgage which had been paid off at that time, and to discount that part of the mortgage which remained to be paid off in the future. It was contended that it would have been unfair for the party responsible for the mortgage payments to claim entitlement to an equitable interest which reflected a part of the mortgage amount not yet paid off. It was held that the plaintiff was to have his interest reduced to account for the amount of the mortgage which remained outstanding and which would be met by the other party. The basis on which this decision was reached is therefore a mixture of the resulting trust and the discretionary features of the common intention constructive trusts.

*Huntingford v Hobbs*¹¹⁶ reflects the somewhat scattered approach that the courts have taken to the application of these principles.¹¹⁷ By contradistinction, in Midland Bank v Cooke,¹¹⁸ it was held that a common intention constructive trust can arise where H and W equally provide a deposit on a house purchased in the name of one or both of them. The dispute arose in circumstances in which H and W acquired property in H's name, and in which W had signed a consent form agreeing to her interests being relegated to those of the mortgagee. W had contributed nothing to the purchase price but contributed the deposit for the purchase of the property equally with H. The question arose whether or not she had any beneficial interest in the property in any event. It was held by Waite LJ that the court is required to survey the whole course of dealing between the parties. Furthermore, it was held that the court is not required to confine its survey to the limited range of acts of direct contribution of the sort that are needed to found a beneficial interest in the first place: which is precisely what Rosset did require. If that survey is inconclusive, Waite LJ held that the court should fall back on the maxim 'equality is equity'. It is difficult to know whether these approaches could be used to find sufficient intention to displace the provisions of an express trust in a conveyance,¹¹⁹ given that the principles of proprietary estoppel, for example, are so frequently used to displace a statutory provision.¹²⁰ As considered above, it is difficult to reconcile this decision with the other cases in this area such as Rosset. However, it does indicate the Court of Appeal's preference to look at the whole range of facts on offer and not to be restricted to direct, financial contributions in all cases. The doctrine of precedent does not appear to apply here – in that the precise detail of the very clear tests in Rosset are effectively ignored, even though the case was usually cited by the junior courts before the decision in Stack v Dowden, and this ignorance of its detail is in spite of Rosset being a 115 Drake v Whipp [1996] 1 FLR 826 – where a contribution of one-fifth of the purchase price (on a net basis) was enlarged to one-third of the entire equitable interest because the court inferred that to be the parties' underlying intention on the evidence despite their direct proportions to the purchase price; Killey v Clough [1996] NPC 38.

116 [1993] 1 FCR 45.

117 Cf Crisp v Mullings (1976) 239 EG 119; Walker v Hall [1984] FLR 126, CA; Harwood v Harwood [1991] 2 FLR 274; Roy v Roy [1996] 1 FLR 541, CA.

118 [1995] 4 All ER 562.

119 On the general reluctance to rectify a conveyance to make it reflect the parties' intentions, see Wilson v Wilson [1969] 1 WLR 1470, per Buckley J; Pink v Lawrence (1978) 36 P & CR 98; Goodman v Gallant [1986] 1 FLR 513, 524, per Slade LJ; Roy v Roy [1996] 1 FLR 541.

120 Yaxley v Gotts [2000] 1 All ER 711.

House of Lords judgment. The flexible approach of the courts to the identification of the parties' common intentions is evident from Hyett v Stanley,¹²¹ in which an unmarried couple who had lived together for over 10 years before the death of one of them took out a loan secured over their home for which they were jointly and severally liable, and in consequence the court inferred a common intention to share the equitable interest in the property equally solely from that joint loan. The court did not apply strictly the dicta of Lord Bridge in Rosset as one would expect having read that admirably clear, if conceptually harsh, speech.

The decision of the Court of Appeal in *Ivin v Blake*¹²² did apply the approach of the House of Lords in Rosset – and is worthy of note precisely because it is one of very few Court of Appeal cases to apply the Rosset tests closely. In Ivin v Blake, B had run a pub from the time of her husband's death, in 1953, which became profitable enough for her to buy a house. However, she could not acquire a mortgage in her own name and therefore the mortgage was taken out in the name of her son, T. B's daughter, D, had given up her job to work in the pub full-time to help her mother, also in 1953. D's agreement to come and work in the pub, thus saving B from having to hire more staff, enabled B to cobble together enough money to buy the property and to generate sufficient income to meet the mortgage repayments. The issue arose whether or not T was required to hold the pub on constructive trust (in part) for D on the basis that D's contribution to the pub business had facilitated the acquisition of the house and also the making of mortgage payments over the house.

The court held that there had been no intention at the time of the acquisition of the house that D would acquire any interest in the house, and therefore there could be no constructive trust. Furthermore, there had been no direct contribution by D to the purchase price of the house. Consequently, D had satisfied neither limb of the Rosset test. It was held that D acquired no equitable interest. On the basis that B had met all of the cash expenses of the purchase of the house which had not been provided by means of the mortgage, her equitable interest was said to have survived her death and that it fell to be apportioned according to her will with the rest of her estate.¹²³ As will emerge below in relation to *Oxley v Hiscock*¹²⁴ and the other cases referred to as the 'unconscionability approach' cases: while Rosset is cited, it is only one of a number of conflicting authorities which the junior courts added to the stew of case law which they use in reaching their decisions.

Domestic work or property rights?

In line with Gissing, the Court of Appeal in *Burns v Burns*¹²⁵ held that a mere contribution to household expenses would not be sufficient to acquire an interest in property. Rather, the claimant would have to demonstrate that her contributions were made to the purchase price of the property with a view to acquiring an interest in that property. A wife who had run the home, cared for the children and paid some household bills (including utility bills and shopping bills) would not acquire rights in the property. This is contrary to the approach in 121 [2003] EWCA Civ 942, [2004] 1 FLR 394, [2003] 3 FCR 253, [2004] Fam Law 23. This case applied Grant v Edwards [1986] 2 All ER 426, as well as considering Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1991] 1 AC 107.

122 [1995] 1 FLR 70.

123 Further, only occasional contributions to expenses do not acquire rights: Kowalczyk v Kowalczyk [1973] 1 WLR 930, 935, per Buckley LJ.

124 [2004] 3 All ER 703.

125 [1984] Ch 317.

Midland Bank v Cooke,¹²⁶ and contrary to the more progressive approach taken in Canada.¹²⁷ The Burns v Burns approach has been applied in a number of cases, including Lloyds Bank v Rosset (where mere supervision of building work was not sufficient to found a right in the property) and *Nixon v Nixon*¹²⁸ (where contribution to household expenses was again considered inadequate to found a right in property). Therefore, to found a right in property there is a need for some substantive (typically financial) contribution to the property beyond mere work within the normal context of the family, such as housework. Similarly, a temporary contribution to repayments of a mortgage will not, without more, found a right in property; nor will merely providing security for another person's acquisition of property.¹²⁹

Court discretion granted by statute

Statute provides for an example of sufficient detriment to acquire an equitable interest. Section 37 of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970 provides that:

where a husband or a wife contributes in money or in money's worth to the improvement of real or personal property in which . . . either or both of them has or have a beneficial interest, the husband or wife so contributing shall . . . be treated as . . . having then acquired by virtue of his or her contribution a share . . . in that beneficial interest . . . as may in all the circumstances seem just to any court.

Therefore, under s 37 of the 1970 Act, where a husband or wife contributes to the improvement of property, that contributor will be awarded such equitable interest as appears to the court to be just. It is important to note that this statute is restricted to cases involving spouses as opposed to other forms of relationship.

Under s 23 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, the court is entitled (as part of its powers in relation to financial settlement on divorce) to adjust the beneficial interests of the parties to the former marriage. As part of its powers, the court is required to bear in mind the welfare of any children of the relationship¹³⁰ and also the parties' respective financial contributions to the welfare and upbringing of such children.¹³¹ In effect, then, there is a very broad discretion on the court to take into account a wide range of issues which properly forms the subject matter of a family law text.¹³²

126 [1995] 4 All ER 562, considered at para 15.11.2.

127 Considered below at para 15.10.1.

128 [1969] 1 WLR 1676.

129 Carlton v Goodman [2002] 2 FLR 259.

130 Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, s 25(1).

131 Ibid, s 25(2).

132 See Hosking v Michaelides [2004] All ER (D) 147, [49]. That a person makes an occasional contribution to mortgage repayments will not, in itself, necessarily acquire that person an equitable interest in the home. So, in Abbey National v Stringer [2006] EWCA Civ 338 a widowed mother asked her 19-year-old son to co-sign a mortgage over their home, the son lived with his mother but had a girlfriend with whom his mother expected him to live later in life. The son did make very occasional payments towards the mortgage but his signature had been used solely to convince the mortgagee that the money was not being lent solely to a widowed women in middle age. Therefore, the contribution to the mortgage by the son would not in itself constitute conduct sufficient for the son to acquire an equitable interest in the home. This may indicate, as considered with cases later in this chapter, a less than scrupulous attention to the detail in Lloyds Bank v Rosset.

Excuses

There are a number of cases which deal with defendants who have given excuses to claimants for denying them express rights in their homes.¹³³ The clear inference in these cases was that the claimants would otherwise have had rights in the property but for the excuses they were given. The courts in these cases have found that the claimant is entitled to an equitable interest in her home because of her reliance on the excuse given to her and because to do otherwise would have been unconscionable in the context. Therefore, these cases have developed without the need to show a common intention – given that the parties’ motives and intentions here seem to have been diametrically opposed – but rather have been predicated on unconscionability, like the ordinary constructive trusts considered in section 12.1.

15.4.4 The difficulties with a strict application of the Rosset test*An example of substantive unfairness in Rosset*

The aim of this section is to consider, in broad terms, the difficulties which are specific to the Rosset decision. Much of this thinking is then taken up in the final section of this chapter. Any test which is rigid necessarily creates the possibility for unfairness at the margins. That would appear to be the case in respect of the test for common intention constructive trust in Rosset. Suppose the following situation:

A and B are a married couple. They acquire a freehold house entirely by means of a mortgage. It is agreed that A will be the sole mortgagor and entirely responsible for the repayments. They have a child who requires special needs education. It is possible for them, let us suppose, to obtain that special needs education only by buying it privately. It is agreed that B will go to work and that she will be entirely responsible for paying for the special needs education. Let us suppose further that the cost of the education matches exactly the cost of the mortgage, and also that it would have been impossible for A to pay both for the education and for the mortgage.

A strict application of the Rosset test would deny B any interest in the property on the basis that B had not contributed directly to the purchase price nor to the mortgage repayments, in line with the decision in Ivin v Blake above.¹³⁴ All this despite the necessity of B’s contribution to familial expenses to make it possible for A to discharge all of the mortgage expenses. B’s greatest hope would be to rely on the dicta in Pettit referring to one party enabling another to make payments to the property, possibly enabling the acquisition of some equitable rights. The ‘family assets’ approach considered at section 15.6 below may offer greater hope to B of acquiring rights in the property. These equivocal factual situations must form the background to much of the ensuing discussion in this chapter.

133 See, for example, Oates v Stimson [2006] EWCA Civ 548, considered below, where one of the parties was made redundant. Eves v Eves [1975] 3 All ER 768; Grant v Edwards [1986] Ch 638; Van Laetham v Brooker [2006] 2 FLR 495.

134 [1995] 1 FLR 70; see para 15.4.3. See now White v White [2000] 2 FLR 981, where family law has suggested that one should not look solely at the breadwinner’s financial contribution to the home.

What Lord Bridge appeared to forget is that people fall in love. And that when they fall in love they sometimes move in together, or get married, or have children. Or sometimes they don't fall in love but they have children and so have to move in together. And so on and so on. Hundreds of years of novels, plays and (latterly) films have shown us the perfidies of the human heart. Similarly, they have shown us (to quote Shakespeare's King Lear) fate deals with us cruelly: 'as flies to wanton boys are we to the gods/they use us for their sport.' It is not possible to create a strict test like that in Rosset and expect either that people will always sit down calmly in those glorious early days of a relationship and decide who is to have what equitable interest in the home, or that people will be able to form a common intention at the start of their relationship which will work perfectly throughout it without anyone becoming ill, being made redundant, falling out of love, or whatever else. Life is just not like that. It is suggested that it is contrary to the very core of equity's flexible ability to do right on a case-by-case basis to use concepts like that in Rosset to attempt to fetter and bind the ability of the courts to see the right result in any particular case and to act with integrity to isolate the best possible outcome.¹³⁵

Resulting trust, constructive trust or proprietary estoppel?

One issue which emerges from the foregoing discussion is the precise form of the trust created by Lord Bridge. This is considered again below, but is worthy of mention at this stage. On the one hand, Lord Bridge refers in his speech to 'constructive trust or proprietary estoppel' on five occasions. This raises the question as to whether he intends to merge those two doctrines into one composite set of rules as to the acquisition of rights in the home. This could be said to be a constructive trust in that it creates rights for the claimant by operation of law. Alternatively, it could be said to arise by dint of proprietary estoppel, because it creates rights to prevent the claimant suffering detriment.

The hidden motive behind Lord Bridge's speech in Rosset may have been an elision of the categories of common intention constructive trust and proprietary estoppel, as mentioned above. The decision of Nourse LJ in *Stokes v Anderson*¹³⁶ makes the case for the contrary argument. His Lordship, in following Rosset and Grant v Edwards, held that the 'court must supply the common intention by reference to that which all the material circumstances have shown to be fair'.¹³⁷ At that stage, his Lordship did not see any reason for the elision of the common intention principles of Gissing with the doctrine of proprietary estoppel, considered at section 15.7 below. As set out in that discussion, the proprietary estoppel doctrine operates entirely at the discretion of the court and is prospective; whereas the constructive trust is an institutional trust (that is, without any discretion for the court) which operates retrospectively. Any attempt to merge these concepts would have to address these differences.¹³⁸

What is also noticeable is that Lord Bridge did not use the expression 'resulting trust' anywhere in his judgment, and yet the common intention formed by conduct encapsulates precisely the presumed resulting trust set out in *Dyer v Dyer*¹³⁹ which comes into existence

135 Dworkin, 1986.

136 [1991] 1 FLR 391.

137 Ibid., 400.

138 Notwithstanding Hayton, 1990:1, considered below.

139 (1788) 2 Cox Eq Cas 92.

in circumstances in which the claimant has contributed to the purchase price of the property with an intention that she take a proprietary right in that property.¹⁴⁰ As such, the common intention constructive trusts in Rosset, so-called, in fact straddle the different concepts of resulting trust, constructive trust, and proprietary estoppel. The reasons for recognising distinctions between these concepts are considered in more detail at the end of this chapter.

The following sections examine those Court of Appeal decisions which have evidently moved away from the Rosset approach and categorise them as disclosing a ‘balance sheet’ approach and a ‘family assets’ approach – both of which break the taboos set out in the speech of Lord Bridge.

15.5 THE BALANCE SHEET APPROACH

Alternative Court of Appeal decisions have developed a balance sheet approach which favours a measurement of financial contributions over the life of a relationship to calculate proportionate equitable rights in the home.

15.5.1 Introduction

The doctrine of precedent appears to have been thrown to the four winds in the area of trusts of homes. There were House of Lords decisions in Gissing and in Pettitt which redressed the balance of the rights of spouses to acquire rights in the family home. Subsequently, the House of Lords decision in Rosset set out the very strict test based on the common intention constructive trust – as set out above. There is also some confusion as to whether or not that common intention constructive trust doctrine ought to be read as subsuming the doctrines of proprietary estoppel and resulting trust, as considered above. However, the Court of Appeal moved in a number of different directions in the 1990s, effectively side-stepping the didactic test in Rosset in favour of a range of flexible, case-by-case approaches. This section considers the first of the Court of Appeal’s approaches; section 15.6 (the family assets approach) considers a second trend in the Court of Appeal’s decisions which leans towards an equal division of the equitable interest for couples who have terminated a long relationship.

The essence of the ‘balance sheet approach’ is that the court draws up a list of financial contributions made by each party towards the property, akin to an accountant preparing a balance sheet, and calculates each party’s proportionate equitable interest in the home according to that list. What will emerge from the following discussion is that the times at which these contributions are made need not comply with the requirements set out in Rosset that they be made before the acquisition and that they be directed solely at acquiring interests in property.

15.5.2 Calculating the size of the equitable interest

The trend towards balance sheet calculation began with the decision of the Court of Appeal in Bernard v Josephs,¹⁴¹ in which the court considered itself entitled to examine the mathematical equity contributed by each party across the range of transactions contributing to the acquisition of a property.¹⁴² Dealing simply with the issue of contributions made to the purchase at the date of acquisition, it is clear that a contribution can be made in a number of different ways. The following are some of the more common forms of financial contribution:

140 Re Roger’s Question [1948] 1 All ER 328; Bull v Bull [1955] 1 QB 234; Winkworth v Edward Baron Development Co Ltd [1986] 1 WLR 1512; Warburton, 1987, 217.

141 [1982] Ch 391; Passee v Passee [1988] 1 FLR 263. 137 See Trowbridge v Trowbridge [2003] 2 FLR 231; [2004] FCR 79.

- (a) by cash payment;
- (b) by agreeing to pay all or part of the interest payments on the mortgage throughout the life of the mortgage;
- (c) by agreeing to pay the whole or part of the capital cost of the mortgage throughout the life of the mortgage;
- (d) agreeing to be liable to the lender for the mortgage debt in the event that the mortgagor goes into arrears without actually making any payments;
- (e) acting as guarantor or surety for the mortgage;
- (f) obtaining a reduction or discount in the acquisition price by exercise of a pre-existing right in the property.

The fourth and fifth solutions do not require that any payment be made at the time of acquisition. Indeed, the second and third options only require that periodic payments are made after the date of acquisition. There are, then, a number of possible means by which contributions could be made after the date of acquisition. There are yet further possibilities:

- (g) by undertaking to make only some of the mortgage repayments on an ad hoc basis – for example, where a wife undertakes to pay the mortgage for a period of a couple of months while her husband finds work;
- (h) by repaying some of the capital cost of the mortgage without acquiring a legal obligation to do so.

All eight of these possibilities (clearly there could be others) assume some level of agreement between the parties: that is, some explicit or implicit understanding that both of them are contributing to the acquisition of the property at the outset or subsequently. Two further issues then arise. First, the situation where there is no express agreement but the parties fall into a pattern of shared expenditure which is dictated by, for example, whether or not they are in employment at any particular time during their joint occupation of the family home. Secondly, the situation where there is a casual agreement that one party will meet expenses related to the mortgage while the other meets ‘domestic’ expenditure. In this latter situation, it may be that the mortgagor could not make those mortgage repayments unless the other party met the ordinary domestic expenditure: it should be remembered that under a literal application of the test in Rosset, those payments for ordinary expenses would not acquire any interest in the property, even though they were necessary to enable the mortgagor to make his mortgage payments.

As considered above, direct contribution will give rise to a resulting trust,¹⁴³ or a common intention constructive trust by conduct.¹⁴⁴ The second possibility will give rise to an equitable interest in the cohabitee's favour on resulting or constructive trust, where it can be proved that the cohabitee contributed to the price of the property after the acquisition. The size of the interest in such circumstances will be proportionate to the contribution to the total purchase price.¹⁴⁵ The Court of Appeal in Huntingford v Hobbs was prepared to look behind the documentation signed by the parties which suggested that they held the equitable interest in the property in equal shares. However, it was held that to look behind such documents there must be 'cogent evidence' that any documentation signed by the parties was not intended to constitute the final statement as to their beneficial interests. Therefore, where a house cost £100,000 and X provides £40,000, where Y procures a mortgage for £60,000, Y is taken to have contributed 60% of the purchase price.¹⁴⁶

¹⁴² Ibid.

¹⁴³ Dyer v Dyer (1788) 2 Cox Eq Cas 92.

¹⁴⁴ Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1990] 1 AC 107.

There is also the possibility of equitable accounting to take into account periods of rent-free occupation and so forth by one or other of the parties.¹⁴⁷ So, where, for example, one spouse quits the property until the litigation as to the equitable interest is resolved, it will be possible for such a spouse to recover money from the spouse who remains in residence to defray part of the costs of his own rental obligations. Equity will ensure that an account is taken between the party of the amounts owed between them, such as the inferred rental cost of one person occupying co-owned property alone.¹⁴⁸ Remember it is possible for litigation to take a number of years to resolve, during which time one spouse would have full use of the property while the other party would be required to find the financial wherewithal to live elsewhere. What is clear from this doctrine of equitable accounting is that equity will provide for items to be added to this 'balance sheet' which are outside the strict test in Rosset. It is clear that Rosset does not paint the full picture. The question of what can be taken into account is considered in further detail below.

15.5.3 What can be taken into account?

Non-cash contributions

What is clear from the preceding discussion is that direct cash contributions to the purchase price, or to the mortgage repayments, will be taken into account in calculating an equitable interest.¹⁴⁹ What is less clear is the extent to which non-cash provisions of value can be taken into account similarly, particularly given that Rosset would not allow them. An interesting question arose in *Springette v Defoe*¹⁵⁰ as to whether or not a person who procures a discount on the purchase price of property is entitled to bring that discount (or reduction) on the price of the property into the calculation of her equitable interest in the property. The argument runs that getting a discount on the property constitutes an indirect contribution to the purchase price, being reliant on the use of some other right that person has.¹⁵¹

145 Huntingford v Hobbs [1993] 1 FLR 736.

146 Ibid; Cowcher v Cowcher [1972] 1 WLR 425.

147 Bernard v Josephs [1982] Ch 391; Huntingford v Hobbs [1993] 1 FLR 736.

148 Byford v Butler [2003] EWHC 1267 (Ch), [2004] 2 FCR 454, [2004] 1 FLR 56; Pavlou (a bankrupt), Re [1993] 3 All ER 955, [1993] 1 WLR 1046; Stack v Dowden [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 FCR 280, [2007] 1 FLR 1858; Murphy v Gooch [2007] 3 FCR 96.

149 Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1990] 1 AC 107.

150 (1992) 24 HLR 552, [1992] 2 FLR 388.

151 Cf Evans v Hayward [1995] 2 FLR 511, per Staughton LJ; Ashe v Mumford (2000) The Times, 15 November.

On the facts of Springette v Defoe, Miss Springette had been a tenant of the London Borough of Ealing for more than 11 years. She began to cohabit with Mr Defoe and they decided to purchase a house in 1982. Neither party was able to raise the necessary mortgage because their incomes, either jointly or severally, were not large enough. However, Miss Springette was entitled to a discount of 41% under the applicable right-to-buy legislation on the purchase price of her home from the council, because she had been an Ealing council tenant for more than 11 years. The purchase price was therefore £14,445 with the discount. The parties took out a mortgage for £12,000. There was an agreement between the parties that they would meet the mortgage repayments half each. Mr Defoe provided £180 in cash; Miss Springette provided the balance of £2,526 in cash. Their relationship broke down in 1985. The issue arose as to the proportionate equitable interest which each should have in the house.

The Court of Appeal held that there should be a resulting trust imposed unless there was found to be sufficient specific evidence of a common intention to found a constructive trust. Such a common intention must be communicated between the parties and made manifest between them at the time of the transaction. On the facts of Springette, there was no evidence to support the contention that the parties had had any sort of discussion as to their respective interests (within Lord Bridge's test in Rosset), nor that they had reached any such agreement.¹⁵² Therefore, the presumption of resulting trust could not be displaced. The court performed a calculation exercise in the following terms, calculating the amount of value which each party had contributed to the purchase price:

Springette	Defoe
£10,045 (discount on property price)
£6,000 (half of mortgage payments)	£6,000 (half of mortgage payments)
£2,526 (cash contribution)	£180 (cash)
£18,571	£6,180

Therefore, Springette was taken to have contributed 75% of the equity and Defoe 25% (after rounding).

Effect of merely contributing 'value', not cash

Importantly, the court looked at the value contributed and not at the amount of cash paid in Springette v Defoe. It is interesting to see how this compares to Lord Bridge's insistence in Rosset that it is 'at least extremely doubtful whether anything less' than a direct contribution to the mortgage instalments or to the purchase price will do. If it is accepted that procuring a reduction in the purchase price is a sufficient contribution, why should it be impossible to argue that if A pays for the household costs, the car and the children's clothes, thus enabling B to defray the mortgage, that A is not making it possible for B to pay off the mortgage and thus making a financial contribution to the purchase? After all, once you accept that the contribution need not be made in cash but merely by some other form of 'value', at what point is the line to be drawn under the range of non-cash contributions which are possible? For example, could someone with a natural flair for negotiating discounts claim a share in the property simply by virtue of convincing the vendor that he should sell the property for less than would otherwise have been accepted?¹⁵³ In Cox v Jones,¹⁵⁴ the claimant had acquired a flat on a private basis from the vendor whom she had known personally when occupying a flat in the same block as him: that the property was acquired on a private basis meant that it was cheaper than it would have been if the parties had had to buy it through an estate agent. However, the point was not taken in that case as to whether or not this acquisition of a reduction in the value of the flat constituted an acquisition of an equitable interest in the flat in itself. Rather, it was one of a number of factors which the court took into account when deciding that the claimant should acquire a right in the flat.¹⁵⁵

152 Cf Mee, 1999.

It is suggested that what is significant about Springette v Defoe is that the contribution which is made by way of the discount on the sale price arises directly from a statutory entitlement: that is, Miss Springette has a right of a given value under statute which is deducted from the acquisition of the property and which makes the purchase possible. Where, for example, a discount on the sale price is negotiated, that is not a contribution of some valuable right of the claimant but rather an alteration in the contractual sale price without the transfer of any valuable rights on the part of the claimant. It is suggested that the former constitutes the contribution of a valuable right which Miss Springette owned, as opposed to the performance of some task of negligible value which did not constitute the transfer of a valuable right.

The nature of the contribution acceptable is complicated even on the facts of Rosset. It is accepted that the courts should allow the parties to include contingent or future liabilities, such as the mortgage obligations, as part of the calculation of their respective contributions. Rather than a straightforward application of the principle in Dyer v Dyer that such a contribution denotes an interest under resulting trust, the parties are being permitted to include in the calculations amounts which they will have to pay in the future but which they have not paid yet under the mortgage contract. This issue is considered further below.

Unpaid mortgage capital and other issues

Judgment in Springette was delivered by the same Court of Appeal and on the same day as Huntingford v Hobbs,¹⁵⁶ discussed briefly above. Huntingford pursued the issue of the means 153 See Evans v Hayward [1995] 2 FLR 511, per Staughton LJ.

154 [2004] 3 FCR 693, [2004] EWHC 1486 (Ch).

155 In that case, the claimant acquired the absolute interest in the flat because it was found on the facts of that case to have been the parties' intention that the defendant would acquire the property as nominee for the claimant because he was the only person who could have obtained the mortgage necessary to effect the purchase. That she had acquired a reduction in the purchase price of the property was held to be one factor among many which justified this conclusion. However, it seems unfair to deny the defendant any right in this flat because he had assumed the legal responsibility for the mortgage and had also contributed half of the deposit on the flat. Granting the claimant the entire interest in the flat, however, was part of a larger settlement in that case in which the defendant was awarded the majority share in a country house in Essex which the couple had bought together. See the discussion of this case in section 15.8 below.

156 [1993] 1 FLR 736.

by which contributions to the acquisition of the property should be calculated and reflected in the equitable interests which were ultimately awarded to the parties. The plaintiff and the defendant lived together but did not marry. The plaintiff was living on social security benefits; the defendant had been recently divorced and was living in her former matrimonial home. The plaintiff moved in with the defendant but was uncomfortable living in his partner's matrimonial home, and therefore they decided to sell up. The plaintiff wanted to move to Woking where he felt he had a better chance to make money as a music teacher. The parties also wanted to be able to provide a home for the defendant's 21-year-old daughter.

The plaintiff and the defendant bought a property for £63,250 in 1986. The defendant had sold her previous property and put £38,860 towards the purchase of the new property. The remaining £25,000 was provided by way of endowment mortgage. The mortgage liability was undertaken in the names of both plaintiff and defendant. It was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant that the plaintiff would make the mortgage repayments. In 1988 the plaintiff left the defendant. The plaintiff had paid £5,316.30 in mortgage interest and £1,480.25 in premium payments. The plaintiff spent £2,000 on the construction of a conservatory, but this did not increase the value of the property although it was found on the facts that it did make it easier to sell: the defendant did not have any real income; the plaintiff paid for most income expenses and household bills. The property was valued at £95,000 at the time of the hearing and there remained £25,000 in capital outstanding on the mortgage.

The plaintiff contended that the property was to be held in equity under a joint tenancy on the basis of the terms of the conveyance into the names of both plaintiff and defendant. Therefore, the plaintiff sought an order that the property should be sold and the sale proceeds divided in equal shares between the parties. The Court of Appeal held that the property should be sold, but that the sale should be postponed to give the defendant a chance to buy out the plaintiff. Further, it was found that the plaintiff must have been intended to have some equitable interest in the property.

In terms of establishing the parties' respective balance sheets, the court decided as follows. The defendant should be deemed to have contributed the cash proceeds of sale of her previous home; whereas the plaintiff should be deemed to have contributed the whole amount of the mortgage (because he was to have made the mortgage repayments) and should receive some credit for the cost of the conservatory. The issue then arose: what about the remaining, unpaid capital left on the mortgage? The Court of Appeal held that the plaintiff should have deducted from his equitable interest an amount in recognition of the fact that he had not yet paid off the capital of the mortgage and that it was the defendant who would have to meet that cost, because she had agreed to take on responsibility for the mortgage. Therefore, the Court of Appeal calculated that:

- (a) the plaintiff should receive £2,000 (conservatory);
- (b) the defendant should receive £25,000 (capital of the mortgage);
- (c) the plaintiff should receive 39% (proportion contributed by mortgage);
- (d) the defendant should receive 61% (proportion of cash contribution).

Again, the court's approach was to look straightforwardly at the amounts of money contributed by the parties towards the property without taking a literal approach to whether such expenditure took place at the time of acquisition (for example, the money spent on the conservatory was applied after purchase) and whether such expenditure was directed at the purchase price and not merely at more ephemeral matters of building work on the property (for example, the money expended on the conservatory again).

One further, significant aspect emerges from this judgment. The Court of Appeal was prepared to accept that, while the balance sheet approach would be based primarily on resulting trust principles crystallised at the time of the acquisition of the property, it would be possible for the parties to advance cogent evidence of subsequent changes of intention which would be effected by means of constructive trust. On these facts the contribution to the conservatory was made after the date of the acquisition of the property. Similarly, it would be possible to overturn even documentary evidence of the parties' intentions with cogent evidence of other intentions. A hybrid form of resulting and constructive trust is therefore formed – one which enables changes in the relationship between the parties to be accounted for in the equitable interests which the court will recognise as existing between the parties.

The courts have demonstrated themselves to be prepared to examine cogent evidence of the parties' true intentions rather than to consider themselves bound by, for example, contributions made directly to the purchase price at the outset, whether under resulting trust principles or otherwise. Therefore, where a wife had made a contribution of one-fifth of the purchase price of property (on a net basis), the court enlarged her share to one-third of the entire equitable interest because it was prepared to find that that had been the parties' underlying intention on the evidence in place of the size of their direct proportions to the purchase price.¹⁵⁷

So, in *Drake v Whipp*¹⁵⁸ the Court of Appeal held that where there was evidence of a common understanding having been formed between the parties then that would be preferred to the mathematical strictures of a resulting trust which would have restricted the parties to their proportionate contributions to the purchase price of property. While Peter Gibson LJ did make reference to Lloyds Bank v Rosset, his Lordship did not restrict himself to the rigorous two-step test set out by Lord Bridge, which would have required allocation of title between the parties in the exact shares in which they contributed to the purchase price or in exact compliance with their earlier common understanding: instead constructive trust principles were relied upon by the court to give effect to what the court considered to be the justice of the case having regard both to their agreement and to their contributions to the purchase price. Peter Gibson LJ left it unclear precisely on what basis that decision was reached (whether mathematical calculation, a decision based on avoidance of unconscionability, or some other), other than to make it plain that it is a constructive trust which is being applied to re-calibrate the resulting trust on which the claimant had relied at first instance.¹⁵⁹

Deposits and sale proceeds from previous properties

One of the common shortcomings of English property law is that the rules focus on specific items of property rather than taking into account the range of dealings between individuals which might impact on the property but which were perhaps not directly related to it. In this way, sales of properties generate capital to acquire further properties, typically after discharge of the mortgage. It is important, therefore, that focus on the particular land in issue does not ignore interests held previously in other properties. So if A and B acquired No 55 Mercer

157 Drake v Whipp [1996] 1 FLR 826.

158 [1996] 1 FLR 826.

159 See in this sense Giumelli v Giumelli [1999] HCA 10 in Australia.

Road with equal cash contributions on the basis of a tenancy in common, that 50:50 division in the equitable interest ought to be carried forward when No 55 Mercer Road is sold and the proceeds used to buy No 1 Acacia Avenue: that is, so that those parties then have a 50:50 share of the equitable interest in No 1 Acacia Avenue.

Similarly, it will typically be the case that individuals buying a home will generate most of the capital to acquire the property by means of mortgage. Those individuals may be required to pay a deposit from their own funds by the mortgagee in order to take out that mortgage, or they may choose to do so to reduce the size of their mortgage debt. Where these deposits are the only cash contributions made by the parties (otherwise than by way of mortgage), their proportionate size may be decisive of the parties' respective equitable interests, or may contribute to their part of the balance sheet, as seen above in relation to Springette v Defoe and Huntingford v Hobbs, and below in relation to Midland Bank v Cooke and McHardy v Warren. In short, if A and B each contribute £5,000 separately by way of mortgage deposit, and borrow £90,000 by way of mortgage (making a total acquisition price of £100,000), A and B would acquire half each of the equitable interest in the property – the mortgagee would not acquire any equitable interest in the property because the parties' common intention would have been that the mortgagee acquire only the rights of a secured lender and not those of a beneficiary under a resulting trust. As a consequence, the mortgage deposit will be a significant part of the allocation of the equitable interest in many such cases.

So, in Midland Bank v Cooke,¹⁶⁰ it was held that a common intention constructive trust can arise where X and Y equally provide a deposit on a house purchased in the name of one or both of them.¹⁶¹ W had contributed nothing to the purchase price, but was deemed to have contributed the deposit for the purchase of the property, which had been given to them by way of wedding gift, equally with H. The question arose whether or not she had any beneficial interest in the property in any event. Waite LJ held that the judge must survey the whole course of dealing of the parties. Further, the court is not required to confine its survey to the limited range of acts of direct contribution of the sort that are needed to found a beneficial interest in the first place. If that survey is inconclusive, the court should fall back on the maxim 'equality is equity'. Part of the judgment of Waite LJ was that equal contribution to the original deposit was an indication that the parties intended to split the equitable interest in their home equally between them. However, as considered above, it is difficult to reconcile this focus on equality between the parties with the other cases in this area asserting a strict approach based on direct contributions to the purchase price (for example, Rosset), or the balance sheet cases (for example, Huntingford) which would consider such an equal division to be inequitable.

On the issue of deposits and subsequently-purchased homes, in McHardy v Warren,¹⁶² H's parents had paid the whole of the deposit on the matrimonial home acquired by H and his wife, W. The legal title in the property was registered in H's sole name. The remainder of the purchase price of the property was provided entirely by means of a mortgage. The mortgage was taken out in H's name only. That house was sold and then two subsequent homes were bought (one after the other) out of the sale proceeds of the first home. The mortgagee sought to recover its security by seeking an order for the sale of the house. W sought to resist its claim on the basis that she had an equitable interest in the property too, grounded on the argument that the deposit provided by her father-in-law constituted a wedding gift to them both, and therefore that she had acquired an equitable interest at that stage derived from her share of the wedding present. Consequently, she claimed that she had 50% of the equitable interest in the original property, which translated into 50% of all subsequent acquisitions.

160 [1995] 4 All ER 562.

161 The facts of this case are considered in greater detail in section 15.6 below in relation to the family assets doctrine.

162 [1994] 2 FLR 338.

It was contended on behalf of the mortgagee that W had only a right equal to the cash value of W's half of the deposit in proportion to the total purchase price of the house. That is, a right to half of the original £650 deposit (£325) out of the total value of the property. The central principle was held to be that the parties must have intended that there be equal title in the property to sustain W's argument. On the facts, the court felt that the only plausible conclusion to be drawn was that the intention of the father in putting up the deposit was to benefit H and W equally, and that their intention must be that the property be held equally in equity. Therefore, the court held that W was entitled to equal share of house with H because W put up the deposit equally with H. In consequence, the building society could not claim that W was entitled merely to £325 and was bound by her half-share in the equitable interest in the property.

Time of the creation of the interest

What emerges from the foregoing discussion is that the contribution does not need to be made before the purchase of the property. Rather, the various forms of contribution accepted in the foregoing cases demonstrate that the manner in which the court will draw up the parties' balance sheet will be by reference to a broad range of contributions and entitlements created at different times after acquisition. The Court of Appeal in *Huntingford v Hobbs*¹⁶³ upheld the use of cogent evidence to demonstrate that documentation was not intended to constitute the full extent of the parties' interests. Further, it was held that the resulting trust in that case crystallised on the date of the acquisition of the property. There was also the possibility of equitable accounting to take into account periods of rent-free occupation by one or other of the parties.¹⁶⁴ In contradistinction to the assertion made in Rosset that the contribution to the purchase price, or the agreement giving rise to a common intention constructive trust, must occur at the date of the purchase, it has been held that a constructive trust arises from the date of the acts complained of.¹⁶⁵

Resulting trusts under Jones v Kernott

As discussed in detail below, the doctrine of resulting trusts was not considered by Lord Walker in Stack v Dowden nor in Jones v Kernott to be appropriate in relation to trusts of homes. However, even the decisions on the facts of those cases focused primarily on the cash contributions made by the parties, just like a resulting trust. The dissenting judgment of Lord Neuberger in Stack v Dowden began with a resulting trust and, very like Huntingford v Hobbs, then allowed the resulting trust to be adjusted to account for subsequent developments. In truth, the only difference between these approaches in practice is the extent to which the initial calculation, based on the parties' financial contributions to the purchase price of the property and to the mortgage instalments, is adjusted to take into account later changes in the parties' intentions.

163 [1993] 1 FLR 736.

164 Bernard v Josephs [1982] Ch 391; Huntingford v Hobbs [1993] 1 FLR 736.

165 Re Sharpe [1980] 1 WLR 219.

15.6 THE FAMILY ASSETS APPROACH

Alternative Court of Appeal decisions have developed a family asset approach which suggests that property should be deemed to be held equally between couples.

15.6.1 Explaining the approach

It is common for civil code jurisdictions to take the approach that married couples take all of their property communally – neither having any interest without the other. This concept is similar to the English notion of joint tenancy. In California and in France, for example, there is an ability for married couples to select the legal form of marriage they prefer, and whether or not they agree to take their property communally or separately (joint or several ownership respectively, in effect). This approach has had some currency in occasional English common law decisions relating to equitable ownership of the family home. Most recently, I will argue, it is the decisions of Waite LJ which have propounded a form of family assets doctrine which is avowedly grounded in Gissing v Gissing,¹⁶⁶ but which has eschewed the complexity of much of the other case law in favour of dividing property equally between couples terminating a long relationship.

The expression 'family assets' was used by Lord Denning in relation to the division of property on a divorce.¹⁶⁷ The phrase 'family assets' was considered to be a 'convenient short way of expressing an important concept. It refers to those things which are acquired by one or other or both of the parties, with the intention that there should be continuing provision for them and their children during their joint lives, and used for the benefit of the family as a whole'.¹⁶⁸ While this attempt to introduce a new model constructive trust to give effect to family assets was championed by Lord Denning,¹⁶⁹ it did not find universal favour in the law of property and was discarded.¹⁷⁰ Lord Denning sets out his eminently readable view of the cases in which he was involved in this area in his memoir The Due Process of Law.¹⁷¹ He also maps with great clarity the crumbling of the developments which he helped to propound. It is not suggested here that that thinking has been given effect to in the courts in retrospect. Rather, it is suggested that there are similarities in a strain of decisions delivered by family courts in relation to rights in property which have echoes of Lord Denning's approach.¹⁷²

166 [1971] AC 886. Cf White v White [2000] 2 FLR 981, 989, per Lord Nicholls, eschewing concentration solely on the financial contributions of the breadwinner.

167 Wachtel v Wachtel [1973] Fam 72, 90.

168 Ibid.

169 Hussey v Palmer [1972] 1 WLR 1286; Cooke v Head [1972] 1 WLR 518; Eves v Eves [1975] 1 WLR 1338: imposed wherever 'justice and good conscience require'. Hazell v Hazell [1972] 1 WLR 301 – look at all circumstances, including overall contribution to the family budget.

170 Ivin v Blake [1995] 1 FLR 70; MacFarlane v MacFarlane [1972] NILR 59, 66; and McHardy v Warren [1994] 2 FLR 338.

171 Butterworths, 1980, 227 et seq.

172 Hammond v Mitchell [1991] 1 WLR 1127; Midland Bank v Cooke [1995] 4 All ER 562; Drake v Whipp [1996] 1 FLR 826; Rowe v Prance [1999] 2 FLR 787. Cf Re B (Child: Property Transfer) [1999] 2 FLR 418.

This approach has been rejected in a number of English decisions. It has been held in a range of cases¹⁷³ that English law on the home contains no such concept as the ‘family assets’ doctrine as a result of the decisions of the House of Lords in Gissing and Pettitt. What is meant by a family assets doctrine in those cases is that it is not possible to say that where a purchase is made out of the general assets of a family the equitable interest in the property so acquired should be divided equally among those family members. However, the law of trusts of homes permits a number of seemingly irreconcilable doctrines, as will emerge from the following discussion. The family assets approach considered here is something quite different.

15.6.2 Where equality is equity

The confusion which remains at the doctrinal level in these cases is well illustrated by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Midland Bank v Cooke.¹⁷⁴ In 1971, a husband and wife purchased a house for £8,500. The house was registered in the husband’s sole name. The purchase was funded as follows: the bulk of the purchase price (£6,450) was provided by means of mortgage taken out in the husband’s name, although Mrs Cooke was a signatory to a second mortgage subsequently taken out over the property. Mr Cooke made a cash contribution of £950, with the balance being provided by means of a wedding present made to the couple of £1,100. That is:

- (a) £6,450 (by way of mortgage loan);
- (b) £1,100 (wedding gift from H’s parents to the couple);
- (c) £950 (H’s cash contribution);
- (d) £8,500 (total purchase price).

In 1978, the mortgage was replaced by a more general mortgage in favour of H, which secured the repayment of his company’s business overdraft. In 1979 W signed a consent form to subordinate any interest she might have to the bank’s mortgage. Subsequently the bank sought forfeiture of the mortgage and possession of the house in default of payment. W claimed undue influence (before the decision in *Barclays Bank v O’Brien*¹⁷⁵) and an equitable interest in the house to override the bank’s claim.

The Court of Appeal, in the sole judgment of Waite LJ, went back to Gissing without considering the detail of Rosset (although accepting that the test in Rosset was ordinarily the test to be applied). Waite LJ had trouble with the different approaches adopted in *Springette v Defoe*¹⁷⁶ and McHardy v Warren.¹⁷⁷ The former calculated the interests of the parties on a strictly mathematical, resulting trust basis; whereas the latter looked to the intentions of all the parties as to whether or not the deposit should be considered as a proportionate part of the total purchase price, or as establishing a half-share of the equity in the property. His Lordship claimed to find the difference in these approaches ‘mystifying’.

173 Ivin v Blake [1995] 1 FLR 70; MacFarlane v MacFarlane [1972] NILR 59, 66 and McHardy v Warren [1994] 2 FLR 338.

174 [1995] 4 All ER 562.

175 [1994] 1 AC 180.

176 [1992] 2 FLR 388.

177 Ibid.

The question then arose as to how the court should address this problem. Waite LJ returned to the speech of Lord Diplock in Gissing and to the decision of Browne-Wilkinson VC in Grant v Edwards, before holding as follows:

[T]he duty of the judge is to undertake a survey of the whole course of dealing between the parties relevant to their ownership and occupation of the property and their sharing of its burdens and advantages. That scrutiny will not confine itself to the limited range of acts of direct contribution of the sort that are needed to found a beneficial interest in the first place. It will take into consideration all conduct which throws light on the question what shares were intended. Only if that search proves inconclusive does the court fall back on the maxim that ‘equality is equity’.

On these facts, the matter could not be decided simply by reference to the cash contributions of the parties. The court accepted that the parties constituted a clear example of a situation in which a couple ‘had agreed to share everything equally’. Facts indicating this shared attitude to all aspects of their relationship included evidence of the fact that Mrs Cooke had brought up the children, worked part-time and full-time to pay household bills, and had become a co-signatory to the second mortgage. This is an approach which echoes family law principles such as the ‘clean break’ approach in divorce proceedings under s 25A of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973.¹⁷⁸

What is not clear is how this decision is to be reconciled with the findings in *Burns v Burns*¹⁷⁹ and *Nixon v Nixon*¹⁸⁰ that activities revolving only around domestic chores could not constitute the acquisition of rights in property. Further, it is not obvious how the decision can be reconciled with the dicta of Lord Bridge in Rosset that a common intention formed on the basis of conduct must be directed at the mortgage payments and that it ‘is at least extremely doubtful that anything less will do’. Returning to Gissing, as Lord Pearson held: ‘I think that the decision of cases of this kind have been made more difficult by excessive application of the maxim “equality is equity”.’¹⁸¹ Therefore, Waite LJ’s approaches in Cooke above and in *Hammond v Mitchell*¹⁸² are fundamentally different from those earlier principles. Furthermore, the family assets approach is in line with the possibility of providing for equitable accounting, so that the court can take account of expenditure made on property even if the claimant is not awarded the proprietary interest which she sought.¹⁸³ The principles of family law considered in Chapter 17¹⁸⁴ will include those forms of ancillary and substantive relief available to claimants under statute.¹⁸⁵ That the settled patterns of 178 Eg, F v F (Clean Break: Balance of Fairness) [2003] 1 FLR 847.

179 [1984] Ch 317.

180 [1969] 1 WLR 1676.

181 [1971] AC 886, 903.

182 [1991] 1 WLR 1127.

183 For a discussion of the operation of such equitable accounting in English law, see Cooke, 1995, 391; also Re Pavlou [1993] 2 FLR 751, Millett J; Leake v Bruzzi [1974] 1 WLR 1528, CA; not following Cracknell v Cracknell [1971] P 356; Suttill v Graham [1977] 1 WLR 819, CA; Re Gorman [1990] 2 FLR 284, per Vinelott J.

184 At section 17.4 below.

185 Bedson v Bedson [1965] 2 QB 666; Re John’s Assignment Trusts [1970] 1 WLR 955; Bernard v Josephs [1982] Ch 391, 411; Chhokar v Chhokar [1984] FLR 313.

ownership in proportion to contributions to purchase price are not to be followed slavishly has emerged in family law cases, which are more concerned to consider the family's needs in the round.¹⁸⁶

15.6.3 Communal undertakings

In most cases involving long-term relationships and children, there will be a complicated list of items of property and communal undertakings. Picking between real and personal property, and including matters like the value of voluntary work by one spouse in the other spouse's business, will all confuse the issue whether or not any rights in property have been acquired. There are also further issues as to title in the personal property which a couple will amass during the course of their relationship. One of my favourite cases explores precisely this point. *Hammond v Mitchell*¹⁸⁷ was a decision of Waite J (as he then was) in which the question arose as to rights in real property, business ventures and chattels. Hammond was a second-hand car salesman who was aged 40 and who had recently left his wife. He picked up Mitchell when she flagged his car down to ask directions in Epping Forest. She was then a Bunny Girl (or nightclub hostess) at the Playboy club in Mayfair, then aged 21. Very soon after that first meeting they began living together. It was said by Waite J that '[t]hey both shared a zest for the good life'.¹⁸⁸ The relationship lasted 11 years and produced two children. Their partnership was tempestuous, and when it finally ended the issue arose whether or not Mitchell had acquired any interest in any property which, predominantly, was held in Hammond's name.

The history of the equitable interest in their personal and their real property followed a familiar pattern, in that '[t]hey were too much in love at this time either to count the pennies or pay attention to who was providing them'.¹⁸⁹ Hammond had told Mitchell that they would marry when he was divorced. He also told her not to worry about herself and the children because 'everything is half yours'. In time they bought a house in Essex in which they continued to live until the break-up of their relationship. They lived hand-to-mouth, trading in cash and filling their house with movable goods. She worked in his business ventures with him. There were no formal accounts and no formal agreements as to rights in any form of property. Aside from the house and its contents, they both acquired interests in restaurant ventures in Valencia, Spain. Mitchell decided to leave Hammond, and so stuffed the Mercedes he had bought her with lots of movables and moved out of the house when he was abroad. They were briefly reconciled before she left him again, with a large amount of personal property crammed this time into a Jaguar XJS.

Waite J was clear that he considered the question of finding a common intention 'detailed, time-consuming and laborious'.¹⁹⁰ The first question for the court to address was whether there was any agreement. Here there had been discussions as to the house. Echoing Lord Pearson in Pettitt v Pettitt, Waite J held that '[t]his is not an area where the maxim "equality

186 Lambert v Lambert [2002] EWCA Civ 1685; cf Le Foe v Le Foe [2001] 2 FLR 970. See Probert, 2004; Barlow, 2004.

187 [1991] 1 WLR 1127.

188 Ibid, 1129.

189 Ibid, 1130.

190 Ibid.

is equity” falls to be applied unthinkingly’.¹⁹¹ However, in the light of all the facts, it was found that Mitchell’s share of the house should be one half of the total interest, on the basis that it appeared that the couple had intended to muck in together and thereby share everything equally.

The second question was whether or not there was any imputed intention which should be applied to the parties. It was found that while Mitchell contributed personally to the business which Hammond had set up in Valencia, this did not justify any reallocation of any proprietary rights without more. Her cash investment had not, it was found, been made with an intention to acquire any further property rights in that Spanish property. With reference to the household chattels, it was held that ‘the parties must expect the courts to adopt a robust allegiance to the maxim “equality is equity”’.¹⁹² Therefore, everything was divided in accordance with the parties’ perceived common intentions much in the manner that a family court judge would have divided the property, it is suggested.

The extraordinary facet of the ‘family assets doctrine’ is that it eschews all of the carefully prescribed rules in Rosset and other similar cases. Rather than concern himself with the niceties of the time of contributions and so forth, Waite LJ appears to be either a great realist or a great romantic. He is a great realist in that he acknowledges that life is a chaotic muddle for many people, in which they do not pay careful attention to their property rights when seeking to cope with the many vicissitudes of life. It is the possibility of drawing careful distinctions which is (in the judge’s word) mystifying, particularly when those distinctions will not fall easily between an interest consensus and a money consensus on competing authorities. Waite LJ is a great romantic when he acknowledges the passionate confusion personified by Hammond and Mitchell and acknowledges that their real intention was to treat everything as shared between them.

There is one further doctrine which offers even more scope to the judiciary to indulge their desire for the discretion to allocate proprietary rights between one party and another: that is the doctrine of proprietary estoppel, which is considered next.

15.7 PROPRIETARY ESTOPPEL

Exceptionally, the doctrine of proprietary estoppel will grant an equitable interest to a person who has been induced to suffer detriment in reliance on a representation (or some assurance) that she would acquire some rights in the property as a result. Whereas rights based on constructive trust and resulting trust are ‘institutional’ trusts taking retrospective effect, proprietary estoppel may give a different kind of right.

This section considers the doctrine of proprietary estoppel as it relates to the home. Chapter 13 considers the breadth and scope of equitable estoppel in greater detail. The reader is therefore also referred to that discussion for a more detailed discussion of these principles and of recent cases.

191 Ibid, 1137.

192 Ibid, 1138.

15.7.1 The test underlying the doctrine of proprietary estoppel

The modern understanding of the doctrine of proprietary estoppel was set out most clearly by Edward Nugee QC in Re Basham.¹⁹³ That case supported the three-stage requirement of representation, reliance and detriment:

. . . where one person, A, has acted to his detriment on the birth of a belief, which was known to and encouraged by another person, B, cannot insist on his strict legal rights if to do so would be inconsistent with A's belief . . . where the belief is that A is going to be given a right in the future, it is properly to be regarded as giving rise to a species of constructive trust, which is the concept employed by a court of equity to prevent a person from relying on his legal rights where it would be unconscionable for him to do so. The rights to which proprietary estoppel gives rise, and the machinery by which effect is given to them, are similar in many respects to those involved in cases of secret trusts, mutual wills, and other comparable cases in which property is vested in B on the faith of an understanding that it will be dealt with in a particular manner . . . In cases of proprietary estoppel the factor which gives rise to the equitable obligation is A's alteration of his position on the faith of a similar understanding.

In short, proprietary estoppel will arise where the claimant has performed some act (arguably, which must be done in relation to the property) to her detriment in reliance upon a representation made to her by the cohabitee, from whom the claimant would thereby seek to acquire an equitable interest in the property.¹⁹⁴

It is clear from the cases that the representation made by the defendant need only amount to an assurance, and it can be implied rather than needing to be made expressly.¹⁹⁵ Therefore, it is sufficient that the defendant allowed the claimant to believe that her actions would acquire her property rights; it is not necessary that there be any express, single promise. Therefore, a series of suggestions made at family gatherings over a number of years which caused the claimant to believe that doing work on land for low wages would lead to the acquisition of some interest in the land was sufficient to constitute a representation.¹⁹⁶ However, it must not be the case that the representation was simply being made by a man to impress a woman in the early stages of a casual relationship when it could not reasonably have been intended that that man intended to part with half of the equitable interest in a huge country estate.¹⁹⁷ Similarly, it is not enough to acquire an interest in her mother's house that a daughter who was educationally-challenged believed that she would have a house bought for her by her mother.¹⁹⁸ In that case, it was held that there had not been any binding representation made which would entitle the daughter to take absolute title in the house after her mother's death when her mother had left the house by will to her third husband. Reliance is generally

193 [1986] 1 WLR 1498.

194 Ibid; In Re Sharpe (A Bankrupt) [1980] 1 WLR 219.

195 Crabb v Arun DC [1976] Ch 179.

196 Gillett v Holt [2001] Ch 210.

197 Lissimore v Downing [2003] 2 FLR 308.

198 Turner v Jacob [2006] EWHC 1317 (Ch).

assumed (on an evidential basis) where a representation has been made.¹⁹⁹ The question of what will constitute ‘detriment’ is considered below.

The decision of the House of Lords in *Thorner v Major*²⁰⁰ concerned the availability of proprietary estoppel in relation to a farm, and gave a clear idea of just how far the requirement of a representation can be stretched. The claimant had worked seven days a week, often for sixteen hours a day, for many years on the deceased’s farm. There was a suggestion that a representation had been impliedly made to the claimant over time by the deceased to the effect that the claimant would become the owner of the deceased’s farm after the deceased’s death, even though in the event the deceased did not leave the farm by will to the claimant. These two men had never discussed the matter between them, something which was explained by their lordships as involving the legendarily taciturn nature of farmers in that part of Somerset. Remarkably, this meant that a representation was found on the facts even though no words were ever spoken between them. The House of Lords held that on these facts there had been a sufficient assurance made by the deceased to the claimant on which it was reasonable for the claimant to have formed the impression that he would become the owner of the farm after the deceased’s death, in reliance on which he worked to his detriment on the other man’s farm. The claimant worked staggeringly long hours on the farm in hard, physical work, and it is difficult not to think that the court was anything other than impressed by that dedication and imputed (or possibly inferred) both an understanding on the part of the claimant that he must have expected a right in the property and an intention on the part of the deceased that the farm would be left to the claimant. In any event, the claim for proprietary estoppel was upheld.²⁰¹ Their lordships, especially Lords Walker and Rodger, made much of the fact that was found by the trial judge that farmers in this part of Somerset could be naturally taciturn, that these two men in particular spoke very few words to one another about anything, and therefore that the absence of any more explicit representation should not necessarily be read as denying the presence of a suitable understanding between these parties that the claimant’s work was being done to his evident detriment in reliance on that understanding. As Lord Rodger put it, there does not need to be a ‘signature event’ on which a clear representation was made:²⁰² which means that there does not need to be a single moment when the representation was made and evidenced and so forth. Instead it is sufficient, as Lord Rodger²⁰³ and Lord Walker²⁰⁴ held, that the ‘relevant assurance’ which was made was ‘clear enough’ in the context. So, if the representor was ‘standing by in silence’, aware that the claimant was acting to his detriment on the belief that he was thus acquiring a right in the property, then that would be enough to grant him rights on the basis of 199 Lim v Ang [1992] 1 WLR 113; Grant v Edwards [1986] Ch 638.

200 [2009] 1 WLR 776. This case was considered in Sinclair v Sinclair [2009] EWHC 926 (Ch) where it was described as being a case ‘about what was expressly said by way of assurance’: although the case clearly is more nuanced than that.

201 The House of Lords was unanimous in finding the existence of a right on these facts, although Lord Scott dissented in part on the basis that this case should have been decided on the basis of a remedial constructive trust, and not proprietary estoppel.

202 [2009] 1 WLR 776, para [24].

203 Ibid, para [26].

204 Ibid, para [56]. Relying on Hoffmann LJ in Walton v Walton, [1994] CA Transcript No 479 (unreported) to the effect that: ‘The promise must be unambiguous and must appear to have been intended to be taken seriously. Taken in its context, it must have been a promise which one might reasonably expect to be relied upon by the person to whom it was made.’

proprietary estoppel.²⁰⁵ Lord Hoffmann and Lord Neuberger concurred in general terms with Lord Walker.

It is important that the assurances of the representor have been intended by their maker to lead the claimant to believe that he would acquire rights in property. So, for example, it would not be sufficient that the representor was merely toying with the claimant without either of them forming a belief that the claimant would in fact acquire any rights in property. For, as Robert Walker LJ put it in Jennings v Rice, 'it is notorious that some elderly persons of means²⁰⁶ derive enjoyment from the possession of testamentary power, and from dropping hints as to their intentions, without any question of any estoppel arising'.²⁰⁷ On the facts of *Gillett v Holt*²⁰⁸ it was clear that the assurances had been repeated frequently and were sincerely meant when made. It is clear that in general terms it will be sufficient if the defendant makes an express representation to the claimant²⁰⁹ but it would also be sufficient to establish an estoppel if some implied assurance were made in circumstances in which the defendant knew that the claimant was relying on the impression she had formed.²¹⁰

As Re Basham and Thorner v Major indicate, a typical situation in which proprietary estoppel claims arise is where promises are made by the absolute owner of land to another person that the other person will acquire an interest in the land if she performs acts which would otherwise be detrimental to her.²¹¹ Typically, then, the person making the promise dies without transferring any right in the property to that other person. This aspect of the doctrine is similar to the law on secret trusts considered in Chapter 6 above, whereby proprietary rights are transferred despite the formal requirements of the Wills Act 1837. For example, in Re Basham,²¹² the plaintiff was 15 years old when her mother married the deceased. She worked unpaid in the deceased's business, cared for the deceased through his illness, sorted out a boundary dispute for the deceased, and refrained from moving away when her husband was offered employment with tied accommodation elsewhere. All of these acts were performed on the understanding that she would acquire an interest in property on the deceased's death. The deceased died intestate. It was held that the plaintiff had acquired an equitable interest on proprietary estoppel principles. It was found that proprietary estoppel arises where A has acted to his detriment, on the faith of a belief, which was known of and encouraged by B, that he either has or will receive a right over B's property; in which case B cannot insist on strict legal rights so as to conflict with A's belief.

This can be contrasted with Layton v Martin,²¹³ in which a man had promised to provide for his mistress in his will. He died without leaving any of the promised bequests in his will, 205 [2009] 1 WLR 776, para [55], per Lord Walker. The House of Lords was unanimous in finding the existence of a right on these facts, although Lord Scott dissented in part on the basis that this case should have been decided on the basis of a remedial constructive trust, and not proprietary estoppel.

206 A 'person of means' is a rich person.

207 [2000] 2 All ER 289, 304.

208 Ibid.

209 Taylor's Fashions Ltd v Liverpool Victoria Trustees Co Ltd [1982] 1 QB 133; Re Basham (Deceased) [1986] 1 WLR 1498; Wayling v Jones (1993) 69 P & CR 170; Gillett v Holt [2000] 2 All ER 289.

210 Crabb v Arun DC [1976] Ch 179.

211 Gillett v Holt [2000] 2 All ER 289.

212 [1986] 1 WLR 1498.

213 [1986] 1 FLR 171.

and therefore the mistress sued his estate claiming rights on constructive trust. Her claim was rejected on the basis that she had not contributed in any way to the maintenance of his assets.²¹⁴ At one level it is a decision based on the absence of detriment. This can be compared with the decision in Re Basham, in which the claimant was found to have made sufficient contributions to the defendant's assets.²¹⁵ Similarly, where a wife contributes to her husband's business activities generally, it may be found that she has suffered detriment which will ground a right in property,²¹⁶ particularly if this evidences a common intention at some level which may be undocumented.²¹⁷ Other relatives will be entitled to rely on their contributions to the acquisition or maintenance of property where there have been assurances made to them that they would be able to occupy that property as their home.²¹⁸ In such situations it is essential that the expenditure is made in reliance on a representation that it will acquire the contributor some right in the property.²¹⁹ So, for example, if a father were to promise his son that the son would acquire an equitable interest in a house owned by his father and that in reliance on that promise (and with the agreement of his father) the son were to sell his house so as to pay for renovation works on his father's house, there would have been a representation, reliance and detriment (where the detriment was in the form of selling the house to pay for the renovations) sufficient to found a claim for proprietary estoppel.²²⁰ In those circumstances, however, the judge expressed himself as finding that the events gave rise to a 'constructive trust' in the son's favour, after some inconclusive discussion about whether 'proprietary estoppel and constructive trust' should be treated as the same doctrine or as two separate doctrines.²²¹

214 See also Midland Bank v Dobson [1986] 1 FLR 171 – the wife's claim failed because there was no evidence that she had suffered any detriment.

215 As noted by Martin, 1997, 211; Hayton, 1997, 215; Davey, 1988, 101.

216 Heseltine v Heseltine [1971] 1 WLR 342.

217 Re Densham [1975] 1 WLR 1519.

218 Re Sharpe [1980] 1 WLR 219 – aunt acquires 'constructive trust' right on the basis of contributions to the acquisition of the property based on a promise that she could live there.

219 Thomas v Fuller-Brown [1988] 1 FLR 237, per Slade LJ – spending money does not, by itself, bring rights in property.

220 S v R [2008] EWHC 1874 (Fam), [2009] 1 P & CR D12 (also sub nom Q v Q). This was a case with a Dickensian range of characters (sons and daughters) involving tremendous familial bitterness in which a widower (aged 98 at the date of the proceedings) railed against his middle-aged son and daughter-in-law, referring to one of his sons as a 'rotter' and in evidence said 'I already cut you off a matter of years ago so unfortunately am denied the satisfaction of doing it again, for you are indeed the prodigal son personified, and deserve the soubriquet as they say "in spades"'. May you burn in Hell.' As such the court had great difficulty in finding facts because of the enmity between the parties. The daughter-in-law faced charges that she was a 'gold digger'; but she, giving as good as she got, suggested that the old man was 'fantastically mean/stingy'. The dispute concerned reorganisation of the family houses and personal property so as to minimise liability to inheritance and capital gains tax; and in particular one house which had fallen into disrepair. This particular house had not been dusted for fourteen years, it needed underpinning work, it was infested with fleas, smelled strongly of dog urine, had old tyres in the loft, the plumbing and wiring were 'pre-war', and 'the garden was a jungle'. It sounds like a palace! The old man exerted influence over his sons by reference to parcelling out his wealth. Some of the family members were wealthy and successful; one other had succumbed to drink: yet at one time the father's affection was for the recovering alcoholic, not the successful son, although affections and alliances had shifted over time. Consequently, trying to establish the agreement (founding the representation) in the context of complex tax planning before the old man moved to Monaco was difficult. However, the summary in the text serves well enough as a digest of the points of principle in the case.

221 Ibid, para 115, per Black J.

Another classic example of proprietary estoppel arose in the decision of Lord Denning in Greasley v Cooke.²²² There a woman, Doris Cooke, had been led to believe that she could occupy property for the rest of her life. She had been the family's maid, but then had formed an emotional relationship with one of the family and become his partner. In reliance on this understanding, she looked after the Greasley family, acting as a housekeeper, instead of getting herself a job and providing for her own future. The issue arose whether or not she had acquired any equitable interest in the property. It was held by Lord Denning that she had suffered detriment in looking after the family and not getting a job in reliance on the representation made to her. Therefore, it was held that she had acquired a beneficial interest in the property under proprietary estoppel principles, because she had acted to her detriment in continuing to work for the Greasleys in reliance on their assurance to her that she would acquire some proprietary rights as a result. The form of right which Lord Denning granted was an irrevocable licence to occupy the property for the rest of her life.²²³ That such a particular remedy was awarded brings us to the more general question: what form of remedy can be awarded under proprietary estoppel principles?

15.7.2 The nature of the interest awarded under proprietary estoppel

Proprietary estoppel is very different, in a number of ways, from the institutional resulting and constructive trusts considered above. The aim of proprietary estoppel is to avoid detriment rather than to enforce the promise, whereas the common intention constructive trust appears to be quasi-contractual (in that it enforces an express or implied agreement), estoppel is directed at preventing detriment being caused by a broken promise. In Walton Stores v Maher,²²⁴ Brennan J held that:

The object of the equity is not to compel the party bound to fulfil the assumption or expectation: it is to avoid the detriment which, if the assumption or expectation goes unfulfilled, will be suffered by the party who has been induced to act or to abstain from acting thereon.²²⁵

In a similar vein, Lord Browne-Wilkinson held in *Lim v Ang*²²⁶ that the purpose of proprietary estoppel is to provide a response where 'it is unconscionable for the representor to go back on the assumption that he permitted the representee to make', that is, to avoid the detriment caused from retreating from that representation. This approach is important, because the court's intention is not merely to recognise that an institutional constructive trust exists between the parties but rather to provide a remedy which prevents the claimant from suffering detriment.²²⁷ The narrow line between proprietary estoppel and the (at the time of writing,

222 [1980] 1 WLR 1306.

223 What is particularly satisfying about this case is that, had Charles Dickens sought to incorporate these events into a novel like Nicholas Nickleby, he could have found no better name for the exploitative family than 'the Greasleys'.

224 (1988) 62 ALJR 110.

225 Ibid, 125.

226 [1992] 1 WLR 113, 117.

227 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

heretical) remedial constructive trust is considered at the end of this chapter. The determination of the courts to prevent detriment therefore requires the court both to identify the nature of the property rights which were the subject of the representation and to mould a remedy to prevent detriment resulting from the breach of promise. Typically, this requires the demonstration of a link between the detriment and an understanding that property rights were to have been acquired. Thus, in Wayling v Jones,²²⁸ two gay men, A and B, lived together as a couple. A owned an hotel in which B worked for lower wages than he would otherwise have received in an arm's-length arrangement. A promised to leave the hotel to B in his will. The hotel was sold and another acquired without any change in A's will having been made to reflect that assurance. B sought an interest in the proceeds of sale of the hotel. The issue turned on B's evidence as to whether or not he would have continued to work for low wages had A not made the representation as to the interest in the hotel. Initially, B's evidence suggested that it was as a result of his affection for A that B had accepted low wages. Before the Court of Appeal, B's evidence suggested that he accepted low wages from A in reliance on the assurance that B would acquire property rights in the hotel. Consequently, the Court of Appeal held that B was entitled to acquire proprietary rights under proprietary estoppel because his detrimental acts were directed at the acquisition of rights in property and were not merely the sentimental ephemera of their relationship.

In Hayton's view,²²⁹ the court is not here giving effect to pre-existing rights but rather is fitting a remedy to a particular wrong. This remedy may be akin to a remedial constructive trust. Indeed, it was held in *In Re Sharpe*²³⁰ that the proprietary estoppel right exists only from the date of the court order. The award appears to be remedial in its effect – providing a remedy for the detriment suffered.²³¹ However, it is worthy of note that in a number of cases, the court appears to be awarding expectation loss (that is, giving to the claimant rights which the claimant had expected to receive) rather than simply avoiding detriment.²³²

15.7.3 The nature of the remedies awarded under proprietary estoppel

The nature of the remedy is at the discretion of the court. The decision of the Court of Appeal in *Pascoe v Turner*²³³ is illustrative of the breadth of the remedy potentially available under a proprietary estoppel claim. The plaintiff and the defendant cohabited in a property which was registered in the name of the plaintiff alone. The plaintiff often told the defendant that the property and its contents were hers – however, the property was never conveyed to her. In reliance on these representations, the defendant spent money on redecoration and repairs to the property. While the amounts were not large, they constituted a large proportion of the defendant's savings. The defendant sought to assert rights under proprietary estoppel when the plaintiff sought an order to remove the defendant from the property.

228 (1993) 69 P & CR 170.

229 Hayton, 1990:1, 370; Hayton, 1993, 485.

230 In Re Sharpe (A Bankrupt) [1980] 1 WLR 219.

231 Lim v Ang [1992] 1 WLR 113, 117. See also Pawlowski, 1996, generally.

232 Pascoe v Turner [1979] 1 WLR 431; Greasley v Cooke [1980] 1 WLR 1306; and Re Basham [1986] 1 WLR 1498, all considered below.

233 [1979] 2 All ER 945, [1979] 1 WLR 431.

The decision of the Court of Appeal in Pascoe v Turner was that the size of interest applicable would be that required to do the ‘minimum equity necessary’ between the parties. Therefore, it was decided to award the transfer of the freehold to the defendant, to fulfil the promise that a home would be available to her for the rest of her life, rather than (apparently) merely to avoid the detriment which had actually been suffered in reliance on the representation. It is impossible to grant a larger interest in land than an outright assignment of the freehold. Therefore, the court apparently has within its power the ability to award any remedy which will prevent the detriment which would otherwise be suffered by the claimant or to fulfil the defendant’s representation.

However, it is not the case that proprietary estoppel will always lead to an award of property rights.²³⁴ For example, in Baker v Baker,²³⁵ the plaintiff was deemed entitled only to compensation in respect of the cost of giving up secure accommodation. The plaintiff was a 75-year-old man with a secure tenancy over a house in Finchley. The defendants were his son and daughter who rented accommodation in Bath. It was agreed that the plaintiff should vacate his flat and that the parties should buy a house together in Torquay. The plaintiff contributed £33,950, in return for which he was entitled to occupy the property rent-free. The defendants acquired the remainder of the purchase price by way of mortgage. The parties decided to terminate the relationship and the plaintiff was re-housed as a secure tenant with housing benefit.

It was not held that there was a resulting trust in favour of the plaintiff (a matter accepted by the court, and presumably the parties, although the reason is not clear from the judgment). Therefore, he sought to establish rights on the basis of proprietary estoppel. It was held that the appropriate equitable response was to provide him with equitable compensation rather than with a proprietary interest in the Torquay house. The amount of compensation was valued in accordance with the annual value of the accommodation he enjoyed, capitalised for the remainder of his life. The amount of the award would then be discounted as an award of a capital sum. Some account was also taken of the costs of moving and so forth. The application of equitable compensation, while a matter of some complexity,²³⁶ does not convey proprietary rights in the land at issue but only a right to receive equity’s equivalent to common law damages to remedy the detriment suffered as a result of the failure of the representation. What is remarkable about this decision is that the court was concerned to consider the claimant’s needs (here, for sheltered accommodation for the remainder of his life) and not simply to consider whether or not he had acquired rights in property. The strength of proprietary estoppel is that it enables the courts to achieve the most just result between the parties in novel situations.²³⁷

An excellent example of the flexibility of the award that is possible in proprietary estoppel cases emerges from the remarkable case of *Porntip Stallion v Albert Stallion Holdings (Great Britain) Ltd*²³⁸ Porntip Stallion, who was from the Philippines, came to London to work for Albert Stallion in 1984 and later married him in June 1989. She lived at Stallion’s premises at The Cut, Waterloo in London with Albert Stallion from some time in 1991. The couple 234 Matharu v Matharu [1994] 2 FLR 597, criticised by Battersby, 1995, 59.

235 (1993) 25 HLR 408.

236 Considered below in Chapter 18.

237 On the ability of proprietary estoppel to adapt to novel situations and to meet changing social mores, see Matharu v Matharu (1994) 68 P & CR 93; Sledmore v Dalby (1996) 72 P & CR 196; Cooke, 2000, 433.

238 [2009] EWHC 1950 (Ch), [2010] 1 FCR 145.

divorced in 1995. Albert Stallion married Lilibeth Stallion in the Philippines in 1996 before they moved to London together. However, Porntip had continued to occupy the property at The Cut even after the divorce, including intermittent periods during which she occupied that property with Albert and Lilibeth. Albert Stallion died in 2004, leaving Lilibeth as his executrix. The property had been owned by Albert Stallion Holdings (Great Britain) Limited, a company controlled by Albert Stallion.²³⁹ Porntip contended that representations had been made to her by Albert²⁴⁰ that she would be able to live at the property rent-free for the rest of her life provided that she did not contest the divorce in 1995 and that she did not seek a court order to protect her position.²⁴¹ Judge Asplin QC found²⁴² (following Thorner v Major.²⁴³) that ‘on the balance of probabilities’ such representations had been made²⁴⁴ and that Porntip had relied upon those representations to her detriment: the detriment being located in her agreement not to contest the divorce nor to acquire the protection of a court order. Illustrating the remarkable flexibility of proprietary estoppel in provided tailor-made remedies, it was held that Porntip would be entitled to occupy the property rent-free for the remainder of her life; although she would not be granted exclusive possession of the property, but rather she would be required to occupy the property in common with Lilibeth (and her new husband and daughter).²⁴⁵ On the facts it was found that the parties would be able to live together in tolerable harmony.²⁴⁶ All of which simply goes to show that there is no accounting for the complexity of other people’s lives, and the occasionally surprising open-mindedness of English judges.²⁴⁷

239 The property was a house with a cellar in the Waterloo area of London, which excluded a bookmaker’s shop located on the ground floor which was leased from the company. Albert was the sole director and owner of 7,999 out of 8,000 shares in that company. The company conducted its business from these premises, although upper floors were given over to a residential home with four or five bedrooms.

240 The representations were made in part by a colleague (who did Albert’s ‘dirty work’) being deputed to ask her for a divorce; on one particular night Albert making oral representations to her about her ability to occupy the property and then writing them out on the basis that she could occupy the property or be paid £55,000 if she was asked to leave it; and then repetition of the representations at later meetings, at which other people were present, which were contended to have removed this caveat about the payment of money instead.

241 Porntip claimed exclusive possession of the residential part of the premises but abandoned a claim to the rents and profits from the remainder of the property.

242 [2010] 1 FCR 145, [110] et seq.

243 [2009] UKHL 18.

244 The judge spends some time on the respective levels of credibility of the various witnesses, who contradict themselves and one another greatly in giving their evidence. As is common in trusts of homes cases, the witnesses are generally impassioned and partial, and occasionally incredible.

245 [2010] 1 FCR 145, [137] and [138]. Porntip had given evidence that they had lived under the same roof ‘but separately’ before.

246 As the judge held at para [138]: ‘In this regard, I appreciate that it is an unusual step to create a situation in which the equity requires a claimant to continue to live in premises with the defendant. However, in this case, Porntip and Lilibeth appear to have done so for a considerable time both before and after Albert’s death.’ With respect, one cannot help but think that the surprising element is not that claimant and defendant will continue to live together but rather that the former wife and the widow would be expected by the High Court to live together. In that sense it is a very ‘modern’, even ‘progressive’ judgment; and a testament to the inherent flexibility of the doctrine of proprietary estoppel.

247 A female friend whom I was boring with an account of this, and other cases, wondered whether the fact that the judge was a woman might have led to this interesting judgment on the facts of this case, and its acceptance of an alternative mode of organising the parties’ living arrangements.

In conclusion, it is clear that proprietary estoppel will provide an entitlement to a broad range of remedies the application of which is at the discretion of the court. The court's discretion will be exercised so as to prevent the detriment potentially suffered by the claimant. What is more difficult to isolate is the extent to which this remedial jurisdiction equates to restitution of unjust enrichment. The issue is therefore whether proprietary estoppel could be said to be about the reversal of unjust enrichment. The difficulty with any such analysis is that there is no necessary pre-existing proprietary right in the property at issue. Rather, it is sufficient that there is some representation made in relation to that property. Consequently, it is unclear how proprietary estoppel could be said to operate so as to restore property rights to their original owner where there was previously no such right.²⁴⁸

What is less clear, then, is the basis on which proprietary estoppel arises. The role of estoppel is to prevent a legal owner from relying on common law rights where that would be detrimental to another. Alternatively, proprietary estoppel might be bundled up with the constructive trust notion of preventing unconscionable conduct more broadly, in particular if Rosset is taken to have elided the concepts. Some authorities would describe proprietary estoppel as raising a 'mere equity' which is binding only between the parties until the judgment is performed. More difficult explanations are that it provides a cause of action, thus infringing the notion that estoppel can only be a shield and not a sword, or that it operates to perfect imperfect gifts.²⁴⁹ Both of these readings have some validity on the cases considered. Evidently, in many situations, proprietary estoppel is the only means by which a claimant can sue and be awarded rights in land. For example, the award made in Pascoe operates in the face of Rosset, which would not have awarded any proprietary rights to the claimant for mere decorative work on the building. Consequently, the doctrine has the hallmarks of a de facto claim made to preclude unconscionability rather than to deal with the claimant's pre-existing property rights. As to the rule that equity will not perfect an imperfect gift, in any case where there is a representation to transfer rights in property, and where that promise is not carried out, proprietary estoppel is perfecting that imperfect gift on proof of some detriment suffered by the claimant – that is the distinction between the successful claimant and the mere volunteer.

15.8 THE UNCONSCIONABILITY APPROACH

15.8.1 The nature of the unconscionability approach

For some time it appeared that there was a further approach emerging in the cases based on the court considering whether or not there would be any unconscionability in denying the claimant an equitable interest in the property. In Chapter 12, we considered that constructive trusts were imposed wherever the defendant had acted knowing of some unconscionability in her treatment of property;²⁵⁰ and similarly in Chapter 13, we considered that, further to the 248 Nor is proprietary estoppel restitutionary in the sense of reversing unjust enrichment because there is no requirement that the defendant has been enriched – simply that the claimant has suffered detriment which was directed at the acquisition of rights in the property.

249 As considered in Chapter 13.

250 See para 12.2.1 above; see, eg, Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

decision of the Court of Appeal in Jennings v Rice,²⁵¹ the doctrine of proprietary estoppel might be metamorphosing into a general doctrine of equitable estoppel which is based on unconscionability in general terms. Consequently, a test based on unconscionability in relation to trusts of homes would bring this area into line with the mainstream principles on constructive trusts. In the developing ‘unconscionability approach’ in the law on trusts of homes, it is suggested, the courts are looking to consider whether or not it would be unconscionable for the defendant to deny property rights to the claimant. This may yet lead to a fusing of the principles of constructive trust and of proprietary estoppel in this context. This is very similar in form to the test of unconscionability which has been used in Australia for some time, as considered in para 15.10.2 below. It should be noted that identifying the existence of this ‘unconscionability approach’ is my own theory – collecting together otherwise disparate decisions of differently constituted courts – but it is suggested that it is the best way to understand this drift in the law.

The doctrinal significance of the unconscionability approach is that the courts are allocating equitable interests in the home without needing to base that finding on a common intention. Therefore, unlike the need in Lloyds Bank v Rosset to identify a common intention between the parties, the courts are considering whether or not it would be unconscionable to deny the claimant an interest in the home. This finding of unconscionability usually begins with a consideration of whether or not the parties have in fact reached an agreement, but even then the often vague finding of an agreement is usually tempered by a consideration of the entire course of dealing between the parties. Some of these courts have then expressed their intention as being to do what is ‘fair’ between the parties. Consequently, the doctrine of proprietary estoppel, with its remedial nature, and the general doctrine of constructive trusts, based on institutional and conscionable trusts, appear at first blush to be functioning in very similar fashions.

There are two distinct characteristics of the ‘unconscionability approach’. First, it is prepared to merge the doctrines of constructive trust and of proprietary estoppel so that the courts will be able to reach the decision which they consider to be most conscionable on the facts of any given case. This is different from the approach in Lloyds Bank v Rosset where Lord Bridge sought to merge these doctrines but precisely so that there could not be any such flexibility for the courts. Secondly, the courts are accepting that it will not be possible to generate any single set of principles which will cover all circumstances, primarily because there are so many different forms of relationship, and therefore achieving the most conscionable solution to any given set of facts is considered to be the only feasible means for a court to proceed. Consequently, the courts which have adopted this approach were paying lip-service to the test in Lloyds Bank v Rosset while also seeking to use the approach of Waite LJ in Midland Bank v Cooke to allow themselves to survey the whole course of dealing between the parties beyond merely financial contributions to the purchase of the property. As Patten J put this matter in Turner v Jacob:²⁵² ‘The question of unconscionability requires the court to look at all the relevant circumstances and not at particular factors in isolation.’ The cases considered below indicate this drift in the cases clearly.

251 [2003] 1 P & CR 100; [2002] EWCA Civ 159.

252 [2006] EWHC 1317 (Ch), [84].

15.8.2 The consensual approach taken in Oxley v Hiscock

The decision in Oxley v Hiscock

The most significant case in this vein at the time of writing appears to be Oxley v Hiscock.²⁵³ This decision of the Court of Appeal has become influential on subsequent decisions of the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court even though, as will emerge, it attempts an uncomfortable elision of most of the cases considered so far in this chapter into one combined test.²⁵⁴ We shall consider the facts of the case first, and then we shall consider how Chadwick LJ seeks to combine the earlier authorities.

In Oxley v Hiscock a woman exercised her statutory right to buy the house over which she had been a secure tenant: to effect the purchase, she used money given by her partner, a man to whom she was not married. The house was bought as a home for the couple and her children by a previous marriage, after he had been released from his confinement as a hostage during the 1990 Gulf War. The property was sold for £232,000 after their relationship broke down and issues arose as to which of them had what equitable interest in the property. Ultimately, the court held that this was a case of pooling resources²⁵⁵ where Mr Hiscock had contributed £60,000 and Ms Oxley had contributed £36,000 and other outgoings: therefore, the court divided the property in the ratio 60:40 in favour of Mr Hiscock. In reaching this conclusion, the court attempted a survey of the whole of the case law in this area and, even more optimistically, sought to reconcile the various cases. The court considered Springette v Defoe, Walker v Hall,²⁵⁶ Grant v Edwards, Lloyds Bank v Rosset and Midland Bank v Cooke, broadly in that order. These cases have all been considered already in this chapter.

The rationale underpinning the decision of Court of Appeal in Oxley v Hiscock

Relying particularly on Grant v Edwards as an explanation of Pettitt v Pettitt and Gissing v Gissing, the court held that the first question which a court must ask itself was whether or not there had been any common intention formed between the parties, either on the basis of direct evidence or inferred from the circumstances. Having identified such a common intention, it was held that one must then quantify the size of the right intended by that agreement. The speech of Lord Bridge in Lloyds Bank v Rosset was considered to be an affirmation of the judgment of Browne-Wilkinson VC in Grant v Edwards, rather than being a new approach entirely,²⁵⁷ although Chadwick LJ in Oxley v Hiscock did lapse into Lord Bridge's habit of referring in composite terms to 'constructive trust or proprietary estoppel' as though they were the same doctrine.²⁵⁸ It was said that the remedial techniques of proprietary estoppel can be used so as to alter the size of the share which either party may acquire in the property.²⁵⁹ The evident differences between Springette v Defoe and Lloyds Bank v Rosset were explained 253 [2004] EWCA Civ 546, [2004] 2 FLR 669, [2004] Fam Law 569.

254 It has been followed in Stack v Dowden [2005] EWCA Civ 857, [2006] 1 FLR 254; Crossley v Crossley [2005] EWCA Civ 1581, [2006] BPIR 404; and Turner v Jacob [2006] EWHC 1317 (Ch).

255 [2004] 2 FLR 669, para [74].

256 [1984] FLR 126.

257 [2004] 2 FLR 669, para [36].

258 Ibid, para [36].

259 Ibid, para [44], considering Stokes v Anderson [1991] 1 FLR 391.

away on the basis that the former case concentrated solely on the question as to the parties' common intention, whereas the latter required a further question to be answered as to whether or not the parties had reached any agreement.²⁶⁰ (That one case was concerned with resulting trust and the other with 'constructive trust or proprietary estoppel' was overlooked by Chadwick LJ.) Midland Bank v Cooke was considered by Chadwick LJ to have established a different understanding of the law based on a survey of the whole course of dealing, but it was further considered that the decision in *Drake v Whipp*²⁶¹ had subsequently reasserted that equitable interests would be based on resulting trust, while also permitting the respective rights of the parties under that resulting trust to be adjusted so as to achieve fairness between them. If one reads the judgment of Peter Gibson LJ in Drake v Whipp, however, it is plain that the Court of Appeal chose to base their judgment on constructive trust principles and not to limit themselves to the formulaic mathematics of resulting trusts. However, Midland Bank v Cooke was also explained by Chadwick LJ as being a case where Mrs Cooke was accepted as having acquired some interest under trust in the house and that the decision in that case was therefore really focused on quantifying that right. This approach, even if it is correct (which I doubt), does not tell us how Mrs Cooke is said to acquire a right from payment of bills and so forth in a manner which would not have been accepted in Lloyds Bank v Rosset as being anything more than a de minimis contribution at its highest.²⁶²

The conclusion to which Chadwick LJ came in *Oxley v Hiscock*²⁶³ was that:

what the court is doing, in cases of this nature, is to supply or impute a common intention as to the parties' respective shares (in circumstances in which there was in fact no common intention) on the basis of that which, in the light of all the material circumstances (including the acts and conduct of the parties after the acquisition) is shown to be fair . . . and it may be more satisfactory to accept that there is no difference in cases of this nature between constructive trust and proprietary estoppel.

It is suggested that the 'unconscionability' element of this approach is encapsulated in the notion that the court is looking for an understanding of the parties' common intention which would be 'fair', to quote Chadwick LJ. The court is thus concerned with establishing a fair result, as opposed to giving effect to the pre-existing rights of the parties. This is, it seems to me a very significant point: the court is prepared to 'supply' the parties' common intention, not simply to find it on the facts. That means the court is prepared to make up what the court thinks their common intention would have been, not simply to try to find out what it actually was. This is, therefore, a fiction of sorts. The court is doing what the court thinks is 'fair', not necessarily what the parties agreed to do.²⁶⁴ The reason for this is that the parties often do not

260 [2004] 2 FLR 669, para [48].

261 [1996] 1 FLR 826.

262 [2004] 2 FLR 669, para [67].

263 Ibid, para [66].

264 See for example Akhtar v Arif [2006] EWHC 2726 (Ch) in which Stuart Isaacs QC, sitting as a deputy judge of the High Court, was faced with contradictory evidence from numerous parties as to what their rights must have been and as to what their intentions must have been. Eventually the court ruled that the parties should be taken to have the equitable interest half each. It is a strange judgment which cites no case law authority at all but in which a judge at first instance can be seen wrestling with contradictory evidence and ending up with the compromise of equal division because there is no 'correct' answer on the facts. Thus the unconscionability approach does anticipate the plight of the ordinary judge in trying to impose a suitable answer on confused circumstances.

discuss their property rights in advance and so the courts feel compelled to supply an agreement for them. This is, I would suggest, a very long way away from Lord Bridge's clear requirements in Lloyds Bank v Rosset that there must have been an agreement, arrangement or understanding reached before the acquisition of the property.

Thus, the approach of Chadwick LJ appears to be remedial, like proprietary estoppel, as opposed to being institutional, like traditional constructive trusts: this means that the court is deciding what the parties' rights ought to be (and thus is in the form of a remedy invented by the court at its discretion) rather than simply seeking to give effect to the parties' pre-existing property rights based on their contributions to the purchase price (as with an institutional constructive trust). What this quasi-remedial, unconscionability approach also does is to fabricate or invent the parties' common intention – by inferring it from the circumstances – and opposed to requiring cogent evidence that that was consciously the actual common intention of the parties. It is this artificiality which has concerned other Commonwealth jurisdictions so much, as is considered below in relation to the New Zealand and Australian cases. Those courts are concerned that the English cases require them to 'supply' the parties' intention, even though the parties may not actually have had that intention consciously. What might be more intellectually satisfying would be for the English courts to accept that they wish to behave like family law courts and simply decide what sort of remedy would be fairest for the parties in all the circumstances, regardless of what they may have done beforehand.

Furthermore, considering the passage just quoted from the judgment of Chadwick LJ, I would suggest that this conclusion is insupportable on the decided cases as they have already been discussed in this chapter. It seems that Chadwick LJ's reference to 'cases of this nature' is a reference to cases in which there has been no agreement, or else Rosset would simply require that the agreement be enforced.²⁶⁵ (Oddly, his Lordship considered this to be limited to cases where both parties contributed to the purchase price (ignoring the cases where that did not happen)²⁶⁶ and where people intended to live together as husband and wife (thus ignoring the cases on same-sex couples and non-romantic home sharers).)²⁶⁷

Even if it should be taken to be a reference to all cases on trusts of homes, there is a clear difference between the first category of Rosset common intention constructive trusts by agreement, the balance sheet cases and the family assets cases, as discussed earlier in this chapter. Rosset was concerned with finding an agreement or inferring a common intention only from payment of the purchase price or the mortgage; it was not concerned with finding a common intention in the abstract. Moreover, Rosset and the 'balance sheet cases' are not concerned with a survey of all of the material circumstances, as was Midland Bank v Cooke, but rather only with contributions of money. None of the cases have expressed themselves to be concerned simply with 'fairness', except the 'family assets cases'. And, for the reasons given at the end of this section, it is not possible simply to declare that constructive trust and estoppel are the same: if they are to be merged, then the basis on which one or other of the doctrines is to be altered must be explained. Therefore, Chadwick LJ cannot succeed in explaining all of the cases as being in agreement with one another. What must be done instead is to declare some cases correct and other cases incorrect – something which a Court of Appeal cannot do in the wake of a House of Lords judgment. Or better, as in this chapter, one should instead understand the differences between the cases.

265 See the explanation which his Lordship gives at [2004] 2 FLR 669, para [68].

266 Eg, Hammond v Mitchell [1991] 1 WLR 1127; Midland Bank v Cooke [1995] 4 All ER 562. And the estoppel cases like Re Basham (Deceased) [1986] 1 WLR 1498 and Pascoe v Turner [1979] 1 WLR 431.

267 Wayling v Jones (1993) 69 P & CR 170; Tinsley v Milligan [1994] 1 AC 340.

The clearest example of Chadwick LJ's attempt to merge together doctrines which simply cannot be merged arises from his Lordship's attempt to reconcile Lloyds Bank v Rosset and Midland Bank v Cooke in one combined test. In Lloyds Bank v Rosset, Lord Bridge set out perfectly clearly that if there was no agreement between the parties then only contributions to the purchase price of the property or to the mortgage instalments would be sufficient to acquire an equitable interest in the land. By contrast, Waite LJ held that the court should 'survey the whole course of dealing' in Midland Bank v Cooke when deciding what conduct might be appropriate in the acquisition of an equitable interest in the land. Therefore, Waite LJ was clearly prepared to consider all conduct, even if it stretched beyond contributions to the purchase price of the property or to the mortgage instalments. Waite LJ is clearly taking an approach typical of a family court judge in considering all of the circumstances of the case. So, we come to Chadwick LJ in Oxley v Hiscock. His Lordship purported to reconcile these two radically different approaches (and all of the other approaches ranged across the spectrum between them) so that they could be merged into one test. That test would require that the court should look first for an agreement between the parties and only then at 'the whole course of dealing' if no such agreement could be found. This is simply to ignore the fact that the House of Lords in Rosset did not intend to permit such a broad survey to be undertaken by the court. Indeed the majority in the House of Lords in Gissing v Gissing also expressed themselves to be reluctant to accept the suggestion of Diplock LJ that common intentions could be identified on such a broad scale. It is suggested, therefore, that the exercise which Chadwick LJ undertook in Oxley v Hiscock is simply intellectually unsustainable.

15.8.3 Proprietary estoppel and unconscionability: Jennings v Rice

Proprietary estoppel was considered in section 15.7 above, and in much greater detail in Chapter 13. The purpose of this brief section is to correlate recent cases on proprietary estoppel with the 'unconscionability approach'. It was Walker LJ in *Jennings v Rice*²⁶⁸ who expressed the view that proprietary estoppel is intended to prevent unconscionability. What emerged from the discussion of proprietary estoppel above, and which is observable in the case of Jennings v Rice itself, is that a successful claimant may not be awarded property rights to prevent unconscionability. Instead the court may order that, to prevent the claimant suffering the effects of unconscionable behaviour, the claimant should be awarded an amount of money sufficient to compensate her for her detriment. So, in Jennings v Rice itself it was held by the Court of Appeal that a man who had helped an old woman around her home for a number of years should be entitled to something to compensate him for his trouble on the basis that she had given rise in his mind to some expectation in reliance on which he had acted to his detriment. The remedy was for an arbitrary sum of money: 'arbitrary' in the sense that it bore no specific relation to any particular detriment which he had suffered nor to any salary he might otherwise have earned. Instead, the court decided that was fair compensation in the circumstances generally. This approach in equitable estoppel is not entirely new, of course, as evidenced by the following passage from Oliver J in *Taylor Fashions v Liverpool Victoria Trustees Co Ltd*²⁶⁹ to the effect that if an award of proprietary estoppel were not made in that case then:

it would be unconscionable for a party to be permitted to deny that which, knowingly or unknowingly, he has allowed or encouraged another to assume to his detriment.²⁷⁰

Therefore, we can see that proprietary estoppel is increasingly based on the notion of unconscionability, arguably in common with the ordinary test for constructive trusts under Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington.²⁷¹

This proximity between the doctrines of constructive trust and proprietary estoppel is considered in detail in section 15.11.2, where it is suggested that there have always been significant differences between the doctrines. However, a semi-conscious elision of the concepts has been accepted in the unconscionability cases because there is a superficial similarity between their shared notions of ‘unconscionability’. So, in *Yaxley v Gotts*²⁷² it was held that both doctrines are ‘concerned with equity’s intervention to provide relief against unconscionable conduct’. Similarly in *Grant v Edwards*²⁷³ it was suggested by Browne-Wilkinson V-C that ‘useful guidance may in future be obtained from the principles underlying the law of proprietary estoppel which in my judgment are closely akin to those laid down in Gissing v Gissing’.²⁷⁴ Thus there is a reasonably long pedigree underpinning the idea that common intention constructive trusts and proprietary estoppel are based on similar principles. Most of these judicial comments do not suggest that the two doctrines should actually be seen as being one. The point is also made in Van Laetham v Brooker by Lawrence Collins J that the remedies provided in proprietary estoppel and constructive trust are effectively the same in that the courts award whatever rights they consider appropriate in good conscience.²⁷⁵ So, his Lordship identified an amount of money which the claimant was entitled to receive in that case which reflected her financial and manual contribution to the acquisition and development of various properties, while also taking into account the skilled and larger contributions of the defendant. Thus, instead of arguing that the two doctrines are identical, the courts tend to suggest that there are merely general similarities between them. That they do conceptually remain distinct is considered below at 15.11.2.

15.8.4 Seeking fairness in all the circumstances: Cox v Jones

An example of a court seeking to achieve a fair result in the circumstances, without concerning itself overly closely with the niceties of doctrine, is Cox v Jones. In *Cox v Jones*²⁷⁶ two 269 [1981] 2 WLR 576, 593. These sentiments were echoed by Oliver LJ in Habib Bank Ltd v Habib Bank AG [1981] 2 All ER 650, [1981] 1 WLR 1265, 1285.

270 This approach was followed in Turner v Jacob [2006] EWHC 1317 (Ch), [81].

271 [1996] AC 669.

272 [2000] Ch 162, 176, [2000] 1 All ER 711, per Walker LJ.

273 [1986] Ch 638, 656, per Browne-Wilkinson V-C.

274 [1971] AC 886.

275 [2006] 2 FLR 495, para [263].

276 [2004] 3 FCR 693, [2004] EWHC 1486 (Ch).

barristers became engaged to be married and set up home together.²⁷⁷ It was evident that their relationship was in difficulties from the beginning when the couple only managed to cohabit successfully for three months after their engagement.²⁷⁸ Mr Jones was much older than Miss Cox and his legal practice was much more successful than hers.²⁷⁹ The couple bought a country house in Essex together for £480,000 in October 1999, but the property was placed in Mr Jones's sole name, with Mr Jones taking out a mortgage in his sole name for £450,000. The property required extensive renovation which Miss Cox supervised but for which Mr Jones paid almost exclusively. Mr Jones raised a mortgage to acquire a flat in Islington which Mr Jones contended was intended to be an investment for him, whereas Miss Cox contended that it was intended to be purchased by him as a nominee for her, with Miss Cox providing just over half of the deposit. Miss Cox also owned a Fiat car which Mr Jones used overseas: Mr Jones claimed to have bought the car from Miss Cox, whereas Miss Cox claimed that she had only lent the car to Mr Jones. Mr Jones had bought an engagement ring for Miss Cox for £10,000: their engagement was broken, but there was no agreement about whether the engagement ended in 1998²⁸⁰ (albeit their relationship continued in some form) or only some years later in 2001. Their relationship ended ultimately in 2001 after the last in a string of situations in which Mr Jones had been physically violent towards Miss Cox.

The claims were as to ownership of the Essex country house, the Islington flat, the car and the engagement ring. As to findings of evidence, it was made clear in the judgment that the facts were found on the judge's impression as to the credibility of each of the witnesses in the witness box.²⁸¹ This demonstrates how it is frequently very difficult to arrive at 'the truth' in trusts of homes cases precisely because the parties frequently cannot prove everything they allege, because the parties have frequently fallen out with one another, and because people are frequently poor witnesses when asked to discuss their personal lives. As to the Essex house, Mann J held that the parties' intentions were contained in an agreement (akin to that identified in Lloyds Bank v Rosset) whereby the couple had agreed that the house would be held jointly between them and in relation to which Miss Cox had acted to her detriment by supervising the renovation works²⁸² and by giving up her legal practice to do so.²⁸³ However, because Mr Jones had suffered much greater detriment than Miss Cox, the property would be distributed 75:25 between them as opposed to being divided equally.

277 It should be noted that acquisition of such rights may be considered to have been made conditional on the parties being married and that if they are not, then such rights might not come into existence: Ottey v Grundy [2003] EWCA Civ 1176; [2003] WTLR 1253; Lightfoot v Lightfoot-Brown [2004] EWCA 840, [2004] All ER (D) 92.

278 Mr Jones lived in a flat in Stone Buildings in Lincoln's Inn and Miss Cox had a large Alsatian dog called 'Bootsie' which caused tension due to its ebullient behaviour in a small flat.

279 The couple met, it appears from evidence, in chambers when she was seeking a tenancy and where he was already a long-standing tenant, although their relationship did not start until after she had left that chambers.

280 When the couple had an argument and Mr Jones pretended to throw the engagement ring out of the window (although he actually retained the ring and gave it back to Miss Cox the next day).

281 This may seem surprising in itself in that the principal witnesses were barristers whom one might have expected to make competent witnesses. It just goes to show that one often behaves very differently in relation to one's personal affairs when compared to one's business affairs.

282 Interestingly, of course, supervision of building works had been ignored by the House of Lords in Lloyds Bank v Rosset itself.

283 Giving up her legal practice, however, would constitute detriment even though supervision of building work would not ordinarily acquire an equitable interest in the property.

What is interesting here is that Mann J did not find any clear agreement as to what interest each person was supposed to have: rather, he found that there was some form of general agreement but felt himself entitled to declare what share should result from it. The court instead looked for a solution which would be ‘fair having regard to the whole course of dealing between them in relation to the property’.²⁸⁴ This is a much more flexible approach than that used in Lloyds Bank v Rosset, where the assumption was that the parties must have reached an agreement either as to the shares which each party would have (which the parties had not in this instance) or as to the amount of money which each party would contribute (where Miss Cox had contributed nothing and so would have had to receive no interest at all). So, it was held to be unconscionable to have denied some interest to Miss Cox because the parties had intended the house to be a jointly-held house, whereas it was also considered unconscionable to give Miss Cox a half-share in that house given the size of her contribution.

As to the flat, it was found that the parties’ intention was that the flat was intended to have been bought by Mr Jones as nominee for Miss Cox because only he could have obtained the mortgage, whereas she could not have done so (due to his income being larger than hers). Therefore, Miss Cox was found to be entitled to the entire equitable interest in the flat.²⁸⁵ It was found as a fact that Miss Cox procured the purchase of the flat at a lower price than otherwise it would have been sold because she knew the vendor personally and so convinced him to make a private sale rather than purchasing it at a higher rate through estate agents.²⁸⁶ She did not acquire an equitable interest on the basis of this reduction in price (by extrapolation from Springette v Defoe), but rather it was taken into account as something beneficial to Mr Jones which she had contributed,²⁸⁷ together with the detriment associated with her not seeking to acquire the flat in her sole name.²⁸⁸ As to the chattels, it was held that the ring was intended to have been given to Miss Cox absolutely and that Miss Cox had intended to transfer outright the car to Mr Jones; consequently, neither chattel was to be returned.

On the basis of the foregoing discussion, the ‘unconscionability approach’ requires the court to consider the extent to which it would be unconscionable for the defendant to deny an equitable interest in the property to the claimant. This approach seems content to meld the strict approach in Lloyds Bank v Rosset, ostensibly based on constructive trust, with general principles of good conscience as emerge in the general law on constructive trusts²⁸⁹ and on proprietary estoppel.²⁹⁰ There are two key difficulties with this approach. First, Lord Bridge’s speech in Rosset was clearly not intended to be as flexible as it is being portrayed in these 284 Quoting Chadwick LJ in Oxley v Hiscock [2004] EWCA Civ 546, [2004] 2 FCR 295, para [69].

285 It is unclear then whether or not Mr Jones is obliged to pay off the mortgage or whether Miss Cox is obliged to assume liability for the mortgage henceforth.

286 She had lived in a flat in the same block of the vendor and so knew him personally: this was credited with enabling her to obtain a reduction in the purchase price.

287 An odd argument this: she is taken to have given something of benefit whereas, of course, Mr Jones was otherwise buying her a flat so the benefit was a benefit she was really contributing to herself rather than to him.

288 It is unclear how this head of detriment is said to relate to the acquisition of the flat, however, given that she still had the flat acquired for her by Mr Jones’s mortgage.

289 As discussed in section 12.1 above.

290 As discussed in section 13.3 above.

cases; rather, it is the more flexible approach in *Grant v Edwards*²⁹¹ which is really being applied. It would be more intellectually satisfying, it is suggested, if the courts acknowledged that the tests set out in Rosset are inappropriate in this context and so explored more satisfactorily the principles which they wish to apply. Pretending to apply a test which is not really being applied at all (or, at least, applying it improperly) is only likely to cause confusion and to hide the courts' real purpose. Secondly, this approach continues to purport to meld the doctrines of constructive trust and proprietary estoppel together when they operate on very different bases: the former institutional and the other remedial. To meld them together would require that one or other or both of the doctrines be altered significantly: to do this, the courts must analyse what those changes are, or admit that such a synthesis of principle is impossible.²⁹²

15.8.5 A model of the general constructive trust combined with the common intention constructive trust

What the Court of Appeal was seeking to do in Oxley v Hiscock was to combine the general law on constructive trusts with the general principles of proprietary estoppel with the common intention constructive trust. A much more convincing model of this sort of combined approach was attempted in Van Laetham v Brooker.²⁹³ In that case Lawrence Collins J incorporated the general understanding of constructive trusts principles into the area of trusts of homes under the sub-heading 'constructive trusts' in the following terms:²⁹⁴

A trust arises in connection with the acquisition by one party of a legal title to property whenever that party has so conducted himself that it would be inequitable to allow him to deny to the other party a beneficial interest in the property acquired. This will be so where (i) there was a common intention that both parties should have a beneficial interest and (ii) the claimant has acted to his detriment in the belief that by so acting he was acquiring a beneficial interest . . .

This formulation of the constructive trust is familiar from the material considered in Chapter 12 in relation to constructive trusts in general, but it is combined here with the sort of constructive trust which was applied in Lloyds Bank v Rosset. This formulation connects the general notion of good conscience in relation to constructive trusts with the common intention constructive trust.

A differently constituted Court of Appeal in *Oates v Stimson*²⁹⁵ took a similarly eclectic approach to the law in this area, although on different bases from Oxley v Hiscock. In this case two men acquired a house together by means of an endowment mortgage. The couple agreed that they would make equal payments towards the mortgage. Latterly, the claimant was made redundant and the defendant agreed to take on responsibility for all of the 291 [1986] Ch 638.

292 See Hudson, 2004:2.

293 [2005] EWHC 1478 (Ch), [2006] 2 FLR 495, [2006] 1 FCR 697.

294 Ibid, para [61].

295 [2006] EWCA Civ 548.

mortgage repayments and other outgoings on the house. It was found that the two men had agreed orally that the defendant would take on these added responsibilities in return for a right to acquire the house on payment of an agreed sum. Issues arose as to what rights the parties had. It was held by Sir Christopher Staughton that: ‘If there must be a search for the minimum equity to do justice, there is also an obligation to take into account all relevant circumstances including the conduct of the parties.’²⁹⁶

This encapsulation of the test combines ideas reminiscent of proprietary estoppel (in the ‘search for the minimum equity to do justice’ akin to Crabb v Arun DC) with the approach in Midland Bank v Cooke (the requirement to ‘take into account all relevant circumstances’) but no reference is made in this judgment to Lloyds Bank v Rosset. It is thus not at all clear on what doctrinal basis his Lordship reached his decision. What is clear is that on the facts his Lordship considered that the claimant should be bound by the agreement he reached with the defendant to the effect that the defendant would acquire responsibility for the mortgage repayments and surrender to the defendant the rights which he had agreed to sell to him.

By contrast, Auld LJ expressed his conception of the test in the following fashion:

Mr Oates’s conduct, in reliance upon which Mr Stimson acted to his detriment and/or changed his position, gave rise to a constructive trust in favour of Mr Stimson rendering it unconscionable not to permit him to enforce the oral agreement for [the sale of the property].

This conceptualisation of the test was based expressly on Lloyds Bank v Rosset and Yaxley v Gotts and is a combination of common intention constructive trust and of proprietary estoppel respectively which bases the ‘constructive trust’ on ‘detriment’ and on the unconscionability which would be occasioned if the claimant could not enforce the agreement. It could be that this ‘constructive trust’ arises on a general basis as with Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington. Keene LJ expressed agreement with Auld LJ rather than Sir Christopher Staughton.

15.8.6 The ‘excuses’ cases: rights not based on common intention

Oddly, for all of the talk of ‘common intention’ in this area of law, there have been cases in which constructive trusts have been upheld over the home in flat contradiction of the intention of one of the parties: and thus these cases are definitely not concerned with the common intention of the parties. *Van Laetham v Brooker*²⁹⁷ concerned, inter alia, a situation in which the defendant provided an excuse for not putting the land in question in joint names: his excuse was that the woman would have had to pay capital gains tax if the property had been put in her name. Two earlier decisions had considered excuses. In *Eves v Eves*²⁹⁸ the claimant was told by the defendant that her name could not be put on the legal title of the property until she was 21. It was held that because the defendant had led the claimant to believe that she would acquire a beneficial right in the property by using excuses, when in truth he intended to deny her any rights in the property, the claimant was entitled to an equitable interest in the property. In *Grant v Edwards*²⁹⁹ the defendant gave an excuse for not putting ²⁹⁶ Ibid, para [13].

²⁹⁷ [2005] EWHC 1478 (Ch), [2006] 2 FLR 495, [2006] 1 FCR 697.

²⁹⁸ [1975] 3 All ER 768, [1975] 1 WLR 1338, 1342, per Lord Denning.

²⁹⁹ [1986] Ch 638.

the claimant on the legal title which, as the Court of Appeal found, suggested that her name would be added to the legal title in the future. Consequently, it was held that the excuse amounted to a representation that she would acquire such a right in the future and therefore it would be unconscionable to deny her a right in the property. It was held by Lawrence Collins J that these cases could be considered to be proprietary estoppel cases and not true common intention constructive trust cases because the very fact that the defendant had made excuses to the claimant suggested that the parties did not have a common intention as to who owned the beneficial interest in the property: that is, the defendant thought the claimant had no rights, whereas the claimant thought that she did.³⁰⁰ Therefore, rather than the claimant's rights being based on a common intention, those rights are based on the unconscionability of denying a beneficial interest in the property. This is the antithesis of Rosset. The excuses cases are based on unconscionability and not on common intention.

15.9 THE PRINCIPLES IN STACK v DOWDEN AND JONES v KERNOTT

15.9.1 Introduction

The decision of the House of Lords in *Stack v Dowden*³⁰¹ made the newspapers and the headlines on BBC Radio 4 news. A remarkable thing really given that it effected very little real change to the law. It was a great, missed opportunity to tidy up the law relating to trusts of homes. The subsequent decision of the Supreme Court in *Jones v Kernott*³⁰² presented a guide to the interpretation of the judgment of Baroness Hale in Stack v Dowden and, usefully, set out a clear summary of the principles which emerged as a result of it. What emerges, however, is that very little of the previous case law has been overruled, that the previous case law will continue to be significant, and that many of the courts at first instance were not following the approach set out in Stack v Dowden in any event³⁰³ – which is perhaps a signal for the future of this area of the law. Each of these cases is considered in turn before a short discussion of some of the key remaining problems is presented.

15.9.2 What the House of Lords decided in Stack v Dowden

The majority of the House of Lords agreed that there should be a presumption that if there is more than one person registered on the legal title of the home then those legal owners should be presumed to be the owners of the equitable interest in that home equally; whereas, if there is only one person registered on the legal title of the home then that sole legal owner should be presumed to be the sole owner of the equitable interest in that home. These presumptions are merely presumptions, and can therefore be rebutted by any evidence which suggests that 300 [2005] EWHC 1478 (Ch), para [67].

301 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831.

302 [2011] UKSC 53, [2011] 3 WLR 1752.

303 As is considered in the text, a survey of all of the courts at first instance to have considered these issues since Stack v Dowden demonstrates a continuation of the same loose observance of the doctrine of precedent which was the case before Stack v Dowden was decided. Judges at first instance seem to pick equally happily from any of the earlier cases, and to use ideas from proprietary estoppel or constructive trust as they please. Most of these cases are unreported and so available only by a careful search of online sources.

the parties' common intention was something different.³⁰⁴ Therefore, all of the law before Stack v Dowden will still be needed to identify both those situations in which people other than the legal owners can acquire an equitable interest in that property, and also the circumstances in which the equitable interests of the parties in their home can be greater or less than an equal share in the total equitable interest.

Baroness Hale did suggest approval for the general drift in the law suggested by Oxley v Hiscock and those textbook writers who have seen a preference in the courts for taking into account the whole course of dealing between the parties and not simply their financial contributions to the purchase price of the property.³⁰⁵ However, the majority did express a preference for finding the parties' intention and not simply looking for what is fair. That the courts may simply abandon the search for the parties' common intention and simply replace that with whatever it considers to be 'fair' was considered in *Holman v Howes*³⁰⁶ to be contrary to the direction signalled by the House of Lords in Stack v Dowden.³⁰⁷ However, it is suggested that Lloyd LJ did stray too far in this regard by stating that the inquiry into what is fair to be 'impermissible'.³⁰⁸ It is suggested that Baroness Hale specified that it should not be the first resort for a court but did not preclude such a consideration outright. The following dicta of Baroness Hale have acquired some force in the lower courts to the effect that: "[t]he search is to ascertain the parties' shared intentions, actual, inferred or imputed, with respect of the property in light of their whole course of conduct in relation to it".³⁰⁹ The decision in Stack v Dowden is actually quite retrograde when looked at closely. It has in truth reversed much of the progress that was being made towards giving judges the power to decide what they considered to be 'fair' and instead has returned to a focus on the formalities of conveyancing and the primacy of monetary contributions in allocating rights in the home.³¹⁰ Thus the trend suggested in the earlier portions of this chapter in the case decided after Lloyds Bank v Rosset appears to have been approved by the majority of the House of Lords; whereas Lloyds Bank v Rosset itself did receive some criticism for being too stringent, even if it was not explicitly overruled. This tentativeness can be explained by the preference of the majority of the House of Lords to await Law Commission proposals in this area and potentially statutory guidance as to how such cases should be decided. The approach in Jones v Kernott qualified this slightly.

The facts in Stack v Dowden concerned Ms Dowden, a successful electrical engineer who contributed the majority of the family's finances, and Mr Stack, a self-employed builder and decorator, who began a relationship in 1975 before Ms Dowden bought a house in her sole name in 1983. The couple had four children. The couple sold their first house for three times its purchase price and then bought a second home in their joint names. Ms Dowden provided 65% of the purchase price of the second home, with the balance being provided by way of a 304 This tells us nothing, however, about the situation in which the parties do not have an intention in common – for example where one of the parties has made excuses to the other party not to include her on the legal title over the property – about who was intended to be an equitable owner of the property.

305 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [61] et seq.

306 [2007] EWCA Civ 877, [2007] BPIR 1085, para [29] et seq., per Lloyd LJ.

307 The same point was accepted in Fowler v Barron [2008] EWCA Civ 377, 11 ITEL 198, 205, [17], per Arden LJ.

308 Ibid., para [32].

309 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 AC 432, para [60]. See also Bindra v Chopra [2008] EWHC 1715 (Ch); and Morris v Morris [2008] EWCA Civ 257.

310 This argument is made by Probert, 'Equality in the Family Home?' (2007) Feminist Legal Studies, 341.

mortgage. Ms Dowden paid off about 60% of the capital on the mortgage. Mr Stack paid for the mortgage interest instalments, and the parties separately paid the premiums on separate endowment insurance policies. The couple kept their bank accounts separate, in large part because Mr Stack operated his business accounts separately. Mr Stack had his business correspondence sent to his father's address. The House of Lords upheld the judgment that the equitable interest in the property should be divided 65:35 in favour of Ms Dowden. Undertaking a survey of the entire course of dealing between the parties, including the extensive work which Mr Stack had performed on both properties, the equitable interests nevertheless closely reflected their financial contributions in fact.

15.9.3 What the House of Lords did not decide in Stack v Dowden

So, let us consider what the House of Lords did not decide. First, the House of Lords did not overrule any of the preceding cases. Therefore all of the law before 2007 seemingly continues in full force and effect. The only exception was a suggestion made in Walker v Hall, Springette v Defoe and Huntingford v Hobbs that there should be different principles in relation to cases where there is only one person on the legal title and cases where there is more than one person on the legal title: this narrow proposition was doubted.³¹¹

Secondly, and following on from the first point, the House of Lords did not create a new test to replace any of the previous law. In this sense, the decision in Stack v Dowden was a great missed opportunity.³¹² Therefore, we are left with the problem of applying the various differing approaches considered already in this chapter, once we have applied the presumptions set out above. As legal scholars studying equity and the law of trusts we must observe how those approaches do indeed operate differently. Lord Neuberger, in his dissenting speech in Stack v Dowden, did attempt to set out a clear approach to answering a range of questions to do with trusts of homes, but this was not followed by any of the other members of the House of Lords: more of that below.

15.9.4 Who agreed with whom about what in Stack v Dowden

The majority

In this section we shall consider what the House of Lords did decide. Lord Hoffmann agreed with the result result to which Baroness Hale came on the appeal.³¹³ Lord Hope expressed concurrence with Baroness Hale.³¹⁴ Lord Walker expressed concurrence with Baroness Hale and further told us that he had set aside large sections of his own speech (tragically, given his long experience in trusts law matters) having read her account of the sociological problems surrounding trusts of homes.³¹⁵ Baroness Hale then set out her speech

311 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [65].

312 Swadling, 2007.

313 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [1]. Although he did not, strictly, say that he agreed with her views on the law, rather 'for the reasons she gives I too would dismiss the appeal': ie his Lordship agreed with the result but did not strictly express a view as to the law.

314 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [2].

315 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [14].

(in reverse order) disposing of the question on the facts of the case, making some comments about Oxley v Hiscock and related cases, and considering some of the issues raised in the family law literature in relation to cohabitantes. Lord Neuberger then delivered a dissenting speech which dealt in detail with the law in this area and which suggested a model for answering questions in the future based on a flexible form of resulting trust, with which none of the other members of the court concurred.

Lord Hope – the Scots law problem

Lord Hope considered that the most significant question was to identify the correct starting point in cases relating to the home.³¹⁶ This he did by dividing between cases in which the legal title is held only in one name and cases in which the legal title is held in joint names:³¹⁷ his Lordship then referred to Baroness Hale's opinion as to the presumption that multiple ownership of the legal title leads to equal division of the equitable interest, and sole ownership of the legal title leads to a presumption of sole ownership of the equitable interest.³¹⁸

Lord Hope also expressed the hope that English law could come to resemble certain aspects of Scots law.³¹⁹ In Scots law, s 27(3) of the Family Law (Scotland) Act 2006 gives the courts the power to disapply the presumption that the family home will be divided equally between parties to a divorce.³²⁰ The real difficulty with suggesting parallels with Scots law is that Scotland does not have equity as part of its jurisprudence. So to suggest a parallel between the two legal systems is extremely unhelpful. When English law decides these questions according to conscience and trust and so forth, then why look for inspiration from a jurisdiction which has none of those ideas in its jurisprudence? If all that is intended is the expression of a hope that Parliament may create a similar statute for England and Wales then that is one thing, but it is pointless for a court to suggest parallels with another jurisdiction where things are done very differently if that same court is not going to effect any meaningful changes to the existing case law principles.

Lord Walker – the trusts law specialist

Lord Walker was the law lord in Stack v Dowden with the most experience of trusts law. His judgments in *Jennings v Rice*³²¹ and other cases had also informed much of the development of the 'unconscionability approach' in recent cases, as considered above. It is therefore something of a tragedy that he decided to delete most of his draft opinion³²² in deference to the opinion of Baroness Hale, particularly given that Baroness Hale approaches much of this issue from the perspective of land law and family law, as opposed to trusts law. Lord Walker expressed his judgment as being merely a footnote to the judgment of Baroness Hale. We do pick up some interesting ideas from Lord Walker nevertheless. First, we are told that the law

316 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [3].

317 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [4].

318 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [4].

319 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [6].

320 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [7].

321 [2003] 1 P&CR 100.

322 As we are told at [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [14].

on trusts of homes will not gravitate towards unjust enrichment law in this context,³²³ as it has in Canada for example, nor will it gravitate towards contract law,³²⁴ but rather it will remain a question for trusts law. Lord Walker considered that the court should not make such a change before the Law Commission had published proposals in this area. Secondly, Lord Walker expressed his view to be that there should not be any fusion of constructive trust with proprietary estoppel in this area,³²⁵ given (it is suggested) the institutional nature of the former doctrine and the remedial nature of the latter. The resulting trust was considered to be a doctrine of limited usefulness in this context.³²⁶ (Interestingly, as considered below, even though resulting trusts based solely on financial contributions are disparaged in these recent cases, nevertheless the judgments tend to follow very closely the proportions which the parties would have received if only their financial contributions had been taken into account.)

Thirdly, the decision in Lloyds Bank v Rosset was criticised, although not explicitly overruled. Lord Walker considered that Rosset was in line with some earlier cases but considered that it ‘did not take full account of the views . . . expressed in Gissing v Gissing’.³²⁷ Lord Walker then suggested that, whether the second common intention constructive trust is correct or not, ‘the law has moved on [from Rosset], and your Lordships should move it a little more in the same direction, while bearing in mind that the Law Commission . . . may recast the law in this area’.³²⁸ It is suggested that this criticism is not quite the same as overruling Rosset and is certainly not the same as setting out a new test. Rather, Lord Walker was suggesting that the developments outlined in this Chapter 15 should continue: that is, moving from the strict Rosset test towards an approach based on unconscionability and a consideration of the whole course of dealing between the parties.

Fourthly, there is some discussion of the tendency in cases like Pettitt v Pettitt for the court itself to ‘imply’ or ‘infer’ a common intention from the circumstances and thus to impute that court-created intention to the parties, rather than to insist upon explicit evidence of the existence of such an intention.³²⁹ This tallies with the view of Chadwick LJ in *Oxley v Hiscock*³³⁰ that the court can ‘supply’ the parties’ common intention if they did not actually have a conscious common intention.

Other than this, Lord Walker deliberately chose not to consider the ‘academic questions’ as to the nature of the trust and so forth. This attitude, it is suggested, will not do. The so-called ‘academic questions’ are very important in practice. First, it is important to know whether or not the common intention must be proven on the facts or whether it can be imputed. If it is to be imputed then it is very important to know what sort of factors will encourage a court to find an intention either to award or to deny a right in the home to someone. Secondly, distinguishing between institutional constructive trusts, remedial constructive trusts and proprietary estoppel is important because it is important to know 323 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [23]. Cf. Lord Hope [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, paras [9]–[11], suggesting that that is the Scots law approach.

324 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [28].

325 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [37].

326 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [28]; although see para [32] in relation to quasi-commercial relationships.

327 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [26].

328 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [26].

329 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, paras [18] et seq.

330 [2004] 2 FLR 669, para [66].

whether the successful claimant will acquire a right in property (and if so, in what form) or alternatively merely a right to an amount of money (whether the latter is only available under proprietary estoppel). Thirdly, if the successful claimant may only acquire a right to an amount of money, by way of proprietary estoppel, then is that an amount of money to compensate her detriment, to fulfil her expectations, or simply to prevent ‘unconscionability’ in some general sense?³³¹ Fourthly, it is very important to know on what basis the court will adjust any original agreement between the parties or any resulting trust allocation of rights to account for changes in the parties’ circumstances or intentions in later years. Fifthly, it is very important to know what the test is supposed to be; and if the test is simply to be a power to prevent unconscionability then to have some idea as to the principles which inform that notion of unconscionability. These are not merely academic questions: rather, they are practical questions on which the lower courts may well be entitled to expect some guidance.

Baroness Hale – a family lawyer’s approach

It was Baroness Hale who delivered the leading speech. Her approach is undoubtedly that of a family lawyer, referring as it does to a wealth of family law scholarship³³² but to little trusts law scholarship (of which there is a library’s worth). Quite deliberately, Baroness Hale avoided setting out anything as clear as a test or even a set of central principles by reference to which future decisions could be made. Instead there are general preferences for one kind of approach – broadly, that suggested by Chadwick LJ in Oxley v Hiscock, in spite of its many flaws – and a hope that the Law Commission will spare all our blushes by generating something which can in time become legislation to decide these difficult questions. There are six principal points to emerge from the speech of Baroness Hale. This judgment is reviewed by Lord Walker and Lady Hale in a joint judgment in the later Supreme Court decision in Jones v Kernott which is considered below; but for present purposes it is useful to focus on this judgment in the abstract before considering the way it has been re-interpreted by Lady Hale and Lord Walker later.

First, there is a distinction to be drawn between the personal context and the commercial context.³³³ It seems that this, following on from Pettitt v Pettitt, may have been a feature in argument in that the court was being asked to consider whether or not to impute a common intention in the same way that a common law court sometimes reads implied terms into contracts. By emphasising the distinction between personal and commercial contexts, we can dilute the whiff of contract law in Lord Bridge’s common intention constructive trust in Lloyds Bank v Rosset.³³⁴ The distinction between inferring and imputing the parties’ common intentions became a very significant part of later cases dealing with Stack v Dowden. This issue is considered in detail below.

Secondly, Baroness Hale was betting the farm on the Law Commission generating proposals for legislative intervention in this area, even though the Law Commission has not 331 In that unconscionability may itself seek to prevent a person suffering uncompensated detriment, or it may seek to prevent a person taking some sort of enrichment, or it may seek to prevent renegeing on a promise which has induced detrimental reliance from the claimant.

332 Especially [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [45] et seq.

333 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [42].

334 Somewhat disingenuously, there was an attempt to suggest that Lloyds Bank v Rosset had commented on the law on trusts of homes by way of obiter dicta: [2007] UKHL 17, at [63].

even produced proposals for reform in this field in its recent consultation papers, and is not intending to include even a draft bill in upcoming publications.³³⁵ In effect, the House of Lords remains where it was in Pettitt v Pettitt in 1970: pleading for Parliamentary intervention.³³⁶ That no such intervention was forthcoming (nor is it likely to be) has meant that the Supreme Court in Jones v Kernott was driven to produce quasi-legislative statements of the law.

Baroness Hale also hoped that the new Land Registry form TR1 will lead to people identifying their common intentions at the outset.³³⁷ There are two problems with this approach. High street solicitors are conspicuously bad at ensuring that these complex niceties are sorted out. Beyond that, rights are not always acquired at the date of acquisition of the property but rather are acquired due to changes in the parties' circumstances in later years. Moreover, the relationships between these people begin casually in circumstances in which there may not be an opportunity to identify who owns what. Baroness Hale's expectation is overly optimistic in this context, as is considered further below. To a divorce lawyer, dealing with married couples, expecting such clarity of thought at one clearly identifiable point in time may seem reasonable. To a property lawyer, exposed to a different take on life, it does not.

Thirdly, there are two new presumptions introduced, as considered above. That passage is repeated here for ease of reference.³³⁸ The majority of the House of Lords agreed that there should be a presumption that if there is more than one person registered on the legal title of the home then those legal owners should be presumed to be the owners of the equitable interest in that home equally; whereas, if there is only one person registered on the legal title of the home then that sole legal owner should be presumed to be the sole owner of the equitable interest in that home. These presumptions are merely presumptions, and can therefore be rebutted by any evidence which suggests that the parties' common intention was something different.³³⁹ Therefore, all of the law before Stack v Dowden will still be important to identify both those situations in which people other than the legal owners can acquire an equitable interest in that property, and also the circumstances in which the proportionate shares of the parties in the equitable interest can be greater or less than an equal share in that equitable interest.

335 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [45] et seq. Especially, para [47].

336 The experience of the Family Law Act 1996 is instructive here: that was an Act which was passed in the teeth of vituperate opposition from the Catholic Church and the Daily Mail on one wing, and the pressure groups representing, for example, victims of domestic violence on the other wing. And even after the careful compromises in that legislation which dealt only with married couples, ensuring that there could not be divorce without a cooling-off period or mediation and so forth, there were still parts of that Act which have not been brought into force. Given how comparatively uncontroversial married life is compared to the many, many forms of unmarried relationships (straight, gay, and non-romantic too), it is unlikely that there will be any governmental enthusiasm to support any particular model for legislation if the Law Commission will not even sign up to one. We have already waited 37 years for legislation in this area: there is no reason to suppose that it is coming now.

337 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [52].

338 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, paras [54] and [56].

339 This tells us nothing, however, about the situation in which the parties do not have an intention in common – for example where one of the parties has made excuses to the other party not to include her on the legal title over the property – about who was intended to be an equitable owner of the property.

Fourthly, Baroness Hale identified, from two sources, a definite drift in the cases which I have already mapped out in this chapter: that is, a drift away from simply looking to see which of the parties has contributed how much money to the purchase price on resulting trust principles,³⁴⁰ and towards undertaking a survey of the whole course of dealings between the parties.³⁴¹ Baroness Hale did not go into the detail of any of the earlier cases nor of the academic commentary in this regard, which is a shame. Her two sources were, broadly, the decision of Chadwick LJ in Oxley v Hiscock, which has been criticised in this chapter on a number of grounds, and a book written by Gray and Gray, Elements of Land Law.³⁴² The notion that the court should ‘undertake a survey of the whole course of dealing’ between the parties in fact comes from Grant v Edwards and Midland Bank v Cooke and not originally from the Law Commission, even though it is the Law Commission and Oxley v Hiscock which are cited as having spawned the idea. This approach suggests a pragmatism which is typical of family law whereby the courts tailor the solution to fit the facts of any given case.

Fifthly, Oxley v Hiscock seems to have been approved, although we must be careful with this observation: Baroness Hale does not go through the whole of the troublesome attempt by Chadwick LJ in Oxley v Hiscock to reconcile Lloyds Bank v Rosset with Midland Bank v Cooke and every other case in the canon in this field.³⁴³ Therefore, we can know that Oxley v Hiscock is approved to the limited sense in which Baroness Hale uses it: that is, by reference to the passage in Chadwick LJ’s judgment (quoted above) which requires that a court be ‘fair’ and that a court should undertake a survey of the whole course of dealing between the parties, and which consequently does not require that a court restrict itself to the sort of considerations which would have satisfied the test in Rosset. Importantly, Baroness Hale was clear that the court should not simply look at what was fair between the parties, although it was unclear whether that was intended to exclude the possibility of considering what was fair or whether it was to prevent the courts from only considering what was fair as opposed to trying to find a common intention. (The standard of fairness as a last resort is, however, adopted explicitly in Jones v Kernott by Lord Walker and Lady Hale.) As considered above, Oxley v Hiscock presents us with the difficulty that it introduced a general notion of ‘fairness’ without explaining either its precise provenance or its meaning, that it suggests that courts can ‘supply’ (or, make up) the common intention of the parties, and that it seeks to reconcile the irreconcilable earlier authorities.

Sixthly, there is a reference to a comment of Lord Hoffmann during argument that, to deal with subsequent changes to the parties’ circumstances or common intention, it may be necessary to develop an ‘ambulatory constructive trust’ which will move and change in parallel with the parties’ circumstances.³⁴⁴ Baroness Hale does not exactly approve this idea but she does seem to acknowledge its usefulness. Care must be taken with this notion though: an ambulatory constructive trust suggests a constructive trust which is constantly capable of change. This is different, strictly speaking, from an institutional constructive trust of the kind 340 Presumptions of resulting trust are considered to be merely a matter of ‘judicial consensus’ rather than a principle of law: [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [60].

341 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [61] et seq.

342 As discussed [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, paras [61]–[66].

343 See the discussion of Oxley v Hiscock in section 15.8.2.

344 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [62].

set out in *Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington*³⁴⁵ which recognises that the parties have rights created at some point before the matter came on to trial when the defendant knew of some factor which affected her conscience. By contrast, a remedial constructive trust (as used in the USA) or proprietary estoppel gives the court complete licence to reach whatever conclusion the court considers to be conscionable and to impose whatever remedy it considers conscionable: however, these rights come into existence from the date of trial onwards for the first time, in this sense a little like a right to common law damages. So, an ambulatory constructive trust (assuming that to mean one that moves over time) is a constructive trust whose precise nature can only be known at the date of trial precisely because its nature changes as the parties' circumstances change. And if its nature is only knowable at the date of trial, then it is more akin to a remedial constructive trust than to a traditional institutional constructive trust precisely because it will be creating new rights at the date of judgment rather than recognising rights which came into existence at the time of some unconscionable act. Up to now, English equity has resisted the remedial constructive trust. But, as Prof Craig Rotherham suggests, perhaps it has already crept into English equity by stealth.³⁴⁶

Lord Neuberger – beyond fairness and back to rigour

Lord Neuberger made a valiant attempt to deal with the various circumstances which might arise in cases relating to trusts of homes. Lord Neuberger, however, delivered a dissenting speech and his approach was out of step with the majority of the House of Lords. There are two notable features of this approach. First, it relied on resulting trusts in the first place³⁴⁷ – a notion unpopular with Lord Walker – and understands those resulting trusts as being capable of change on constructive trust principles when the circumstances require it.³⁴⁸ Secondly, it disapproved of the idea of 'fairness' or the imputation of rights being used by the courts to allocate the equitable interest in the home because it is too vague and not helpful in letting the parties know in advance what their rights are.³⁴⁹

What Lord Neuberger proposed, therefore, was similar to the judgment in Huntingford v Hobbs, considered above, where the court would begin with a resulting trusts analysis (predicated therefore primarily on the parties' financial contributions to the property) which would be re-calibrated by constructive trust principles over time to reflect the parties' common intention as it might change during their occupancy of the property. The precise basis on which these constructive trust principles would operate is less clear. Ordinarily, a constructive trust would operate in response to conscience, as in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington, but the constructive trust at play in trusts of homes cases has always been different from the ordinary model, whether on the basis of Grant v Edwards or Lloyds Bank v Rosset. This judgment is by some distance the most cogent of those delivered by the House of Lords. What it lacks is a means of accommodating changes in the parties' intentions after the acquisition of the property or to reflect other inputs to the property from the date of 346 Rotherham, 2002, especially Ch.1.

345 [1996] AC 669.

347 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [110], where there are different contributions to the purchase price.

348 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [124].

349 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [125].

acquisition other than merely money; in essence, it lacks a means of taking the needs of ‘fairness’ or ‘good conscience’ into account.

15.9.5 The legacy of Stack v Dowden and Jones v Kernott

A judgment often acquires a life of its own after it has been delivered because later courts will frequently identify specific dicta from within that judgment which they will emphasise and to which they will accord a particular meaning over time. Two ideas from the speech of Baroness Hale in Stack v Dowden were accorded great significance in subsequent cases: first, an issue as to whether the courts should ‘infer’ or rather ‘impute’ the parties’ common intention, where the former requires identifying an intention in the minds of the parties themselves and where the latter involves the court supplying the parties’ common intention for them; and, secondly, that the law is still focused on seeking out what the common intention of the parties must have been and ‘undertaking a survey of the whole course of dealing’ between the parties, but not simply looking for what the court considers to be ‘fair’. In expressing the first idea, Baroness Hale held the following:

There is no need for me to rehearse all the developments in the case law since Pettitt v Pettitt and Gissing v Gissing . . . The law has indeed moved on in response to changing social and economic conditions. The search is to ascertain the parties’ shared intentions, actual, inferred or imputed, with respect to the property in the light of their whole course of conduct in relation to it.³⁵⁰

In expressing the second idea, Baroness Hale held the following:

Oxley v Hiscock was, of course, a different case from this. . . . The Claimant [in that case] had first to surmount the hurdle of showing that she had any beneficial interest at all, before showing exactly what that interest was. The first could readily be inferred from the fact that each party had made some kind of financial contribution towards the purchase. As to the second, Chadwick LJ said this, at para 69:

. . . in many such cases, the answer will be provided by evidence of what they said and did at the time of the acquisition. But, in a case where there is no evidence of any discussion between them as to the amount of the share which each was to have – and even in a case where the evidence is that there was no discussion on that point – the question still requires an answer. It must now be accepted that (at least in this court and below) the answer is that each is entitled to that share which the court considers fair having regard to the whole course of dealing between them in relation to the property. And in that context, the whole course of dealing between them in relation to the property includes the arrangements which they make from time to time in order to meet the outgoings (for example, mortgage contributions, council tax and utilities, repairs, insurance and housekeeping) which have to be met if they are to live in the property as their home.³⁵¹

350 Stack v Dowden [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [60].

351 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 WLR 831, para [61].

Oxley v Hiscock has been hailed by Gray and Gray as ‘an important breakthrough’.³⁵² The passage quoted is very similar to the view of the Law Commission in *Sharing Homes*³⁵³ on the quantification of beneficial entitlement:

If the question really is one of the parties’ ‘common intention’, we believe that there is much to be said for adopting what has been called a ‘holistic approach’ to quantification, undertaking a survey of the whole course of dealing between the parties and taking account of all conduct which throws light on the question what shares were intended.

That may be the preferable way of expressing what is essentially the same thought, for two reasons. First, it emphasises that the search is still for the result which reflects what the parties must, in the light of their conduct, be taken to have intended. Second, therefore, it does not enable the court to abandon that search in favour of the result which the court itself considers fair. For the court to impose its own view of what is fair upon the situation in which the parties find themselves would be to return to the days before *Pettitt v Pettitt*³⁵⁴ without even the fig leaf of s 17 of the 1882 [Married Women’s Property] Act.

And yet, in spite of decrying the idea of deciding these cases simply by reference to a concept of ‘fairness’ in Stack v Dowden, that is exactly what Lady Hale did (in her joint judgment with Lord Walker) in Jones v Kernott (in the fourth stage of their test, set out below). There is no explanation of this volte face between the two judgments; nor is there any explanation as to what is meant by the concept of ‘fairness’ in this context – for example whether it is to be read in accordance with family law concepts of fairness, whether it is to include financial contributions, or whether there are any concepts which should be prioritised over others. What the Supreme Court has succeeded in doing is leaving every court at first instance in its wake entirely without guidance as to what ‘fairness’ means on the facts in front of it. The result of this failure to introduce clarity is that the whole sorry circus of courts at first instance taking entirely different approaches to the law will begin again (as happened in the wake of the decision in Lloyds Bank v Rosset) so that ten years from now we shall be trying to identify the patterns in another spaghetti of case law. The next section considers how differently subsequent decisions of the Court of Appeal treated the dicta of Lady Hale in Stack v Dowden, and then we come to the detail of Jones v Kernott in the section following that.

15.9.6 The development of the principles in Stack v Dowden in subsequent cases

Cases following Stack v Dowden

In spite of the attempt by the House of Lords to bring some conceptual order to this area of law, the academic treatment of their overly general judgments (with the notable exception of 352 K Gray and S Francis Gray, Elements of Land Law, Oxford University Press, 2005, 931, para 10.138.

353 Law Commission, Sharing Homes, 2002, para 4.27.

354 [1970] AC 777.

the judgment of Lord Neuberger) indicated that too much uncertainty remained.³⁵⁵ The treatment of Stack v Dowden in many of the cases following it highlighted the issue of imputing and inferring intentions, in particular by reference to the dicta of Baroness Hale, quoted above, to the effect that '[t]he search is to ascertain the parties' shared intentions, actual, inferred or imputed, with respect to the property in light of their whole course of conduct in relation to it'.³⁵⁶ Those few words, and the concept of fairness, received more attention in later cases than the rest of the judgment. In discussing Stack v Dowden, the Court of Appeal in *Holman v Howes*³⁵⁷ held that simply launching an inquiry into what is 'fair' between the parties would be 'impermissible'.³⁵⁸ On the Holman v Howes approach, the decision in Stack v Dowden has reversed much of the progress that was being made towards giving judges the ability to decide what they considered to be 'fair' and instead has returned to a more limited focus on the primacy of monetary contributions in allocating rights in the home.³⁵⁹

Sir John Chadwick in the Court of Appeal in *James v Thomas*³⁶⁰ held that the common intention between the parties can be formed at any time (whether before, during or after acquisition of the property) and accepted that a judgment as to the fairness of the situation cannot be the sole criterion³⁶¹ but rather must follow an inquiry into the parties' common intention.³⁶² The decisions of the Court of Appeal in *James v Thomas*³⁶³ and *Morris v Morris*³⁶⁴ demonstrated that in the absence of an express agreement after the date of acquisition, the courts will generally be reluctant to infer an intention to vary the parties' pre-acquisition beneficial interests in the home based on their conduct alone. Exactly that point was made in Mirza v Mirza.³⁶⁵ So, in James v Thomas it was found to be insufficient that the claimant performed extensive acts of physical labour on the property for her to acquire a right in the property to vary their previous understanding. In that case Ms James 'drove a tipper, dug trenches, picked up materials, laid concrete, tarmac and gravel and generally undertook manual work associated with the business of Mr Thomas' – nevertheless, that was not enough to constitute conduct which altered the parties' previously agreed beneficial interests in the home. In Morris v Morris,³⁶⁶ Peter Gibson LJ explained that the fact that the claimant was starting a riding school business or that the claimant was participating in the farm business 355 See Gray and Gray, 2009, 7-072; Swadling, 2007; Gardner and Davidson, 2011. See also Cooke, 2011. Stack v Dowden was, however, followed in Attorney-General's Reference (No 2 of 2008) [2008] EWCA Crim 2953; Ashby v Kilduff [2010] EWHC 2034 (Ch); Thomson v Humphrey [2009] All ER (D) 280 (Jun).

356 [2007] UKHL 17, [2007] 2 AC 432, para [60]. See also Bindra v Chopra [2008] EWHC 1715 (Ch); and Morris v Morris [2008] EWCA Civ 257.

357 [2007] EWCA Civ 877, [2007] BPIR 1085, para [29] et seq, per Lloyd LJ.

358 Ibid, para [32].

359 This argument is made by Probert, 'Equality in the family home?' (2007) Feminist Legal Studies, 341.

360 [2008] 1 FLR 1598.

361 It should be recalled that as Chadwick LJ he had given judgment in Oxley v Hiscock and had advocated the approach of using fairness.

362 So, when a woman moved into a house which a man already owned and began to work on the property with him, it would be possible to find a common intention: on those facts, looking at the whole course of the parties' dealings, the man's assurances that their common endeavours 'will benefit us both' were insufficient to constitute a representation that she would acquire a beneficial interest in the property.

363 [2007] EWCA Civ 1212, [2007] 3 FCR 696, [2008] 1 FLR 1598, at [36], per Sir John Chadwick.

364 [2008] EWCA Civ 257, at [36], per May LJ.

365 [2009] 2 FCR 12, 33.

366 [2008] EWCA Civ 257, at [36], per May LJ.

was insufficient to suggest that the defendant was representing (either for constructive trust or for proprietary estoppel purposes) that the claimant was intended to acquire any greater beneficial interest in the farm or other property.³⁶⁷ In *Williams v Lawrence*³⁶⁸ it was held that simply because a father allowed his son to convert the family home (so that two families could live in it) and to move into it with his partner did not mean that his son had necessarily been granted a beneficial interest in that property. On the facts of Williams v Lawrence there had been no discussion nor any agreement to that effect between the parties and, relying on James v Thomas, the court was reluctant to infer such an agreement from conduct alone.³⁶⁹

That the law remained confused was evident from the decision of the Court of Appeal in Williams v Parris,³⁷⁰ which proceeded primarily on the basis of Lloyds Bank v Rosset in finding that there was an agreement sufficient to constitute a common intention constructive trust between people who decided to acquire flats in their block and to let them out for their common benefit. It was held that all that was required, beyond the express discussions which constituted the agreement that each person was to have an equitable interest in the property, was that the parties must have suffered some detriment. It was found that even though the claimant had made no contribution to the purchase price (because he was bankrupt at the time) his ‘contribution appears to have been confined to some two days’ painting work, plus hance charges’ and that that was sufficient to acquire him an equitable interest.³⁷¹ Later cases have deviated similarly from the decision in Stack v Dowden. It has been held that where the parties agree that one of them will have no interest in the property, his later contribution to the property will not acquire him an equitable interest in that property,³⁷² unless (it is suggested) the parties can be shown to have changed their common intention. Moreover, it has been held in *Laskar v Laskar*³⁷³ that the principle in Stack v Dowden applies only to the home and not to commercial property nor lettings run as a business intended solely to raise income.³⁷⁴

Therefore, the lower courts have not simply swung in behind one House of Lords approach or the other. Instead the courts continue to select doctrines and ideas from any or all of the 367 [2008] EWCA Civ 257, at [24]. Cf. Thorner v Major [2009] 1 WLR 776 where extensive physical labour on a farm was held to be suggestive of a representation that the claimant was to acquire rights under proprietary estoppel in the farm and other related property.

368 [2011] EWHC 2001 (Ch), [2011] WTLR 1455.

369 Where a father promised in de Bruyne v de Bruyne [2010] EWCA Civ 519 to settle a farm and shares on trust, and other family members made transfers of property in reliance on that promise, then the father was deemed to hold that property on constructive trust for the children who were intended to be the beneficiaries of the arrangement.

370 [2008] EWCA Civ 1147. In relation to the acquisition of other property, such as a boat, see The ‘Up Yaws’ [2007] EWHC 210 (Admlty), [2007] 2 FLR 444.

371 Similarly the High Court in Samad v Thompson [2008] EWHC 2809 (Ch) tended to follow Rosset with only passing reference to Stack.

372 Griffiths v Cork [2007] EWHC 1827 (Ch), 10 ITELR 313, where he had executed a deed recognising that he had no interest in the property, and the defendant succeeding in demonstrating that he had been competent to execute that deed at the time even though he was otherwise shown to have been suffering from paranoid schizophrenia.

373 [2008] EWCA Civ 347, [2008] 2 FLR 589.

374 The Court of Appeal in Singapore has nevertheless expressed its view that there is common sense underpinning the presumptions of advancement in certain types of relationship where a gift was a reasonable inference (Lau Siew Kim v Yeo Guan Chye Terence and Another [2007] SGCA 54, [2008] 4 LRC 587) and the presumption has been considered by the Supreme Court of British Columbia (Kerr v Baranow (2007) BCSC 1863, 10 ITELR 763). Similarly it was held that the equitable ownership should follow the law unless other considerations required (Ibid.).

cases decided from Pettitt v Pettitt in 1970 through to *Stack v Dowden*³⁷⁵ in 2007 with all the care of children at a pick-and-mix counter. Just consider the range of different doctrines which have been applied by the cases considered in this chapter. It is as if the doctrine of precedent had become truly optional.³⁷⁶ For the future, it is suggested that the decision of the Supreme Court in Jones v Kernott, as it interpreted Stack v Dowden, will be as effective in controlling subsequent behaviour as herding cats. It is well known that if you try to herd more than one cat in the same direction then each one of those cats will immediately separate and scamper off their own way. The High Court and the Court of Appeal appear to react similarly.

The position after Stack v Dowden

That the law had ‘moved on’ from Lloyds Bank v Rosset was underlined in *Abbott v Abbott*³⁷⁷ by Baroness Hale in the Privy Council, just as it had been suggested by Baroness Hale in the House of Lords in Stack v Dowden; however, there is little judicial guidance as to where the law should go in the future. We are left with the notion that the court should identify the common intention between the parties as to the equitable ownership of their home. What this does not help us to understand is how the court will ‘supply’ a common intention when the parties had not consciously considered the question at all. The Labour government announced that there would be no legislation in England and Wales to deal with this matter, just as I had predicted,³⁷⁸ and the Coalition government shows no inclination to broach this topic. So, we were left in a most unsatisfactory condition after Stack v Dowden with little judicial guidance as to how we should proceed. It is suggested that in fact (regardless of what Baroness Hale may have said) the courts will ultimately resort to what individual judges consider to be fair in the circumstances if there is no clear evidence as to what the parties did actually intend.³⁷⁹ The decision in Jones v Kernott, with its formalistic attempt to set out clear rules, can be understood as a reaction to that lack of political will to legislate in this area.

15.9.7 The decision in Jones v Kernott

The decision on the facts

Ms Jones was a mobile hairdresser; Mr Kernott was a self-employed ice cream salesman who received benefits during the low season for ice cream sales. The couple met in 1980. In 375 It is a significant feature of English law generally that the advent of electronic databases has meant that there are many, many cases available to us all whereas previously only those cases collected in the law reports could expect a broad public. With so many cases available now, it is evident that many courts simply do not follow the doctrine of precedent either slavishly or at all. For example, the decision in Williams v Parris suggests that courts may follow the line of authority they think most convenient or expeditious. The decision in Kean v McDonald [2006] All ER (D) 348 is a good example of a case on the ownership of a home which pays little attention to the many possible authorities in reaching a conclusion.

376 On which see Duxbury, 2008 generally.

377 [2007] UKPC 53, [2008] 1 FLR 1451.

378 The announcement was made by the government minister Bridget Prentice on 6 March 2008.

379 In Laskar v Laskar [2008] EWCA Civ 347, [2008] 2 FLR 589 the Court of Appeal did not simply decide what was ‘fair’ but did look to ensure that the result of focusing primarily on the parties’ discussions and financial contributions did not lead to an unfair result.

1981, Jones bought a mobile home in her sole name and Kernott moved in with her in 1983. They had two children. In 1985, Jones sold her mobile home and the couple bought a property on Badger Hall Avenue in Thundersley, Essex. The Badger Hall Avenue property was bought in their joint names. The purchase price of £30,000 was cheap because it had belonged to a relative of a client of Jones.³⁸⁰ Jones contributed £6,000 in cash by way of deposit on the property, with the remainder coming by way of an endowment mortgage in the parties' joint names. Kernott contributed £100 per week to household expenses, with Jones paying for everything else 'out of joint resources'.³⁸¹ The couple took out a joint loan to extend the property, with Kernott and friends doing the building work, with a 50% increase in the value of the property to £44,000.³⁸² Kernott left in 1993 after a little over eight years of cohabitation. Thereafter, for over 14 years, Ms Jones met all the expenses associated with the property and Kernott made very little contribution to the maintenance of his two children. The parties later cashed in a joint insurance policy so that Kernott could put down a deposit on his own home, something he could afford to do in part because he was not contributing to the maintenance of his children.

The case came on because Ms Jones sought to sell the property at Badger Hall Avenue and Kernott claimed that he had an equitable interest in the property. The judge at first instance found on the facts that the equitable interest in the property should be divided roughly in the proportions 90:10 in favour of Ms Jones, a division which broadly reflected their financial contributions over the nearly 23 years they had held the property and was in line with the evidence as the judge could find it in relation to the parties' intentions. The trial judge had found at first instance, as accepted by Strauss QC on appeal to the High Court, that the parties had changed their intentions especially when Kernott left the property but that Kernott had not intended to abandon any right to the Badger Hall Avenue property. On the facts, taking into account the various contributions, assessing Ms Jones's share at 90% was decided by the judge at first instance to be fair and just, as confirmed by Strauss QC, but without having displaced evidence of the parties' intentions. The majority of the Court of Appeal, unaccountably, held that this was a joint tenancy, which meant that Kernott was entitled to one half of the equitable interest. Quite why 14 years of absence and a complete lack of contribution during that time could not have been taken to constitute a severance of the joint tenancy and a concomitant need to establish the size of the parties' respective equitable interests as tenants in common, is unclear – quite apart from the simple justice of the case which seemed to require that 14 years of contributions on her own should have entitled Ms Jones to the lion's share of the equitable interest. Jacob LJ dissented on the basis that there was no reasonable basis for an appellate court to disturb the decision of the court of first instance which had heard the evidence and drawn sensible conclusions from it.

The Supreme Court reversed the Court of Appeal's decision and restored the judgment at first instance. Interestingly, while the Supreme Court was at pains to consider the niceties relating to inferring or imputing common intention and the residual role of using a standard of fairness when the evidence was otherwise inconclusive, the outcome broadly reflected the parties' financial contributions to the property, with other considerations having very little 380 No point was taken about whether or not Jones should acquire any credit for having obtained a reduction in the price of the property, as in Cox v Jones or Springette v Daffoe.

381 [2011] 3 WLR 1121, at [38]

382 Thus, it was argued that Kernott's labours increased the value of the property, thus acquiring him an extra share of the equitable interest.

meaningful effect on those calculations. Interestingly, the standard of ‘unconscionability’ was not mentioned, even though it might be thought that 14 years without contribution to a property or to the family unit which lived there might have resulted in an unconscionable benefit for Kernott in the Court of Appeal, which could therefore have been reversed by a traditional constructive trust intended to avoid unconscionability being suffered. Having considered the facts of the case, we turn now to the detail of the judgments.

The principles set out by Lord Walker and Lady Hale

Lord Walker and Lady Hale, in their joint judgment, identified what they considered to be the law. Interestingly, rather than leave matters to possible misinterpretation or confusion, as had been the case after Stack v Dowden, the later passages in their joint judgment identified the key principles in numbered form, more akin to legislation than a discursive judgment, after having considered Stack v Dowden and other issues. We shall begin with this summary of the principles, before considering some of the points which were made in their joint judgment. Lord Walker and Lady Hale divided again between homes in which the legal title is held in joint names and homes held in the name of only one party when they held that:³⁸³

[51] the following are the principles applicable in a case such as this, where a family home is bought in the joint names of a cohabiting couple who are both responsible for any mortgage, but without any express declaration of their beneficial interests:

- (1) The starting point is that equity follows the law and they are joint tenants both in law and in equity.
- (2) That presumption can be displaced by showing (a) that the parties had a different common intention at the time when they acquired the home, or (b) that they later formed the common intention that their respective shares would change.
- (3) Their common intention is to be deduced objectively from their conduct: ‘the relevant intention of each party is the intention which was reasonably understood by the other party to be manifested by that party’s words or conduct notwithstanding that he did not consciously formulate that intention in his own mind or even acted with some different intention which he did not communicate to the other party’ (Lord Diplock in *Gissing v Gissing*³⁸⁴). Examples of the sort of evidence which might be relevant to drawing such inferences are given in Stack v Dowden.³⁸⁵
- (4) In those cases where it is clear either (a) that the parties did not intend joint tenancy at the outset, or (b) had changed their original intention, but it is not possible to ascertain by direct evidence or by inference what their actual intention was as to the shares in which they would own the property, ‘the answer is that each is entitled to that share which the court considers fair having regard to the whole course of dealing between them in relation to the property’:

383 [2011] UKSC 53, [2011] 3 WLR 1121, [2011] 3 FCR 495, at [51].

384 [1970] 2 All ER 780 at 790, [1971] AC 886 at 906.

385 [2007] 2 FCR 280 at [69], [2007] 2 All ER 929.

Chadwick LJ in Oxley v Hiscock.³⁸⁶ In our judgment, ‘the whole course of dealing . . . in relation to the property’ should be given a broad meaning, enabling a similar range of factors to be taken into account as may be relevant to ascertaining the parties’ actual intentions.

- (5) Each case will turn on its own facts. Financial contributions are relevant but there are many other factors which may enable the court to decide what shares were either intended (as in case (3)) or fair (as in case (4)).

[52] This case is not concerned with a family home which is put into the name of one party only. The starting point is different. The first issue is whether it was intended that the other party have any beneficial interest in the property at all. If he does, the second issue is what that interest is. There is no presumption of joint beneficial ownership. But their common intention has once again to be deduced objectively from their conduct. If the evidence shows a common intention to share beneficial ownership but does not show what shares were intended, the court will have to proceed as at [51] (4) and (5), above.

[53] The assumptions as to human motivation, which led the courts to impute particular intentions by way of the resulting trust, are not appropriate to the ascertainment of beneficial interests in a family home. Whether they remain appropriate in other contexts is not the issue in this case.

It is worth noting two things. First, the other members of the Supreme Court did not adopt this list of five principles as being a correct statement of the law in this area. Lord Collins agreed with the reasoning for allowing the appeal but did not express concurrence with the judgment, instead giving a judgment of his own. Lord Wilson disagreed about the desirability, in his view, of imputing a common intention to the parties, as discussed below. Lord Kerr set out his own summary of the principles, in which he identified differences between the judges, as considered below. Lord Kerr’s summary of the principles is similar, however, to that of Lady Hale and Lord Walker. As a result, whether this list of principles is accepted as being a correct statement of the law by the courts in the future remains to be seen. It is likely to be accepted by courts at first instance as a useful means of proceeding at the very least. Courts at first instance are likely to be eager to adopt this systematic statement of the principles in reaching their decisions because it lends them structure. Therefore, it is likely that these principles will be adopted by courts in the future. Secondly, the difficulty is in knowing what those principles mean, for example in the use of the term ‘fairness’. It is in this context that the future case law is likely to return to the case law before Stack v Dowden for inspiration.

The approach suggested by Lord Walker and Lady Hale divided between the legal title of properties put in the name of one party and in the parties’ joint names, as in Stack v Dowden. The presumption is that the parties’ beneficial interests are to follow the pattern of their ownership of the legal title – that is, either joint or separate – unless there is evidence to rebut that presumption. Where the equitable ownership is unclear, then the court will engage in a survey of the entire course of dealing between the parties, as was first set out in Midland Bank v Cooke and then repeated in Oxley v Hiscock. A difficulty with this approach is that, while the joint judgment accepts that the parties’ intentions might change,³⁸⁷ nevertheless locking the presumption into the situation as recorded on the Land Register when the property was acquired initially means that subsequent changes of intention must act as a rebuttal to that presumption. And yet it is not clear what changes of intention count: must they be joint changes of intention, or a unilateral change of intention, or changes in circumstances which would be considered to be material objectively? Or would an aggregate of small changes in intention constitute sufficient for a change in intention? At what time must that change in intention have manifested itself? What if the other party disagreed?

386 [2004] 2 FCR 295 at [69], [2004] 3 All ER 703.

387 [2011] UKSC 53, at [14].

The presumption of resulting trust is removed from the equation, as in Stack v Dowden.³⁸⁸ Interestingly, Lord Walker and Lady Hale seem to disparage the use of presumptions in relation to the family home while, without irony, creating two new presumptions in Stack v Dowden. There is no clearer example of a court imputing a common intention to the parties than creating a presumption, albeit a rebuttable one.

What Jones v Kernott decided about imputation and inference

The judges in the Supreme Court were agreed as to the outcome of the appeal. However, it is not clear that there was a majority for any given conceptualisation of the legal principle, although there is very little difference between Lord Walker and Lady Hale and Lords Kerr and Collins on the bulk of the propositions, with Lord Wilson being the most obviously at odds with them about his preference for imputing a common intention as opposed merely to inferring it (after all, as Strauss QC put it in relation to fairness, ‘that is what courts are for’³⁸⁹). Lord Collins thought the distinction between imputation and inference would make little difference in practice (because the court would ultimately have to deal objectively with all of the contradictory evidence in any event); whereas Lords Kerr and Wilson considered that it would be significant in practice (because it would govern the court’s approach either to deciding what it thought was fair or alternatively searching for a common intention on the evidence).

Lord Kerr attempted to identify the principles which were agreed between the members of the Supreme Court, which was a useful exercise from the perspective of courts at first instance deciding cases subsequently.³⁹⁰ Those principles were as follows:

- (i) In joint names cases, the starting point is that equity follows the law. One begins the search for the proper allocation of shares in the property with the presumption that the parties are joint tenants and are thus entitled to equal shares;
- (ii) That presumption can be displaced by showing (a) that the parties had a different common intention at the time when they acquired the home or (b) that they later formed the common intention that their respective shares would change;
- (iii) The common intention, if it can be inferred, is to be deduced objectively from the parties’ conduct;
- (iv) Where the intention as to the division of the property cannot be inferred, each is entitled to that share which the court considers fair. In considering the question of what is fair the court should have regard to the whole course of dealing between the parties.

388 [2011] UKSC 53, at [25], [29] and [53], quoted above.

389 [2010] 1 WLR 2401, at [33].

390 [2011] UKSC 53, [2011] 3 WLR 1121, [2011] 3 FCR 495, at [68].

By contrast, the two areas of disagreement which his Lordship identified were the following:³⁹¹

- (a) Is there sufficient evidence in the present case from which the parties' intentions can be inferred?
- (b) Is the difference between inferring and imputing an intention likely to be great as a matter of general practice?

There is a great difference between 'imputing' an intention to the parties and 'inferring' that intention from the parties' conduct and evidence. This particular formulation by Lord Kerr adopts the uncomfortable notion that the court must objectively ascertain the intentions of the parties: meaning that the court must consider all of the evidence to identify as clearly as possible what the parties should be taken to have intended. This issue took up a large part of the hearing in front of the Supreme Court. Lord Kerr considered this to be important, whereas Lord Collins considered that it would make little difference in practice. The philosophical difference is a great one, however.

If a court 'imputes' a common intention then the court is imposing its view of what is 'fair' or appropriate on the parties; whereas, if a court 'infers' a common intention then the court is simply enforcing the parties' own agreement, but not substituting its own views for the parties' intentions. However, as Lord Walker and Lady Hale held, adopting dicta of Judge Strauss QC, 'it is not open to a court to impose a solution upon [the parties] in contradiction to those intentions, merely because the court considers that it is fair to do so.'³⁹² Interestingly, these dicta seem to suggest that the parties may have had different intentions from which the court will seek to infer an appropriate arrangement. Nevertheless, this passage suggests that the concept of fairness is to be used only once the evidence as to the parties' common intention is unclear. The court must work with the grain of what the parties can be proved to have intended, perhaps taking an objective stance to interpret what those individual elements of intention can be taken to constitute in the final analysis. For example, suppose Brenda and Robert cohabited in a house which had been acquired entirely by way of a mortgage which Robert had discharged from his salary before being made redundant. In that case, separate strands of evidence that Brenda was to go out to work to supplement the family's income for the first time and that Robert was to continue to pay the mortgage (albeit from a redundancy payment, not from a salary) might reasonably be fused together by the court to infer a common intention that Brenda was to acquire rights in the home for the first time; alternatively, if that evidence was considered inconclusive, the court could take the view that fairness meant that Brenda should acquire a right for the first time, especially if Robert could only make those payments if Brenda paid for everything else.

The choice is between a judge-made approach as to who should own the parties' home, regardless of the parties' own preferences, and an approach which allows freedom of choice for the people involved by creating their own common intention. The difficulty identified by Piska³⁹³ is that it will be difficult in practice to 'access' the parties' subjective intentions; or rather, it will be difficult to unlock the epistemically difficult concept of 'the parties' objective intentions',³⁹⁴ by which it is suggested is meant 'the arrangement which the parties must

391 [2011] UKSC 53, [2011] 3 WLR 1121, [2011] 3 FCR 495, at [68].

392 [2011] UKSC 53, [2011] 3 WLR 1121, [2011] 3 FCR 495, at [46].

393 Piska, 2008.

394 Ibid, 127.

have intended, given all the available evidence'. As behavioural psychologists have long said, the subjective thoughts of any person are unknowable.³⁹⁵ Instead, the courts can only access an approximation of those thoughts through cross-examination in court and any other evidence which can be identified. They will attempt to do this, as Lord Walker and Lady Hale put it, as a result of 'the primary search for what the parties actually intended, to be deduced objectively from their words and their actions'.³⁹⁶

It will not always be an easy thing to establish on the evidence at trial what the intentions of the parties were. One party may allege a purely business relationship whereas the other party may allege that there was a sexual relationship between them: the former may indicate absolute ownership of a flat as a business asset by the person who paid for it, whereas the latter may indicate that at the date of purchase there was an intention of common ownership in equity.³⁹⁷ The judge will be required to form a view of the witnesses and the likelihood of the things they allege. There are several cases considered above in which men have lied to women about the reasons they were not put on the legal title of property, and several cases have made the point that witnesses in these sorts of cases tend to become overwrought and give bad evidence (even if those witnesses are themselves barristers, as in Cox v Jones). Therefore, the practical business of finding fact is very difficult indeed. Hence, in practice, it is suggested that the concept of fairness will be used far more than the Supreme Court has anticipated to reach the final conclusion in many cases.

Unconscionability: the Voldemort concept

Somewhat surprisingly perhaps, during argument in front of the Supreme Court in Jones v Kernott, Lady Hale remarked that 'the law of trusts has no way of producing fairness'. The principal concept which was not mentioned in front of the Supreme Court and which was not mentioned in Stack v Dowden nor in Jones v Kernott was 'unconscionability'. It has become a Voldemort concept: no one, it seems, can speak its name.³⁹⁸ Jones v Kernott could have been decided on the basis that to have allowed Kernott a half-share would have been unconscionable, just as it would have been unconscionable to have left him with nothing; and in Stack v Dowden that good conscience entitled Ms Dowden to a 65% share in the property in that case. The absence of the concept of unconscionability in these cases is all the more surprising given that Lady Hale suggested that the law of trusts had no mechanism for doing justice between the parties. Two points follow from this alarming suggestion. First, 395 See, for example, the famous lecture delivered by John Watson in 1919, 'Psychology as the Behaviourist Views it', set out in Watson, 1994: 'Society as a whole is under constant endeavour to get the individual to materialise thoughts in overt speech or in deeds. . . . There is no known direct method of detecting whether an individual is lying, notwithstanding the many studies made upon that topic.' The point being that subjective thought processes remain locked inside the mind.

396 [2011] UKSC 53, [2011] 3 WLR 1121 [46].

397 Favor Easy Management Ld v Wu [2011] EWHC 2017 (Ch).

398 The reference is, of course, to the character of Lord Voldemort in JK Rowling's Harry Potter books, whose name no one was supposed to speak. I mentioned the metaphor behind this idea to Martin Dixon, (my esteemed fellow author at Routledge, friend, and of the University of Cambridge) over coffee at the Supreme Court on the day Jones v Kernott was heard. We agreed this was a good idea and that there would be a race between us to write it down first. It is my idea. I have written it down first. Just so he knows. (For the avoidance of doubt, dear reader, we are only joking.)

equity and trusts law exists to ensure good conscience and therefore they do contain a concept which can generate justice between the parties. Second, as the highest appellate court, which had already taken it upon itself to review the entirety of the law in this area (and not simply to answer the factual problems in front of it), it was open to the Supreme Court in any event to have created a doctrine to produce justice if it had chosen to do so.

15.9.8 Three persistent problems

There are three significant themes which illustrate difficulties with these cases: the nature of real relationships between home sharers that are messier than the courts have accepted; the persistence of relying on financial contributions, for all of the fine talk about the law having ‘moved on’,³⁹⁹ which makes it difficult to know what ‘fairness’ will add; and the difficulties of differentiating between imputing or inferring a common intention. These themes are considered in the sections to follow.

15.9.9 (1) Real property, real relationships and real people

The messy facts of people’s lives and the normative judgments in Stack and Kernott

What is surprising about the judgments in Stack v Dowden is how surprised the judges were about the slightest idiosyncrasy in people’s lives. That an unmarried couple with separate occupations maintained separate bank accounts is treated as though it necessarily carries Mr Stack and Ms Dowden outside the norm. The truth is that, particularly when dealing with unmarried couples, everyone is outside the norm. There is no norm any more among unmarried home sharers. As Hans Magnus Enzensberger memorably put it: this standard deviationism is now all part of the ordinary exoticism of everyday life.⁴⁰⁰ As opposed to the conformity of the middle of the 20th century, everyone is ‘into’ something now and they define themselves by reference to it: law student, juggler, Buddhist, lesbian, motorbike enthusiast, actor, grime DJ, Belieber,⁴⁰¹ alternative therapist, blogger, whatever. None of these things defines a whole person but they may be the features which people use to define themselves. People define themselves in their own terms. Everyone wants to be treated as an individual and everyone sees themselves as having something special about them. The same is true of home sharers’ relationships, no matter what the glossy magazines try to tell them.⁴⁰² None of these relationships conforms to a norm but our highest courts want to pretend that they do. Home sharers and cohabittees, as opposed simply to those in ‘intimate relationships’, are both categories of people who are governed by these trusts of homes rules but who conform to none of the relationship categories to which Lady Hale referred. The Law Commission report to which she and Lord Walker referred in both judgments makes 399 [2007] 2 AC 432, at [60], per Baroness Hale.

400 Enzensberger, 1992, 179.

401 A ‘Belieber’ is one who ‘believes’ in Justin Bieber, a pop singer with an ardent, youthful following. The Monkees should have re-released their song ‘I’m a Believer’ with the lyrics: ‘And I saw his face / Now I’m a Belieber’ to capture the phenomenon. Presumably this will all be ancient history by the time of the next edition of this book.

402 There is nothing more ‘normalising’ than the ideals which glossy lifestyle magazines, weekend newspaper supplements or supermarket freebie magazines try to impose on their readers.

careful reference to ‘home sharers’ and not to ‘couples’. Home sharers may be new graduates buying and sharing a home after university as they start their careers; home sharers may be a gay couple with no intention of having children; home sharers may be a couple whose relationship has ended but who continue to live in the same home because neither can afford a home in the same neighbourhood on their own and because they want to help raise their children.

The sort of circumstance which is not considered by any of these courts would be the following, which is illustrated by no less a part of our culture than the television programme Sex and the City.⁴⁰³ Suppose that a man (let us call him ‘Big’⁴⁰⁴) owns an apartment which he has bought outright, and then a woman (let us call her ‘Carrie’) moves into that apartment when their relationship becomes increasingly serious. But she does not move in on one particular night after a long conversation, still less does she move in once a TR1 Land Registry form has been completed to decide on her right in the property. Instead, Carrie spends more and more time at his flat, until she begins to leave a few clothes and then an increasing number of toiletries there because it is easier for her to get ready for work when she stays the night. What leaving these few items behind implies for their relationship becomes a micro-crisis in their lives. Over time, let us suppose that Carrie moves in: perhaps because she has to move out of her flat because her lease terminates or because she loses her job, perhaps she becomes pregnant without either of them planning that she would, or perhaps they just want to spend more and more time together – eventually, however, through force of circumstance Big’s flat becomes her permanent home. Let us suppose that ten years later the parties need to decide whether or not she has any rights in the property. In what circumstances might a person like Carrie acquire a right in the home beyond the imaginings of the Supreme Court?

At no point will an ordinary couple identify a particular moment as being so significant that they will need to take legal advice to regularise who has what right in the property. This is why Stack v Dowden is so unrealistic. The couple will focus on the first toothbrush to be left in the flat because it says more about their relationship than about their property law rights: becoming a couple who ‘live together’ rather than two people who ‘go out’ is the real concern for them, not their equitable interests. Hence the need to interpret their relationship as a court of equity and not to expect that it will respond to rigid legal categories. If Carrie is pregnant then her health and their financial concerns are likely to take control of their minds, not their property law rights. There will be no ‘magic moment’ in which they formulate a common intention. There may not even be a single moment in which they even have a common intention about all of the things which the courts consider important in this context.⁴⁰⁵ This is why the standard of ‘fairness’ will be important in practice because the courts will have to formulate a rough approximation of what their common intention should have been from the information available.

403 This particular micro-crisis began with a hairdryer in Sex and the City, ‘Evolution’, Season 2, Episode 23 (Home Box Office, 1999), written by Darren Star. Carrie wanted to leave things at Big’s apartment. Big was threatened by this disturbance to his ordered, minimalist and masculine life. Ironically and tragically, Carrie was delighted to be allowed to leave a hairdryer and other objects, but this only served to demonstrate that she was intended to have no property rights because she needed permission to leave them and as such she had no right to do so.

404 That is a name given to this character in the programme, and not one of my own invention, in case you were confused.

If Carrie starts to pay the mortgage or the couple clearly start to present themselves as ‘spousal analogues’⁴⁰⁶ in the way they live their life together then maybe we would begin to say that Carrie should have acquired rights in the home. The issue is which of these two things would actually prompt the judges to grant her rights in the property. For all that the law has ‘moved on’⁴⁰⁷ from Lloyds Bank v Rosset and from money-based resulting trusts, what is noticeable is that the courts in Stack v Dowden and in Jones v Kernott do not appear, on the facts, to place a specific value on anything which happens between the parties other than their financial contributions. Instead, the courts seem to focus on finding a common intention at the outset and on the parties’ financial contributions. The messy facts of most people’s lives are much more difficult to quantify. (This point is taken up again below.)

Very few people have everything mapped out so comfortably that everyone involved has enough money, self-confidence and legal advice to identify their common intentions in advance of purchase. It will often be the case that the parties privately disagree about their respective rights in the property, and that that is precisely why the matter is never discussed. Because they are English, this may well be the very last thing they will ever discuss. What they would risk would be the ending of their relationship in a spectacular argument. So, instead they focus on choosing the right colour paint for the back bedroom in a DIY superstore and play out their angst in disagreements over the taps which would work best in the guest lavatory.⁴⁰⁸ If a couple have children, then it is common for one partner to take the lead role in looking at properties to buy during the week while the other partner is at work, but the roles will commonly be reversed when it comes to solicitors and negotiating the price of the property through estate agents. In these sorts of situations, even if the parties do buy their first home together, there will obviously be power relationships within ‘intimate relationships’ which prevent the parties either from ever considering who owns what or from making a common intention explicit. The idea of a common intention is therefore often a fabrication.

Moreover, the idea of a common intention is simply peculiar. It assumes that the parties will form a conscious common intention at the outset of their relationship about their property rights. Let us imagine how that might work in practice:⁴⁰⁹

In an episode of the TV show The Big Bang Theory, the uber-geek⁴¹⁰ Sheldon Cooper improbably finds a girlfriend: the differently geeky Amy Farrah Fowler. The characters’

405 It was a staple of 1970s sitcoms, for example, that married men had little control over their domestic arrangements – see for example, George and Mildred – and that as a result their ‘common intention’ about their home life was something which they waited to be told. The idea that a ‘common intention’ would be ‘common’ at times seems a little unlikely. An emotionally constipated nation like the English always appeared to be in the 20th century will necessarily find it difficult to discuss their common intentions and so it is improbable in many cases that one will be created without the parties being questioned about it together at one particular time.

406 This is the term which Alan Plater invents in The Beiderbecke Affair for the two unmarried schoolteacher heroes to use to define their quasi-marital relationship.

407 [2007] UKHL 17, at [60], per Baroness Hale.

408 And, yes, I realise it may be bourgeois to have a guest lavatory, which is exactly why I mentioned it.

409 Alastair Hudson, Great Debates in Equity & Trusts, Macmillan, 2014, Ch.9.

410 Geek is not a term of abuse in this context. Geek is good.

combination of oddness and intelligence is the heart of the programme's comic conceit. Sheldon Cooper in particular is the poster boy for hyper-intelligence and social stupidity being contained in one awkward body. . . . When Sheldon and Amy decided to formalise their interaction as being some form of boyfriend/girlfriend relationship, Sheldon produced a hard copy of 'The Relationship Agreement' which was intended to codify in legally-binding, contractual form their rights and responsibilities in relation to the minutiae of their future relationship.⁴¹¹ . . . The humour is located in the fact that Sheldon's behaviour in codifying the precise details of their putative relationship is instantly recognisable to the audience as being aberrant. That is a very important point. Sheldon does not fall in love: instead he codifies the common intention which he wants them to agree to have. And everyone in the audience laughs because this seems so strange. . . . Only an oddball would want to agree in advance all of the minutiae of their putative, fledgling romantic relationship with another person. . . . Do the courts really expect that we will all act like Sheldon Cooper when we begin cohabiting with someone? The definitive weirdo in our popular culture is apparently the model for our relationships in property law.

The very idea of a common intention has been dismissed in other commonwealth jurisdictions because it is so odd. It is odd both because it assumes that the parties will come to this form of agreement and because in many cases it requires the courts to manufacture the parties' common intention for them. Both of these ideas are considered below. First, we turn to the question: has the new approach in the leading cases actually had any effect on the outcome of those cases?

Sisters doing it for themselves, or just following the money?

What is interesting about Stack v Dowden and about Jones v Kernott is that both of the women are the successful, higher earners in their relationships who have the property rights at the start of the relationship. This marks a great sea-change from the old-fashioned hearth-and-home wives Mrs Pettitt and Mrs Gissing, let alone those women who had sought 'the deserted wife's equity' before then. The feminist scholarship in this field has always made the sensible central point that in relation to the home it cannot only be financial contributions by men under the old nuclear family model which should acquire rights in property, but rather that other forms of contribution to the home or to the family should be taken into account. What is interesting in the judgments of Lady Hale, as a former family law academic, is that so little account is taken of the things which the men did within their relationships (for example, in working on the home), even though their financial contributions were less significant than those of their partners. What both of those cases have shown, ironically, is that financial contributions will still remain the most significant factor in spite of the law having purportedly 'moved on'.

In Jones v Kernott it seems entirely reasonable that a 90% contribution from Ms Jones, with no contribution from Kernott for over 14 years, should result in a 90% equitable interest for her – but there is very little in the judgment which takes account of anything that Kernott may have done beyond a financial contribution estimated at about 10% of the equity.⁴¹² Similarly, Ms Dowden earned more than Mr Stack and so contributed more financially to the home, and the ultimate decision came down broadly in the same proportions as the parties' financial contributions. Notably, that decision also identified equitable interests which were very close to the parties' proportionate financial contributions. The same is true of the decision in Oxley v Hiscock. For all of the fine talk about undertaking surveys of the entire course of dealing, of considering what is fair, of inferring common intentions objectively, this seems to make very little difference to the final calculation beyond assessing the parties' financial contributions. Even if these factors are being taken into account, they only appear to make a small difference at the edges to the parties' rights in the property. As yet there is no guidance as to how they could be brought into account. Older judgments like that in Midland Bank v Cooke (finding that the equities were equal because there was no clear answer otherwise) and in Jennings v Rice (where the shares on estoppel principles were such as to prevent unconscionability) tell us much more about bringing other factors into account. This is what makes the judgment about what is 'fair' after Jones v Kernott more difficult because it is not at all clear what weight, if any, is being given in practice to any other forms of contribution to the home by the highest courts in recent cases. The solid tug of money appears to be working on the courts too.

411 'The Flaming Spittoon Acquisition', Season 5, Episode 10, 2011.

15.9.10 (2) Imputation, inference and judge-made decisions

A large part of the oral argument before the Supreme Court in Jones v Kernott involved the question of whether the parties' common intention should be imputed to them or whether it should be inferred from the evidence. In essence, if the court imputes a common intention then the court is imposing its view of what is proper or appropriate or fair (where those three things are very different) onto the parties. A judge would always prefer to infer a common intention by looking at the evidence and identifying what the parties must have intended their rights to be. As Piska has discussed, it is not possible to identify the true subjective intentions of either party because they are locked inside those parties' minds.⁴¹³ Indeed, there would be three problems anyway, even if one could peer into their minds: that party may not have consciously formulated a clear view about all of the significant questions in any event; that party's view may change over time, depending perhaps on the strength of their relationship with their partner, the arrival of children, and so forth; the parties' subjective views may indicate only a fundamental disagreement with one another which they have never voiced out loud. Often there will not be a clear consensus; which has the result that the court will be forced to impose a conclusion on the parties.⁴¹⁴ This is why in Jones v Kernott there is an unsatisfactory concept of the court objectively inferring the parties' intentions. What this 412 The trial judge does appear to have taken into account Kernott's work on the property but that is supposed to have increased its value by 50%, which is hardly borne out by the 10% ultimate share.

413 Piska, 2008.

414 Indeed, the courts are concerned to identify a consensus too often, whereas in practice there may have been a vague common understanding at one or other time in the relationship (often at times of crisis or stress when there seems to be no alternative) but intentions and sentiment will change over time through a long relationship and identifying the time at which the intention is to be fixed is important: on the date of purchase, on the birth of the first child, on the children leaving home, when the breadwinner lost their job and the other party went out to find work, and so on.

means is that the court will listen to all the evidence and try to estimate what the parties' subjective intentions probably were, and as a consequence what the most rational common intention must have been in that context. In essence, then, the court will always be imposing a common intention on the parties in truth by dint of selecting which evidence appears to shed a meaningful light on what their intentions must have been.

15.9.11 (3) The last resort: going to the fair

Lord Walker devoted a large part of his judgment in Stack v Dowden, which was intended to be merely a 'footnote' to Baroness Hale's judgment, to considering the legacy of the word 'fair' in the cases up to and including Gissing v Gissing. The law before Pettitt and Gissing had seen valiant attempts by Lord Denning and others to introduce a notion of fairness into the law by means of 'the deserted wife's equity', as considered above. Therefore, Lord Diplock's judgments in the Court of Appeal in Pettitt v Pettitt and in Gissing v Gissing in the House of Lords were delivered in reaction to the difficulties with that concept of the court making an order which was 'fair'. Instead, fairness was considered by Lord Walker to be a large part of the drive to impute common intentions to the parties where the parties were to be taken to have intended what was fair.⁴¹⁵ This, however, is as much discussion as we get from Lord Walker or Lady Hale as to what the idea of fairness may involve. Lady Hale excluded the possibility, as was discussed above, of the court simply deciding what was fair in Stack v Dowden.⁴¹⁶ However, in Jones v Kernott Lord Walker and Lady Hale had decided that the court could do what was fair if the presumption had been rebutted and the evidence was not otherwise conclusive of a common intention.⁴¹⁷

Ultimately, the courts will be required to ask what is 'fair' on the facts of countless cases at first instance because evidence of the parties' true common intention will be difficult to isolate among the mass of evidence.⁴¹⁸ The higher courts have left us no indication as to what that might mean in recent cases. Therefore, the courts at first instance will have recourse to all of the preceding authority to decide what is fair. It is the last, and necessary, resort of the law in this area but courts at first instance require a little guidance as to how they should approach it, not least to minimise the number of likely appeals. In circumstances which involve 'intimate relationships' it may be sensible to move lock, stock and barrel to adopting family law concepts. What makes judges nervous of doing this is that they do not wish to appear to be producing property law rights out of thin air.⁴¹⁹

15.10 DIFFERENT APPROACHES ELSEWHERE IN THE COMMONWEALTH

Other Commonwealth jurisdictions have taken a different approach to that developed in English law since the decision in Gissing v Gissing. Typically, Gissing is seen as the common 415 It is of course the proof of human rationality to assume that parties to a relationship are always concerned to be fair as opposed to anything else. As Jerry Seinfeld put it, 'If you don't play games [in a relationship], how do you know who is winning?'

416 [2007] UKHL 17, at [61].

417 [2011] UKSC 53, at [46] and [47].

418 As acknowledged in general terms at [2011] UKSC 53, at [36].

419 See Rotherham, 2002, Ch. 10.

conceptual root in considering cases concerning trusts of homes in Commonwealth jurisdictions as far flung as Canada, Australia and New Zealand. The common intention constructive trust approach in Rosset has not found favour generally across the Commonwealth, and it is at that point that the other jurisdictions have begun to diverge from English law. Each jurisdiction has developed its own approach. There is a much longer discussion of these principles on www.alastairhudson.com/trustslaw.

15.10.1 Canada and ‘unjust enrichment’

The test for unjust enrichment

The core of the Canadian approach is the imposition of a proprietary constructive trust ‘where a person who holds title to property is subject to an equitable duty to convey it to another on the ground that he would be unjustly enriched if he were permitted to retain it’.⁴²⁰ The sea-change in the Canadian case law came in Pettkus v Becker,⁴²¹ in the leading judgment of Dickson J. The parties were an unmarried couple who had lived together for 19 years. The property at issue was the farm in which they had both lived, and a bee-keeping business which had been established through their joint efforts. The woman claimed an entitlement to half of the business and to the land. The court was unanimous in holding that she should be entitled to a constructive trust to prevent any unjust enrichment on the part of her former partner. Dickson J set out the general underpinnings of the Canadian approach:

... where one person in a relationship tantamount to spousal prejudices herself in the reasonable expectation of receiving an interest in property and the other person in the relationship freely accepts benefits conferred by the first person in circumstances where he knows or ought to have known of that reasonable expectation, it would be unjust to allow the recipient of the benefit to retain it.⁴²²

In the later case of Peter v Beblow,⁴²³ the test is more clearly stated. For there to be an unjust enrichment in the Canadian law relating to equitable rights in the home, it was held that three conditions must be satisfied: ‘(1) there has been an enrichment; (2) a corresponding deprivation has been suffered by the person who supplied the enrichment; and (3) there is an absence of any juristic reason for the enrichment itself’.⁴²⁴

The effect of this test is said to be the creation of a presumption that the ‘performance of domestic services will give rise to a claim for unjust enrichment’.⁴²⁵ The principal driver away from the English common intention constructive trust was that, in the words of Dickson J, the courts were involved in the ‘meaningless ritual’ of searching for a ‘fugitive common intention’.⁴²⁶ On the facts of Pettkus there had been no common intention formed, but the court wished to provide the claimant with a remedy. It was considered that a judgment in

420 Ibid, 629.

421 (1980) 117 DLR (3d) 257.

422 (1980) 117 DLR (3d) 257, 274.

423 (1993) 101 DLR (4th) 621. Egana v Normore 10 ITELR 813 applied Peter v Beblow.

424 Ibid, 630, per Cory J.

425 Mee, 1999, 192.

426 (1980) 117 DLR (3d) 257, 269.

money by way of equitable compensation would have been inappropriate to prevent that unjust enrichment, and the court therefore made an order for a constructive trust over the property at issue.

15.10.2 Australia and ‘unconscionability’

The development of a test of unconscionability

The modern position in Australian law was established originally in the decision of the High Court of Australia in Baumgartner v Baumgartner.⁴²⁷ The plaintiff and defendant had lived together, sharing all household and other expenses, for a period of four years. They had not married, although the plaintiff had changed her name by deed poll so that it was the same as that of her partner. The couple had one child during this time. The couple sold a home which had been wholly owned by the defendant and sought to construct another one with the sale proceeds of the first and a mortgage taken out in the man’s name. The plaintiff worked throughout the relationship, and passed her wage packets to her partner each time she was paid on the basis that he looked after their financial affairs. The plaintiff eventually left her partner with their child and claimed an equitable interest in the property.

It was found that the parties did not form a common intention but that that would not dispose of the matter. The court wanted to provide for a means of acquiring rights in the home which went beyond straightforward financial contribution to the acquisition cost of the home. The court held that a proprietary interest by way of constructive trust would be ordered where failure to do so would have been ‘so contrary to justice and good conscience’ that it could not have been permitted. This approach is best explained as a test based on the issue whether or not the trustee’s retention of the beneficial interest would be ‘unconscionable’. On these facts it was held that it would be unconscionable for the plaintiff to deny any beneficial interest to the defendant. As the court expressed the position:

The case is accordingly one in which the parties have pooled their earnings for the purposes of their joint relationship, one of the purposes of that relationship being to secure accommodation for themselves and their child. Their contributions, financial and otherwise, to the acquisition of the land, the building of the house, the purchase of furniture and the making of their home, were on the basis of, and for the purposes of, that joint relationship. In this situation the [defendant’s] assertion, after the relationship had failed, that the Leumeah property, which was financed in part through the pooled funds, is his sole property, is his property beneficially to the exclusion of any interest at all on the part of the respondent, amounts to unconscionable conduct which attracts the intervention of equity and the imposition of a constructive trust at the suit of the [plaintiff].

Therefore, the court is prepared to allocate rights on the basis of a general contribution to a joint undertaking between two people as partners. It does not require the application of that money solely to the acquisition cost,⁴²⁸ neither does it preclude actions of contribution to general household expenses, nor does it require some evident common intention between the parties. This test of unconscionability allows the court, in effect, to impute motives and to judge the justice of the case objectively – that is, without the need to pretend to be able to read the minds of the protagonists. The approach in Australia has therefore been to return to the notion of unconscionable behaviour as a general yardstick for measuring the suitability of an order as to the ownership of the equitable interest in land.

427 [1988] Conv 259, (1988) 62 ALJR 29, (1987) 164 CLR 137.

428 Which had formerly been the position in Calverley v Green (1984) 155 CLR 242.

Forms of unconscionability granting rights in the home

In Australia, direct contributions to the purchase price and to the mortgage instalments still count towards an interest in the property.⁴²⁹ Similarly, work done in repairing the property will afford some equitable interest.⁴³⁰ Other contributions will also be recognised. Facilitating the payment of the mortgage by paying for other expenses will acquire an equitable interest in the home.⁴³¹ More extensively, working unpaid in the family business may acquire rights in the home.⁴³²

In relation to non-financial contributions – or contributions involving money, such as working unpaid – the Australian approach is less clear. In short, such non-financial contributions will be accounted for by means of an equitable interest if they have facilitated direct financial contributions to the acquisition of the property in some way.⁴³³ In the case of Bryson v Bryant,⁴³⁴ a wife had cared for her husband through a long marriage (of about 60 years) until her death. The couple had built a house together and, while he had been the main breadwinner, she had contributed to the family income during the Depression, becoming the breadwinner for a while. Evidence was limited on their precise contributions. After her death, while her husband was in hospital suffering from senile dementia, their extended family began to argue over the rights in their home. The court held that unconscionability would require that the wife receive a half-share in the property on constructive trust principles. As Kirby P presented their argument:

It is important that the ‘brave new world of unconscionability’ should not lead the court back to family property law of twenty years ago by the back door of a preoccupation with contributions, particularly financial contributions . . . Nor should those who have provided ‘women’s work’ over their adult lifetime . . . be told condescendingly, by a mostly male judiciary, that their services must be regarded as ‘freely given labour’ only or, catalogued as attributable solely to a rather one-way and quaintly described ‘love and affection’, when property interests come to be distributed.

429 Atkinson v Burt (1989) 12 Fam LR 800; Ammala v Sarimaa (1993) 17 Fam LR 529; Harmer v Pearson (1993) 16 Fam LR 596. Payments towards the mortgage similarly: Carville v Westbury (1990) 102 Fed LR 223; Kais v Turvey (1994) 17 Fam LR 498.

430 Miller v Sutherland (1991) 14 Fam LR 416, 424; Booth v Beresford (1993) 17 Fam LR 147; Kais v Turvey (1994) 17 Fam LR 498.

431 Baumgartner v Baumgartner (1987) 164 CLR 137; Hibberson v George (1989) 12 Fam LR 725; Lipman v Lipman (1989) 13 Fam LR 1; Renton v Youngman (1995) 19 Fam LR 450; Bell v Bell (1995) 19 Fam LR 690.

432 Lipman v Lipman (1989) 13 Fam LR 1. Cf Ivin v Blake [1995] 1 FLR 70; and proprietary estoppel in Wayling v Jones (1993) 69 P & CR 170.

433 Stowe and Devereaux Holdings Pty Ltd v Stowe (1995) 19 Fam LR 409, 418.

434 (1992) 29 NSWLR 188.

The question which follows is precisely how far this notion of unconscionability is intended to stretch. Clearly it will encompass things otherwise dismissed by Rosset and other English cases as merely ‘women’s work’.⁴³⁵ The concept of unconscionability has been pursued in more recent cases such as *Giumelli v Giumelli*⁴³⁶ and Killen v Rennie.⁴³⁷ These issues are pursued in the next section which conducts a survey of the academics’ course of dealing with this subject.

15.11 TRENDS IN THE ACADEMIC DISCUSSION OF TRUSTS OF HOMES

15.11.1 Framing the problem

The issue of rights in the home is a particularly important socio-economic phenomenon. Any property which is co-owned in England and Wales may be affected by these rules – millions of homes and families are affected by this area of law. It is therefore somewhat surprising that every Anglo-centric common law jurisdiction is experiencing such difficulty in formulating suitable legal and equitable principles in this area. The problem with the current English approach to the common intention constructive trust is perhaps summarised best by Dixon J in Pettkus v Becker,⁴³⁸ in his description of the court’s role in trusts of homes cases as being ‘[t]he judicial quest for the fugitive or phantom common intention’. Necessarily the court is required to use some fiction, or impute an intention which the parties had never really considered before coming to court. More to the point, it is impossible for ordinary people to know the nature of their rights in their homes when the law is quite so complex and obscure.

15.11.2 Conceptual issues with the common intention constructive trust

The phantom common intention

The criticism of the common intention constructive trust highlighted above was based primarily on its reliance on an implied agreement where no such agreement has ever existed: it has been described as a ‘phantom’. For example, the term ‘mutual conduct common intention constructive trust’, as set out in Lloyds Bank v Rosset, is simply self-contradictory. Where there is avowedly no express agreement of any kind between the parties, the court has given itself the power to impute such an intention from the behaviour of the parties. The court supposes that the parties would have reached such and such an agreement if they had thought about it – the whole point being that they did not think about it. Therefore, they are treated as having created an agreement where in reality there was none. That is a legal fiction.

435 See generally the excellent Bryan, 1990, 25.

436 [1999] HCA 10.

437 [2005] NSWCA 392.

438 (1980) 117 DLR (3rd) 257.

The feminist analysis

There are objections made by feminist theorists which home in on the requirement that there must have been some direct contribution to the mortgage repayments or purchase price⁴³⁹ rather than any more general contribution to familial expenses or to family life in general.⁴⁴⁰ It is suggested that in most of the decided cases the claimant is a woman who does not work because the parties' lifestyle is organised around the woman as carer and the man as breadwinner. The English approach does not give any recognition to the work that is done by women in this circumstance. In Canada, in Australia and in Midland Bank v Cooke,⁴⁴¹ there is some recognition of the non-financial contribution of (typically) women in relationships. Similarly, where the woman does contribute financially to the home it is often by means of paying for bills, or paying for other expenses on an ad hoc basis or by helping in a family business. The Rosset test does not take these forms of contribution into account. Therefore, women not entitled to protection under matrimonial legislation are victims of the affection of English judges for allocating rights in property on the basis of cash contributions.

The changing understanding of women's rights

The position of women under English law before the Married Women's Property Act 1882 was truly disturbing.⁴⁴² A wife became 'the shadow of her husband' on marriage with the effect that all of the woman's property passed absolutely to her husband and became in law his property. If you have read Jane Austen's novel Persuasion you will have encountered the heroine Anne who must resist the advances of unctuous Mr Elliot who is a gold-digger seeking a rich wife so that his own penury can be remedied by acquiring ownership of all of her money after marrying her. In such circumstances, many women would be abandoned by unscrupulous husbands who spent all of their wives' money and kept mistresses. In this sense equity came to the rescue of these women by holding 'their' property on well-drafted settlements so that roguish husbands could not steal it away from them. Equity was consequently considered to be a woman's protector. It was not until important decisions in the late 20th century (such as *Williams & Glyn's Bank v Boland*⁴⁴³) that wives were recognised as having distinct rights in matrimonial property. Even among the seemingly enlightened judiciary of the 20th century, there were some very patronising and out-dated ideas in play. Lord Denning, who is for many people a sort of judicial saint, considered that:

No matter how you may dispute and argue, you cannot alter the fact that women are different from men. The principal task in life of women is to bear and rear children: and it is a task which occupies the best years of their lives. The man's part in bringing up the children is no doubt as important as hers, but of necessity he cannot devote so much 439 Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1990] 1 All ER 1111, 1119, per Lord Bridge.

440 Burns v Burns [1984] Ch 317. Cf White v White [2000] 2 FLR 981, 989. See Wong, 1998 and Wong, 2004.

441 [1995] 4 All ER 562.

442 Cretney, Family Law in the Twentieth Century, Oxford, 2003 at pp 92 et seq.

443 [1981] AC 487.

time to it. He is physically the stronger and she the weaker. He is temperamentally the more aggressive and she the more submissive. It is he who takes the initiative and she who responds . . .⁴⁴⁴

It goes on in that vein for some time. And he is generally thought to be one of the good guys! The recent case law on trusts of homes suggests that we live in more enlightened times now.

The supremacy of money

The other question which falls to be answered is why the focus of so much English law is so determinedly directed at financial contributions to the exclusion of all else. At one level it is clear that restricting the detriment necessary to found a claim to cash payments would make it easier for equity to decide what sort of contribution should count. Unfortunately for proponents of that argument, it is then necessary to include undertakings to make mortgage repayments in the future, and then to include the provision of cash discounts on the property, and so on. Equity is simply ducking the difficult question: in relation to families, what forms of action ought to confer rights in the home?

It is suggested that the better approaches would be the following. At a fundamental level, it should be recognised that labour in the family business or in the home is equivalent in worth to cash contributions in the home. In family contexts, particularly when children are involved, the courts should be mindful of the needs of the parties. By 'needs' is meant the requirement of the children to have a home and their welfare catered for. In the context of couples in long-term relationships without children (married or unmarried, heterosexual or homosexual), the courts should be mindful of the needs of the parties balanced by their deserts. The balance between needs and deserts means that parties should receive such remedy (personal or proprietary) as is appropriate to the nature of their relationship.

Therefore, long-term relationships should allocate equal rights to the parties unless it would be unconscionable to do so, whereas relationships of comparatively short standing should give priority (but not exclusivity) to the deserts of those parties who have contributed through finance or labour to the property. Where the parties do in fact reach an express agreement or found an express trust as to their respective rights, those rights should be enforced in the absence of any supervening factor.

The dangers of bright-line development

There are a number of potential issues arising specifically from the test set out in Rosset. In a note, Gardner has described this a part of the 'bright-line' development of the law relating to the family home:⁴⁴⁵ that is, a development of a strict test over a number of cases in place of a flexible, discretionary form of equity.⁴⁴⁶ Within the bright-line development in Rosset, there is a loss of flexibility, which has led to a number of Court of Appeal decisions simply ignoring the rigour of the Rosset test. Such uncertainty cannot be useful for a mature system of jurisprudence. Furthermore, it can be argued that Rosset ignores the role of the resulting trust like that in Dyer v Dyer,⁴⁴⁷ with the effect that there is great uncertainty in distinguishing between constructive trust and proprietary estoppel principles.

444 Denning, The Due Process of Law, Butterworths, 1980 at p 194.

445 (1991) 54 MLR 126.

The core problem is that each system of rules is reliant on a central fiction. For example, the common intention constructive trust depends on there being a ‘common intention’, even in situations where the parties have come to no agreement at all. In each jurisdiction there are presumptions and assumptions as to the parties’ intentions and the appropriate response. Couple these conceptual problems with the changing nature of the family and the higher incidence of family breakdown, and the difficulties facing the law increase.

Distinguishing between constructive trusts and proprietary estoppel

It is important to understand the differences between proprietary estoppel and constructive trust, because those differences are real and significant. Any attempt to unify them, as Lord Bridge attempts in Rosset, will require the creation of a new concept which straddles the existing categories. To begin with proprietary estoppel, the estoppel does not require common intention. Further, proprietary estoppel enables the court to tailor the remedy to fit the wrong, and there need not be an impact on third parties unless they have acted unconscionably.⁴⁴⁸ Estoppel may reverse detriment but will also give effect to expectations and so perfect imperfect gifts.⁴⁴⁹ The scope for remedies is broader: there may be a life interest or co-ownership interest, or a licence or a money judgment under estoppel which may be secured by a charge over the property.⁴⁵⁰

The proprietary constructive trust is a more precise and rigid approach, recognising that there is a difference between proprietary and personal remedies. To compare the constructive trust with estoppel, the institutional constructive trust does not take account of the rights of third parties. With Rosset-style constructive trusts, the court gives effect to the whole of the common intention (via express agreement or mutual conduct); whereas with an estoppel-type remedy, preventing unconscionable behaviour can be achieved by a tailor-made remedy varying between personal and proprietary court orders.

A line in the case law has developed to erode the distinction between constructive trusts and proprietary estoppel. It is generally considered that the constructive trust does not have 446 In a number of cases, including Abbey National v Cann [1991] 1 AC 56, City of London BS v Flegg [1988] AC 54, and Rosset [1990] 1 All ER 1111 itself, the House of Lords has favoured a tightening of the tests relating to the family home. This tendency can also be seen in the decisions of the Privy Council in Re Goldcorp [1995] 1 AC 74; Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324, and Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378, where their Lordships have moved towards more concrete tests for equitable responses like the constructive trust. Similarly, the decision of Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669 started from a restatement of the core principles of trusts law and sought to solidify the basis on which equity operated: similarly Target Holdings v Redfern [1996] 1 AC 421.

447 (1788) 2 Cox Eq Cas 92.

448 See Hayton, 1995:1, 386.

449 Eg, Pascoe v Turner [1979] 1 WLR 431.

450 Hayton, 1990:1.

the flexibility to decide what the extent of the interest in any case ought to be, although a slew of recent cases (from Bernard v Josephs through to Huntingford and the possibly anomalous Midland Bank v Cooke) have suggested a more flexible balance sheet approach to the identification and calculation of the equitable interest. In more general terms, it has been accepted in Australia in Walton Stores v Maher that equity will come to the relief of the parties simply where there has been ‘unconscionable conduct’, a more general approach which accords with cases like Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC and BCCI v Akindele.⁴⁵¹ The doctrine of constructive trust is thus becoming ever looser, in contradistinction to Lord Bridge’s attempt in Rosset to rigidify the doctrine.

Thus, classically, where only one party contributes to the mortgage this usually leads straightforwardly to a resulting trust rather than to some more flexible remedy like estoppel. However, in the wake of Bernard v Josephs and Huntingford v Hobbs there has developed something of a fashion among judges for the use of equitable accounting to determine the size of the equitable interest and to reallocate value where appropriate, rather than a reliance on a straightforward arithmetical resulting trust. So, for example, where the mortgage debt remains outstanding and one party assumes responsibility for the first time for discharging the remaining capital, that person acquires the value of that outstanding capital on her side of the balance sheet: thus equitable accounting permits alteration of the parties’ original intentions where appropriate.⁴⁵² Consequently, resulting trust and constructive trust have acquired some of the flexibility of estoppel by means of equitable accounting used to level out the unfairness sometimes exerted by trust-based approaches.

Ferguson has argued that it is wrong to merge the doctrines of constructive trust and proprietary estoppel because the courts are maintaining a distinction between the two in practice and because there is a difference in the onus of proof in the two remedies.⁴⁵³ Further, it is suggested that the doctrine of proprietary estoppel requires the cohabitee to raise a prima facie case of representation, reliance and detriment, with the other side then having to rebut that argument, whereas the constructive trust does not have a clear onus of proof. Proprietary estoppel is easier to plead because you know with certainty which three elements to plead in a statement of claim; whereas constructive trusts are more uncertain in that they require a vaguer argument predicated on the conscience of the defendant – unless applying the strict Rosset test.

A number of recent cases have taken the view that proprietary estoppel and constructive trust are to be considered as being part of the same doctrine. This process of eliding the two distinct doctrines perpetuates the suggestion made in Lloyds Bank v Rosset, where Lord Bridge considered that rights in the home come into existence on the basis of ‘constructive trust or proprietary estoppel’: as though the same doctrine. First, in Yaxley v Gotts,⁴⁵⁴ it was suggested, when deciding that a partly performed contract should take effect in equity even though it was in breach of s 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, that this equity was based on equitable estoppel or constructive trust

451 [2000] 3 WLR 1423.

452 Huntingford v Hobbs [1993] 1 FLR 736.

453 Ferguson, 1993. However, her analysis is based on the fact that Lord Bridge in Rosset does not join the two concepts all the time. Perhaps the better argument would be based on the decision of Nourse LJ in Stokes v Anderson, who argues that there ought to be a difference between the doctrines.

454 [2000] 1 All ER 711.

because the two were effectively indistinguishable. Similarly in *Grant v Edwards*⁴⁵⁵ it was suggested that ‘useful guidance may in future be obtained from the principles underlying the law of proprietary estoppel which in my judgment are closely akin to those laid down in Gissing v Gissing’,⁴⁵⁶

Secondly, in Oxley v Hiscock,⁴⁵⁷ Chadwick LJ was called upon to consider the equitable interests to the home of an unmarried couple. His Lordship commenced by considering the speech of Lord Bridge in Lloyds Bank v Rosset, in part to the effect that equitable interests occurred on the basis of ‘constructive trust or proprietary estoppel’, before then considering that he was entitled to consider the entire course of dealing between the parties on the basis of the judgment of Waite LJ in Midland Bank v Cooke. It has been suggested in this chapter that these two approaches are completely different. His Lordship expressed the opinion that the doctrines of constructive trust and proprietary estoppel were effectively identical. The subtler point is also made in Van Laetham v Brooker by Lawrence Collins J that the remedies provided in proprietary estoppel and constructive trust are effectively the same: that is, not that the two doctrines are exactly the same but rather that their effects are very similar.⁴⁵⁸

Professor Mark Thompson has expressed the view⁴⁵⁹ that this elision of the concepts, as suggested in Oxley v Hiscock, is not conceptually possible. The differences which he identifies are as follows. First, estoppel will grant rights such as easements⁴⁶⁰ which the doctrine of constructive trust will not grant, whereas constructive trusts are limited to granting proportionate rights in property. Secondly, the two doctrines come into existence on very different bases: constructive trust is based on the prevention of unconscionable conduct, whereas proprietary estoppel is based on detrimental reliance on a representation. Thirdly, constructive trusts are institutional, whereas proprietary estoppel is a remedial doctrine.⁴⁶¹ In conclusion, Professor Thompson suggests that the Court of Appeal was attempting to ‘reconcile the irreconcilable’,⁴⁶² a view which is shared by this writer.⁴⁶³ What the expression ‘reconcile the irreconcilable’ means, as considered above in relation to the ‘unconscionability approach’ is that the various cases which were discussed by Chadwick LJ in that case are so doctrinally different that it is not possible to mix them into a combined test. For example, the speech of Lord Bridge, with which the other members of the judicial committee of the House of Lords agreed, was clear that if there was no agreement between the parties then only contributions to the purchase price of the property would be conduct appropriate in the acquisition of an equitable interest in that land. By contrast, Waite LJ held that the court could ‘survey the whole course of dealing’ in Midland Bank v Cooke when deciding what conduct might be appropriate in the acquisition of an equitable interest in the land. Chadwick LJ in Oxley v Hiscock then purported to say that these two radically different approaches could be merged into one test whereby one looked first for an agreement between the parties and then at 455 [1986] Ch 638, 656, per Browne-Wilkinson V-C.

456 [1971] AC 886.

457 [2004] 3 All ER 703, [2004] EWCA Civ 546.

458 [2006] 2 FLR 495, para [263].

459 Thompson, 2004.

460 ER Ives Investment Ltd v High [1967] 2 QB 379; Crabb v Arun DC [1976] Ch 179.

461 See, eg, Ottey v Grundy [2003] EWCA Civ 1176.

462 Thompson, 2004.

463 See also Gardner (2004) 120 LQR 541, 546.

‘the whole course of dealing’ if no such agreement could be found. This is simply to ignore the fact that the House of Lords in Rosset did not intend to permit such a broad survey to be undertaken by the court. Indeed the majority in the House of Lords in Gissing v Gissing expressed themselves to be reluctant to accept the suggestion of Diplock LJ that common intentions could be identified on such a broad scale. It is suggested, therefore, that the exercise which Chadwick LJ undertook in Oxley v Hiscock is simply intellectually unsustainable.

15.11.3 Answering a problem question on the law on trusts of homes

There are a number of conflicting approaches set out in this chapter and consequently this is fertile ground for writing essays but it can be difficult when it comes to answering problem questions. The key to answering problem questions is to impose a structure on the material. I suggest the following structure for this area. First, if there is no express trust, apply the presumptions set out in Stack v Dowden and the fine principles set out in Jones v Kernott. Given that Stack v Dowden did not overrule any of the preceding law those presumptions can be rebutted by using any of the following principles. You may therefore wish to write in a way which identifies the divisions in the earlier cases. So, secondly, set out the strict test in Lloyds Bank v Rosset and apply it to the facts of the question. Come to a conclusion on the application of that test to the facts of the problem. Thirdly, in the alternative, consider whether or not the balance sheet cases would produce a different answer on the facts by means of resulting trust thinking. Fourthly, consider whether or not the family assets approach would lead to yet another answer on the facts – it is likely that ‘undertaking a survey of the whole course of dealing’ will lead to a different conclusion from that in Lloyds Bank v Rosset. Set out the conclusion based on this analysis and reflect on the difference from the Rosset approach. Fifthly, consider whether or not the doctrine of proprietary estoppel could lead to yet another conclusion. The principal difference here will be that proprietary estoppel permits a broad range of remedies ranging from absolute title to mere financial compensation, depending on whether or not the court is concerned to effect the promise, or to compensate detriment, or to prevent unconscionability. Finally, the recent unconscionability approach cases (seemingly with the approval of Baroness Hale in Stack v Dowden) may permit yet another conclusion based on seeking an agreement between the parties and then undertaking a survey of the whole course of dealing between them. In this way it will be possible both to show an understanding of the different effects of these different approaches and also it will be possible to lend structure to a problem answer. This may resolve itself in a question as to what is ‘fair’ after Jones v Kernott.

An alternative approach would be to consider the facts on the basis of traditional trusts law categories: express trust, then resulting trust, then constructive trust, and then proprietary estoppel. The difficulty with this approach, it is suggested, is that the courts do not appear to be using these categories to mean the same thing, and therefore it may produce a ‘wobbly’ structure for a problem answer in the context of trusts of homes.

In terms of essay writing this area clearly has a large literature. The key to a strong essay is to have a thesis (one which answers the question being asked . . .) which one either seeks to prove or to disprove. A clear target for an essay in this area would be the unsatisfactory nature of the decision in Lloyds Bank v Rosset, and the gaps in Stack v Dowden and Jones v Kernott or the differences between the approaches of various courts as discussed in this chapter or as seen through one of the lenses set out immediately above or in Chapter 17.

15.11.4 Conclusions – rethinking the law on trusts of homes

The argument raised in Marilyn French's novel The Women's Room in favour of an ignored and brutalised wife was that she was entitled to receive from her husband a divorce settlement which recognised her role as housekeeper, mother and sexual partner throughout their relationship. This attitude turns on its head the English approach to rights in the family home, based as it is solely on 'breadwinning' and mortgage payments leading to the acquisition of equitable property rights. The English law is wrestling with its own heritage. On the basis that it began with the idea that wives did not have rights independent of their husbands' rights, Lord Diplock in Gissing v Gissing advanced a seemingly radical notion that there might be some other form of common intention created between couples. This rule has transmuted evenly enough to unmarried couples, but remained bound to the proposition that the person who provided the cash flow and the capital would be the only person entitled to have rights in the property. Other forms of commitment or of giving value attracted no similar rights.

The only recognition of the likelihood that many families will disintegrate into divorce rapidly is in the common law relating to sales of the home, in which children may be allowed to remain in the home (with the parent who has custody) until school-leaving age. The problem is in providing sufficient wherewithal for both parties to a relationship to quit that relationship and acquire suitable alternative accommodation. It is obvious that two incomes will provide a better home than only one income. The cases need to recognise the need for flexibility to deal with cases requiring homes to be found for children. This perhaps requires a recognition that equitable rights in property must be granted to the parent who retains custody of the children. By the same token, childless couples perhaps have need of a different test which recognises their lack of dependants (whether children, aged relatives or other persons).

One cannot help but think that the rigidity of the test in Rosset is measuring the wrong thing and ensuring that there are a number of cases in which the courts will fail to identify situations in which there ought to be some recognition of the contribution made to a relationship by some party other than the breadwinner. Whether this requires an approach as mercenary as that in Canada remains to be seen. The North American approach assumes not only that there ought to be some accounting for the broader context of a relationship, but also that it is possible to put a monetary value on something as intangible as participation in a relationship. The intellectual shortcoming in that approach is an assumption that the 'breadwinner' is not also entitled to claim some emotional capital invested in the relationship.

Perhaps, then, the prevention of the exploitation of one party at the expense of the other is the most useful foundation for the allocation of equitable interest. However, it does not answer the question how other contexts, such as the welfare of children, should be addressed. In an area of such tremendous social importance, the words of Lord Reid in considering this confused mixture of case law have a great resonance: 'The whole question can only be resolved by Parliament and in my opinion there is urgent need for comprehensive legislation.'⁴⁶⁴ The problem with the current state of the case law is that it is both confused and, at times, unsuited to dealing with the thousand natural shocks that flesh is heir to.

464 Pettitt v Pettitt [1970] AC 777, 797.

Trusts of land

16.1	INTRODUCTION	801
16.2	TRUSTS OF LAND	802
16.2.1	Introduction to the treatment of trusts of land	802
16.2.2	The Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996	803
16.2.3	The meaning of ‘trust of land’	803
16.2.4	The functions of the trustees of land	804
16.2.5	The trustees’ duty of care	805
16.2.6	Exclusion and restriction of the powers of trustees of land	805
16.2.7	Delegation of the powers of trustees of land	806
16.2.8	The rights of beneficiaries under a trust of land	807
16.2.9	The powers of the court to make orders, inter alia , for the sale of the land	816
16.2.10	The protection of purchasers of the land	826
16.3	CONCURRENT OWNERSHIP OF LAND	827
16.3.1	Joint tenancy and tenancy in common	827
16.3.2	Understanding the law’s manifold treatment of the family home	828

16.1 INTRODUCTION

The purpose of this chapter is to consider how the law of trusts, equity and land law interact. The first section considers the regime introduced by the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act (TLATA) 1996 dealing with trusts of land. This Act deals with issues as disparate as the abolition of the doctrine of conversion, the rights of beneficiaries to occupy the trust property, the obligations and powers of trustees, and the resolution of applications for orders for sale. The second section draws together some of the disparate discussions in this book of the various equitable doctrines which relate to land law. Land law, principally by means of the Law of Property Act (LPA) 1925, rationalised those rights which would be legal estates and legal interests, and those rights which would therefore be equitable interests. These equitable interests suggest situations in which equity is deeming there to be a right in parallel to the formal legal right. Equitable doctrines also suggest that in given situations, a general notion of unconscionability will operate so as to provide rights for the claimants.

16.2 TRUSTS OF LAND

16.2.1 Introduction to the treatment of trusts of land

While this Part 5 has been concerned throughout with the law of trusts as it relates to land, its main focus has been on the trusts implied by law aspect of the allocation of equitable interests in the home. The issues considered in Chapter 15 were concerned with whether or not a particular person is to have equitable rights in the home at all. In this situation we are concerned with situations in which parties have been held to have such equitable interests in land. There may be situations, as in Goodman v Gallant,¹ where there is an express trust created over the family home which make clear those persons who are to be considered prima facie to have rights in the home. Therefore, in this discussion we are concerned by turns with equitable interests in land by means of constructive trust, resulting trust or possibly by proprietary estoppel, as well as rights under express trusts.

In either situation, there will be a 'trust of land' created in respect of that property, which is now subject to the TLATA 1996 dealing with the administration of that trust. Having decided that there is an equitable interest vested in a claimant, the next question is to understand the nature of the obligations imposed on the person who is to act as trustee of that equitable interest. Typically, litigation as to the respective rights of persons in land is concerned with a desire in one or more of those litigants to dispose of that land, or to evict another person from that land, or possibly to ascertain tax liability or liability in relation to insolvency. Therefore, a claimant will be commencing litigation to establish rights under constructive trust or another form of trust precisely because she wishes to assert her rights to land.

Once the decision is reached that that person does have a right in the property by means of a constructive trust or proprietary estoppel the question necessarily arises: how is that property to be dealt with as a result of the recognition of that trust? If the relationship between the occupants has broken down, should the property be sold and the proceeds divided between them, or should one or other of the parties be entitled to remain in occupation of that property? This section will consider these questions from the perspective of the law of trusts, as opposed to family law. Under the old s 30 of the LPA 1925 (now replaced by s 14 of the TLATA 1996)² the applicant would frequently seek a court order for the sale of the property and the division of the proceeds between the equitable interest holders.³ As a corollary to that, the defendant may wish to assert rights to continue in occupation of that land and to resist any application for a sale of the property. The 1996 legislation sets out the context in which that is done. As to the obligations of the trustee not to permit conflicts of interest and so forth,⁴ the general principles of trusteeship will apply to a trustee of a trust of land as to any other trustee of a trust implied by law.

1 [1986] Fam 106.

2 Although most of the decided cases are decided on the basis of the substantively similar LPA 1925, s 30.

3 See, eg, Jones v Challenger [1961] 1 QB 176; Re Citro [1991] Ch 142 – considered in greater detail below.

4 As considered in Chapter 8.

16.2.2 The Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996

Technical objectives of the Act

The TLATA 1996 was enacted further to the Law Commission Paper Transfer of Land: Trusts of Land.⁵ The fundamental technical aim of the TLATA 1996 was to achieve the conversion of all settlements under the Settled Land Act 1925, all bare trusts, and all trusts for sale under the LPA 1925 into a composite form of trust defined to be the ‘trust of land’. Within this redrawing of rights in land were some larger objectives concerned with the rights of beneficiaries under trusts of land to occupy the home and an extension of the categories of person whose rights should be taken into account when reaching decisions on applications for the sale of the home.

As part of this technical aim to reform the manner in which land was treated by the 1925 legislation, s 3 of the TLATA 1996 set out the abolition of the doctrine of conversion. The abolition of the doctrine of conversion removed the automatic assumption that the rights of any beneficiary under the trust for sale (under the LPA 1925) were not vested in the property itself but rather were vested in the proceeds of sale. This notion of conversion of rights flowed from the understanding of trusts for sale as being trusts whose purpose was the sale of the trust fund and its conversion into cash. Clearly, this ran contrary to the intention of most people acquiring land for their own occupation in which it was not supposed for a moment that their sole intention was to dispose of the property as though a mere investment (rather, their true intention must be to live in the property). Therefore, the common law developed the notion of a ‘collateral purpose’ under which the court would resist the obligation to sell the property in place of an implied ulterior objective for families (for example) to retain the property as their home.⁶

16.2.3 The meaning of ‘trust of land’

The term ‘trust of land’ means ‘any trust of property which consists of or includes land’.⁷ Therefore, any trust will become a trust of land if it includes a parcel of land within a more general portfolio of property, even if the remainder of the trust property is comprised of chattels and intangible property, or alternatively if the trust fund includes money which is intended to be applied for the acquisition of land, in the manner considered below. Trusts of land include not only express trusts but also constructive trusts, resulting trusts, ‘implied trusts’, bare trusts and trusts for sale: indeed ‘any description of trust’.⁸ Trusts are caught within the scope of trusts of land whether they were created before or after the 1996 Act came into force.⁹ In terms of trusts implied by law, the statute covers any trusts ‘arising’ before or after the coming into force of the Act, as well as any express trust consciously ‘created’ before or after the Act.¹⁰ There are two forms of land which fall outwith the Act:

5 1989, Law Comm No 181, HMSO.

6 Jones v Challenger [1961] 1 QB 176; Re Citro [1991] Ch 142.

7 TLATA 1996, s 1(1)(a).

8 Ibid, s 1(2)(a). The reference to ‘trusts for sale’ is to trusts falling under the LPA 1925, a code repealed by the 1996 Act.

9 TLATA 1996, s 1(2)(b).

10 Ibid, s 1(2)(b).

land which was settled land under the Settled Land Act 1925 (before the TLATA 1996 came into force) or land to which the Universities and Colleges Estates Act 1925¹¹ applies.¹²

16.2.4 The functions of the trustees of land

The trustees have general powers to deal with the trust property as though they were the absolute owners of the trust property, as expressed in the following terms:¹³

For the purposes of exercising their functions as trustees, the trustees of land have in relation to the land subject to the trust all the powers of an absolute owner.

Therefore, akin to the powers of trustees under the TA 2000, the trustees are entitled to deal with the property held under the trust as though its absolute owner.¹⁴ The reference to ‘their functions as trustees’ in s 6(1) is a reference to the powers and the obligations of the trustees considered in Part 3 of this book and the specific terms of the trust instrument dealing with the powers of the trustees. There are, necessarily, restrictions on the scope of the trustees’ powers such that the reference to the trustees being entitled to act as though the ‘absolute owner’ of the trust property.¹⁵ The trustees are required to act in the best interests of the beneficiaries and to avoid any conflict of interest between their personal and their fiduciary capacities. Within the TLATA 1996, there is also an express restriction to the effect that:¹⁶

The powers conferred by [s 6] shall not be exercised in contravention of, or of any order¹⁷ made in pursuance of, any other enactment or any rule of law or equity.

Within the reference to the ‘rule of . . . equity’ can be supposed to be a reference to the principles limiting the powers of trustees, as considered above in Part 3 of this book generally. In any event, the trustees are expressly required by statute to ‘have regard to the rights of the beneficiaries’.¹⁸ Furthermore, the TLATA 1996 provides that the generality of the power does not operate so as to override any restriction, limitation or condition placed on the trustees by any other ‘enactment’.¹⁹

11 Where universities, generally bodies corporate, have land held on trust, then this provision is of significance to them. Excluded from the scope of universities and colleges under the 1925 Act are those institutions of further education effected under the Education Reform Act 1988 as higher education or further education corporations.

12 TLATA 1996, s 1(3).

13 TLATA 1996, s 6(1). See also the TA 2000, s 8(3), which grants trustees the power to acquire land for the occupation of beneficiaries or as an investment without the need for the existence of a trust of land.

14 The LPA 1925, s 28, by contrast provided that the trustees had ‘all the powers of a tenant for life and the trustees of a settlement under the Settled Land Act 1925’.

15 The Law Commission sought to make the powers of the trustees of land as ‘broadly based and as flexible as possible’: Law Commission Report No 181, para 10.4.105.

16 TLATA 1996, s 6(6).

17 Whether that be an order of the court or of the Charity Commissioners: TLATA 1996, s 6(7).

18 Ibid, s 6(5).

19 Ibid, s 6(8). It is suggested that these provisions add nothing which the general law of trusts would not have added in any event. It could not be supposed that trustees would be permitted, simply by virtue of s 6(1) of the TLATA 1996, to circumvent their ordinary fiduciary obligations or any mandatory rules of statute applicable to them. The draftsperson of the TA 2000, which has a similarly broad power of investment for trustees, did not consider it necessary to qualify that power in this manner.

The TLATA 1996 contains two further express powers for trustees. First, provided that all of the beneficiaries under the trust of land are of full age and full capacity, the general powers of the trustees include a power ‘to convey the land to the beneficiaries even though they have not required the trustees to do so’.²⁰ The beneficiaries are then required to do ‘whatever is necessary’ to ensure that the property vests in them as beneficiaries subject to the possibility that a court may order them so to do.²¹ This is, in effect, the inverse of the rule in Saunders v Vautier,²² in that the trustee is able to compel a conveyance of full title in the property to the beneficiaries, as opposed to the beneficiaries calling for a conveyance of that title. Secondly, the trustees have ‘power to purchase a legal estate in any land in England or Wales’.²³ The statute is clear to express the breadth of this principle. This power can be exercised by way of investment,²⁴ to provide land for the occupation of any of the beneficiaries²⁵ or for any other reason.²⁶

16.2.5 The trustees’ duty of care

Trustees owe a general duty to exercise reasonable skill and care towards the beneficiaries in the management of their obligations. As considered in detail in Chapter 8, the TA 2000 imposes a duty of care on trustees in the following terms:²⁷

Whenever the duty under this subsection applies to a trustee, he must exercise such care and skill as is reasonable in the circumstances, having regard in particular –

- (a) to any special knowledge or experience that he has or holds himself out as having, and
- (b) if he acts as trustee in the course of a business or profession, to any special knowledge or experience that it is reasonable to expect of a person acting in the course of that kind of business or profession.

The effect of this provision is to enlarge the potential liabilities of trustees of land, particularly those acting in furtherance of a business or profession, by imposing an implied duty to exercise reasonable skill and care in the discharge of their fiduciary obligations. The duty of care under the 2000 Act is imposed on trustees of land by means of an amendment to s 6 of the 1996 Act.²⁸

16.2.6 Exclusion and restriction of the powers of trustees of land

The provisions of the legislation may be excluded by the terms of the trust instrument. So, even though the powers of trustees under the TLATA 1996 as considered in the preceding paragraphs are extensive,²⁹ those powers:

20 TLATA 1996, s 6(2).

21 Ibid, s 6(2)(a) and (b).

22 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

23 TLATA 1996, s 6(3).

24 Ibid, s 6(3)(a).

25 Ibid, s 6(3)(b).

26 Ibid, s 6(3)(c).

27 TA 2000, s 1(1).

28 By means of inserting a provision to that effect in the TLATA 1996, s 6(9).

29 Ibid, s 8.

do not apply in the case of a trust of land created by a disposition in so far as provision to the effect that they do not apply is made by the disposition.³⁰

Therefore, the powers of the trustees to deal with the land as absolute owner or to partition the land can be excluded by the trust instrument itself, just as the provisions of the TA 1925 and the TA 2000 can be excluded by the terms of the trust instrument. However, the terms of s 8(1) of the TLATA 1996 would appear to have the effect of enabling the settlor to postpone the trustees' right of sale of the property indefinitely.³¹ Furthermore, in general terms the trustees are prevented from exercising either of these powers without the consent of the beneficiaries if the consent of the beneficiaries is required.³²

16.2.7 Delegation of the powers of trustees of land

The TLATA 1996 has given trustees of land much wider powers to delegate their responsibilities than was possible under the TA 1925. Section 9 provides that:³³

The trustees of land may, by power of attorney, delegate to any beneficiary or beneficiaries of full age and beneficially entitled to an interest in possession in land subject to the trust any of their functions as trustees which relate to the land.

The trustees are entitled to delegate their functions in relation to the land only when acting collectively; any trustee wishing to delegate his functions individually to some other person must comply with the procedure for so doing in the TA 1925 or the Enduring Powers of Attorney Act 1985. The delegation under s 9 of the TLATA 1996, requiring the trustees to act as a body and not individually, must be agreed unanimously.³⁴ The delegation must be effected in the form of a deed,³⁵ but it may be for a definite or an indefinite period of time.³⁶ Delegation of the trustees' powers to a beneficiary renders that beneficiary a trustee for those purposes under statute.³⁷ This power, it is suggested, would have been available under the general law of trusts, particularly under the general obligation imposed on a trustee to avoid conflicts of interest on pain of liability to account to the beneficiaries for breach of trust. The trustees nevertheless become jointly and severally liable for the actions of such a beneficiary to whom the trustees' powers have been delegated³⁸ only to the extent that they have acted without reasonable care in their choice of delegate.³⁹

Purchasers of the land dealing with a delegate exercising the powers of the trustees are given protection by s 9. It is assumed that the delegate was someone to whom the functions

30 Ibid, s 8(1).

31 Provided always that such a provision conformed with the rule against perpetuities.

32 TLATA 1996, s 8(2).

33 Ibid, s 9(1).

34 Ibid, s 9(3).

35 Ibid, s 9(1).

36 Ibid, s 9(5).

37 Ibid, s 9(7).

38 Ibid, s 9(8).

39 Ibid, s 9(8).

of the trustees could have been properly delegated provided that a purchaser, or indeed any third party dealing with the delegate, was acting in good faith.⁴⁰ This protection is then extended to cover those who acquire trust property in good faith from someone who dealt with the delegate.⁴¹

16.2.8 The rights of beneficiaries under a trust of land

The meaning of 'beneficiary'

The term 'beneficiary', for the purposes of the TLATA 1996, means:

a person who under the trust has an interest in property subject to the trust (including a person who has such an interest as a trustee or a personal representative).⁴²

In consequence, the definition of 'beneficiary' is very wide-ranging. Falling within this definition are beneficiaries under express trusts, constructive trusts or resulting trusts over the land. That the definition includes any person with a proprietary interest in the land has the effect that mortgagees and trustees in bankruptcy constitute beneficiaries under the terms of the Act. Similarly, trustees and personal representatives are expressly defined as falling within the definition of 'beneficiary'. The purpose behind this extensive definition is to grant locus standi to this broad a range of people with interests in the property to be consulted as to dealings with the property or to commence proceedings to seek an order for the sale of that property or some other order from the court. People who acquire rights under the trust by virtue of being trustees or personal representatives⁴³ or by virtue of being an annuitant⁴⁴ are excluded from the definition of 'beneficiary'.

The beneficiaries' power of consent

A trust instrument may seek to protect the rights of the beneficiaries by means of obliging the trustees to seek the consent of the beneficiaries or some other persons to any proposed, specified course of action. For example, this would prevent the trustees from selling the trust property or from encumbering the trust property without such a consent. With this in mind, s 10 of the TLATA 1996 provides as follows:

If a disposition creating a trust of land requires the consent of more than two persons to the exercise by the trustees of any function relating to the land, the consent of any two of them to the exercise of the function is sufficient in favour of a purchaser.⁴⁵

Thus, such a requirement of consent can be satisfied if two of the beneficiaries (or other specified people) give their consent. This is similar to the principle of overreaching in land

40 Ibid, s 9(2).

41 Ibid.

42 TLATA 1996, s 22(1).

43 Ibid, s 22(2).

44 Ibid, s 22(3).

45 Ibid, s 10(1).

law whereby a good receipt can be given by two trustees.⁴⁶ In effect, the statute seeks to simplify the trustees' obligations in relation to obtaining consent from all of the people who might have been required to consent under the terms of the trust instrument.⁴⁷ Section 14(2) of the TLATA 1996 permits the trustees to acquire an order from the court to relieve them of the requirement to obtain the consent of any person connected with the operation of the trustees' functions.⁴⁸

The beneficiaries' rights to be consulted by the trustees

In common with the issue considered immediately above in relation to the right of the beneficiaries to give or to withhold consent in relation to the exercise of the trustees' powers, a trust instrument may also provide for the beneficiaries to have the right to be consulted in limited circumstances. More generally, the TLATA 1996 provides for beneficiaries to be consulted by the trustees in relation to the carrying out of any of their powers.⁴⁹ Section 11 of the TLATA 1996 provides:⁵⁰

The trustees of land shall in the exercise of any function relating to land subject to the trust –

- (a) so far as practicable, consult the beneficiaries of full age and beneficially entitled to an interest in possession in the land, and
- (b) so far as consistent with the general interest of the trust, give effect to the wishes of those beneficiaries, or (in case of dispute) of the majority (according to the value of their combined interests).

Two issues arise from this provision. First, in which circumstances are the trustees obliged to carry out their obligations of consultation? The expansive wording of this provision, particularly the terms 'so far as practicable' and 'so far as consistent', are not qualified in the statute, nor have they received a close analysis in the decided cases. Furthermore, it is not clear what types of trust business might be considered too minor to require consultation with the beneficiaries, nor how far the practicalities of the situation (such as the detrimental effect of delay, difficulties with obtaining responses from individual beneficiaries, and so on) could be taken to absolve the trustees from any claim that they had failed to carry on an effective consultation in deciding to desist from contacting the beneficiaries.

At the first level, matters such as the size of the trust, the extent of its property holdings, and the number of beneficiaries who might need to be consulted will affect both the possibility of the trustees being able to contact those beneficiaries and the range of 46 LPA 1925, ss 2, 27.

47 Unless, that is, the trust instrument excludes the operation of the statute.

48 In relation to minors whose consent is required by the trust instrument, the trustees are required to obtain the consent of 'a parent who has parental responsibility for him within the meaning of the Children Act 1989' or of a guardian: TLATA 1996, s 10(3).

49 TLATA 1996, s 11(3). Such a power to be consulted was only available under s 26(3) of the LPA 1925 in relation to trusts for sale implied by law. The new provision extends to all trusts of land. The new provisions apply to all trusts of land created after 1996, but only apply to trusts created before 1997 if there is a provision contained in a deed requiring such consultation.

50 TLATA 1996, s 11(1).

business activities (both large and small) which the trustees may have to manage. Some of the trusts activities may be thought suitably significant to require consultation and others not. For example, a decision to change the bank with which the trust account is held might not be significant enough to require consultation, whereas a decision whether to sell the trust's holding of land to effect a transfer of the trust's investment temporarily into bonds would be sufficiently significant.

The second issue relates to the identification of what will constitute the general interests of the trust. The more complex the trust's holdings, its classes of beneficiaries, and the powers of the trustees, then the more difficult the task of establishing what those interests will be. The greater the number of beneficiaries, the more difficult the task of picking a path between their conflicting interests. While this statutory provision imposes an obligation on the trustees to consult with the beneficiaries, it is suggested that in practice it simply requires that the trustees observe the general duty under trusts law to permit no conflict of interest, to act fairly between the trustees and to refrain from committing any breaches of trust.⁵¹ The effect of this provision is that, in conducting the proper management of a trust of land and, in relation to issues of appropriate significance to the trust, the trustees must first consult with the beneficiaries and then act in accordance with the ordinary principles of the law of trusts and the terms of the trust instrument.

The trustees are not obliged to obey the beneficiaries, merely to consult with them. Nevertheless, failure to consult the beneficiaries at all when required to do so will itself constitute a breach of trust.⁵² Moreover, it might be that if the trustees failed to take into account some relevant consideration raised by the beneficiaries, then any decision made on that basis might be capable of being set aside.⁵³ However, if the trustees can demonstrate that they have consulted an appropriate consultation and then that they have decided to act otherwise than in accordance with the view of one group of beneficiaries, their decision will not necessarily constitute a breach of trust. Rather, under general trusts law the trustees are required to act in the interests of all of the beneficiaries and not to favour any particular group of beneficiaries. So, if the trustees can demonstrate that their decision was reasonable in all the circumstances, even if it did not give effect to the wishes of a simple majority of the beneficiaries, then the trustees would not be liable for any breach of trust to any beneficiaries who formed a part of that majority, always provided that they had conducted the consultation in the first place.

Section 14(2) of the TLATA 1996 permits the trustees to acquire an order from the court to relieve them of the requirement either to consult any person or to obtain the consent of any person connected with the operation of the trustees' functions. The trustees would therefore be well-advised in practice to seek the permission of the court before dispensing with the requirement to consult with the beneficiaries.

The beneficiaries' limited rights of occupation

One of the underlying aims of the changes introduced by the TLATA 1996 was to grant beneficiaries under trusts of land a qualified right to occupy land held on trust for them. The 51 See, eg, Rodway v Landy [2001] Ch 703.

52 Re Jones [1931] 1 Ch 375; Crawley Borough Council v Ure [1996] QB 13, [1996] 1 All ER 724.

53 Re Hastings-Bass [1975] Ch 25: see para 8.3.13 above.

contexts in which this right of occupation was permitted will, in some circumstances, limit the rights of some beneficiaries to occupy the land at the expense of others. Section 12 of the TLATA 1996 provides that:

A beneficiary who is beneficially entitled to an interest in possession in land subject to a trust of land is entitled by reason of his interest to occupy the land at any time if at that time –

- (a) the purposes of the trust include making the land available for his occupation (or for the occupation of beneficiaries of a class of which he is a member or of beneficiaries in general), or
- (b) the land is held by the trustees so as to be so available.

Therefore, the 1996 Act provides for a right of occupation for any beneficiary whose interest is in possession at the material time. What is clear is that no beneficiary has a right to occupy the land simply by virtue of being a beneficiary under a trust of land.⁵⁴ Rather, the terms of the trust instrument must entitle the beneficiary to go into occupation and, therefore, the trust instrument must not contain provisions which exclude that possibility. The right of occupation, as expressed in s 12, can be exercised at any time and therefore need neither be permanent nor continuous.

Section 12 then contains a number of alternative caveats. The first is that the purposes of the trust include making the land available for a beneficiary such as the applicant. Again, this serves merely to reinforce the purposes of the trust of land, excluding from occupation those beneficiaries who were never intended to occupy and permitting occupation by those beneficiaries who were intended to be entitled to occupy the property. The trustees are nevertheless required to act fairly and evenly between all of the potential occupants.⁵⁵

The second means of enforcing a right to occupy is that the trustees ‘hold’ the land to make it available for the beneficiary’s occupation. The problem is what is meant by the term ‘hold’ in these circumstances. There are two possibilities: either the trustees must have made a formal decision that the property is to be held in a particular manner, or more generally that it must be merely practicable that the land is made available for the beneficiary’s occupation, given the nature and condition of the land. The case law has defined the notion of availability for occupation to be dependent on whether or not the trust instrument provides that the beneficiaries are entitled to occupy that land or that it would be a proper exercise of the trustees’ powers as expressed in that trust instrument to make it available for the occupation of the beneficiaries.⁵⁶

Clearly, this second possibility is broader than the first: in effect, the land is available for occupation if there is nothing in the trust instrument to prevent the trustees from allowing beneficiaries to occupy it and if occupation is physically possible in the sense of the property being habitable and vacant. Nevertheless, it has also been held that just because the trustees have a power, as opposed to an obligation, to make the property available for the beneficiaries’ occupation, that does not entitle the beneficiaries to go into occupation unless the trustees decide to exercise their power such that any of the beneficiaries are permitted to occupy it.⁵⁷ Depending on the terms of the trust instrument, which may contain a provision which explicitly prevents such a course of action, it would be possible for the trustees to sell the trust property and use the sale proceeds to acquire another property which could be made available for the beneficiaries' occupation further to the power contained in s 8(1)(c) of the TA 2000.

⁵⁴ IRC v Eversden [2002] STC 1109, at para 25.

⁵⁵ Rodway v Landy [2001] Ch 703.

⁵⁶ IRC v Eversden [2002] STC 1109.

The exclusion of beneficiaries from occupation of the property

The more contentious part of the legislation is that in s 13(1) whereby the trustees have the right to exclude beneficiaries in the following circumstances:

Where two or more beneficiaries are entitled under s 12 to occupy land, the trustees of land may exclude or restrict the entitlement of any one or more (but not all) of them.

The limits placed on this power by the legislation are set out in s 13(2):

Trustees may not under subsection (1) –

- (a) unreasonably exclude any beneficiary's entitlement to occupy land, or
- (b) restrict any such entitlement to an unreasonable extent.

Therefore, the trustees are restricted from excluding any beneficiary unreasonably. In deciding which of the beneficiaries to allow into occupation and which to exclude from occupation, the trustees are required to take into account 'the intentions of the person or persons . . . who created the trust'⁵⁸ and 'the purposes for which the land is held . . .'⁵⁹ and 'the circumstances and wishes of each of the beneficiaries . . .'.⁶⁰ Therefore, all that the s 13 power to exclude achieves is the application of the purposes of the trust, while recognising that the trustees do have the power to exclude beneficiaries.⁶¹ It is submitted that these intentions could be expressed in a document creating the trust or be divined in the same manner as a common intention is located in a constructive trust over a home. It is also possible for the trustees to effect a partition of the property and thereby to require that the beneficiaries occupy different portions from one another, and to require further that the beneficiaries do not intrude on one another's portions.⁶² So, in Rodway v Landy,⁶³ two medical practitioners shared trust premises which they used in partnership for their medical practices. One party terminated the partnership and wished to have the property sold. It was found that such a sale would have been unlawful under the National Health Service Act 1977. Consequently, it was held, in place of a sale being made, that the parties would be required to partition the building so that they could carry on their medical practices separately in that building.

⁵⁷ Ibid, affirmed at [2003] EWCA Civ 668.

⁵⁸ TLATA 1996, s 13(4)(a).

⁵⁹ Ibid, s 13(4)(b).

⁶⁰ Ibid, s 13(4)(c).

⁶¹ It is suggested that these intentions could be expressed in a document creating the trust or be divined in the same manner as a common intention is located in a constructive trust over a home: as considered in the previous paragraph.

⁶² Rodway v Landy [2001] EWCA Civ 471, [2001] Ch 703.

⁶³ Ibid.

The mechanics of the statutory trust in favour of a minor

A statutory trust is automatically created in any situation in which a legal estate is purportedly conveyed to a minor.⁶⁴ A question arises as to the operation of that trust when, for example, a lease (which is a legal estate) is purportedly granted to a minor. In *Hammersmith & Fulham LBC v Alexander-David*⁶⁵ a 16-year-old girl was granted a tenancy over a local authority flat which, further to Sched 1 of TLATA 1996,⁶⁶ the local authority held on trust for her.⁶⁷ This raised the interesting problem that the local authority as her landlord could not serve her with a notice to quit for two reasons: first, such a notice to quit should be served on the trustee, not the beneficiary; and, second, the landlord was also trustee and therefore serving the notice to quit would appear to constitute a breach of trust because the trustee would be terminating the trust in so doing. The local authority had nevertheless served a notice to quit on the girl. For the girl it was argued that the notice to quit in this case had been served on the tenant herself rather than on the trustee of the lease, and that it should properly have been served on the trustee under general trusts law. At first instance an order to quit had been made. The tenant appealed.

The Court of Appeal analysed the transaction in the following manner. First, the local authority had not granted an equitable lease but rather had granted a legal tenancy on its ordinary terms. That the tenant was a minor who could not hold a legal estate did not mean that a legal estate had not been granted: rather, such a legal estate was held on trust for the tenant. Second, the agreement between the parties was deemed to have constituted the declaration of the statutory trust under Sched 1 of TLATA 1996. Third, the appeal would be allowed on the basis that the notice to quit had been served on the wrong person, because the notice to quit should have been served by the local authority as lessor on the local authority as trustee, and not on the tenant-beneficiary directly.⁶⁸ Of course, this case does have the odd effect that if there is to be a valid notice to quit served then the lessor must serve that notice on itself.

This leaves the further question of whether the service of a notice to quit in any such circumstance constitutes a breach of trust. It was held by Sullivan LJ that ‘for so long as the respondent [local authority] held the premises in trust for the appellant, it could not lawfully destroy the subject matter of the trust by serving notice to quit on the appellant’.⁶⁹ Quite where this leaves the lessor is unknowable. The primitive conception of the role of a fiduciary used by Sullivan LJ – i.e. as an all-or-nothing office – makes it impossible ever to terminate such a tenancy or to enforce its covenants. However, it has frequently been held

64 Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, Sched 1, para 1.

65 [2009] EWCA Civ 259, [2010] Ch 272.

66 Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, Sched 1, para 1(1)(b).

67 Typically these applicants, being in ‘priority need’ further to art 3 of the Homelessness (Priority Need for Accommodation) (England) Order 2002, SI 2002, No. 2051, have applied to the local authority to be housed as a homeless person under the Housing Act 1996; on which see Alastair Hudson, The Law on Homelessness, Sweet & Maxwell, 1997.

68 It was held further that it was not sufficient in relation to 16- and 17-year-old tenants to succeed in creating mere licences, as opposed to leases, to provide that their agreements constituted merely licences when they were on the same terms as other agreements, and where they granted exclusive possession to those tenants: in reliance on Street v Mountford [1985] AC 809.

69 [2009] EWCA Civ 259, [2009] 3 All ER 1098, at [31]. No comment was made as to what would happen if the local authority as landlord served the notice to quit on itself as trustee in the proper form.

that fiduciary offices are not all identical but rather the nature of each fiduciary office depends upon its own terms.⁷⁰ It is suggested that the trustee's obligations in these circumstances should be understood as being in the form of a bare trust (i.e. merely to hold the legal title in the property for the benefit of the tenant) and not as extending so far as to preclude it from exercising the ordinary rights and powers of a lessor if the tenant is in breach of the terms of the lease; these fiduciary obligations should be considered to be distinct from the powers and obligations of a lessor outwith this bare trust. A trustee is obliged, after all, to act in the interests of her beneficiary only to the extent of its fiduciary obligations but no further. Thus, if the fiduciary duties are understood in this context as being in the form of a bare trust, then there would be no overlap with its rights as a lessor.

The effect of these provisions on the unity of possession

The argument has been made that the TLATA 1996 does violence to the concept of unity of possession, reawakening the spectre of Bull v Bull,⁷¹ whereby a trustee who is also a beneficiary under a trust of land could abuse her powers as trustee to exclude other persons who were also beneficiaries but not trustees under the trust of land.⁷² As to the merits of that argument, it seems that s 12 operates only where it is the underlying purpose of the trust that the claimant-beneficiary be entitled to occupy that property⁷³ or that the property is otherwise held so as to make that possible, in which case the trustees would be required to observe the terms of the trust in making any such decision.⁷⁴ Consequently, the exclusion of beneficiaries under s 13 will only apply where it is in accordance with the purpose of the trust.

Furthermore, an unconscionable breach of the trustees' duty to act fairly as between beneficiaries would lead to the court ordering a conscionable exercise of the power. In any event, there is a power to make an order in relation to the trustees' functions under s 14 to preclude the trustee from acting in flagrant breach of trust or in a manner which was abusive of her fiduciary powers in permitting a personal interest and fiduciary power to come into conflict.⁷⁵

Of course, s 12 of the TLATA 1996 could simply be considered to be a provision which grants a qualified right of occupation, in relation to which it is necessary to protect the trustees from an action for breach of the duty of fairness by means of s 13 if some beneficiaries are protected rather than others. That means that the trustee would be deemed to have a power to permit some person to occupy the land under s 12 whilst at the same time protecting the trustee from any action based on breach of trust under s 13 in permitting that occupation.

None of this would be of importance in relation to 'de facto unions' (marriages, etc)⁷⁶ because the purpose of the trust would clearly be to allow all parties to occupy the land as their home. Therefore, it is only in relation to the odd cases where land is acquired with a purpose that only some of them might occupy the property that the *Bull v Bull*⁷⁷ problem is of any great concern. It seems that the TLATA 1996 intends to displace the concept of 70 Eg Henderson v Merrett Syndicates [1995] 2 AC 145 at 206, per Lord Browne-Wilkinson.

71 [1955] 1 QB 234.

72 Barnsley, 1998.

73 TLATA 1996, s 12(1)(a).

74 Ibid, s 12(1)(b).

75 As considered in Chapter 8.

76 See this expression deployed in Gillies v Keogh [1989] 2 NZLR 327.

77 [1955] 1 QB 234.

interests in possession as the decisive factor in the treatment of the home in favour of considering the advantages of permitting some persons to continue to occupy the home.

In the wake of the balance sheet cases⁷⁸ and the family assets cases⁷⁹ considered in Chapter 15, the courts are more likely to allocate interests between beneficiaries and decide on the parties' respective merits rather than step back to the idea of interests in possession.⁸⁰ Therefore, the approach of the courts appears to be more likely to support the underlying purpose of the legislation in granting rights of occupation to beneficiaries under trusts of land. As suggested above the argument has been made that the 1996 Act interferes with the concept of unity of possession, as was considered in Bull v Bull,⁸¹ whereby a trustee who is also a beneficiary under a trust of land could abuse her powers as trustee to exclude other persons who were also beneficiaries but not trustees under the trust of land.⁸² As to the merits of that argument, it is suggested that s 12 operates only where it is the underlying purpose of the trust that the claimant-beneficiary be entitled to occupy that property⁸³ or that the property is otherwise held so as to make that possible, in which case the trustees would be required to observe the terms of the trust in making any such decision.⁸⁴ Consequently, the exclusion of beneficiaries under s 13 will only apply where it is in accordance with the purpose of the trust.

Furthermore, an unconscionable breach of the trustees' duty to act fairly as between beneficiaries would lead to the court ordering a conscionable exercise of the power. In any event, there is a power to make an order in relation to the trustees' functions under s 14 to preclude the trustee from acting in flagrant breach of trust or in a manner which was abusive of her fiduciary powers in permitting a personal interest and fiduciary power to come into conflict.

The beneficiaries' rights of occupation in the event of a beneficiary's bankruptcy

The preceding sections have considered the rights of any beneficiaries whose interests are in possession to occupy the trust property. However, the rights of the parties to occupy the trust property will be changed in the event that a beneficiary goes into bankruptcy. From the moment of that beneficiary's bankruptcy, that beneficiary's trustee in bankruptcy will seek to take possession of his rights under the trust.⁸⁵ At first blush, any spouse of that bankrupt person might seek to assert rights of occupation of that property. However, s 336 of the Insolvency Act 1986 provides that:

- (1) Nothing occurring in the initial period of the bankruptcy (that is to say, the period beginning with the day of the presentation of the petition for the bankruptcy order and ending with the vesting of the bankrupt's estate in a trustee) is to be taken as having given rise to any [matrimonial home rights under Part IV of the Family Law Act 1996] in relation to a dwelling house comprised in the bankrupt's estate.

78 Bernard v Josephs [1982] Ch 391; Huntingford v Hobbs [1993] 1 FLR 736.

79 Midland Bank v Cooke [1995] 4 All ER 562.

80 That is, beyond the necessary inclusion in the legislation requiring that the rights must be in possession at the time of the claim.

81 [1955] 1 QB 234.

82 Barnsley, 1998.

83 TLATA 1996, s 12(1)(a).

84 Ibid, s 12(1)(b).

85 The right of a beneficiary to a share of a life interest which is defeasible by a power of the trustees will not, however, constitute a basis for possession or sale for a mortgagee: Skyparks Group plc v Marks [2001] WTLR 607.

Thus, any rights which might otherwise arise under the Family Law Act 1996 are restricted. Similarly:

- (2) Where a spouse's [matrimonial home rights under the Act of 1996] are a charge on the estate or interest of the other spouse, or of trustees for the other spouse, and the other spouse is adjudged bankrupt –
 - (a) the charge continues to subsist notwithstanding the bankruptcy and, subject to the provisions of that Act, binds the trustee of the bankrupt's estate and persons deriving title under that trustee, and
 - (b) any application for an order under [section 33 of that Act] shall be made to the court having jurisdiction in relation to the bankruptcy.

The powers of the court to make an order are then expressed in the following form:

- (4) On such an application as is mentioned in subsection (2) . . . the court shall make such order under [section 33 of the Act of 1996] . . . as it thinks just and reasonable having regard to –
 - (a) the interests of the bankrupt's creditors,
 - (b) the conduct of the spouse or former spouse, so far as contributing to the bankruptcy,
 - (c) the needs and financial resources of the spouse or former spouse,
 - (d) the needs of any children, and
 - (e) all the circumstances of the case other than the needs of the bankrupt.

Whereas the scope of those rights might seem expansive, and to be similar in form to those in s 15 (as considered below), they are limited by the following significant proviso which requires the court to give priority to the interests of the bankrupt's creditors:

- (5) Where such an application is made after the end of the period of one year beginning with the first vesting under Chapter IV of this Part of the bankrupt's estate in a trustee, the court shall assume, unless the circumstances of the case are exceptional, that the interests of the bankrupt's creditors outweigh all other considerations.

Where a beneficiary is entitled to occupy trust property as her residence, there may be claims as to the bankrupt's right to remain in that property. Section 337(2) of the Insolvency Act 1986 provides a right for the bankrupt not to be evicted or, if not already in occupation, to go into occupation, in the following terms:⁸⁶

- (2) Whether or not the bankrupt's spouse (if any) has rights of occupation under [matrimonial home rights under Part IV of the Family Law Act 1996] –
 - (a) the bankrupt has the following rights as against the trustee of his estate –
 - (i) if in occupation, a right not to be evicted or excluded from the dwelling house or any part of it, except with the leave of the court, ⁸⁶ By virtue of s 337(1), this principle 'applies where – (a) a person who is entitled to occupy a dwelling house by virtue of a beneficial estate or interest is adjudged bankrupt, and (b) any persons under the age of 18 with whom that person had at some time occupied that dwelling house had their home with that person at the time when the bankruptcy petition was presented and at the commencement of the bankruptcy'.

- (ii) if not in occupation, a right with the leave of the court to enter into and occupy the dwelling house, and
- (b) the bankrupt's rights are a charge, having the like priority as an equitable interest created immediately before the commencement of the bankruptcy, on so much of his estate or interest in the dwelling house as vests in the trustee.

Taking into account the foregoing rights of the bankrupt person to make an application to the court, the court is empowered on such an application to 'make such order under [s 33 of the Act of 1996] as it thinks just and reasonable having regard to the interests of the creditors, to the bankrupt's financial resources, to the needs of the children and to all the circumstances of the case other than the needs of the bankrupt'.⁸⁷ Significantly, the court's approach to the making of any order is made subject to following proviso:⁸⁸

- (6) Where such an application is made after the end of the period of one year beginning with the first vesting . . . of the bankrupt's estate in a trustee, the court shall assume, unless the circumstances of the case are exceptional, that the interests of the bankrupt's creditors outweigh all other considerations.

Consequently, the core principle of insolvency law that, all else being equal, the rights of creditors are to be considered to be paramount is maintained.

Section 338 of the Insolvency Act 1986 deals with the possibility that the bankrupt might argue that payments towards the discharge of the mortgage would vest the bankrupt with property rights in the following terms:

Where any premises comprised in a bankrupt's estate are occupied by him . . . on condition that he makes payments towards satisfying any liability arising under a mortgage of the premises or otherwise towards the outgoings of the premises, the bankrupt does not, by virtue of those payments, acquire any interest in the premises.

Therefore, the impact of insolvency law on the ownership of property is prevented from raising any presumption that a bankrupt person owns property simply because she defrays some part of the mortgage over that property.

The broader context of the inter-action of human rights law and the provisions of the Insolvency Act 1986 in this context, and also the circumstances in which an order of sale may nevertheless be refused, are considered in section 16.2.9.

16.2.9 The powers of the court to make orders, inter alia, for the sale of the land

The range of people entitled to petition the court

When there are disputes between the beneficiaries to a trust, or between trustees and some or all of the beneficiaries, then it is open to the parties to petition the court for an order as to how they should proceed. The most common form of dispute is between beneficiaries, some of whom want the land retained and others of whom want the land sold. In a family situation, for example, property that is held on the terms of a trust land will be attractive for those beneficiaries who occupy the trust property as their home, but unattractive to beneficiaries who would rather sell the land so that they can take the cash and live elsewhere. Clearly, the wishes of these varying beneficiaries to the trust of land are in conflict and it will be difficult for the trustees to know in which direction to proceed. Consequently, the parties will seek an order of the court further to s 14 of the TLATA 1996. A court which is seised of an application under s 14 of the TLATA 1996 is free to make any order which it sees fit, except in relation to the appointment or removal of trustees.⁸⁹ Section 14(1) provides that:

⁸⁷ Insolvency Act 1986, s 335A(5).

⁸⁸ Ibid, s 335A(6).

Any person who is a trustee of land or has an interest in property subject to a trust of land may make an application to the court for an order under this section.⁹⁰

Consequently, occupants of property can only make an application to the court if they have an ‘interest in property’: that is, if they have a proprietary right in the land held on trust. It is suggested that there are three categories of person with a sufficient interest in the property. First, the trustees may make an application as expressly envisaged by the statute. As considered in the previous sections of this chapter, the trustees may seek directions from the court in circumstances in which they are unable to reach a unanimous decision between themselves, or alternatively in circumstances in which the trustees were required to consult with the beneficiaries but where that consultation did not generate a unanimous view. Secondly, the beneficiaries may make an application (as the archetypal person with ‘an interest in property’)⁹¹ seeking an order to direct that the trustees deal with the property in a given way. The most common form of application in the decided cases relates to beneficiaries seeking a sale of the property, for example, in the event of a relationship breakdown, and thus seeking an order that the trustees effect such a sale. The respondent to such an application will typically seek either to resist the application in its entirety or to agree to such an order only on terms, for example, as to her right or the right of any children of the relationship to continue in occupation of the home. Thirdly, an application may be made by any other person who has ‘an interest in property’⁹² such as a mortgagee or other secured creditors with a right secured over the home.

The requirement that an action can be brought only by people with an interest in the property will generally exclude children of the family living in the property or any other relatives occupying the property who do not have a proprietary right in that home. Subject to what is said in relation to s 15 of the TLATA 1996 below, children are entitled to have their interests taken into account when the court considers the form of order it wishes to make, but not to apply to the court in relation to the trustees’ treatment of the land.⁹³

Section 14 of the TLATA 1996 replaced s 30 of the LPA 1925 which provided that the court was entitled to make any order it saw fit in response to an application. There was an extensive case law on the effect of s 30 of the 1925 Act, particularly in relation to disputes between family members at a time of family breakdown or situations involving a mortgagee seeking ⁸⁹ TLATA 1996, s 14(3).

⁹⁰ Applications under this section may be made either before or after the commencement of this Act: ibid, s 14(4).

⁹¹ Ibid, s 14(1).

⁹² Ibid.

⁹³ See, eg, the Children Act 1989, s 1, which establishes that the welfare of the child is paramount, as considered below.

repossession or sale of the home further to a mortgage loan contract. The more difficult area in the cases has been the question of whether or not to order a sale of land where the beneficiaries cannot come to a unanimous decision as to whether or not a sale should go ahead. It is suggested that those cases will continue to be important in relation to s 14 applications.

The powers of the court

The scope of any order which the court is entitled to make is set out in s 14(2) of the TLATA 1996⁹⁴ in the following terms:

the court may make any such order –

- (a) relating to the exercise by the trustees of their functions (including an order relieving them of any obligation to obtain the consent of, or to consult, any person in connection with the exercise of any of their functions), or
- (b) declaring the nature or extent of a person's interest in property subject to the trust, as the court thinks fit.⁹⁵

The two provisions, s 30 of the 1925 Act and s 14 of the 1996 Act which replaced it, operate similarly to the extent that the court is empowered to make any such order as the court 'thinks fit' in relation to the trustees' functions. Section 14 of the TLATA 1996 necessarily makes express reference to the court making orders as to the trustees' obligations to consult the beneficiaries and to obtain consent in circumstances where such consents are necessary: the obligations to obtain consent and to consult, respectively, were considered earlier.

Matters which the court is required to take into account when considering an application

The principal question, then, is as to the matters which the courts are required to take into account when exercising their powers under s 14 of the TLATA 1996: s 15 sets out those matters.⁹⁶ The four categories of persons whose interests and preferences are to be considered in relation to an exercise of a power under s 14 are as follows:⁹⁷

- (a) the intentions of the persons or persons (if any) who created the trust,
- (b) the purposes for which the property subject to the trust is held,
- (c) the welfare of any minor who occupies or might reasonably be expected to occupy any land subject to the trust as his home, and
- (d) the interests of any secured creditor of any beneficiary.

There is a balancing act to be conducted by the court between these four potentially contradictory considerations. It does not appear that there is any significance in the ranking of these 94 Formerly personified in s 30 of the LPA 1925.

95 TLATA 1996, s 14(2).

96 There was no comparable provision in the 1925 Act to s 15, although three of the matters which are identified in s 15 were features of the case law on s 30.

97 TLATA 1996, s 15(1).

matters which the courts are required to take into account: that is, it does not seem to matter that the matters to be taken into account have been listed in this particular order.⁹⁸ Each category is considered in turn in the paragraphs to follow.

The purpose of the trust and the settlor's intention

Paragraph (1)(a) of s 15 provides that the underlying purpose of the trust as expressed by its settlor is to be applied by the court in reaching any decision. Therefore, this heading requires that the court consider the settlor's intentions in creating the trust.⁹⁹ While the settlor's intentions are to be considered, it is not the case that the settlor's intentions under the general law of trusts are necessarily decisive as to the interpretation of the trust. The rule in *Saunders v Vautier*¹⁰⁰ necessarily accepts that the beneficiaries, acting unanimously, may direct the trustees how to use the trust property or may terminate the trust. An example would be the decision in Re Bowes,¹⁰¹ in which the settlor's original intention, to provide for the maintenance of large gardens on settled land, was overridden by the unanimous direction of the beneficiaries to the effect that the trust property should be applied for their personal benefit as opposed to its use solely for the abstract purpose of the maintenance of parkland. By extrapolation from this principle, the law of trusts does not require the trustees to follow the settlor's intentions slavishly, even if they can be clearly divined from the wording of the trust instrument.

The second matter to be considered, under para (1)(b) of s 15, is the purpose for which the trust was created. This is subtly different from the settlor's stated intentions. If, for example, the settlor created a trust to benefit all of her children, then this might colour the trustees' decisions when those children become adults. While the children were infants, the trustees would be concerned with the maintenance of the children, whereas once the children grow up, the trustees might be more concerned with providing income so that those adults can make their own decisions about the way in which they want to live their lives. Therefore, if there is an underlying purpose to the trust – such as the prosperity of the settlor's children – it might be that a decision to preserve the house as a home for the children while they were minors would be displaced by a decision to sell the house and divide the proceeds between the children once they have become adults with their own homes. It might be that the terms of the trust instrument and the use to which those powers are being put by the trustees might not be capable of easy reconciliation. In such a situation, the attitude of English trusts law to the effect that all of the beneficiaries acting in concert are able to direct the trustees how to deal with the property may trump the settlor's original intentions.¹⁰² Thus, the trust's purposes from time-to-time may differ from the original purposes set out in the trust instrument which are the subject matter of para (1)(a). It has been accepted on the authorities that these 'purposes' may vary from context to context.¹⁰³

98 A v B (unreported, Family Division, 23 May 1997), per Cazalet J.

99 TLATA 1996, s 15(1)(a).

100 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

101 [1896] 1 Ch 507.

102 Saunders v Vautier (1841) 4 Beav 115.

103 Bankers Trust Co v Namdar [1997] EGCS 20; Barclays Bank v Hendricks [1996] 1 FLR 258; Mortgage Corporation v Shaire [2000] 1 FLR 973; Grindal v Hooper (2000) The Times, 8 February.

The rights of children in occupation of the property

The most contentious part of s 15 is para (1)(c), which imports into this area of trusts law the need to consider the rights of children in relation to their homes are to be taken into account.¹⁰⁴ Under ordinary principles of trusts law, children do not have rights in the home under property law principles on the basis that they are unlikely to have made a financial contribution to the acquisition of the property.¹⁰⁵ Consequently, ordinary trusts law would not consider the rights of children in deciding the allocation of rights in the home, as considered in Chapter 15. The inclusion of para (c), therefore, requires that the position of the children be taken into account for the first time.

The case law dealing with s 30 of the LPA 1925 did give peripheral consideration to the place of the children in making an order under that section. For example, in Re Holliday,¹⁰⁶ the needs of the children to finish their schooling were taken into account such that the order for sale of the property was made conditional on the children of the relationship reaching school-leaving age. What was obvious, however, was that the rights of a mortgagee¹⁰⁷ or a bankruptcy creditor¹⁰⁸ would always take priority over the needs of the children in those cases.¹⁰⁹ The significance of the introduction of s 15(1)(c) is that the needs of children might be elevated to being of equal significance to the rights of secured creditors and other people.

This provision may lead to the importation of elements of child law and of the case law under the Children Act 1989 to this area, under which the welfare of the child is made paramount.¹¹⁰ The principles of child law have developed since the principal cases on s 30 were decided: therefore, it is difficult to know how property law courts will deal with concepts developed originally by family courts in disposing of applications seeking the use of the family courts' broad, statutory discretion. Under ss 14 and 15, it would be possible for the court to import child law concepts given the express power for the court to make such order as it sees fit.¹¹¹ The interests of children are generally best served by resisting an application for the sale of property so that the children can remain in their home and thus reduce any volatility in their lifestyle which would result from the need to move home. This is particularly true if the family unit intends to stay together and if it is only a secured creditor which is seeking to have the home sold. By contrast, different considerations come into play if the sale is being sought by one of the child's unmarried parents:¹¹² in this situation, the best interests of the child might be served by living with one parent rather than another in circumstances in which it would not be practicable, possible or even desirable to remain in the original home.

104 Cf family law where the welfare of the child is paramount: Children Act 1989, s 1.

105 As required, for example, by Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1991] 1 AC 1.

106 [1981] 2 WLR 996.

107 Lloyds Bank v Byrne (1991) [1993] 1 FLR 369, (1991) 23 HLR 472.

108 Re Citro [1991] Ch 142.

109 One exceptional case was Re Holliday [1981] 2 WLR 996, in which the bankruptcy creditor's interests were relegated behind the needs of the family – including the children – to remain in their home: that decision was based on the small size of the debt compared to the value of the home whereby it was considered disproportionate to sell a house to discharge such a small debt.

110 Bankers Trust Co v Namdar [1997] EGCS 20; Barclays Bank v Hendricks [1996] 1 FLR 258; Mortgage Corporation v Shaire [2000] 1 FLR 973; Grindal v Hooper (2000) The Times, 8 February.

111 TLATA 1996, s 14(2).

112 If the parents were married, then divorce law might decide the question as to which course is most appropriate.

At the time of writing, the jurisprudence in this area is in its infancy. The possibilities are considered below, after the discussion of the rights of secured creditors, which are considered next.

The situation when one of the beneficiaries is bankrupt

The circumstances in which one of the beneficiaries is bankrupt are different from other circumstances. If one of the trustees of land is bankrupt, the trust property will not form a part of that beneficiary's estate simply because she is a trustee. It is only if the trustee also has some beneficial interest in the trust property that the trust property will be brought into account in the bankruptcy proceedings. If it is a beneficiary who is bankrupt, then the trustee in bankruptcy will be entitled to bring an application under s 14 as a person with an interest in the land by dint of the bankruptcy proceedings. Section 335A(1) of the Insolvency Act 1986 overrides the provisions of the 1996 Act providing that:¹¹³

Any application by a trustee of a bankrupt's estate under section 14 . . . for an order under that section for the sale of land shall be made to the court having jurisdiction in relation to the bankruptcy.

The application under s 14 is therefore subjugated to the hearing of the bankruptcy petition. That court's powers operate as follows:¹¹⁴ the court shall make such order as it thinks just and reasonable having regard to –

- (a) the interests of the bankrupt's creditors;
- (b) where the application is made in respect of land which includes a dwelling house which is or has been the home of the bankrupt or the bankrupt's spouse or former spouse –
 - (i) the conduct of the spouse or former spouse, so far as contributing to the bankruptcy,
 - (ii) the needs and financial resources of the spouse or former spouse, and
 - (iii) the needs of any children; and
- (c) all the circumstances of the case other than the needs of the bankrupt.

Under this provision, the court may make any order which it considers just and reasonable to make provided that it takes into account considerations which are broadly similar to those under s 15 of the TLATA 1996. However, s 335A(3) provides that, regardless of the ostensible similarity of these provisions to s 15 of the TLATA 1996:

Where such an application [under section 14 of the 1996 Act] is made after the end of the period of one year beginning with the first vesting . . . of the bankrupt's estate in a trustee, the court shall assume, unless the circumstances of the case are exceptional, that the interests of the bankrupt's creditors outweigh all other considerations.

113 Further to the TLATA 1996, s 15(4).

114 Insolvency Act 1986, s 335A(2).

Therefore, regardless of the provisions of s 15 of the TLATA 1996, the court is obliged to assume that the interests of the bankrupt's creditors must be given priority over all other considerations and the rights of other people in relation to the trust property. Consequently, it is assumed that the property is to be sold and the relevant proportion of the proceeds transferred to the trustee in bankruptcy to discharge the creditors' debts.

Whereas the statute does not go further in setting out the principles which the court must bear in mind, it was held in *Harrington v Bennett*¹¹⁵ that the requirements of s 335A of the Insolvency Act 1986 are fivefold. First, where the application is made more than one year after the vesting of the bankrupt's property in the trustee, the interests of creditors are paramount. Secondly, the court can only ignore the creditors' interests in exceptional circumstances, which circumstances will typically relate to the personal circumstances of the joint owners. Thirdly, the categories of exceptional circumstances are not closed, with the result that it is open to the judge to decide what may constitute exceptional circumstances in future cases. Fourthly, the term 'exceptional circumstances' indicates circumstances 'outside the usual melancholy consequences of debt or improvidence'. Fifthly, that the sale proceeds may be used entirely to discharge the expenses of the trustee in bankruptcy is not an exceptional circumstance which may still benefit the creditors.¹¹⁶ The term 'exceptional' is to be given 'its ordinary and familiar meaning'¹¹⁷ which in turn is said to involve the expressions 'out of the ordinary course, or unusual, or special, or uncommon'.¹¹⁸ This definition includes almost all of the elements of the definition in the Oxford English Dictionary. The practice of the courts, however, has been to reserve a finding of exceptional circumstances to a very small and rare category of circumstances indeed, as considered in the discussion to follow. The finding of 'unusual' seems somewhat mild given the attitude of the courts in general.

In the case of an application made by a trustee in bankruptcy under s 14 of the TLATA 1996, different criteria have been applied on the cases under s 30 of the 1925 Act from those considered in relation to the other paragraphs of s 15 of the TLATA 1996 which do not relate to bankruptcy. Regardless of s 335A of the 1986 Act, the court would ordinarily have ordered a sale of the property automatically in a situation in which one of the beneficiaries has been declared bankrupt. So, in the case of Re Citro,¹¹⁹ it was no answer to an application for sale on behalf of the bankrupt's creditors that the loss of the home which was the subject of the trust would require the family to leave the area in which they lived and to uproot their children from their schooling. It was held that a sale of the property would not be refused unless the circumstances were exceptional and that this form of hardship was, in the maudlin and yet lyrical view of the court, merely one of the melancholy features of life. As Nourse LJ put the matter:¹²⁰

What then are exceptional circumstances? As the cases show, it is not uncommon for a wife with young children to be faced with eviction in circumstances where the 115 [2000] BPIR 630.

116 See also Judd v Brown [1998] 2 FLR 360; Re Raval [1998] 2 FLR 718; Claughton v Charalambous [1999] 1 FLR 740; Re Bremner [1999] 1 FLR 912.

117 Nicholls v Lan [2006] EWHC 1255 (Ch), [2006] All ER (D) 16, [10], per Morgan QC.

118 Hosking v Michaelides [2004] All ER (D) 147, per Morgan QC.

119 [1991] Ch 142.

120 Ibid, 157.

realisation of her beneficial interest will not produce enough to buy a comparable house in the same neighbourhood or indeed elsewhere. And, if she has to move elsewhere, there may be problems over schooling and so forth. Such circumstances, while engendering a natural sympathy in all who hear of them, cannot be described as exceptional. They are the melancholy consequences of debt and improvidence with which every civilized society has been familiar.

If everyone wanted proof that this is a cold and heartless world, then those dicta are that proof. That is not to say that they are wrong in principle, nor that they are even undesirable in a society in which people are so dependent on debt that the consequences of denying creditors the right to recover their money would mean reduced access to debt for us all. I sense that even Nourse LJ would agree with that.

There have been very few cases in which the courts have resisted an application for sale when one of the beneficiaries has been declared bankrupt. The first situation in which an application for an order for sale was denied was that in Re Holliday,¹²¹ a case in which the bankrupt had gone into bankruptcy on his own petition to rid himself of his creditors and one in which the debt was so small in comparison to the sale value of the house that there was thought to be no hardship to the creditors in waiting for the bankrupt's three children to reach school-leaving age before ordering a sale. However, that hardship will be caused to the children or to the family in general as a result of a sale in favour of a trustee in bankruptcy is considered, as mentioned in the preceding paragraphs, to be merely one of the maudlin vicissitudes of life.¹²² In Re Holliday, however, the circumstances were rare in that the debt owed was very small and constituted only a fraction of the total market value of the house at issue. There have been a few melancholy situations in which sale has not been ordered immediately: where the bankrupt's spouse was terminally ill and had special housing needs,¹²³ or where the property had been adapted specially to accommodate an occupant's special housing needs.¹²⁴ A finding of exceptional circumstances has been made in circumstances in which the bankrupt's spouse has been diagnosed as being a paranoid schizophrenic.¹²⁵ Such a finding has been held to justify a one-year suspension of sale.¹²⁶ There has also emerged an equity of exoneration whereby the bankruptcy debts of one of a number of co-owners of property are to be met only out of the share of the bankrupt party even if the entire property had purportedly been charged to secure the bankrupt's debts.¹²⁷ It should not be forgotten either that cases like Re Holliday remain cases out of the ordinary run of the case law themselves and so remain the rare exceptions.¹²⁸

121 [1981] 2 WLR 996.

122 Re Citro [1991] Ch 142.

123 Cloughton v Charalambous [1999] 1 FLR 740; Re Bremner [1999] 1 FLR 912. Further, Re Raval [1998] 2 FLR 718, in which a one-year suspension of the sale was granted due to a diagnosis of paranoid schizophrenia. See also Skyparks Group plc v Marks [2001] WTLR 607, in which a mortgagee was denied an order for possession and sale of mortgaged property against a contingent right of a beneficiary under a trust for sale.

124 Re Gorman [1990] 1 WLR 616, where this was proposed hypothetically by Vinelott J at 629.

125 Re Raval [1998] 2 FLR 718; Nicholls v Lan [2006] EWHC 1255 (Ch), [2006] All ER (D) 16.

126 Re Raval [1998] 2 FLR 718.

127 Re Pittortou [1985] 1 WLR 58, 61; Judd v Brown [1998] 2 FLR 360, 362.

128 See Harman v Glencross [1986] Fam 81, 95, per Balcombe LJ.

The position may be thought of differently where the property is held on an express trust for sale (that is, where the purpose expressly is to sell the property) with a power to postpone the sale. This was the case in *Avis v Turner*¹²⁹ during matrimonial proceedings where the husband had been made bankrupt. This was the position in the law before the enactment of the 1996: all trusts over land were deemed to be trusts to sell that land with a power to postpone sale.¹³⁰ Section 14(2)(a) of the 1996 Act was taken by Chadwick LJ in that case to empower the court to order the trustees to relax their power to postpone the sale and thus to seek a sale of the property. Ordinarily then a sale of the property will be sought in cases of bankruptcy. It is not surprising that where the property is held on trust for the purpose of seeking a sale with a mere power to delay sale, that a sale will be ordered where bankruptcy has visited one of the parties.

Findings of fact

The job of finding facts in these cases is a matter for the judge at first instance. It will be a rare occasion on which an appellate court will disturb the findings of fact of the trial or on which an appellate court will disturb the trial judge's conclusions as to the balancing act under ss 14 and 15 of TLATA 1996. In G v G,¹³¹ in relation to proceedings under the old s 30 of the 1925 Act, Lord Fraser held that:¹³² the appellate court should only interfere when they consider that the Judge of first instance has not merely preferred an imperfect solution which is different from an alternative imperfect solution which the Court of Appeal might or would have adopted, but has exceeded the generous ambit within which a reasonable disagreement is possible.

This approach has been followed in a number of cases in relation specifically to cases under the 1996 Act.¹³³ This may involve differences of view as to the significance of medical evidence in deciding whether or not there are exceptional circumstances to justify refusing an immediate order of sale.

The rights of any secured creditor of the beneficiaries

In the cases on s 30 of the LPA 1925, which has been displaced by s 14 of the TLATA 1996, the rights of secured creditors were prioritised over the rights of other people. The result of this prioritisation was that the property would be sold so that the sale proceeds could be used to discharge the debt. Paragraph (1)(d) of s 15 of the 1996 Act requires the court to consider the rights of any creditor of any beneficiary, not requiring that the beneficiary be bankrupt at the time. Therefore, mortgagees will be entitled to have their interests taken expressly into 130 In re Mayo [1943] Ch 302, 304, per Simonds J; Jones v Challenger [1961] 1 QB 176, 181, per Devlin LJ.

129 [2008] 2 WLR 1.

131 [1985] 1 WLR 647.

132 Ibid., 652.

133 Assicurazioni Generali SPA v Arab Insurance Group: Practice Note [2003] 1 WLR 577; Nicholls v Lan [2006] EWHC 1255 (Ch); Donohoe v Ingram [2006] BPIR 417.

account. The courts have indicated that mortgagees ought to be protected with the same enthusiasm as bankruptcy creditors in these contexts.¹³⁴ It has been held that the primary interest of secured creditors is taken to be to recover their debt and therefore to seek an immediate sale, ordinarily without the need for further analysis.¹³⁵ Therefore, the question for the court usually resolves itself to a question as to whether or not there is any good reason to prevent a sale of the property so as to recover as much of the creditors' debt as possible.

Human rights law and s 335A

Section 335A of the 1986 Act has been held to be in compliance with the human right to a family life of occupants of property under Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights.¹³⁶ There has been one tentative suggestion that in future the interpretation of this provision might need to be altered so as to ensure compliance with the spirit of Article 8.¹³⁷ However, there has been held to be no necessary infraction of Article 8 in relation to considering the sale of a home occupied by a woman who had been diagnosed as being schizophrenic.¹³⁸ More generally, it has been held by the House of Lords that Article 8 could not be relied upon to defeat proprietary or contractual rights to possession nor to confer a right to be provided with a home.¹³⁹ This approach has been considered as a further reason for denying that s 335A is necessarily in breach of Article 8.¹⁴⁰ In short, a succession of decisions of the High Court have demonstrated a reluctance to take a point based on Article 8 on the basis, it is suggested, that the balancing act which is necessarily a part of hearing a s 14 application under the 1996 Act will consider whether or not it is appropriate to take away the defendant's home by means of a sale.

The interpretative role of the case law decided before 1997

It seems probable that the courts will continue to consider the case law decided under s 30 of the 1925 Act. What is unclear is the extent to which the introduction of s 15 of the TLATA 1996 will render the principles under the 1925 Act inapplicable. The case of *Mortgage Corp v Shaire*¹⁴¹ has suggested that the TLATA 1996 could be read as intending to alter the manner in which the old case law should be dealt with by the courts. The legislative intention might be taken to create equality between the rights of secured creditors such as mortgagees and the rights of occupants of the property and their families (including children), rather than simply assuming that the rights of creditors should still be treated as being paramount (as 134 Lloyds Bank v Byrne (1991) 23 HLR 472, [1993] 1 FLR 369.

135 Re Citro [1991] Ch 142; Bank of Ireland Home Mortgages Ltd v Bell [2001] 2 All ER (Comm) 920, [31] and [38]; First National Bank Plc v Achampong [2004] 1 FCR 17, [61]; Nicholls v Lan [2006] EWHC 1255 (Ch), [47]–[49].

136 Jackson v Bell [2001] EWCA Civ 387.

137 Barca v Mears [2004] All ER (D) 153, per Strauss QC.

138 Nicholls v Lan [2006] EWHC 1255 (Ch).

139 Harrow LBC v Qazi [2003] UKHL 43, [2004] 1 AC 983. See also Price v Leeds CC [2005] EWCA Civ 289, and now on appeal Leeds CC v Price [2006] UKHL 10, [2006] 2 WLR 570.

140 Donohoe v Ingram [2006] BPIR 417, [21].

141 [2001] Ch 743, [2001] 4 All ER 364. See also Bank of Ireland Home Mortgages Ltd v Bell [2001] 2 All ER (Comm) 920; First National Bank plc v Achampong [2004] 1 FCR 17.

considered in the previous paragraph). In the case of Mortgage Corp v Shaire itself, only interlocutory questions were considered without any final decision on the merits being reached. Therefore, the High Court did not reach any conclusions as to the proper interpretation of the new legislation. Other, as yet unreported,¹⁴² cases have suggested, however, that the pre-1997 case law will continue to be of significance in interpreting the broadly similar matters to be taken into account under the 1996 Act.¹⁴³ It is suggested that the position in relation to bankruptcy will remain as it was before 1997 by virtue of s 335A of the Insolvency Act 1986 and that the remaining case law on s 30 of the 1925 Act will continue to be influential given that the provisions of s 30 of the 1925 Act and s 14 of the 1996 Act are so similar.

16.2.10 The protection of purchasers of the land

When the purchase is contracted with a delegate of the trustees' powers

When a purchase is contracted with someone to whom the trustees have delegated their powers, this raises the possibility that the sale may subsequently be repudiated by the trustees or the beneficiaries. In circumstances in which the purchaser has acted in good faith, the purchase is presumed to be valid.¹⁴⁴ Section 10 of the TLATA 1996 provides that where two or more people are to give their consent in advance of a valid sale, consent being given by any two of them is sufficient to transfer good title to the purchaser.¹⁴⁵

Overreaching

The doctrine of overreaching provides that if the purchase price for property is paid to two trustees or a trust corporation, then the rights of the purchaser overreach the interests of the beneficiaries under that trust of land.¹⁴⁶ Overreaching will not operate in situations in which there is only one trustee of the trust of land.¹⁴⁷ The particular problem which has arisen in land law is whether an overriding interest¹⁴⁸ in relation to a person in actual occupation of land¹⁴⁹ would take priority over the rights of a purchaser who has paid purchase moneys over that land to two trustees so as to claim a right to overreach the rights of those beneficiaries. The House of Lords has held that an equitable interest acquired by a wife against her husband under an implied trust for sale coupled with actual occupation of that land constituted an overriding interest:¹⁵⁰ however, the doctrine of overreaching was not at issue in that case.¹⁵¹ A subsequent decision of the House of Lords held that the proper management of the conveyancing system required that the doctrine of overreaching should take priority over an 142 In the materials available to me at the time of writing.

143 See Wright v Johnson (unreported, Court of Appeal, 2 November 1999), per Robert Walker LJ.

144 TLATA 1996, s 9(1).

145 Ibid, s 10(1).

146 LPA 1925, s 27.

147 Williams & Glyn's Bank Ltd v Boland [1981] AC 487.

148 After the enactment of the Land Registration Act 2002, Sched 3, now rendered as 'interests which override'.

149 The decided cases relate to LRA 1925, s 70(1)(g).

150 That was, under s 70(1)(g) of the 1925 Act.

151 Williams & Glyn's Bank Ltd v Boland [1981] AC 487.

equitable interest coupled with actual occupation of the property.¹⁵² The effect of this latter decision was to enhance the protection available to purchasers who pay the purchase moneys for land to two or more trustees, or to a trust corporation, by ensuring that their interests overreach those of any beneficiary in actual occupation of the property under a trust for sale or, latterly, by extension under a trust of land.

16.3 CONCURRENT OWNERSHIP OF LAND

16.3.1 Joint tenancy and tenancy in common

The rules relating to joint tenancies and tenancies in common are also significant in relation to land. Where the parties have acquired the property with unity of time, title, interest and possession, they will be taken to be joint tenants of that property, provided that they had sufficient intention to do so.¹⁵³ The result is that neither party takes any individual interest in the property: rather, both acquire the whole of the interest in the property. It is a perfect communist model: together they hold everything; apart they have nothing. The joint tenancy best expresses the traditional legal understanding of marriage (the most common source of joint tenancies) as a unit in which the spouses acquire no rights against one another. Further, the last of them left alive acquires the whole of the rights in the property under the survivorship principle, provided that the joint tenancy was not severed before the death of the penultimate living joint tenant.¹⁵⁴ Severance of the joint tenancy – leading to the creation of a tenancy in common – occurs in a number of ways where the parties evidence sufficient intention to deal with their own share.¹⁵⁵ Severance will occur on service of a notice to that effect by one joint tenant to the others,¹⁵⁶ or by the bankruptcy of one joint tenant,¹⁵⁷ by the mutual conduct of the parties,¹⁵⁸ or by their mutual agreement.¹⁵⁹ Severance on divorce is a more complex business, whereby if death occurs before service of the final order, then severance will not take place,¹⁶⁰ although there are authorities which have held that service of final divorce proceedings will constitute an act of severance,¹⁶¹ whereas merely seeking the advice of the court as to one's rights as a preparatory step to divorce proceedings will not.¹⁶² The detail of this area of land is considered in detail in textbooks on land law¹⁶³ and was considered in the previous chapter in relation to the judgment in Jones v Kernott.¹⁶⁴

152 City of London Building Society v Flegg [1988] AC 54.

153 See, eg, Burgess v Rawnsley [1975] Ch 429 – where a woman went into occupation of property with a man but subject to a misunderstanding about his unrequited love for her: a sad case in which he presents the genteel object of his affection with a rose wrapped in a newspaper.

154 Re Draper's Conveyance [1969] 1 Ch 486; Harris v Goddard [1983] 1 WLR 1203.

155 Williams v Hensman (1861) 1 J & H 546, (1861) 70 ER 862. Eg, by dealing fraudulently with the property: Ahmed v Kendrick (1988) 56 P & CR 120, except where that would permit the fraudster to benefit from that fraud – Penn v Bristol & West Building Society [1995] 2 FLR 938.

156 Re 88 Berkley Road [1971] Ch 648.

157 Re Gorman [1990] 2 FLR 284; Re Pavlou [1993] 2 FLR 751.

158 McDowell v Hirschfield Lipson & Rumney and Smith [1992] 2 FLR 126; Gore and Snell v Carpenter (1990) 60 P & CR 456, 462.

159 Hunter v Babbage [1994] 2 FLR 806.

160 Re Palmer (Deceased) [1994] 2 FLR 609.

161 Re Draper's Conveyance [1969] 1 Ch 486.

162 Harris v Goddard [1983] 1 WLR 1203.

163 See, eg, Thomas and Hudson, 2004, Chapter 57 generally.

164 [2011] 3 WLR 1121.

16.3.2 Understanding the law's manifold treatment of the family home

There is no single attitude to the home in the common law or in equity, in spite of developments in the legislation since the housing statutes of 1977,¹⁶⁵ the Children Act 1989, and the variety of family law, housing and property legislation passed in 1996.¹⁶⁶ It is submitted that this lack of common principle is true of the various departments of common law and equity, covering the well-established divisions between trusts law, family law, child law, public law and housing law. Rather, each area of law appears to advance its own understanding of the manner in which such rights should be allocated, causing an inability to generate a single legal model which is able either to understand the changing nature of the family or to account for it in the current jurisprudence. Consequently, there is a hotchpotch of rules and regulations coming at the same problem from different directions. A comprehensive legislative code dealing with title to the home, the rights of occupants, the rights of children and the rights of creditors is necessary to reduce the cost and stress of litigation, and to ensure that this problem is given the political consideration that it deserves.

165 I.e., the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, the Protection from Eviction Act 1977 and, of course, the Rent Act 1977.

166 Principally the Family Law Act 1996 and the Housing Act 1996.

Essay – Family law, human rights law and equity

17.1 INTRODUCTION	829
17.1.1 Issues of definition	829
17.1.2 The similarities between human rights law and equity, in outline	830
17.2 HUMAN RIGHTS LAW AND EQUITY	831
17.2.1 The theoretical basis of human rights law	831
17.2.2 A theoretical basis for equity?	833
17.2.3 Modelling human rights law	834
17.3 PRINCIPLES OF HUMAN RIGHTS LAW	835
17.3.1 The applicable human rights norms	835
17.3.2 The nature of human rights in property	836
17.3.3 The right to family life – Art 8	837
17.3.4 The right to possessions	839
17.4 FAMILY LAW AND THE LAW OF THE HOME	839
17.4.1 The context	839
17.4.2 The Family Law Act 1996	841
17.4.3 The impact of the Children Act 1989	842
17.4.4 Cohabitants and married couples	843
17.5 SOCIAL JUSTICE AND RIGHTS IN THE HOME	844
17.5.1 Social justice and the legal treatment of the home	844
17.5.2 Understanding the difficulties with relationship breakdown	847

17.1 INTRODUCTION

17.1.1 Issues of definition

This essay falls into four parts. First, a consideration of the intellectual distinctions between the philosophy of human rights and the philosophy of equity. Secondly, an analysis of the possible applications of human rights law to the norms of trusts law. Thirdly, an analysis of the manner in which family law and child law approach questions as to ownership and occupation of the home differently from trusts law. Fourthly, a consideration of how these various approaches conceive differently of socially just conclusions to the questions which they consider.

Up to now this book has considered two streams of thought in English law. First, the comparatively haphazard development of principle in the Courts of Equity in the Tudor period¹ and, secondly, the development of trusts law since the early 19th century. In Chapter 1, the philosophy underpinning equity was explained as being a means of achieving socially just ends as a counter-balance to the rigidity of the common law. With the enactment of the Human Rights Act 1998, there is a possibility of a very different legal culture in England and Wales. For equity this presents a new challenge. What is not clear is whether the principles which underpin human rights are the same as the principles which underpin equity and trusts law, particularly in relation to rights to property and rights to the home.²

At one level equity is simply the product of its own history: a ramshackle bag of ideas which are the product of a culture rather than of a formal ideological programme. That means, equity has developed without any specific programme, and therefore we should not be surprised if at some points the logic appears to break down. In the late 20th century, a tremendous literature was spawned which examined the trust in particular (as opposed to equity in general). In contrast, human rights law is an ideological product of liberal democracies in the wake of the Second World War. This essay will attempt an introduction to some of the fault-lines of the distinction between human rights law³ and equity: any more ambitious project could only be frustrated in the space available.

Human rights law talks of the right to possessions, the right to a family life and so forth in the European Convention on Human Rights. It is that Convention which is the subject matter of the Human Rights Act 1998. It was drafted in the wake of the horrors of the Second World War and clearly recognises the suffering of the people of Europe at the hands of the Nazis. Equity has an older provenance than human rights thought which deploys expressions like ‘conscience’, ‘the trust’ and ‘bona fides’ dating back into the mists of English jurisprudential history. Those principles were considered in Chapter 1 and their common features are analysed in the final chapter of this book.

17.1.2 The similarities between human rights law and equity, in outline

The argument is simply this: both human rights law and equity sound as if they ought to be concerned to improve the lot of ordinary citizens either by protecting a list of fundamental freedoms, or by generating ‘fair’ results to litigation. However, it is not clear that their different principles will always lead to the same ‘just’ result. Both streams of thought are normative systems, in the sense that human rights are committed to protecting the rights of the individual against state action and in the sense that equity is committed to the enforcement of contracts, to the protection of private property rights and to the control of the defendant’s conscience. Both are normative. Both are ‘streams of ought’ in this sense. Perhaps one key difference between them is that equity will typically be directed at the application of discretionary principles to individual cases, whereas human rights law will typically erect general, ideologically-grounded norms to fit all cases. There is perhaps a difference between micro- and macro-provision of fair dispute resolution respectively.

1 That is, the range of actions which the Courts of Equity have developed from the times of the medieval Lords Chancellor.

2 See generally Douzinas, 2000.

3 Meaning those entitlements which English law will protect and recognise, as opposed to general claims to entitlement which are not necessarily recognised by the law.

17.2 HUMAN RIGHTS LAW AND EQUITY

17.2.1 The theoretical basis of human rights law

The very notion of human rights is an ideological result of Enlightenment thought in Western Europe. The development of humanism in Western thought is key to the political landscape at the beginning of the 21st century. As philosophers moved beyond placing God as the source of all human thought and morality, replacing divine intervention with a theory of self-determination for human beings, those same human beings began the agonising process of conceiving of their own intellectual structures of right and wrong. Through Hobbes and Locke we see natural right replace straightforward observance of religious law developed through the revealed word of God.

The development of secular law (as opposed to religious law or superstitious ‘lore’) to govern the actions and interactions of human beings itself requires that there be a set of developed principles which underpin this law-making. Given the flimsy, animated sacks of water that we human beings are, desperately trying to keep the hordes of chaos at bay, there should be little surprise that legal systems tend to veer between the creation of rigid rules and a demand for flexible justice. Deep in the philosophy of law is a need to balance discretion with certainty and certainty with discretion. The genesis of human rights was something very different.

Probably the most significant intellectual development in the late 20th century was the primacy acquired by human rights thinking in liberal democracies. In fact, human rights law has become one of the most prolific exports from these liberal democratic countries, despite the difficulty of tracing any neat philosophical source for it. With the onset of globalisation these human rights norms have become common currency, as developing nations seek access to the financial resources and technology of the more developed economies. At the surface level this global commitment to human rights is indicative of a more mature political culture; at another level many commentators worry that it only demonstrates a new economic imperialism.⁴ There are three main objections to the development of a human rights law culture: the effects of economic globalisation; constitutional control by the judiciary; and an atomisation of social relations. Each will be examined in turn.

Globalisation is a complex phenomenon of late modernism. At its most conspicuous level, globalisation concerns the generation of brands which are recognised around the world. At another level globalisation signals the victory of one view of liberal democracy over other political ideologies. Bauman points out the shortcomings of this globalisation in two phenomena: first, the new ability offered to multinational corporations to move between markets without needing to feel engaged by the local communities which they affect; and secondly, in a division between a new cosmopolitan elite and the remaining majority of the population excluded from the possibilities offered by this process of globalisation.⁵ The fall-out of this development of globalisation is that communities are weakened, with the result that social ties are loosened in favour of an atomisation of society which focuses instead on individual rights as conceived of in human rights thinking.⁶ Human rights are becoming the greatest export commodity from the capitalist democracies to the rest of the world – they are all but boxed up with everything else that is sold.⁷ As such, the ideology underpinning human rights as applied in the globalised economy is criticised for seeking above all to secure the rights of Western capitalists through the protection of rights in property: in that sense there is a different goal from property law, but an equal veneration in practice for private property.

4 Eg, Chomsky, 2000.

5 Bauman, 2000.

6 Bauman, 1998; Houellebecq, 2001.

Secondly, the generation of human rights norms through law means that judges acquire potentially very large amounts of power to overrule legislation passed by the democratically elected members of the legislature.⁸ By introducing a Human Rights Act, there is a danger that liberal constitutionalism takes priority instead, which would mean that the courts could have more power than Parliament, particularly in relation to any legislation which appeared to contravene that human rights legislation.⁹

The same reservations which we might have about human rights law might also beset our consideration of equity. In general terms it has been accepted in this book that it is a good thing for the legal system to provide for a means of achieving fair and flexible responses to particular factual situations. On the other hand it could be asked: who are the judges who are developing these equitable principles? Are the judges sufficiently democratically accountable when they develop and apply these norms? Why are these principles being developed and not others? The passive nature of equity (in that it is only applied to cases which come before the courts) has meant, for example, that equity concentrated primarily on commercial law cases in the 1990s, without extending its gaze to social welfare cases and so forth.

Thirdly, human rights norms assert the rights of the individual over and above social rights and obligations. As such, some socialists have criticised them for being ‘atomistic’ – that is, for separating human beings off from one another and breaking down social solidarity.¹⁰ It would not be correct to say that all socialists have objected to human rights.¹¹ Many socialists have seen fit to redraw the socialist project (always a troubled expression) to define their socialism as an essentially moral project which has a sense of right and wrong which is lacking from rightwing, capitalist thought.¹² For many on the left, indeed, human rights became a means of campaigning against the worst excesses they identified in late capitalist society.

Equity-in-theory (that is, the form of philosophical equity set out in Chapter 32)¹³ is concerned with ensuring fair results on a case-by-case basis. As such, it could be said to contribute to the atomisation of social relations by considering each case separately. Alternatively it could be said that it ensures that a socialist project both stays true to its

7 Chomsky, 1999.

8 Ewing, 1994, 147. This conceptual difficulty faced the Labour government which introduced the Human Rights Act 1998. The point made by Gearty and Tomkins, 2000, 64, is that democratic socialism, properly so called, requires that the democracy has the upper hand and therefore that Parliament is sovereign (although, of course, other socialists would dispense with the term ‘sovereignty’).

9 This explains the decision by the Labour administration in enacting the Human Rights Act to provide that the courts could merely make a declaration of incompatibility (s 4 of the 1998 Act), so that Parliament remains sovereign and so that the judges are merely enabled to pass comment on legislation and not to overrule it: considered below.

10 See, eg, Sypnowich, 1990, 84 et seq; and Hunt, 1992, 105.

11 The sort of problems which beset the socialists are well expressed by Gearty and Tomkins, 2000. Those two express themselves as being comfortable if human rights norms develop ‘the dignity of the individual’ (p 66).

12 See, eg, Habermas, 1990, 3.

13 Identified with Aristotle’s Ethics, 1955, and parts of Hegel’s Philosophy of Right, 1952.

ideology and also prevents it from being blind to the individual suffering of many.¹⁴ Further, the cultural relativism of English equity means that it is able to assimilate the precise ideological components of a common morality (such as a distaste for unconscionable behaviour and fraud) and apply them in individual cases.

In comparing human rights law with English equity the argument can be made that human rights law offers a more forward-looking attitude to the principles on which individual cases could be decided. Equity-in-practice, by contrast, is a collection of parochial, English aphorisms applied by the courts ('he who comes to equity must come with clean hands' and so forth). What human rights law offers is a means of ensuring that the rights of individual people are not overlooked by a legal system as part of the natural tendency which all legal systems exhibit to generate abstract technical models to meet real-world problems. Human rights law is therefore founded in developing cosmopolitan,¹⁵ international norms, in contradistinction to equity which offers merely a stream of case law principle and procedure which has been developed entirely within the historical culture of the English Lord Chancellors and their Courts of Chancery. So, at one level human rights law constitutes a part of a growing, global ideology whereas equity is a parochial product of strictly English culture. But is that to overlook the humane possibilities offered by flexible and responsive equity in contradistinction to political principles drafted in the middle of the 20th century?

17.2.2 A theoretical basis for equity?

Perhaps one of the difficulties which equity faces is that it has not expressly expounded a clear underlying philosophy. The statements to the effect that equity is concerned to preclude unconscionable behaviour do not explain sufficiently what is meant by that unconscionable behaviour at the abstract level, or the ways in which it might apply in detailed contexts. As such, it is vulnerable to attack from those who have a philosophy of their own to hand.

For example, the restitution lawyers have been able to deploy civilian concepts of unjust enrichment to meet many of the cases for which equity is currently used.¹⁶ Those restitution lawyers do not, for the most part, advocate the discontinuance of the equitable claims and remedies:¹⁷ instead they call for the acceptance that the reversal of unjust enrichment is the causative factor behind the implementation of many of those equitable remedies. Their underlying philosophy is drawn from Roman law¹⁸ – albeit that they shrink from defining in philosophical terms what they mean by 'unjust'.¹⁹

The law of restitution has a number of influential judicial supporters, including Lord Goff (in many ways its creator) and Lord Millett. The standard of conscience erected by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in *Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC*²⁰ (or the 14 Bevan (1952), 1978.

15 A favoured term of Beck, 1992.

16 See in general terms Birks, 1989.

17 Because they do not consider them. However, Beatson, 1991, and Jaffey, 2000, have both called for unjust enrichment to replace equity wholesale – by which they can only be taken to mean replace trusts law and not injunctions, specific performance and the rest.

18 Birks, 1992.

19 Birks, 2000:1, 8.

20 [1996] AC 669.

reliance on the doctrine of notice in Barclays Bank v O'Brien)²¹ does not help us to identify any more closely equity's underlying philosophical base. After all, one person's conscience is another person's ethical whimsy. Perhaps the truth is that equity is a haphazard product of history more than a carefully crafted creed in the manner of the civil codes in continental Europe.

This book attempts to identify a philosophical root for equity in social justice, in the meaning given to that term in Chapter 32. That is, a social justice based on equality of access for citizens to principles of fairness in recognition of their needs and deserts, which ensures that the legal system is not blind to any injustice suffered by the individual under the common law. Following Aristotle,²² this form of equity is a flexible means of achieving something different from the justice sought by the general law where fairness demands it; similar sentiments are expressed by Hegel.²³ While that may sound, at first blush, to be a normatively loaded programme, it is no more prescriptive than the loaded terminology of 'conscience' and 'justice' used by the traditional trust lawyers or by the restitution lawyers respectively.

17.2.3 Modelling human rights law

At the time of writing, if we are to be honest with one another, no one is entirely sure how human rights law will impact on ordinary private law. It may be that human rights norms will have a seismic impact on private law – or the judiciary may take the view that existing case law and statute already give the courts a capacity to give effect to the norms embodied in European human rights law without the need for further amendment. However, it is important to recognise that human rights law is as much about a way of thinking, at the time of writing, as about any particular corpus of case law.

Distinguishing between 'rights' and 'freedoms'

There is one fundamental distinction to be drawn in this thinking before we can hope to apply the law relating to the Human Rights Act to equity and the law of trusts. That distinction is between 'human rights' and 'civil liberties'. These terms appear to have been used as synonyms one for the other in the arguments which have grown up surrounding the movement for the adoption of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) into English law. However, there is a very significant difference between them.

A 'human right' suggests something inalienable which attaches to the very humanity of the individual: that is, a right which each individual human being has simply by virtue of being alive. By contrast a 'civil liberty' attaches to the individual's status as a citizen: that is, a freedom conferred only on persons who are citizens, rather (possibly) than those who are asylum seekers or who do not otherwise qualify as being citizens. This second category might include rights to vote, or freedoms from arbitrary arrest which are conferred on citizens but not on others. This distinction is little discussed even in the human rights law literature, and remains a confusing distinction at the heart of this emerging area of law.²⁴

21 [1994] 1 AC 180.

22 Aristotle, Ethics, 1955, 198, para 1137a17, x: see section 1.1 above.

23 Hegel (1821), 1952, 142, para 223.

24 Ewing and Gearty, 2000, 1.

Furthermore, a ‘civil liberty’ would seem to imply a ‘freedom’. The term freedom, itself, can be used here in relation to a ‘freedom from’ as well as in relation to a ‘right to’. That means the distinction between protection from an abuse of some inalienable freedom as opposed to a positive permission to perform a given act as a free citizen. Many of the key tenets of ECHR concern freedom from torture and other abuses of the rights of the person. In the wake of a traumatic world war it is unsurprising that there would have been some focus on ensuring that ordinary human beings could be protected from such abuses of the liberty of the person by means of torture, false imprisonment, degrading treatment and so forth.

The alternative approach is the ‘rights-based’ approach which would assert that individuals have ‘rights to’²⁵ perform certain actions or to enjoy certain attributes. So, for example, in relation to the right to a family life or the right to possessions, we might consider that these rights are rights in the sense of positive freedoms to act without let or hindrance. The question then is ‘how far should these rights go?’ Many would argue for a ‘right to strike’ or a ‘right to equal pay for like work’ being enshrined as legal entitlements within a code of economic civil liberties. The boundaries are therefore important ones between freedoms from abuse of the person, rights to perform inalienably human activities, and more rarefied political entitlements.

17.3 PRINCIPLES OF HUMAN RIGHTS LAW

17.3.1 The applicable human rights norms

There are two general issues. First, the role of the state in protecting rights enshrined in the European Convention on Human Rights which interact with equity and trusts. Secondly, the potential development of horizontal rights and obligations between private persons in circumstances in which common law rights are developed in accordance with Convention rights.

The position under English law is that with effect from October 2000 the provisions of the Human Rights Act 1998 came into effect. The 1998 Act provides that ‘primary legislation and subordinate legislation must be read and given effect in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights’.²⁶ The aim of the legislation is therefore to secure a form of interpretation of legislation, although that is not intended to ‘affect the validity, continuing operation or enforcement of any incompatible primary legislation’, with the effect that the courts cannot overrule legislation if it is considered to be in conflict with human rights law.²⁷ Therefore, legislation may be passed, perhaps in relation to immigration, which may lead to effects which are contrary to a literal application of the Convention rights: but that will not permit a court to declare that legislation ineffective; rather the court is empowered only to make a declaration of incompatibility²⁸ which will not affect the validity of that provision.²⁹ The sovereignty of Parliament is thus maintained.

25 Or ‘freedoms to’.

26 Human Rights Act 1998, s 3(1).

27 Ibid, s 3(2)(b).

28 Ibid, s 4(2).

29 Ibid, s 4(6).

What the 1998 Act has not done is to create a new cadre of legal rules in the nature of a common law of human rights: the precise terms of the Convention have not become mandatory norms of English law. Whether a treaty is to have direct, mandatory effect as part of ordinary English law would depend on the terms of that treaty, and that is not the case here;³⁰ rather, the Convention rights are, initially, aids to the construction of legislation.³¹ What is less clear is how the courts will react to the concomitant possibility that human rights norms might come to influence the common law over time, such that judges come to give effect to human rights norms as part of the common law.³²

Gearty and Tomkins³³ state that ‘what is . . . interesting is the extent to which the Human Rights Act may mould the common law’, although the point is controversial as considered by Buxton,³⁴ in that ‘traditional forms of law . . . may well be required in future to evolve in a Convention-compatible way, with this evolution being assisted by the principles to be found in the European Convention’. There had already been case law decided before the Human Rights Act 1998 came into full force and effect on the Convention-compatibility of the reforms to civil procedure, introduced by Lord Woolf, in General Mediterranean Holdings v Patel,³⁵ and more specifically in relation to private law the case of DPP v Jones.³⁶ This demonstrates that private law was beginning to develop in parallel with Convention norms even before the enactment of the Human Rights Act and its full implementation in October 2000. In Jones, the comments as to the primacy of private property indicated the straightforwardly capitalist turn which we can expect English property law to take even when applying human rights norms by protecting these rights in property in preference to other competing claims.

17.3.2 The nature of human rights in property

So, the fundamental question in relation to human rights and property law is between (i) a positive right to property and (ii) a negative³⁷ freedom from abuse of that property. At one level the proprietor of land would argue that she is entitled to use that land without interference by state agencies or others. Yet planning law permits use of land for purposes which may adversely affect a neighbouring proprietor if planning permission is awarded, and also permits compulsory acquisition of land in defined circumstances. The point could be made that this is a loss which is compensated: however, that compensation disavows the core logic of English property law, that the owner of property rights has proprietary rights and not simply rights to financial compensation. At one level, then, the entire scheme of planning law appears to run counter to the idea of rights in property. However, similar environmental laws regulating the use of land for purposes which pollute other land would appear to benefit the users of neighbouring land while similarly appearing to breach the property rights of the polluter.

30 See, eg, cases dealing with maritime treaties: The Hollandia [1982] QB 872; Caltex Singapore Pte v BP Shipping Ltd [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep 286.

31 Grosz, Beatson, Duffy, Gearty et al, 2000, 7 et seq.

32 Hunt, 1998; Phillipson, 1999.

33 Gearty and Tomkins, 2000, 65.

34 Buxton, 2000.

35 [1999] 3 All ER 673.

36 [1999] 2 All ER 257 – a case involving trespass which drew on Convention concepts as to protection of rights to possessions.

37 In Hegelian terms.

What this does is to pull us closer to the centre of the issues discussed in Chapter 31 as to the intrinsic nature of property rights. Is a right to property a right which attaches to its holder as part of that person's fundamental freedoms, or is it a right held by whoever happens to be the owner of that property from time to time which should be deemed to be a mere commodity? By 'commodity' is meant a right with a given value attaching to it from time to time which can be transferred intact from one person to another, without necessarily attaching to that person. So, if I have property rights in x but x is taken from me in breach of trust and the sale proceeds used to buy y, property law will recognise my rights as attaching instead to y. What I 'own' is not the property itself (whether x or y) but rather those rights which attach to different property from time to time.³⁸ Therefore, it is unimportant for property law in many situations which precise property is at issue: although when seeking to establish an inalienable human right to possessions it would typically be easier to demonstrate that such a right ought to attach to identified property with which the claimant had had some long-standing connection than in relation to property with which there was only a loose relationship. At this level, ordinary property law and human rights law applying to property may have differential applications.

Section 2 of the Human Rights Act 1998 leads to the development of common law norms on the basis of Convention jurisprudence. There are three particular contexts in which this might be important. First, the right to one's 'possessions' in the First Protocol; secondly, the right to respect for one's home and for a family life; and, thirdly, the interaction of these ideas with notions of social justice and of community interest.

17.3.3 The right to family life – Art 8

The most important provision in the European Convention adopted by the 1998 Act for our purposes is the right to family life in Art 8. The Convention has a European method of using general concepts which are then given substance by case law, whereas English statute tends to deal with detail, hiding its philosophy and leaving it to the courts to develop the big ideas. The right to 'family life' is a similarly big idea which is somewhat alien to an English property lawyer's ears. The key issues will be whether the right to a family life will impinge on litigation between couples as to rights in the family home on separation, or in cases involving third parties asserting rights over that family home. In the Convention case of Sporrong v Sweden,³⁹ it was held that:

the Court must determine whether a fair balance was struck between the demands of the general interest of the community and the requirement of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights. The search for this balance is inherent in the whole of the Convention.

So, in *James v United Kingdom*⁴⁰ – a case brought by the Duke of Westminster seeking to show that the provisions of the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 (entitling tenants to extend long leases or compulsorily acquire the freehold of property) were an abrogation of his human rights – it was held by the court that this was not the case, even though (as Cooke and 38 As considered in Chapter 31, that would depend on the property and the person in any given context.

39 (1982) 5 EHRR 35, 52.

40 (1986) 8 EHRR 123.

Hayton⁴¹ point out) ‘a number of wealthy tenants made a windfall profit by their discounted purchase’ and the Duke of Westminster lost many rights in his land as a result. However, it was found by the court that the enactment of the 1967 statute had been ‘calculated to enhance social justice’, and therefore it served the general interest in a way which overrode those individual rights. We therefore have a principle that notions of social justice can override an individual’s human rights. Is social justice to do with equality, or simply to do with personal gain? It is difficult to see on the jurisprudence on the decided cases what is meant by ‘social justice’ here.

What will be significant in relation to English property law is whether English judges decide that preserving a free market in mortgage services is more important than protecting families against actions brought by mortgagees for sale of mortgaged property. Left to its own devices English property law has always sought to protect the property market⁴² and to ensure that a bona fide purchaser takes good title in property.⁴³ A little like the Bible, such broad pronouncements in the European human rights jurisprudence will support any point of view. Professor Gray put the matter in the following way: ‘We have made property so central to our society that any thing and any rights that are not property are very apt to take second place.’⁴⁴ Perhaps it is that truth which will limit the future development of human rights principles in all areas of English property law.

As Howell has pointed out, there are real problems in relation to the law of adverse possession, which gives an occupier of land for 12 years immunity from any claim to remove her, and also in relation to the law on security of tenure, which prevents a landlord from evicting a tenant arbitrarily. The question is whether these facets of English property law abrogate rights to property, or whether they will be adjudged to achieve a socially useful function which absolves them from such a claim.⁴⁵ This is all in contrast to the South African constitution which provides explicitly that the right to housing is a human right.⁴⁶

In another case on Art 8, the applicant contended that the noise generated by an airport close to the applicant’s home was an abrogation of his human rights.⁴⁷ The court held that this application was ill-founded and did not raise any question of his right to a peaceful family life. A claim in relation to forfeiture of a lease as a result of non-payment by the lessee of a service charge was held to have been similarly ill-founded as a purported claim within Art 8.⁴⁸ Similarly, denial of planning permission for Romany people to erect caravans on their own land has been upheld because it was held that the applicants’ right to their home must be balanced against the interests of the broader community which were said to favour preventing the establishment of such a gypsy community.⁴⁹

41 Cooke and Hayton, 2000.

42 City & London BS v Flegg [1988] AC 54.

43 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

44 Gray and Gray, 2001.

45 Howell, 1999, 287.

46 Robertson, 1998, 311.

47 Powell v United Kingdom (1987) 9 EHRR 241.

48 Applicant No 11949/86 v United Kingdom (1988) 10 EHRR 149.

49 Buckley v United Kingdom (1997) 23 EHRR 101.

17.3.4 The right to possessions

Article 1 of the First Protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights provides that ‘Every natural or legal person is entitled to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions’ and that ‘No one shall be deprived of his possessions except in the public interest and subject to the conditions provided for by law’. Whether there could ever be said to be a human right to trust property seems bound up with who it was who abstracted that property. If it were the trustee or some stranger to the trust, that would appear to be a matter for the law on breach of trust considered in Chapter 18. Alternatively, if it were some state agency or some person liable for breach of human rights then the First Protocol comes into play. With regard to the law of trusts, one context in which it might be useful to talk of human rights would be in relation to trust property taken by the state, or property which the state is alleged to hold on trust for private citizens.

In general terms, claims (that is a right to sue another person or a chose in action) will be recognised by English law as a possession, and therefore the rights of beneficiaries under a trust in general terms should be held as being a possession, being an equitable right in property. The principles established in Sporrong and James (considered at para 17.3.3 above) have been taken to apply in this context, to the effect that interferences with such rights are permissible only where they are in the public interest. In general terms, a deprivation of property will be required to be a permanent deprivation and not merely a temporary interference with its use.⁵⁰ Rights for private persons to take transfers of property rights from other private persons will not be deprivations where there is a public interest in such a transfer, as in James concerning enfranchisement of leasehold rights. A feature of a lawful deprivation will be whether or not there is compensation available for the person losing property rights.⁵¹

17.4 FAMILY LAW AND THE LAW OF THE HOME

17.4.1 The context

It is a regrettable feature of English law that frequently, socially important aspects of our communal life fall between a number of unrelated legal disciplines rather than being dealt with entirely by any one set of coherent rules. By ‘unrelated legal disciplines’ I mean that the practitioners, judges and academics in such areas are either ignorant of or reluctant to apply the norms developed in other legal disciplines. One good example of this is the law relating to the family home. To read books written by property and trusts lawyers, one would not think that there had been legislation passed in 1989⁵² and 1996⁵³ relating to the primacy of the rights of the child in disputes over the family home. Similarly, in reading the works of family lawyers in such contexts, one would not know that there were bitter divisions between property lawyers relating to unjust enrichment, the classification of trusts implied by law, 50 Handyside v United Kingdom (1976) 1 EHRR 737 – in which a provisional seizure of obscene publications was not such a deprivation.

51 James v United Kingdom (1986) 8 EHRR 123.

52 Children Act 1989.

53 Family Law Act 1996.

and so forth.⁵⁴ Typically, legal categories cut across very significant social arenas. That is not to criticise those authors – rather it is merely to recognise the way in which the practise of English law has splintered.⁵⁵ The family law statutes relate to the divorce of married couples, whereas the law on trusts of homes (discussed in Chapter 15) relates to any situation in which the co-owners are not married or in which a secured creditor is proceeding against a married couple. So, this observation is not meant as a criticism of those different camps of lawyers: ‘family law’ is concerned with the divorce of married couples and with child law applications, whereas property law is required to deal with everything else in relation to the home and a family’s moveable property. Consequently, the organisation of the legal system means that one cadre of lawyers need not know about the thought processes of the other. However, it does seem to be a somewhat arbitrary place to draw such a hard and fast line between different types of case.

We can draw a significant distinction between the sort of considerations which were set out in Chapter 15 in relation to Trusts of homes and two recent decisions on divorce in the House of Lords. In *Miller v Miller, Macfarlane v Macfarlane*⁵⁶ the courts responded to the very different culture in family law without a moment’s thought as to the manner in which ordinary property law might have considered the same question. The types of concerns which were taken into account are far more reminiscent of Waite LJ in Midland Bank v Cooke than the House of Lords in Lloyds Bank v Rosset, for example. So, there was no need to follow nor consider Lloyds Bank v Rosset. Instead, the House of Lords followed the general prescriptions in *White v White*⁵⁷ that one should not give priority to the breadwinner when deciding what rights each party to a divorce should have in the family home, to their personal property, to future income, to pension rights, and so on and so forth. Lord Nicholls suggested that the courts should seek fairness in dividing up rights to property, compensation for any economic disparity in the way that the parties lived out their marriage, and taking into account the equal sharing that is ordinarily a part of married life. The court is generally concerned to achieve a clean break for the parties so that they can put their terminated marriage behind them, although there will frequently still be an obligation for one party to make periodical income payments to the other party, possibly for the maintenance of their children.

The court drew a distinction in the abstract between long and short marriages, whereby a longer marriage would more readily justify the inference that the parties should be taken to hold their property equally, whereas a shorter marriage would lead less obviously to that inference if the parties continued to treat some of their property separately. So, the marriage in Miller lasted for only two years and nine months and so could be treated differently from the marriage in Macfarlane which lasted for 16 years and resulted in three children. Similarly, where one party had made a ‘stellar contribution’ to their married life, for example by earning an extraordinary amount of money which permitted them to live a luxurious lifestyle, then that stellar contributor may be entitled to a larger share of their property than the party who had contributed much less: this would be particularly so if their marriage had been 54 Hayes and Williams, 1996; Hoggett, Pearl, Cooke and Bates, 1996. See Hudson, 2004:4.

55 Perhaps this serves to show that while law may itself be a closed social system, many of its sub-sets are similarly autopoietically closed from each other by virtue of the development of separate norms and procedures.

56 [2006] UKHL 24.

57 [2001] 1 AC 596.

a short one, whereas a longer marriage might more easily justify the conclusion that the other party had assisted the stellar contributor by the provision of a home and so forth.

What was particularly clear from the speeches in the House of Lords, particularly those of Baroness Hale and Lord Nicholls, was that none of these principles constituted a hard-and-fast rule. Rather, they were principles for the guidance of subsequent courts when disposing of the precise circumstances before them, but nevertheless principles which provided a sustainable framework for deciding future cases. As Baroness Hale put the matter:

There is much to be said for the flexibility and sensitivity of the English law of ancillary relief. It avoids the straitjacket of rigid rules which can apply harshly or unfairly in an individual case. But it should not be too flexible. It must try to achieve some consistency and predictability. This is not only to secure that so far as possible like cases are treated alike but also to enable and encourage the parties to negotiate their own solutions as quickly and cheaply as possible.⁵⁸

This encapsulates the entire dilemma of equitable relief, and demonstrates the desire of a judge in a senior court to provide clear guidance for junior courts.

The discussion which follows aims to integrate the trusts law thinking considered hitherto in this Part with family law thinking. It is only in this way that it is possible to understand some of the divisions in the case law between the judges and to understand the complexity and texture of the many debates surrounding the family and the home in modern legal theory.

17.4.2 The Family Law Act 1996

The Family Law Act (FLA) 1996 made significant changes to the legal treatment of relationship breakdown and to the rights of members of relationships to use family property after break-up. The law of trusts is blind to the context of relationship breakdown, and family law takes a very different approach to the supposed sanctity of rights in property from trusts law.

In theory, there is one significant difference between family law and property law applications in that the court is not simply concerned to unearth pre-existing property rights and to give effect to them in family law applications. Rather, the court is empowered to examine all of the parties' needs and circumstances – together with those of any children⁵⁹ – including their housing needs and their income to ensure a result which best serves the family's overall welfare. The task which family law takes on in this context is necessarily a complex one in any particular set of circumstances. Clearly it is not desirable for the family courts to proceed on the basis of the kinds of strict criteria which property law courts will tend to apply in cases like Lloyds Bank v Rosset,⁶⁰ for fear of introducing too much formalism into an area of law which deals with the most intimate and psychologically-fraught aspects of an individual's life.

In the context of relationship breakdown there is therefore the possibility that property courts and family courts will be acting on the basis not only of very different substantive

58 [2006] UKHL 24, para [122].

59 Eg, the FLA 1996, ss 62(2) and 63 are concerned to prevent 'significant harm' being caused to any child.

60 [1990] 1 All ER 1111.

norms developed by case law or by statute respectively, but also on the basis of very different procedural rules: property law recognising pre-existing rights in land, while family law makes open-textured judgments to address the needs of the family.

One further point about the nature of the property rights which the FLA 1996 offers to applicants for occupation orders is not a right in the property, that is, not a right in rem, but rather a right of the use of that property. In Hohfeld's division of these issues this constitutes a right against the respondent to be allowed to occupy the property.⁶¹ It is a property right only in the sense that it affords protection against the respondent in person. The significance of the matrimonial home right is that it offers the applicant a registrable charge which is a form of right in rem because it will bind all third parties once it is registered. Thus, it operates as a right attaching to the property which is exercisable against the world and not simply as a right against the respondent in personam.

17.4.3 The impact of the Children Act 1989

The Children Act (CA) 1989 provides that the welfare of the child is paramount.⁶² This provision encapsulated a growing change in English family law by expressly recognising the needs of the child. The 1989 Act drew upon the spirit of a raft of legislation passed in the 1970s⁶³ and hardened it into a general principle that the welfare of the child is paramount in family proceedings.⁶⁴ The Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 required that in making financial orders the court must give 'first consideration' to the welfare of the child.⁶⁵ As such, the housing needs of the family are generally considered through this lens.⁶⁶

The legislation in this area has also created a debate as to precisely what is meant by the child's 'welfare' in this context. For the trusts lawyer it is rare that children are ever mentioned, because in trusts law cases the focus is on contributions directly to the purchase price of property or, exceptionally, to general family expenses: it is very rare that a child would ever make such a contribution. In consequence, trusts law and property law would not consider the needs of the child. Property law is concerned to vindicate the rights of adults in the property. It is only in a needs-based system of family law that the place of the children is taken into account in allocating rights in law.⁶⁷ Exceptionally, statute has introduced the possibility that the existence of children may be considered in property law claims to do with the sale of property⁶⁸ – but subject always to the rights of any creditors of the property.⁶⁹ It is suggested that, but for that statute, property law would pay children no heed.⁷⁰

61 Hohfeld, 1919; see para 31.2.2.

62 CA 1989, s 1.

63 Matrimonial Causes Act 1983; Domestic Violence and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1976; Adoption Act 1976; Domestic Proceedings and Magistrates' Courts Act 1978; Matrimonial and Family Proceedings Act 1984.

64 Except in relation to applications for leave to apply under CA 1989, s 8: Re A and W (Minors) (Residence Order: Leave to Apply) [1992] Fam 182, CA; K v H (Child Maintenance) [1993] 2 FLR 61.

65 Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, s 25(1); Waterman v Waterman [1989] 1 FLR 380.

66 M v B (Ancillary Proceedings: Lump Sum) [1998] 1 FLR 53, CA.

67 Ie, rights to use or occupy property under statute.

68 TLATA 1996, s 14, considered at para 16.2.9 above.

69 Whether creditors in a bankruptcy (Re Citro [1991] Ch 142) or mortgagees protecting their security (Lloyds Bank v Byrne (1991) 23 HLR 472; [1993] 1 FLR 369).

70 See, eg, Re Citro [1991] Ch 142.

The impact of the 1989 Act is therefore to require family courts to consider the place of children and their needs. In the FLA 1996, the court is required, when making ouster orders,⁷¹ to make an order which ensures that there is no ‘significant harm’ suffered by any child.⁷²

17.4.4 Cohabitants and married couples

One of the virtues of the law of trusts as considered in Chapter 15 might be said to be its blindness to whether the couples who claim rights are married or unmarried,⁷³ of different sexes or the same sex.⁷⁴ The law of trusts, however, is preoccupied with financial contributions made by the parties⁷⁵ over and above other, less material measurements of their intention.⁷⁶ It is family law which has prioritised the needs of the family and the most appropriate means of using (rather than owning) family property as its guiding principle. Its failing is a need in the public policy motivating legislation to attempt consciously to support the institution of marriage by providing rights only for married couples in many contexts: a trend which is evident in the case law.⁷⁷ In general terms the courts have not been willing to extend matrimonial rights to non-married couples.⁷⁸ This includes claims brought by mistresses of married people,⁷⁹ or by the business partners of married people.⁸⁰ The approach of the courts in relation to cohabitants has been to consider their various claims for rights in property to be a matter for contract⁸¹ or agreement⁸² between them. This is to be contrasted with the situation in which the rights of children or the rights of children to occupy property are involved.

In relation to married couples, the case law used to be reluctant to enforce contracts between the parties on the basis that marriage constituted the couple as one person in law.⁸³ Early suggestions of an alteration to this traditional understanding were set forth in landmark decisions such as *National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth*⁸⁴ and also Pettitt v Pettitt,⁸⁵ where it was suggested that spouses could create legally enforceable rights between themselves; as well as Williams & Glyn’s Bank v Boland,⁸⁶ in which a wife acquired a novel right of actual occupation distinct from her marriage to her husband.⁸⁷ Boland was heralded as 71 Considered in para 17.4.2 above.

72 FLA 1996, ss 62(2), 63.

73 Hammond v Mitchell [1991] 1 WLR 1127.

74 Wayling v Jones (1993) 69 P & CR 170; Tinsley v Milligan [1993] 3 All ER 65.

75 Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1990] 1 All ER 1111.

76 Except in the family assets cases like Midland Bank v Cooke [1995] 4 All ER 562.

77 Windeler v Whitehall [1990] FLR 505, per Millett J.

78 Ibid; Mossop v Mossop [1989] Fam 77.

79 Dennis v MacDonald [1981] 1 WLR 810, 814, per Purchas J.

80 Harwood v Harwood [1991] 2 FLR 274: husband’s business partner claims rights in the matrimonial home.

81 For rights to be created under contract, the statutory requirements of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, s 2(1) would have to be satisfied. A formally ineffective contract would have no effect: Hemmens v Wilson Browne [1994] 2 FLR 101; United Bank of Kuwait plc v Sahib [1997] Ch 107, per Chadwick J; Pitt v PHH Asset Management Ltd [1993] 4 All ER 961, CA. Although see now Yaxley v Gotts [2000] 1 All ER 711, in which proprietary estoppel was used to avoid the provisions of the 1989 Act.

82 In the forms considered in Chapter 15 as to common intention and so forth.

83 Hyman v Hyman [1929] AC 601; Sutton v Sutton (1984).

84 [1965] AC 1175.

85 [1970] AC 777.

86 [1981] AC 487.

87 See also Tanner v Tanner [1975] 1 WLR 1346; Layton v Martin [1986] 2 FLR 227.

a progressive decision precisely because it enlarged the rights of a spouse who had some equitable interest in the matrimonial home – and consequently merely a minor interest protected only if registered as such – to the status of an overriding interest due to the further fact that Mrs Boland was also in actual occupation of the matrimonial home. Previously, it had been doubted whether or not spouses could create such rights inter se and, furthermore, use such rights to bind third parties, such as mortgagees.

17.5 SOCIAL JUSTICE AND RIGHTS IN THE HOME

This section takes a different approach to the means by which rights to occupy or to ‘own’ the home may be acquired. It considers both a theory of social justice and its potential application to this topic, as well as a factual example of the manner in which different legal categories might have different impacts on these problems.

17.5.1 Social justice and the legal treatment of the home

A viable concept of social justice

‘Social justice’ is a term so commonly used by political scientists, politicians, and even philosophers that its very ubiquity would seem to suggest that it is a term without content: an empty vessel. It is argued that such a suggestion would be mistaken. This section will adopt the definitions of that term considered by Miller⁸⁸ to highlight the philosophical differences between the norms exacted by three different sub-systems of law: English property law, English family law, and the Canadian law of unjust enrichment.

As considered in Chapter 1, the term ‘justice’ has been the subject of complex philosophical debate since the time of Aristotle. ‘Social justice’ more particularly relates to the applications of these theories of justice to social goods beyond simply claims between individuals. In Miller’s analysis the forms of social justice can be divided into two: conservative and ideal. First, conservative social justice seeks to apply principles of justice so as to preserve a status quo: such justice may, for example, seek restitution to vindicate the property rights of some person so that the pre-existing division of property rights is maintained.⁸⁹ Secondly, ideal social justice seeks to change existing social conditions in line with some political ideology – the particular ideology need not matter for that categorisation.⁹⁰ This marks out two political philosophies: the radical and the conservative.

Beyond that initial delineation it is said that social justice operates on one or more of the following three bases: rights, deserts, or needs. Social justice based on rights is orientated around the vindication of some recognised entitlement to property.⁹¹ Social justice based on deserts allocates goods to a person because that person is said to be deserving on account of her talents, her social position, or in recompense for some previous action. Social justice based on needs measures neither a pre-existing entitlement nor a deserving case, but rather 88 Miller, 1976.

89 Such as in Foskett v McKeown [2000] 3 All ER 97.

90 This is primarily a radical political agenda, but may also be reflected in doctrines like proprietary estoppel which frequently create rights which had never existed before.

91 There is insufficient space here to consider the ways in which ‘rights’ may come into existence philosophically – the reader is referred to the discussion of human rights law above.

identifies a category of person who requires a transfer of goods to her so that her lack of such goods can be alleviated. It would be possible to imagine situations in which a person's needs might give rise to a right under a particular legal system,⁹² or where we might argue that to have a right to something means that you are deserving of it under a positivist system of law.

An example of this model in action

The example which Miller gives to tease apart the three forms of social justice⁹³ relates to two boys who agree to clean my windows on the basis that I will pay them £1 each for the work. I notice that one boy works diligently and performs an excellent job, whereas the other boy is slovenly and cleans the windows poorly. I have the following dilemma: do I pay the boys equally for their unequal work? A rights theory would require me to pay them according to our agreement: that is, a contract which entitles each to be paid £1 and which creates common law rights for each boy. A deserts theory might suggest that I pay £1.25 to the diligent child and only £0.75 to the slovenly child, on the basis that the diligent boy's personal characteristics and hard work mean that he deserves to receive more than the lazy boy. Alternatively, it might require me to reward the diligent boy with an extra £0.25 and to respect the lazy boy's rights to receive his £1. A needs theory may make me take into account the possibility that one boy is from a rich home whereas the other is from a poor home – perhaps this would prevent me from refusing to pay the slovenly boy less than I owed him under our contract if he was poor and his apparent slovenliness caused by malnourishment. Alternatively, a needs thesis might encourage me to withhold the money from the lazy boy if he was rich and did not need the full £1, so that some of that money could be redistributed to a diligent, poor boy.

Rights, deserts and needs in distinct approaches to trusts of homes

If we consider the manner in which English law deals with the home against these models we will see that there are different concepts of justice at play. English property law provides that on relationship breakdown only a person who has contributed to the purchase price of the property is entitled to take property rights in it.⁹⁴ This is a rights-based conception of a just conclusion which awards rights in property solely on the basis of some recognised legal entitlement. So it is that the purchase price resulting trust recognises a right as arising from the payment of money: it is this right which gives rise to an equitable interest in property, but it is blind to any question of the needs of the parties.⁹⁵ This attitude is similar to contract law which enforces my obligation to the other contracting party on the basis of our freely created contract. It is value-neutral (except to the extent that it supports commercial morality by requiring that a contract once made is inviolate).

The Australian unconscionability approach is founded on concepts from commercial partnership law. In Muschinski v Dodds,⁹⁶ the analogy developed by Deane J was that those rules 92 As evidenced in housing law or the family proceedings considered above.

93 Miller, 1976, 28. See Hudson, 2004:3 for a full analysis of these issues.

94 Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1991] 1 AC 107.

95 Tinsley v Milligan [1994] 1 AC 340.

96 (1985) 160 CLR 583.

‘applicable to regulate the rights and duties of the parties to a failed partnership or joint venture’ ought to be incorporated into a case in which two people had brought severally their money and their brawn to the development of a piece of land on which they intended to live together until their relationship failed.⁹⁷ This is also a rights-based conception of a just conclusion which awards rights in property solely on the basis of some recognised pre-existing entitlement. What is concealed is the court’s value judgment in preferring expressed, contractarian models to any other. So it is that the purchase price resulting trust recognises a right as arising from the payment of money: it is this right which gives rise to an equitable interest in property but it is blind to any question of the needs of the parties.⁹⁸ This attitude, as mentioned above, is similar to contract law in that it is ostensibly value-neutral – but that seems to deny the possibility either that the arrangement was formed on the basis of inequality of bargaining power, or that the parties’ circumstances altered significantly subsequently.

Canadian unjust enrichment law takes a more creative approach to rights in the home, by finding that property rights come into existence when a person participates in a relationship such that the other party receives valuable services, albeit not payments in cash. This is an approach based on deserts – to contribute to a relationship over a period of time means that the individual acquires some claim to just treatment by way of a transfer of some right in that property.⁹⁹ Similarly, the approach taken by Waite LJ in Midland Bank v Cooke,¹⁰⁰ in recognition of a wife’s contribution to a marriage, accepts that she deserves some right in the property sufficient to defeat the claim of a mortgagee to take possession of that property from her. It could be said that proprietary estoppel is similarly based on deserts.¹⁰¹ When a right to the fee simple in property is awarded to a claimant who has been promised that she will receive the property in its owner’s will, it could be said that she deserved that transfer of title in the light of her acts to her detriment in reliance on the promise made to her.¹⁰² One exceptional decision under the doctrine of proprietary estoppel which is based on needs is that of Baker v Baker.¹⁰³ In that case, whereas the court could have decided to award an elderly man merely a proprietary right in a house which he shared with relatives and which he had helped to purchase, the court instead decided to make him an order for an amount of money which would satisfy his need to pay for sheltered accommodation in his declining years. Simply to have recognised that he deserved a proprietary right would not have met his more immediate need to pay for nursing home care.

English family law takes different approaches. The CA 1989 places the welfare of the child as the paramount consideration – in consequence, the legislation takes a needs approach

97 Ibid, 618.

98 Tinsley v Milligan [1994] 1 AC 340.

99 Peter v Beblow (1993) 101 DLR (4th) 621.

100 [1995] 4 All ER 562.

101 It might well be considered that the use of the term ‘deserve’ here supposes that a beneficent, mostly male judiciary would be handing out gifts of interest in the home as though rewards to female claimants. That is not the sense of ‘desert’ which Miller, or I, intend. There is, I do not deny, always the problem that when one talks of a ‘deserving’ claimant that necessarily opens the door to unfortunate value judgments. All cases involving rights in the home already do involve value judgments, but we tend to try to keep them concealed behind a cloak of technicalities, doctrines and legal principles like the common intention constructive trust, proprietary estoppel and so forth. Such value judgments should be made express so that they can be criticised and/or developed: Hudson, 2004:2.

102 Re Basham [1986] 1 WLR 1498.

103 (1993) 25 HLR 408.

to a just conclusion. The child will not have contributed to the purchase price, neither will it necessarily have formed an integral part of the family unit for long enough to deserve property rights (or even occupation rights). Similarly, the Inheritance (Provision for Family and Dependents) Act 1975 provides a power for the court to rewrite a will either on grounds of some overlooked proprietary right, or on grounds of need – an alternative choice of rights and needs respectively.

Property law is directed at the recognition of pre-existing rights. Purely remedial, equitable doctrines such as proprietary estoppel are concerned to ensure both good conscience, and also that someone who has suffered detriment receives her just deserts or that her needs are met. Family law, housing law and social security law are concerned to meet the needs of applicants.¹⁰⁴ Within these subtly different approaches to social justice are the true differences between these various aspects of the English law treatment of the home.

17.5.2 Understanding the difficulties with relationship breakdown

It is one thing to allocate rights in property; it is another to break up a family.¹⁰⁵ However, in the termination of most familial relationships disputes about the two contexts overlap.

Suppose the following situation. A married couple have acquired a house as joint tenants both at law and in equity of the fee simple. Suppose that the husband has decided to leave his wife, and so is trying to borrow as much money as possible before fleeing the jurisdiction by taking out a mortgage and forging his wife's signature on the agreement. The husband then seeks to acquire a mortgage over the property without getting the agreement of his wife. If the husband enters into a fraudulent transaction, that will sever the joint tenancy between husband and wife.¹⁰⁶ However, the rights of the mortgagee will bite on the husband's severed half share in the equitable interest in the house.¹⁰⁷ Therefore, the mortgagee would be entitled to seek an order for the sale of the property and so realise its security to the extent of the husband's half interest in the property.¹⁰⁸ Unless the wife were able to assume her husband's obligations under the mortgage (although she would not have received the capital with which her husband had absconded), she would be required to sell the property and find somewhere else to live with only half (in this example) of the total value of the house which was her home before her husband's fraudulent activities.¹⁰⁹

The preceding analysis is based on a property law rule. If the same situation were addressed as a question of divorce law before the husband had sought to defraud the mortgage company and desert his wife, she might have a claim to remain in the property (particularly if there were children).¹¹⁰ The difference is clearly the intercession of the mortgage company

104 Although it could be argued that with the possibility of losing entitlement to Job Seeker's Allowance on grounds of failure to attend interviews, such social security provision is now based on a weak form of right which stems from attendance at interviews and not simply from an assessment of needs.

105 See in particular Dewar, 1998.

106 First National Security v Hegerty [1985] QB 850.

107 Ibid; Ahmed v Kendrick (1988) 56 P & CR 120.

108 Lloyds Bank v Byrne (1991) 23 HLR 472; [1993] 1 FLR 369.

109 Her strongest line of defence would be under Barclays Bank v O'Brien [1993] 3 WLR 786; Barclays Bank v Thomson [1997] 4 All ER 816 on grounds of undue influence or, on these facts, misrepresentation in any agreement to the terms of the mortgage.

110 FLA 1996, s 30; CA 1989, s 1.

asserting the rights of a third party. It is an essential truth of English law that all rules are different where one party goes into bankruptcy: the rights of creditors will always fall to be considered,¹¹¹ and under English law they will always be protected.¹¹² The only exceptions to this rule would be those circumstances in which the rights of the creditor are deemed to have been subjugated to the rights of some other person in equity¹¹³ or on grounds of fraud.¹¹⁴

Clearly there are difficulties in deciding between rights in property and the justice to be allocated between family members other than simply by recognition of pre-existing property rights. This is a tension which has expressed itself in a number of cases; as with *Davis v Johnson*¹¹⁵ considering the Domestic Violence and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1976 and holding that a court can oust a property owner from his home on grounds of domestic violence. Previously the courts had considered that a property owner could not be removed from the property. In other words, it had been said that morality could not override a person's property rights.¹¹⁶ Similarly the court in *Dart v Dart*¹¹⁷ considered s 25 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 in relation to the courts' approach to the redistribution of property rights between spouses in divorce. In that case the specific context was domestic violence, which placed the court in a difficult position between the need to protect a person from domestic violence and the concomitant need to protect another person's pre-existing property rights.

The decision in *Peffer v Rigg*¹¹⁸ demonstrates the conflict between providing for certainty on the one hand and providing a just result on the other.¹¹⁹ In that case, Mr Peffer and Mr Rigg had married two sisters. The question arose which of these couples should care for the sisters' mother. It was decided between both families, after some negotiation, that the husbands would buy a home for their mother-in-law, although only Rigg's name appeared on the legal title. All of the parties were aware that Rigg and Peffer had contributed equivalent amounts to the purchase price, and therefore that each had equivalent rights in the property. Each therefore had minor interests in the property as a result, but neither registered their interests. When the Riggs divorced subsequently, they purported as part of their divorce settlement to transfer the entire freehold interest to Mrs Rigg and to ignore Peffer's rights. The Riggs argued that Peffer had no rights because he had failed to register them. However, Graham J held that it would be unconscionable for Mrs Rigg to deny Mr Peffer's rights, and therefore that Mrs Rigg (by then in possession of the entire legal title) held the property on constructive trust for Peffer and herself as beneficiaries. This case contrasts significantly with the unregistered land case of Midland Bank v Green,¹²⁰ in which a father had granted his son a right to buy a farm from him at a price which subsequently appeared to be a good

111 TLATA 1996, s 15(1)(d): 'The matters to which the court is to have regard in determining an application for an order under section 14 include . . . (d) the interests of any secured creditor of any beneficiary.'

112 Lloyds Bank v Byrne (1991) 23 HLR 472, [1993] 1 FLR 369. Albeit that those rights may be actionable only against the share of one party in some cases: First National Security v Hegerty [1985] QB 850.

113 Thames Guaranty v Campbell [1985] QB 210; Abbey National v Moss [1994] 1 FLR 307.

114 Ahmed v Kendrick (1988) 56 P & CR 120; Penn v Bristol & West Building Society [1995] 2 FLR 938.

115 [1979] AC 264.

116 Cooke and Hayton, 2000, 433.

117 [1996] 2 FLR 286.

118 [1977] 1 WLR 285.

119 See also Prudential Assurance Co v London Residuary Body [1992] 2 AC 388, [1992] 3 All ER 504. Cf Midland Bank Trust Co v Green [1981] AC 513, where failure to register precluded enforcement of similar rights despite prima facie unconscionability on the part of the defendants.

120 [1981] AC 513.

one. This right to buy was an estate contract and could be protected against third parties only if it were registered as a land charge. The son failed to register his right. The father sought to renege on this right by selling the land at an under-value to his son's mother. The mother also had actual knowledge of the right to buy. Whereas the son argued that his parents' actions had been unconscionable, the House of Lords held that the son had not registered his right and therefore that it was not protected against the sale at an under-value to the mother. In Peffer v Rigg, the approach is very much in line with traditional equitable thinking, whereas Midland Bank v Green is predicated on land law policy.

What must not be allowed to happen is that the concepts of equity are used as though some covert feint to provide an answer to a problem, as in Peffer v Rigg where otherwise Peffer would have suffered the loss of his rights due to the formal requirements of statute. Rather, equitable concepts should be accepted as being simply discretionary and applied so as to achieve just results – not as some dodge in a technical game.¹²¹ The difficulty is in attempting to avoid a common law rule while also obfuscating the equitable principle. It would be better for the courts to acknowledge that, in general terms, they are concerned to do justice on the facts of individual cases and not that the certainty of the general law is being called into question.¹²²

The role of children was considered above in relation to family proceedings: but the rights of children are not considered in property law disputes. What is significant is that the perception which the British polity has of a 'property-owning democracy' is in truth a 'democracy-owning-property-through-mortgages',¹²³ in which the reality as perceived by the citizen frequently differs markedly from the reality as exercised through law. The law of property is not the only means of allocating rights in property: there are housing law, social security law (especially housing benefit), family law, equity (especially proprietary estoppel and the availability of injunctions), trusts law and human rights law to be considered too. It is suggested that equity is sufficiently flexible to absorb principles from these other legal fields and to relax its automatic affection for the protection of private property rights. Equity ought not to harden its own principles so that they become just another part of the technical posturing that makes up much commercial litigation.¹²⁴

121 This form of 'covert equity' is evident in Barclays Bank v O'Brien [1994] 1 AC 180 and Bruton v Quadrant Housing Trust [2000] 1 AC 406.

122 In relation to Bruton v Quadrant Housing Trust [2000] 1 AC 406, which found the existence of a lease even though the purported lessor had no interest in the demised property, Hayton and Cooke have said: 'Yes of course we have benefited from reminders in recent years that a lease is primarily contractual but to suggest that a lease might be purely contractual with no need for an estate in land is completely novel': Cooke and Hayton, 2000, 437, thus illustrating the danger of seeking a particular result while using doctrinally difficult methods so to do.

123 To borrow from Lord Diplock in Pettitt v Pettitt [1970] AC 777.

124 See, generally, Chapter 21 on this tendency.

This page intentionally left blank

Part 6

Breach of trust and related equitable claims

This page intentionally left blank

Breach of trust

18.1	INTRODUCTION	854
18.1.1	The liability of trustees within the context of breach of trust more generally 854
18.1.2	The nature of liability for breach of trust 855
18.1.3	What constitutes a breach of trust 856
18.2	THE BASIS OF LIABILITY FOR BREACH OF TRUST	856
18.2.1	The development of liability for breach of trust 857
18.2.2	The modern law on breach of trust: Target Holdings v Redferns 858
18.2.3	Loss as a foundation for the claim 860
18.2.4	Allocating liability for breach of trust among a number of trustees 862
18.3	REMEDIES FOR BREACH OF TRUST	865
18.3.1	The remedies for breach of trust in outline 865
18.3.2	Specific restitution of the trust property 865
18.3.3	Equitable compensation to restore the value of the trust fund 867
18.3.4	Equitable compensation for losses to the trust in general 868
18.3.5	A comparison of common law damages and equitable compensation 873
18.3.6	Valuation of the loss to the trust 875
18.3.7	Some reservations about Target Holdings v Redferns 877
18.3.8	The claim for breach of trust after termination of the trust 878
18.3.9	Breach of trust in relation to investment of the trust fund 880
18.4	DEFENCES TO LIABILITY FOR BREACH OF TRUST	880
18.4.1	Lack of a causal link between breach and loss 880
18.4.2	Breach committed by another trustee 880
18.4.3	Failure by the beneficiary to alleviate loss 881
18.4.4	Release 881
18.4.5	Trustee exemption clause 881
18.4.6	Excuses for breach of trust 882
18.4.7	Action not in connection with fiduciary duties, or action permitted by the terms of the trust 883
18.4.8	Concurrence by a beneficiary in a breach of trust 884
18.4.9	Change of position 884

18.5 ALLOCATING CLAIMS

885

- 18.5.1 Choice between remedies 885
- 18.5.2 Allocation of liability between defendants 885
- 18.5.3 Limitation period 886

OVERVIEW

A trustee will be liable for breach of trust if that breach of trust causes a loss to the beneficiaries. Such a trustee will be liable in the event of a breach of trust either, in the first place, to restore the trust property which was passed away in breach of trust; or if that is not possible to reconstitute the value of the trust fund in cash to its level before the breach of trust, or to pay equitable compensation to the beneficiaries.¹ There is an important distinction to be made here between proprietary liability and personal liability.

Proprietary claims will be considered in relation to specific restitution and to tracing in Chapter 19, whereas personal liability claims are considered in this chapter in relation to compensation,² dishonest assistance³ and knowing receipt.⁴ Issues relating to the liability of fiduciaries in respect of making authorised profits from the trust were considered in Chapter 12.

A trustee will be liable in the situation in which the breach of trust has caused some loss to the trust.⁵ There will be no liability in respect of a breach of trust where that breach resulted in no loss to the trust.⁶ The measurement of compensation will be the actual, demonstrable loss to the trust, rather than some intermediate value of the property lost to the trust.⁷

18.1 INTRODUCTION18.1.1 The liability of trustees within the context of breach of trust more generally

In this book so far we have considered the means by which express private trusts and trusts implied by law are created and administered. In this Part, the emphasis changes to those situations in which trusts are breached, such that the beneficiaries may seek to bring claims either to recover the original trust property or to recover its equivalent value in cash from the trustees and others. This chapter will focus first on the liability of those who are identified as express trustees. The reader is referred back to the general discussion of the duties of trustees in Part 3 above: those three chapters set out the general obligations of trustees which, if breached, would make a trustee liable for breach of trust.

1 Nocton v Lord Ashburn [1914] AC 932; Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421, [1995] 3 WLR 352, [1995] 3 All ER 785.

2 See section 18.5 below.

3 See paras 12.9.3 above and 18.4.3 below.

4 See paras 12.9.2 above and 18.4.4 below.

5 Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421.

6 Ibid.

7 Ibid.

While the discussion of ‘breach of trust’ in most trusts law textbooks usually refers only to the liability of the trustees themselves for breach of trust, it is important to bear in mind that there are other claims which are of significance to beneficiaries when there has been a breach of trust, such as tracing rights in trust property into substitute property, imposing personal liability to account on people who have received property unconscionably and knowing of the breach of trust, and on people who have dishonestly assisted in that breach of trust. All of these claims are collected into subsequent chapters of this Part 6 of this book. In this chapter we will consider the liability of trustees for any loss suffered by the beneficiaries as a result of a breach of trust. Tracing will be explained in Chapter 19 as being the process by which a beneficiary can claim title either to the original property or to a substitute for that original property⁸ in the hands of another person. Unconscionable receipt and dishonest assistance are discussed in Chapter 20, giving rise to a personal liability to account as a constructive trustee for any loss suffered by the trust if the defendant has either received the trust property knowing of the breach of trust⁹ or if she has assisted in that breach of trust.¹⁰ This form of liability is also in addition to any liability to account for any profits made out of a breach of trust¹¹ by holding those profits on constructive trust for the beneficiaries of the trust,¹² as was considered in Chapter 12.¹³ Together, all of these claims constitute the potential scope of liability for breach of trust available to beneficiaries.

In this chapter, then, we will consider the context of the liability of the trustees for breach of trust: namely, in what circumstances will a breach arise, and what forms of claim may flow from that?

18.1.2 The nature of liability for breach of trust

The trustees will be liable for any loss caused by a breach of trust. No dishonesty, negligence or other mens rea is required to fix a trustee with liability for breach of trust. Rather, for there to be a breach of trust, it is enough that there has been a breach of the terms of the trust or a breach of one of the duties of trustees discussed in Chapters 8 and 9. Where the breach of trust has caused property to pass out of the trust fund then the trustee’s principal obligation is to recover that property and to restore it to the trust fund. (This is referred to here as ‘specific restitution’.) If that property cannot be recovered, or if the trustee has caused some loss to the trust other than transferring away trust property, then the trustees’ liability is to reconstitute the value of the trust fund in cash and to pay equitable compensation for any consequent loss. These principles are clearly established by the decision of the House of Lords in Target Holdings v Redfern. The key development in this area of the law of trusts established by that case is the requirement that the trustees’ breach of trust must have, in some way, caused the beneficiaries’ loss. The purpose of remedies for breach of trust is to compensate the beneficiaries for any loss to the value of the trust fund and to protect the integrity of the trust fund.

8 Eg, the sale proceeds of the original property taken in breach of trust.

9 Re Montagu [1987] Ch 264.

10 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378.

11 Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46.

12 Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324, [1993] 3 WLR 1143.

13 Section 12.5 above.

18.1.3 What constitutes a breach of trust

Lord Browne-Wilkinson held that:

The basic right of a beneficiary is to have the trust duly administered in accordance with the provisions of the trust instrument, if any, and the general law.¹⁴

Therefore, the most obvious example of a breach of trust would be a breach of the terms of the trust instrument¹⁵ or a breach of any obligation imposed on trustees under the general law of trusts. Breaches of trust can take many forms, as Millett LJ made in clear in the following passage from his judgment in Armitage v Nurse:¹⁶

Breaches of trust are of many different kinds. A breach of trust may be deliberate or inadvertent; it may consist of an actual misappropriation or misapplication of the trust property or merely an investment or other dealing which is outside the trustees' powers; it may consist of a failure to carry out a positive obligation of the trustees or merely of a want of skill and care on their part in the management of the trust property; it may be injurious to the interests of the beneficiaries or be actually to their benefit.

Thus a breach of trust will encompass any failure by the trustees to comply with the obligations which are set out in the trust instrument itself,¹⁷ or which are set out in the Trustee Act 2000 if applicable, or which arise under the case law: all of these obligations were discussed in detail in Chapters 8 and 9 of this book. All that is required is the fact of the trustee having committed a breach of trust which causes loss to the trust:¹⁸ there is nothing equivalent to mens rea by which to attach liability to a trustee. The various forms of liability, remedies and defences are considered in detail in this chapter.

18.2 THE BASIS OF LIABILITY FOR BREACH OF TRUST

*A trustee will be liable for breach of trust if that breach of trust causes a loss to the beneficiaries. Such a trustee will be liable in the event of a breach of trust to restore the very trust property which was passed away in breach of trust, or to provide value equivalent to the value of any property passed away in breach of trust, or to pay equitable compensation to the beneficiaries.*¹⁹ There is an important distinction to be made here between proprietary liability and personal liability.

A trustee will be liable in the situation in which the breach of trust has caused some loss to the trust. There will be no liability in respect of a breach of trust where that breach resulted in no loss to the trust. The measurement of compensation will be the

14 Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421, 434.

15 Clough v Bond (1838) My & Cr 490, (1838) 8 LJ Ch 51, (1838) 40 ER 1016.

16 [1998] Ch 241, 251.

17 Clough v Bond (1838) My & Cr 490.

18 Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421.

19 Ibid.

*actual, demonstrable loss to the trust, rather than some intermediate value of the property lost to the trust.*²⁰

This section focuses on the leading case in relation to claims for breach of trust, Target Holdings v Redferns,²¹ and two issues specifically: first, in what circumstances a loss can be remedied by a claim based on breach of trust; and, secondly, how should the loss be valued?

18.2.1 The development of liability for breach of trust

As was considered in detail in Chapter 8, the trustee owes a range of obligations under general trusts law to the beneficiaries beyond any obligations which may be included in any particular trust instrument. So, a breach of trust may arise either on the basis of a breach of an express term of the trust instrument or a breach of an obligation contained in the general law of trusts.

The trustee's principal duty is said to be to account to the trustees both in the sense of providing accounts as to the contents of the trust fund from time to time and also in the sense of justifying their actions to the beneficiaries. So, as Lord Millett explained this matter when writing an article:²²

The primary obligation of a trustee is to account for his stewardship [of the trust]. The primary remedy of the beneficiary . . . is to have the account taken, to surcharge and falsify the account, and to require the trustee to restore to the trust estate any deficiency which may appear when the account is taken.

Therefore, the trustee must account to the beneficiaries and the beneficiaries are entitled to recover any loss caused by a breach of the trustees' duties.

The traditional approaches to breach of trust differed in significant ways from the modern approach set out by the House of Lords in Target Holdings v Redferns. The modern approach requires that the beneficiaries have suffered a loss and there must have been a causal link between the loss suffered and the trustees' actions. The older approach took a strict deterrent policy in relation to the trustees' liability for breach of trust²³ by making the trustee strictly liable for any loss which resulted from a breach of trust.²⁴ So, if the trustee made a distribution out of the trust property to a person whom she considered to be entitled to receive that property on the basis of forged documentation or a forged marriage licence, then she would nevertheless be held liable for breach of trust.²⁵ The trustee was typically responsible not for the replacement of the specific property but for an equivalent amount by way of compensation.²⁶ So, in Re Massingberd's Settlement, it was held that where the trustee had made unauthorised investments in breach of trust, he was required to procure authorised investments within the terms of the trust and to make good the loss suffered by the trust from

20 Ibid.

21 Ibid.

22 Millett, 1998.

23 Hayton, 1995, 845.

24 Clough v Bond (1838) 3 My & Cr 490, (1838) 8 LJ Ch 51, (1838) 2 Jur 958.

25 Ashby v Blackwell (1765) Eden 299; Eaves v Hickson (1861) 30 Beav 136. Cf Re Smith (1902) 71 LJ Ch 411.

26 Re Massingberd's Settlement (1890) 63 LT 296. See also Knott v Cottee (1852) 16 Beav 77.

that transaction by reconstituting the trust fund with those authorised investments. Equally, the trustees may be liable for breach of trust in failing to sell the property in sufficient time to make a profit.²⁷ Notably, it is still not required that the trustee has made any personal profit from the breach of trust to be liable for breach of trust.²⁸

The principal duty imposed on the defaulting trustee is one of effecting restitution of the breach of trust.²⁹ This use of the term ‘restitution’ in this context means simply the restoration of property or its equivalent cash value to its original owner,³⁰ and not necessarily reversal of an unjust enrichment. The focus here is on compensating the beneficiaries for any loss and on protecting their property rights. This obligation is not limited by common law principles of remoteness of damage.

18.2.2 The modern law on breach of trust: Target Holdings v Redferns

The leading decision in this area is that of the House of Lords in Target Holdings v Redferns,³¹ and it is from this case that the core test is drawn.

Target were seeking to enter into an investment with people who subsequently turned out to be fraudsters. As part of the transaction, Target wanted a mortgage over a piece of land (referred to as ‘the Property’ from here onwards). To achieve this, they required a valuation of the Property and the legal services of Redferns, a firm of solicitors, to ensure that they would acquire a valid legal charge over the Property. The borrowers were fraudsters. They acquired a fraudulently high valuation over the property which was being put up as security under the mortgage agreement. This over-valuation convinced Target that their loan would be adequately secured. When the fraudsters absconded with the loan moneys, Target found out that the Property was not worth as much as they had been told. As the fraudsters could not be found, Target was required to find someone else to sue.

Target had paid the loan moneys necessary to acquire the mortgage interest to Redferns, the solicitors. The agreement was that the solicitors were to hold the money as trustees on trust in their client account, to be paid out if the security was acquired or to be returned to Target if it was not. Redferns were not a party to the fraudulent valuation. In breach of the trust, however, the solicitors paid the trust fund away in breach of trust in ways not permitted for them to do under the terms of the transaction, principally by advancing money to the borrower before the mortgage security had been created, and also to defray other personal expenses of their solicitors’ firm. These breaches of trust were wholly unconnected to the fraudulent valuation of the Property. In time, however, the solicitors paid enough money back into their client account to pay for the acquisition of the mortgage security. This payment was made and Target therefore acquired the mortgage security which they had sought from the outset. However, it was when Target attempted to enforce their security

27 Fry v Fry (1859) 27 Beav 144.

28 Dornford v Dornford (1806) 12 Ves 127, 129; Adair v Shaw (1803) Sch & Lef 243, 272; Lord Mountford v Lord Cadogan (1810) 17 Ves 485.

29 Re Dawson [1966] 2 NSW 211; Bartlett v Barclays Trust Co Ltd [1980] Ch 515; Bank of New Zealand v New Zealand Guardian Trust Co Ltd [1999] 1 NZLR 664.

30 Swindle v Harrison [1997] 4 All ER 705.

31 [1996] 1 AC 421.

later, when the underlying commercial transaction broke down, that Target realised that they had been given a fraudulently high valuation over the Property.

Consequently, Target began to search for someone they could sue to recover the loss they had made on the transaction. It is important to remember that the loss suffered by Target was the difference between the real value of the Property and the fraudulently high valuation of the Property which Target had been given when creating their mortgage security. Given that the parties to the transaction were not able to make good Target's loss, Target was forced to sue the first solvent person who came within their reach. Therefore, Target sought to sue Redferns, the solicitors, for breach of their trust obligations in respect of the money held in the client account.

Target's arguments fell into two parts: first, that Target were entitled at the date of the trial to have the trust fund restored on a restitutionary basis; and, secondly, that immediately after the moneys had been paid away by Redferns in breach of trust there had been an immediate loss to the trust fund which Redferns were required to make good.

It is important to consider these arguments one at a time. The first line of argument would have obliged the trustees to restore the trust fund. The trust fund was made up of the money provided by Target to acquire the mortgage security. Target sought restitution of that fund from Redferns, because it was Redferns who had paid away the property that had formerly been in the trust fund in breach of that express trust. This argument proceeded on the basis that there was a strict liability for a trustee to restore a trust fund in any circumstances in which there had been a misapplication of such property in breach of trust. This raised the second line of argument, under which Target maintained that there was a loss to the trust at the very moment Redferns made the payment of the money away in breach of trust.

Redferns counter-argued that while there had been a breach of trust, the money was restored to the trust fund before Redferns were required to acquire the mortgage security. Target's argument on this form of strict liability was therefore being made irrespective of the fact that Redferns had made good the money taken from the client account before the date of creating the mortgage. Target were in effect not asking for the restoration of the trust fund, but a payment equal to the loss suffered as a result of the Property not being worth the value represented by the fraudulent valuation.

Lord Browne-Wilkinson took the view, to cut a long story short, that the loss suffered by Target had therefore been caused by the fraudulent valuation of the Property and not by Redferns' breach of trust. The breach of trust had been remedied by Redferns acquiring the mortgage security which Target had required from them. Redferns had provided the service which Target had required originally. The loss arose from different circumstances: to wit, the fraud of other people. Therefore, Target would not be entitled to claim compensation for breach of trust against Redferns in respect of the loss caused by the insufficiency of the value of the mortgage security.³² Having cut the long story short, however, it is important to probe the more detailed elements of the decision.

32 Target Holdings was applied in Cherney v Newman [2011] EWHC 2156 (Ch) by Henderson J in relation to a claim for breach of fiduciary duty in relation to a solicitor acting for its client in relation to property transactions: it was held that the solicitor bore no duties to advise his client as to the commercial aspects of this transaction and therefore that the loss had not flowed from any breach of duty.

18.2.3 Loss as a foundation for the claim

The requirement that there must have been a loss for liability for breach of trust

The underpinning rationale for the decision in *Target Holdings v Redferns*³³ is that there must be a loss suffered as a direct result of the breach of trust, or else there would be beneficiaries who might seek to ‘double up’ on their damages by suing on a breach of trust even if that technical breach of trust happened to benefit the beneficiaries. This development is contrary to the approach in the older cases which did not permit a trustee to plead some intervening act which allegedly caused the loss.³⁴ The example given by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in *Target Holdings v Redferns*³⁵ to illustrate the importance of requiring a causal link was to imagine a situation in which a trustee made unauthorised investments which then turned out to be profitable. The traditional strict liability approach to breach of trust favoured in the older authorities would mean that the beneficiaries would be entitled to sue even if the trust fund had increased in value as a result of something which was technically a breach of the terms of the trust. Suppose, for example, a trust instrument which empowers trustees to invest only in Betamax plc shares but suppose instead that the trustees bought Gotech plc shares, technically in breach of trust. The Gotech plc shares then doubled in value while the Betamax plc shares remained static. If the basis of liability were a strict liability, then the beneficiaries would be able to sue the trustees even though the Gotech plc shares generated a greater profit than the Betamax plc shares. The approach in Target Holdings v Redferns instead was that the beneficiaries could only sue for breach of trust if the trustees had caused a loss to the beneficiaries. However, the beneficiaries would be able to require that the trustees replace the Gotech plc shares with the authorised Betamax plc shares.³⁶

So, the question then is as to the rights which must be affected to found a claim for breach of trust. Lord Browne-Wilkinson considered the position which would arise in relation to a technical breach of trust by the trustee carried out with the consent of one beneficiary but not the other. His Lordship posed the question whether there could be liability in such circumstances on a strict liability basis even though there had been in fact no loss suffered by the beneficiary who had not consented to the breach. He held:³⁷

A carping beneficiary could insist that the unauthorised investment be sold and the proceeds invested in authorised investments: but the trustee would be under no liability to pay compensation either to the trust fund or to the beneficiary because the breach has caused no loss to the trust fund. Therefore, in each case the first question is to ask what are the rights of the beneficiary; only if some relevant right has been infringed so as to give rise to a loss is it necessary to consider the extent of the trustee’s liability to compensate for such loss.

33 Ibid.

34 Cf Kellaway v Johnson (1842) 5 Beav 319; Magnus v Queensland National Bank (1888) 37 Ch D 466; Re Brogden (1888) 38 Ch D 546.

35 [1996] 1 AC 421.

36 Re Massingberd’s Settlement (1890) 63 LT 296.

37 [1995] 3 All ER 785, 793.

Therefore, there must be a loss which flows directly from the breach of trust.³⁸ It is not enough that there is some breach of trust if no loss is actually suffered as a result of it. The sequence of events is also important. For there to have been a breach of trust, a trust must have been formed before the purported breach of duty took place.³⁹ So, if a financial institution breached its obligations to its customer before that money was settled on trust, then the breach of duty would not be a breach of trust, even if a trust was created later (without any further breach of duty taking place then).⁴⁰ The loss must also accrue to the claimant personally and not to some other person or company in which the claimant has an interest. So, where a claimant contended that shares were held on trust for him and that the company allegedly suffered a loss due to the defendant director's actions, it was held that the claimant had no action personally on the basis that the loss accrued to the company and not to the claimant personally: thus, a shareholder cannot recover compensation on her own account from a director of the company if the company in which she holds those shares has already recovered damages on its own account from that director in relation to that same loss.⁴¹

Difficulties with demonstrating loss in relation to investment of a trust

In relation to the investment of a trust fund, it may be difficult to prove that there has been a loss caused to the trust if the trustees have kept the capital value of the trust broadly steady but if they have nevertheless failed to generate any profit on that trust fund or if the capital value of the fund has fallen in real terms.⁴² For example, in Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc (No 2),⁴³ the bank had acted as trustee of a will trust for 60 years. The plaintiff contended that the bank had generated a rate of return on the trust property which was lower than comparable investment indices. The bank demonstrated that it had acted prudently and in accordance with investment market practice throughout the period of its trusteeship. In consequence, it was not possible to demonstrate that the plaintiff had suffered any particular level of loss, nor that the trustee had breached its fiduciary duties in general terms. In that case, then, it could not be demonstrated that there had been a loss. It was also difficult to 38 The beneficiary must be able to prove loss. So, in Jeffrey v Gretton [2011] WTLR 809 a beneficiary under a trust over a dilapidated house claimed that she had not been fully informed about a deed of variation in relation to the trust and she claimed further that a sale of the house had been delayed so as to allow another beneficiary to live there and so as to cause her loss. It was found that her claim was not proved: she had been informed sufficiently about the deed; the sale had been delayed while the house was refurbished; and another beneficiary had not been in regular occupation of the property. Oddly, the court only relied upon Jaffray v Marshall and not Target Holdings v Redferns.

39 Re BA Peters plc, Moriarty v Atkinson [2009] BPIR 248, [2010] 1 BCLC 142, [2008] EWCA Civ 1604, [2011] WTLR 1661.

40 Ibid.

41 Shaker v Al-Bedrawi [2003] Ch 350; [2002] 4 All ER 835, doubting Walker v Stones [2001] QB 902, CA on this point. This sort of claim is generally referred to as a claim for 'reflective loss' where the shareholder-beneficiary seeks to recover for a loss already recovered by the company. Furthermore, under company law, the case was disposed of on the basis that a shareholder could not sue on a loss which was a loss properly accruing only to the company in any event: Prudential Assurance Co Ltd v Newman Industries Ltd (No 2) [1982] Ch 204, CA.

42 That is, in relation to the reference to 'real terms', if a fund was worth £20,000 in 1960, that would have been a very large fund which could have bought a detached house, but in 2000, the same amount of money would have been worth much less and would have constituted only about 5% of the purchase price of a similar house.

43 [1993] 1 WLR 1260, [1994] 1 All ER 118.

demonstrate that there had been any loss because, even though the beneficiaries were disappointed with the return which had been realised on the trust's investments, it appeared that other banks would have followed a similar investment strategy in relation to that type of trust. So, although there is a small gain, the beneficiaries may seek to argue that there has in fact been a loss. This argument will not succeed if the investment manager can demonstrate that her investment strategy was the same as that which would have been adopted in the marketplace generally.

18.2.4 Allocating liability for breach of trust among a number of trustees

The general rule: joint and several liability of trustees

The question arises whether trustees are to be held liable jointly or whether liability can be imposed on only one of the trustees. So, where there are a number of trustees but when a breach of trust is committed by only one of them, are all of the trustees to be equally liable for the breach of trust or only the blameworthy trustee? Where there is more than one trustee, those trustees are expected to act jointly.⁴⁴ Therefore, as a general rule, the trust property is required to be vested in the name of all of the trustees jointly, all of the trustees must receive any trust income, all of the trustees must give a receipt, and so forth. In that sense it would be expected that liability for breach of trust would attach to the trustees jointly and severally,⁴⁵ no matter which of them was directly responsible for the breach of trust. The trustees are jointly liable in that each of them is equally liable for any breach of trust, subject to what is said below. That the trustees are jointly and severally liable means that if one or more of the trustees were unable to meet their obligations, then the beneficiaries would be able to recover their loss from those trustees who are able to meet their trustees' collective obligations.

The reason for all of the trustees being held to be jointly and severally liable for the breach of trust is that to do otherwise would encourage trustees to take no responsibility for the decisions made in connection with their trusteeship. That is, it would be attractive to individual trustees to take no part in the management of the trust so that they could claim later not to have been responsible for any decision or action. It has been held that encouraging the trustees to act in this way would be an 'opiate on the consciences of the trustees', whereas it is in the interests of the beneficiaries to have all of the trustees taking an active part in the management of the trust so that they exercise control over one another.⁴⁶ Thus, all of the trustees are made equally liable for any loss to the trust. However, as considered in the next section, liability may be apportioned between the trustees once the beneficiaries' claim has been satisfied.

There are circumstances in which the trustees need not act jointly and in relation to which there is no requirement that all of the trustees should be jointly and severally liable. For 44 Luke v South Kensington Hotel Co (1879) 11 Ch D 121; Re Dixon (1826) 2 GL & J 114; Re Hilton [1909] 2 Ch 548; Re Whiteby [1910] 1 Ch 600; Re Butlin's Settlement Trust [1976] Ch 251. See para 8.2.4 above.

45 'Joint and several' liability means that all of the trustees may be held liable together or that each individual trustee may be separately liable for the whole of the loss, regardless of which was directly responsible in fact for the acts constituting the breach of trust. Thus, the beneficiaries may sue one or all of the trustees to recover any loss suffered. The trustees, as considered in the text, may then seek to recover a contribution to the compensation paid to the beneficiaries from one another.

46 Bahin v Hughes (1886) 31 Ch D 390, at 398, per Frey LJ.

example, the trust instrument may permit some other means of proceeding without unanimity⁴⁷ or necessity may require that assets be registered in the name of only one of the trustees at a given time.⁴⁸ Thus, it may be that some of the trustees have their liability limited by the trust instrument: in general terms, limitation of liability clauses will exclude the liabilities of trustees.⁴⁹ Therefore, it would seem possible that a trustee whose liability was expressly limited could be excluded from liability, whereas a trustee whose liability was not so limited would not have her liability excluded. In such situations, however, the property must not be left in the hands of one or only a few of the trustees for longer than is necessary.⁵⁰ If a trustee is also a beneficiary under that trust, then if the trustee has committed a breach of trust that person cannot take their beneficial interest until they have accounted for their breach of trust.⁵¹

Apportioning liability between trustees

From the preceding principles, then, the beneficiaries may proceed against any trustee in relation to a loss suffered as a result of some breach of trust because all of the trustees are jointly and severally liable for any breach of trust. Nevertheless, it has been held that no individual trustee will be liable for any default which is the default individually of another trustee.⁵² Thus, any individual trustees who have been required to compensate the beneficiaries for a breach of trust may subsequently recover any compensation paid to the beneficiaries from whichever of the other trustees was actually responsible for the acts which constituted the breach of trust. So, the beneficiaries may sue any one or more of the trustees, and then it is for the trustees to sort matters out between themselves afterwards (unless any of them has her liability expressly excluded by the terms of the trust instrument). Trustees may be liable to make contributions alongside the other trustees in situations in which they are liable for a breach of trust in common with those other trustees further to the Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978. The 1978 Act displaced the inherent power of the courts of equity to order a trustee to make such a contribution. The Act operates⁵³ so that any trustee who is made liable to compensate the beneficiaries for any breach of trust is entitled to recover a contribution towards her liability from the other trustees who are also liable for that same breach⁵⁴ and whose responsibility, impliedly, is not excluded by the trust instrument or 47 TA 2000, s 11. For example, where only one trustee is to receive income on behalf of all of the other trustees: Townley v Sherbourne (1633) Bridg 35; 2 W & TLC (9th edn) 577; Gouldsworth v Knights (1843) 11 M & W 337.

48 Consterdine v Consterdine (1862) 31 Beav 330.

49 See para 8.5.1 above.

50 Brice v Stokes (1805) 11 Ves 319; Re Munton [1927] 1 Ch 262.

51 Re Dacre, Whitaker v Dacre [1916] 1 Ch 344 at 346–7, per Lord Cozens-Hardy MR; Brazzill v Willoughby [2009] EWHC 1633 (Ch), [2010] 1 BCLC 673.

52 Townley v Sherbourne (1633) Bridg 35; 2 W & TLC (9th edn) 577. This principle was enshrined in the now-repealed Trustee Act 1925, s 30(1), whereby trustees were liable only for their own acts and defaults. However, a trustee will be liable for any breach of trust of which she has knowledge or which she conceals or, obviously, in which she knowingly participates in some way: Boardman v Mosman (1799) 1 Bro CC 68. There will also be liability for failing to protect the interests of the beneficiaries in such a situation: Brice v Stokes (1805) 11 Ves 319; Gough v Smith [1872] WN 18.

53 The relevant acts must have occurred after 1978 for the Act to be effective.

54 Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978, ss 1(1), 6(1). See Friends Provident Life Office v Hillier Parker May & Rowden [1997] QB 85. The trustee must have become a trustee after 1978: Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978, s 7(2); Lampitt v Poole Borough Council [1991] 2 QB 545.

by contract. The amount of the contribution to be made is such as the court considers to be just and equitable in the circumstances.⁵⁵ In assessing the extent of the justice and equity of any trustee making a contribution, the court will look to the fault which would attach to that trustee in regard to the breach of trust.⁵⁶ As a result, it is open to the court to absolve the trustee from liability altogether or to require her to provide a complete indemnity to the other trustees or anything in between.⁵⁷

The courts will generally apportion liability evenly between the trustees⁵⁸ except in circumstances in which one trustee has acted fraudulently⁵⁹ or has demonstrated wilful default.⁶⁰ Suppose that one trustee had intentionally defrauded the beneficiaries by taking property from the trust and that the extent of the other trustees' liability was to fail to spot what the fraudulent trustee was doing. In such a situation, the court will typically require that the trustee who is most culpable will bear the larger share of the loss.⁶¹ Similarly, a trustee who takes some personal benefit from the breach of trust will generally be liable to bear a proportionately increased share of the liability,⁶² although not necessarily the complete liability.⁶³ In the event that there has been no loss suffered but there are costs incurred in righting the breach of trust, those costs can be recovered from the trustee against whom the action is to be taken.⁶⁴ It has been suggested that the courts will typically take into account the following factors: how large a role each trustee played in causing the loss, the level of moral blameworthiness attaching to each trustee, and the extent to which each trustee had taken some personal benefit from the breach of trust.⁶⁵

Breach of trust by a company acting as trustee

Where the trustee is a company, then the directors of that trustee company will owe their fiduciary duties to the company and it is the company which owes the duties of a trustee to the beneficiaries of the trust.⁶⁶ In the event of a breach of trust, the beneficiaries must proceed against the company and then the company must bear any liability and in turn seek to recover its own loss from the director.⁶⁷

55 Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978, s 2(1).

56 Ibid. Cf Baker v Willoughby [1970] AC 467; Madden v Quirk [1989] 1 WLR 702.

57 Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978, s 2(2). See Bacon v Camphausen (1888) 58 LT 851; Ramskill v Edwards (1885) 31 Ch D 100.

58 See Bacon v Camphausen (1888) 58 LT 851; Ramskill v Edwards (1885) 31 Ch D 100.

59 Charitable Corporation v Sutton (1742) 2 Atk 400; Lingard v Bromley (1812) 1 V & B 114; Tarleton v Hornby (1833) 1 Y&C 333; Attorney-General v Wilson (1840) Cr & Ph 1.

60 Scotney v Lomer (1886) 29 Ch D 535.

61 Monetary Fund v Hashim (1994) The Times, 11 October; Dairy Containers Ltd v NZI Bank Ltd [1995] 2 NZLR 30; Re Mulligan [1998] 1 NZLR 481; Dubai Aluminium Co Ltd v Salaam [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep 415.

62 Lockhart v Reilly (1857) 25 LJ Ch 697; Thompson v Finch (1856) 8 De GM & G 560; Blyth v Fladgate [1891] 1 Ch 337; Re Turner [1897] 1 Ch 536.

63 Butler v Butler (1875) 5 Ch D 554, affirmed on appeal (1878) 7 Ch D 116.

64 Re Lindsay [1904] 2 Ch 785.

65 Mitchell, 2000, 211.

66 Gregson v HAE Trustees Ltd [2008] EWHC 1006 (Ch), [2008] 2 BCLC 542.

67 This is often referred to in the cases as a 'dog-leg claim'.

18.3 REMEDIES FOR BREACH OF TRUST

18.3.1 The remedies for breach of trust in outline

Having considered the factors that will give rise to a claim for breach of trust, it is important to consider the remedies which flow from such a claim.⁶⁸ The following discussion considers those remedies imposed on trustees who have misapplied the trust property. The context of remedies against third parties is considered at section 18.4 below, and claims in relation to title to the trust property itself are examined in Chapter 19.

From Lord Browne-Wilkinson's account of the available claims, the following three equitable remedies can be divined:

- (a) a claim ordering the trustee to restore the original property which formed part of the trust fund, referred to here as 'specific restitution of the trust property',⁶⁹
- (b) a claim against the trustee to pay money or to provide property of equivalent value to the amount lost to the trust fund if the original assets cannot be recovered; or
- (c) a claim for equitable compensation to recover any further loss suffered by the trust.

Even in situations in which the loss or breach of trust was caused by the dishonesty of a third party to the trust, the beneficiary is required to proceed first against the trustee for breach of trust in any event.⁷⁰ In this sense the liability of the trustees for any breach of trust is a primary liability. Each of these remedies is considered in turn in the sections to follow.

18.3.2 Specific restitution of the trust property

The first option is to require the trustee to restore the trust fund to its original condition by recovering the very property which was originally held on trust. Where it is a particularly valuable or important item of property that is lost to the trust fund, the principles considered in Chapter 19 will apply to require the trustee to deliver up that specific property if it is in her possession or under her control, or to enable a clean substitute for the trust property to be identified and recovered (common law tracing),⁷¹ or its traceable substitute to be acquired and added to the trust fund (equitable tracing).⁷² In relation to a loss caused by a breach of trust, the question is then as to the nature of the remedy necessary to compensate the beneficiary by means of restoration of the trust fund.⁷³ Specific restitution is the primary remedy because it enforces the trustees' obligation to safeguard the trust property.

Lord Browne-Wilkinson explained the options for remedying breach of trust as being focused on recovery of the original trust property where possible in the first instance. This 68 Contrary to Professor Birks's argument that it is not appropriate to talk of 'rights' and 'remedies' but rather only of 'rights' which necessarily imply their remedies (Birks, 2000:1), this is one context in which the rights of the claimant may lead to the realisation of any one of a number of remedies dependent on the context, one of which (equitable compensation) necessarily involves some judicial discretion (see generally Barker, 1998, 319).

69 This claim is in personam, as considered below only in that the defendant trustees are judged on the basis of their personally-owed obligations to safeguard the trust property and to observe the terms of the trust.

70 Target Holdings v Redfern [1996] 1 AC 421.

71 FC Jones (A Firm) v Jones [1996] 3 WLR 703.

72 Re Diplock's Estate [1948] Ch 465; Boscawen v Bajwa [1996] 1 WLR 328.

73 Caffrey v Darby (1801) 6 Ves 488, [1775–1802] All ER Rep 507; Clough v Bond (1838) 3 My & Cr 490, (1838) 40 ER 1016; Nocton v Lord Ashburton [1914] AC 932.

point emerges from the following extract from his Lordship's speech in Target Holdings v Redferns:⁷⁴

The equitable rules of compensation for breach of trust have been largely developed in relation to such traditional trusts, where the only way in which all the beneficiaries' rights can be protected is to restore to the trust fund what ought to be there. In such a case the basic rule is that a trustee in breach of trust must restore or pay to the trust estate either the assets which have been lost to the estate by reason of the breach or compensation for such loss. Courts of Equity did not award damages but, in acting in personam, ordered the defaulting trustee to restore the trust estate.⁷⁵

Compensation for a breach of trust is thus achieved by recovery of the original trust assets (specific restitution) in the first place; and only secondarily by compensation in money. The position in English law remains that the trustee is responsible in the first instance for the restoration of the particular trust property which was lost in the breach of trust, and only if that is not possible for compensation of the beneficiary for loss of the original assets in cash. Typically, therefore, if the trust assets have been dissipated, compensation will have to be made by way of a cash payment from the trustee. What is important to note is that the beneficiaries may, in many circumstances, prefer to recover the specific property that was lost (because it will grant a proprietary right, because it had sentimental value, because it was expected to increase in value, or because it was intrinsically valuable) rather than to receive simply its cash equivalent from the trustee which may not reflect the future profits which might be earned from that property and which will not reflect any value beyond simply its market value in cash. Specific restitution is therefore a proprietary obligation on the trustee to recover the original trust assets.

However, what is important to note is that while tracing revolves around the assertion of proprietary rights either in a specific item of property or in its substitute, Lord Browne-Wilkinson expressed the jurisdiction of equity in this context to be in the form of an action in personam against the trustee to recover the trust estate. In parallel with the decision of Lord Templeman in Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid,⁷⁶ the court is providing for an action in personam against a particular person who is identified as a trustee, seemingly, acting on the principle that 'equity looks upon as done that which ought to have been done' such that the trustee is required to continue to hold that item of specific property on trust for the beneficiaries (unless the property has passed out of the trustee's control or possession).⁷⁷ Where the original trust property has passed out of the trustee's control or possession such that it cannot be recovered, the action converts to a mere action for money to recover the equivalent cash value of the specific assets misapplied in breach of trust, as considered in para 18.3.3 below. The action for specific restitution, however, is not a personal action, but rather an action in relation to specific property which is brought against the trustee. There 74 [1996] 1 AC 421, [1995] 3 All ER 785 HL.

75 Nocton v Lord Ashburton [1914] AC 932, at 952, 958, per Viscount Haldane LC.

76 Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324, [1993] 3 WLR 1143.

77 The distinction between an in personam and an in rem action in this context is that an action in personam in equity binds only the particular defendant, whereas an action in rem would bind any successors in title or assignees from the defendant (other than the bona fide purchaser for value).

will only be a personal action to account in money if the original trust property cannot be recovered.

In situations in which the trustees have invested in property not permitted by the trust instrument, their obligation will be to replace those unauthorised investments with authorised investments.⁷⁸ This is different from providing specific restitution because the trustees are not recovering property which has been passed away from the trust in breach of their duties, but rather the trustees are acquiring the assets of a type which they ought to have acquired beforehand.

It was suggested in *Harris v Kent*⁷⁹ that the application of the remedy of specific restitution might be inappropriate in a context in which none of the parties (beneficiaries and trustees) wanted to keep the trust in existence, something which would be done by recovering the original trust property. Therefore, it was considered that the better remedy would be to compensate the beneficiary for the loss she would not have suffered but for the breach of trust.

18.3.3 Equitable compensation to restore the value of the trust fund

If the specific property which comprised the trust fund cannot be recovered, the following course of action arises from the speech of Lord Browne-Wilkinson:

If specific restitution of the trust property is not possible, then the liability of the trustee is to pay sufficient compensation to the trust estate to put it back to what it would have been had the breach not been committed.⁸⁰

The second course of action is then for restoration (confusingly rendered in the cases as ‘restitution’)⁸¹ of an amount of money equal to the value of the property lost to the trust fund by the breach of trust.⁸² The issue of valuation is considered further at para 18.3.5 below, but in general terms the valuation will be an amount to return the trust to the position it had occupied before the transaction which constituted the breach of trust. As Lord Browne-Wilkinson explained the appropriate valuation, it is that required to ‘put [the trust fund] back to what it would have been had the breach not been committed’. In other words, the aim of this second remedy is to calculate the amount of money which is necessary to restore the value of the trust fund. It is important to note that there is a difference between personal compensation for loss suffered as a breach of trust, and compensation equivalent to the value of property lost to the trust as considered in the next section.⁸³

78 Re Massingberd’s Settlement (1890) 63 LT 296.

79 [2007] EWHC 463 (Ch), Briggs J.

80 Cf Caffrey v Darby (1801) 6 Ves 488, [1775–1802] All ER Rep 507; Clough v Bond (1838) 3 My & Cr 490, (1838) 40 ER 1016. See now Bairstow v Queens Moat Houses (2001) unreported, 17 May.

81 Swindle v Harrison [1997] 4 All ER 705. ‘Confusing’ in that the trustee will not necessarily have been personally enriched: see section 31.3.

82 The obligation of the fiduciary being to compensate the beneficiaries for the loss caused by the breach of duty, as set out in Target Holdings v Redferns, was observed in Lee v Futurist Developments Ltd [2010] EWHC 2764 (Ch), [2011] 1 BCLC 653, [49].

83 Swindle v Harrison [1997] 4 All ER 705; Bristol & West Building Society v Mothew [1996] 4 All ER 698.

It is possible that this restoration of the value of the fund could take a number of forms other than straightforwardly paying cash. For example, it might permit the acquisition of an annuity which would generate similar levels of income to any trust capital misapplied in breach of trust. The level of compensation, as a matter of evidence, must equate to the loss which the beneficiary can demonstrate was caused by the breach of trust such that the trust fund is placed back in the position it would have occupied but for the breach.⁸⁴ This might include any loss which the trust would have suffered subsequently as a result of the nature of the trust property – for example, accounting for a large fall in the value of such property subsequently.

18.3.4 Equitable compensation for losses to the trust in general

Introduction to equitable compensation in general terms

The previous section considered liability for equitable compensation in a way that was limited to effecting restoration of the value of the trust fund. Equitable compensation is available more broadly under the general principles of equity for any other losses which may have been suffered by the trust.⁸⁵ Suppose that the trustees had incurred expenses in committing a breach of trust such as selling property which ought to have been retained as part of the trust fund. The restoration to the trust fund of the value of the property transferred away should be considered to be separate from the recovery of any other loss consequential to the breach of trust. For example, if the loss to the trust was in the form of a lost opportunity in the future – such as a right to receive a dividend⁸⁶ which was lost when shares held as part of the trust fund were sold in breach of trust – then the beneficiaries will wish to recover equitable compensation from the trustees for this lost opportunity to receive a dividend and not simply for the capital value of the shares.

Compensation is an equitable remedy which gives rise to a right which is purely personal in nature, giving no right to any specific property. In relation to breach of trust, some loss has been caused to the trust, and it is that loss which is made good by compensation. The court is therefore awarding a payment of money instead of some proprietary right which relies on the beneficiaries showing that a loss has resulted from the breach of trust. Rather than recognising some proprietary right in the beneficiary and imposing a trust or charge to recognise the right as being proprietary, compensation requires only that the loss to the trust is calculated in cash terms and that that amount is accounted for by the trustee to the trust fund.⁸⁷

There is a need for the beneficiaries to decide, in many cases, whether to proceed in relation to a restitutionary proprietary claim for some property held in the trustee's hands, for a claim equal to the value of some specific property lost to the trust, or for a compensatory claim in relation to the breach of trust simpliciter.⁸⁸ These are different remedies and the 84 Target Holdings v Redfems [1996] 1 AC 421.

85 Further to Gwembe Valley Development Co Ltd v Koshy [2003] EWCA Civ 1048, [2004] 1 BCLC 131, at para 142 et seq, per Mummery LJ, a director who breaches his fiduciary duties to a company in a manner which causes loss to that company will also be liable to pay equitable compensation to the company.

86 A 'dividend' is a right making up part of a shareholder's rights to receive an income payment annually as and when declared by the board of directors to be paid out of the company's profits.

87 Target Holdings v Redfems [1996] 1 AC 421.

88 Target Holdings v Redfems [1996] 1 AC 421, [1995] 3 WLR 352, [1995] 3 All ER 785.

beneficiary will be required to elect between them to remove the possibility of multiple recovery in respect of the same loss.⁸⁹ It is important to note that there is a difference between personal compensation for loss suffered as a breach of trust, and compensation equivalent to the value of property lost to the trust,⁹⁰ as considered in the next section.

Distinguishing between 'restorative' and 'compensatory' remedies

The cases have distinguished between remedies which are concerned merely to put the parties back in the position which they occupied before the breach of trust ('restorative' remedies) and remedies which are concerned to compensate the claimant for further losses as well as restoring the parties to the position before the breach was committed ('compensatory' remedies). There is a line to be drawn between compensation in relation to breach of the duty of skill and care, and breach of the general fiduciary duty not to permit conflicts of interest or not to deal with the trust property personally. In relation to the former (breach of the duty of skill and care), the court will import analogous principles to those of causation and remoteness of damage.⁹¹ However, in relation to duties to avoid conflicts of interest and self-dealing, equitable compensation in such circumstances would be awarded in lieu of rescission of the contract which the trustee had entered into in breach of that duty.⁹² Compensation in that circumstance would be calculated according to the value of the property lost to the trust, less the price paid to the trustee, plus interest.⁹³ Thus, the second form of compensation is said to be 'restorative', in that it effects rescission, rather than being generally compensatory, which would deal with all consequent loss.

So, in Swindle v Harrison,⁹⁴ by way of illustration of compensation for conflict of interest by a fiduciary, the (wonderfully-named) solicitor Mr Swindle failed to disclose all material facts to his client Mrs Harrison in his fiduciary capacity in connection with a purchase of property, such that she lost money in the transaction. Mrs Harrison sought compensation from the solicitor for her loss. The Court of Appeal held that Mrs Harrison was entitled to restorative compensation only, that is, an amount of compensation to put the trust into the position which it had occupied before the transaction. The aim of this restorative remedy was to achieve rescission of the transaction, and so put her back in the position which she would have occupied but for the breach of trust, as opposed to compensating her for any general further loss. The Court of Appeal held that only this restorative remedy was available where the plaintiff had been in some way culpable for her loss; whereas if the plaintiff had been induced into the contract by some fraud or unconscionable act on the part of the fiduciary then a compensatory remedy would be appropriate. On the facts of Swindle v Harrison, it was found that Mrs Harrison had decided to enter into the transaction of her own volition, and therefore generally compensatory remedies would not be available.

The measure of compensation here is that of compensation for loss suffered as a result of the breach of trust. It is this measure which makes up the third limb of the test in Target

89 Tang v Capacious Investments [1996] 1 AC 514.

90 Swindle v Harrison [1997] 4 All ER 705; Bristol & West Building Society v Mothew [1996] 4 All ER 698.

91 Bristol & West Building Society v Mothew [1996] 4 All ER 698, per Millett LJ.

92 Ibid.

93 Holder v Holder [1968] Ch 353.

94 [1997] 4 All ER 705.

Holdings v Redferns.⁹⁵ The measure of the size of the loss is therefore a measurement of consequential loss only, and is not limited to a measurement of the value of the property which made up the trust fund before the transaction.

The establishment of the liability to pay compensation

The core issue is the measurement of the amount of compensation which is to be paid. As considered above, there is no strict rule of foreseeability, nor of remoteness of damage, in relation to a breach of trust. It is therefore possible that the trustee will be liable in respect of any loss which accrues to the trust. The issue is then the extent to which such common law concerns ought to intrude in deciding exactly how large the loss to the trust fund has been. Lord Browne-Wilkinson held as follows in Target Holdings v Redferns:⁹⁶

At common law there are two principles fundamental to the award of damages. First, that the defendant's wrongful act must cause the damage complained of. Second, that the plaintiff is to be put 'in the same position as he would have been in if he had not sustained the wrong for which he is now getting his compensation or reparation'.⁹⁷ Although, as will appear, in many ways equity approaches liability for making good a breach of trust from a different starting point, in my judgment those two principles are applicable as much in equity as at common law. Under both systems liability is fault-based: the defendant is only liable for the consequences of the legal wrong he has done to the plaintiff and to make good the damage caused by his wrong or to pay by way of compensation more than the loss suffered from such wrong.

Compensation for breach is therefore based on fault, rather than on any strict liability of the trustee.⁹⁸ The distinction between fault-based common law damages and fault-based equitable compensation is then a further issue. Lord Browne-Wilkinson put it in the following terms:

The detailed rules of equity as to causation and the quantification of the loss differ, at least ostensibly, from those applicable at common law. But the principles underlying both systems are the same. On the assumptions that had to be made in the present case until the factual issues are resolved (ie that the transaction would have gone through even if there had been no breach of trust), the result reached by the Court of Appeal does not accord with those principles. Redferns as trustees have been held liable to compensate Target for a loss caused otherwise than by the breach of trust.

Therefore, while there remains some distinction between the common law and equity in this context, Lord Browne-Wilkinson does not find it necessary to probe that difference on the facts of Target Holdings on the basis that there is no proof that the loss to the trust was caused in any way by the breach of trust itself. As his Lordship considered the matter:

⁹⁵ Considered above at para 18.3.3.

⁹⁶ [1996] 1 AC 421, [1995] 3 All ER 785, 792.

⁹⁷ Ibid.

⁹⁸ Pawlowski, 2000.

the common law rules of remoteness of damage and causation do not apply. However, there does have to be some causal connection between the breach of trust and the loss to the trust estate for which compensation is recoverable, viz the fact that the loss would not have occurred but for the breach.⁹⁹

In line with the older authorities in this area, the distinction between the common law and equitable codes would be that the common law will impose liability to pay damages only where there is sufficient proximity and foreseeability, whereas equity will award compensation where the loss can be shown to have been derived from the breach of trust. The difference would therefore be that equitable compensation may be awarded even where the loss was not strictly foreseeable, provided that it did result from the breach of trust.¹⁰⁰

The nature of compensation as part of equity

A trustee will be liable to compensate the beneficiaries for the loss occasioned by a breach of trust even though the loss may flow unexpectedly from the breach. The genesis of this principle is perhaps rooted in the understanding of trusts as being founded on the conscience of the trustee. Breach of a trust is an unconscionable act imposing liability on trustees to compensate beneficiaries no matter what. That conscience could be said to extend properly to the situation in which the trustee breaches the terms of the trust in such a way that the trustee may have been acting out of the best of motives (perhaps in investing in assets not strictly within her investment powers) but nevertheless caused some loss to the trust.

So, suppose T invested in A plc shares, outwith the investment powers in the trust, on the basis that such shares were expected in good faith to generate a better return for the trust than the authorised investments. Suppose then that A plc fell unexpectedly into insolvency as a result of terrorist activity in their production plants, and that the trust's investment was lost. Under common law, it would be arguable that the terrorist activity was unforeseeable and that no liability should attach to the trustees as a result. However, equity would impose liability for breach of trust regardless. The validity of this liability would be based on T's knowledge that the investment was a breach of trust, even though it was undertaken from the best of motives. The strict rule of trusts law must be enforced: the trustee must not be permitted to do anything which she knows to be contrary to conscience.¹⁰¹

However, Lord Browne-Wilkinson explained liability as arising not simply on the occurrence of a breach but rather only when that breach causes a loss to the trust. This approach rests on a positive duty on trustees to protect the trust fund and its value, leading to a concomitant duty on trustees to account to the beneficiaries for any loss in the value of that fund caused by their breach of trust. As Lord Browne-Wilkinson considered the matter in Target Holdings v Redferns:¹⁰²

99 See also Re Miller's Deed Trusts (1978) 75 LS Gaz 454; Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [1994] 1 All ER 118, [1993] 1 WLR 1260.

100 Clough v Bond (1838) 3 My & C 490, (1838) 8 LJ Ch 51, (1838) 2 Jur 958; Re Massingberd's Settlement (1890) 63 LT 296.

101 [1967] 2 AC 46.

102 [1996] 1 AC 421, [1995] 3 All ER 785, 793.

The equitable rules of compensation for breach of trust have been largely developed in relation to such traditional trusts, where the only way in which all the beneficiaries' rights can be protected is to restore to the trust fund what ought to be there. In such a case the basic rule is that a trustee in breach of trust must restore or pay to the trust estate either the assets which have been lost to the estate by reason of the breach or compensation for such loss. Courts of Equity did not award damages but, in acting in personam, ordered the defaulting trustee to restore the trust estate.¹⁰³

Therefore, the remedy of compensation is available on a personal basis from the trustee to achieve restitution of the loss suffered by the trust fund. Historically, this rule has been developed in relation to family trusts, where the trustees were generally considered to occupy a position of especial tenderness in relation to the beneficiaries. Consequently, the trustees were to be held personally liable if any of the beneficiaries' personal fortunes were lost through the misfeasance of the trustees. It is perhaps questionable whether the same rule ought to apply to commercial situations, where perhaps a claim based on contract might be preferable.

The more difficult situation is where the beneficiaries seek to recover some lost opportunity caused by the breach of trust. While it is commonly said that the trustee will not be liable for such opportunity cost,¹⁰⁴ it might well be the case that the development of a causal link for the liability of trustees¹⁰⁵ will lead to liability for losses which are foreseeable as a result of the breach of trust. Suppose, for example, that a valuable oil painting held on trust was to have been sold to a dealer for £100,000, but the trustee sold it instead in breach of trust for only £75,000; it would be reasonable to suppose that the beneficiary ought to have some claim against the trustee for the lost opportunity of the more valuable sale.¹⁰⁶

The issue which remains is that compensation will not achieve restitution of specific property; only a payment of money equal to the loss. Lord Browne-Wilkinson continued:

If specific restitution of the trust property is not possible, then the liability of the trustee is to pay sufficient compensation to the trust estate to put it back to what it would have been had the breach not been committed.¹⁰⁷ Even if the immediate cause of the loss is the dishonesty or failure of a third party, the trustee is liable to make good that loss to the trust estate if, but for the breach, such loss would not have occurred.¹⁰⁸

Therefore, compensation will be available on an almost strict liability basis, provided that causation can be demonstrated. The trustee is personally liable, even where the source of the misfeasance is with some third party who perhaps induced the trustee to act as she did.

103 See Nocton v Lord Ashburton [1914] AC 932 at 952, 958, per Viscount Haldane LC.

104 Palmer v Jones (1862) 1 Ven 144.

105 Target Holdings v Redfern [1996] 1 AC 421, [1995] 3 WLR 352, [1995] 3 All ER 785.

106 Mowbray et al, 2001, 1194; Kingdon v Castleman (1877) 46 LJ Ch 448. Cf Hobday v Peters (No 3) (1860) 28 Beav 603.

107 Caffrey v Darby (1801) 6 Ves 488, [1775–1802] All ER Rep 507; Clough v Bond (1838) 3 My & Cr 490, (1838) 40 ER 1016.

108 [1995] 3 All ER 785, 792. Cf Re Dawson, Union Fidelity Trustee Co Ltd (No 2) [1980] 2 All ER 92, [1980] Ch 515.

18.3.5 A comparison of common law damages and equitable compensation

Distinguishing between common law damages and equitable compensation

The third limb of the possible remedies for breach of trust set out in Target Holdings v Redferns suggests at first blush an overlap with common law damages¹⁰⁹ and the need for evidence of a link between loss and remedy.¹¹⁰ The important initial point is that the suit must be brought against the trustee in cases of breach of trust, before the matter is pursued against others who may have orchestrated the breach of trust in fact. As Lord Browne-Wilkinson continued: ‘Even if the immediate cause of the loss is the dishonesty or failure of a third party, the trustee is liable to make good that loss to the trust estate if, but for the breach, such loss would not have occurred.’¹¹¹

One of the more complex issues to arise out of the *Target Holdings v Redferns*¹¹² litigation was the line between equitable compensation and common law damages. In short, Lord Browne-Wilkinson held that there is little difference between the two doctrines. Both are dependent, first, on the fault of the defendant and, secondly, on a nexus between the loss suffered by the claimant and the defendant’s wrongdoing. This point emerges from the speech of Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Target Holdings v Redferns:¹¹³

At common law there are two principles fundamental to the award of damages. First, that the defendant’s wrongful act must cause the damage complained of. Second, that the plaintiff is to be put ‘in the same position as he would have been in if he had not sustained the wrong for which he is now getting his compensation or reparation’ . . . Although, as will appear, in many ways equity approaches liability for making good a breach of trust from a different starting point, in my judgment those two principles are applicable as much in equity as at common law. Under both systems liability is fault based: the defendant is only liable for the consequences of the legal wrong he has done to the plaintiff and to make good the damage caused by his wrong or to pay by way of compensation more than the loss suffered from such wrong. The detailed rules of equity as to causation and the quantification of the loss differ, at least ostensibly, from those applicable at common law. But the principles underlying both systems are the same.

There is close intellectual ground between the two approaches. However, there is a subtle distinction between the evidential burden in cases of equitable compensation in contradistinction to cases involving common law damages. As his Lordship continued:

Thus the common law rules of remoteness of damage and causation do not apply [in relation to breach of trust]. However, there does have to be some causal connection

109 Somewhat oddly there is repeated reference in Ramzan v Brookwide Ltd [2011] EWCA Civ 985, at [49] et seq by Arden LJ to ‘damages for breach of trust’, even though ‘damages’ are available only at common law (with a voluminous jurisprudence as to their scope) whereas the equitable remedies available in relation to breach of trust were clearly set out by the House of Lords in Target Holdings v Redferns as considered above.

110 See also Bristol & West Building Society v Mothew [1996] 4 All ER 698.

111 Cf Re Dawson, Union Fidelity Trustee Co Ltd (No 2) [1980] 2 All ER 92, [1980] Ch 515.

112 [1996] 1 AC 421.

113 [1996] 1 AC 421, [1995] 3 All ER 785, 792.

between the breach of trust and the loss to the trust estate for which compensation is recoverable, viz the fact that the loss would not have occurred but for the breach.¹¹⁴

Significantly, then, there is required to be a causal link between the loss suffered and the breach of trust perpetrated. Thus, Target were held not to be entitled to recover compensation from Redferns for breach of trust. It was not necessary on the facts of that case to inquire into questions of remoteness of damage nor the precise issues of causation to reach that decision in Target Holdings. This remains a conceptual difficulty for future cases in understanding the sliver of difference between the common law and the equitable doctrines.

Liability in the tort of negligence in relation to trusts

There are a number of situations in which common law claims, in particular liability in negligence, may be significant in relation to the operation of trusts. Principally, claims in negligence will be available in favour of people who do not have the rights of beneficiaries under trusts, particularly if their hopes of prospective rights were frustrated by someone's negligence. Thus, a lawyer drafting a trust may be liable for common law damages under the tort of negligence if that duty is carried out negligently so as to cause the claimant loss.¹¹⁵ So, in *White v Jones*¹¹⁶ a solicitor took so long to draft a will that the intended beneficiary acquired no rights in the client's estate on the client's death intestate some time later. The third party who was intended to have acquired rights under the will which was to have been drafted was held by a majority of the House of Lords to be entitled to recover damages for her loss. While a solicitor would not ordinarily owe duties to someone other than her client, Lord Goff was of the opinion that justice demanded a remedy in this instance because the solicitor's negligence had caused loss to this third party.¹¹⁷ Equally, failure to warn a testatrix that it would only be possible to dispose of property by will in the manner which she intended if she first severed the joint tenancy on which it was then held, gave rise to liability in negligence to those third parties who would otherwise have acquired beneficial rights in that property under the will.¹¹⁸ This liability in damages will, however, only be available to people who are intended to be either a beneficiary or a legatee.¹¹⁹ Liability at common law may also be held to arise on the basis of breach of an implied contractual term. So, a lawyer's failure to protect a client's confidence in a conveyancing transaction was held to give rise to damages for breach of an implied term of the contract between solicitor and client to maintain the confidentiality of the client's affairs.¹²⁰ For present purposes, however, the principal claim which will be brought by a beneficiary under the law of trusts would be a claim for breach of trust because there is no need to prove foreseeability nor causation in the common law sense of that term, and the remedies available for breach of trust are broader than those available for breach of a common law duty.

114 Cf Re Miller's Deed Trusts (1978) 75 LS Gaz 454; Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [1994] 1 All ER 118, [1993] 1 WLR 1260.

115 See generally Clerk and Lindsell, 2006, para 10–104 et seq.

116 [1995] 2 AC 207.

117 Ibid., 259.

118 Carr-Glyn v Frearsons [1999] Ch 326.

119 Worby v Rosser [2000] PNL R 140; Gibbons v Nelsons [2000] PNL R 734.

120 Hilton v Barker Booth & Eastwood [2005] 1 WLR 567, [2005] UKHL 8.

The fusion fallacy: merging equity with common law in error

There is a phenomenon known as the ‘fusion fallacy’ by reference to which common lawyers occasionally seek to rely on common law remedies (in particular damages) to impose liability to effect compensation on people who are trustees; whereas they should rely on the law on breach of trust. For example, in a sprawling range of litigation in the linked cases of *Concord Trust v Law Debenture Trust Corporation plc*¹²¹ and *Law Debenture Trust Corporation v Elektrim Finance BV*¹²² an investor in a bond issue sought to have a bond agreement terminated: under the terms of that agreement the trustee had a power to terminate the bond agreement in certain circumstances. Issues arose as to whether or not the trustee was liable in tort for activating its powers under the bond agreement improperly and whether or not the trustee was liable for breach of contract. It was held at first instance in Concord Trust by Smith J that the trustee had used its powers under the terms of the trust and of the contract properly.¹²³ It was held that if a trustee who is empowered to terminate a bond agreement does so incorrectly, then that trustee would be liable to the borrower for damages in contract.¹²⁴ It was held further that there would not be any liability in tort because the relationship between the parties was based on contract.¹²⁵ On these facts, it was held that the trustee bore no liability in tort nor in contract. It is a remarkable thing that the obligations of the trustee were considered to arise entirely at common law in this case, when the liabilities of a trustee lie properly in the law of trusts for breach of trust.

18.3.6 Valuation of the loss to the trust*The methodology for valuing the loss to the trust*

A difficult question arises in relation to compensation for breach of trust: at what level should compensation be awarded in respect of property which fluctuates in value between the date of the breach and the date of judgment?

For the beneficiary, it would be preferable to claim the highest value for that property between those two dates. This approach, dubbed ‘the highest intermediate balance’, was adopted in Jaffray v Marshall.¹²⁶ Under the principle in Jaffray v Marshall, every presumption is to be made against the wrongdoing trustee. Therefore, if there had been an opportunity to realise (or sell) the assets during a continuing breach of trust, this would lead to the quantum of the compensation payable by the trustee imposing an obligation to make good the lost opportunity at its highest point. There was no distinction made in that case between shares and other types of property. The approach in Jaffray is based on a strict liability on the part of the trustee for any breach of trust, holding the trustee accountable for the highest possible loss in the circumstances.

121 [2005] UKHL 27 arising out of the same facts. This case is discussed in detail in Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, Sweet & Maxwell, 2009, para 33–41.

122 [2005] EWHC 1999 (Ch).

123 [2004] EWHC 270 (Ch).

124 Concord Trust v Law Debenture Trust Corporation plc [2005] UKHL 27, para [41], per Lord Scott.

125 Ibid at para [38], per Lord Scott.

126 [1994] 1 All ER 143, [1993] 1 WLR 1285; see also Nant-y-glo and Blaina Ironworks Co v Grave (1878) 12 Ch D 738.

However, Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Target Holdings overruled the decision in Jaffray as being wrong in principle. As considered above, in Target Holdings, the appropriate valuation was found to be that required to ‘put [the trust fund] back to what it would have been had the breach not been committed’. The valuation is therefore that required to identify a level of compensation which is capable of restoring the value of the trust fund. Rather than selecting a specific formula, Lord Browne-Wilkinson preferred to leave the issue as a matter of evidence. The claimant beneficiary is therefore required to prove the level of compensation which equates to the loss caused to the trust by the breach of trust. The underlying intention is to return the trust fund to the position that it would have occupied but for the breach.

It has been held more generally by the courts that the measure of compensation for breach of trust would be ‘fair compensation’, that is to say, the difference between proper performance of the trust obligations and what the trustee actually achieved, not the least that could have been achieved.¹²⁷ It has been held that the trustee will not be liable for speculative or unliquidated losses: the beneficiary must be able to demonstrate that amounts have been lost.¹²⁸ However, it is not clear how this will interact with the principles of equitable compensation and their potentially broader ambit.¹²⁹

No set-off permitted

The trustees are not permitted to set off a profit in one transaction against a loss in another transaction.¹³⁰ So, in Dimes v Scott,¹³¹ trustees breached their trust by paying the income of the trust to the testator’s widow but their delay in the administration of the trust had permitted them to buy more securities for the trust than would otherwise have been the case: it was held that the commission of the breach of trust was actionable in itself regardless of any profit which the trustees had made in some collateral transaction.¹³² Similarly, in *Fletcher v Green*¹³³ the trustees had committed breaches of trust by lending money under a mortgage to a firm in which one of the trustees had a personal interest. When the mortgage was unwound at a loss and the money paid into court, that money was invested in securities which rose in value. It was held that the trustees should not be permitted to set off the loss which they had caused against the profit made on the acquisition of the securities. However, in *Bartlett v Barclays Bank*¹³⁴ the trustee was held liable for breach of trust in failing to supervise the board of directors of a company in which the trust held a controlling shareholding, and Brightman J considered the difficulty of applying this rule in many cases. The directors of the company had made two principal investments, one of which was a success and the other of which was a failure. It was held that in these circumstances it would be permissible to set off the loss on one project against the gain on the other project because, on 127 Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [1994] 1 All ER 118, [1993] 1 WLR 1260, CA.

128 Palmer v Jones (1862) 1 Vern 144.

129 Rickett, 2000.

130 Dimes v Scott (1828) 4 Russ 195, per Lord Lyndhurst. See also Bartlett v Barclays Bank [1980] Ch 515, 538; [1980] 1 All ER 139, 155, per Brightman J.

131 (1828) 4 Russ 195.

132 See also Fletcher v Green (1864) 33 Beav 426.

133 (1864) 33 Beav 426.

134 [1980] Ch 515, 538, [1980] 1 All ER 139, 155.

the facts of that case, the two separate transactions were nevertheless part of the same pattern of wrongful conduct committed by the board of directors.

Exemplary damages

It has been suggested by some commentators that trustees may be liable for exemplary damages if their behaviour in breaching their trust has been ‘outrageous’.¹³⁵ Under English law, however, it has been held that the court will only impose liability on a trustee to the extent that a trustee has caused a loss through her breach of trust, and that a court will not impose exemplary liability over and above that loss.¹³⁶ This approach has also been taken in Australia.¹³⁷ The suggestion has been made that the position in England may be susceptible to change with a change in approach to exemplary damages more generally.¹³⁸ However, it is suggested that, in line with the approach taken in the rest of this chapter, the liability of the trustees is to account for any loss occasioned by a breach of trust and not to account for anything outwith such a loss.

18.3.7 Some reservations about Target Holdings v Redferns

Jaffray v Marshall,¹³⁹ considered immediately above, was said to be wrongly decided in principle by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Target Holdings, on the ground that its award of compensation was assessed on the basis of an assumption of a potentially impossible sale (that is, a sale which could not have taken place in practice, even though an open-market value could be estimated for that time). On the contrary, the true purpose of compensation was said in Target Holdings to be to make good the loss, even though the right of action based on breach of trust technically arose immediately. This is a possible weakness with the decision in Target in that there would have been a valid action against Redferns if such an action had been brought before Redferns had acquired the mortgage security for Target, but that action appeared to dissolve because Redferns had remedied the breach before it came to light.

One further problem with Target is that the beneficiary is not able to bring a claim against a trustee for breach of trust unless that beneficiary has suffered some financial loss directly as a result of the breach of trust. There may be other breaches of trust, for example, in a situation in which investments are to be restricted only to ethical investment funds and the trustees contravene those instructions, which will generate no entitlement to compensation or reconstitution of the trust fund unless there has been financial loss. So, if the trustee were to invest in unethical investments in breach of trust but nevertheless made a profit then no action for compensation would lie because compensation is only for financial loss and not 135 See Hayton and Mitchell, 2005, 706. This approach has been applied in relation to breaches of fiduciary duty elsewhere in the Commonwealth.

136 Re Brogden (1886) 38 Ch D 546, 557, per North J. See also Vyse v Foster (1872) LR 3 Ch App 309, 333.

137 Harris v Digital Pulse Pty Ltd (2003) 56 NSWLR 298, per Heydon JA; see also, however, the remarks of Mason P to the contrary.

138 See Hayton and Mitchell, 2005, 706; making reference to Kuddas v Chief Constable of Leicestershire [2002] 2 AC 122.

139 [1994] 1 All ER 143, [1993] 1 WLR 1285.

other types of loss. In this example, however, the trustee would be obliged to bear the cost of replacing the unauthorised investments with authorised investments. The appropriate claim against the trustee would be for an injunction, considered in Chapter 27, to prevent continued breach of the trust terms and requiring observance of those terms in future.

The more complex problem might be in circumstances in which property with only sentimental value is disposed of. Perhaps the property is intrinsically valuable but in a way which the decision in Target Holdings does not accept, because Target assumes the only significant value to be an open-market value. The requirement to demonstrate loss which can be quantifiable in terms of money compensation gives the beneficiary no effective remedy. This approach indicates that the right of the beneficiary is to be measured in terms of re-sale value and not in relation to the intrinsic value of taking a proprietary right over specific, identified trust property.

18.3.8 The claim for breach of trust after termination of the trust

Where property is paid away in breach of trust, the question arises at what point the trust terminates; and furthermore as to the nature of the claim which can be brought when the trust property has been paid away.

When does the trust end?

In deciding whether or not a claim for breach of trust can be brought after termination of a trust, it is important to know when a trust ends. It has been suggested that a trust ends when the trust property is transferred away.¹⁴⁰ However, it is not clear, in the wake of the decision of the House of Lords in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC,¹⁴¹ how this position can be maintained on principle. It would appear that the trust, that is, the obligation of the trustee, does not come to an end when the property is transferred away. A trust is not simply title to property but also involves obligations of trusteeship to the beneficiaries which are imposed on the trustee personally. Therefore, the trusteeship must necessarily continue where there is some order either for reconstitution of the fund, or for the payment of compensation. The fact that such an order would be operative on the trustee must imply that obligations which arose by virtue of the trust continue to be operative too. The imposition of any equitable remedy on a trustee, whether personal or proprietary, requires the continuation of the trusteeship.

A trust can be deemed to have been terminated, for example when its purpose has been superseded by another structure and all of the property transferred out of the trust with the intention that the trust will have no further activities. So, in *Southampton City Council v Southampton Median Mosque Trust Ltd*¹⁴² a charitable purpose trust was formed for the creation of a new mosque in Southampton (to obtain planning permission and so forth) but issues arose as to who would be responsible for its construction. Consequently, after meetings between all of the parties, a company limited by guarantee was formed for this purpose and issues arose as to the purpose of the trust. It was held that the trust was deemed to have been terminated and its activities passed to the company instead.

140 Davern, 1997, 86.

141 [1996] AC 669.

142 [2010] EWHC 2376 (Ch).

Issues with holding trustees to account

Where there is a Vandervell-style¹⁴³ trust obligation (where legal and equitable title to the trust fund are transferred together) that is validly performed (that is, there is no equitable claim against trustee), it can properly be said that the trust has ended because the trusteeship has ended. The acid test will always be whether the trustee has acted in any sense in breach of trust in the conduct of that Vandervell-style transfer, or whether she breached some contractual warranty concerning the manner in which that transfer was to be performed. Where there is no claim in equity in respect of the trusteeship, it can be said, in hindsight, that the trust has come to an end.

The counter-argument might be that the trust in Target terminated at the date of transfer, and therefore there is no need to raise the argument that there be reconstitution of the trust fund, on the basis that there would be no fund to reconstitute in any event.¹⁴⁴ The argument runs that once the trust is dead, it cannot be brought back to life. The issue is then whether the trust had transformed into a chose in action against the trustee personally equal to the value of the trust fund. However, this would be to overlook the fact that equity will still give effect to many of those equitable obligations that made up the trust by means of equitable tracing claims, personal claims for dishonest assistance or knowing receipt, or subrogation claims. It must be the case that property acquired as a result of such a claim must be held on trust in the same manner that the property was held on trust before the unconscionable event which gave rise to the claim. Otherwise, when the fund property is got in, it would not be subject to the terms of that same express trust. It could not be established, on principle, that breach of trust would be remedied by an order to deal with property otherwise than in accordance with the trust that was originally breached.

Further to Target Holdings v Redferns, there is no liability to reconstitute to the trust fund where the underlying commercial transaction has been performed. Suppose a situation in which a bank conducts a transaction in a context where it is in a fiduciary position in relation to its client. Suppose the customer invests an amount of capital with that bank with the investment aim of taking a position only on the performance of ordinary shares on the FTSE-100. That bank will be liable to reconstitute the fund placed with it if it takes unacceptable risks with that fund in breach of trust and causes loss to the client, but not if the underlying commercial purpose of the transaction has been performed.¹⁴⁵ Therefore, the bank would not be liable for a fall in price of shares, but it would be liable if it invested in bonds instead of shares which fell markedly in value.

So, in Target Holdings v Redferns, obtaining security over property was the commercial purpose of the trust. The loss suffered by the beneficiary did not flow from the technical breach of trust. The issue is therefore whether the appropriate claim is breach of contract, negligence or breach of trust. It is submitted that allocation of risk and not conscionability is 143 Vandervell v IRC [1967] 2 AC 291; see section 5.7 above.

144 See Davern, 1997.

145 Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421.

the only useful analysis of this issue in relation to the share dealing transactions considered immediately above.¹⁴⁶ While it is an established principle of equity that the imposition of a fiduciary duty cannot be used to enlarge contractual duties, in the application of rules of equity, it is suggested that there ought to be a conceptual difference between a commercial trust and a traditional family trust, such that non-compliance with instructions becomes really a matter of contract rather than a matter of trust in commercial cases.

18.3.9 Breach of trust in relation to investment of the trust fund

For a detailed consideration of liability for breach of trust as it relates to the investment of the trust property, see para 9.9.1 above.

18.4 DEFENCES TO LIABILITY FOR BREACH OF TRUST

While there are, potentially, a large number of defences to a claim for breach of trust, this section highlights the most significant of them.

18.4.1 Lack of a causal link between breach and loss

The claimant is required to prove a causal link between the loss suffered and the breach of trust.¹⁴⁷ If there is no link between the breach of trust and the loss, then the trustee will not be liable for any loss that is suffered. The discussion of Target Holdings v Redferns in this chapter has demonstrated this principle.

18.4.2 Breach committed by another trustee

The alternative defence which an individual trustee may put forward is that the breach of trust was the responsibility of another trustee. One trustee is not held to be liable for the actions or omissions of any other trustee.¹⁴⁸ So, for example, a trustee will be liable for custody of money only where that trustee has given a receipt for that property, and not otherwise.¹⁴⁹ A trustee will only be liable in this context for any wilful default¹⁵⁰ or for a failure to ensure, for example, that money has been properly invested, such that liability will not attach to a trustee who has attempted to ascertain that the other trustee has carried out her obligations properly.¹⁵¹ There is an obligation on a trustee to take action to protect the beneficiaries in the event that she learns of a breach of trust committed by another trustee,¹⁵² for example, by beginning a claim for restoration of the trust fund.¹⁵³

146 Hudson, 1999:1.

147 Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc (No 2) [1993] 1 WLR 1260, [1994] 1 All ER 118.

148 Townley v Sherborne (1633) Bridg 35, (1633) W & TLC 577.

149 TA 1925, s 30(1); Re Fryer (1857) 3 K & J 317; Brice v Stokes (1805) 11 Ves 319.

150 Re Vickery [1931] 1 Ch 572, 582.

151 Thompson v Finch (1856) 22 Beav 316; Hanbury v Kirkland (1829) 3 Sim 265. Cf Re Muntion [1927] 1 Ch 262.

152 Brice v Stokes (1805) 11 Ves Jr 319; Oliver v Court (1820) 8 Price 127, 166; Booth v Booth (1838) 1 Beav 125; Gough v Smith [1872] WN 18.

153 Earl Powlet v Herbert (1791) 1 Ves 297.

18.4.3 Failure by the beneficiary to alleviate loss

Failure by the beneficiary to minimise her own loss does not constitute a full defence to a claim for breach of trust, but it may serve to reduce the trustee's liability. Where the beneficiary fails to take straightforward measures to protect herself against further loss, after due notice and opportunity to do so, then the trustee will not be liable for any further loss arising after the beneficiary could have taken action to protect herself.¹⁵⁴

18.4.4 Release

Where the beneficiaries agree formally to release the trustee from any liability, the equitable doctrine of release will operate so as to protect that trustee from any liability arising from her breach of trust.¹⁵⁵ However, that does not prevent the beneficiaries from seeking equitable relief in respect of any factor which was not made known to them at the time of granting the release or which arises outside the terms of that release.¹⁵⁶ Therefore, where employees signed a release form in respect of any breach of duty by their employer, it was held that this would not prevent a claim for relief in relation to stigma attached to them when it subsequently emerged that their employer bank had been dealing dishonestly.¹⁵⁷

18.4.5 Trustee exemption clause

Where the trust instrument contains a clause excluding or limiting the trustees' liabilities, that exemption of liability provision will generally be enforced.¹⁵⁸ This position was considered in great detail in section 8.5.1.¹⁵⁹ The question in recent cases has been as to the form of exemption clause which will be enforced. A typical form of exemption clause is one which excludes the trustee's liability except in the event of the trustee's dishonesty. It was held in *Armitage v Nurse*¹⁶⁰ that such an exemption clause would be effective even to exclude liability for the trustees' own negligence in the performance of their duties. Clearly, this approach greatly limits the extent of the trustee's liability if the trustee was sufficiently well-advised to have insisted on such a contractual provision from the outset. Ordinarily, as considered above, the trustee would be liable for all loss resulting from her breach of trust without needing to identify fault or foreseeability: that a breach of trust led to loss would be sufficient to impose liability.¹⁶¹ A more restricted approach was taken in Walker v Stones,¹⁶² in which an exemption clause that sought to exclude the trustee's liability for all actions except dishonesty was held to be effective in general terms, but not so as to exclude liability

154 Corporacion Nacional del Cobre de Chile v Sogemin Metals Ltd [1997] 1 WLR 1396, 1403; Canson Enterprises Ltd v Boughton & Co (1991) 85 DLR (4th) 129, 161.

155 Lyall v Edwards (1861) 6 H & N 337, (1861) 158 ER 139; Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England v North Eastern Railway Co (1877) 4 Ch D 845; Turner v Turner (1880) 14 Ch D 829.

156 BCCI v Ali [2000] 3 All ER 51.

157 Ibid. Cf Malik v BCCI [1997] 3 All ER 1.

158 Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241; Bogg v Raper (1998) The Times, 12 April; Wight v Olswang [2000] WTLR 783; Walker v Stones [2001] QB 902. Cf Rothmere Farms Pty Ltd v Belgravia Pty Ltd (1999) 2 ITEL 159.

159 See para 8.5.1 above.

160 [1998] Ch 241; Galmerrow Securities Ltd v National Westminster Bank plc [2002] WTLR 125.

161 Target Holdings v Redfern [1996] 1 AC 421.

162 [2001] QB 902.

in circumstances in which the trustee could not reasonably have believed that her actions would be considered to be honest.

Underlying these decisions is a fundamental difference of opinion as to the minimum content of trusteeship. In Armitage v Nurse, the court took the view that exclusion clauses ought to be upheld because otherwise professional trustees would have refused to hold the office in question; however, in Walker v Stones, the court doubted the breadth of that proposition and preferred instead to look objectively at the probity of the trustee's actions.¹⁶³ Nevertheless, the principle is generally accepted that trustee exemption clauses will be effective to limit the trustee's liability; the only exception to that principle will be if the trustee has acted dishonestly. It does appear that liability for acting negligently can be excluded.¹⁶⁴

18.4.6 Excuses for breach of trust

There is a power for the court in s 61 of the TA 1925 to grant partial or total relief for breach of trust. That section provides that:

If it appears to the court that a trustee . . . is or may be personally liable for any breach of trust . . . but has acted honestly and reasonably, and ought fairly to be excused for the breach of trust and for omitting to obtain the directions of the court in the matter in which he committed such breach, then the court may relieve him either wholly or partly from personal liability for the same.

Therefore, the question is whether or not a trustee has acted honestly such that the court considers it appropriate to relieve her of her liability. This provision was directed primarily at the perceived harshness of the case law on breach of trust, which tended to hold amateur trustees liable for the whole of any loss suffered by beneficiaries in circumstances in which there was no reason to suppose that those trustees had held themselves out as having any particular competence to manage the trust to any particular standard. So, in Re Evans (Deceased),¹⁶⁵ a daughter acted as administrator in her deceased father's estate, holding that estate on trust for herself and her brother beneficially as next-of-kin under the intestacy rules. When she came to distribute the estate she assumed that her brother was dead because she had not heard from him for 30 years. The defendant bought an insurance policy to pay out half the value of the estate in the event that her brother re-appeared. Her brother did re-appear four years later and claimed that the defendant had breached the trust by taking all of the fund for herself beneficially, and claimed further that the insurance policy would be insufficient to meet his total loss. The judge concluded that the defendant ought to be granted partial relief: her liability was limited to the amount which could be met from the sale of a house forming part of the estate. Otherwise, the approach of the courts has been to take a case-by-case approach to relief under this provision, dependent usually on whether or not the trustee has acted reasonably¹⁶⁶ in the manner in which she might have handled her own 163 Cf para 8.5.5 above and para 21.2.4 below. Cf In Williams WT (2000) 2 ITELR 313, permitting such clauses in the USA.

164 Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241.

165 [1999] 2 All ER 777; Lowry and Edmunds, 2002.

166 Chapman v Browne [1902] 1 Ch 785.

property,¹⁶⁷ or whether the trustee acted unreasonably by leaving the trust property in the hands of a third party without good reason¹⁶⁸ or on an erroneous understanding of the law.¹⁶⁹ It has been held that if a trustee has acted grossly negligently in breaching her trust obligations – in that case by paying trust moneys out to people who were not entitled to them on the terms of the trust – then the relief under s 61 would not be available to the trustee.¹⁷⁰

On this basis, there may be a defence for the trustee where she can demonstrate that there was a good reason for the sale or misapplication of the trust property.¹⁷¹ Therefore, where a trustee breaches the precise terms of a trust by investing in property outwith the investment powers contained in the trust deed, in circumstances where the trustee is able to demonstrate that the technical breach of trust protected the beneficiaries from losses which they would otherwise have suffered, it will be open to that trustee to maintain that the breach of trust is therefore not actionable. At one level it would be necessary for the beneficiary to demonstrate loss in any event. On the authority of Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc,¹⁷² even if a small loss had been suffered, it is open to a trustee to demonstrate that the investment strategy applied was adopted both for the long-term benefit of the beneficiaries and to guard against future risk to the fund. If proven, such an argument would constitute a good defence to a claim for compensation for breach of trust arising out of such a loss on the basis that it shielded the fund from future loss even if it failed to generate the maximum short-term gain.¹⁷³ Evidently, the trustee would be required to prove that the adopted course of action was indeed wellfounded in accordance with market practice, and further that any loss was reasonable to achieve that alternative goal.¹⁷⁴

18.4.7 Action not in connection with fiduciary duties, or action permitted by the terms of the trust

Most obviously, the trustee will not be liable for breach of trust in circumstances in which either the terms of the trust permit the action complained of¹⁷⁵ or if the action complained of is not connected to the trustee's fiduciary duties.¹⁷⁶ For example, in Ward v Brunt,¹⁷⁷ a family farm business was left without anyone to run it after Norman Ward died. Norman had left the farm to be held equally for his grandchildren such that the farm business was to be run by them as partners. Susan, one of the beneficiaries under this arrangement, gave up her work as a teacher to take over the running of the farm because no one else was prepared to do so. Susan was thus a fiduciary in relation to the other partners. Norman's executors offered Susan an option to purchase the freehold over the farm, in accordance with the terms of Norman's will, which Susan subsequently agreed to exercise. Thus, Susan acquired the 167 Re Stuart [1897] 2 Ch 583; Re Barker (1898) 77 LT 712. See also Perrins v Bellamy [1898] 2 Ch 521, per Kekewich J.

168 Wynne v Tempest (1897) 13 TLR 360; Re Second East Dulwich etc Building Society (1899) 68 LJ Ch 196.

169 Ward-Smith v Jebb (1964) 108 SJ 919.

170 Barraclough v Mell [2005] EWHC B17 (Ch), [98], per Judge Behrens QC.

171 Ibid.

172 Ibid.

173 [1993] 1 WLR 1260, [1994] 1 All ER 118.

174 On these issues, see generally Chapter 9 in relation to the investment of trust funds.

175 Galmerrow Securities Ltd v National Westminster Bank plc [2002] WTLR 125.

176 Ward v Brunt [2000] WTLR 731.

177 Ibid.

freehold over the land and Susan personally became landlord to the business which she had agreed to run on behalf of the partnership. In time, Susan decided to serve a notice to quit on the farm business. The other beneficiaries contended that this service of the notice to quit was in breach of Susan's fiduciary duties as manager of the trust's business. It was held that Susan did not breach her fiduciary duties to the partnership in acquiring the freehold of the farm for herself and in consequence she was entitled to exercise all of the rights of a freeholder to serve a notice to quit on tenants of the property. Furthermore, Susan was not liable for the profits which she made from having a freehold with vacant possession after the termination of the lease. Therefore, there is no liability for breach of trust, even if the fiduciary is acting contrary to the interests of the beneficiaries, provided that the powers which the fiduciary is exercising accrue to her in a personal capacity or derive from her beneficial capacity. In this case, Susan's powers accrue to her in a personal capacity and derive from her beneficial ownership of the freehold.

18.4.8 Concurrence by a beneficiary in a breach of trust

If a beneficiary concurs or acquiesces in a breach of trust, then that beneficiary is estopped from seeking to recover compensation for that breach of trust from any trustees to whom that concurrence was proffered.¹⁷⁸ To demonstrate that a beneficiary has concurred in a breach of trust that beneficiary must have had sufficient knowledge of the breach of trust. The principles have been explained in the following manner:¹⁷⁹

The . . . court has to consider all the circumstances in which the concurrence of the cestui qui trust was given with a view to seeing whether it is fair and equitable that, having given his concurrence, he should afterwards turn round and sue the trustees; . . . subject to this, it is not necessary that he should know that what he is concurring in is a breach of trust, provided that he fully understand what he is concurring in, and . . . it is not necessary that he should himself have directly benefited by the breach of trust.

Therefore, the most significant underlying factor is the fairness and equity in the beneficiary bringing an action for compensation for breach of trust. In essence, one cannot have known of and agreed to something in relation to which one subsequently seeks to recover compensation.

18.4.9 Change of position

There is authority to suggest that the defence of change of position may potentially have been available for claims for breach of trust. This defence is considered in detail in Chapter 19. The only defence which would have been available in Haugesund Kommune v Depfa

178 White v White (1798–1804) 5 Ves 554; Evans v Benyon (1888) 37 Ch D 329; Re Pauling's Settlement Trusts [1964] Ch 303, at 335, [1962] 1 WLR 86, at 106. Cf Chillingworth v Chambers [1896] 1 Ch 685.

179 Re Pauling's Settlement Trusts [1962] 1 WLR 86, at 108, per Wilberforce J. See also Re Garnett (1885) 31 Ch D 1, a case dealing with release but adopted for this purpose; and Holder v Holder [1968] Ch 353; Re Freeston's Charity [1978] Ch 741, relating specifically to acquiescence. See further Spellson v George (1992) 26 NSWLR 666.

*ACS Bank*¹⁸⁰ was the defence of change of position.¹⁸¹ It was held that this was a transaction in which the recipient of the payments knew that they would have to be repaid and therefore that the defence of change of position would not apply.¹⁸²

18.5 ALLOCATING CLAIMS

There are two issues considered in short compass in this section. First, how does the claimant decide which of a potentially large number of claims to pursue? Secondly, how does the court decide how liability for loss suffered by the claimant is allocated between a large number of defendants?

18.5.1 Choice between remedies

As considered above, there is a possibility of a number of remedies, ranging from those associated with tracing claims, to those associated with restoration of the value of specific property, to those based on compensation.¹⁸³ There is then a question as to the remedy which the beneficiary is required to pursue in all the circumstances. The equitable doctrine of election arises in such situations to provide that it is open to the claimant to elect between alternative remedies.¹⁸⁴ In Tang v Capacious Investments, the possibility of parallel remedies arose in relation to a breach of trust, for the plaintiff beneficiary to claim an account of profits from the malfasant trustee or to claim damages representing the lost profits to the trust. It was held that these two remedies existed in the alternative and therefore that the plaintiff could claim both, not being required to elect between them until judgment was awarded in its favour. Clearly, the court would not permit double recovery in respect of the same loss, thus requiring election between those remedies ultimately.

18.5.2 Allocation of liability between defendants

The manner in which the courts apportion liability between the trustees was considered above.¹⁸⁵ There is a difficulty in deciding which of a number of defendants will be required to make good the claimant's loss. It may be that the first defendant acted deliberately to defraud the claimant, whereas the other defendants would claim to be less culpable because they did not act deliberately, or because the first defendant's actions were the primary factor in causing the loss, or some similar explanation. In such a situation, the court will typically require the defendant who is most culpable to bear the larger share of the loss in fact.¹⁸⁶ It has been suggested that the courts will typically take into account the following factors: how large a role each defendant played in causing the loss; the level of moral blameworthiness

180 [2010] EWCA Civ 579.

181 Cf Goss v Chilcott [1997] 2 All ER 110, [1996] AC 788.

182 The approach of Pill LJ to change of position was cited with approval in Ibrahim v Barclays Bank [2011] EWHC 1897 (Ch).

183 Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421.

184 Tang v Capacious Investments Ltd [1996] 1 All ER 193. See Birks, 2000:1, 8.

185 See para 18.2.4 above.

186 Monetary Fund v Hashim (1994) The Times, 11 October; Dairy Containers Ltd v NZI Bank Ltd [1995] 2 NZLR 30; Re Mulligan [1998] 1 NZLR 481; Dubai Aluminium Co Ltd v Salaam [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep 415, CA.

attaching to each defendant; and the extent to which each defendant had taken some personal benefit from the breach of trust.¹⁸⁷ Of course, it should not be forgotten that each defendant to a claim for breach of trust is potentially liable for the entire loss if, for example, the other defendants are bankrupt at the time of the trial.

18.5.3 Limitation period

One point which has arisen recently is whether there is any limitation period on an action for account. It has been held that the appropriate period is that for common law fraud, unless there has been a dishonest breach of fiduciary duty, in which case there is no period applicable.¹⁸⁸

¹⁸⁷ Mitchell, 2000.

¹⁸⁸ Coulthard v Disco Mix Club Ltd [2000] 1 WLR 707; Paragon Finance v DB Thakerar [1999] 1 All ER 400; Raja v Lloyds TSB Bank plc (2000) The Times, 16 May; Cia de Seguros Imperio v Heath (REBX) Ltd [2001] 1 WLR 112.

Tracing

19.1	TRACING – UNDERSTANDING THE NATURE OF THE CLAIM	889
19.1.1	Introduction	889
19.1.2	The distinction between following, common law tracing and equitable tracing	894
19.1.3	Tracing is a process, not a remedy	894
19.2	COMMON LAW TRACING	895
19.2.1	Introduction	896
19.2.2	Understanding the limitations	897
19.2.3	A new direction	897
19.3	EQUITABLE TRACING	899
19.3.1	Introduction	900
19.3.2	Need for a prior equitable interest	900
19.3.3	The benefits of equitable tracing	902
19.4	EQUITABLE TRACING INTO MIXED FUNDS	904
19.4.1	Mixture of trust money with trustee’s own money	905
19.4.2	Mixture of two trust funds or mixture with innocent volunteer’s property	907
19.4.3	Tracing payments made by mistake	915
19.5	LOSS OF THE RIGHT TO TRACE	916
19.5.1	Loss of the right to trace: the general principle	916
19.5.2	Lowest intermediate balance	918
19.5.3	Tracing through electronic bank accounts	919
19.6	CLAIMING: TRUSTS AND REMEDIES	920
19.6.1	What form of remedy would be most appropriate: a charge, a lien or a constructive trust?	921
19.6.2	Constructive trust recognised in response to equitable tracing claims	923
19.6.3	Charges and liens in tracing	928
19.6.4	Subrogation	931
19.6.5	Swollen assets theory	932
19.6.6	An oddity with tracing remedies	933
19.6.7	Choice of remedies	934

19.7 DEFENCES	934
19.7.1 Change of position	935
19.7.2 Estoppel by representation	944
19.7.3 Passing on	945
19.7.4 Bona fide purchaser for value without notice	945
19.7.5 Consensual transfer	948
19.8 ISSUES WITH TRACING	949
19.8.1 Does conscience matter in relation to equitable tracing?	949
19.8.2 Tracing as part of equity and property law, not restitution	950
19.8.3 Tracing into stolen property	951

OVERVIEW

In situations in which the claimant seeks to identify a specific item of property (or its 'clean' substitute) in the hands of the defendant, the claimant will pursue a common law 'following' claim to require the return of that specific item of property.¹

The more complex situation is that in which the claimant's property has passed into the hands of the defendant but has been substituted for another item of property in which the claimant has never previously had any proprietary rights. The claimant may pursue either a common law tracing claim,² or an equitable tracing claim³ to assert title to the substitute property as being representative of the claimant's original property. In the event that the original property or the substitute property has been mixed with other property then the claimant will only be able to bring an equitable tracing claim, because common law tracing claims are restricted to situations in which the property against which the claim is brought remains separate from all other property. An equitable tracing claim requires that the claimant had some pre-existing equitable proprietary right in that property⁴ – although the validity of this latter rule has been doubted by many commentators.⁵

The particular difficulty arises in relation to money passed through bank accounts. English law treats each payment of money as being effectively distinct tangible property such that, when a bank account containing such money is run overdrawn, that property is said to disappear.⁶ Consequently, there can be no tracing claim in respect of property which has ceased to exist.⁷

1 FC Jones (A Firm) v Jones [1996] 3 WLR 703 – considered below at para 19.2.3.

2 Ibid.

3 Pilcher v Rawlins (1872) LR 7 Ch App 259; Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669; Boscawen v Bajwa [1996] 1 WLR 328.

4 Re Diplock's Estate [1948] Ch 465; Boscawen v Bajwa [1996] 1 WLR 328.

5 Eg, Smith, 1997.

6 Eg, Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

7 Roscoe v Winder [1915] 1 Ch 62.

The process of tracing, and identifying property over which a remedy is sought, is different from the issue of asserting a remedy in respect of that property.⁸ Tracing is simply the process of identifying property against which the claimant may bring a claim; whereas the question as to the form of remedy which the court may award in support of that property right is a separate question. Aside from the loss of the right to trace, remedies in relation to tracing claims may typically include: the establishment of a constructive trust, an equitable charge, a lien, possibly a resulting trust, and subrogation.⁹ In relation to mixtures of trust and other money held in bank accounts, a variety of approaches has been taken in the courts from the application of the old first-in, first-out principle,¹⁰ to the establishment of proportionate shares in any substitute property.¹¹

Defences available in relation to tracing claims include change of position,¹² bona fide purchase of the property for value,¹³ estoppel by representation,¹⁴ and passing on.¹⁵

19.1 TRACING – UNDERSTANDING THE NATURE OF THE CLAIM

19.1.1 Introduction

This chapter considers the law relating to tracing. The function of the law of tracing is to enable the owner of property to recover that property in the event that it is taken from her involuntarily. By ‘involuntarily’ is meant that the owner has not agreed to any transfer of title in that property to the defendant. It may be that the property has been stolen, or taken in breach of trust, or taken by mistake: whatever the cause, the owner has not consented fully to giving that property up to the defendant.

Tracing operates on three levels. At the first level it might be that all the owner is seeking to do is to recover her original property from the defendant. At the second level, the owner might be seeking to recover both her original property and any profits which have been realised from the defendant’s use of the property. At the third level, the owner may not be able to recover her original property because that property has been mixed with other property, or it cannot be found, or some other person has acquired good title to it by virtue, for example, of having purchased it in good faith.¹⁶ In such a situation, the owner may seek to establish property rights against some other property which the defendant has acquired by using the original property. Therefore, the claimant is seeking to assert title to substitute property, which might take the form of sale proceeds received on the sale of the original property, or of property acquired with those sale proceeds, or of some composite property in which the original property has been combined in some way. This substitute property we will refer to as the ‘traceable proceeds’ of the original property. The reason why we will use the term ‘traceable proceeds’ is that the owner’s rights in the original property are traced into the substitute property. This third category of cases is clearly the most difficult and will form the

8 Boscawen v Bajwa [1996] 1 WLR 328.

9 As considered at section 19.5 below.

10 Clayton’s Case (1816) 1 Mer 572.

11 Barlow Clowes International Ltd (In Liquidation) and Others v Vaughan and Others [1992] 4 All ER 22.

12 Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale [1991] 2 AC 548; Scottish Equitable v Derby [2001] 3 All ER 818.

13 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

14 National Westminster Bank plc v Somer International (UK) Ltd [2001] Lloyd’s Rep Bank 263.

15 Kleinwort Benson v Birmingham City Council [1996] 4 All ER 733, CA.

16 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

principal focus of this chapter.¹⁷ A worked example of the issues raised is given below; however, there are other matters which require mention first.

There is an important point of distinction to be made between seeking to establish title in the original item of property which was previously owned, and seeking to establish title to substitute property (or traceable proceeds) which is not the exact property which was previously owned. Clearly, the former case requires the claimant to say 'That property is mine and I want it back'. In many cases this will be a case of fact and proof. Suppose my car is taken from me – a car which I will be able to identify by its registration plates and chassis number – I will wish to have that very car returned to me once I have proved that the car in the defendant's possession bears my number plates and chassis number and is therefore demonstrably my car. However, suppose that my car was taken from me and sold to someone who has moved, such that I cannot now find my car. In that case, I would be forced to bring proceedings against the person who took the car from me to recover the sale proceeds of the car from her: that is, money which had never previously belonged to me but which is clearly derived directly from the sale of my property. To establish such a claim would require me to trace my property rights from the car into the cash which the defendant has received. The former situation is clearly a process that recognises my original ownership, whereas the latter situation involves the proposition that it is somehow morally 'correct' for the defendant to give up the money which was received from the wrongful sale of my car. That process of following and tracing rights in property in these ways is our principal focus in this chapter.

The conceptual problem that these issues pose is the difficulty of the claimant trying to establish rights in property in which she had never previously had any rights. For example, if a thief steals my property and sells it to a bona fide purchaser, this sale would have the result that the bona fide purchaser¹⁸ would take good title in equity to the property.¹⁹ I will wish to argue that I have property rights in the sale proceeds which the thief has realised from the sale of the stolen goods. Of course, I have never had property rights in that particular money before. However, common sense would dictate that I ought to be entitled to take that money from the thief to make good my loss as a victim of crime. This also serves the subsidiary benefit of punishing the thief.²⁰

Before launching into the law relating to tracing, it is important to understand the factual problems which generate it. This worked example should illustrate the issues. Suppose the following set of facts:

Timothy, a trustee, physically removed a painting which formed part of a trust fund in breach of trust. Timothy will therefore bear the liability of breach of trust considered in Chapter 18. Suppose then that the painting was transferred by Timothy to another person, Anne, his accomplice. There are three possible, factual scenarios to consider, 17 The word 'owned' here is an admittedly ugly usage. As will emerge from the ensuing discussion, there are different forms of tracing claim at common law and in equity, as well as claims to vindicate rights in property.

The word 'owned' will serve, for the time being, to cover a broad range of possible states of affairs at law and in equity.

18 I.e., a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the victim's rights in the property; or 'Equity's darling'.

19 Pilcher v Rawlins (1872) LR 7 Ch App 259; Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

20 More specific reading in this area is the excellent Smith, 1997.

as set out below, under which the beneficiaries might seek to establish rights in the property.

(1) Identifying the original property

First, suppose that Timothy transferred the painting to Anne, his accomplice, and that Timothy has no money to make good the loss to the trust fund in relation to his liability for breach of trust. Therefore, although the beneficiaries would ordinarily proceed against Timothy for a breach of trust claim,²¹ it is clear that that claim will be of no value to them if Timothy has no money to make good their loss. Suppose that Anne still has the painting in her possession at the time of the claim. In that circumstance, all that the beneficiaries would be required to do would be positively to identify the painting as being the one taken in breach of trust, and to have that painting restored to the trust fund. This claim will be considered under the general heading of ‘common law tracing’ (or, more specifically, ‘following’) at section 19.2 below.²² We could describe this claim as simply vindicating the beneficiaries’ right in the painting by ordering a retransfer of the painting to the trust fund.²³ Lord Millett has described this notion of following in this fashion: ‘[f]ollowing is the process of following the same asset as it moves from hand to hand.’²⁴

(2) Substitute property

Secondly, suppose that Timothy transferred the painting to Anne but that Anne sells the painting on to a third person. If Timothy had no money to make good the loss to the trust fund then he would not be able to satisfy a judgment based on breach of trust. Suppose further that Anne did not have the painting in her possession at the time of the claim. Rather, the painting had been sold to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the breach of trust and is now unobtainable (for reasons considered later).²⁵ Clearly, the beneficiaries cannot now recover the original painting. Suppose, however, that Anne does still have the proceeds of sale of the painting remaining in cash in an envelope under her bed.

The claim on behalf of the beneficiaries is more complex in this second example because the property at issue is not the original property, the painting, which the trustees had previously held on trust for the beneficiaries; rather, it constitutes the sale proceeds received on transfer of that property. This money did not form a part of the trust fund. However, it is clearly identifiable as a substitute for the property which Timothy and Anne took from the trust. If the sale proceeds have been held distinct from all other property then the beneficiaries may be able to bring a common law tracing claim.²⁶ What the beneficiaries would be required to do here would be properly described as ‘tracing’, as opposed to merely ‘following’ as explained below, because the property in Anne’s hands is different property acquired as a

21 Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421, [1995] 3 WLR 352, [1995] 3 All ER 785.

22 FC Jones (A Firm) v Jones [1996] 3 WLR 703.

23 Foskett v McKeown [2001] 1 AC 102.

24 Ibid.

25 Pilcher v Rawlins (1872) LR 7 Ch App 259; Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

26 FC Jones (A Firm) v Jones [1996] 3 WLR 703 – considered below at para 19.2.3.

substitute for the painting.²⁷ Nevertheless, the claim here is comparatively straightforward because the sale proceeds are clearly a ‘clean’ substitute for the painting and have not been mixed with any other property.

As will emerge from the discussion which follows, there is authority that a common law tracing claim will allow a claimant to establish rights in property in circumstances in which the original property and any substitute property, or property added to the original property and forming part of it, are kept distinct from all other property.²⁸ For example, provided that the sale proceeds were kept in a bank account separate from all other moneys, it would be possible for the claimant to establish rights on both the sale proceeds and any interest earned on that money held in the account.²⁹

If the sale proceeds had been mixed with other property then the claim becomes more complex because common law tracing does not extend to mixtures of property.³⁰ The claim to be brought in this latter example would be an ‘equitable tracing claim’. This form of claim is considered next.

(3) Mixtures of property

Thirdly, as before, suppose that Timothy has transferred the painting in breach of trust to Anne. Timothy has no money to make good the loss to the trust fund. Suppose that Anne does not have the painting in her possession at the time of the claim. Rather, the painting has been sold and is now unobtainable.³¹ Importantly, Anne does hold the proceeds of sale of the painting separately, but rather Anne has paid that money into a bank account along with other money unconnected to the breach of trust. Therefore, the sale proceeds derived from the sale of the painting have been mixed with other property unconnected with the breach of trust.

This situation is similar to example (2) above in that the original trust property has been substituted for money. Therefore, the claim is an equitable tracing claim, seeking to assert that it would be unconscionable for Timothy and Anne to refuse to transfer the money to the trust as a substitute for the painting taken from the trust fund. The added difficulty here is that the money which was substituted for the painting has been irretrievably commingled with other money. The issue considered in detail later in this chapter is how to award a proprietary right to the beneficiaries over such a mixed fund. The cases have taken a number of different approaches. In short, the claimant may be entitled to a charge over the mixed fund,³² or entitled to proprietary rights in property acquired from that mixed fund,³³ or ²⁷ Foskett v McKeown [2001] 1 AC 102.

²⁸ FC Jones (A Firm) v Jones [1996] 3 WLR 703.

²⁹ Ibid.

³⁰ Taylor v Plumer (1815) 3 M & S 562; Agip v Jackson [1990] Ch 265, 286, per Millett J; [1991] Ch 547 CA; El Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings [1993] 3 All ER 717. However, see Smith, 1995:2, 240, suggesting that Taylor v Plumer in fact turned on questions of equitable tracing.

³¹ Again, perhaps because it has been sold to a bona fide purchaser without notice of the beneficiaries’ rights.

³² Re Diplock’s Estate [1948] Ch 465.

³³ Various calculated in Clayton’s Case (1816) 1 Mer 572; Barlow Clowes International Ltd (In Liquidation) and Others v Vaughan and Others [1992] 4 All ER 22.

entitled to a constructive trust³⁴ over such property,³⁵ or entitled to be subrogated to the rights of some person with an interest in that fund.³⁶ These doctrines are explained fully later.

Comparison with personal liability to account

It is worth remembering that the tracing claims, based on the facts above, will operate in tandem with other principles considered already in this book. Timothy will be liable for breach of trust either to provide compensation, or to reconstitute the trust fund directly.³⁷ Anne will be liable for knowing receipt of the trust property,³⁸ and possibly for dishonest assistance in that breach of trust.³⁹ Personal liability to account is therefore a liability to pay an amount of compensation equal to the loss suffered by the trust. Importantly, personal liability to account is a purely personal claim such that if Timothy or Anne were to go into insolvency, the claimant would have no advantage in that insolvency because the claimant would have no proprietary rights.

By contrast, the focus of the tracing rules is on establishing a claim to specific property. Where that property is particularly valuable, or likely to increase in value, the establishment of a proprietary claim will enable the claimant to claim entitlement to any profits derived from that property.⁴⁰ In some circumstances, a proprietary claim will entitle the claimant to recover compound interest (rather than merely simple interest) on the property recovered.⁴¹ Therefore, there are frequently advantages in establishing a proprietary claim.

So, to alter the hypothetical facts slightly: if Anne organises the means by which Timothy can sell that painting through art dealers but does not touch the painting herself, then Anne will face liability for dishonest assistance in a breach of trust.⁴² If Bert were to receive the painting and store it prior to selling it on Timothy's behalf, Bert will face liability for knowing receipt of property in breach of trust.⁴³ As explained in Chapter 20, these actions would impose personal claims for the value of the property passed on to Anne and Bert rather than any proprietary liability in favour of the beneficiaries. However, the focus of this chapter is on the claim brought on behalf of the beneficiaries to assert proprietary rights to recover the painting itself, or any property substituted for the painting. Frequently, all of these claims (whether personal or proprietary) will be pursued simultaneously by the beneficiaries.⁴⁴ This is, in truth, the search for a solvent defendant: that is, anyone who will be able to make good the claimant's losses. As such, the issues considered in this chapter will typically form a part only of the web of claims brought in relation to any one set of facts.

34 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

35 El Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings [1993] 3 All ER 717.

36 Boscawen v Bajwa [1996] 1 WLR 328.

37 Target Holdings v Redfern [1996] 1 AC 421.

38 Re Polly Peck International [1992] 3 All ER 769.

39 If the property had not passed through A's hands – Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378.

40 Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324.

41 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669. Cf Sempra Metals v IRC [2008] Bus LR 49.

42 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378.

43 Re Polly Peck International [1992] 3 All ER 769.

44 See, eg, Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale [1991] 2 AC 548.

19.1.2 The distinction between following, common law tracing and equitable tracing

The distinction between following and tracing has been explained by Lord Millett in the following terms:⁴⁵

[Following and tracing] are both exercises in locating assets which are or may be taken to represent an asset belonging to the [claimants] and to which they assert ownership. The processes of following and tracing are, however, distinct. Following is the process of following the same asset as it moves from hand to hand. Tracing is the process of identifying a new asset as the substitute for the old.

A following claim requires simply that a specific piece of property is followed and identified by its original common law owner, thus being returned to that original owner.⁴⁶ In short, following claims appear to have more in common with a principle of vindicating the rights of the original owner in the very property which was taken from him as opposed to the establishment of a derivative claim in other property which is said to represent the property taken.⁴⁷ On the other hand, a tracing claim concerns the identification of property or value in which the claimant has some pre-existing interest which the court is then asked to recognise – typically because the claimant’s original property has been substituted by a wrongdoer for the property claimed.

There is also a distinction between common law tracing and equitable tracing, as suggested above. This chapter will focus on equitable tracing for the most part, after disposing of common law tracing at section 19.2 below. In short, the common law will allow tracing only into the original property which was taken from its original owner. Latterly, this jurisdiction has been extended to include ‘clean substitutions’, where the original property is substituted by other property but where that substitute property is kept distinct from all other property.⁴⁸ Equitable tracing is by far the more extensive jurisdiction because it entitles the claimant to rights not only in property substituted for the original property taken in breach of trust, but also in mixtures into which such property is passed.⁴⁹

19.1.3 Tracing is a process, not a remedy

Tracing is a process. Tracing itself does not provide a remedy.⁵⁰ It does nothing more than trace a right in an original piece of property into subsequent items of property or value. Having performed the tracing element, there is then the further issue as to the form of remedy which should be granted or the form of trust which arises. Therefore, the lawyer is required to do two things, one after the other: first, trace into the appropriate property; and, secondly, identify the best remedy to bring against that property. That is why this part is titled Breach

45 Foskett v McKeown [2001] 1 AC 102.

46 See Smith, 1997, 1–14.

47 An issue pursued in Chapter 31.

48 FC Jones (A Firm) v Jones [1996] 3 WLR 703.

49 It is a pre-requisite of equitable tracing, on the current understanding of the authorities, that there has been some pre-existing equitable or fiduciary relationship to invoke the equitable jurisdiction, see Shalson v Russo [2003] EWHC 1637 (Ch), para [02].

50 Boscawen v Bajwa [1996] 1 WLR 328. Filby v Mortgage Express (No 2) Ltd [2004] EWCA Civ 759 and Bracken Partners Ltd v Gutteridge [2004] 1 BCLC 377. See also Smith, 1997.

of Trust and Related Equitable Claims. The term ‘claims’ is very important. The legal rules and equitable principles considered in the early sections of this chapter concern only the right of the claimant first, to identify property derived from her property and then secondly, to bring a claim to assert proprietary rights over identified property. For ease of reference, I shall refer to this process and the claim to a remedy as a ‘tracing claim’ or as a ‘tracing action’. The remedy which the court will then impose is a separate issue. If the claimant cannot prove that any given property was derived from her original property, then there will be no right to claim any sort of remedy.⁵¹ As outlined above, the court may make an order for compensation,⁵² an order that the property be restored by direct transfer to the original owner,⁵³ or an order that the property be held on resulting trust⁵⁴ or constructive trust,⁵⁵ or be subject to a charge.⁵⁶ That eventual remedy is a separate issue from the question whether or not the claimant can establish a tracing claim against identified property in the first place.

The distinction is made plain in *Boscawen v Bajwa*⁵⁷ in the judgment of Millett LJ, where his Lordship held that:

Tracing properly so-called, however, is neither a claim nor a remedy but a process . . . It is the process by which the plaintiff traces what has happened to his property, identifies the persons who have handled it or received it, and justifies his claim that the money which they handled or received (and if necessary which they still retain) can properly be regarded as representing his property. He needs to do this because his claim is based on the retention by him of a beneficial interest in the property which the defendant handled or received. Unless he can prove this, he cannot (in the traditional language of equity) raise an equity against the defendant . . .

This is an important first point. Part 9 considers the equitable remedies which may be available; Part 4 has already dealt with constructive trusts and resulting trusts. Common law remedies may be available in relation to common law tracing, encompassing remedies beyond the scope of this book such as the simple common law restitution of property and an action for money had and received.⁵⁸ The following discussion will therefore consider the appropriate tracing rules at common law and in equity before moving on to consider the manner in which the courts have used trusts and equitable remedies to address questions of tracing.

19.2 COMMON LAW TRACING

In situations in which the claimant seeks to identify a specific item of property in the hands of the defendant in which the claimant has retained proprietary rights, the 51 Ultraframe UK Ltd v Fielding [2005] EWHC 1638 (Ch), [2005] All ER (D) 397, [1471].

52 Target Holdings v Redfern [1996] 1 AC 421, [1995] 3 WLR 352, [1995] 3 All ER 785.

53 Foskett v McKeown [2000] 3 All ER 97.

54 El Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings [1993] 3 All ER 717.

55 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

56 Barlow Clowes International Ltd (In Liquidation) and Others v Vaughan and Others [1992] 4 All ER 22. [1995] 4 All ER 769.

58 Cf Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

claimant will seek a common law tracing claim to require the return of that specific item of property.

19.2.1 Introduction

Common law tracing permits the claimant to identify that a particular item of property belongs at common law to the claimant. What is required is that the claimant is able to demonstrate that the property claimed is the very property which is to be restored, or that the property claimed has not been mixed with any other property. Therefore, in a situation in which a partner in a solicitors' firm took money from a client account to gamble at a casino, the casino held some money separately in an account for the partner. The partner's firm sought to recover the moneys paid to the casino which had come originally from its client account through, inter alia, common law tracing. It was held that there was a right to claim in common law tracing in respect of those amounts of money which were identifiable as having come from that client account.⁵⁹ That is, the claimant could establish common law tracing rights against sums of money held by the casino to the partner's account which could be proven to have come from the firm's account and passed to the defendant without being mixed with other moneys. Provided that money in bank accounts was held unmixed with other moneys, it was possible for common law tracing to be effected.⁶⁰ Note that it has been held that common law tracing cannot take effect over telegraphic transfers between electronic bank accounts because such insubstantial property will not be clearly identifiable.⁶¹

In Agip (Africa) v Jackson,⁶² the defendant accountants arranged that money would be taken from the plaintiff by means of forged payment orders made out in favour of a series of dummy companies. The intention had been to launder the money through the 'shell' companies (that is, companies created solely to carry out the defendants' fraudulent purpose) by means of passing the money through a number of bank accounts in a number of different currencies belonging to a number of different companies, but where those companies were wound up after the money had passed through their accounts.⁶³ The plaintiffs pursued a number of claims simultaneously against the defendant. One of the claims was for restitution at common law of money taken from them. It was held that for common law tracing to be available it would be necessary for the plaintiff to demonstrate that the money claimed was the very money which had been wrongfully taken from the trust by the defendant's fraud held separately from all other moneys. On the basis that money had been moved through numerous companies, currencies and bank accounts, it was held that it was no longer possible

59 Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale [1991] 2 AC 548.

60 Banque Belge pour L'Etranger v Hambrouck [1921] 1 KB 321.

61 El Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings [1993] 3 All ER 717. This approach has been followed in Nimmo v Westpac Banking Corporation [1993] 3 NZLR 218; Bank Tejarat v Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation (CI) Ltd [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep 239. Cf Birks, 1995:3. It has also been accepted that telegraphic transfer does not involve a transfer of property but rather simply an adjustment in the value of the choses in action constituted by the bank accounts: R v Preddy [1996] AC 815; considered in Chapter 31. See generally Matthews, 1995:2.

62 [1991] Ch 547, 566, per Fox LJ, [1991] 3 WLR 116, [1992] 4 All ER 451.

63 This is standard practice in money laundering. By transferring the money into different accounts, by combining it with other money and by changing it into different currencies, it becomes very difficult to prove where the original money went. The device of running the various companies insolvent means that the tracing process must be conducted through the complexities of such companies' windings up, which adds further problems.

for the original money to be identified. Consequently, common law tracing would not be available to the plaintiff in relation to those sums.⁶⁴ So, where property is taken in breach of fiduciary duty and passed through a number of companies, the beneficiary of the original fiduciary duty is entitled to trace her property rights through those successive companies.⁶⁵

19.2.2 Understanding the limitations

As is obvious from the two cases considered immediately above, the common law tracing process is very brittle. If the property becomes unidentifiable, or if it becomes mixed with any other property, then the common law tracing claim will fail. The usual tactic for the money-launderer is therefore to take the original money, to divide it up into randomly-sized portions, pay it into accounts which already contain other money, convert the money into different currencies and move it into accounts in another jurisdiction. This type of subterfuge puts that property beyond the reach of common law tracing. Instead, the claimant would be required to rely on equitable tracing, as considered at section 19.3 below.

It is these limitations which have led many leading academics and judges to recommend that the distinction between common law tracing and equitable tracing should be removed. In Agip (Africa) v Jackson, Millett J sought to preclude common law tracing from operation in circumstances where there had been anything other than clean, physical substitutions. Writing extra-judicially he has said:⁶⁶ ‘A unified and comprehensive restitutionary remedy should be developed based on equitable principles, and attempts to rationalise and develop the common law action for money had and received should be abandoned.’ These arguments are considered in more detail at the end of this chapter. However, one more recent decision of the Court of Appeal, in which Millett LJ ironically delivered the leading judgment, suggested that common law tracing may have a broader ambit than had previously been thought.⁶⁷

19.2.3 A new direction

The Court of Appeal decision in *FC Jones & Sons v Jones*⁶⁸ concerned an amount of £11,700 which was loaned by a partnership to Mrs Jones, who was the wife of one of the partners. There was no suggestion that this transaction was wrongfully performed. Mrs Jones invested the money in potato futures⁶⁹ and made a large profit. Ultimately she held a balance of £49,860: all of the money was held separately in a single bank account. Subsequently, it transpired that the partnership had committed an act of bankruptcy under the Bankruptcy Act 1914 (rendering it technically bankrupt before it had made the payment to Mrs Jones), and therefore all of the partnership property was deemed to have passed retrospectively to the Official Receiver. This meant that the Official Receiver was entitled to the £11,700 before it 64 Agip is considered in greater detail below at para 19.3.3.

65 El Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings [1993] 3 All ER 717; Bracken Partners Ltd v Gutteridge [2004] 1 BCLC 377.

66 Millett, 1991, 85.

67 FC Jones (A Firm) v Jones [1996] 3 WLR 703.

68 [1996] 3 WLR 703, [1996] 4 All ER 721.

69 Ie, a form of derivatives contract traded on the commodities markets which speculates on the value of potatoes in the future.

had been paid to Mrs Jones. Therefore, it was claimed that Mrs Jones had had no title to the original £11,700 and that the Official Receiver should be entitled to trace into Mrs Jones's bank account to recover the money from her.

The question, however, became more complex than that. There was no doubt that the Official Receiver was entitled to the £11,700 before the date of its transfer to Mrs Jones, and that the sum of £11,700 ought to have been recoverable by the Official Receiver. The more difficult problem was to decide whether or not the Official Receiver ought to be entitled to the entire £49,860 which Mrs Jones had generated from that initial £11,700 in her investments in potato futures.

The ordinary understanding of common law tracing would have suggested that the Official Receiver could have recovered the £11,700, being the original property, but that it could not recover any further amounts unless it could demonstrate equitable title in the property (under equitable tracing principles). On these facts there could be no equitable tracing because the partnership firm had retained no equitable interest in the money lent to Mrs Jones. Furthermore, the combination of the conversion of the original £11,700 into options contracts and then its mixture with profits made on those investments would ordinarily have meant that common law tracing would have offered no redress for the Official Receiver winding up the partnership's assets. However, the Court of Appeal held that all of the £49,860 was to be paid to the Official Receiver as part of a common law tracing claim. The rationales behind that decision suggest a significant development in the scope of common law tracing.

Millett LJ was prepared to allow a proprietary, common law claim on the basis that the money at issue in this case was perfectly identifiable in a single bank account. Here the £11,700 originally held and the £49,860 generated in profits ultimately had been held in a single bank account and not mixed with any other moneys. On the facts, there could not have been a claim in equity against Mrs Jones because she had never been in any fiduciary relationship with the Official Receiver nor with the partnership (a necessary pre-requisite of an equitable tracing claim).⁷⁰ The nature of the common law tracing right was explained by Millett LJ as being a proprietary right to claim whatever was held in the bank account, whether the amount at the time of the claim was more or less than the original amount deposited. Furthermore, it was held that it was immaterial whether or not those amounts constituted profits on the original money, or simply the original money, or a combination of the two.

For his part, Nourse LJ reached the same conclusion by a different route. His Lordship confusingly mixed personal and proprietary claims. The claim he expressed himself willing to grant was the personal claim for money had and received, but on these facts that was explained as being a right entitling the Official Receiver to a right in property representing the original property (which may therefore have been more than the original money) and not merely the original property. Furthermore, his Lordship held that the claim for money had and received was based on conscience, making it seem more like an equitable claim than a common law claim.⁷¹

Following on from Smith's work on Taylor v Plumer,⁷² the Court of Appeal accepted that the founding case on common law tracing had in fact used equitable tracing rules. Smith has taken this to be justification for the amalgamation of common law tracing with equitable tracing in the future (considered at the end of this chapter). However, the Court of Appeal held that the principle of common law tracing remained valid separate from equitable tracing nonetheless.⁷³

70 As considered below at section 19.3.

71 See Davern, 1997, 92.

72 (1815) 3 M & S 562; Smith, 1997, 162 et seq.

What is perhaps remarkable about the decision of the Court of Appeal in FC Jones (A Firm) v Jones is that the court appears to have generated an entirely novel remedy at common law. Common law recognises two remedies principally in this context:⁷⁴ common law damages;⁷⁵ and a claim for money had and received.⁷⁶ The common law does have property law concepts, of which the most obvious in this book has been the legal title held by the trustee of a trust fund. However, those common law concepts have been so little discussed in recent years that it is equitable principles to do with tracing, charges and trust which seem to have displaced them. The remedy awarded in Jones has some initial commonsensical attraction: you have my property and I wish you to return my property to me. Therefore, the Court of Appeal ordered Mrs Jones to transfer the £11,700 to the Official Receiver. As a question of property law that order is remarkable in itself, even though as a question of common sense it seems in keeping with the idea of protecting rights in property. What is even more remarkable is that the profit made on the original £11,700, bringing the total amount held in Mrs Jones's potato futures bank account to £49,860, is also able to be traced at common law. It is a little like the argument that if one owns the tree then one also owns any fruit which grows on that tree.⁷⁷ This appears to extend the common law tracing doctrine to include substitute property (that is, the profit on the original property). This remedy is akin to a vindicatio under Roman law, under which the court would order a recognition that a person's rights be vindicated. Nevertheless it appears that common law tracing will not permit a claim to pass through inter-bank clearing systems because the original property in such situations is not capable of being identified sufficiently clearly.⁷⁸

19.3 EQUITABLE TRACING

Equitable tracing is the only means by which a claimant can trace into mixtures of property, where a part of that mixture represents or comprises money in which the claimant previously held some equitable proprietary right. Particular difficulties have arisen in relation to money passed through electronically-held bank accounts. English law treats each payment of money as being distinct tangible property such that, when a bank account containing such money is run overdrawn, that property is said to 73 See, however, Millett, 1991, 71, in which Millett surprisingly argues for the elimination of common law tracing shortly before extending its ambit greatly in Jones.

74 There are other common law principles to do with identification of assets under which mixtures of tangible property will be divided on the basis of the old Roman rules of commixio and confusio (Indian Oil Corp Ltd v Greenstone Shipping SA [1987] 3 All ER 893) provided that they have not become capable of separation, in which case the claimants would become tenants in common of the combined mass (Buckley v Gross (1863) 3 B & S 566). See also Greenwood v Bennett [1973] QB 195.

75 As provided in relation to breach of contract and to compensate tortious loss.

76 Or 'a personal claim in restitution', per Lord Goff in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

77 Not that I am suggesting that potatoes grow on trees, either; it is just that that is the metaphor so loved of economists in this area.

78 FC Jones (A Firm) v Jones [1997] Ch 159, 168.

disappear. Consequently, there can be no tracing claim in respect of property which has ceased to exist.

19.3.1 Introduction

Tracing in equity (or ‘equitable tracing’) is a considerably more extensive means of tracing property rights than is available at common law. As will emerge, equitable tracing permits property rights to be traced into mixtures of property so that one of a number of different equitable remedies may be used to reconstitute the claimant’s property rights. The fundamental pre-requisite for the bringing of an equitable tracing claim is that the claimant must have had some equitable interest in the property which is to be traced before equity will entertain the claim.⁷⁹ That pre-existing equitable interest may be a beneficial interest under an express or a constructive trust. As discussed above, it is important to remember that this is a two-stage process. The first stage is for the detective work of the tracing process to be carried out so that the claimant is able to identify the property which stands as a substitute for her original property and against which she therefore wishes to bring a claim. The second stage, having traced the property, is to identify which equitable remedy should be imposed over that property. These various elements of a tracing claim are considered in turn in the sections to follow.

19.3.2 Need for a prior equitable interest

The traditional rule

It is a pre-requisite for an equitable tracing claim that the claimant had some equitable interest in the original property, or that the person who transferred that property away had some fiduciary relationship to the claimant (such as being a trustee).⁸⁰ Therefore, before starting an equitable tracing claim, one must always ensure that there is a pre-existing equitable interest.

An example of the application of this principle was the decision of the Court of Appeal in *Boscawen v Bajwa*⁸¹ that there must be a pre-existing fiduciary relationship which calls the equitable jurisdiction into being. That case concerned a purported contract for the sale of land which was not completed. Bajwa had charged the land by way of a mortgage with a building society (the Halifax Building Society) before then exchanging contracts for the sale of the property with purchasers. In turn, the purchasers had sought a mortgage with the Abbey National. The loan moneys provided by Abbey National were paid to solicitors who were entitled to use the moneys only as part of the purchase. Mistakenly, the solicitors thought that the sale was going ahead properly, but in fact the sale was never completed. This had the result that the solicitors used the Abbey National’s money to pay off Bajwa’s mortgage with the Halifax, but did not acquire a legal charge in favour of the Abbey National because the purchase did not take place. In turn, however, the solicitors who were holding the purchase moneys went into insolvency and therefore the sale could not be completed.

79 Re Diplock’s Estate [1948] Ch 465

80 Ibid.

81 [1995] 4 All ER 769.

The issue arose how the Abbey National was to recover its money, which had been held on express trust for it by the solicitors and then used to pay off Bajwa's debt with the Halifax Building Society. The more precise legal question was whether or not the bank was entitled to trace into the debt with the building society and claim a right in subrogation to the debt owed to the building society.⁸² On the facts, it was accepted that the money had been held on trust from the outset. The money could therefore be followed into the solicitors' client account. The issue was whether it could be traced further into the payment to the building society.

In explaining the ability to trace into a mixed fund, Millett LJ held that: '... equity's power to charge a mixed fund with the repayment of trust moneys enables the claimant to follow the money, not because it is his, but because it is derived from a fund which is treated as if it were subject to a charge in his favour.' In Boscawen v Bajwa, Bajwa and the solicitors were not dishonest in mixing the bank's money and Bajwa's money. Therefore, Bajwa and the bank could be treated as ranking pari passu in the making of payments. The solicitors were clearly fiduciaries. Further, Bajwa must have known that he was not entitled to that money until contracts were completed. As such, Bajwa could not keep the sale proceeds and title to the property. Bajwa could not therefore rely on the favourable tracing rules set out in *Re Diplock*⁸³ for innocent volunteers, considered below.

Liability to equitable tracing even of innocent volunteers

Significantly the defendant need not have acted unconscionably. Rather, the unconscionability will be in denying the rights of the beneficiary to their property. In Diplock the defendants had been the recipients of grants made to them by the personal representatives of a deceased testator in accordance with the terms of a residuary bequest in that will. The gift was afterwards held to have been void in other litigation by the House of Lords on the basis that its charitable purpose failed.⁸⁴ The residue was therefore to have passed on an intestacy. The next-of-kin, entitled on intestacy, brought an action to recover the money which had been paid away by the personal representatives. It was found that the recipients of the money had acted in good faith and had every reason to think that it was their property. They were held nevertheless to be subject to the rights of the residuary beneficiaries to trace after the money in equity, even though they had not themselves acted unconscionably. The beneficiaries' property rights were held to bind even 'volunteers provided that as a result of what has gone before some equitable proprietary interest has been created and attaches to the property in the hands of the volunteer'.⁸⁵ Therefore, it would not matter that the ultimate recipients were innocent of any breach of trust provided that there had been some preceding breach of an equitable duty by someone else. In effect this approach distinguishes between the source of the property rights in the hands of persons under a fiduciary duty and the further question of the remedy which might then be sought against the volunteers who then held the property. As the matter was put in Re Diplock:

once the proprietary interest has been created by equity as a result of the wrongful or unauthorised dealing by the original recipient of the money, that interest will persist and be operative against an innocent third party who is a volunteer, provided only that the ⁸² The remedy of subrogation is considered in Chapter 30.

⁸³ [1948] Ch 465.

⁸⁴ sub nom Chichester Diocesan Board v Simpson [1944] AC 341.

⁸⁵ Ibid, 530.

means of identification or disentanglement remain. For such purpose it cannot make any difference whether the mixing was done by the original recipient [that is, the fiduciary] or by the innocent third party.⁸⁶

What emerges from these dicta is that the court will seek to protect the beneficiary under the original fiduciary duty rather than allow the subsequent innocent volunteer to retain any rights in the windfall which he has received. This approach was applied by the House of Lords in Foskett v McKeown,⁸⁷ in circumstances in which a trustee took money from the trust and used it to pay the premiums on an insurance policy which was made out in favour of the trustee's children. It was held that the beneficiaries under the trust were entitled to trace in equity into the proceeds of the insurance policy after the trustee's death, thus illustrating that the limitation on the children's rights in the lump sum paid on the maturity of the insurance policy was subject to the beneficiaries' right to trace even though the children had played no part in the breach of trust. Therefore, the innocent volunteer is prima facie liable in a tracing claim, with the precise remedy to be decided, as considered below.⁸⁸

The order made in Diplock was that the innocent volunteers and the beneficiary claimants should take a pro rata share under an equitable charge in the property held in that commingled fund. This principle was encapsulated in the following terms:

Where an innocent volunteer (as distinct from a purchaser for value without notice) mixes 'money' of his own with 'money' which in equity belongs to another person, or is found in possession of such a mixture, although that other person cannot claim a charge on the mass superior to the claim of the volunteer, he is entitled, nevertheless, to a charge ranking pari passu with the claim of the volunteer . . . Such a person is not in conscience bound to give precedence to the equitable owner of the other of the two funds.⁸⁹

Therefore, it is not simply a question of conscience which gives rise to this claim, and the remedy recognises the continued rights of the innocent volunteer only in that part of the fund not derived from the trust. The claim arises to vindicate the property rights of the beneficiaries of the original trust in the items of property which were mistakenly paid away. In that sense, the equitable tracing claim is predicated on the existence of the original equitable relationship – and consequently recognises the original duties of good conscience owed to the claimant–beneficiary – and is merely enforcing that person's property rights by means of equitable tracing.

19.3.3 The benefits of equitable tracing

The benefits

The clear benefits of equitable tracing over common law tracing appear in money-laundering cases like Agip (Africa) v Jackson,⁹⁰ which upheld the core principle that there must be a ⁸⁶ Ibid, 536.

⁸⁷ [2000] 3 All ER 97.

⁸⁸ See section 19.5 below.

⁸⁹ [1948] Ch 465, 524.

⁹⁰ [1991] Ch 547, 566, per Fox LJ, [1991] 3 WLR 116, [1992] 4 All ER 451.

fiduciary relationship which calls the equitable jurisdiction into being. In Agip, on instructions from the plaintiff oil exploration company, the Banque du Sud in Tunis transmitted a payment to Lloyds Bank in London, to be passed on to a specified person. The plaintiff's chief accountant fraudulently altered the payment instruction so that the money was in fact passed on to a company called Baker Oil Ltd. Before the fraud was uncovered, Lloyds Bank had paid out under the chief accountant's instruction to Baker Oil before receiving payment from Banque du Sud via the New York payment system. The account was then closed and the money was transferred via the Isle of Man to a number of recipients controlled by the defendants. The defendants were independent accountants who ran a number of shell companies through which the moneys were paid, their intention being to pass the moneys through these companies so that the funds would become, in effect, untraceable in practice, with the ultimate intention that they would keep those moneys. The defendants were clearly rogues of the lowest sort. The issue arose whether or not the value received by Baker Oil constituted the traceable proceeds of the property transferred from Tunis.

It was held that either principal or agent can sue on the equitable tracing claim, and that the role of plaintiff was not restricted to the Banque du Sud in this case. The bank had not paid Baker Oil with 'its own money' but rather on instruction from the plaintiff oil company which was its customer (albeit that they were fraudulent instructions). Further, it was impossible to trace the money at common law where the value had been transferred by 'telegraphic transfer' thus making it impossible to identify the specific money which had been misapplied. On these facts, because the plaintiff's fiduciary (that is, its chief accountant) had acted fraudulently, it was held that it was open to the plaintiff to trace the money in equity through the shell companies and into the defendant's hands. There was also a personal liability to account imposed on those persons who had knowingly received misapplied funds, or who had dishonestly assisted in the misapplication of the funds as discussed in Chapter 20.

This case demonstrates the ability of equity to trace into complex mixtures of property beyond the jurisdiction of the common law. It is also possible for equity to make a variety of awards of trusts and other remedies, as considered below at section 19.5. The equitable jurisdiction makes awards for discovery of documents during litigation to assist in the tracing process, and also provides for injunctions which will prevent a defendant dissipating property after the date of the injunction.⁹¹

Limitations on the right to trace in equity

The question of loss of the right to trace is considered separately below,⁹² but it is useful to dwell on it while looking at the particular problem of electronic bank accounts. In Bishopsgate Investment Management v Homan,⁹³ money was taken by newspaper mogul Robert Maxwell from pension funds under his control. The beneficiaries under those pension funds sought to recover the sums taken from their trusts on the basis of an equitable tracing claim. The money had been passed into bank accounts which had gone overdrawn between the time of the payment of the money into the accounts and the bringing of the claim. On the basis that the accounts had gone overdrawn (and therefore had no property in them), it was held that 91 Eg, Bankers Trust Co v Shapira [1980] 1 WLR 1274; In Re DPR Futures Ltd [1989] 1 WLR 778.

92 See para 19.5.1.

93 [1995] Ch 211, [1995] 1 All ER 347, [1994] 3 WLR 1270.

the beneficiaries had lost their right to trace into those particular accounts because the property had disappeared from them.

The same principle appears in Roscoe v Winder,⁹⁴ where it was held that beneficiaries cannot claim an amount exceeding the lowest intermediate balance in the bank account after the money was paid in. The claimant will not be entitled to trace into any such property where the account has been run overdrawn at any time since the property claimed was paid into it. It would be possible for the plaintiff to trace into the account into which such money was paid subsequently. However, in practice, if a fraudster who has taken the money belonging beneficially to the claimant pays it into a bank account held in the UK, then removes all of the money from that UK account and pays it into a bank account in another jurisdiction which will not enforce judgments from an English court, the loss of the right to trace into the UK account will effectively signal the loss of any feasible hopes of recovering the claimant's money at all. This principle is considered further below.⁹⁵

19.4 EQUITABLE TRACING INTO MIXED FUNDS

The process of tracing, and identifying property over which a remedy is sought, is different from the issue of asserting a remedy in respect of that property. In relation to mixtures of trust and other money held in bank accounts, a variety of approaches has been taken in the courts, from the application of the old first-in, first-out principle to the establishment of proportionate shares in any substitute property.

As considered in the initial hypothetical situations at the start of this chapter, one of the more problematic issues in equitable tracing claims is that of identifying title in property in funds which are made up both of trust property and other property. Where it is impossible to separate one item of property from another, it will be impossible to effect a common law following claim. Suppose that it was a car, registration number SAFC 1, that had been taken and parked in a car park with other cars. It would be comparatively easy to identify that car and recover it under a common law following claim, as in Jones above.⁹⁶ However, where the property is fungible, such as money in a bank account, such segregation cannot be easily performed. When my car is parked in a car park there is no meaningful mixture of property because my car can be easily identified. If, however, I bought a bag of Demerara sugar and my sugar was tipped into a sugar bowl with other Demerara sugar, then it would be impossible to identify my sugar in amongst that mixture. In such a situation, equitable tracing and an equitable remedy will be required to identify where my property is deemed to have gone and what recourse I have against the person who is controlling that mixture. It is this sort of situation which will interest us for the remainder of this chapter. Because this sort of litigation can be complex, and therefore expensive in practice, most of the cases are concerned with large amounts of money being mixed in bank accounts⁹⁷ or other intangible property (like modern financial instruments or securities) being moved between accounts.

94 [1915] 1 Ch 62.

95 See para 19.5.1.

96 Jones, FC (A Firm) v Jones [1996] 3 WLR 703, [1997] Ch 159.

97 See Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, Sweet & Maxwell, 2009, Chapter 21.

19.4.1 Mixture of trust money with trustee's own money

The first factual situation to be considered in the context of equitable tracing into mixed funds is that where the trustee mixes money taken from the trust with property that is beneficially her own. There are a number of conflicting cases in this area, with the result that it is not always clear which approach should be taken in any given situation. The attitude of the courts could be best explained as selecting the approach which achieves the most desirable result for the beneficiaries under the trust which has had its funds misapplied. In short, the courts appear to be seeking to achieve a just result and therefore selecting the approach which gets them there most efficiently.

The honest trustee approach

The problem with commingling the trustee's own money with trust property is deciding whether property acquired with money from that mixture is to be treated as having been taken from the trust or as having been taken from the trustee's own money. On the basis that the trustee is required to invest trust property to achieve the best possible return for the trust,⁹⁸ and on the basis that the trustee is required to behave honestly in respect of the trust property, the court may choose to assume that the trustee intended to use trust property to make successful investments and her own money for any inferior investments.

This approach is most clearly exhibited in Re Hallett's Estate.⁹⁹ Hallett was a solicitor who was a bailee of Russian bonds for one of his clients, Cotterill. Hallett also held securities of that type on express trust for his own marriage settlement (so that he was among the beneficiaries of that marriage settlement). Hallett sold the bonds and paid all the proceeds of sale into his own bank account. Hallett died subsequently. Therefore, it was left to the trustees of the marriage settlement and Cotterill to claim proprietary rights over the remaining contents of Hallett's bank account.

It was held that it could be assumed, where a trustee has money in a personal bank account to which trust money is added, that the trustee is acting honestly when paying money out of that bank account. Therefore, it is assumed that the trustee is paying out her own money on investments which lose money and not the trust money. It was held that: '... where a man does an act which may be rightfully performed... he is not allowed to say against the person entitled to the property or the right that he has done it wrongfully.' Therefore, it is said that the trustee has rightfully dissipated her own moneys such that the trust money remains intact. The beneficiaries were entitled to claim either equitable title in the assets acquired by the trustee, or a lien over that asset.¹⁰⁰ In the more modern language of the law of trusts we might argue that this recognises the basis of the trust in the conscience of the trustee.¹⁰¹ Therefore, not only is the court assuming that the trustee was acting honestly but it is also applying the tenets of equity so as to require him to act honestly: that is, by holding that any benefit to 98 Cowan v Scargill [1985] Ch 270.

99 (1880) 13 Ch D 696.

100 A lien is a right to take possession of property until one is paid what one is owed. It is clear though that the beneficiary will not now be confined to claiming a lien: Re Tilley's Will Trusts; Burgin v Croad [1967] Ch 1179, 1186, [1967] 2 All ER 303, 308; Scott v Scott (1963) 109 CLR 649; Foskett v McKeown [2000] 3 All ER 97, 123, per Lord Millett.

101 Cf Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

derive from the property held would be passed to the beneficiaries. By the same token, it might be said that an investment in successful investments would be deemed to be an investment made out of the trust property.¹⁰²

So to take an example of this approach in operation, imagine that a trustee has taken property from a trust fund and mixed it with her own money in her own bank account. If that mixture of money was then used half to pay for an expensive meal and half to buy shares, the court would assume that the trustee was acting honestly and (based on this convenient fiction) would attribute the valuable shares to the trust fund and the money dissipated on the meal to the trustee's own money. In this way the trust is able to recover the shares from the trustee, and thus recoup the value of the trust fund. One way of thinking of this doctrine is as an extension of the remedy of specific restitution for breaches of trust by trustees whereby the trustee is required to recover the trust's property: Hallett is effectively going one step further by allowing the trust¹⁰³ to establish an equitable interest in the property acquired with the original trust money.

Beneficiary election approach

By contradistinction to the 'honest trustee approach', there is the 'beneficiary election' approach which appears most clearly in Re Oatway.¹⁰⁴ In that case, the trustee held £4,077 in a personal bank account. The trustee then added £3,000 of trust money to this account. Out of the £7,077 held in the account, £2,137 was spent on purchasing shares. The remainder of the money in the bank account was then dissipated. The beneficiaries sought to trace from the £3,000 taken out of the bank into the shares and then to impose a charge over those shares. The shares themselves had risen in value to £2,474. The beneficiaries also sought a further accounting in cash to make up the balance of the £3,000 taken from the trust fund.

It was held that where a trustee has wrongfully mixed her own money and trust money, the trustee is not entitled to say that the investment was made with her own money and that the trust money has been dissipated. Importantly, though, the beneficiaries are entitled to elect either that the property be subject to a charge as security for amounts owed to them by the trustee, or that the unauthorised investment be adopted as part of the trust fund: hence the term 'beneficiary election approach'. It is therefore clear that the courts are prepared to protect the beneficiaries at all costs from the misfeasance of the trustee – re-emphasising the strictness of the trustee's obligations to the beneficiaries.¹⁰⁵ So, on the facts of Oatway the beneficiaries were able to elect to have the valuable shares subsumed into the trust as opposed simply to taking rights over money (which was to their advantage because it was considered likely that those shares would increase in value in the future), and also to be able to require the trustee to account in cash for the remaining shortfall in the balance taken from the trust fund (in effect based on the principles of breach of trust spelled out in Target Holdings in Chapter 18 requiring a trustee to reconstitute the value of the trust fund).

102 See Re Oatway [1903] 2 Ch 356, below.

103 Strictly, a trust is not an entity because it has no legal personality, but please excuse this useful shorthand in this context.

104 [1903] 2 Ch 356.

105 See now Foskett v McKeown [2000] 3 All ER 97, 123, per Lord Millett.

This approach has been expressed as being an exception to the main approach of rateable division of the property in *Foskett v McKeown*¹⁰⁶ by the House of Lords on the basis, in effect, of fault by Lord Millett.¹⁰⁷ His Lordship held that:

The primary rule in regard to a mixed fund, therefore, is that gains and losses are borne by the contributors rateably.¹⁰⁸ The beneficiary's right to elect instead to enforce a lien to obtain repayment is an exception to the primary rule, exercisable where the fund is deficient and the claim is made against the wrongdoer and those claiming through him.

Lord Millett relied on similar principles which apply in relation to physical mixtures, where it is said that if the mixture is the fault of the defendant then it is open to the claimant to 'claim the goods'.¹⁰⁹ Importantly, even where the defendant is not at fault in the commingling of property, such an innocent volunteer is not entitled to occupy a better position than the person who was responsible simply by reason of her innocence.¹¹⁰ This issue of innocents caught up in the affairs of others is considered immediately below.

There is one anomalous case, given the general trend in the cases to assume everything against the trustee who acts wrongfully. In Re Tilley's Will Trusts,¹¹¹ a trustee took money which she held on trust and paid it into her own personal bank account. The trustee made investments on her own behalf from that bank account. The moneys she took from the trust settled her overdraft on that account in part so that she was able to continue her investment activities. The court held that the beneficiaries had no rights to trace into the investments which the trustee had made with the money taken from that account; rather the court was convinced on the facts that the trust money had simply served to reduce her overdraft but not to pay for her investments. An alternative analysis, more in line with Foskett v McKeown, would have been to find that if the trust money made the investment possible, the trust should be taken to have contributed traceable funds to the acquisition of those investments.

19.4.2 Mixture of two trust funds or mixture with innocent volunteer's property

General principle

This section considers the situation in which trust property is misapplied in such a way that it is mixed with property belonging to an innocent third party. Therefore, rather than consider the issues which arose in the previous section concerning the obligations of the wrongdoing trustee, it is now necessary to decide how property belonging to innocent parties should be allocated between them. It was held in *Re Diplock*¹¹² that the entitlement of the beneficiary to the mixed fund should rank pari passu (or 'in equal step', or proportionately) with the rights of the innocent volunteer:

106 [2000] 3 All ER 97. Foskett was followed in Serious Fraud Office v Lexi Holdings plc [2008] EWCA Crim 1443, [2009] 1 All ER 586.

107 Ibid, 124.

108 Ie, in proportionate shares.

109 Lupton v White, White v Lupton (1808) 15 Ves 432, [1803–13] All ER Rep 336; Sandeman & Sons v Tyzack and Branfoot Steamship Co Ltd [1913] AC 680, 695; [1911–13] All ER Rep 1013, 1020, per Lord Molton.

110 Jones v De Marchant (1916) 28 DLR 561; Foskett v McKeown [2000] 3 All ER 97.

111 Re Tilley's Will Trusts, Burgin v Croad [1967] Ch 1179.

112 [1948] Ch 465, 524.

Where an innocent volunteer (as distinct from a purchaser for value without notice) mixes ‘money’ of his own with ‘money’ which in equity belongs to another person, or is found in possession of such a mixture, although that other person cannot claim a charge on the mass superior to the claim of the volunteer, he is entitled, nevertheless, to a charge ranking pari passu with the claim of the volunteer . . . Such a person is not in conscience bound to give precedence to the equitable owner of the other of the two funds.

Therefore, none of the innocent contributors to the fund is considered as taking any greater right than any other contributor to the fund. Rather, each person has an equal charge over that property. This approach has been adopted in *Foskett v McKeown*¹¹³ by Lord Millett.¹¹⁴

The primary rule in regard to a mixed fund, therefore, is that gains and losses are borne by the contributors rateably.¹¹⁵ The beneficiary’s right to elect instead to enforce a lien to obtain repayment is an exception to the primary rule, exercisable where the fund is deficient and the claim is made against the wrongdoer and those claiming through him.

As considered above, Lord Millett relied on similar principles which apply in relation to physical mixtures, where it is said that if the mixture is the fault of the defendant then it is open to the claimant to ‘claim the goods’.¹¹⁶ It was said at that stage that even where the defendant was not at fault in the commingling of property, such an innocent volunteer would not be entitled to occupy a better position than the person who was responsible simply by reason of her innocence.¹¹⁷ In the case of Foskett v McKeown itself, a trustee had been misusing the trust’s funds to pay two of the five premiums on a life assurance policy, of about £20,000, which he had taken out in favour of his wife and children. When the trustee committed suicide and the breach of trust was discovered, it was held that the beneficiaries of the trust were entitled to trace into the moneys paid out under the life assurance policy on the basis that their money had been mixed with the trustee’s own money to pay for the life assurance policy premiums, which were to pay a lump sum to the trustee’s children on the trustee’s death. Whereas the Court of Appeal had held that the beneficiaries were entitled only to an amount of money equal to the two premiums, about £20,000, the House of Lords held that they were entitled to a two-fifths share of the lump sum, worth about £400,000.

Opinion differs over the rights and wrongs of this decision.¹¹⁸ The House of Lords chose to vindicate the property rights of the beneficiaries by means of recognising that the contributions which the trust fund made to the insurance policy premiums enhanced the final lump sum and, significantly, that the comparatively small contributions to those premiums acquired proportionate proprietary rights in the much larger lump sum paid out on the policy’s maturity. Thus, a contribution of only £20,000 landed a share of the £1 million policy

113 [2000] 3 All ER 97.

114 Ibid, 124.

115 That is, in proportionate shares.

116 Lupton v White, White v Lupton (1808) 15 Ves 432, [1803–13] All ER Rep 336; Sandeman & Sons v Tyzack and Branfoot Steamship Co Ltd [1913] AC 680, 695, [1911–13] All ER Rep 1013, 1020, per Lord Molton.

117 Jones v De Marchant (1916) 28 DLR 561; Foskett v McKeown [2000] 3 All ER 97.

118 Eg, Virgo, 2004 and Rotherham, 2004.

pay-out because that £20,000 constituted two-fifths of all the premiums. An alternative approach, and one which would have recognised the innocence of the children who were expecting to take absolute title in the whole of the lump sum paid out from the insurance policy, would have been to order compensation for the beneficiaries equal to the amount of cash taken from the trust fund to pay the policy's premiums. This approach would have meant that the beneficiaries would not have recovered a proportionate share in the much larger pay-out from the insurance policy. However, what the majority decision in the House of Lords achieves is recognition of the fact that the trustee ought to have been investing the trust fund properly, and therefore that for the beneficiaries simply to have the looted cash returned to them would not give them the return they would otherwise have expected on their capital if the trustee had managed and invested it properly. In effect, what is being suggested is that the children would otherwise have received a windfall (in the form of the size of the insurance policy pay-out) without recognising the beneficiaries' unwitting contribution to their wealth. What makes this case difficult is that it involves two sets of innocent parties fighting over the money that is left after the wrongdoing trustee's death. There is no completely satisfactory answer in that one or other of the parties seems likely to receive less money than that to which they would otherwise feel they were entitled. The logic of the law of tracing suggests that the beneficiaries are entitled to pursue their property rights into any fund of money if the defendant has no defence to a claim for its recovery.¹¹⁹ Therefore, the law of tracing necessarily requires that if the beneficiaries have involuntarily had their property invested in an insurance policy, those beneficiaries deserve a share in the investment. So, in Clark v Cutland,¹²⁰ when one of the shareholders organised the diversion of a company's assets into his personal pension fund, it was held that the company was entitled to trace into that pension fund.¹²¹ It was held further that an appropriate proportion of the value taken from the pension fund should be held on constructive trust for the company.

The law of tracing functions by awarding proportionate interests in the fund available. This is so whether the fund decreases or increases in value. Suppose the following situation. Shyster is trustee of a trust over a store of 10,000 Belgian chocolates, which are held in a warehouse, in favour of Bernice as beneficiary. Shyster also owns a store of 10,000 identical chocolates in a neighbouring warehouse beneficially in common with his wife, Innocent. Suppose then that Shyster takes the chocolates which are held on trust for Bernice and has them transferred to the warehouse where he and Innocent hold their own chocolates. Innocent does not know of this event. Due to poor air conditioning it is found that 5,000 of the mixed stock of chocolates are rendered unfit to eat. The question then arises as to who has rights in the remaining chocolates. Even though Innocent knows nothing of Shyster's breach of trust, she will be bound by any rights which Bernice has. Therefore, Bernice would remain entitled to one half of all of the chocolates held in the warehouse, because that was the rateable proportion of chocolates which she contributed to the stock of chocolates held in the warehouse. Therefore, Bernice would be entitled to an equitable interest in 7,500 good chocolates and 2,500 of the worthless, spoiled chocolates (that is, half of the good 15,000 chocolates to account, and forgetting her half of the 5,000 chocolates which have been spoiled) together with a claim against Shyster personally in breach of trust for the value of the spoiled chocolates,¹²² or a lien over the chocolates such that she is repaid their cash value.¹²³ Innocent is not entitled to resist Bernice's claim solely on the basis that she did not know of Shyster's actions; although she would probably also have a personal claim against Shyster herself for the loss which resulted from the damage to her chocolates. These principles function on the basis of logic and of property law. There is a possibility on the facts of this hypothetical example that a court may have recourse to morality in that the court may order that the spoiled chocolates should be deemed to have belonged beneficially to Shyster on the basis that he was a defaulting trustee and so that none of the innocent parties for whom he was holding chocolates on trust would suffer any loss as a result of his actions.¹²⁴

119 See section 19.5 below and Virgo, 2003, 203.

120 [2003] 4 All ER 733, [2003] EWCA Civ 810.

121 Applying Foskett v McKeown [2001] 1 AC 102; Allan v Rea Bros Trustees Ltd [2002] EWCA Civ 85, (2002) 4 ITELR 627.

The more difficult situation is that in which the property cannot be divided between the parties rateably because, for example, it is a garment like a coat which cannot reasonably be cut into pieces and divided. Page Wood VC has held quite simply that:

if a man mixes trust funds with his own, the whole will be treated as the trust property, except so far as he may be able to distinguish what is his own.¹²⁵

Therefore, suppose that it was money which had been taken from Bernice's trust fund by her trustee Shyster, and further suppose that that money had been used to buy a coat which has now passed into the possession of Innocent and Shyster. A coat could not be sensibly divided up between the parties in the way that the store of chocolates could be divided up. Bernice might have been entitled to recover the entire property as opposed to only having a right to a pro rata share or a lien to make good her loss. So, Bernice could take possession of the coat until Shyster pays her in money or in money's worth the value of her right in the coat, instead of seeking to take title in a part of the coat (for example, a sleeve) when the coat was not physically capable of being divided up sensibly in this way. After all, what use would it be to have a mere sleeve from a coat; whereas it would be possible to have a proportionate part of a fund of money or of a physical commodity like salt. It is not surprising to learn that English law will apply subtly different approaches depending on the type of property at issue. This is considered in relation to the remedies for tracing below.

Furthermore, it does not matter what the market value was of the assets contributed to the fund at the time of their contribution: what matters is the value which they constitute as a proportion of the total fund at the time of making the claim. Suppose, for example, that Shyster took 1,000 SAFC plc shares from Bernice at a time when those shares were worth 100p, and later that Innocent added 1,000 shares which were worth only 90p at the time when she contributed them. Suppose further that at the time of making the claim SAFC plc shares were worth 150p. The courts will not take Innocent's contribution to have been £900 (the value of her shares at the time of their contribution) and Bernice's shares £1,000. Rather, each is deemed to have contributed one half of all of the property in the mixed fund of 2,000

122 As considered at section 18.5 above; ie, a claim to restitution or compensation – Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421, [1995] 3 WLR 352, [1995] 3 All ER 785.

123 Re Oatway [1903] 2 Ch 356; Foskett v McKeown [2000] 3 All ER 97.

124 Re Hallett's Estate (1880) 13 Ch D 696.

125 Frith v Cartland (1865) 2 Hem & M 417, 420, (1865) 71 ER 525, 526; Foskett v McKeown [2000] 3 All ER 97, 125.

shares.¹²⁶ The approach taken is that the claimants receive rights in property regardless of the precise market value of the property at any time: the purpose of a property court is to vindicate the claimant's property rights first, and it is then for other doctrines such as breach of trust, considered in Chapter 18, to look to the compensation of any of the parties for any loss which remains outstanding.

The question then is as to the range of other remedies which the courts may choose to offer. On the cases relating to money in bank accounts, much has turned on whether or not the claimants can establish rights either to money subsisting in bank accounts or to moneys used to buy assets of substantial value. Typically in the cases involving money in bank accounts, some money has simply been dissipated whereas other money has acquired profitable investments. It is to this type of issue that we now turn.

Payments made through current bank accounts

Different principles apply in relation to tracing payments made through current bank accounts. The rule in Re Diplock which was considered at para 19.4.2 above applies satisfactorily to static funds where no property moves in or out. Suppose that the property making up the fund constitutes two cars of equal value contributed one each by the two innocent parties. In that circumstance it is easy to divide the fund between two claimants so that they receive one car each. If the fund were a house which was bought with the aggregate proceeds of the property belonging to the two innocent parties, Re Diplock would require that each person take an equal charge over that house.

The more difficult situation, however, is that in which the fund containing the mixed property is used in chunks to acquire separate property. Suppose a current bank account from which payments are made to acquire totally unrelated items of the property. The problem will lie in deciding which of the innocent contributors to the fund ought to take which right in which piece of property. The facts in the following table may illustrate the problem, concerning payments in and out of a current bank account the balance of which stood at zero at the opening of business on 1 June.

Date	Payments in	Payments out
1 June	£1,000 from trust A
2 June	£2,000 from trust B
3 June		£500 to buy ICI plc shares
4 June		£1,500 to buy SAFC plc shares
5 June		£1,000 to buy BP plc shares

On these facts £3,000 was in the account at the end of 2 June, being a mixture of money from two separate trusts (A and B). By 6 June, the traceable proceeds of that property had been used to buy ICI shares, SAFC shares, and BP shares. The problem is then to ascertain the title to those shares. There are two possible approaches: either particular shares are allocated between the two trust funds, or both funds take proportionate interests in all of the shares.¹²⁷ The two scenarios appear in different cases, as considered immediately below.

¹²⁶ Foskett v McKeown [2000] 3 All ER 97, per Lord Millett.

The first in, first out approach

The long-standing rule relating to title in property paid out of current bank accounts is that in Clayton's Case.¹²⁸ In relation to current bank accounts, the decision in Clayton's Case held that the appropriate principle is 'first in, first out' such that in deciding which property has been used to acquire which items of property it is deemed that money first deposited is used first. The reason for this rule is a rigid application of accounting principles. If money is paid in on 1 June, that money must be deemed to be the first money to exit the account.

Therefore, according to the facts set out above, the deposit made from trust A on 1 June is deemed to be the first money to be paid out. The ICI shares acquired on 3 June for £500 would thus be deemed to have been acquired solely with money derived from trust A. The tracing process consequently would assign rights in the ICI shares to A. By the same token, the SAFC shares would be deemed to have been acquired on 4 June with the remaining £500 from trust A and £1,000 from trust B. The BP shares are therefore acquired with the remaining £1,000 from trust B.

The drawback with the Clayton's Case approach is that it would be unfair to trust A if ICI shares were to halve in value while shares in BP were to double in value. That would mean that trust A's £500 investment in ICI would be worth only £250 as a result of the halving in value, whereas trust B's £1,000 investment in BP would then be worth £2,000.

The only way of understanding this rule is to recall that it derives from a case decided early in the 19th century when there was comparatively little litigation concerning intangible property. Rather, this case appears to have its roots in cases regarding tangible property like soft fruit. If we ran a business as wholesalers of soft fruit – oranges, pears and so forth – we would have a large warehouse in which the fruit was stored. When an order came in for a consignment of oranges, we would be foolish to ship out the fruit which had arrived in our warehouse most recently, because that would leave older fruit at the rear of the warehouse at greater risk of rotting. Instead, the first fruit to have arrived in our warehouse would be the first fruit which we would ship out: first in, first out. This way of thinking carried on into elementary book-keeping, in which the assumption was that the first money to be paid into a bank account would similarly be the first money to be paid out. In a world of intangible property, it is an approach which appears anachronistic. Another approach is suggested in the next section.

Proportionate share

The alternative approach would be to decide that each contributor should take proportionate shares in all of the property acquired with the proceeds of the fund. This is the approach taken in most Commonwealth jurisdictions.¹²⁹ On the facts in the table on page 911 above, 127 The proportionate approach is probably to be preferred now, although, as will emerge, the authorities are not yet clear on this point: Foskett v McKeown [2000] 3 All ER 97.

128 (1816) 1 Mer 572.

129 Re Ontario Securities Commission (1985) 30 DLR (4d) 30; Re Registered Securities [1991] 1 NZLR 545.

each party contributed to the bank account in the ratio 1:2 (in that trust A provided £1,000 and trust B provided £2,000). Therefore, all of the ICI shares, the SAFC shares, and the BP shares would be held on trust one-third for A and two-thirds for B. The result is the elimination of any differential movements in value across this property in circumstances in which it is pure chance which beneficiaries would take rights in which property.

A slightly different twist on this approach was adopted in Barlow Clowes International v Vaughan.¹³⁰ In that case, investors in the collapsed Barlow Clowes organisation had their losses met in part by the Department of Trade and Industry. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry then sought to recover, in effect, the amounts which had been paid away to those former investors by tracing the compensation paid to the investors into the assets of Barlow Clowes.

At first instance, Peter Gibson J held that the rule in *Clayton's Case*¹³¹ should be applied. Clayton's Case asserts the rule (as considered immediately above) that tracing claims into mixed funds in current bank accounts are to treat the money first paid into the bank account as the first paid out of the account. The majority of the Court of Appeal favoured a distribution between the rights of the various investors on a pari passu basis, considering Clayton's Case too formalistic and arbitrary. Leggatt and Woolf LJ approved a 'rolling charge' approach culled from the Canadian cases. This meant that the investors would have to take into account not only the size of their contribution to the fund, but also the length of time for which that money was part of the fund. Clearly, the longer an investment is made, the more money it could be expected to make. Therefore, the attraction of the rolling charge would be to take into account the length of time for which depositors had deposits. In this way they would also share the impact of losses.

It is suggested that this rolling charge approach is the more sensible approximation to the contribution which each good faith investor has made to the total fund. Rather than look to which investors contributed their money first and which last – always a result of chance – it seems a more equitable approach to resort to the resulting trust principle that each should take according to the proportionate size of their contributions. On the facts of Barlow Clowes, the process of calculating these separate entitlements would have been particularly complicated given the large number of investors and the huge range of investments made by the funds at issue. The one caveat might then be to recognise that some investors would have had their investments in the fund for longer, and that therefore they should receive some credit for the duration of their investment. Some equitable accounting at that level would appear to be conscionable.

It is clear from decisions in the wake of Barlow Clowes that the English courts would prefer to resile from the Clayton's Case principle;¹³² at the time of writing, however, 130 [1992] 4 All ER 22, [1992] BCLC 910; noted Birks, 1993, 218.

131 (1816) 1 Mer 572.

132 Barlow Clowes v Vaughan [1992] 4 All ER 22; El Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings (No 2) [1995] 2 All ER 213, 222, Robert Walker J; Re Lewis's of Leicester [1995] 1 BCLC 428; Sheppard v Thompson (2001) unreported, 3 December; Russell-Cooke Trust Co v Prentis [2003] 2 All ER 478; Commerzbank AG v IMB Morgan plc [2004] EWHC 2771 (Ch). Commonwealth jurisdictions have long turned their back on Clayton's Case (see Re Ontario Securities Commission (1988) 52 DLR (4th) 767 (Sup Ct) in Canada and Re French Caledonia Travel Service Pty Ltd (2003) 204 ALR 353, per Campbell J, in Australia), as have the courts in the USA (see Re Walter J Schmidt & Co, 298 F 314, 316 (1923), per Learned Hand J).

Clayton's Case has not been formally overruled, merely criticised and distinguished. So, in *Russell-Cooke Trust Co v Prentis*¹³³ a solicitor conducted an investment scheme and took investments from his clients in return for a guaranteed return of 15% on all investments. All of the investments were paid into the solicitor's client account, which meant that those funds were held on trust for the clients in proportionate shares. The solicitor's practice was the subject of complaints and when the Law Society intervened, a number of irregularities and shortfalls in the operation of the investment fund were discovered. The court was asked whether the more appropriate principle was that in Clayton's Case (the 'first-in, first-out' approach) or that in Barlow Clowes (the 'rolling charge' approach). Lindsay J held that the Clayton's Case approach was still binding but that it was also capable of being distinguished on the facts of any given case. Having suggested that the 'first-in, first-out' approach was the binding principle, it was held that that principle could be displaced in circumstances in which, for example, the parties had demonstrated a contrary intention in their dealings or in which that conclusion would be unfair between the parties. As is considered in the following paragraph, it is frequently the case that the 'first-in, first-out' approach will appear to be unfair to one party or another. As this point was put by Woolf LJ in Barlow Clowes v Vaughan:¹³⁴

There is no reason in law or justice why his depredations upon the fund should not be borne equally between [the parties]. To throw all the loss upon one, through the mere chance of his being earlier in time, is irrational and arbitrary, and is equally a fiction as the rule in Clayton's Case. When the law adopts a fiction, it is, or at least it should be, for some purpose of justice. To adopt it here is to apportion a common misfortune through a test which has no relation whatever to the justice of the case.

This approach suggests that the court's purpose – when dealing with mixtures of the property of two innocent people – is to achieve justice between them if there is no obvious fault on the part of one party or the other.¹³⁵ Or, to put the same idea in the language of equity, division of property should be made on a *pari passu*¹³⁶ basis where the equities between the parties are even.

Latterly, in Commerzbank AG v IMB Morgan plc,¹³⁷ the same approach to authority of Clayton's Case was taken by Lawrence Collins J. A fraudulent investment scheme was operated through a correspondent bank account managed by Commerzbank. Money was taken from the public and mixed in the bank account. It was held that it would have been unjust and impracticable to have applied Clayton's Case on these facts: unjust because it would have produced arbitrary results between the investors, and impracticable in that it would have required a difficult exercise to decide which payments in and out of this account were derived from which investors and made in which order.

133 [2003] 2 All ER 478.

134 [1992] 4 All ER 22, 44.

135 Cf Re Eastern Capital Futures Ltd [1989] BCLC 371, 375, per Morritt J, where it was held that the preference should be for even division of the property where the equities were even.

136 'Pari passu' meaning 'in equal step', suggesting a division in proportion to contribution without any addition or reduction needing to be made to account for inequitable behaviour.

137 [2004] EWHC 2771 (Ch).

Which approach is to be preferred?

Therefore, the rolling charge approach has been approved but not applied, and the rule in Clayton's Case was criticised by Leggatt LJ in Barlow Clowes as having 'nothing to do' with tracing property rights through into property. Indeed, it does appear to effect somewhat arbitrary results in many circumstances. Suppose, for example, the following facts. £5,000 is taken from a trust fund and mixed in a bank account with £10,000 belonging to the trustee's mother which was already in that account. Suppose then that £7,500 is taken out of the mixture and used to buy Gotech plc shares which double in value, while the remaining £7,500 is lost on a bet on a three-legged terrier running against greyhounds at White City dog track. If Clayton's Case were applied, the money used to buy the valuable shares would be deemed to come entirely from the mother's money. The money wasted on the bet would be deemed to have come as to £2,500 from the mother and £5,000 from the trust. However, if Barlow Clowes were applied, the trust would be able to argue that, because it had contributed one-third of the money in the bank account (that is, £5,000 of the total £15,000 in the account), the trust should be entitled to one-third of the valuable shares and one-third of the useless bet in proportion to its total contribution.

The result of these cases is that the English cases will disapply Clayton's Case on the slightest indication that to apply Clayton's Case would produce injustice in the form of 'irrational and arbitrary' results. Otherwise, Clayton's Case has not been formally overruled. Therefore, in deciding tracing claims relating to current bank accounts, it is necessary first to consider the effect of Clayton's Case and secondly to consider whether the alternative approach based on pari passu or proportionate division would produce more equitable results between the parties or results more in tune with their evident intentions.

The rule in Clayton's Case derives from a time when money was considered to be a tangible item of property like cattle, land, and so forth. As mentioned above, the first in, first out rule mimics the way in which goods in a warehouse would be accounted for. In Clayton's Case, money is being treated in the same fashion – thus denying that it is in fact intangible – and the application of that rule generates arbitrary results in many circumstances.

19.4.3 Tracing payments made by mistake

Suppose A mistakenly pays money to B, so that B has no true entitlement to it.¹³⁸ The question which would arise is whether or not A is entitled to trace that payment and enforce a remedy to recover it from B.

In Chase Manhattan Bank NA v Israel-British Bank (London) Ltd,¹³⁹ a payment between banks was made twice by mistake. The recipient bank went into insolvency before repaying the second, mistaken payment. The issue arose whether the payer had a proprietary right in the payment so that it could be traced by the payer and deemed to be held on trust for it (thus protecting that payment from the insolvency). It was held by Gouling J that the property should be held on trust for the payer and that the payer could therefore trace into the assets of the recipient bank as a result of the equitable interest founded under the trust. The precise ¹³⁸ That is, suppose the absence of a contract or any other juristic reason entitling B to retain that money.

¹³⁹ [1981] 1 Ch 105, [1980] 2 WLR 202, [1979] 3 All ER 1025.

basis for the extended fiduciary duty imposed by Goudling J is difficult to identify, being an uncomfortable combination of restitution of unjust enrichment and constructive trust.¹⁴⁰

The rationale of this judgment was doubted (but its result approved on other grounds) by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC,¹⁴¹ where his Lordship declared that he was prepared to accept that this decision was correct on the basis that a constructive trust arose at the time when the property had been received and the recipient knew of the mistake: it was said that the combination of knowledge of the mistake and the effect on the recipient's conscience would be sufficient to justify the creation of a constructive trust. By the same token, ignorance of the mistake would not have given rise to an equitable proprietary right. In Lloyds Bank plc v Independent Insurance Co Ltd,¹⁴² a bank made a mistake in relation to a payment into an account held by one of its clients. However, the bank's mistake was not as to a countermand, but rather as to how much money was paid through its customer's account. It was held (following Barclays Bank v Simms)¹⁴³ that the bank could not recover against the payee because the payment discharged a debt owed by the bank's customer to the payee.

19.5 LOSS OF THE RIGHT TO TRACE

19.5.1 Loss of the right to trace: the general principle

A claimant in a tracing claim will lose her right to trace if the property into which she is seeking to trace her rights either ceases to exist or cannot be found. The loss of the right to trace is considered in detail below in relation to electronic bank accounts: in that context, by way of example, money is often moved between electronic bank accounts by money-launderers or by thieves in an effort to make it impossible to prove where the money which was derived from the claimant's property has gone. If the trail goes cold, then the tracing claim is lost. So, if a bank account into which the claimant's money was paid subsequently goes overdrawn (that is, if the account is run down to zero) then the claimant will lose her right to claim into that particular bank account because the money which represented her property has clearly passed out of that account by the time the level of that account reached zero.¹⁴⁴ The same point holds true for all forms of property: if the property and its traceable substitute cease to exist, the claimant loses the right to trace.¹⁴⁵ So, in *Ultraframe (UK) Ltd v Fielding*¹⁴⁶ the claimant sought to claim that the defendant had earned profits by misusing the claimant's intellectual property in breach of trust to manufacture high quality double glazing components.¹⁴⁷ Therefore, the claimant argued, inter alia, that the defendant's profits had been derived from the claimant's property. However, the claimant could not prove an 140 Old editions of Professor Martin's Modern Equity have suggested that Goudling J stopped short of adopting the principle of unjust enrichment as the basis for this trust: 13th edn, 1989, 628.

141 [1996] AC 669.

142 [1999] 2 WLR 986, CA.

143 [1980] QB 677.

144 Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington [1996] AC 669.

145 Roscoe v Winder [1915] 1 Ch 62; Boscawen v Bajwa [1996] 1 WLR 328; Box v Barclays Bank [1998] Lloyd's Rep Bank 185.

146 [2005] EWHC 1638 (Ch), [2005] All ER (D) 397.

147 This is a filleted account of a very, very long case which involved a very large number of parties.

unbroken chain of property rights leading from itself to the defendant. Therefore, it was held that where the claimant could not identify any particular item of property as constituting the traceable proceeds of the original trust property, then it would not be possible to trace into any profits which the defendant had made because no link between it and any property taken in breach of trust had been proven. Instead, the claimant could only demonstrate that the defendant had earned a profit from behaviour which had been allegedly unconscionable but could not demonstrate that that profit had been derived from the claimant's property or from its traceable proceeds. The point is that the claimant must be able to demonstrate that property in the defendant's hands constitutes the traceable proceeds of the claimant's property: if there is any break in that chain then the claimant will lose her right to trace into the property in the defendant's hands.

This principle is demonstrated most clearly in Bishopsgate Investment Management v Homan.¹⁴⁸ Here, in the aftermath of newspaper mogul Robert Maxwell's death, it transpired that amounts belonging to pension trust funds under his control had been misapplied. The amounts had been paid into accounts held by MCC (a company controlled by Maxwell) and other companies. Those accounts had gone overdrawn since the initial deposit of the money. The pension fund trustees sought an order granting them an equitable charge over all the accounts held by MCC, in line with dicta of Lord Templeman in Space Investments Ltd v Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce.¹⁴⁹ It was held, nevertheless, that it is impossible to trace money into an overdrawn account on the basis that the property from which the traceable substitute derives is said to have disappeared.¹⁵⁰

Further, on the facts of that case it was also held that there could be no equitable remedy enforced against an asset which was acquired before the misappropriation of the money took place. This is because it is not possible to trace into property which had been acquired without the aid of the misapplied property: that is, if Anne buys a car on 1 January, and then subsequently Anne misappropriates cash from a trust fund on 1 February, it cannot be said that that trust property made it possible to acquire the car.

The same principle was upheld by the Court of Appeal in *Serious Fraud Office v Lexi Holdings plc*¹⁵¹ to the effect that a general charge would not be ordered over all of the assets of a bank on the basis that the claimant could demonstrate that the traceable proceeds of their property had passed into the bank at some point. Rather, the claimant is required to demonstrate into which fund or account that property passed. In essence, it is suggested, the obiter remarks of Lord Templeman amount to nothing more than a personal claim against a bank (in that no specific property is identified) for a given amount of money. This point was reinforced by Briggs J in Re Lehman Brothers (Europe) (No 2) where client money had been mixed with the bank's own money in such a way that it was impossible to identify any given money flowing from the traceable proceeds of a particular class of claimant and that as a 148 [1995] Ch 211, [1995] 1 All ER 347, [1994] 3 WLR 1270; Law Society of Upper Canada v Toronto Dominion Bank (1998) 169 DLR (4th) 353 (Ont Ca).

149 Space Investments Ltd v Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce Trust Co (Bahamas) Ltd [1986] 1 WLR 1072, [1986] 3 All ER 75.

150 The loss of the right to trace was also upheld in Re BA Peters plc, Atkinson v Moriarty [2008] EWCA Civ 1604, [2010] 1 BCLC 142, [15], per Lord Neuberger where it was held that if the property over which proprietary rights were sought had ceased to exist in the hands of the defendant then there could be no proprietary right in the form of a trust against that defendant.

151 [2008] EWCA Crim 1443, [2009] 1 All ER 586, [2009] QB 376.

result it was impossible for them to bring a tracing action, and furthermore that they could not assert a charge over the entire assets of the defendant bank.¹⁵² Such a claim for a general charge over the assets of the bank would offend the anti-deprivation¹⁵³ and *pari passu*¹⁵⁴ principles in insolvency law whereby assets may not be taken from the insolvent person's estate nor may one unsecured creditor be advantaged ahead of any other unsecured creditor.

19.5.2 Lowest intermediate balance

The principle set out above does not account for the circumstance which is more generally the case when property is taken away from a mixed fund and new property added subsequently. Suppose that £100 is taken from a trust fund and paid into a bank account which already contains £50; suppose that £130 is spent, leaving only £20 of the original mixture. If £200 is added subsequently, then there is a question as to whether a claimant-beneficiary can recover the whole of her loss from that account or only the £20 which could be said to have represented her property. The question arises whether the claimant ought to be able to trace into any property held in a fund to which her own property has been added, or whether the claimant should be restricted to tracing only into property which can be demonstrated to have derived from the original misappropriated property.

The rule is that the claimant has only a right to claim the lowest intermediate balance of that property.¹⁵⁵ The reference to lowest intermediate balance means that the claimant will be entitled to trace into only the lowest value of the property held between the date of its misapplication and the date of the claim being brought because that is the largest amount which could possibly be said to have resulted from her contribution to the mixture originally. That is, the £20 which represents the last money which the trust could possibly have contributed to that bank account in the example given above. So, by way of illustration, *Roscoe v Winder*¹⁵⁶ concerned money being taken from a trust, paid into a bank account, and mixed with other money such that sums were paid into and out of that account on numerous occasions, causing fluctuating balances in that account over time. The issue would be to ascertain which level in the bank account should be considered to be the one against which the claimant could claim. The court held that, assuming the trust money was the last to be paid out of the account, the claimant could assert a claim only against the lowest level in that account because (by definition) any money paid into the account after that lowest level had been reached could not be said to have been derived from the trust.

Suppose the following, to repeat the example given above: £100 is taken from a trust fund and added to a bank account already containing £50 on 1 January. Then suppose that £130 is taken out of the account on 1 February, before a new £200 unrelated to the trust is paid into the account on 1 March. If a claim were brought on 1 April, the beneficiary would be entitled to trace into only the £20 which was left in the account on 1 February, on the basis that that is the only money which could possibly be said to have derived from the original £100. That 152 [2009] EWHC 3228 (Ch), [2010] EWHC 47 (Ch), [2010] 2 BCLC 301.

153 Belmont Park Investments Pty Ltd v BNY Corporate Trustee Services Ltd [2011] UKSC 38, [2011] 3 WLR 521.

154 British Eagle International Airlines Ltd v Cie Nationale Air France [1975] 1 WLR 758.

155 Roscoe v Winder [1915] 1 Ch 62. See also Campden Hill Ltd v Chakrani [2005] EWHC 911 (Ch).

156 [1915] 1 Ch 62.

£20 is the lowest intermediate balance of the fund. The £200 paid in subsequently had not come from the trust, by definition, and therefore there could be no claim against it.

The £20 is the lowest intermediate balance against which a claim based on tracing can be established. The claimant would have lost her right to claim into the remaining money once it was paid out of that account – instead, the claimant would have to find out where that money had gone and then seek to trace into the place where that money subsequently came to rest. So, suppose the remaining £80 (out of the original £100 in this example) had moved into bank account No. 100, then the claimant would seek to trace into the first account for £20 and into bank account No. 100 for the remaining £80.

19.5.3 Tracing through electronic bank accounts

One of the most vexed problems in tracing claims then is that of establishing proprietary rights in amounts of money which are held in electronic bank accounts. Most of the cases in this area involve large banking and commercial institutions, for two reasons. First, it is only such wealthy institutions which can afford to pay for the complex and convoluted litigation that is necessary in this field to bring matters to court (involving expensive experts in accountancy and banking, as well as lawyers). Secondly, the nature of electronic bank accounts raises very particular problems for English lawyers, and indeed all legal systems.

Electronic bank accounts are choses in action (that is, debts) between depositor and bank. The bank owes, by way of debt, the amount of money in the account to the depositor (provided that the account is in credit) on the terms of their contract. Therefore, these accounts are not tangible property. Rather, they are debts with value attached to them (that value being the amount of the deposit plus interest). It is consequently surprising that English lawyers continue to think of money (whether held in a bank account or not) as being tangible property. When considering the way in which tracing applies to money held in accounts, conceiving of that money as being tangible rather than being simply an amount of value, creates problems, particularly in relation to the loss of the right to trace.¹⁵⁷

By way of example, it was held in *Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC*¹⁵⁸ that the specific property provided by the payer was not capable of identification given that it had been paid into bank accounts which had subsequently been run into overdraft on a number of occasions. The analogy used by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in explaining the nature of equitable proprietary rights was that of ‘a stolen bag of coins’. His Lordship was supposing that to identify any money which was being traced, we must imagine that the money was in the form of coins held in a bag which had been stolen, and that the claimant can only trace after the specific coins in that bag but not any other coins which might have been added to the bag subsequently. This metaphor is particularly enlightening, for the reasons given above, because it envisages proprietary rights in electronic bank accounts as being concerned with tangible property and not as the intangible property which it clearly is. Money in an electronic bank account is not in the form of tangible coins in a bag: it is in the form of memory stored in a computer’s memory. Therefore, we have to ask whether or not this tangible property metaphor is useful in relation to electronic money.

¹⁵⁷ See now Lloyds Bank plc v Independent Insurance Co Ltd [1999] 2 WLR 986, CA.

¹⁵⁸ [1996] AC 669, [1996] 2 All ER 961.

In that eccentric way which English lawyers think about money held in electronic bank accounts, it was said by Lord Browne-Wilkinson that once a bank account goes overdrawn or the money is spent, that money disappears.¹⁵⁹ This is a money-launderer's paradise. Rather than saying 'if money passes out of a computer-held bank account but its value is still held in some form by the owner of that account, therefore we should treat that person as still having the money', English law actually says 'if that electronic money has gone from that account and cannot be traced in its equivalent proprietary form, we must assume it has disappeared'. No wonder the English have such an affection for mediocre TV magicians if they are so easily convinced by these disappearing tricks. In this way, English law retains its determination to understand property in terms of tangible property and not as value which attaches to different items of property (tangible or intangible) from time to time. This is ironic given that the purpose of the law of tracing is straightforwardly to recognise that property rights may continue to exist even though the original property itself is beyond reach.¹⁶⁰

19.6 CLAIMING: TRUSTS AND REMEDIES

Aside from the loss of the right to trace, remedies in relation to tracing claims will typically include: the establishment of a lien; the establishment of a constructive trust; the establishment of an equitable charge; and subrogation.

Having considered the nature of the tracing process, it is important to consider the types of claim and the forms of remedy which might be imposed as a result of it. The two principal remedies are the charge¹⁶¹ and the constructive trust;¹⁶² although resulting trust,¹⁶³ equitable compensation,¹⁶⁴ lien¹⁶⁵ and subrogation¹⁶⁶ are also possible on the basis of decided cases.¹⁶⁷ The structure is simple: first, the tracing process is carried out in accordance with the principles considered above; then, secondly, having identified the property which is to be the subject matter of the claim, the claimant seeks to impose a trust or some equitable remedy over that property. The various possibilities are considered below. In short, there are no clear rules as to which remedy should be applied in which situation but rather the courts seem to be prepared to impose whichever remedy seems to be most appropriate in the circumstances and whichever remedy provides the most convenient solution for the successful claimant. Therefore, this section will consider all of the principal remedies in turn. First, however, we shall consider in the abstract which form of remedy is likely to be most appropriate in which type of situation: this will make the nature of each remedy easier to understand.

159 For an extended discussion of this idea, see generally Chapter 31.

160 In general see Chapter 31; Hudson, 1999:3, 170.

161 Re Tilley's Will Trusts [1967] Ch 1179.

162 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669, at para 19.5.3 below.

163 El Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings [1993] 3 All ER 717.

164 Target Holdings v Redfern [1996] 1 AC 421, [1995] 3 WLR 352, [1995] 3 All ER 785.

165 Foskett v McKeown [2001] 1 AC 102.

166 Boscawen v Bajwa [1996] 1 WLR 328. Considered in section 30.7.

167 Contrary to Professor Birks's argument that it is not appropriate to talk of 'rights' and 'remedies' but rather only of 'rights' which necessarily imply their remedies (Birks, 2000:1), this is one context in which the rights of the claimant may lead to the realisation of any one of a number of remedies dependent on the context, one of which (equitable compensation) necessarily involves some judicial discretion; see generally Barker, 1998, 319.

19.6.1 What form of remedy would be most appropriate: a charge, a lien or a constructive trust?

The onus is on the claimant to claim the remedy which is most appropriate in the circumstances. Different types of remedy will be more suitable or more appropriate in different circumstances depending on the nature of the property and whether or not there are innocent third parties involved. Usually this issue resolves itself to a choice between a charge over the traced property, or a possessory lien over the property, or the award of proprietary rights in the form of a constructive trust over the property in favour of the claimant. Each of these remedies is considered in detail below but their basic characteristics can be explained here. First, the charge arises only in equity and entitles the claimant to seize the property and seek a court order to sell it if the defendant does not pay the claimant whatever the claimant is owed under the terms of the charge. Secondly, a lien entitles the claimant to take physical possession of property and to retain that property until the defendant pays the claimant whatever the claimant is owed. Both of these types of remedy are therefore concerned with ensuring that the claimant is paid an amount of money and both require that the property can be identified separately from other property. The third ‘remedy’¹⁶⁸ is the constructive trust which entitles the claimant to an equitable proprietary interest in the traced property. In theory such a constructive trust could be constructed so that any third party with rights in the traced property would hold the equitable interest in that property in common with the claimant; more usually a constructive trust will be claimed so that the claimant can become the absolute beneficial owner of property so that she can acquire any future increase in value in that property. A constructive trust is likely to be sought in circumstances in which the property is intrinsically valuable or when it is likely to be of use to the claimant.

So, if the property that was being traced was a cargo of cotton onboard a ship moored at Tilbury Docks in London and if the claimants had no use themselves for a large quantity of cotton, the claimants might seek a charge over the cotton so that they could force payment of an amount equal to the amount of money which was wrongfully taken from their trust fund; if payment was not made, they could use their rights under the charge to sell the cotton. If they feared that the ship might sail away from England, then they could seek a lien so as to take possession of the cotton until they were paid an amount equal to the amount of money taken wrongfully from their trust fund. If the property being traced was a holding of valuable shares, the claimants may prefer to enforce a constructive trust over those shares so that the claimants would become the beneficial owners (and would thus remain the beneficial owners even if they subsequently increased in value).

The decision as to which remedy will be the most appropriate will therefore depend on the circumstances. The nature of the property will be particularly important, as outlined above. So, where the property subject to the tracing claim is capable of being separated from other property so that it could form the subject matter of a trust, a constructive trust may be the most appropriate remedy. If the property were not so segregated, then it would not be possible to impose a trust over that property because the subject matter of that trust would not be separately identifiable.¹⁶⁹ If, for example, the traceable proceeds of the claimant’s original property were mixed with property belonging to other innocent parties, the more appropriate approach would be to award a charge to each party in proportion to their contribution to the total fund. Alternatively, the claimant might be awarded a lien in circumstances in which compensation in money would be appropriate, but so that the claimant would have the protection of a lien in the event that payment was not made. Each of these claims is considered further below.

168 The word ‘remedy’ here is in inverted commas because, strictly, constructive trusts are institutional and not remedial.

169 MacJordan Construction Ltd v Brookmount Erostin Ltd [1992] BCLC 350.

The advantage of the constructive trust is that the claimant acquires equitable title in specific property. However, a fixed charge does grant property rights which will be enforceable in the event of an insolvency by means of granting the claimant a right to be paid an amount of money but, if the debtor defaults, giving the claimant a right to seize the specified property to realise its claim.¹⁷⁰ The shortcoming of a charge is that once the repossessed property is sold, the claimant is entitled only to recover the amount of the debt, not to take absolute title in the property, having to account to the debtor instead for any surplus. Were the claimant to establish a right under a constructive trust, as considered below, the claimant would be entitled to take equitable ownership of the property and thus take title in any increase in value in that property. So, this raises the question: which remedy should be applied in which circumstances. Lord Millett held the following in Foskett v McKeown:¹⁷¹

As Ames pointed out in ‘Following Misappropriated Property into its Product’ (1906) Harvard Law Review 511, consistency requires that, if a trustee buys property partly with his own money and partly with trust money, the beneficiary should have the option of taking a proportionate part of the new property or a lien upon it, as may be most for his advantage.

The detail of these dicta need not detain us at the moment – we shall consider the obligations of trustees shortly. What is significant is the acceptance by Lord Millett here that there is no single remedy which the court is obliged to impose: rather, the court will impose whatever remedy is appropriate bearing in mind the convenience to the claimant. Thus, when I identified the most important remedies as being the constructive trust, the charge and the lien, I was doing so on the basis of what judges have tended to do in practice. At the time of writing there is no clear, single judicial statement of which remedy should be applied in which context and therefore we shall have to formulate an understanding of why judges impose given remedies in given situations for ourselves.

The main principles, it is suggested, are as follows, once the tracing process has been successfully pursued and the target property has been successfully identified, if the original property which was taken from the trust can be identified separately from all other property, then a following claim will be sufficient for the court to declare that that property belongs beneficially to the beneficiaries of the trust.¹⁷² For the other principles we must assume that the original property cannot be identified separately from all other property and that instead that property is mixed with other property. If the property is of a fungible sort – like money in a bank account or salt in a salt cellar – and if the claimant wants the property itself, then the claimant will seek a constructive trust over the entire fund so that the claimant is beneficially entitled to an appropriate proportion of that fund. Put crudely, she will become the owner of part of that property.

170 Re Tilley's Will Trusts [1967] Ch 1179; Paul Davies Pty Ltd v Davies [1983] 1 NSWLR 440.

171 [2001] 1 AC 102, 127.

172 Ibid.

Alternatively, if the property is not property which the claimant would wish to own but if the claimant would prefer to have the cash equivalent of her loss as a beneficiary, then she will prefer to have a charge or a lien over the entire mixture of property. As discussed below, a charge will entitle the claimant to petition the court for seizure of the property if the defendant does not pay her the cash amount required; or alternatively a lien will entitle the claimant to take possession of the property until such time as payment in an amount sufficient to settle the claim is made to her, and if payment is not so made then the claimant will petition the court for seizure of the property. So, if the property acquired with the trust's money was a component in a large industrial machine, the claimant might have no use for that component. Therefore, she would prefer to have a charge over the entire machine to secure her right to money from the defendant, but so that she could insist on the sale of the machine if payment were not made. If the property acquired with the trust's money was something more portable, like an oil painting which is not expected to increase much in value, then the claimant would prefer to take a lien over the painting – such that she would take physical possession of the painting – until such time as she is paid enough money to settle her claim by the defendant. If the defendant does not pay up then the claimant would apply to the court for permission to sell the painting. So, we can see that much will depend on the nature of the property involved as to which remedy is the most appropriate, and also much will depend on whether or not the claimant would have any use for the type of property which the defendant had acquired with the misapplied trust fund.

19.6.2 Constructive trust recognised in response to equitable tracing claims

The basis on which a constructive trust will be used as a remedy in a tracing claim

As considered in the previous section, a constructive trust will be an appropriate response¹⁷³ to a tracing claim where there is identified and separate property capable of being held on trust for the claimant as a result of the tracing process. As discussed in Chapter 12, in general terms a constructive trust is imposed in circumstances in which the defendant deals with property knowing of some factor which affects her conscience.¹⁷⁴ Thus, the House of Lords in *Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC*¹⁷⁵ held that there will not be a constructive trust without the defendant having knowledge of some factor which affects her conscience. For the imposition of a constructive trust as a result of an equitable tracing claim, it is therefore required that there be a pre-existing equitable interest sufficient to ground the equitable tracing claim,¹⁷⁶ that there be identifiable property which can be the subject matter of the trust,¹⁷⁷ and that the defendant have acted unconscionably with knowledge that her actions were unconscionable.¹⁷⁸

173 The term 'response' is used here because, strictly, the word 'remedy' would be inaccurate given that English constructive trusts are institutional and not remedial.

174 See section 12.1 above.

175 [1996] AC 669, [1996] 2 All ER 961.

176 Re Diplock [1948] Ch 465.

177 Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

178 Ibid.

In Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC,¹⁷⁹ a bank paid money to a local authority under an interest rate swap contract which was subsequently found to have been void ab initio. The principal question was whether or not the bank could demonstrate that the local authority should be required, by virtue of their common mistake¹⁸⁰ as to the validity of the contract or the failure of consideration when the contract was avoided, to be treated as a constructive trustee of the moneys paid to it such that the bank would be able to trace its money into the local authority's general funds. It was held that the local authority would not be treated as having been a constructive trustee of the moneys paid to it by the bank because, from the time it received the money until the time at which it dissipated those moneys, it had no knowledge that the contract was void ab initio and therefore could not have dealt unconscionably with the money.¹⁸¹ There was no constructive trust, nor any trust of any other kind,¹⁸² and therefore no equitable interest sufficient to found an equitable tracing claim. Furthermore, there could not have been a constructive trust because there was no property over which such a trust could have been imposed, or in relation to which an equitable tracing claim could have been commenced, once the local authority had spent the money paid to it by the bank.¹⁸³

Whether constructive trusts will be imposed in response to a tracing claim to award new rights in property, and whether an equitable base sufficient to found a tracing claim is necessary to found a constructive trust

In the abstract, it is clear in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC that there was no constructive trust because there was no knowledge of any factor affecting the defendant's conscience. Nevertheless, it should be recognised that in general terms, constructive trusts may arise in two completely different contexts. The first context would be in recognition of a pre-existing proprietary right which is deemed to have been transferred into the traceable proceeds of property taken originally from the claimant. The second context would be to impose an equitable obligation over a defendant in relation to property which the claimant had not previously owned because the defendant is deemed to have acted unconscionably in relation to that property in general terms.

The former type of constructive trust, in the form of a recognition of pre-existing property rights, is evident from the decision in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC.¹⁸⁴ By contrast, the latter form of constructive trust arises in satisfaction of a form of general, equitable obligation in the manner demonstrated by Lord Templeman in Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid.¹⁸⁵ In the latter case, Lord Templeman held that a person who receives a bribe in breach of some office holds that bribe on constructive trust from the moment he receives it, with the result that any property which is acquired with that property or any profit

179 [1996] AC 669.

180 Or alternatively by virtue of failure of consideration in the form of the void contract.

181 See generally the discussion of this principle at section 12.1.

182 Particularly no resulting trust, as considered at section 11.1.

183 The moneys had been paid into the local authority's general bank accounts and those accounts had subsequently gone overdrawn, this terminating any possible right of tracing, as considered at section 19.3.

184 [1996] AC 669.

185 [1994] 1 AC 324, [1993] 3 WLR 1143.

derived from that property is similarly held on constructive trust.¹⁸⁶ This constructive trust arises over property in which the claimant previously had no proprietary rights but founds equitable proprietary rights by operation of law and consequently a right to commence an equitable tracing claim if the constructive trustee passes that property away or deals with it in some way.

This second type of constructive trust could be imposed simply on the basis of the court's measurement of the conscionability of the defendant's actions. Therefore, it is possible that the claimant might not need to demonstrate a pre-existing equitable interest appropriate to commence an equitable tracing claim, as required by Re Diplock,¹⁸⁷ but simply to show that the defendant has behaved unconscionably in general terms. In Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid,¹⁸⁸ the claimant was entitled to property rights in the defendant's property not because the claimant had had any prior rights in the property or in property through which it was traced, but simply because it is considered equitable to award her such property rights. So, if one thinks carefully about the claim in Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid the claimant Attorney-General was able to impose a constructive trust over property which had been acquired with bribes without needing to prove that the claimant had any prior equitable interest in the bribes, never mind attempting to prove that any such rights could be traced into the acquired property. Instead, the constructive trust in that case was imposed over substitute property solely on the basis of the defendant's unconscionable behaviour in receiving bribes. Alternatively, the better analysis in keeping with Diplock, would be to say that the unconscionable act of, for example, receiving a bribe as in Reid is itself the thing which gives rise to the equitable proprietary action, therefore there is no logical gap in this area of the law.

Nevertheless there may be a tension in the nature of constructive trusts between those constructive trusts imposed on a person who deals with property knowing that his actions are unconscionable, and those constructive trusts which are imposed in relation to equitable tracing claims.¹⁸⁹ It has been suggested that even as a result of the speech of Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC,¹⁹⁰ there is no need to demonstrate a prior equitable interest in the property to establish a constructive trust. This conclusion results from his Lordship only requiring a defendant to have knowledge of a factor which affects her conscience for there to be a constructive trust imposed.¹⁹¹ Lord Browne-Wilkinson did, however, mention the need for a pre-existing equitable interest on which an equitable tracing claim should be based and therefore it could be said that his Lordship was not intending to overlook the niceties of the law tracing before the award of a constructive trust in such cases.

186 The first constructive trust over the bribe itself arises as a result of equity acting in personam against the defendant such that his unconscionable receipt of that property causes him to be deemed to be a constructive trustee of that property for those beneficiaries to whom fiduciary duties were owed. On the basis, then, that equity looks upon that as done which ought to have been done, the property held on trust is to be treated as having been the property of the claimant from the moment when the conscience of the defendant was affected by knowledge that his act was unconscionable, thus giving rise to a proprietary right in equity.

187 [1948] Ch 465.

188 [1994] 1 AC 324.

189 See specifically the discussion of the nature of constructive trusts in equitable tracing claims in Thomas and Hudson, 2004, at para 29–73 et seq.

190 [1996] 2 WLR 802, 838–39 in relation to a part of the speech headed 'The stolen bag of coins'.

191 Birks, 1996:2 at 10.

By contrast with ordinary constructive trusts, equitable tracing claims entitle the claimant to a remedy even if the defendant is an innocent volunteer.¹⁹² That means that the defendant need not have acted unconscionably for a constructive trust to be imposed as a response to an equitable tracing claim; rather, such constructive trusts are imposed so as to vindicate the claimant's rights in the traced property. In some circumstances, it may be that the defendant has acted unconscionably in coming into possession of the property but that is not a prerequisite of the claim. So, in Re Diplock there was an equitable tracing claim brought in relation to money paid out of a trust in the belief that the trustees were entitled to pay money to a medical charity, whereas the charitable purpose clause in that will trust was found to be void for not expressing a purely charitable purpose. Therefore, the beneficiaries under the will trust sought to trace into the assets of the charity to recover the property which had been paid to them in good faith by the trustees and which the charity had received in good faith. The beneficiaries' claim to be able to trace into the assets of the charity to recover the trust's money was not prevented by the fact that the charity had not acted unconscionably. Rather, the tracing claim was concerned to recover the beneficiaries' property rights regardless of the conscionability of the defendant's actions, unless the defendant could demonstrate one of the defences considered below. The same point emerges from Foskett v McKeown where the defendants had not personally committed any unconscionable act.

However, there are cases where good conscience has been held to be a good reason for not permitting a tracing action in relation to which the claimant was seeking to impose a constructive trust over property. An illustration of this line of authority can be taken by extrapolation from one decided case, Allan v Rea Brothers Trustees Ltd.¹⁹³ Suppose that property was transferred from one pension trust fund, A, to another pension trust fund, B. Suppose further that it was found that the money had been received by the trustees of the A trust in breach of the terms of the B trust, but that the consciences of the trustees of the A trust were not affected because they did not know that their actions constituted a breach of the terms of the B trust. The question would be whether or not the beneficiaries of trust A could trace into trust B and impose a constructive trust over the moneys which had been paid into trust B. Mainstream constructive trusts law would require that the trustees be shown to have acted unconscionably in relation to the receipt of that money before a constructive trust could be imposed over it. On the basis of this argument it was held in Allan v Rea Brothers Trustees Ltd that there would not be any trust over the transferred moneys in favour of the B trust because the trustees had not had knowledge at the material time of any factor which ought to have affected their consciences. However, in that case, it was acknowledged¹⁹⁴ that the property remained in equity the property of the B trust, further to the decision in Foskett v McKeown, regardless of the knowledge of the trustees of the B trust.

Clearly, there is a tension here between the question whether or not a person can be held liable to hold property on constructive trust further to an equitable tracing claim so as to vindicate the claimant's property rights in the trust property, or whether such a constructive trust can only come into existence if the defendant's conscience is affected. It is suggested that the courts have taken the approach that a constructive trust will be imposed further to an equitable tracing claim so as to vindicate the claimant's property rights,¹⁹⁵ just as tracing in general is said to be concerned with vindicating the claimant's property rights in general.

192 Re Diplock's Estate [1948] Ch 465; Foskett v McKeown [2001] 1 AC 102, [2000] 3 All ER 97.

193 Allan v Rea Brothers Trustees Ltd [2002] EWCA Civ 85, where this issue emerges at para 46.

194 Ibid, at para 52, per Robert Walker LJ.

I would suggest that there is a way out of this puzzle as to whether or not the defendant ought to be required to have knowledge of some factor which affects her conscience before a constructive trust can be imposed over property in her possession. In practice, it is suggested that for an equitable tracing claim to be successful, it would be necessary in any event for the defendant to have under her control or in her possession the traceable proceeds of some property belonging in equity to the claimant. Therefore, the commencement of proceedings to assert title to that property and any communications prior to the service of proceedings will have furnished the defendant with sufficient knowledge to be obliged to hold that property on constructive trust for the claimant. Therefore, the start of the litigation would itself constitute the claimant giving the defendant notice of that unconscionable factor, even if the defendant had not known about it beforehand. The defendant would be required to make out a defence either of change of position, or of having purchased that property in good faith, or of estoppel by representation to resist the tracing claim. In this way, it is suggested, the conceptual problem as to whether or not the mooted imposition of a constructive trust in a claim for equitable tracing would be trumped by a lack of sufficient knowledge disappears in practice when the claimant first contacts the defendant. If the property or its traceable proceeds is no longer in the possession of the defendant then the right to trace would have been lost in any event, and so a tracing claim would in any event be inappropriate.¹⁹⁶

That constructive trusts are institutional, and not remedial, in this context

In the speech of Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC,¹⁹⁷ when considering the flawed judgment of Gouling J Chase Manhattan v Israel-British Bank,¹⁹⁸ the problem that arose was the use of a seemingly remedial constructive trust by Gouling J with reference to a mistaken payment made by one bank to another. Lord Browne-Wilkinson held that English law will only impose an institutional constructive trust, not a remedial constructive trust. The institutional constructive trust is defined as arising by operation of law so as to protect pre-existing property rights without the scope for discretionary application on a case-by-case basis; a remedial constructive trust, by contrast, would permit the court's discretion as to the terms and nature of that constructive trust.

Under an institutional constructive trust, the trust arises by operation of law as from the date of the circumstances which give rise to it: the function of the court is merely to declare that such trust has arisen in the past. The consequences that flow from such a trust having arisen are also determined by rules of law, not under a discretion. However, in Chase Manhattan, Gouling J had suggested that there was no distinction between English and New York law, even though New York law would apply a remedial constructive trust in the following way. As Lord Browne-Wilkinson held, the remedial constructive trust is very different from the institutional constructive trust used in England:

¹⁹⁵ Re Diplock; Diplock v Wintle [1948] Ch 465; Foskett v McKeown [2001] 1 AC 102.

¹⁹⁶ Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington [1996] AC 669.

¹⁹⁷ [1996] AC 669.

¹⁹⁸ [1981] 1 Ch 105.

A remedial constructive trust, as I understand it, is different. It is a judicial remedy giving rise to an enforceable equitable obligation: the extent to which it operates retrospectively to the prejudice of third parties lies in the discretion of the court.¹⁹⁹

While the institutional constructive trust remains the English law approach, it was held possible by Lord Browne-Wilkinson for the remedial constructive trust to be introduced in the future:

Although the resulting trust is an unsuitable basis for developing proprietary restitutionary remedies, the remedial constructive trust, if introduced into English law, may provide a more satisfactory road forward.

The future of the law of tracing may therefore lie with a constructive trust imposed by the court, perhaps in similar manner to the doctrine of proprietary estoppel, by means of a remedy which is tailor-made for each case as opposed to one which simply recognises pre-existing property rights.

There are two other views of the result in Chase Manhattan. The first is that rescission ought to effect automatic reversion of the property to the claimant.²⁰⁰ As Millett LJ held in El Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings, the form of trust involved here could be seen as being based on the resulting trust. However, we must remember that this was the model of restitutionary resulting trust which had been advanced originally by Prof Birks²⁰¹ and which had been so roundly dismissed by the House of Lords in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington, as considered in Chapter 11. The second view, related to the first, is that a remedy based on a tracing claim should exist to prevent unjust enrichment.²⁰² This is the argument based on Smith's work²⁰³ which was rejected in Foskett v McKeown when it was held by Lord Browne-Wilkinson²⁰⁴ and by Lord Millett that the purpose of tracing is to protect property rights as part of property law, and not to reverse enrichments received by defendants as a result of some unjust factor.²⁰⁵ The broader impact of the decision in Westdeutsche Landesbank in the context of imposing proprietary rights by constructive trust is considered at para 19.6.2 above, and the general nature of such trusts in cases of theft at para 19.5.3.

19.6.3 Charges and liens in tracing

Equitable charges

Equitable charges are considered in detail in Chapter 23.²⁰⁶ For the purposes of this discussion, a charge will give the claimant a proportionate right in a fund of property equal to a 199 [1996] AC 669, per Lord Browne-Wilkinson.

200 El Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings [1993] 3 All ER 717.

201 Birks, 1992.

202 Goff and Jones, 2002, 101.

203 Smith, 1997.

204 [2001] 1 AC 102, 109.

205 Ibid, 129.

206 See section 23.2 below.

given value, but without the need for the claimant to segregate property within that fund as would be required for the creation of a trust.²⁰⁷ Charges can be fixed over specific property, or they can float over a pool of property such that the legal owner of that fund can continue to deal with it. Charges take effect only in equity, not at common law.²⁰⁸ The means of identifying the difference between a fixed and a floating charge is the following one:

A [fixed, or] specific charge . . . is one that without more fastens on ascertained and definite property or property capable of being ascertained and defined; a floating charge, on the other hand, is ambulatory and shifting in its nature, hovering over and so to speak floating with the property which it is intended to effect until some event occurs or some act is done which causes it to settle and fasten on the subject of the charge within its reach and grasp.²⁰⁹

It is more likely that a court would order a fixed charge so as to freeze the fund held by the defendant, with each claimant to a beneficial share of that fund entitled to a specified proportion of it. A charge, then, offers a means of granting a security interest over property to the claimant without the need for the formalities necessary for a trust.²¹⁰

In a tracing action, the benefit of a charge to the claimant would be to grant her a right to be paid whatever amount of money has been awarded by the court further to the tracing action so as to compensate the beneficiaries for their loss, but with the added benefit of a security interest over the charged property which can be seized by order of the court if the defendant fails to make payment. Thus, charges grant a right to seize the charged property in the event that the defendant does not perform her obligations to pay money or to transfer property to the claimant. Importantly, though, a mere charge does not grant the chargee an immediate right in the charged property in the manner that a mortgage grants the mortgagee such an immediate right of ownership in the mortgaged property.²¹¹ As the current authors of Fisher and Lightwood's Law of Mortgage put the matter:

A charge is a security whereby real or personal property is appropriated for the discharge of a debt or other obligation, but which does not pass either an absolute or a special property in the subject of the security to the creditor, nor any right to possession. In the event of non-payment of the debt, the creditor's right of realisation is by judicial process.²¹²

207 Re Goldcorp [1995] 1 AC 74.

208 Re Coslett Contractors Ltd [1998] Ch 495. Explained in Gleeson, Personal Property Law (FT Law & Tax, 1997) 235, to be the case because title may not be divided at common law.

209 Illingworth v Houldsworth [1904] AC 355, 358, per Lord Macnaghten.

210 Clough Mill v Martin [1984] 3 All ER 982.

211 It should be noted that the judges are not always so discriminating between charges and mortgages, often using the terms synonymously. See, for example, Slade J in Siebe Gorman v Barclays Bank [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep 142, 159 where the terms are used interchangeably in the following passage: ' . . . a specific charge on the proceeds of [the book debts] as soon as they are received and consequently prevents the mortgagor from disposing of an unencumbered title to the subject matter of such charge without the mortgagee's consent, even before the mortgagee has taken steps to enforce its security.'

212 Falcon Chambers, Fisher and Lightwood's Law of Mortgage (11th edn, Butterworths, 2002) 25.

Thus a chargee has a right to apply to the court to seek a right to seize the charged property and to sell it so as to realise the amount owed to it.²¹³ Any surplus realised on sale will be held on constructive trust for the chargor.²¹⁴ There is no specific formality for the creation of a charge over personalty.²¹⁵ Once a court orders the existence of a charge then the chargee – the claimant in a tracing claim – will have a right to receive money in satisfaction of her rights or to enforce the charge as just described.

Liens

A lien is a right to take possession of another person's property until such time as that other person makes payment in satisfaction of a debt or some other obligation. In equity, it is not necessary for the claimant to have possession of the property before seeking permission to seize that property. A lien is a right only to detain property and not a right to sell it.²¹⁶ If the claimant wishes to sell the property to recover amounts owed to her by the defendant, then she must apply to the court for permission.²¹⁷ Liens can arise both at common law and in equity. Common law liens are frequently annexed to a contractual right in some way. By contrast, in general, equitable liens can be imposed by the courts otherwise than by means of an express contractual provision.²¹⁸ Rather, an equitable lien is a right accepted by equity to detain property which then gives rise to an equitable charge,²¹⁹ such an equitable charge in turn granting its holder a proprietary right in the manner considered above. So, an equitable lien is really a manifestation of a jurisdiction accepted by courts of equity to detain property by imposing an equitable charge over it.²²⁰ That equitable charge in turn grants the chargee a right to apply to the court for an order for sale of that property by means of a writ in the Chancery Division of the High Court endorsed with a claim to be entitled to an equitable lien,²²¹ and otherwise in the manner considered above in relation to equitable charges.²²² In a tracing claim the usefulness of a lien is that it enables the claimant to assume physical control of property until the defendant satisfies her obligations to the claimant. Diplock LJ described the lien as a 'primitive remedy'²²³ of a 'self-help' variety whereby the claimant has a right exercisable over goods already in her possession (in the case of a common law lien)

213 Johnson v Shippen (1703) 2 Ld Raym 982; Stainbank v Fenning (1851) 11 CB 51; Stainbank v Shepard (1853) 13 CB 418. This doctrine is also considered in the following cases: Swiss Bank Corporation v Lloyds Bank Ltd [1982] AC 584 at 595, [1980] 2 All ER 419 at 425, CA, [1982] AC 584, [1981] 2 All ER 449, HL; Carreras Rothmans Ltd v Freeman Mathews Treasure Ltd [1985] Ch 207, [1985] 1 All ER 155 at 169; Re Charge Card Services Ltd [1987] Ch 150 at 176, [1989] Ch 497 CA; Re BCCI (No 8) [1998] AC 214, [1997] 4 All ER 568, HL; Re Coslett Contractors Ltd [1998] Ch 495 at 507, per Millett LJ.

214 Cf Law of Property Act 1925, s 103.

215 Cradock v Scottish Provident Institution (1893) 69 LT 380, affirmed at (1894) 70 LT 718, CA.

216 Hammonds v Barclay (1802) 2 East 227.

217 Larner v Fawcett [1950] 2 All ER 727.

218 In Re Welsh Irish Ferries Ltd [1986] Ch 471.

219 Ibid; In Re Kent & Sussex Sawmills Ltd [1947] Ch 177.

220 Ibid.

221 Bowles v Rogers (1800) 31 ER 957; Re Stucley [1906] 1 Ch 67.

222 See Hudson, 2006, para 11–70 et seq.

223 Primitive in the sense that it reeks of brute force and the common-sensical notion that if you owe me x and I have property of yours in my possession equal to the value of x , then I should simply keep your property unless you make payment of x to me.

or possibly not in her possession (in the case of an equitable lien) and operates as a defence to the other party's claim for recovery of those goods.²²⁴

Ordinarily, the courts will award equitable liens in a narrow range of well-established contexts.²²⁵ Examples of equitable liens include an equity to secure the discharge of indebtedness,²²⁶ the solicitor's lien on property recovered,²²⁷ a trustee's lien in relation to her expenses,²²⁸ and in relation to contracts for the sale of land there are the vendor's lien over the purchase money and the concomitant purchaser's lien over any deposit advanced.²²⁹ The equitable lien is predicated on there being some obligation to pay money or to do some similar act. Equity will impose a charge in such circumstances to reflect this obligation.

19.6.4 Subrogation

Subrogation is a powerful equitable remedy in tracing and other situations. It is best explained by means of an example. If Arthur's money was used by Brian to pay off a debt which Brian owed to Colin, then equitable subrogation would permit Arthur to insist that Brian owed that same debt to Arthur. This remedy is particularly useful in tracing claims when the original property has been dissipated or cannot be traced: what the claimant can do is to demand that any obligation which was discharged with the original property is henceforth owed to the claimant instead. The equitable remedy of subrogation is considered in section 30.7. The leading case in this context is Boscawen v Bajwa,²³⁰ which was considered above at para 19.3.2, in which the Abbey National Building Society paid mortgage moneys to Bajwa expecting that they would be secured over the land which Bajwa was selling. Due to a mistake by the solicitors acting in this case, the mortgage moneys were paid to Bajwa's account, so that Bajwa's mortgage with the Halifax Building Society was discharged, but the sale of the property did not go through. Therefore, the Abbey National did not acquire the mortgage security it was expecting. The remedy of subrogation meant that the mortgage which Bajwa owed to Halifax was revived and Bajwa owed the mortgage debt instead to Abbey National on the same terms: the Abbey National was thus subrogated to the earlier rights of the Halifax. Abbey National acquired a remedy by way of subrogation in the form of being owed the mortgage debt which had been discharged with their money. Thus a remedy is provided even though the money taken from Abbey National has ceased to be traceable because it has passed into Halifax's general accounts and cannot be identified. In relation to tracing generally, the remedy of subrogation allows the claimant to trace her property into the defendant's possession and then, even if that property has been used to pay off a debt and ostensibly has therefore disappeared, the claimant can become the defendant's creditor for the debt which was discharged.²³¹

224 Tappenden v Artus [1964] 2 QB 185.

225 Not in relation to sales of goods, where a statutory lien applies: Sale of Goods Act 1979, s 41.

226 Re Bernstein [1925] Ch 12 at 17; Re Bond Worth Ltd [1980] Ch 228 at 251.

227 See Snell's Equity (Sweet & Maxwell, 2005), para 42–05.

228 Trustee Act 1925, s 30(2); Re Beddoe [1893] 1 Ch 547.

229 Mackreth v Symmons (1808) 15 Ves 329 at 340, 33 ER 778 at 782; Rose v Watson (1864) 10 HL Cas 672 at 684.

230 [1996] 1 WLR 328. See also para 30.7.3 below. Ibrahim v Barclays Bank [2011] EWHC 1897 (Ch) followed Boscawen v Bajwa.

231 Gertsch v Aspasia (2000) 2 ITELR 342.

19.6.5 Swollen assets theory

There is one anomalous set of dicta which suggested a radically different approach to equitable tracing. They appeared in the speech of Lord Templeman in Space Investments Ltd v Canadian Bank:²³²

In these circumstances [where money has passed in breach of fiduciary duty into the assets of the defendant, such that the specific money cannot be traced] it is impossible for the beneficiaries interested in trust money misappropriated from their trust to trace their money to any particular asset belonging to the trustee bank. But equity allows the beneficiaries, or a new trustee appointed in place of an insolvent bank trustee . . . to trace the trust money to all the assets of the bank and to recover the trust money by the exercise of an equitable charge over all the assets of the bank . . . that equitable charge secures for the beneficiaries and the trust priority over the claims of customers . . . and . . . all other unsecured creditors.

The importance of this approach is that it is not necessary to identify specific property over which the tracing claim is to be exercised. On the facts, money was paid by one bank to another as a result of an unjust factor, which would have entitled the payer to recover that property in ordinary circumstances. However, the money passed into the general accounts of the payee, so that it could not be separated from the general assets of the payee. The traditional approach would be to say: ‘If the payment cannot be identified among other property, there is no right to trace into that property.’

Lord Templeman’s approach suggests that it is possible to say: ‘My money went in there, it is still in there somewhere, and therefore I want rights over the whole thing equal to the value of my lost money.’ This mirrors the American ‘swollen assets theory’, which entitles the claimant to impose a charge over the assets of the recipient equal to the value of the property which was misappropriated. Subsequently, these obiter dicta have been criticised by academics and judges alike. The criticism of this approach is that it grants advantageous rights to unsecured creditors over the whole of the assets in an entity in the event of that entity’s insolvency, particularly when that creditor cannot identify rights in any specific property. Thus, it was held in *Bishopsgate v Homan*²³³ by Dillon LJ that the ‘swollen assets approach’ should not be interpreted in any event to give rights in an overdrawn account by asserting rights over all the assets of the bank. This approach perhaps recognises more accurately the true nature of the sets of property rights represented by electronic bank accounts, as considered above.

It is clear that the ‘swollen assets approach’ is not English law but rather forms part of obiter dicta delivered by Lord Templeman. By contrast, in Re Goldcorp,²³⁴ it was held that the rights of claimants to some proprietary tracing claim would be restricted to the situation in which identifiable property was held distinctly and separately for the benefit of those claimants. In part this follows the general English law approach that equitable tracing will be available only where there is some pre-existing equitable or fiduciary relationship which gives rise to some proprietary rights in the claimant, and in part it is the result of the possibility of the imposition of a trust only in circumstances in which the property held on trust is segregated from other property.²³⁵

232 [1986] 3 All ER 75, 76–77, [1986] 1 WLR 1072, 1074.

233 [1995] 1 WLR 31.

234 [1995] 1 AC 74.

The approach which English law adopts does mean that the availability of equitable tracing and equitable proprietary claims in general is greatly restricted precisely because such claims are said to attach only to identifiable, segregated property. Thus in *Ultraframe (UK) Ltd v Fielding*²³⁶ it was held that where the claimant could not identify any particular item of property as being a substitute for the original trust property, but instead could only demonstrate that the defendant had earned a profit from behaviour which had been allegedly unconscionable, then it was held that it would not be possible to trace into that profit because no link between it and any property taken in breach of trust had been proven. In that case, which was a voluminous piece of litigation, it had been alleged that confidential information relating to the construction of conservatories had been taken in breach of fiduciary duty by employees of a company and then used for their own personal profit. Amongst many other claims, the claimants sought to trace into the profits which had resulted from the use of this information. However, the link had not been proved on the facts: all that could be demonstrated was that there had been profits made but not that any property held on trust had been used to make them. By extrapolation, then, simply identifying a profit in the hands of a defendant will not be sufficient to found a tracing action unless that profit can be demonstrated to constitute a substitute for the original property. The claimant would therefore be required to seek other remedies based on constructive trust in relation to that property.

19.6.6 An oddity with tracing remedies

One of the more unusual factors about the remedies usually applied in relation to tracing actions is that not all of them are ordinarily proprietary. A constructive trust will recognise that the successful claimant has property rights in the traced property. However, a lien is a purely possessory remedy which does not grant a proprietary right but only a right to detain property until an amount of money is paid. It is only if the money is not paid that the claimant is entitled to petition to court to ask that the property be sold so as to realise the amount of money which is owed to the claimant. Similarly, a charge does not grant a proprietary right in the charged property (unlike a mortgage) but rather grants the chargee only a contingent right to seize the property until she is paid the amount of money which she is owed, and if she is not paid that money then she may seek a sale of the property. It is therefore somewhat counter-intuitive that these latter remedies are not strictly concerned with proprietary rights, although they do involve dealings with property to secure a right in money, and yet nevertheless they are commonly used as remedies in tracing actions. In cases involving money, as in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington or Foskett v McKeown, usually the claimants will only be concerned to recover money and may be comparatively unconcerned about the precise legal mechanism which leads to those sums being paid into their bank account.

Lord Millett in Foskett v McKeown did suggest that proprietary remedies, like the constructive trust, are the primary form of remedy in relation to mixed funds, with a lien being available in the event that a constructive trust is inappropriate. What his Lordship said more precisely was the following:

235 See also Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

236 [2005] EWHC 1638 (Ch), [2005] All ER (D) 397.

The primary rule in regard to a mixed fund, therefore, is that gains and losses are borne by the contributors rateably.²³⁷ The beneficiary's right to elect instead to enforce a lien to obtain repayment is an exception to the primary rule, exercisable where the fund is deficient and the claim is made against the wrongdoer and those claiming through him.

Lord Millett relied on similar principles which apply in relation to physical mixtures where it is said that if the mixture is the fault of the defendant then it is open to the claimant to 'claim the goods'.²³⁸ Nevertheless, it is exactly this sort of loose phraseology about the nature of the remedies in tracing claims which generates confusion. It is suggested that the general approach outlined in section 19.6.1 is the best description of how remedies are to be identified in the absence of a single, clear judicial statement of the principles.

19.6.7 Choice of remedies

Clearly there are a number of remedies potentially available in relation to a tracing claim. No court will permit double recovery in respect of the same loss. Therefore, the equitable doctrine of election arises in such situations to provide that it is open to the claimant to elect between alternative remedies.²³⁹ In Tang v Capacious Investments, the possibility of two parallel remedies arose in relation to a breach of trust. It was held that these two remedies existed in the alternative and therefore that the plaintiff could claim both, not being required to elect between them until judgment was awarded in its favour. However, it was held in *Crittenden v The Estate of Charles Albert Bayliss*²⁴⁰ that it would be an abuse of the process of the court for a claimant to elect not to bring a tracing claim and then at a later stage in litigation to seek to bring that tracing claim in any event.

19.7 DEFENCES

Defences available in relation to tracing claims include change of position, estoppel by representation and passing on, in which the defendant will assert that she dealt with the property in reliance on good faith that she had some rights in the property. The further defence would be that the defendant was a bona fide purchaser for value of the property without notice of the claimant's rights.

While the preceding discussion has considered the contexts in which a claimant will be able to mount a tracing claim, there will be situations in which the recipient of the traceable proceeds of the claimant's property will be able to resist the claim. The following defences

237 That is, in proportionate shares.

238 Lupton v White, White v Lupton (1808) 15 Ves 432, [1803–13] All ER Rep 336; Sandeman & Sons v Tyzack and Branfoot Steamship Co Ltd [1913] AC 680, 695, [1911–13] All ER Rep 1013, 1020, per Lord Molton.

239 Tang v Capacious Investments Ltd [1996] 1 All ER 193. See Birks, 2000:1, 8.

240 [2005] EWCA Civ 1425.

are apparently available: change of position, passing on, estoppel by representation, and bona fide purchaser for value without notice.

19.7.1 Change of position

The basis of the defence of change of position

The defence of change of position will be available to a defendant who has received property and, on the faith of the receipt of that property, suffered some change in her personal circumstances.²⁴¹ The most concise judicial statement of the manner in which the defence of change of position might operate can be extracted from the (partially dissenting) speech of Lord Goff in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC:²⁴²

Where an innocent defendant's position is so changed that he will suffer an injustice if called upon to repay or to repay in full, the injustice of requiring him so to repay outweighs the injustice of denying the plaintiff restitution.

Thus, the court is required to consider which outcome would be more unjust: either allowing the defendant to keep the property given the harm that would cause to the claimant, or forcing the defendant to return the property to the claimant if the defendant had acted in some way in reliance on having received that property.²⁴³

The doctrine of change of position has grown as part of the doctrine of restitution of unjust enrichment. The outlines of the doctrine of change of position were set out in the following terms by Lord Goff in his speech in the House of Lords in Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale.²⁴⁴ In that case, the defendant casino had received money from a solicitor who had appropriated that money from a law firm's client accounts and gambled it away at the defendant casino. The law firm sought to recover the lost moneys from the casino by means of equitable and common law tracing claims, as well as personal liability to account for participation in a breach of trust. With these facts in mind, Lord Goff described the future development of the defence of change of position in the following way:²⁴⁵

I am most anxious that, in recognising this defence to actions of restitution, nothing should be said at this stage to inhibit the development of the defence on a case by case basis, in the usual way. It is, of course, plain that the defence is not open to one who has changed his position in bad faith, as where the defendant has paid away the money with knowledge of the facts entitling the plaintiff to restitution; and it is commonly accepted that the defence should not be open to a wrongdoer. . . . It is not however appropriate in the present case to attempt to identify all those actions in restitution to which change of position may be a defence. . . . At present I do not wish to state the principle any less broadly than this: that the defence is available to a person whose position has so changed

241 Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale [1991] 2 AC 548.

242 [1996] AC 669.

243 Scottish Equitable v Derby [2000] 3 All ER 793, HC, [2001] 3 All ER 818, CA.

244 [1991] 2 AC 548.

245 Ibid at 580.

that it would be inequitable in all the circumstances to require him to make restitution, or alternatively to make restitution in full. I wish to stress however that the mere fact that the defendant has spent the money, in whole or in part, does not of itself render it inequitable that he should be called upon to repay, because the expenditure might in any event have been incurred by him in the ordinary course of things. I fear that the mistaken assumption that mere expenditure of money may be regarded as amounting to a change of position for present purposes has led in the past to opposition by some to recognition of a defence which in fact is likely to be available only on comparatively rare occasions.²⁴⁶

The four key themes to emerge from this passage of Lord Goff's speech are as follows.

(1) The open nature of the defence of change of position

First, Lord Goff places no boundaries on the future development of the defence, although his Lordship did not anticipate that it would develop into a defence of very general application. For example, as his Lordship outlined, simply that the defendant has spent money will not in and of itself demonstrate a change of position. At the very least, the expenditure of money would need to be balanced, as with any other detrimental act, against the injustice of permitting the claimant to trace their property rights into the property in the defendant's hands. Thus, the defence will itself arise on technical bases which are to be established in future cases. However, as will be considered below, the very open nature of this defence now makes it doubtful whether change of position is to be understood as a restitutionary defence or whether it is really just another way of understanding equity's role dealing in good conscience with the parties.

(2) Bad faith as a barrier to the defence of change of position

Secondly, 'bad faith' will be a barrier to any reliance on the defence. What constitutes bad faith in such circumstances remains a difficult question. If a commercial person receives money which was paid by mistake, without making any enquiries of the payer, and then uses that money in a way which would otherwise constitute a change of position, it would be doubtful that such a person will be found to have acted in good faith.²⁴⁷ Equally, if the recipient has said or done something which has encouraged the payer to make that payment, whether innocently or deliberately, then the recipient will be unlikely to make out the defence of change of position successfully.²⁴⁸ Change of position will be available to the extent that 246 In considering the nature of the defence of change of position it was held in Haugesund Kommune v DEPFA ACS Bank [2011] 1 All ER 190, [152] by Pill LJ held that: 'The defence [of change of position] is not fixed in stone, and has developed and can be expected to develop further over time on a case-by-case basis. Broadly speaking the defence is available to a person whose position has so changed that it would be inequitable in all the circumstances to require them to make restitution or alternatively to make restitution in full . . . Concepts of relative fault are not applicable; good faith being a sufficient requirement in this context . . . The defence is to be regarded as founded on a principle of justice designed to protect the defendant from a claim to restitution in respect of a benefit received by him in circumstances in which it would be inequitable to pursue that claim or to pursue it in full . . .' This passage was cited with approval in Ibrahim v Barclays Bank [2011] EWHC 1897 (Ch).

247 Niru Battery Manufacturing Co v Milestone Trading Ltd [2002] EWHC 1425 (Comm), para 135, per Moore-Bick J.

248 See Larner v London County Council [1949] 2 KB 683 at 688, per Lord Denning.

a defendant made payments unknowingly to the fictitious subsidiary company of a third party, as part of a scheme to defraud the defendant and the claimant, but will not be able to rely on that defence in relation to commissions received as part of the process of making those same payments.²⁴⁹ That the defence of change of position is predicated on the balance of justice between the parties, rather than on proving the fault or deliberate action of either party,²⁵⁰ suggests that even innocent actions of this sort may cause the defence of change of position to be unavailable. It has been held by Sedley LJ in *Niru Battery Manufacturing Company v Milestone Trading Ltd*²⁵¹ that the defence of change of position is not dependent upon the demonstration of an absence of bad faith in equal and opposite manner to the obligation to prove dishonesty in a claim for dishonest assistance.²⁵² Bad faith in this context is therefore not to be taken to be equivalent to dishonesty.²⁵³

In *Barros Mattos v MacDaniels Ltd*²⁵⁴ Laddie J accepted the proposition that the defence of change of position would not be available to someone who had acted illegally. It was held that the defendant could not put up a tainted claim to retention of the property against the claimant's untainted claim for restitution. It was accepted, however, that the illegal act might be so minor that it could be ignored on the de minimis principle (that something very small can be ignored) and the defence of change of position could still be available. In this case, a fraudster had stolen money from a Brazilian bank and passed it to the defendant. The defendant had then distributed the money according to the defendant's instructions. The defendant sought to resist a claim for knowing receipt and restitution of the amount stolen from the bank on the basis of change of position. Laddie J approved the principle in *Tinsley v Milligan*²⁵⁵ to the effect that a person who had performed an illegal act could not rely on that illegal act as the basis for rights in property nor could that person, by extension, defend an action for tracing or in knowing receipt. Consequently, the defendant was obliged to account for the entire amount received.²⁵⁶

The reliance placed by Laddie J on Tinsley v Milligan and the old equitable cases²⁵⁷ on illegality when denying the defence of change of position demonstrates the strong link between equitable principles and the principles of unjust enrichment outlined in Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale.²⁵⁸ It is suggested that the propinquity of change of position and the 249 Maersk Air Ltd v Expeditors International (UK) Ltd [2003] 1 Lloyd's Rep 491.

250 See Dextra Bank and Trust Company Ltd v Bank of Jamaica [2002] 1 All ER (Comm) 193, para 142.

251 [2003] EWCA Civ 1446.

252 Ibid, para 179. In Niru Battery v Milestone Trading, Niru had agreed to buy lead ingots from Milestone and so Milestone had obtained financing from CAI to acquire that lead by means of commonly used financial instruments known as 'warehouse warrants'. To pay for the release of the warrants, Milestone in turn acquired further finance from BS and SGS. CAI sold the warrants when it became concerned about the market value of lead and so Milestone was not able to fulfil its obligations to Niru. In proceedings for restitution, it could not be demonstrated that any party had acted dishonestly, with SGS being liable in negligence and CAI liable only in unjust enrichment.

253 Ibid, para 182, applying BCCI v Akindele [2001] Ch 437, distinguishing Medforth v Blake [2000] Ch 86.

254 [2004] 3 All ER 299, [2004] EWHC 1188 (Ch).

255 [1994] 1 AC 340, [1993] 3 All ER 65.

256 It is unclear whether or not the obligation to account was made ultimately on the basis of knowing receipt or on the basis of restitution of unjust enrichment: there is a reliance on Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale [1991] 2 AC 548 which suggests the latter, although the matter is not explained clearly because the application was made on an interlocutory basis.

257 See, eg, Holman v Johnson (1775) 1 Cowp 341, 343, 98 ER 1120, 1121.

258 [1991] 2 AC 548.

principles of equity mean that the barrier between the two is disappearing in practice. This is particularly so where, as in Barros Mattos v MacDaniels, this case could have been disposed of on the basis that a defendant cannot advance the defence of change of position if she has come to equity with unclean hands on the basis of having committed an illegal act.²⁵⁹

(3) Measurement of comparative inequity or harm to be caused to each party

Thirdly, the general purpose of the test is to measure the comparative inequity of recovering the property from the defendant or denying such recovery to the claimant if the defendant has changed her position in some way. The manner in which this process has been carried out will emerge from the cases considered in the following sections.

(4) Activity which will constitute a change of position

Fourthly, it is important to attempt to understand what types of behaviour will constitute a change of position. In short, a change of position could be embodied either by taking any steps which would not otherwise have been taken, or by refraining from some action which would otherwise have been taken. The defence of change of position would seem to include all sums expended by the defendant in reliance on any representation or payment made by the claimant, including the cost of financing a proposed transaction between the parties.²⁶⁰ Furthermore, where the defendant forgoes an opportunity to take a benefit from another source in reliance on the payment received from the claimant, the defendant is entitled to include such a reliance within her defence of change of position.²⁶¹ It has been suggested that even receipt of a payment of money in reliance on an agreement not to contest a divorce petition might constitute a change of position.²⁶² What the defendant cannot do is seek to rely on the benefit of a contract which turned out to have been void,²⁶³ or to have acted in good faith reliance on a payment in circumstances in which they have acquiesced in the action which rendered such payment void.²⁶⁴ In any event, the defendant is required to have acted in good faith in seeking to assert a defence of change of position.²⁶⁵ However, if the defendant has had the benefit of money paid to her, for example, in that she has earned interest on that money or has saved herself banking charges by not going overdrawn to the extent of that payment, then the defendant will be required to account for any such benefit in reducing the worth to her of the change of position defence.²⁶⁶ Where, for example, the defendant received 259 See, for example, Tinsley v Milligan [1994] 1 AC 340, 355, [1993] 3 All ER 65, 72, per Lord Goff; Barros Mattos v MacDaniel [2004] 3 All ER 299, 306, per Laddie J.

260 Sanwa Australia Finance Ltd v Finchill Pty Ltd [2001] NSWCA 466.

261 Palmer v Blue Circle Southern Cement Ltd [2001] RLR 137.

262 X v X (Y and Z Intervening) [2002] 1 FLR 508, as considered in Commerzbank v Price [2003] EWCA Civ 1633, para 68, per Munby J.

263 South Tyneside Metropolitan Borough Council v Svenska International plc [1995] 1 All ER 545.

264 Standard Bank London Ltd v The Bank of Tokyo Ltd [1995] 2 Lloyd's Rep 169.

265 Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale [1991] 2 AC 548; South Tyneside Metropolitan Borough Council v Svenska International plc [1995] 1 All ER 545; Euroactividade AG v Moeller (2001) unreported, 1 February. See also Lloyds Bank v Independent Insurance [1999] 2 WLR 986; Friends Provident v Hillier Parker [1995] 4 All ER 260.

266 Pearce v Lloyds Bank plc [2001] EWCA Civ 1097. Also, if the defendant acquired land with the property, then there will not have been a change of position: Campden Hill Ltd v Chakrani [2005] EWHC 911 (Ch).

£10,000 from the claimant and thus earned interest on that £10,000, the claimant will be entitled to reduce the amount which the defendant claims is represented by her change of position to account for that interest earned. Further examples of changes of position are considered in the following sections.

Change of position in relation to mistaken and to windfall payments

Since the decision of the House of Lords in Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale,²⁶⁷ there have been a slew of cases on change of position. In Scottish Equitable v Derby,²⁶⁸ a pensioner received a payment of about £172,400 from a pension fund by mistake. The issue arose as to whether or not the pension fund could recover the mistaken payment from the pensioner. The pensioner sought to defend the pension fund's claim to recover the mistaken payment on the basis that he had changed his position in reliance upon receipt of the money. The pensioner had not taken any steps nor refrained from any action on receipt of the windfall from the pension fund, except for an expenditure of about £9,600 on his family's home. The pensioner contended, however, that to repay the money to the pension fund at a time when he was separating from his wife would cause him great financial hardship. In effect he was arguing that it would have been unfair for him to have repaid the money because he had come to consider that money as belonging to him since his receipt of it. The precise change of position which he hastily alleged was the disappointment this would cause him and his wife who were dividing their property on divorce on the basis that he owned this large windfall. However, it was held in the High Court that because his hardship was not causally linked to the mistaken payment to him (the hardship having resulted from his separation from his wife, whereas the payment was caused by an unrelated administrative error), the pensioner was not entitled to rely on the defence of change of position, except in relation to the £9,600 which he had spent in reliance on his receipt of the money.²⁶⁹ The Court of Appeal held that the sums claimed by the claimant were so large that they bore no relation to the detriment which the defendant pensioner was claiming he had suffered by way of a change of position.²⁷⁰ Therefore, the pensioner was not entitled to retain the full £172,400, but he could retain the £9,600 which he had spent in good faith. The Court of Appeal also considered the question of estoppel by representation, which is discussed below.

Similar issues arose in Philip Collins Ltd v Davis,²⁷¹ where overpayments were made to one of Phil Collins's backing musicians by mistake. The musician sought to retain that money simply on the basis that he thought he was due it, even though his contract provided expressly to the contrary. The employer proposed to recover the money by withholding it from future royalties which would otherwise have been paid to the musician. The musician contended that he had changed his day-to-day lifestyle in reliance on the receipt of the money. It was held that the musician bore the burden of proving that the defence applied to him. On these facts, he was entitled to resist recovery of half of the overpayments, in that he had changed his lifestyle in reliance on having received them. He was entitled to a defence in relation to half of the overpayments because the court considered that in all of the

267 [1991] 2 AC 548.

268 [2000] 3 All ER 793.

269 Ibid.

270 [2001] 3 All ER 818.

271 [2000] 3 All ER 808.

circumstances, that was an appropriate proportion to which he should be entitled: it was no more sophisticated an analysis than that. Alternatively, it might be suggested that this is a thin premise on which to deny the claimant recovery of money which had been paid mistakenly, to which the defendant had no entitlement, and to which one might have expected the defendant to realise she had no entitlement.²⁷²

It is not sufficient for the claimant to argue that her expectations in receiving the windfall would be disappointed by return of the money to the payer (in that she would have less money than she had otherwise thought); rather, there must be some change in position linked to the receipt of that money in circumstances in which it could not be alleged by the defendant that she had any good reason to assume that the money was rightfully hers.²⁷³ Therefore, where a payment is made mistakenly without any representation that the defendant was entitled to that money to which she would not otherwise be entitled, and where the sum of money was so large that the defendant ought reasonably to have realised that there had been a mistake, then there should be no defence of change of position.²⁷⁴ What is required is that the transfer of the property which is being traced should be referable in some way to the change of position.²⁷⁵

Change of position as an equitable defence concerned to effect justice

Whereas we have considered the defence of change of position to be primarily a restitutionary defence up to now, it has emerged in more recent cases that it can be understood as being based on a combination of restitution and general equitable principles. Indeed, in Lord Goff's original speech in Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale, there were clear references to an understanding of the comparative inequity of requiring that the defendant accede to the claimant's tracing claim.²⁷⁶ The general principle on which the Court of Appeal in Niru Battery Manufacturing Co v Milestone Trading Ltd has recognised the operation of the defence of change of position is by reference to:

the essential question . . . whether on the facts of a particular case it would in all the circumstances be inequitable or unconscionable, and thus unjust, to allow the recipient of money paid under a mistake of fact to deny restitution to the payer.²⁷⁷

272 Indeed, this final element – as to the conscionability or reasonableness (where those two terms are taken to be broadly similar in this sense) of the defendant failing to notice that she has received an overpayment – might be considered an important element of this defence in the future. Such an approach would recognise the importance of proof of a link between the conscionability of the change of position, or the hardship that the claimant would suffer, and the receipt of the money. See, for example, Lloyds Bank v Independent Insurance [1999] 2 WLR 986; Home Office v Ayres [1992] ICR 175.

273 What is not addressed in Derby is what would have happened if the pensioner had separated from his wife because he had received this money and could therefore support himself with the money received.

274 State Bank of New South Wales v Swiss Bank Corporation (1995) 39 NSWLR 350: a case in which a bank received a very large electronic payment transfer from another bank without any clear instruction as to which account or customer that amount was to have been credited – it was held that, while not dishonest, the recipient bank could not credibly claim that it was entitled to rely on the receipt of so large an amount without any identified payee, so as to have changed its position. See also Philip Collins Ltd v Davis [2000] 3 All ER 808.

275 Philip Collins Ltd v Davis [2000] 3 All ER 808 at p 827f, per Jonathan Parker J.

276 [1991] 2 AC 548 at 580.

277 Niru Battery Manufacturing Co and Another v Milestone Trading Ltd and Others [2003] EWCA Civ 1446, para 162, per Clarke LJ.

Alternatively, Sedley LJ has expressed the same process in terms that:

courts . . . are not tied to a single rigid standard in deciding whether a defence of change of position succeeds. They are to decide whether it is equitable to uphold the defence. Since the doctrine of restitution is centrally concerned with the distribution of loss among parties whose rights are not met by some stronger doctrine of law, one is by definition looking for the least unjust solution to a residual problem.²⁷⁸

What is clear from these dicta is that the defence of change of position is capable of being understood on the basis of equitable notions of fairness.²⁷⁹ References to ‘the doctrine of restitution’ notwithstanding, there is no explanation of these principles by reference to unjust enrichment on this model. Similarly, in Dextra Bank and Trust Co v Bank of Jamaica, the keynote of the defence of change of position has become its transformation into a general, equitable form of defence which is:

founded on a principle of justice designed to protect the defendant from a claim to restitution in respect of a benefit received by him in circumstances in which it would be inequitable to pursue that claim, or to pursue it in full.²⁸⁰

Thus, restitution – in a general conception of recovery or return of property – has become equated with general notions of equity and as such need not be based on restitution of unjust enrichment.²⁸¹

Whether incurring future liabilities can amount to a change of position

Thus far, our focus has been on a defendant who has changed her position after receipt of the traced property but before the action comes to court. What has not been considered so far is the position of a defendant who has changed her position by committing herself to legal liabilities which will take effect only in the future. Suppose, for example, that, in reliance on the receipt of a valuable piece of machinery which was previously held on trust, the defendant entered into a contract to supply electronic components to be made with that machinery. In this example, the defendant would claim to have changed her position on the basis that she will, in the future, be liable to perform the contract and so her position will be changed. The authorities are in conflict as to whether or not such future changes of position are sufficient to found the defence.²⁸²

The principal authority suggesting that the change of position cannot take effect in the future is the decision of Clarke J in South Tyneside Metropolitan BC v Svenska International 278 Ibid, para 192, per Sedley LJ.

279 The same use of words has been applied in Credit Suisse (Monaco) SA v Attar [2004] EWHC 374 (Comm), para [98], per Gross J.

280 Dextra Bank and Trust Co v Bank of Jamaica [2002] 1 All ER (Comm) 193, para 38.

281 That is, the thesis advanced by Professor Smith in The Law of Tracing (Smith, 1997) that tracing is always concerned to effect restitution of unjust enrichment is not the sole basis – if indeed it need be any of the bases – on which equitable tracing is awarded.

282 It could be argued, I acknowledge, that a present contractual obligation to perform some act in the future could be considered to be a present liability, albeit that it falls only to be performed in the future.

*plc.*²⁸³ It was held by Clarke J that the change of position must have taken place after receipt of the property. In this latter case, the bank had entered into hedging transactions in anticipation of amounts which it would receive from the local authority under an interest rate swap contract which was subsequently held to have been void ab initio. It was held that the bank could not claim that its hedging policy – involving the creation of financial instruments with third parties, the effect of which was expected to cancel out the effect of any loss suffered under the swap contract with the local authority – could not found a defence of change of position because those hedging contracts were created before its obligation to effect restitution of payments arose. This decision was considered to have been reached on ‘exceptional’ circumstances by the Privy Council in Dextra Bank and Trust Co v Bank of Jamaica.²⁸⁴

A future liability has also been held not to amount to a factor sufficient to found the defence of change of position in Pearce v Lloyds Bank.²⁸⁵ In that case, the defendant’s bank had set-off amounts in the defendant’s bank account against forged payment instructions which it had received from third parties out of that same account. The defendant contended that the bank ought not to have been entitled to set off those amounts because the defendant would have been liable to pay VAT on the payments which had passed in and out of that account. At the time, however, these future liabilities to VAT had not been discharged. It was held that such future liabilities could not found a defence of change of position.

There are two principal authorities suggesting that a future liability can amount to a change of position. In Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale,²⁸⁶ it was accepted without much discussion that such future liabilities would found the defence of change of position. It was in *Dextra Bank and Trust Co v Bank of Jamaica*²⁸⁷ that the position was given closer consideration. In that case, the Privy Council was prepared to hold that incurring a future liability would constitute a change of position. Dextra had been approached by W who induced it to lend US$3 million to the Bank of Jamaica secured by a note issued by the Bank of Jamaica, although W had no authority to execute this transaction. W in turn convinced the Bank of Jamaica that the money was to be used in a foreign exchange transaction to acquire its equivalent in Jamaican dollars. This was a fraudulent conspiracy. The Bank of Jamaica paid out the equivalent of US$3 million in Jamaican dollars to the conspirators, all the while believing that it was making payment to Dextra. The argument was raised, inter alia, that the Bank of Jamaica could have relied on the defence of change of position to Dextra’s action in restitution. During the transaction, the Bank of Jamaica had paid Jamaican dollars before Dextra’s cheque had cleared into the Bank of Jamaica’s accounts and therefore the change of position was in relation to a future payment at that stage. The Privy Council was of the opinion that there was no objection to such a claim. They preferred to permit the defence to be broadly understood, on the following terms:²⁸⁸

It is surely no abuse of language to say, in the second case as in the first, that the defendant has incurred expenditure in reliance on the plaintiff’s payment or, as it is

283 [1995] 1 All ER 545.

284 Dextra Bank and Trust Co v Bank of Jamaica [2002] 1 All ER (Comm) 193.

285 [2001] EWCA Civ 1097.

286 [1991] 2 AC 548.

287 [2002] 1 All ER (Comm) 193.

288 Ibid, para 38.

sometimes said, on the faith of the payment. It is true that, in the second case, the defendant relied on the payment being made to him in the future (as well as relying on such payment, when made, being a valid payment); but, provided that his change of position was in good faith, it should provide, pro tanto at least, a good defence because it would be inequitable to require the defendant to make restitution, or to make restitution in full. In particular it does not, in their Lordships' opinion, assist to rationalise the defence of change of position as concerned to protect the security of receipt and then to derive from that rationalisation a limitation on the defence. The defence should be regarded as founded on a principle of justice designed to protect the defendant from a claim to restitution in respect of a benefit received by him in circumstances in which it would be inequitable to pursue that claim, or to pursue it in full.

In principle, it is suggested, there is no objection to allowing a future obligation to be considered to be a change of position. In many ordinary contracts, for example, a person is legally obliged today to perform some act in the future such that that person will incur liabilities in damages or in specific performance immediately there is some refutation of the contractual obligations. Therefore, one could be said to have changed one's position by agreeing to such a future obligation in an immediately legally binding form. Therefore, it is suggested that the approach taken in Dextra Bank and Trust Company Ltd v Bank of Jamaica is to be preferred. Once a liability becomes legally enforceable, whether or not it has been discharged, the defendant can be considered to have changed her position in the sense that her balance sheet will show that she owes a liability and not that the assets necessary to discharge that liability constitute free funds.

Whether the change of position can take place before the receipt of the property

A further question is whether or not the change of position on which the defendant seeks to rely can take place before the property which is being traced has been received by the defendant. That a change of position can take place before the property is received has been accepted in Commerzbank AG v Price,²⁸⁹ in which case a merchant banker took the decision not to seek alternative employment on the basis that he would receive a severance payment from the bank which employed him at the time: it was no objection to his reliance on the defence of change of position that his alleged change of position took place before his receipt of the property. So, if Xavier enters into a contract with Yolanda on Monday whereby he promises to deliver a computer to her on Wednesday, then Xavier is under a legal liability on Monday to deliver a computer, albeit that delivery does not take effect until Wednesday: by the same token, Yolanda incurs a debt to make payment for that computer. Both parties' accounts will show a liability respectively for one computer and for payment on Monday, and therefore both parties could be said to have changed their positions on Monday and not only on Wednesday.²⁹⁰

289 [2003] EWCA Civ 1633.

290 If the contract were cancelled by both parties, then their accounts would be altered from the date of cancellation.

19.7.2 Estoppel by representation

The foregoing section considered the defence of change of position, which was explained by the Court of Appeal in Niru Battery v Milestone as being based on equitable principles. Another means of defending a tracing action is to rely upon the doctrine of estoppel by representation which is straightforwardly equitable. Estoppel by representation is a defence which is superficially similar to change of position. An estoppel by representation will be made out in circumstances in which the defendant to a tracing action can demonstrate that some representation has been made to her, that that representation was deliberately or accidentally false, that the claimant knew the representation would be acted upon, that the defendant then acts to her detriment in reliance upon the representation, and that there is no defence to the estoppel.²⁹¹ This estoppel has been recognised both at common law and in equity.²⁹² The significant difference between the two defences is that the estoppel is predicated on some representation being made by the claimant, as opposed to a balancing of the competing equities of the case as suggested by the defence of change of position.²⁹³

An example of the defence of estoppel by representation in action arose in National Westminster Bank plc v Somer International.²⁹⁴ Somer held a US dollar account with the bank into which it paid moneys received from foreign clients. Somer was expecting to receive a sum of between US$70,000 and US$78,000 from one of its clients and informed the bank of this. Subsequently, the bank received a payment of US$76,708 which was intended for another of its account holders but which it mistakenly credited to Somer's US dollar account. The bank informed Somer that the money had been paid into its dollar account and Somer assumed that it was the payment which it was expecting to receive from its own client. In reliance on the receipt of the money, Somer shipped US$13,180 worth of goods to the client from which it was expecting the payment. Subsequently, the bank sought to recover the mistaken payment. Somer argued that it was entitled to an estoppel by representation because the bank had represented to it that the money belonged to Somer, that Somer had acted to its detriment in reliance on that representation and that it was therefore entitled to retain the whole of the moneys paid to it by the bank.

Previously, the doctrine of estoppel by representation had operated only as a rule of evidence to the effect that a claimant would have been entitled to retain the whole of a mistaken payment.²⁹⁵ The Court of Appeal in National Westminster Bank plc v Somer International held that the doctrine of estoppel by representation operated on equitable principles such that it was possible to operate outwith any strict rule requiring that the defendant be entitled to retain the whole of the payment. Rather, where the court considered the retention of the whole of the payment to be unconscionable, it would be possible to limit the defendant's entitlement to rely on the estoppel only to the extent that it had suffered detriment. Therefore, on these facts, Somer could retain only an amount equal the value of the goods which it had shipped in reliance on the representation.²⁹⁶ This mooted

291 See generally the various forms of estoppel by representation applied in Jorden v Money (1854) V HLC 185; 10 ER 868 and National Westminster Bank plc v Somer [2002] QB 1286, CA.

292 Jorden v Money (1854) V HLC 185; 10 ER 868.

293 Goff and Jones, 2002, 829.

294 [2002] QB 1286, CA.

295 Avon County Council v Howlett [1983] 1 WLR 605.

296 Scottish Equitable v Derby [2001] 3 All ER 818 applied.

development is, however, at odds with earlier authority, and the flexibility of the older, purely evidential form of the estoppel by representation consequently awaits confirmation by a higher court.²⁹⁷

19.7.3 Passing on

The defence of passing on bears some similarity to the defence of change of position. Passing on requires that the defendant has passed the property on, or that some expense has been incurred such that the value of the property has effectively been passed on to some third person. The defendant will therefore claim that she does not have possession of the property, nor of its traceable proceeds, because that property has been transferred to another person without receipt of any traceable proceeds. Given that tracing is a proprietary claim, it is necessary for there to be some traceable proceeds in the hands of the defendant. Otherwise, to impose a liability on the defendant to account to the claimant with some property which was not the traceable proceed of the claimant's original property would be to impose a personal claim on the defendant rather than a proprietary claim.

The defence of passing on was raised before the Court of Appeal in Kleinwort Benson v Birmingham CC.²⁹⁸ That case concerned an interest rate swap. The bank claimed that the defence of passing on should have been available to it on the basis that the contract with the local authority (which was subsequently held to have been void ab initio) had caused the bank to incur extra expense to manage the risk of the transaction. The Court of Appeal held, however, that there was no necessary link between the contract with the local authority and the bank's decision to incur that expense by means of a hedging strategy over which the local authority had no control. Therefore, the passing on defence is available where the property has been passed on, but not where there is no link between the expenditure and the liability incurred.

19.7.4 Bona fide purchaser for value without notice

The general principle

The final problem is the perennial one of deciding between the person who has lost property to a wrongdoing fiduciary, and the person who buys that property in all innocence. Suppose the example of the painting held on trust for beneficiaries which is transferred away in breach of trust by Tim. Suppose then that the painting is purchased by Eve in good faith for its full market price. Eve will necessarily take the view that she has paid an open-market price for property in circumstances in which she could not have known that the property ought properly to have been held on trust. By the same token, the beneficiaries would argue that it is they who ought to be entitled to recover their property from Eve.

The bona fide purchaser defence was confirmed by the House of Lords in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington. As it was held by Lord Browne-Wilkinson:

²⁹⁷ See Avon County Council v Howlett [1983] 1 WLR 605 at 622, per Slade LJ.

²⁹⁸ [1996] 4 All ER 733; Hudson, 1997:2, 27.

from the date of the establishment of the trust (i.e. receipt or mixing of the moneys by the ‘trustee’) the original payer will have an equitable proprietary interest in the moneys so long as they are traceable into whomsoever’s hands they come other than a purchaser for value of the legal interest without notice. [emphasis added]

From a strict analytical viewpoint, the property lawyer ought to find for the beneficiaries. At no time do the beneficiaries relinquish their property rights in the painting before Eve purchases it. Therefore, those rights ought to be considered as subsisting. Eve cannot acquire good title on the basis that the beneficial title still properly remains in the beneficiaries. The approach of equity, though, is to protect free markets by ensuring that the bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the rights of a beneficial owner is entitled to assert good title in property in such situations. Such a person is rightly referred to as ‘Equity’s darling’. Consequently, a good defence to a tracing claim would appear to be an assertion that you are a purchaser acting in good faith without notice of the rights of the beneficiary.²⁹⁹

Independent Trustee Services Ltd v Morris

The bona fide purchaser defence was considered by Smith J and then on appeal by the Court of Appeal in Independent Trustee Services Ltd v GP Noble and Morris.³⁰⁰ In that case an ancillary relief order had been made against a husband, Mr Morris, such that he had to pay an amount slightly in excess of £1.4 million to his former wife on their divorce. Meanwhile, Mr Morris had misappropriated money from the claimants’ pension funds and that money was used in part to meet his payment obligations to Mrs Morris under that order.³⁰¹ Mr Morris’s total misappropriation from those funds was £52 million, with £4.89 million passing to Mr Morris personally. The claimants sought to trace after those moneys, inter alia, into the funds which had been paid to Mrs Morris. Importantly, Mrs Morris had been unaware that her former husband had made misappropriations from the claimants’ pension funds to acquire his money.

Mrs Morris’s adult children had informed her that her former husband was living a life with his new partner in Australia which was beyond the means which had been disclosed in the divorce proceedings.³⁰² Consequently, Mrs Morris sought to set aside the ancillary relief order in favour of a recalculation of the amounts which should be payable. That ancillary relief order was indeed rescinded by Moylan J. When the claimants brought their tracing action against the funds which had been paid to Mrs Morris, Mrs Morris sought to argue that she was a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of their rights in the money from which the payments to her were made. Smith J³⁰³ and later the Court of Appeal held that Mrs Morris was not entitled to this defence. It was held that Mrs Morris had been a bona fide purchaser of those payments without notice of the claimant’s rights at the outset, but the rescission of the ancillary relief order was taken to have the effect of cancelling the order for 299 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669, per Lord Browne-Wilkinson.

300 [2012] EWCA Civ 195; [2012] WLR (D) 55. This case is now the subject of an appeal to the Supreme Court.

301 It took some time for those payments to be made, and there were other matrimonial proceedings necessary to secure payment, but that does not affect the analysis here.

302 Unbeknownst to her, Mr Morris’s new riches came from his criminal activities and not from an under-reporting of his income.

303 Independent Trustee Services Limited v GP Noble Trustees Ltd [2010] EWHC 1653 (Ch).

all purposes, including the provision of the status of equity's darling on Mrs Morris. Therefore, because the original ancillary relief order was cancelled, Mrs Morris lost her defence because her defence depended on the payments having been made under the ancillary relief order before that order was rescinded. Once it was rescinded, it was held that it ceased to protect Mrs Morris.

It is suggested that this approach is unfortunate. Mrs Morris was a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the claimant's rights at the time she received those payments. If the payments were to be returned to Mr Morris before different amounts were paid to Mrs Morris on a second occasion after Mrs Morris had become aware of her former husband's misdeeds in acquiring that money, then that would mean that Mrs Morris could no longer be claiming to have acted in good faith. However, if Mrs Morris kept those original payments subject to a recalculation of the amount which she was owed by her husband above those original amounts, then she would not receive them a second time, and therefore her original good faith should continue to apply.

What is problematic with this approach is that the nature of the 'purchase' is unclear. A purchase suggests the giving up of money or rights of a given value in return for an asset. The ancillary relief order is a right to receive money without any consideration involved in a payment moving in the opposite direction. Therefore, it is unclear why Mrs Morris has 'purchased' the £1.4 million. It is said by Lloyd LJ to be because the payment was made under the court order, but it is not clear why Mrs Morris is said to be giving up her rights under that order in consideration for the money she is paid; rather, the right entitles her to be paid an amount of money by Mr Morris. It is true that the value which attached to that right could be sold or mortgaged. But it seems to strain the logic of property law to say that the right is exchanged for the payment because the payment extinguishes the right to receive payment.

The more appropriate defence would appear to be change of position under which the court would conduct a balancing exercise to see whether it was more just to allow Mrs Morris to keep the money or more just to order the return of the money to the claimant beneficiaries under the pension fund. As Lloyd LJ explained the facts, there was no repayment to Mr Morris once Moylan J cancelled the ancillary relief order because the assumption was that Mr Morris would have to make a further payment to Mrs Morris. Nevertheless, his Lordship took the view (as did Patten LJ) that the cancellation of the ancillary relief cancelled any effect it could have had. What is unclear is why Mrs Morris's status as a bona fide purchaser is said to be dependent on the ancillary relief order: her status was dependent on her having purchased the payment of £1.4 million (assuming for the moment that that is what happened) and does not require the oxygen of that order to continue. History does not change so that she becomes a knowing recipient of that money simply because, ex post facto, a family court judge sets aside the order prior to identifying the larger amount which should be payable under a fresh order.

It is suggested that if Mrs Morris's rights stem from the extent of her former husband's legitimate wealth, then her receipt of money from him under a court order which is calculated by reference to his improperly acquired money would be wrong in principle. (Something which Patten LJ accepts at the very end of his judgment.) Therefore, Mrs Morris should not be entitled to an amount which she only received because her husband appeared to be wealthy due to his criminal actions. If the amounts paid to her had not come from the traceable proceeds of his looting of the pension funds, but rather from his legitimately earned wealth, then it would be appropriate to allow her to retain them; but the extent to which they were taken from the claimants' pension funds, or alternatively that they constituted an overvaluation of his legitimate wealth, should be taken to weigh the balance in favour of the claimants on the basis of the balancing test for the change of position defence that Lord Goff set out in Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale (as was considered above). In essence, Smith J and the Court of Appeal came to the right conclusion (ie that Mrs Morris should not be entitled to retain the moneys in the face of the claimants' tracing action) but by an unfortunate line of reasoning which depended on an illusory role for the court order and on an illusory purchase.

On a final note, Lloyd LJ embroils himself in a confusion around the nature of a trust in this context. His Lordship disagreed with Lord Browne-Wilkinson's observation in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington (which he was bound to follow, of course) that a person cannot be a trustee of property if and so long as they are unaware of the thing which would otherwise have affected their conscience. However, tracing actions such as that in Re Diplock do not hinge on the conscience being affected. Instead, one is entitled to vindicate one's property rights by means of equitable tracing without the defendant having acted unconscionably, with the remedy that is awarded being any one from a list of a charge, a lien, subrogation (where appropriate) or a constructive trust. It was argued in Thomas and Hudson, *The Law of Trusts*³⁰⁴ that if one needs an impact on conscience to establish a constructive trust then that must arise at the moment that the defendant is made aware at the outset of the litigation that it is holding property which ought properly to be returned to the claimant. By definition, the defendant must be holding the traceable proceeds of the trust property and therefore there will be knowledge of the breach of duty at the same time as those traceable proceeds are held by the defendant. From that moment there is certainly an impact on the conscience and a trust is therefore appropriate: therefore, Lord Browne-Wilkinson's dicta do not need to be disturbed.

19.7.5 Consensual transfer

The matter is little discussed, but if the original owner of the property either made a perfect gift of the property to the defendant, or entered into a contract to transfer the property to the defendant, the defendant ought to be recognised as having a complete defence to any tracing action. The second proposition is clearly an extension of the bona fide purchaser principle, potentially, into cases in which the contract transferring the property might not constitute a contract of sale. The former principle seems to be common sense. In the event that there has been a transfer of absolute title from the claimant to the defendant without any duress or undue influence, the common law would recognise the defendant's ownership of that property. Thus it is possible to sever a claimant's ties with her original property or its traceable proceeds where she can be taken to have agreed to transfer title in it. The only complication here is where there was an intention to transfer that property away which the claimant subsequently sought to disavow, as in National Westminster Bank v Somer,³⁰⁵ in which the claimant appeared to have an intention to transfer property at the outset but subsequently realised a mistake and so sought to reverse that transfer. This issue has been considered in para 19.6.3 above.

304 GW Thomas and AS Hudson, The Law of Trusts, 2nd edn, Oxford University Press, 2010, 33.77–33.78.

305 [2002] QB 1286, CA.

19.8 ISSUES WITH TRACING

19.8.1 Does conscience matter in relation to equitable tracing?

Equity, as we have discussed throughout this book, is concerned with good conscience. The law of tracing, however, is not always concerned with good conscience, even in relation to equitable tracing.³⁰⁶ In Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC, it was held by Lord Browne-Wilkinson that a constructive trust will be imposed whenever the defendant has knowledge of some factor which affects her conscience. Therefore, when a constructive trust is being used as a remedy in relation to a tracing action, it should be the case that that constructive trust is imposed as a response to the defendant's unconscionable behaviour. Thus, the House of Lords held (unanimously on this point) in *Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC*³⁰⁷ that there will not be an equitable proprietary right in the form of a trust without there being knowledge of some factor which affects the conscience of the legal owner of property. This is similar to the approach taken by Lord Templeman in Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid,³⁰⁸ where his Lordship held that an equitable proprietary right arises as a result of equity acting in personam against the defendant such that unconscionable dealing with property will cause the defendant to be deemed to be a constructive trustee of that property for those beneficiaries to whom fiduciary duties were owed. On the basis, then, that equity looks upon as done that which ought to have been done, the property held on trust is to be treated as having been the property of the claimant from the moment when the conscience of the defendant was affected by knowledge of an unjust factor, thus giving rise to a proprietary right in equity. On the basis of cases such as Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC and Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid, it has been argued that this approach means that a constructive trust might be imposed in situations where there has been some general unconscionability, but this leaves at large the question as to whether or not there must be some pre-existing proprietary base for the action.

Indeed, it has been argued that this approach means that a constructive trust might be imposed in relation to a tracing action without the need to establish a prior equitable interest and so forth.³⁰⁹ In Re Diplock,³¹⁰ a charity was held liable to account to the claimant beneficiaries for property which had been passed to it under a void charitable purpose clause. The charity in this case had not committed any unconscionable act, but was nevertheless liable under the equitable tracing action. Similarly, in Foskett v McKeown,³¹¹ the defendants were the children of a trustee who had committed a breach of trust, but the defendants themselves had committed no unconscionable act. Nevertheless, the defendants were held liable in relation to an equitable tracing action brought by the beneficiaries of the trust. In that case, the basis of the tracing action was explained as being to vindicate the property rights of the 306 See Gleeson, 1995.

307 [1996] AC 669, [1996] 2 All ER 961.

308 [1994] 1 AC 324, [1993] 3 WLR 1143.

309 Birks, 1996:1. However, it could be argued, to the contrary, that the unconscionable behaviour brings a proprietary base into existence at the same moment as imposing a remedy by way of constructive trust over the property at issue.

310 Diplock's Estate, Re [1948] Ch 465.

311 Foskett v McKeown [2000] 3 All ER 97.

claimant and therefore the tracing action was not predicated on any unconscionable behaviour. Consequently, we can observe that a tracing action may either relate to some unconscionable behaviour on the part of the defendant; or else it may simply be predicated on a determination in English property law to protect (or vindicate) the claimant's property rights, even if that requires tracing the original property rights into substitute property. If one were determined to argue that tracing in equity is based on conscience, then it could be said that vindicating the rights of the owner of property is a demonstration of a conscience on the part of property law itself.

19.8.2 Tracing as part of equity and property law, not restitution

There is a question as to whether tracing is concerned with subtracting an unjust enrichment from the hands of the defendant, or whether equitable tracing operates on the basis of protecting the claimant's property rights against unconscionable misuse by permitting their recovery even from complex mixtures and changes of form. The language preferred by Smith is that the claimants in tracing cases achieve restitution of that property by means of having property rights in the form of the equitable interest in that property passed back to them to be held on the terms of the original trust.³¹² This model of restitution of unjust enrichment is considered in Chapter 31.³¹³ However, there is now clear authority that tracing does not arise on the basis of restitution of unjust enrichment.³¹⁴

Prof Birks' first model of restitution of unjust enrichment³¹⁵ was concerned with the subtraction of enrichments from defendants who had acquired their enrichments at the plaintiff's expense and due to some unjust factor, such as a mistake or undue influence or some such. That the enrichment was 'unjust' meant that it arose on the basis of one of a list of factors suggested by various restitution scholars and not on the basis that it was in some general way 'unconscionable'. The appropriate remedy for the recovery of property by way of restitution was said to be a resulting trust. This theory was dismissed by the House of Lords in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington.³¹⁶ Smith applied this theory to the law on tracing.³¹⁷ His contention was that when property is recovered through any tracing action, the tracing process is undertaken further to an unjust factor having arisen so as to transfer the property away from the plaintiff and is then recovered from the defendant by means of restitution in the form, in the original version of this theory, of a resulting trust. The problem with this theory – aside from the rejection of the resulting trust remedy in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington – was that it did not accord with authority, nor was it entirely clear what its benefit would be (other than a superficial claim to have tidied up the law in some fashion). On the authorities, in cases such as Re Diplock, the claimant was entitled to recover her property by means of a tracing action on the basis that that property had belonged to the claimant and that the defendant had no legally-enforceable right to retain it. The courts had not based their decisions on the defendant having been unjustly enriched. Rather, as Lord Millett made clear in Foskett v McKeown, tracing operates as a part 312 Smith, 1997, generally.

313 See section 31.3.

314 Boscawen v Bajwa [1995] 4 All ER 769, 776; Foskett v McKeown [2001] 1 AC 102, 109 and 129.

315 See Birks, 1992.

316 [1996] AC 669.

317 See Smith, 1997.

of property law in protecting the rights of claimants to assert title to property which remains theirs at common law or which is a substitute for property taken from them in breach of trust.

The decision in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC is remarkable, in part, because it avoids the contract purportedly entered into between the parties while at the same time implicitly accepting that the transfer of property under that void contract is nevertheless valid. So it is that the bank is deemed to have transferred title in the money paid to the local authority even though the contract which purported to transfer that title was itself held to have been void. The alternative view of this context would be that a mistake as to the validity of the contract³¹⁸ (or other vitiating factor)³¹⁹ would lead to the contract being rescinded at the claimant's election, and thus give rise to a right to trace after that money.³²⁰ Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC held that there is no such right to trace where the intention of the parties was to transfer outright the title in the property³²¹ and where the money or its traceable proceeds had been dissipated.³²²

19.8.3 Tracing into stolen property

One particular context in which tracing becomes important, other than the straightforward breaches of fiduciary duty considered above, is when property is stolen. This issue was considered at para 2.6.3. Clearly, no system of law will permit a thief to obtain any proprietary rights in the proceeds of the crime. The question is the manner in which the thief is required to deal with the property after the theft, and whether or not the thief ought to be required to hold the stolen property on trust for the victim of the theft as the result of a tracing claim. It has been held that where property is stolen from a pension fund, the thief holds the stolen property on constructive trust for victims of the theft; therefore it is possible to trace into that stolen property and to establish title over it.³²³ Similarly, it was held in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC that by analogy with a hypothetical stolen bag of coins, the thief should hold that stolen property on constructive trust for the victim of the crime.³²⁴ Therefore, equitable tracing is available to the victim of crime because the thief holds the stolen property on constructive trust, with the result that the victim has an equitable interest in the property.

In Chapter 12, the Privy Council decision in Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid is considered.³²⁵ In that case, the Attorney-General for Hong Kong accepted bribes in return for which he did not prosecute particular criminals. The receipt of those bribes was in itself a criminal offence. It was held by Lord Templeman that from the moment of receipt of the bribes, the defendant held that property on constructive trust for his employers. The consequence of that immediate imposition of a constructive trust was that the defendant also held 318 Now a valid ground for avoidance of a contract: Kleinwort Benson v Lincoln City Council [1998] 4 All ER 513.

319 Such as misrepresentation or undue influence: Martin, 1997, 666.

320 Daly v Sydney Stock Exchange (1986) 160 CLR 371; Lonrho plc v Al Fayed (No 2) [1992] 1 WLR 1; El Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings [1993] 3 All ER 717; Halifax Building Society v Thomas [1996] Ch 217.

321 Although, necessarily, that intention would not have been present but for the mistake which the parties had made as to the validity of the contract.

322 See also Re Goldcorp [1995] 1 AC 74.

323 Bishopsgate v Maxwell [1993] Ch 1, 70.

324 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

325 Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324, [1993] 3 WLR 1143.

on constructive trust any profits made from those bribes, or any property acquired with the money representing the bribes. Consequently, a thief (or other criminal obtaining pecuniary advantage from a crime) will hold the stolen property and its traceable substitute on constructive trust for the original owner of the property.

The result of this decision is akin to Lord Browne-Wilkinson's dicta in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC that a constructive trust will be imposed on a person whose conscience is affected by knowledge of a factor which is considered to have affected it. Thus, a thief knows of the unconscionability of stealing property and therefore will be subject to a constructive trust in respect of that property from the moment of the theft. Lord Templeman rendered this principle in a slightly different way in Reid. His Lordship held that equity acts in personam (as considered in Chapter 1) and also 'looks upon as done that which ought to have been done'. Therefore, the imposition of the constructive trust in Reid operates as a 'personal claim'³²⁶ against the defendant, which requires that the defendant is not entitled to deal with the property other than to hold it on trust for the claimant.

The other means of conceiving of the law in this area is that the victim of the crime is the only person who could release her rights in the property which was stolen. Therefore, those rights must be considered to have continued in existence, despite the theft. Consequently, the courts should not be concerned to grant new property rights to the claimant under constructive trust, but rather should simply be recognising that those rights have always continued in existence such that the claimant ought to be entitled to a declaration that those rights have continued to exist. The slight conceptual problem with the imposition of a constructive trust on the thief is the apparent recognition that the thief acquired legal title in the stolen property when she acts as trustee of the constructive trust. Indeed, the further problem with Reid is that the employer had no pre-existing rights in either the stolen property or its proceeds, and therefore arguably ought only to receive a right in personam against the defendant in the manner which Lord Templeman explained it. In both of these situations, equity appears to be acting in a way which punishes the criminal, in effect, and which grants the victim of crime a right to trace her stolen property in equity by granting her an equitable interest in the property by means of the constructive trusts device.³²⁷

326 In the sense discussed in para 1.14.12, that equity is concerned with the conscience of the defendant in general terms and not simply that the defendant is not necessarily subject to a proprietary claim.

327 Without the grant of a constructive trust, the victim would be considered to have held only an absolute title in the property such that there was no distinct equitable interest capable of founding equitable tracing: Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

The liability of strangers to account for involvement in a breach of trust

20.1	INTRODUCTION	955
20.1.1	The liability of strangers to the trust in relation to a breach of trust 955
20.1.2	Understanding the basis of each claim 955
20.2	DISHONEST ASSISTANCE	961
20.2.1	Introduction 961
20.2.2	A summary of the cases on the test for dishonesty 964
20.2.3	The nature of dishonest assistance 965
20.2.4	The objective test for ‘dishonesty’ 968
20.2.5	Introducing a modicum of subjectivity to the test of ‘dishonesty’ 974
20.2.6	The difficulty for judges at first instance in the light of the current state of the authorities 990
20.2.7	Dishonesty, the provision of professional services and negligence 999
20.2.8	Investment, risk-taking and dishonesty 1002
20.2.9	The nature of the remedy 1004
20.3	UNCONSCIONABLE RECEIPT	1006
20.3.1	Introduction 1006
20.3.2	The nature of ‘receipt’ 1007
20.3.3	The nature of ‘unconscionability’ in unconscionable receipt 1009
20.3.4	The nature of ‘knowledge’ 1012
20.3.5	The acid test for knowledge – ‘should you have been suspicious?’ 1014
20.3.6	Dishonesty in unconscionable receipt 1019
20.3.7	The nature of the remedy 1023
20.4	DEFENCES	1023
20.4.1	Bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the breach of trust 1023
20.4.2	Change of position 1023
20.4.3	Release 1024
20.5	THE PARTICULAR QUESTION OF LIABILITY TO ACCOUNT IN CORPORATE CONTEXTS	1024
20.5.1	The personal liability to account of employees of companies, and the liability of that company for personal liability to account 1024

20.5.2	The personal liability to account of financial advisors and financial institutions	1026
20.5.3	An issue in relation to bank accounts	1030
20.6	THE PERSONAL REMEDY IN RE DIPLOCK	1030
20.7	QUESTIONS AS TO THE NATURE OF THE LIABILITY OF STRANGERS	1031
20.7.1	A question as to the extent of the remedy of personal liability to account	1031
20.7.2	The distinction between the receipt-based and the assistance-based claim	1033

OVERVIEW

Where a person dishonestly assists in a breach of trust, that dishonest assistant will be personally liable to account to the beneficiaries of that trust for the value lost to the trust. The test for dishonesty is an objective test (although there is authority suggesting a modicum of subjectivity too) which requires that the court consider what an honest person would have done in the circumstances, albeit seen through the lens of the personal characteristics and knowledge of the defendant.¹ ‘Dishonesty’ in this context encompasses fraud, lack of probity and reckless risk-taking. The liability is predicated on an equitable wrong and imposes a personal liability to account to the beneficiaries as though a constructive trustee.² It is not necessary that any trustee of the trust is dishonest; simply that the dishonest assistant is dishonest.³ The claim for dishonest assistance is one which has provoked great controversy among academic commentators and has spawned two Privy Council and two House of Lords decisions, seven decisions of the Court of Appeal including dishonest assistance claims, and dozens of decisions in the High Court in recent years. The principal issue is as to the nature of the test for dishonesty and the precise level of subjectivity which can be admitted to an avowedly objective test.

A person who is neither a trustee nor a beneficiary will be personally liable to account to the trust for any loss suffered in a situation in which she receives trust property unconscionably with knowledge that the property has been passed to her in breach of trust.⁴ ‘Knowledge’ in this context includes actual knowledge, wilfully closing one’s eyes to the breach of trust, or failing to make the inquiries which a reasonable person would have made.⁵ Recent cases have recast this test of knowledge so that it is based on whether or not the defendant had acted unconscionably in receiving the trust property.⁶ Another (short) line of authority had predicated this test on dishonesty.

1 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378; Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [2002] 3 WLR 1913, [2003] 1 All ER 97.

2 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378.

3 Ibid.

4 Re Montagu [1987] Ch 264; Agip v Jackson [1990] Ch 265, 286, per Millett J; [1991] Ch 547, CA; Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale [1991] 2 AC 548; El Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings [1993] 3 All ER 717, appealed [1994] 2 All ER 685.

5 Re Montagu [1987] Ch 264.

6 BCCI v Akindale [2001] Ch 437; Charter plc v City Index Ltd [2008] 2 WLR 950.

20.1 INTRODUCTION

20.1.1 The liability of strangers to the trust in relation to a breach of trust

This chapter considers the circumstances in which people who are neither trustees nor fiduciaries will be liable for any loss suffered by beneficiaries as a result of some breach of trust.⁷ The status of the trustee and the fiduciary is easily comprehensible. The rule that a fiduciary cannot profit from that office and that trustees will be liable for any loss caused by a breach of trust are well-established in equity.⁸ The more difficult question is: in what circumstances will a person who is neither a trustee nor a beneficiary under a trust be held liable in respect of any loss caused by a breach of that trust? Such a person is referred to in the following sections as a ‘stranger’ to the trust,⁹ having no express position connected to that trust. Equity has always sought to impose fiduciary duties on those who misuse trust property, whether holding an office under that trust or not. This has extended to the imposition of the duties of a trustee onto people who meddle with the trust fund. One of the practical reasons for pursuing this remedy is that the intermeddler is frequently an advisor or a professional who is solvent and therefore capable of making good the money lost to the trust if the trust property itself is lost and if the trustees have no money to make good the loss to the trust in an action for breach of trust.

20.1.2 Understanding the basis of each claim

The receipt claim and the assistance claim

The two sets of applicable principles can be summarised in the following terms. First, a person who is neither a trustee nor a beneficiary will be personally liable to account to the trust for any loss suffered in a situation in which she dishonestly assists the commission of a breach of trust, without receiving any proprietary right in that trust property herself.¹⁰ This liability is referred to as ‘dishonest assistance’. The test for ‘dishonesty’ in this context is a test which asks whether or not the defendant acted as an honest person would have acted in the circumstances.¹¹ This notion of dishonesty extends beyond straightforward deceit and fraud potentially into reckless risk-taking with trust property.¹²

Secondly, a person who is neither a trustee nor a beneficiary will be personally liable to account to the trust for any loss suffered in a situation in which she receives trust property with knowledge that the property has been passed to her in breach of trust.¹³ This form of liability is referred to as ‘knowing receipt’ (or, unconscionable receipt now). ‘Knowledge’ in this context includes actual knowledge, wilfully closing one’s eyes to the breach of trust, or 7 This category of claim was considered in outline in section 12.9 above. Readers should also have reference, when indicated in this chapter, to section 12.8 above in relation to the liability of trustees de son tort.

8 See sections 12.5 and 18.1 respectively.

9 The expression ‘strangers’ is used by Lord Selborne in Barnes v Addy (1874) 9 Ch App 244, at 251.

10 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378.

11 Ibid.

12 Ibid.

13 Re Montagu’s Settlements [1987] Ch 264.

failing to make the inquiries which a reasonable person would have made in these circumstances.¹⁴ Recent cases have suggested that liability for receipt of property in breach of trust should be based on proof that the defendant has acted unconscionably¹⁵ which, it is suggested, would include having knowledge that there had been a breach of trust.

In either case, there must have been loss suffered by the beneficiaries as a result of some breach of trust: the liability of the strangers is then to account to the beneficiaries for that loss, providing that the knowing receipt or dishonest assistance has been demonstrated.¹⁶ Therefore, there must have been a breach of trust before either of these claims could arise. The remedy which is sought is a remedy which will make the defendant liable to account to the beneficiaries as though they had been trustees;¹⁷ that is, the defendants are construed by the court (hence the term ‘constructive trustees’) to have rendered themselves liable to account to the beneficiaries in the same way that trustees would be liable by virtue of their participation in the breach of trust. Therefore, their obligation is to account to the beneficiaries personally (that is, from their own, personal funds) for the full loss suffered by the beneficiaries in the same way that express trustees would have to account to the beneficiaries under the *Target Holdings v Redferns*¹⁸ principle.

These two types of claim should be understood as being related to constructive trusts because the courts have clearly described the liability here as being a form of constructive trusteeship.¹⁹ Equally importantly, however, it is accepted that the defendants do not hold any property on trust. This form of claim is brought in situations in which the claimant is not able to identify the original property nor its traceable proceeds, and where she is unable to recover the whole of the value lost to the trust fund from the trustees alone. In such situations, the claimant will be seeking someone else who can be made liable for the loss to the trust fund, and so will sue people who have either received the trust property during the breach of trust or assisted in the breach of trust without receiving the property, as is considered in the next section.

How dishonest assistance and knowing receipt combine with other claims relating to breach of trust

Claims for dishonest assistance and knowing receipt should be understood as combining with the claims brought against trustees for breach of trust (considered in Chapter 18) and to trace the substitute for the original property taken in breach of trust (considered in Chapter 19). For example, suppose that Tim held a pristine, extremely valuable first edition of Charles Dickens’s novel Oliver Twist on trust. If Tim were to transfer that book away in breach of trust, then he would be personally liable as a trustee for breach of trust. As discussed in Chapter 18, a trustee (Tim) would be liable to restore the Oliver Twist first edition to the

14 Ibid.

15 BCCI v Akindele [2001] Ch 437; Charter plc v City Index Ltd [2008] 2 WLR 950.

16 See Thomas and Hudson, 2004, para 30.19 et seq. Also on the older position in relation to the liability of strangers, see Harpum, 1986.

17 Ibid.

18 [1996] 1 AC 421; see section 18.1 above.

19 See, eg, Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [2002] 3 WLR 1913, [2003] 1 All ER 97.

trust fund, or to restore the cash value of the novel to the trust fund, or to pay equitable compensation to the beneficiaries.²⁰ The beneficiaries would be required to proceed against Tim, as trustee, in the first place.²¹

Given that a first edition of Oliver Twist is particularly valuable, it might be that Tim would not be able to compensate the beneficiaries in cash simply because he might not have enough money to do so. Therefore, the beneficiaries would need to find someone else who would be able to make good their loss. Suppose then that Julia, a book dealer, organised the sale of the book to a client overseas for Tim. Julia would then face personal liability for dishonest assistance in a breach of trust: that is, the liability of one who assisted the breach of trust.²² If Julia organised the sale of the book, she would clearly have assisted the breach of trust. To use language familiar to criminal lawyers, purely by way of illustration: Julia will have committed the actus reus necessary for this form of liability. As will emerge from the discussion below, it will be necessary to demonstrate that Julia acted dishonestly when assisting the breach of trust.²³ Therefore, to use criminal law jargon again, it will be necessary to demonstrate that Julia has the appropriate mens rea of ‘dishonesty’ to be liable.²⁴ The test of ‘dishonesty’ which equity uses has extended beyond the ordinary meaning of the word ‘dishonesty’. The precise nature of Julia’s liability would be to make good all of the loss suffered by the beneficiaries as though Julia had been a trustee.²⁵

Further, suppose that Kramer owns a book depository in which valuable, antique books are stored in airtight conditions and in which they can be displayed for purchasers. If Kramer received the book and stored it prior to selling it on Tim’s behalf, then Kramer might face liability for knowing receipt of that book in breach of trust: that is, a potential liability based on the receipt of the book when it comes into his possession. It would be necessary that two things took place: an actus reus of receipt of the book and also a mens rea of knowledge that Kramer had received the book in breach of trust. The applicable principles surrounding each of these terms are considered below. The significant factor at this stage is that the liability which Kramer faces is based on receipt of the property and not simply on assisting with the breach of trust.²⁶

20 Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421, [1995] 3 WLR 352, [1995] 3 All ER 785.

21 Ibid.

22 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378; Smith New Court v Scrimgeour Vickers [1997] AC 254; Corporacion Nacional del Cobre De Chile v Sogemin Metals [1997] 1 WLR 1396; Fortex Group Ltd v MacIntosh [1998] 3 NZLR 171; Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley [1999] Lloyd’s Rep Bank 438; Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [1999] 1 Lloyd’s Rep 415; Wolfgang Herbert Heintl v Jyske Bank [1999] Lloyd’s Rep Bank 511; Thomas v Pearce [2000] FSR 718; Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [2002] 3 WLR 1913, [2003] 1 All ER 97.

23 Ibid.

24 It should be stressed that the courts do not use this criminal law jargon, but it is hoped that these concepts will be familiar to serve by way of analogy.

25 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378; Smith New Court v Scrimgeour Vickers [1997] AC 254; Corporacion Nacional del Cobre De Chile v Sogemin Metals [1997] 1 WLR 1396; Fortex Group Ltd v MacIntosh [1998] 3 NZLR 171; Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley [1999] Lloyd’s Rep Bank 438; Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [1999] 1 Lloyd’s Rep 415; Wolfgang Herbert Heintl v Jyske Bank [1999] Lloyd’s Rep Bank 511; Thomas v Pearce [2000] FSR 718; Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [2002] 3 WLR 1913, [2003] 1 All ER 97.

26 Grupo Toras v Al-Sabah (2000) unreported, 2 November, CA.

These claims would impose on Julia and Kramer respectively personal liability to account to the beneficiaries for the value of the property passed and for any consequent loss that the beneficiaries suffer.²⁷ In either case, liability as a knowing recipient or as a dishonest assistant should be understood as imposing liability as a constructive trustee on the defendant.²⁸ So, Julia is construed to be a trustee as a result of her unconscionable act of dishonestly assisting a breach of trust such that she bears the liability to make good any loss suffered by the beneficiaries which arises from Tim's breach of trust, and Kramer will be liable to account as a constructive trustee on the basis of his receipt of the book. Significantly, in this example, Julia did not receive the book; rather, her liability is based on her wrongful act of dishonest assistance rather than on any contact with the property itself.

However, it should not be forgotten that in many cases, these claims will form part of a much larger web of claims commenced by beneficiaries. The beneficiaries may also seek to recover the book itself or the traceable proceeds of the book by way of tracing.²⁹ The first claim would be a proprietary tracing action at common law to recover the very first edition of Oliver Twist which was taken from the trust fund.³⁰ If the book had been sold, they would seek an equitable proprietary tracing action to assert title to the money received for the sale of the book.³¹ These claims were considered in Chapter 19. Frequently, all of these claims will be pursued simultaneously by the beneficiaries. As such, the issue considered in this chapter might constitute only one of a number of claims brought in relation to any one set of facts. The beneficiaries will then be able to elect between these two remedies, but not to recover their loss more than once.³² The many defendants may then sue one another for a contribution to the liability which any one of them might face in relation to the beneficiaries. Liability for personal liability to account under either of these heads will apply specifically in relation to a breach of trust or more generally in relation to any other breach of fiduciary duty, such as a breach of duty by a company director or a business partner or an agent, in exactly the same way as it applies to trustees.³³ However, for ease of reference we shall refer primarily to 'trustees', although the principles will apply in relation to any breach of fiduciary duty.

Three cases will serve to illustrate the combination of claims against trustees and strangers which might follow on from a breach of trust. The first is the decision of the House of Lords 27 What remains unclear is the extent to which the equitable remedy of account in these cases will permit the court to hold the defendant liable only to the extent that the defendant is genuinely culpable in the same way that, eg, a common law court would invoke principles of contributory negligence to reduce the defendant's liability.

28 Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [2002] 3 WLR 1913, [2003] 1 All ER 97, per Lord Nicholls, as considered below. See also Hayton, 1995:2.

29 Considered in Chapter 19.

30 Jones, FC (A Firm) v Jones [1996] 3 WLR 703.

31 Re Diplock's Estate [1948] Ch 465; Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669, HL.

32 Tang v Capacious Investments [1996] 1 AC 514.

33 See, eg, JJ Harrison (Properties) Ltd v Harrison [2002] 1 BCLC 162, 'where a director who had bought land belonging to the company, without disclosing its development potential, was held to have acquired the property as constructive trustee' as explained in Ultraframe (UK) Ltd v Fielding [2005] EWHC 1638 (Ch), [2005] All ER (D) 397, para [1481], per Lewison J.

in Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale.³⁴ In that case, a partner in a firm of solicitors frequently drew money from the firm's client account and gambled it away in the defendant's casino. When the firm of solicitors discovered that this money had been taken from accounts which the partnership held on trust for its clients, the firm had to find a means of recovering their client's loss. The partner himself owed his fellow partners a liability as a fiduciary, but he was unable personally to make good the loss to the partnership. Therefore, the firm proceeded against the casino under a range of personal and proprietary claims. Among the personal claims brought by the solicitors' firm were actions against the casino under the tort of negligence, an action for money had and received (or 'personal liability in restitution'), an action for conversion of cheques, an action for conversion of a banker's draft, and an action for knowing receipt in respect of the money taken from their client account. Among the proprietary claims were actions for common law tracing into the casino's bank accounts and for equitable tracing similarly into its bank accounts. The firm also claimed against the bank which held the firm's client account, claiming dishonest assistance, conversion of cheques, conversion of a banker's draft and breach of contract. All of these claims were pursued simultaneously as the firm of solicitors sought to prosecute every possible claim which might recover all or part of their loss.

In the House of Lords, the matter was ultimately settled, in part, on the basis of unjust enrichment on the part of the casino, with an account taken of the casino's change of position on receipt of the moneys – thus establishing the case as a landmark decision among restitution lawyers. The plaintiffs were able to establish proprietary claims with reference to those moneys which the casino had held separately from other of their moneys so as to be identifiable, but were only able to proceed for the remaining moneys under personal claims to the extent that the casino could be demonstrated to have had sufficient knowledge of the source of the partner's moneys or to have been otherwise negligent. The complex web of actions was essential to the firm's claims.

The second case which will serve as an illustration is Agip (Africa) v Jackson,³⁵ in which the defendant accountants arranged that money would be taken from the plaintiffs by means of forged payment orders payable to a series of 'dummy companies'.³⁶ The intention had been to launder the money through the dummy companies. The plaintiffs pursued a number of claims simultaneously, both personally against the accountants themselves, against their firm, against the companies and the banks which received the money, and also brought proprietary claims against any property which constituted or had been derived from the original moneys taken. This type of web of claims is typical of cases brought in these areas of law – as the claimant seeks for some person (or a sufficient number of people) able to make good its losses.³⁷ In each case, the claimants sought to recover all of their loss by whatever method against whichever defendant would be successful, and then subsequently to elect which of those claims they wish to enforce.

34 [1991] 3 WLR 10.

35 [1990] Ch 265, 286, per Millett J, [1991] Ch 547, CA.

36 'Dummy' or 'shell' companies are companies which do not conduct a trade but which are used solely to hold assets for their shareholders: they are similar to trusts in this sense.

37 What is often referred to as the 'search for the solvent defendant'.

The third illustration is Primlake Ltd v Matthews,³⁸ in which case an architect, Matthews, advised a company, Primlake, on the development of land. Primlake sold an option to acquire the development land in return for three large deposits (totalling about £3 million). Matthews procured payments to himself, in his own name and that of his wife, of about £900,000 in total by giving instructions to a person who controlled those funds to make the payments. While Lawrence Collins J was only appraised of this case at an interlocutory stage, his Lordship made it clear in his concluding passage what his conclusions on the merits of liability for constructive trust and for personal liability to account as a constructive trustee would be. Issues arose as to whether or not Matthews was a director of the payer company – something which it is not necessary for us to resolve for the purposes of this example. It is sufficient to note that Matthews was not entitled to receive the money and it was found to have been paid to him in breach of fiduciary duty. It was held by Lawrence Collins J that Matthews would be liable for dishonest assistance in the breach of fiduciary duty because he had actual knowledge of his lack of entitlement to the money and because he had organised the payments; he could also be liable for knowing receipt of those same moneys because the payments were made into his own bank accounts and because he had actual knowledge of the breach of duty; and he would also be liable to hold those payments or any property acquired with them on constructive trust because he had obtained those moneys unconscionably further to the general principle set out in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington.³⁹

The nature of the remedy of personal liability to account

The form of relief awarded in claims for dishonest assistance or knowing receipt is the imposition of a personal liability to account on the stranger as a constructive trustee.⁴⁰ In Selangor v Craddock (No 3),⁴¹ it was held by Ungood-Thomas J that this form of relief is:

nothing more than a formula for equitable relief. The court of equity says that the defendant shall be liable in equity, as though he were a trustee.

In short, this is not a trust as ordinarily understood; rather, the explanation of these two claims as imposing constructive trusteeship is, in Ungood-Thomas J's opinion, really just a means of intellectualising the way in which equity chooses to provide a remedy for the beneficiaries. Neither dishonest assistance nor knowing receipt operates as an ordinary trust because there is no specific property which is held on trust. Rather, this is an example of equity granting a personal remedy to beneficiaries. Indeed, the cases on dishonest assistance were excluded by Lord Browne-Wilkinson from many of the rules which concern express

38 [2006] EWHC 1227 (Ch).

39 It should be noted, however, that in his Lordship's conclusion there is a pell-mell finding of liability across the distinct doctrines of resulting trust, constructive trust, money had and received, dishonest assistance and knowing receipt which makes it particularly difficult to know on what precise basis any particular claim was made out.

40 Cf Elliott and Mitchell, 2004.

41 [1968] 1 WLR 1555, 1579.

trusts in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC,⁴² when his Lordship explained that:

In order to establish a trust there must be identifiable trust property. The only apparent exception to this rule is a constructive trust imposed on a person who dishonestly assists in a breach of trust who may come under fiduciary duties even if he does not receive identifiable trust property.

It does appear that this type of equitable relief is as much in the form of a remedy as an institutional trust. That means dishonest assistance (and, it is suggested, knowing receipt)⁴³ is as much a form of equitable wrong (organised around a standard of good conscience) as a breach of trust (under which identified property is held on trust for beneficiaries). Each of the two heads of liability to account to the beneficiaries is considered in turn, beginning with dishonest assistance.

20.2 DISHONEST ASSISTANCE

Where a person dishonestly assists in a breach of trust, that dishonest assistant will be personally liable to account to the beneficiaries of that trust for the value lost to the trust. The test for dishonesty is an objective test (although there is authority suggesting a modicum of subjectivity too) which requires that the court consider what an honest person would have done in the circumstances, albeit seen through the lens of the personal characteristics and knowledge of the defendant.⁴⁴ ‘Dishonesty’ in this context encompasses fraud, lack of probity and reckless risk-taking. The liability is predicated on an equitable wrong and imposes a personal liability to account to the beneficiaries as though a constructive trustee.⁴⁵ It is not necessary that any trustee of the trust is dishonest; simply that the dishonest assistant is dishonest.⁴⁶ The claim for dishonest assistance is one which has provoked great controversy among academic commentators and has spawned two Privy Council and two House of Lords decisions, seven decisions of the Court of Appeal including dishonest assistance claims, and dozens of decisions in the High Court in recent years. The principal issue is as to the nature of the test for dishonesty and the precise level of subjectivity which can be admitted to an avowedly objective test.

20.2.1 Introduction

Liability for dishonest assistance relates to ‘strangers’ to trusts: that is, someone who is not a trustee of that trust. The elements of that liability can be summed up in the following way:

42 [1996] AC 669.

43 There is a tendency to separate out these two claims on the basis that in relation to knowing receipt, there will have been specific property received by the defendant before liability will attach to her; however, the remedy is still a personal remedy and is not dependent upon there still being any property in the defendant’s hands which could be held on trust.

44 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378; Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [2002] 3 WLR 1913, [2003] 1 All ER 97.

45 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378.

46 Ibid.

A stranger will be personally liable to account as a constructive trustee to the beneficiaries of a trust for any loss caused to the trust by a breach of trust if the stranger assisted that breach of trust and if the stranger did so dishonestly.⁴⁷

The stranger is described as being a ‘constructive trustee’ because she will be made liable as if she had actually been a trustee for the loss caused by the breach of trust: in that sense she is ‘construed’ to be a trustee and hence is a ‘constructive trustee’. The liability to account to the beneficiaries is effectively the same as though the stranger had been an express trustee and required to account under Target Holdings v Redferns,⁴⁸ as discussed in Chapter 18. The stranger is ‘personally liable to account’ in that she does not hold any property on trust, and in that sense is not an ordinary, constructive trustee; rather, her liability is to compensate the beneficiaries of the trust for the loss which was caused by the breach of trust, with that compensation coming from her own personal property. Ordinarily, the stranger would account in money for the cash equivalent of the loss. Therefore, this is a personal and not a proprietary liability. This form of liability is clearly a potentially very large one because the stranger can be personally liable for the whole of the beneficiaries’ loss.⁴⁹ The concept of ‘assistance’ is considered below although there is little case law on exactly what is meant by that term. It appears that any substantive act or omission which facilitates the breach of trust will be sufficient. The difficulty in the case law has been in identifying what is meant by ‘dishonesty’. That issue will occupy the bulk of the discussion.⁵⁰

47 This summary of the test is the author’s own, although it is culled from various authorities considered in this section: Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378; Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [2002] 3 WLR 1913, [2003] 1 All ER 97; Twinsectra v Yardley [2002] 2 AC 164; Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust [2005] UKPC 37, [2006] 1 WLR 1476; Abou-Rahmah v Abacha [2006] EWCA Civ 1492; and the less celebrated decisions in Goose v Wilson Sandford & Co [1998] EWCA Civ 245; Brinks Mat v Abu-Saleh (No3) [1999] CLC 133; Brown v Bennett [1999] 1 BCLC 659; Wakelin v Read [2000] EWCA Civ 82; Woodland-Ferrari v UCL Group Retirement Benefits Scheme [2002] 3 All ER 670, [2002] EWHC 1354 (Ch D); Carr v Bower Cotton [2002] EWCA Civ 1788; Manolakaki v Constantinides [2004] EWHC 749; Ultraframe (UK) Ltd v Fielding [2005] EWHC 1638 (Ch); AG Zambia v Meer Care & Desai & Others [2007] EWHC 952 (Ch), on appeal [2008] EWCA Civ 1007; Markel International Insurance Co Ltd v Surety Guarantee Consultants Ltd [2008] EWHC 1135 (Comm); JD Wetherspoon plc v Van de Berg & Co Ltd [2009] EWHC 639 (Ch); Markel International Insurance Company Ltd v Higgins [2009] EWCA Civ 790; Aerostar Maintenance v International Ltd v Wilson [2010] EWHC 2032 (Ch); Independent Trustee Services Ltd v GP Noble Trustees Ltd [2010] EWHC 1653 (Ch); Al Khudairi v Abbey Brokers Ltd [2010] EWHC 1486 (Ch), [2010] PNLR 32; Dyson Technology Ltd v Curtis [2010] EWHC 3289 (Ch); Starglade v Nash [2010] EWCA Civ 1314; Secretary of State for Justice v Topland Group plc [2011] EWHC 983 (QB); Fiona Trust & Holding Corporation v Privalov [2010] EWHC 3199 (Comm); Law Society of England and Wales v Habitable Concepts Ltd [2010] EWHC 1449 (Ch); Law Society of England and Wales v Isaac [2010] EWHC 1670 (Ch); Apax Global Payment and Technologies Ltd v Morina [2011] All ER (D) 185 (Jun); and Agip (Africa) Ltd v Jackson [1990] Ch 265.

48 [1996] 1 AC 421.

49 In circumstances in which there are several people who may be responsible in various ways for the breach of trust, then the Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1970, as explained in Dubai Aluminium Company v Salaam [2002] 3 WLR 1913, [2003] 1 All ER 97, will allocate responsibility between them.

50 Liability for dishonest assistance differs from claims for unconscionable receipt in that there is no requirement for the imposition of liability for dishonest assistance that the stranger has had possession or control of the property at any time, whereas unconscionable receipt is based on the defendant having taken trust property into her possession. A person who is liable for dishonest assistance in a breach of trust is obliged to account to the beneficiaries for any loss suffered as a result of that breach of trust. Elliott and Mitchell, 2004.

The principles informing this area of equity were set out in the speech of Lord Selborne LC in Barnes v Addy, where his Lordship held that:

strangers are not to be made constructive trustees merely because they act as the agents of trustees in transactions within their legal powers, transactions, perhaps, of which a Court of Equity may disapprove, unless those agents receive and become chargeable with some part of the trust property, or unless they assist with knowledge in a dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the trustee.⁵¹

The decision in Barnes v Addy offers us a clear foundation for the modern law on dishonest assistance because it is a decision of the House of Lords which cites no earlier authority: the defendant's liability is based on her dishonest participation in actions which constituted a breach of trust. It is worth noting that the test as set out by Lord Selborne relates to 'knowledge' of a dishonest design on the part of the trustee: indeed, this area of law was known as 'knowing assistance' for most of the 20th century as a result. There were other cases on which the House of Lords in Barnes v Addy could have chosen to rely or to build, but they did not.⁵² It was in 1995 with the judgment of Lord Nicholls in *Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan*⁵³ that there was a movement from 'knowing assistance' towards 'dishonest assistance'. The principal effect of this change was a movement away from subjective ideas of what the defendant knew about the breach of trust towards a test based on objectivity which required the court to identify what an honest person would have done in the circumstances. This area of law has subsequently been bedevilled by a see-sawing between preferences for an objective and for a subjective approach to this area. It is suggested that the current state of the law is that the courts are predominantly following the judgment of Lord Nicholls in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan, which established an objective test, but those courts are giving weight to dicta from within that judgment which nevertheless admit some subjectivity into the process.⁵⁴

What this section will do is to trace the development of the law chronologically through the cases decided by the Privy Council, the House of Lords and the Court of Appeal (in that order), before coming to a raft of High Court decisions in which the judges at first instance have been faced with the difficult business of identifying one clear test from among all of those authorities. One of the results of the movement towards electronic law reporting of all cases which are decided in the High Court and above in this area is that there are many more cases available to us than was the case when Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan was decided. This has the result that the state of the authorities simply becomes more confusing because there are many cases reported with alternative approaches to the law than are published in the mainstream law reports. If one takes a purist's approach to the doctrine of precedent, then this is all very unsatisfactory. Therefore, this section will finish by working through a hypothetical set of facts to demonstrate how the five principal, different approaches in the cases to the test of dishonesty can lead to different results.

51 (1874) 9 Ch App 244, 251–2.

52 Fyler v Fyler (1841) 3 Beav 550, 49 ER 1031; Attorney-General v Leicester Corp (1844) 7 Beav 176, (1844) 49 ER 1031; Eaves v Hickson (1861) 30 Beav 136.

53 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 3 All ER 97, 102.

54 Ibid.

20.2.2 A summary of the cases on the test for dishonesty

This short section sets out a map through the different interpretations of ‘dishonesty’ in the context of liability for dishonest assistance. In essence, the test for dishonesty is predicated on the judgment of Lord Nicholls in the Privy Council in *Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan*⁵⁵ to the effect that the test is an objective one: such that a person is dishonest if she fails to do what an honest person would have done in those circumstances. Nevertheless, in *Twinsectra v Yardley*⁵⁶ in the House of Lords, Lord Hutton held that the test for dishonesty required not only an inquiry as to what an honest person would have done in the circumstances but also an inquiry into whether or not the defendant subjectively appreciated that what he had done would have been considered to be dishonest by honest people. The shortcoming in Lord Hutton’s version of the test was demonstrated in *Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust*⁵⁷ in the Privy Council in which the defendant sought to argue that his personal morality was such that he did not know that honest people would have thought his actions were dishonest and that his personal morality meant that, in effect, he would do whatever his clients wanted with no questions asked. The Privy Council, including Lord Nicholls and judges who had purportedly support Lord Hutton in Twinsectra, held unanimously that the test should be the objective test set out in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan. In the meantime, in Dubai Aluminium v Salaam in the House of Lords,⁵⁸ it had been held by Lord Nicholls that the appropriate test for dishonesty was the objective test in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan, although Dubai Aluminium has rarely been cited in the later cases.

Latterly, the Court of Appeal in *Abou-Rahmah v Abacha*⁵⁹ purportedly followed Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust (and thus by implication Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan). However, they did this by relying on dicta in Lord Nicholls’s judgment in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan which suggested that reference could be made to the defendant’s personal attributes. Subsequent cases⁶⁰ have continued to rely on this idea that within the objective test a court can consider the personal attributes, experience and intelligence of the defendant, provided that one does not allow the defendant’s personal beliefs to excuse an otherwise dishonest act.

The rationale behind the imposition of liability for dishonest assistance

The rationale for imposing liability on a dishonest assistant in a breach of trust is to protect the beneficiaries from the acts of strangers interfering with the trust in some way such that they assist or facilitate the breach of trust. There may, however, be several people involved in a breach of trust: the trustees, the dishonest assistants, any knowing recipients of the 55 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 3 All ER 97.

56 Twinsectra v Yardley [2002] 2 AC 164. This interpretation was accepted in Ultraframe (UK) Ltd v Fielding [2005] EWHC 1638 (Ch), [2005] All ER (D) 397.

57 Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust [2005] UKPC 37, [2006] 1 All ER 333.

58 Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [2002] 3 WLR 1913.

59 Abou-Rahmah v Abacha [2006] EWCA Civ 1492, CA.

60 AG Zambia v Meer Care & Desai & Others [2007] EWHC 952 (Ch); Markel International Insurance Co Ltd v Surety Guarantee Consultants Ltd [2008] EWHC 1135 (Comm), [2008] All ER (D) 10; Aerostar Maintenance v International Ltd v Wilson [2010] EWHC 2032 (Ch); Starglade v Nash [2010] EWCA Civ 1314 and others referred to below.

trust property, and anyone innocently or knowingly holding the traceable proceeds of trust property after the breach of trust. Liability for dishonest assistance is a secondary form of liability in that the dishonest assistant will be sued either once the trustee's liability for breach of trust has been established or if the trustee cannot be held liable for breach of trust for some reason. The liability is secondary then to the primary liability of the trustee. It should be recalled that a trustee need not be dishonest to be liable for breach of trust: rather, it is sufficient that there was a breach of trust and that it caused loss to the beneficiaries.⁶¹

The basis of liability for dishonest assistance in the old case of Barnes v Addy was that the defendant participated in or carried out a 'dishonest and fraudulent design'. Today it is sufficient that the assistant was dishonest even if the trustee was entirely unaware of the breach of trust (or if the trustee was a company). In *Dubai Aluminium v Salaam*⁶² Lord Nicholls explained this form of liability as being a form of 'equitable wrong'.⁶³ Nevertheless, what is clear from those 19th-century judgments is the fact that all of the judges use the formula of constructive trust to impose liability as though the defendant were an express trustee but not on the basis that property is actually held on trust by the dishonest assistant. That means that the courts are construing someone who is a stranger to the trust to be liable to account to the beneficiaries as though she were an express trustee: anyone who is construed to be a trustee is a constructive trustee. This might just be a 'formula for equitable relief', as Ungood-Thomas J has suggested,⁶⁴ but the reason for imposing that equitable relief at all is that the beneficiaries are entitled to expect that their trustees will be able to fulfil their fiduciary duties properly without interference from third parties:⁶⁵ this is so whether those third parties procure a breach of trust from gullible trustees, conspire with those trustees to commit a breach of trust, or otherwise assist in the breach of the trustees' obligations. The nature of the modern test emerges in the next section from the decision of the Privy Council in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan, considered next.⁶⁶

20.2.3 The nature of dishonest assistance

The requirement that there has been a breach of trust

The liability of the dishonest assistant is based on fault: the defendant is held liable both for the act of assisting in the breach of trust and also for her fault in doing so dishonestly. The loss for which the stranger must account to the beneficiaries is the loss which stems from 61 Twinsectra v Yardley [2002] 2 AC 164, 194, per Lord Millett.

62 [2002] 3 WLR 1913, [2003] 1 All ER 97.

63 At para [9]. In Dubai Aluminium v Salaam Lord Millett focused on Lord Selborne's suggestion that liability may be predicated on the defendant making herself in effect an express trustee de son tort by interfering with the running of the trust to such an extent that she is construed by the court to have become a trustee, with the result that she may be held liable for any breach of trust ([2002] 3 WLR 1913, [2003] 1 All ER 97, para 140 et seq). Lord Millett, however, is alone in taking this approach.

64 Selangor v Cradock (No 3) [1968] 1 WLR 1555, 1579. What Ungood-Thomas J meant was that the doctrine is really just a convenient mechanism for holding the dishonest assistant liable for the loss suffered by the beneficiaries. I prefer the idea, set out in the text, that it is really a form of equitable wrong which extends the notion of trusteeship to anyone who interferes with the trust sufficiently so as to contribute to the causation of a breach of trust.

65 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 3 All ER 97, 103, per Lord Nicholls.

66 [1995] 2 AC 378.

her assistance in the breach of trust.⁶⁷ Without a breach of trust, there would be no loss for which to account.⁶⁸ It is not required that the defendant knows the specifics of the breach of trust; rather, as will emerge, it will be sufficient that the defendant was dishonest and that there was a breach of trust or some other fiduciary duty.⁶⁹ It has been held that there is a requirement that the assistance must have had some link to the loss suffered by the claimant. So, in *Brown v Bennett*⁷⁰ it was held that: ‘if there is no causative effect and therefore no assistance given by the [defendant], on whom it is sought to establish the liability as a constructive trustee, for my part I cannot see that the requirements of conscience require any remedy at all.’⁷¹ Thus the defendant must have genuinely assisted the breach of trust in some way.

Time and nature of the assistance and its relation to the breach of trust

Whereas the trustees will be liable for any loss caused by their breach of trust (referred to as the ‘primary liability’), someone who assists in a breach of trust dishonestly will also be liable for that loss (referred to as a ‘secondary liability’). As considered below, the trustee need not be dishonest – thus the trustee may have been duped by the dishonest assistant into committing the breach of trust.⁷² The dishonest assistant may be a shadowy Moriarty figure⁷³ who does not come into contact with the trust property but who is in some way, as considered below, responsible for the breach of trust. Alternatively, the assistant may be a conspirator with the trustee who commits the breach of trust. Furthermore, the assistance can take place after the breach of trust; it need not be contemporaneous with it. As Lord Millett held in Twinsectra v Yardley:

The accessory’s liability for having assisted in a breach of trust is quite different [from liability for knowing receipt, considered below]. It is fault-based, not receipt-based. The defendant is not charged with having received trust moneys for his own benefit, but with having acted as an accessory to a breach of trust. The action is not restitutionary; the ⁶⁷ Derksen v Pillar [2002] All ER (D) 261, [32].

⁶⁸ So, in Cattley v Pollard [2006] EWHC 3130 (Ch) it was held that there could not be a claim for dishonest assistance brought in circumstances in which there had been no pre-existing trust or trusteeship (with, however, unfortunate references to ‘knowing assistance’). However, where a solicitor was entrusted with trust moneys by trustees, he acted as their ‘fiduciary agent’ in taking those moneys and therefore was taken to be ‘trustee of them’ (Soar v Ashwell [1893] 2 QB 390, 394, per Lord Esher MR); and so (by extension) misappropriation of those moneys could give rise to actions for breach of trust or dishonest assistance. There must be a breach of trust or a breach of some other fiduciary duty: Dyson Technology Ltd v Curtis [2010] EWHC 3289 (Ch).

⁶⁹ Agip (Africa) Ltd v Jackson [1990] Ch 265; Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust [2006] 1 WLR 1476; Abou-Rahmah v Abacha [2006] EWCA Civ 1492, per Rix LJ; Al Khudairi v Abbey Brokers Ltd [2010] EWHC 1486 (Ch), [2010] PNLR 32; Dyson Technology Ltd v Curtis [2010] EWHC 3289 (Ch).

⁷⁰ [1999] 1 BCLC 659.

⁷¹ Approved in Yugraneft v Abramovich [2008] EWHC 2613 (Comm), [2008] All ER (Comm) 299, para [390], per Clarke J.

⁷² Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378.

⁷³ Moriarty was Sherlock Holmes’s nemesis: a man who controlled the London underworld but whose guilt could never be proven.

claimant seeks compensation for wrongdoing.⁷⁴ The cause of action is concerned with attributing liability for misdirected funds. Liability is not restricted to the person whose breach of trust or fiduciary duty caused their original diversion. His liability is strict. Nor is it limited to those who assist him in the original breach. It extends to everyone who consciously assists in the continuing diversion of the money. Most of the cases have been concerned, not with assisting in the original breach, but in covering it up afterwards by helping to launder the money.⁷⁵

Thus it may be the case that the assistance takes place at some later date and yet still imposes liability.⁷⁶ The most difficult problem, however, as considered in the next section, is in establishing whether or not a person has been dishonest.

The basis of the liability on proof of the stranger's dishonesty

The leading case on, and the clearest illustration of, the test for dishonest assistance is the decision of the Privy Council in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan.⁷⁷ In that case, the appellant airline contracted an agency agreement with a travel agency, BLT. BLT was a company. Under that agreement, BLT was to sell tickets for the appellant. BLT held money received for the sale of these tickets on express trust for the appellant in a current account. BLT was therefore the trustee. BLT was contractually required to account to the appellant for these moneys within 30 days. The respondent, Mr Tan, was the managing director and principal shareholder of BLT. From time to time, amounts were paid out of the current account into deposit accounts controlled by Mr Tan. The current account was used to defray some of BLT's expenses, such as salaries, and to reduce its overdraft. This was all in breach of trust. In time, BLT went into insolvency. Therefore, the appellant sought to proceed against Mr Tan personally for 'knowingly assisting'⁷⁸ in a breach of trust. The issue between the parties was whether 'the breach of trust which is a pre-requisite to accessory liability must itself be a dishonest and fraudulent breach of trust by the trustee'. On behalf of Mr Tan it was argued 74 A restitutionary action would seek recovery of property or the subtraction of an unjust enrichment which the defendant had received – a restitutionary action, properly so called, is not concerned to compensate the defendant but rather only to 'subtract' the enrichment which was received unjustly. The enrichment need not be equal to the size of the claimant's loss.

75 [2002] 2 AC 164, 194.

76 In Al Khudairi v Abbey Brokers Ltd [2010] EWHC 1486 (Ch), [2010] PNLR 32 there were two defendants of significance. The first defendant was guilty of procuring a breach of trust and paying moneys away through bank accounts operated by the second defendant. The second defendant's position was more difficult because the second defendant was not directly involved in the commission of the breach of trust but he did make available a bank account through which those moneys were paid and therefore he was held to have assisted the breach of trust. It was held that he had had sufficient knowledge of the circumstances to mean that an honest person in his circumstances would have considered his assistance given to the first defendant to have been dishonest. Reliance was placed on dicta of Arden LJ in Abou-Rahmah v Abacha to the effect that '[i]t is sufficient if the defendant knows of the elements of the transaction which make it dishonest according to normally accepted standards of behaviour', Abou-Rahmah v Abacha [2006] EWCA Civ 1492, at [59].

77 [1995] 2 AC 378.

78 Before the decision in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan, this form of liability was referred to as 'knowing assistance' because the test at that time was a test of knowledge, not dishonesty.

that the trustee, BLT, had not been dishonest and therefore there had not been a dishonest design on the part of the company, as required by Barnes v Addy.⁷⁹

The Privy Council held that Mr Tan was personally liable to account for assisting in the breach of trust and that it was unnecessary for the trustee itself to have been dishonest.⁸⁰ Rather, it is sufficient that some accessory acted dishonestly for that accessory to be fixed with liability for dishonest assistance. The express trustee's state of mind is unimportant. The scenario posited here is that the express trustee may be honest, but the stranger who is made constructive trustee is dishonest. Where the third party is acting dishonestly, that third party will be liable to account. It is not enough to impose liability on an assistant that the fiduciary was dishonest but that the assistant was not dishonest: the assistant's liability rests on the dishonesty of the assistant.⁸¹

The decision of the Privy Council was set out in the judgment of Lord Nicholls. That judgment created a test of 'dishonesty' to replace the old test of 'knowledge'. Importantly, Lord Nicholls held that the question of whether or not the defendant was dishonest was one to be assessed by reference to what an honest, reasonable person would have done in the circumstances. The appropriateness of this purely objective test for dishonesty has been an issue in subsequent decisions, and in particular some dicta which refer to the court considering what the individual defendant knew in the circumstances. This section will be structured in the following way: first, to analyse the objective test as set out in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan; secondly, to consider the mooted requirement of subjectivity which has been introduced to it by subsequent decisions; and, thirdly, to consider how the law appears to stand now.⁸²

20.2.4 The objective test for 'dishonesty'

A note before we begin

It is remarkable what can happen to a judgment after it has been delivered and set free into the world: it can develop a life of its own in the way it is adopted and adapted by subsequent judgments. So it is with the judgment of Lord Nicholls in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan, which is discussed in detail in this section. The courts have focused their discussion of that case onto two passages within a judgment which had as its dual intention, first, to change the test from 'knowledge' to 'dishonesty' and, second, to make that test for dishonesty an objective test. Nevertheless, the courts have tended to rely on two short passages within that judgment which can be interpreted so as to introduce subjectivity into the test and as a result have begun to convert that test effectively back into a test which is in large part concerned with 79 This, it is suggested, is dubious. Ordinarily, the knowledge of the controlling mind of a company – here Mr Tan – would be attributed to the company itself: so, the company would be deemed to know everything that Tan knew: Meridian Global Funds Management Asia Ltd v Securities Commission [1995] 3 All ER 918, [1995] 2 BCLC 116; Lebon v Aqua Salt Co Ltd [2009] UKPC 2, [2009] 1 BCLC 549.

80 Applied in Statek Corp v Alford [2008] EWHC 32, Evans-Lombe J.

81 Remarkably an argument to the contrary was attempted before the court in Wrexham AFC v Crucialmove Ltd [2006] EWCA Civ 237, before it was batted away by Sir Peter Gibson and the point made in the text was re-affirmed, at para [37].

82 Twinsectra v Yardley [2002] 2 All ER 377.

knowledge. This section considers the judgment in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan before later sections consider how that principle has developed in later cases.

The objective test in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan

In describing the nature of the test for dishonesty in this context in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan, Lord Nicholls held that:

acting dishonestly, or with a lack of probity, which is synonymous, means simply not acting as an honest person would in the circumstance. This is an objective standard.⁸³

Therefore, the question which this test requires the court to ask is not what the defendant thought personally, but rather what an honest person would have done if they had been placed in the same circumstances as the defendant. If the defendant did not act in the way that an honest person would have acted in those circumstances, then the defendant is deemed to have been dishonest. The court will therefore be holding the defendant up to an objective idea of what constitutes honest behaviour. The interesting notion raised by this passage is that dishonesty can be either an active state of mind, or alternatively a passive ‘lack of probity’. The vernacular, ordinary meaning of ‘dishonesty’ would tend to involve some active deceit or lying.⁸⁴ However, dishonesty is considered more broadly by the Privy Council to involve failing to do what an honest person would do, such that passive dishonesty (such as failing to make inquiries, or to ensure that a proposed investment risk is not too great) is included within the test. This Tan test is therefore based on an objective understanding of ‘dishonesty’; whereas the claim for knowing receipt, in the judgment of Megarry VC in Re Montagu,⁸⁵ sets out a subjective test of what the defendant can be taken to have known.⁸⁶

It was found as a fact by the Brunei Court of Appeal that BLT, the travel agency company run by Mr Tan, had not acted dishonestly.⁸⁷ The Privy Council took this to mean that it was not established that Mr Tan, as BLT’s directing mind, had intended to defraud the airline. The money was held to be lost ‘in the ordinary course of a poorly run business with heavy overhead expenses’. Lord Nicholls accepted that Tan ‘hoped, maybe expected, to be able to pay the airline’:⁸⁸ therefore, he was not suggesting that Tan was necessarily acting fraudulently. The test for dishonesty will therefore bite where a business is run incompetently. It was enough that Tan had not done what an honest person would have done.

The basis of Lord Nicholls’s decision was that ‘Mr Tan had no right to employ the [trust] money in the business at all. That was the breach of trust. The company’s inability to pay the airline was the consequence of that breach of trust.’⁸⁹ Tan had actual knowledge of this breach of trust on these facts. So, Lord Nicholls found that Tan was not acting as an honest

83 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378, 386.

84 R v Ghosh [1982] 2 All ER 689, [1982] QB 1053; R v Hicks [2000] 4 All ER 833.

85 [1987] CL 264.

86 As to the nature of liability for breach of trust, see further at para 18.3.1 above.

87 Although, it is suggested that, on the facts of Tan, Mr Tan was the controlling mind in any event.

88 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378, 390.

89 Ibid.

person would have acted. He was using money in a way that was not permitted. Therefore, he was held to have been dishonest. In bringing a claim, the allegation of dishonesty must be pleaded plainly when bringing proceedings.⁹⁰

The two possible readings of the test in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan

The case law which has followed Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan is among the most interesting in modern equity. It cuts to the very heart of the purpose of equity in reaching judgment in relation to individual defendants. Interestingly, as is considered below, Lord Nicholls was very clear that the new test of dishonesty should not be allowed to collapse into a general test of unconscionability (which, ironically, is exactly what has happened to the doctrine of knowing receipt, which is considered in the second half of this chapter). Instead, Lord Nicholls's judgment requires close analysis. What is clear is that his Lordship intended the test for dishonesty to be an objective test, but importantly there are two points in his otherwise very clear and concise judgment in which his Lordship muddied the purity of the objective test which he otherwise appeared to be advocating. The most quoted passage from the judgment of Lord Nicholls in later cases is the following:

Before considering this issue further it will be helpful to define the terms being used by looking more closely at what dishonesty means in this context. Whatever may be the position in some criminal or other contexts (see, for instance, *Reg v Ghosh*⁹¹), in the context of the accessory liability principle acting dishonestly, or with a lack of probity, which is synonymous, means simply not acting as an honest person would in the circumstances. This is an objective standard. At first sight this may seem surprising. Honesty has a connotation of subjectivity, as distinct from the objectivity of negligence. Honesty, indeed, does have a strong subjective element in that it is a description of a type of conduct assessed in the light of what a person actually knew at the time, as distinct from what a reasonable person would have known or appreciated. Further, honesty and its counterpart dishonesty are mostly concerned with advertent conduct, not inadvertent conduct. Carelessness is not dishonesty. Thus for the most part dishonesty is to be equated with conscious impropriety. However, these subjective characteristics of honesty do not mean that individuals are free to set their own standards of honesty in particular circumstances. The standard of what constitutes honest conduct is not subjective. Honesty is not an optional scale, with higher or lower values according to the moral standards of each individual. If a person knowingly appropriates another's property, he will not escape a finding of dishonesty simply because he sees nothing wrong in such behaviour.

In most situations there is little difficulty in identifying how an honest person would behave. Honest people do not intentionally deceive others to their detriment. Honest people do not knowingly take others' property. Unless there is a very good and compelling reason, an honest person does not participate in a transaction if he knows it involves a misapplication of trust assets to the detriment of the beneficiaries. Nor does an honest person in such a case deliberately close his eyes and ears, or deliberately not ask questions, lest he learn something he would rather not know, and then proceed regardless. However, in the situations now under consideration the position is not always so straightforward. This can best be illustrated by considering one particular area: the taking of risks.⁹²

⁹⁰ Taylor v Midland Bank Trust Co [2002] WTLR 95.

⁹¹ [1982] QB 1053.

Then in that discussion of risk which follows soon after this first passage, Lord Nicholls held that:

when called upon to decide whether a person was acting honestly, a court will look at all the circumstances known to the third party at the time. The court will also have regard to personal attributes of the third party such as his experience and intelligence, and the reason why he acted as he did.⁹³

In essence there are two contradictory trends in these passages: on the one hand, the court is simply to look at what an objective, honest person would have done in the circumstances of the case and ask whether or not the defendant did that, but without any reference to the defendant's own belief system; on the other hand, the court is entitled to look at the defendant's personal attributes (thus including subjective factors relating to the defendant) while assessing what an honest person would have done in this circumstance. The latter approach is not a purely objective test, whereas the former test is. Therefore, one's reading of this passage depends entirely upon whether one reads it as a whole and notices the repeated emphasis throughout the judgment (and not just in these passages) that the test is an objective test to be measured by an objective standard, or whether one teases out the two references (one in the long passage and one in the shorter passage) to subjective factors and uses them to justify returning to a test which involves some subjectivity and an assessment of the defendant's knowledge alongside an assessment of what an honest person would have done. Let us consider that in a little more detail.

In the first passage, Lord Nicholls could be understood as doing the following: acknowledging that ordinarily people would expect that the concept of dishonesty would involve subjective factors but making it very plain that in his version of the concept of dishonesty there should be no subjective factors at all. Let us call this the 'pure objective' reading. This pure objective approach would rely on the words 'acting dishonestly, or with a lack of probity, which is synonymous, means simply not acting as an honest person would in the circumstances' and 'these subjective characteristics of honesty do not mean that individuals are free to set their own standards of honesty in particular circumstances. The standard of what constitutes honest conduct is not subjective'. In particular this reading of the test for dishonesty could be encapsulated in a finding that the defendant was 'not acting as an honest person would in the circumstances', without worrying about what the defendant

92 [1995] 2 AC 375, 389.

93 Ibid., 391B.

personally thought.⁹⁴ An objective test requires that the judge decides what an honest person would have done in the circumstances; or perhaps if there is a formal regulatory code in existence the judge should ask whether the defendant complied with it because such a regulatory code could be taken as a statement of what a regulated person should have done in the circumstances.⁹⁵

There is, however, another possible reading of that first passage whereby Lord Nicholls could be understood as doing the following: identifying that honesty is always a subjective concept at root but that the defendant may not excuse behaviour which honest people would consider to be dishonest by reference to her own personal beliefs. Let us call this the ‘primarily subjective’ reading. It is only ‘primarily subjective’ in that Lord Nicholls clearly acknowledges that objective standards can override subjective beliefs. This reading is bolstered by the words ‘for the most part dishonesty is to be equated with conscious impropriety’ (that is, intentional dishonesty) and in particular by the idea in the second passage that ‘the court will also have regard to personal attributes of the third party such as his experience and intelligence, and the reason why he acted as he did’. The idea in the second passage has found particular favour with the High Court⁹⁶ and with the Court of Appeal⁹⁷ in recent cases.

I must admit to some personal difficulty with this primarily subjective reading of the first passage.⁹⁸ If Lord Nicholls had intended us to take the view from the first passage that his Lordship intended dishonesty to have a subjective connotation in the application of the test to factual circumstances, then why would he have held that ‘this is an objective standard’ before discussing subjectivity, and why would he have concluded those six sentences ruminating on the fact that this objective approach may seem ‘surprising’ by saying ‘however’ (indicating a switch in the argument away from support for subjectivity), individuals may not set their own standards, the standard of honest conduct is not subjective, and honesty is not an optional scale. In the first passage, I would suggest, Lord Nicholls was acknowledging that instinctively one might think of dishonesty as involving subjectivity but that that was not his Lordship’s intention in this instance. Nevertheless, this passage has been taken, for example by Arden LJ,⁹⁹ to suggest a slightly subjective slant to the otherwise objective test.

94 The proof of how strictly objectivity can be interpreted is perhaps demonstrated by Markel International Insurance Company Ltd v Higgins [2009] EWCA Civ 790 where the suggestion that the defendant was suffering from the early stage of Alzheimer’s disease was insufficient to avoid a finding of dishonest assistance as having been overwhelming on the facts: subjectively it might clearly have been possible to have failed to consider something dishonest, whereas here dishonesty could only be based on the objectivity of the dishonesty being proven.

95 See Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, Sweet & Maxwell, 2009, Ch 3.

96 Those cases include AG Zambia v Meer Care & Desai & Others [2007] EWHC 952 (Ch), on appeal [2008] EWCA Civ 1007; Fiona Trust & Holding Corporation v Privalov [2010] EWHC 3199 (Comm), at [1437], per Andrew Smith J.

97 Starglade v Nash [2010] EWCA Civ 1314.

98 I prefer to acknowledge my own prejudices and views explicitly in the text rather than to present a partial account of the cases while keeping my views secret. Let us be transparent and expose our opinions to the disinfectant properties of daylight. I hope too that presenting these arguments on the basis of disagreement between human beings, rather than as entirely abstract ideas, will make them easier to understand for student readers in particular.

99 Abou-Rahmah v Abacha [2006] EWCA Civ 1492, considered in detail below.

The second passage is, of course, harder to explain away. Two points do present themselves. First, it is not part of the ratio decidendi in that Lord Nicholls was dealing here with risk-taking in investment transactions and therefore he was no longer considering the test for dishonesty which should be applied specifically to Mr Tan. Second, it is one sentence out of a twelve page judgment which otherwise sticks doggedly to the line that honesty should be objective. Other than that, of course, it is impossible to correlate the idea that the court should consider the personal attributes, experience and intelligence of the defendant specifically while still pursuing an exclusively objective test. A pure objective reading of the first passage requires that the court sit in judgment – in a literal and a metaphorical sense of that term – not by questioning the personal motivations or beliefs of the defendant, but rather in an abstract way by deciding what an honest person would have done in those circumstances and then simply asking whether or not on the facts of the case the defendant had behaved in that way. Clearly, as soon as a judge is entitled to ask what the defendant's 'personal attributes' were, whether she was intelligent enough to have understood the situation or whether her experience would have led her to a particular course of action, then the objective idea of dishonesty is clearly compromised. It is suggested that by including a reference to the subjective characteristics of the defendant in the test that this shatters the pure objectivity of that test. The idea of dishonesty and honesty being an objective standard cannot co-exist with an examination of the defendant's personal characteristics. In fact, its very inconsistency with the idea of an objectively honest person as being the test is the third argument for refusing to accord this second passage any particular weight. Lord Nicholls cannot have intended the test to be both an objective test and also one which permitted this level of subjectivity.

As will emerge from the analysis of the cases to follow – especially Twinsectra v Yardley and Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust – this debate is continued by the judges themselves. However, before coming to those cases, we will briefly consider the question of what constitutes an 'honest person' in this test.

Who is the 'honest person'?

Thus far I have advanced a pure objective reading of Tan, while acknowledging that other people prefer a primarily subjective reading. That does not mean that I consider the pure objective reading to be without difficulties. The principal difficulty is in identifying what is meant by an honest person. I have certainly never met one. After all, what does it mean to be an honest person? What attributes does an honest person have? There are many activities which cannot sensibly be said to be capable of being conducted 'honestly': for example, how does a person eat a sandwich 'honestly', or open curtains 'honestly'? Clearly, there are some activities in which the concept of dishonesty has no meaningful part to play. Therefore, it is suggested, when deciding what constitutes an honest person the court must necessarily focus on those actions or omissions which call a standard of honesty or dishonesty into play. This means considering the circumstances of the case to identify what would constitute honesty in that particular context. For example, a sandwich could be eaten dishonestly if it had been stolen from a sandwich shop and if the person eating it then pretended to have paid for it. However, it is not the eating itself which is done dishonestly – presumably the mastication and digestion would have taken place in a usual, if possibly furtive, manner – but rather it is the context of appropriating the sandwich and then lying about having paid for it which makes it dishonest. Therefore, the court would need to identify which circumstances throw a light on whether or not a hypothetical, honest person would have acted in one way or another.

It is at that point that the question arises whether or not the defendant's own characteristics are to be used to identify the context in which honesty is measured. It is suggested that all an objective test for dishonesty requires is that the court identify the facts which were known to the defendant – so that the hypothetical, honest person can be taken to know those facts – but not the defendant's characteristics – such as a tendency to lie, or to be garrulous, or to be easily fooled. The second passage from Lord Nicholls, quoted above, clearly admits 'personal attributes' but the first passage clearly excludes personal moral codes and beliefs which would excuse an action which would otherwise be considered to be dishonest. So, there are very few personal attributes which can be admitted into the analysis. In essence, what the court must do is to postulate a hypothetical person who had access to the same facts as the defendant who has to act honestly in the situation in which the defendant found herself. Ultimately, it is likely that this will mean that the judge will probably be asking what they think that they ought to have done if they had found themselves in that situation. What prevents this from being an entirely subjective measurement on the part of the judge as to what she would have done herself, however, is the requirement that the judge identify an objectively honest person's conduct and be able to justify the finding that this is behaviour which would have been expected of anyone. These theoretical questions will emerge again in the later cases.

20.2.5 Introducing a modicum of subjectivity to the test of 'dishonesty'

Ordinarily one cannot rely on one's own, subjective opinion of what is honest: the 'Robin Hood defence'

It was clear in Lord Nicholls's leading opinion in the Privy Council in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan that his Lordship did not intend the test of dishonesty to be subjective. This means that his Lordship did not want the question 'has this person acted dishonestly?' to be answered by reference to whether or not the defendant herself considered her actions to have been dishonest, or whether or not she knew that other people would have considered them to be dishonest. This view emerges from the following passage, already quoted above:

... subjective characteristics of dishonesty do not mean that individuals are free to set their own standards of honesty in particular circumstances. The standard of what constitutes honest conduct is not subjective. Honesty is not an optional scale, with higher or lower values according to the moral standards of each individual. If a person knowingly appropriates another's property, he will not escape a finding of dishonesty simply because he sees nothing wrong in such behaviour.¹⁰⁰

100 [1995] 2 AC 375, [1995] 3 All ER 97, 106. Cf Walker v Stones [2001] QB 902. The last sentence contains an unfortunate reference to 'appropriation', whereas it is not necessary for the operation of the assistance liability that the defendant receive the property into his possession: the term 'appropriation' here should be read as referring to participation in the act of appropriation of property from the trust fund without passing possession or control of it to the defendant.

This approach to the notion of dishonesty is very different from that in the criminal law, whereby conviction for a crime of dishonesty will require that the defendant personally knew that her actions were dishonest, which is sometimes referred to as the ‘Robin Hood’ defence.¹⁰¹ In the context of the criminal law, we might consider it unsurprising if the courts require that a person not be convicted of a crime without knowing that they had committed some act which they knew to involve a criminal mens rea because ignorance of the loss is no defence to conviction of a crime against the state, whereas some wrong committed against another private person is typically treated by English law as a matter of a different order.¹⁰²

The distinction between subjective and objective bases of law in the jurisprudence of equity

So, we have established that ordinarily equity will not permit a defendant to avoid liability to account to the beneficiaries on the basis that she personally did not consider her actions to have been dishonest, even though criminal law frequently uses subjective tests. Given the general principle that ‘ignorance of the law is no defence’, this might lead us to suppose that the defendant ought not to be permitted to rely on a defence that she did not know her actions would be considered to be dishonest by other people. Indeed, this takes us to the very heart of debates about the purpose of law in society. If, as positivists claim, the law operates as a series of commands given by a sovereign (the law) to ordinary people, there is no reason to deny the power of the law to ascertain objective notions of what constitutes honest or dishonest behaviour. Citizens can consequently expect to be subject to those value judgments through the courts. Alternatively, even if law is to be based on natural law principles (founded on some moral grundnorm)¹⁰³ there is no reason to suppose that the law ought to be shy when deciding whether or not a person has acted dishonestly. If the law gives effect to an objective morality, it could be said that there is no objection to the courts establishing objectively the nature of that morality and therefore the nature of dishonest conduct. What the law appears to have done instead in the House of Lords in Twinsectra v Yardley, after Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan, is to take an alternative approach which suggests that in deciding what constitutes an objective notion of dishonest conduct one must nevertheless consider whether or not the defendant herself knew that her conduct would be considered to be dishonest by other people.

What none of the courts since Twinsectra v Yardley has accepted is that the defendant can rely on a defence that her own moral code did not consider her wrongdoing to have been dishonest. The idea that the defendant might seek to defend herself on the basis that subjectively she considered her actions to be honest is frequently referred to as the ‘Robin Hood defence’ on the basis that the defendant might suggest that she considered robbing from the rich to be acceptable if it was done to give money to the poor, as Robin Hood did in the legend.¹⁰⁴ It has been held that:

101 R v Ghosh [1982] QB 1053.

102 In AAH Pharmaceuticals v Birdi [2011] EWHC 1625 (Ch), at [34], Coulson J took the view that the Ghosh test for dishonesty in theft was the same as the test in Tan which has ‘a connotation of subjectivity’. This, it is suggested, is simply wrong.

103 A ‘grundnorm’ is, to borrow from the jurisprudential theorist Kelsen, a notion that there is some central point from which the law and morality is said to flow and from which it draws its legitimacy.

104 Walker v Stones [2000] 4 All ER 412.

A person may in some cases act dishonestly, according to the ordinary use of language, even though he genuinely believes that his action is morally justified. The penniless thief, for example, who picks the pocket of the multi-millionaire is dishonest even though he genuinely considers the theft is morally justified as a fair redistribution of wealth and that he is not therefore being dishonest.¹⁰⁵

Thus, dishonesty is said to be based on objective principles because to measure dishonesty on a subjective basis would permit an unacceptable level of moral relativism whereby each defendant would seek to excuse behaviour which is objectively dishonest. The suggestion that subjectivity should be required in assessing dishonesty arises in the judgments considered in the next section.

The suggestion that the defendant must be both objectively and subjectively dishonest

A combined subjective and objective approach emerged from the decision of the House of Lords in Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley.¹⁰⁶ In that case, Yardley sought to borrow money from Twinsectra to acquire property. It was a term of the loan agreement that the money was to be used solely for that purpose. It was a further part of the agreement that the money would be paid to Sims, a solicitor acting on behalf of Yardley, such that Sims would hold the loan money on trust with a power to spend it only for the acquisition of the property. Furthermore, Sims gave a solicitor's undertaking as to the proper repayment of the loan. The terms of the trust here were slightly unusual in that they took the form of a solicitor's undertaking that the money would be used only for the prescribed purpose, although Yardley was entitled to use the loan moneys as collateral for other transactions. However, Sims was replaced as Yardley's solicitor in this transaction by Leach. Yardley assured Sims that the money could be passed to Leach on the basis that Leach would now act as solicitor under the agreement. The money was misapplied by Yardley and the loan was not repaid. Twinsectra brought proceedings, inter alia, against Leach, contending that Leach had dishonestly assisted in a breach of Sims's trust obligations. Leach's defence was that he considered himself to have been entitled to use the money for whatever purposes Yardley directed him to use it, and in consequence that he did not consider that he had done anything dishonest. The majority of the House of Lords (with Lord Millett dissenting) appeared to agree with the speech of Lord Hutton which held that liability for dishonest assistance required both that the actions would have been considered dishonest by honest and reasonable people and also that the defendant himself realised that the actions would have been considered dishonest by honest and reasonable people. After reviewing the authorities, Lord Hutton gave the following exposition of the test:

There is, in my opinion, a further consideration [beyond deciding whether the test is one of knowledge or dishonesty as set out by Lord Nicholls] which supports the view that for liability as an accessory to arise the defendant must himself appreciate that what he was doing was dishonest by the standards of honest and reasonable men. A finding by the judge that a defendant has been dishonest is a grave finding, and it is particularly 105 Ibid, 444, per Sir Christopher Slade.

106 [2002] 2 All ER 377.

grave against a professional man, such as a solicitor. Notwithstanding that the issue arises in equity law [sic] and not in a criminal context, I think that it would be less than just for the law to permit a finding that a defendant had been ‘dishonest’ in assisting in a breach of trust where he knew of the facts which created the trust and its breach but had not been aware that what he was doing would be regarded by honest men as being dishonest.¹⁰⁷

This version of the test, therefore, clearly adds an important second, subjective element to the test of dishonesty. Significantly, though, the second limb of the test is whether or not the defendant realised that other people would have considered her actions to have been dishonest and not simply that the defendant herself thought that the action was dishonest.

An example might help to illustrate the point. Suppose that I have been renting a flat from someone while they were abroad on business. Suppose further that I had a lot of difficulties with the flat and so consider that the rent I had to pay was far too high for the trouble I suffered when occupying it. On the day of my departure I decide that it would be nice to have some memento of my time in that flat, and I see an old edition of a novel I have always wanted to read. I decide that, in the light of the trouble I have been caused and the huge rent I have paid for the flat, I deserve to take that novel and keep it for myself, even though I know it belongs to my landlord. At that moment I may be able to justify my conduct to myself and so convince myself that it is not dishonest in the context for me to take that book. However, it must be the case that I know, somewhere at the back of my mind, that other people would think ‘the book does not belong to you and therefore it is dishonest for you to take it’. This is the distinction here between realising that other people consider an act to be dishonest and considering it to be dishonest oneself. What this strange ‘combination test’ in Twinsectra v Yardley achieves is the addition of a modicum of subjectivity to the law, but it does not turn its back entirely on objective notions of what honest and reasonable people would think of one’s actions.¹⁰⁸ It was, in truth, a hybrid test.

The issue is then as to the efficacy of the test set out by Lord Nicholls in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan. Lord Hutton explained the issue in the following way:

It would be open to your Lordships to depart from the principle stated by Lord Nicholls [in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan] that dishonesty is a necessary ingredient of accessory liability and to hold that knowledge is a sufficient ingredient. But the statement of that principle by Lord Nicholls has been widely regarded as clarifying this area of the law and, as he observed, the tide of authority in England has flowed strongly in favour of the test of dishonesty. Therefore, I consider that the courts should continue to apply that test and that your Lordships should state that dishonesty requires knowledge by the defendant that what he was doing would be regarded as dishonest by honest people, although he should not escape a finding of dishonesty because he sets his own standards of honesty and does not regard as dishonest what he knows would offend the normally accepted standards of honest conduct.¹⁰⁹

107 Ibid, 387.

108 More generally, this would be an ineffective argument on my part on the basis of the Robin Hood defence criticised in Walker v Stones [2000] 4 All ER 412.

109 [2002] 2 All ER 377.

So, Lord Nicholls's original test in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan is to continue in existence, albeit in a hybrid form. This combination of an alteration of that Tan test and yet a purported approval of it by the House of Lords is slightly awkward in the abstract. The utility of the dishonesty test and its growing popularity are cited as the reasons for its retention. Furthermore, it is unfortunate that the gloss which Lord Hutton put on that test, by way of a subjective element, is expressed as requiring 'knowledge' that what the defendant was doing would be considered dishonest: this is unfortunate because the test of dishonesty was developed precisely to move away from tests of knowledge.¹¹⁰

The effect, it is suggested, is to leave the law in a confused state. Neither is it entirely clear with which parts of Lord Hutton's analysis the other members of the judicial committee of the House of Lords were agreeing. Lord Steyn concurred with both Lord Hutton and Lord Hoffmann. Lord Slynn concurred with Lord Hoffmann at the beginning of his short speech, but then expressed concurrence also with Lord Hutton, although it is not entirely clear with which parts of that judgment he proposed to concur. Lord Hoffmann disposed of the matter first by analysing the terms of the undertaking given by Sims. Lord Hoffmann then appeared to express agreement with Lord Hutton that 'a dishonest state of mind' is to be conceived of as 'consciousness that one is transgressing ordinary standards of honest behaviour', but then proceeded in the next paragraph to express agreement with Lord Nicholls in Tan, who was against any such subjectivity in relation to one's own moral code, and then to express regret that the trial judge used subjective-sounding expressions such as 'the defendant shut his eyes to the obvious' (considered below).¹¹¹ Lord Millett dissented by focusing primarily on the nature of this arrangement as a Quistclose trust, and his analysis of the concept of dishonesty was predicated on a close analysis of Lord Nicholls's leading opinion in Tan. In Lord Millett's view, Leach knew all of the facts which caused his action to be considered wrongful and therefore could be considered to have acted dishonestly. It is suggested that Lord Millett's analysis is the most cogent on the facts of this case: the solicitor was supposed to be a professional, he had possession of all of the facts necessary to show to an ordinarily honest person that his actions were wrong, and therefore he was to be held to have been dishonest.

Another example of this tendency towards subjectivity, it is suggested, arises in *Brinks Ltd v Abu-Saleh (No 3)*¹¹² where a security guard's wife would have been held liable for assisting her husband's breach of his fiduciary duties to his employer – after her husband had helped armed robbers to steal gold bullion from his employer – when she helped him to transport the cash proceeds of the robbery overseas. The reason she was not held to be 110 This is an interesting combination of the subjective and objective elements bound up in a notion of conscience. Whereas the conscience might be thought of as being a necessarily personal thing and therefore subjective, it would clearly be impossible for the law to concern itself solely with whether or not the defendant considered that she ought or ought not to be liable. The work of phenomenological philosophers and of ethical philosophers like Emmanuel Levinas suggest that notions of good and bad conscience exist outside the individual. Theorists like Norbert Elias point out that all human beings, from their first weaning as infants through their schooling and their adult life, are surrounded and shaped by external inputs to their individual psyches. Consequently, it is suggested that the law need not be quite so shamefaced at the notion of erecting entirely objective notions of conscience in such cases. This question is considered in greater detail in the final chapter of this book in section 32.2. See also Hudson, 2004:2, 23.

111 [2002] 2 All ER 377, 383. This approach was applied without comment by Peter Smith J in Manolakaki v Constantinides [2004] EWHC 749 (Ch), [167].

112 [1999] CLC 133.

liable on the facts was that she had not known of the robbery and had instead assumed that her help had been sought on the basis that her husband was involved in some tax evasion scam, as opposed to disposing of the fruits of an armed robbery: her ignorance of the true nature of their dealings meant that she was held not to have been assisting her husband dishonestly. As we have seen, however, the court's reliance on her subjective lack of appreciation of the circumstances does not square with the objectivity required by Tan: an objective test would require the court to ask what an honest person would have done in the defendant's circumstances, and not what she herself knew or did not know.

The re-establishment of a purely objective test for dishonesty, and of personal liability to account as being an equitable wrong giving rise to 'constructive trusteeship'

A subsequent decision of the House of Lords in *Dubai Aluminium v Salaam*¹¹³ has re-established the test for dishonesty as being purely objective and has reaffirmed that personal liability to account as a dishonest assistant is an equitable wrong giving rise to 'constructive trusteeship'. Unfortunately, however, this important case is rarely cited in the discussions about dishonest assistance, seemingly because it relates to a case of assistance in a breach of a different kind of fiduciary duty. This case involved a fraudulent scheme whereby Dubai Aluminium Co Ltd paid out US$50 million in a sham consultancy agreement. One of the fraudsters, Salaam, was a client of a firm of solicitors, Amhurst Brown.¹¹⁴ It was claimed by Dubai Aluminium that Mr Amhurst, a partner of the Amhurst Brown firm of solicitors, had been a dishonest assistant in the fraud, in that Mr Amhurst had advised Salaam throughout his various activities. The House of Lords was able to proceed on the basis that the Amhurst Brown partners were innocent of the fraud and to recognise that no fraud had been proved against Mr Amhurst himself because all of the parties had agreed to settle. The remaining question was as to the liability of the Amhurst Brown partnership under the Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978 and, consequently, whether Mr Amhurst's liability was for the equitable wrong of dishonest assistance as opposed to a common law liability under tort, because equitable and common law liabilities received different treatment under the 1978 Act. Lord Nicholls gave a leading speech in *Dubai Aluminium v Salaam*¹¹⁵ with which Lord Slynn concurred. Lord Millett gave a speech in slightly different terms. Lord Hutton concurred with both Lord Nicholls and Lord Millett. Lord Hobhouse gave a speech, without concurring with any of the others, focusing on the role of the 1978 Act and, inter alia, its use in providing 'restitutionary remedies for unjust enrichment at the expense of another'.¹¹⁶

Lord Nicholls described liability for dishonest assistance as being the 'equitable wrong of dishonest assistance in a breach of trust or fiduciary duty'.¹¹⁷ This form of liability was further described by Lord Nicholls as being for a 'wrongful act' whereby if a partnership were held liable for fraudulent misrepresentation then it would be 'remarkable' if the

113 [2002] 3 WLR 1913, [2003] 1 All ER 97.

114 In fact, Amhurst were two successive partnerships but they were treated by the House of Lords as being one partnership.

115 [2002] 3 WLR 1913, [2003] 1 All ER 97.

116 Ibid, para 76.

117 Ibid, para 9.

members of the partnership were not also vicariously liable for an individual partner's 'dishonest participation . . . in conduct directed at the misappropriation of another's property'.¹¹⁸ Lord Nicholls described the liability as being that of a 'constructive trustee'¹¹⁹ whose 'misconduct . . . gives rise to a liability in equity to make good resulting loss'.¹²⁰ This analysis was predicated both on Lord Nicholls's own decision in *Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan*¹²¹ and on the older judgment in Mara v Browne,¹²² where a partnership was held liable for a breach of fiduciary duty committed by one of the partners.¹²³ No mention was made in his Lordship's speech of the approach taken in Twinsectra v Yardley, which purported to introduce a subjective element to the objective notion of dishonesty in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan. Instead the test for dishonesty was again centred on an objective conception of dishonesty, as discussed above in relation to Tan.

By contrast, in Lord Millett's speech, the particular facts of this case were not disposed of by reference to dishonest assistance principles alone, but rather they were disposed of by reference to old principles imposing vicarious liability on a partnership for the equitable wrongdoing of any one partner¹²⁴ as contrasted with vicarious liability in tort.¹²⁵ As to the roots of the dishonest assistance claim in cases such as Mara v Browne,¹²⁶ Lord Millett placed this claim in the context of trusteeship having become 'more professional. Clients no longer look to their trustees to be philosophers, guides and friends . . .', with the effect that we do not need to consider the usage of 'constructive trust' and 'constructive trustee' in Mara v Browne as denoting a trust of identifiable property¹²⁷ and that we should recognise that 'meanings have changed over time'. Lord Millett suggested that we should consider the form of constructive trusteeship in Mara v Browne as equivalent to liability as a trustee de son tort.¹²⁸ The impact of such a definition of the liability for dishonest assistance would be to predicate it solely on the fault of the defendant for intermeddling with the operation of the trust or rendering herself an 'actual trustee',¹²⁹ and not simply by means of assisting in a breach of that trust without seeking to take over its management. What Lord Millett sought to make of this understanding on the facts before him was the proposition that no partnership can accept that any individual partner is entitled to breach her fiduciary duties to a client and therefore the partnership cannot be said to accept any liability for the actions of an individual partner who acts dishonestly. Therefore, Amhurst Brown could not be liable as a trustee de son tort in relation to Mr Amhurst's actions because it had never accepted any liability for Mr Amhurst acting outside the scope of his fiduciary duties.

118 Ibid, para 11.

119 Ibid, para 40.

120 Ibid.

121 [1995] 2 AC 378.

122 [1896] 1 Ch 199, 208, per Lord Herschell.

123 Cf In Re Bell's Indenture [1980] 1 WLR 1217, 1230, per Vinelott J.

124 Brydges v Branfill (1842) 12 Sim 369.

125 Credit Lyonnais Bank Nederland NV v Export Credits Guarantee Department [2000] 1 AC 486.

126 [1896] 1 Ch 199.

127 Paragon Finance plc v DB Thakerar & Co [1999] 1 All ER 400, 408; Coulthard v Disco Mix Club Ltd [2000] 1 WLR 707, 731.

128 [2002] 3 WLR 1913, [2003] 1 All ER 97, paras 135 and 138. Cf Taylor v Davies [1920] AC 636; Clarkson v Davies [1923] AC 100, 110.

129 Taylor v Davies [1920] AC 636, 651, per Viscount Cave.

However, it is suggested that Lord Millett's approach overlooks the broader explanation of this liability in *Barnes v Addy*¹³⁰ given by Lord Selborne, to the effect that the defendant would be liable not only for rendering himself a trustee de son tort, but also by 'actually participating in the fraudulent conduct of the trustee to the injury of the cestui que trust'¹³¹ in committing a breach of trust. Therefore, the history of this claim has been predicated on a form of constructive trusteeship which undoubtedly involves assistance in a breach of trust, or where 'they assist with knowledge in a dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the trustees',¹³² and not control of the trust by the defendant. The whole purpose of the dishonest assistance claim is that it is imposed on the defendant due to her wrongdoing and not due to her acceptance of liability as such: in this regard, Lord Millett's comments must be taken to relate solely to the partnership aspects of this case. The correct approach to this remedy is that the wrongdoing dishonest assistant is made 'accountable in equity' for the loss which her dishonesty has caused to the beneficiaries.¹³³

The position after Twinsectra v Yardley

According, inter alia, to the decision of Lewison J in Ultraframe (UK) Ltd v Fielding,¹³⁴ the effect of the decision of the House of Lords in Twinsectra v Yardley was that the test for dishonesty in this context had changed subtly but significantly to the effect that the defendant must be shown to have understood that she had acted dishonestly and not simply that an honest person would not have acted as she had done. Oddly the courts had tended to overlook the dicta in Dubai Aluminium v Salaam relating to dishonesty. However, the Privy Council in Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust,¹³⁵ considered next, has suggested a movement back to a purely objective test. Being a Privy Council decision, however, it is of purely persuasive authority. This decision has been approved by the Court of Appeal in Abou-Rahmah v Abacha,¹³⁶ although that decision is not without its difficulties as will be considered in the next section but one.

The facts in Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust

The movement back towards a straightforwardly objective test for 'dishonesty' in this context is suggested by the decision of the Privy Council in Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust.¹³⁷ The facts relate to the collapse of Barlow Clowes International Ltd ('Barlow Clowes'). Barlow Clowes had attracted approximately £140 million, principally from private British investors. The bulk of that money was dissipated by Peter Clowes and his associates both on other business ventures and on 'extravagant living'.¹³⁸ Peter Clowes was convicted and 130 (1874) 9 Ch App 244.

131 Ibid., 251.

132 Ibid., 252.

133 Selangor United Rubber Estates Ltd v Cradock (No 3) [1968] 1 WLR 1555, 1582, per Ungood-Thomas J.

134 [2005] EWHC 1638 (Ch), [2005] All ER (D) 397, para [1481].

135 [2005] UKPC 37, [2006] 1 WLR 1476, [2006] 1 All ER 333.

136 Ibid.

137 Ibid.

138 Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust [2006] 1 WLR 1476, [2006] 1 All ER 333, [1].

imprisoned for offences relating to the eventual collapse of the Barlow Clowes investment scheme.

This particular case related to funds which were paid through a company called International Trust Corporation (Isle of Man) Ltd ('ITC'). ITC provided financial services and, in time, was to act as a management company for a range of other companies where those other companies were the vehicles through which much of the Barlow Clowes money was dissipated. At first instance, this action related to the liability of ITC and two of its principal directors, Henwood and Sebastian, in dishonestly assisting Peter Clowes and his associate Cramer in misappropriating investors' funds from Barlow Clowes and related companies. Of particular significance were four sums paid away between June and November 1987 of £577,429, £6 million, £205,329, and £1,799,603 respectively, although there were as many as 15 payments considered at first instance. It was found that there was no commercial purpose for these transactions other than to spirit them out of the Barlow Clowes group.

The appeal brought before the Privy Council related to Henwood's claim that he had not acted dishonestly. Henwood appealed against the Acting Deemster's finding¹³⁹ at first instance that he had dishonestly assisted Peter Clowes and Cramer on the basis that there was insufficient evidence to support such a finding. It is this appeal which is the centre of our concerns.

The facts relating to Henwood's involvement with the Barlow Clowes organisation are set out in summary form in Lord Hoffmann's judgment: they can be understood as follows. Henwood and ITC were first involved with Cramer and payments from the Barlow Clowes organisation¹⁴⁰ in May 1986. In the Spring of 1987, as Lord Hoffmann told the tale, Henwood's business relationship with Cramer and Peter Clowes grew close and the possibility arose that Henwood might go into a 'virtual partnership' with these two men in relation to a reverse takeover of another company, JFH. We are told that it was at this stage that Henwood 'began to take a lively interest in their business'.¹⁴¹ It was in the summer of 1987 that the first of the relevant transactions took place by means of transfer from the Barlow Clowes organisation through ITC. Henwood approved the transfer of the money from ITC to Cramer so that Cramer could pursue personal business interests. The judge at first instance found that Henwood 'knew enough about the origins of the money to have suspected misappropriation and that he acted dishonestly in assisting in its disposal'.¹⁴² The judge further found that after June 1987 Henwood 'strongly suspected'¹⁴³ that the monies passing through ITC had come from private British investors. Consequently it was held that no honest person could have assisted Peter Clowes and Cramer if those suspicions were correct. Henwood, we are told, had 'consciously decided not to make inquiries because he preferred in his own interest not to run the risk of discovering the truth'.¹⁴⁴

139 The Acting Deemster was the judge at first instance in the Isle of Man.

140 We are not given specific information as to which company paid money to ITC and therefore I will simply refer to 'the Barlow Clowes organisation' to represent the payer in these transactions.

141 Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust [2006] 1 WLR 1476, [7].

142 Ibid., [8].

143 Ibid., [11].

144 Ibid., [11].

The decision of the Privy Council in Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust

Lord Hoffmann delivered the unanimous judgment of the Privy Council in the following, unequivocal terms: ‘Their Lordships consider that by ordinary standards such a state of mind is dishonest’.¹⁴⁵ Therefore Henwood’s claim that he had simply followed his clients’ instructions without asking any questions was considered to have been dishonest. In support of this statement, Lord Hoffmann considered the argument raised at first instance that Henwood lived by a different moral code and that by his own moral standards obeying instructions from his clients, Peter Clowes and Cramer, took priority in a way that excluded all other moral claims to his attention. In the words of the Acting Deemster, Henwood had an:

exaggerated notion of dutiful service to clients, which produced a warped moral approach that it was not improper to treat carrying out clients’ instructions as being all important.¹⁴⁶ Mr Henwood may well have thought this to be an honest attitude, but, if so, he was wrong.¹⁴⁷

The argument advanced by Henwood’s counsel was as follows. Lord Hutton in Twinsectra v Yardley had suggested that for a person to be dishonest, his actions must not only be considered to be dishonest by an objectively honest person but the defendant himself must also be aware that his actions would be considered to be dishonest by such a person.¹⁴⁸ Consequently, counsel for Henwood argued that Henwood had not appreciated that his actions would be considered to be dishonest and therefore that Henwood could not be a dishonest assistant. The court of appeal in the Isle of Man, known as the Staff of Government Division, considered that the Acting Deemster had drawn inferences of dishonesty from Henwood’s evidence and had based her judgment on those inferences. This court of appeal considered that, just because Henwood knew the general nature of Cramer and Peter Clowes’s business, it did not follow that Henwood would necessarily have formed the view that the monies paid through ITC were necessarily taken in breach of trust from Barlow Clowes’s private investors. Consequently, the court of appeal found that there was insufficient evidence of dishonesty on Henwood’s part. This finding of a lack of dishonesty, then, relied on Lord Hutton’s explanation of what ‘dishonesty’ meant in Twinsectra v Yardley.

The Privy Council overturned the decision of the court of appeal. As to the facts of the case, Lord Hoffmann considered that it was the Acting Deemster who had heard six days of evidence from Henwood and others and who was therefore in a good position to judge whether or not Henwood had acted dishonestly. His Lordship was unconvinced by the court of appeal’s argument that a trial judge ‘drawing inferences from inferences’ was likely to lead to injustice, for the same reason. Instead, his Lordship was prepared to rely on the Acting Deemster’s findings of fact and her impression that Henwood had been dishonest in the circumstances.

¹⁴⁵ Ibid., [12].

¹⁴⁶ That is, Henwood argued that he considered his loyalty to Cramer and Clowes, his clients, as being more important than the rights or interests of any other person.

¹⁴⁷ Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust [2006] 1 WLR 1476, [2006] 1 All ER 333 [12].

¹⁴⁸ [2002] 2 AC 164, 174.

Re-establishing the objective test for 'dishonesty'; explaining Twinsectra v Yardley

As to the appropriate legal principles, there are three significant issues. First, Lord Hoffmann held that neither he nor Lord Hutton, when both gave judgment in Twinsectra v Yardley, had intended the test for dishonesty to be understood as having a subjective requirement (that one appreciate that other people would consider one's behaviour to have been dishonest) added to it.¹⁴⁹ Instead, the purely objective test in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan should be understood to be the governing test. Consequently, Henwood would not be able to rely on his own moral code to absolve him of liability and therefore he was held liable as a dishonest assistant.

However, this argument seems a little thin given that Lord Hutton had held the following in Twinsectra v Yardley in purportedly (we had previously thought) adding a subjective dimension to the test for 'dishonesty':

There is, in my opinion, a further consideration [than deciding whether the test is one of knowledge or dishonesty as set out by Lord Nicholls] which supports the view that for liability as an accessory to arise the defendant must himself appreciate that what he was doing was dishonest by the standards of honest and reasonable men. A finding by the judge that a defendant has been dishonest is a grave finding, and it is particularly grave against a professional man, such as a solicitor. Notwithstanding that the issue arises in equity law [sic] and not in a criminal context, I think that it would be less than just for the law to permit a finding that a defendant had been 'dishonest' in assisting in a breach of trust where he knew of the facts which created the trust and its breach but had not been aware that what he was doing would be regarded by honest men as being dishonest.¹⁵⁰

This form of the test, therefore, clearly did add an important second, subjective element to the test of dishonesty. Significantly, though, the second limb of the test is whether or not the defendant realised that other people would have considered his actions to have been dishonest and not that the defendant himself thought that the action was dishonest. Consequently, on this basis, Henwood's argument (had his evidence been credible) would in theory have been successful if he could have shown, even though an honest person would not have acted as he had acted, that he did not himself appreciate that other people would have considered his actions to have been dishonest.

The key passage from Lord Hoffmann's judgment in Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust in this context is in paragraph [10], as follows:

The judge stated the law in terms largely derived from the advice of the Board given by Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan. In summary, she said that liability for dishonest assistance requires a dishonest state of mind on the part of the person who assists in a breach of trust. Such a state of mind may consist in knowledge that the transaction is one in which he cannot honestly participate (for example, a misappropriation of other people's money), or it may consist in suspicion combined with a conscious decision not to make inquiries which might result in knowledge: see Manifest Shipping Co Ltd v Uni-Polaris Insurance Co Ltd.¹⁵¹ Although a dishonest state of mind is a subjective mental state, the standard by which the law determines whether it is dishonest is objective. If by ordinary standards a defendant's mental state would be characterised as dishonest, it is irrelevant that the defendant judges by different standards. The Court of Appeal held this to be a correct state of the law and their Lordships agree.

149 Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust [2006] 1 WLR 1476, [2006] 1 All ER 333 [15]–[16] and [18].

150 Twinsectra v Yardley [2002] 2 All ER 377, 387.

So, what results is a re-affirmation that the test is an objective test. However, whereas Lord Nicholls suggested considering what an honest person would have done and measuring the defendant's actions against the hypothetical actions of this honest person, Lord Hoffmann suggests that 'ordinary standards' will be the standard against which the court will decide whether or not the defendant's actions had been dishonest. It is suggested that asking what an honest person would have done is almost a counsel of perfection (but not in the pejorative sense in which people often use that term). Asking what an honest person would have done means identifying an almost ideal course of conduct untainted by any moral impropriety. An objective set of standards may, however, permit some level of 'moral ambiguity' between things which are deemed 'honest' and things which are deemed to be 'dishonest'. There is therefore a sliver of difference between the approach expressed by Lord Hoffmann in Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust and the approach set out by Lord Nicholls in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan.

What Lord Hutton should be taken to have meant in Twinsectra v Yardley

Secondly, Lord Hoffmann explained in Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust that Lord Hutton should not have been interpreted as adding a level of subjectivity to the test. Rather, their Lordships in Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust took Lord Hutton in Twinsectra v Yardley to have meant that the defendant's:

knowledge of the transaction had to be such as to render his participation contrary to normally acceptable standards of conduct. It did not require that he should have had reflections about what those normally acceptable standards were.¹⁵²

However, there are two problems with this attempt to 'spin'¹⁵³ Lord Hutton's dicta. The first problem is that Lord Nicholls's objective approach in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan does not require that the defendant realise that his actions would be dishonest by ordinary standards (although if that could be proved it would clearly show dishonesty): rather the court measures what an honest person would have done and then asks whether or not the defendant acted in that way. The second problem is that Lord Hutton is a criminal lawyer and criminal law's notion of dishonesty is subjective: it requires that the defendant know that his actions

151 [2003] 1 AC 469.

152 Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust [2006] 1 WLR 1476, [2006] 1 All ER 333 [15].

153 'Spin' is the art used in modern political activity of presenting an account of events in such a way as to make them seem less embarrassing, damaging or unfortunate.

would be considered to be dishonest.¹⁵⁴ Thus it is perfectly probable that a criminal lawyer would have taken this attitude to questions of dishonesty.¹⁵⁵

Lord Hoffmann then gave an explanation of his own speech in Twinsectra v Yardley, which had expressed concurrence with Lord Hutton. Lord Hoffmann, however, made clear that his comment in that case to the effect that the defendant must have exhibited ‘consciousness that one is transgressing ordinary standards of honest behaviour’¹⁵⁶ does not require subjective reflection on what those standards are: rather, it was intended to be an objective requirement of dishonesty. This attempt by Lord Hoffmann to spin his own earlier judgment, particularly when the facts of Eurotrust had indicated why that test would not work, does seem a little disingenuous.

The correct approach to Henwood’s evidence

Thirdly, what emerged from Lord Hoffmann’s recitation of the court’s opinion was that the judge at first instance was right to listen to the defendant’s evidence and have regard to ‘the lies which Mr Henwood told in evidence’.¹⁵⁷ The trial judge here considered that there may be a number of reasons why Henwood lied in evidence as to the time when he learned about the Barlow Clowes business – either to conceal his guilt or out of fear that he would not be believed – and it was considered right by Lord Hoffmann, given that there is ‘no window into another mind’, to draw inferences from the circumstances and what was said in evidence.¹⁵⁸ What is happening here reflects Scott LJ’s dicta in *Polly Peck v Nadir (No 2)*¹⁵⁹ that no matter which test is used the question boils down to the trial judge asking herself, ‘Ought the defendant to have been suspicious [as to whether or not this property is derived from a breach of trust] in these circumstances?’¹⁶⁰ So, we are told by Lord Hoffmann in *Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust*¹⁶¹ that it is not necessary that the defendant should have known

154 R v Ghosh [1982] 2 All ER 689, [1982] QB 1053; R v Hicks [2000] 4 All ER 833.

155 One understanding of this case is that Lord Hutton had previously run the ‘Diplock courts’ in Northern Ireland. These special criminal courts heard cases involving terrorist and similar organisations without juries. The system had been introduced because the intimidation of juries had been such a problem. Consequently, the judges in Diplock courts had to act as both judge and jury. Jackson and Doran, 1995 found somewhat counter-intuitively that these judges were doing a good job in difficult circumstances of compensating for the absence of a jury in the conduct of these trials, in spite of the self-evident civil liberties implications. (For a contrary view, see Greer and White, 1986.) What this means for our purposes is that Lord Hutton spent a very long time becoming used to seeking proof that a defendant knew herself that she had been dishonest both as judge and as jury. Therefore, his attitude in Twinsectra v Yardley was entirely consistent with those beliefs. This also explains the Hutton Inquiry into the death of David Kelly and the start of the Iraq War: in spite of intense media scrutiny when Tony Blair gave evidence that he had not thought himself to have been dishonest, Lord Hutton would not have considered him dishonest because his own test was a subjective one; whereas when BBC journalists admitted that they had said they had checked facts in stories when they had not, then they were held to have been subjectively dishonest. The selection of Lord Hutton – with his steely determination and experience of intense outside pressure, and with his preference for a subjective test – was a stroke of genius by those who appointed him if their goal was to have the Prime Minister exonerated by that report for any dishonesty.

156 Twinsectra v Yardley [2002] 2 AC 164, [20].

157 Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust [2006] 1 WLR 1476, [2006] 1 All ER 333 [23].

158 Ibid., [26].

159 [1992] 4 All ER 769.

160 See the discussion at section 20.3.4 below.

161 Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust [2006] 1 WLR 1476, [2006] 1 All ER 333 [28].

that the monies came from a breach of trust but rather it would be sufficient that ‘he should have entertained a clear suspicion that this was the case’.¹⁶² On these facts, it was not necessary that Henwood know the detail of all of Peter Clowes and Cramer’s transactions but rather it would be enough that he had ‘grounds to suspect’¹⁶³ that they were misappropriating the money. The dicta of Rimer J in *Brinks Ltd v Abu-Saleh*¹⁶⁴ to the effect that the defendant must know either of the existence of the trust or of the facts giving rise to the trust, were disapproved of by Lord Hoffmann.¹⁶⁵

The decision of the Acting Deemster was therefore restored on the basis that the Privy Council considered that there was sufficient evidence to support the Acting Deemster’s findings.¹⁶⁶

The decision of the Court of Appeal in Abou-Rahmah v Abacha

The Court of Appeal in *Abou-Rahmah v Abacha*¹⁶⁷ has prima facie approved the approach of the Privy Council in Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust. However, as is explained below, there are serious difficulties with the detail of the judgments of Rix LJ and Arden LJ in that case. The facts in Abou-Rahmah v Abacha were as follows. The claimants were contacted by the second defendant to ask the claimants to assist the first defendant with some financial problems. Briefly put, the claimants were offered a share in a trust fund of US$65 million which the first defendant claimed he was trying to get out of Benin. To gain access to this money, or so the claimants were told, it was necessary to make a number of payments, totalling US$1.375 million, to various government agencies purportedly to acquire regulatory permission to move the target money and to meet VAT liabilities. The claimants paid the amounts which were purportedly required to access the target money. These arrangements were a scam intended to take money from the claimants. In time, after the payments had been made, the defendants absconded with the money. The claimants sought to recover their losses from a variety of third parties who had been involved with this scam in various ways. This particular piece of litigation concerned a claim brought by the claimants against a bank into which two payments totalling US$625,000, which had been taken from the claimants as part of the scam, had been paid. While a number of claims were made at first instance, only questions relating to dishonest assistance and to the change of position defence were made in front of the Court of Appeal.

At first instance, Treacy J followed the hybrid subjective–objective test for dishonesty in Twinsectra v Yardley: the decision in Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust was reached after the trial had ended, although Treacy J had accepted skeleton arguments on the nature of the test.¹⁶⁸ On appeal, Rix LJ stated the principles underpinning dishonest assistance in the following terms:

162 Ibid.

163 Ibid.

164 [1996] CLC 133, 151.

165 Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust [2006] 1 WLR 1476, [2006] 1 All ER 333 [28].

166 Ibid., [29] and [32].

167 [2006] EWCA Civ 1492, [2007] Bus LR 220.

168 [2005] EWHC 2662 (QB), [2006] 1 Lloyd’s Rep 484.

It would seem that a claimant in this area needs to show three things: first, that a defendant has the requisite knowledge; secondly, that, given that knowledge, the defendant acts in a way which is contrary to normally acceptable standards of honest conduct (the objective test of honesty or dishonesty); and thirdly, possibly, that the defendant must in some sense be dishonest himself (a subjective test of dishonesty which might, on analysis, add little or nothing to knowledge of the facts which, objectively, would make his conduct dishonest).¹⁶⁹

However, this passage, it is suggested, is simply a misunderstanding of the debate which has followed Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan – a debate which his Lordship sought to essay in those parts of his judgment which followed the passage quoted above and which dealt with dishonest assistance. What is a misunderstanding, it is suggested, is the inclusion of the first and second requirements: what was required by Lord Nicholls in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan was an objective test to decide whether or not the defendant had been ‘dishonest’, not the old test which had considered the defendant’s ‘knowledge’. The third element of the test is very wide of the mark. Therefore, this test cannot really be considered as being an application of the Tan test as set out in Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust as it purports to be. Here knowledge is put ahead of dishonesty by Rix LJ, and not in the nuanced way in which Lord Nicholls mentioned it briefly in Tan. Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan did not create a test of what the defendant knew; rather it is only a question of what an honest person would have done in the circumstances and whether or not the defendant lived up to that standard of honesty. Failure to be honest in this sense renders a person dishonest. It was Lord Hutton’s now discredited suggestion in Twinsectra v Yardley – that the defendant must also be proved to have appreciated that other people would have considered her behaviour to have been dishonest – which brought in this element of subjective dishonesty to the previously entirely objective test of dishonesty. However, as Rix LJ recognised, the unanimous decision of the Privy Council in Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust sought to return the test to its purely objective state in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan. Therefore, the reference to knowledge which Rix LJ makes should not be made if, as Rix LJ claimed to be doing, the law is to be returned to its purely objective state in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan. What Rix LJ has achieved instead, ironically enough, is an affirmation of the hybrid subjective–objective test for dishonesty in Twinsectra v Yardley or a test for subjective knowledge.

Also in Abou-Rahmah v Abacha, Arden LJ set out the following summary of the principles relating to dishonest assistance:

In Barlow Clowes International Ltd (in liquidation) v Eurotrust International Ltd,¹⁷⁰ the Privy Council considered the case law of England and Wales on the issue of the element of dishonesty necessary for liability under this head. Its interpretation of that case law was that it is unnecessary to show subjective dishonesty in the sense of consciousness that the transaction is dishonest. It is sufficient if the defendant knows of the elements of the transaction which make it dishonest according to normally accepted standards of behaviour. This is the first opportunity, so far as I am aware, that this Court has had an opportunity of considering the decision of the Privy Council, and in my judgment this court should follow the decision of the Privy Council.¹⁷¹

169 [2006] EWCA Civ 1492, [16].

170 [2006] 1 All ER 333.

What Arden LJ should be taken to mean here, in following the test in Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust, is that the Eurotrust test for dishonesty would definitely be made out on any given set of facts if the defendant ‘knows of the elements of the transaction which make it dishonest according to normally accepted standards of behaviour’. If the defendant knew that her behaviour would be considered to be dishonest according to normal standards of behaviour then that would mean that the defendant would be held to have been dishonest on any formulation of the dishonesty test. However, to be liable under Tan or Eurotrust it would not have been necessary to prove such subjective knowledge: rather, merely identifying that in the circumstances an honest person would not have behaved as the defendant behaved would have been sufficient. The defendant would not be found to have been dishonest because she realised the nature of her actions would have been considered to have been dishonest by other people, but rather because her actions offended the normal standards of behaviour. This formulation by Arden LJ blurs that point.

Arden LJ laid great emphasis on the following idea from the opinion of Lord Nicholls:

As Lord Nicholls said in the Royal Brunei case, honesty has ‘a strong subjective element in that it is a description of a type of conduct assessed in the light of what a person actually knew at the time, as distinct from what a reasonable person would have known or appreciated.’¹⁷²

But this passage is being taken totally out of context. It is a discussion of honesty – not dishonesty – and refers to dishonesty as being ‘its counterpart’ immediately after the passage which Arden LJ has quoted. The key passage emerges immediately before the sentence which Arden LJ has quoted. That passage in Lord Nicholls’s opinion in the Privy Council in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan read:

Whatever may be the position in some criminal or other contexts . . . , in the context of the accessory liability principle acting dishonestly, or with a lack of probity, which is synonymous, means simply not acting as an honest person would in the circumstance. This is an objective standard.¹⁷³

Then Lord Nicholls held ‘This may seem surprising’, and only then did he speak the words quoted by Arden LJ above. In other words his Lordship was pointing out that his insistence on a purely objective test may seem counter-intuitive at first – and that honesty may seem to connote subjective notions – but that in truth objectivity was nevertheless the keynote. After the passage quoted by Arden LJ, and references to a common understanding of there being some subjectivity in discussions of honesty and dishonesty, Lord Nicholls then changed tack completely and held the following, focusing on pure objectivity and speaking out clearly against form of subjectivity:

171 [2006] EWCA Civ 1492, [59a].

172 Ibid., [66].

173 [1995] 2 AC 378, 386.

However, these subjective characteristics of honesty do not mean that individuals are free to set their own standards of honesty in particular circumstances. The standard of what constitutes honest conduct is not subjective. Honesty is not an optional scale, with higher or lower values according to the moral standards of each individual. If a person knowingly appropriates another's property, he will not escape a finding of dishonesty simply because he sees nothing wrong in such behaviour.¹⁷⁴

It could not be plainer. Lord Nicholls was demanding a test which could not enable the defendant to use subjective standards of morality to excuse her from liability for conduct which would have been held to be dishonest by reference to objective standards of honesty.¹⁷⁵ It is only in the second passage quoted from Tan earlier in this chapter that Lord Nicholls unequivocally allowed a reference to personal attributes, intelligence and experience to be included in the court's analysis of the facts. Arden LJ appears to be engaging in the primarily subjective" reading of this passage but without reference to the remainder of the paragraph from which it is taken. This, it is suggested, is a good example of how a short phrase, or a sentence or a single concept in a judgment can acquire a life of its own through the work of judges in later cases, and often the entire context in which that concept was developed in the judgment is lost as a result.

20.2.6 The difficulty for judges at first instance in the light of the current state of the authorities

The different strands of authority: five different tests

As a result of the foregoing mass of authority, it is not an easy matter for a judge at first instance to decide a case relating to dishonest assistance. The instinct of any judge at first instance is to identify the facts: it must be remembered that the hearing at first instance is the trial and that any appellate court will rely on the facts which the trial judge finds by reference to the evidence submitted in court. Ordinarily, it is only the trial judge who hears the witnesses and who sees examination and cross-examination on their evidence. Therefore, a trial judge will tend to devote a large amount of her judgment to a finding of fact, but this in turn tends to mean that in dishonest assistance cases a large amount of attention is lavished on evidence as to the subjective motivations, beliefs, intelligence, experience and actual knowledge of the defendant. In relation to a strictly objective test, where all that one should consider is what an honest person would have done and not at all what the defendant subjectively thought or knew, this is largely irrelevant. As discussed above, what makes that 174 Ibid. [1995] 3 All ER 97, 106. Cf Walker v Stones [2001] QB 902. The last sentence contains an unfortunate reference to 'appropriation', whereas it is not necessary for the operation of the assistance liability that the defendant receive the property into his possession: the term 'appropriation' here should be read as referring to participation in the act of appropriation of property from the trust fund without passing possession or control of it to the defendant.

175 Arden LJ was therefore quoting a passage entirely out of the context of the opinion of Lord Nicholls in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan, an approach which has been approved by the Privy Council in Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust and notionally even by Arden LJ. It cannot be acceptable that a person escapes liability for dishonesty simply by claiming that she did not think what she did was dishonest. That may be sufficient to keep someone out of prison in the criminal law, but it is insufficient when a court is called upon to decide whether or not an objectively dishonest person should be required to compensate the victim of her actions in equity.

formulation of the objective test complicated, however, is that Lord Nicholls in Tan did refer (as considered above) to the defendant's knowledge, personal attributes and experience, which has sent judges in subsequent cases scurrying off to consider what the defendant's knowledge was, even though this is only a three-word construct in a much fuller judgment which otherwise was remarkably clear about its focus on objectivity.

Nevertheless, on the state of the authorities there are five possible, contradictory things that a trial judge may be looking for by reference to the current authorities. The following range of possibilities are suggested, inter alia, by Judge Strauss QC at first instance in Starglade v Nash.¹⁷⁶ This also serves as a useful summary of the foregoing discussion of the authorities:

- (1) In Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan, Lord Nicholls identified the test as being what an honest person would have done in the circumstances (where the circumstances are to be identified by reference to the facts available to the defendant¹⁷⁷). As is generally forgotten, the House of Lords in Dubai Aluminium v Salaam agreed with this approach.
- (2) In Twinsectra v Yardley in the House of Lords, Lord Hutton required both that the defendant's behaviour was dishonest by the standards of honest people and also that the defendant must be shown to have appreciated that her behaviour contravened ordinary standards of conduct (that is, that an honest person would have considered her behaviour to have been dishonest).
- (3) In Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust in the Privy Council, the Privy Council speaking through Lord Hoffmann explicitly re-interpreted Lord Hutton's speech (but it is not strictly open to the Privy Council to overrule the House of Lords) and found that a person may not escape liability for dishonesty by reference to some personal code of morality (and thus a failure to appreciate that her actions would have been considered to have been dishonest by reference to the standards of honest people). Instead, liability was to be decided by reference to the objective standards of honest people.
- (4) In Abou-Rahmah v Abacha, Arden LJ purported to accept the judgment of Lord Nicholls in Tan (after Twinsectra and Eurotrust) as constituting English law, although it is not clear that the rest of the Court of Appeal agreed with her as to the details, and it was not clear therefore whether Rix and Pill LJ should be taken to have required a subjective knowledge of one's own dishonesty.
- (5) In Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan, Lord Nicholls also referred to the defendant's personal attributes, experience and intelligence (in the second passage quoted above in the discussion of Tan) which was taken by Lord Clarke and by Smith J in A-G for Zambia v Mesai Care to elevate the examination of the defendant's knowledge, personal attributes, experience, intelligence and so forth (all of which are clearly subjective characteristics) to the same level in the analysis as an objective examination of what an honest person would have done. This approach has been followed in numerous other High Court and Court of Appeal cases which are considered in this section. What is difficult is that the second passage from the judgment of Lord Nicholls in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan has been elevated to the same status as the objective test in the remainder of the judgment. The concept of objective dishonesty is identified most clearly in these cases with the idea that a defendant may not escape liability by reference to a subjective moral code or other set of beliefs.

¹⁷⁶ [2009] EWHC 148 (Ch), [2010] WTLR 1267.

¹⁷⁷ By 'available' is meant things which were actually known and things which ought to have been known to someone who was not shutting her eyes to the obvious or who was not failing to make the inquiries which an honest person would have made.

Each of these tests is clearly subtly but importantly different. I really do empathise with trial judges in this context. In the following sections I consider some High Court cases decided since Abou-Rahmah v Abacha and the ways in which they have dealt with these difficulties. It is suggested, ultimately, that the approach which was accepted by the House of Lords in Dubai Aluminium v Salaam – approving Tan – should be accepted as the leading case: that approach is considered after the survey of these cases. First, however, to illustrate the differences, let us consider a hypothetical example and apply each of the five preceding approaches to it.

Eric overhears Stan and Kyle, two investment bankers, talking in loud, drunken voices about a 'secret deal' they will do the next day. They think they are alone in the train carriage. The deal is the announcement of a takeover of one company by another which no one in the market will know about before the next day at 10.00am. The share price of both companies will rise sharply when the news becomes public. Eric was brought up by his mother with one single motto, which she even wrote on his bedroom wall as a boy: 'Take any opportunity which comes along, no matter what the risk.' He had little formal education, little contact with other people, and had always been considered to be a liar at school. Eric's mother is also in need of an operation which can be performed quickly, so as to ease her suffering, only if Eric obtains £20,000. Eric buys shares in both companies at 9.00am the following day and then sells them at 11.00am and makes £20,000 profit.

Is Eric dishonest? Would your answer differ if you knew that Eric's actions would be a criminal offence under insider dealing legislation?

Let us take each of the five analyses one at a time.

- (1) Lord Nicholls in Tan would ask us to take the perspective of an honest person in this context. If Lord Nicholls took the view that profiting from a secret conversation like this was not something that an honest person would do, then Eric would be dishonest because he did not do what an honest person would have done.¹⁷⁸

178 In January 2012, the Financial Services Authority handed down a record £7.2 million fine for 'market abuse' violations (a regulatory penalty based on misuse of 'inside information' akin to insider trading) to David Einhorn, the manager of American hedge fund Greenlight Capital (worth $7 billion at the time), for selling more than 11.6 million shares in a company over four days after he had been told by a stockbroker advising that company the confidential information (which should not have been disclosed nor dealt on under market abuse regulation) that the company was going to issue a large number of new shares (which would have reduced the value of Einhorn's own shares). Einhorn protested that he had not understood the law in the UK (which is remarkable for a market professional of his experience), that the FSA had taken an odd interpretation of the regulations (even though there had been no change in the FSA's policy or regulations), and that Einhorn was in fact considered by people who worked with him to be a very ethical person. He launched a public relations offensive (in many senses of that term) in the press to recover his reputation: see, for example, 'The outsider who has run foul of the FSA', The Financial Times, 27 January 2012. Even a well-established market professional like Einhorn will seek to plead ignorance and innocence in relation to an activity which involves straightforwardly unethical conduct. See the many reports on this story at www.ft.com.

- (2) Lord Hutton in Twinsectra would require that Eric understood that honest people would consider his behaviour to have been dishonest. Here, Eric would say that his moral code (in the form of the motto given to him by his mother) led him to take this advantage and that he did not know what other people would think of his actions. In consequence, in spite of this being a criminal offence, he would escape liability for dishonesty.
- (3) The Privy Council in Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust would not allow Eric to rely on his own moral code to escape liability. It would also be necessary to show that ordinary standards of behaviour required Eric to have behaved differently. On that basis he would be likely to escape liability.
- (4) The Court of Appeal in Abou-Rahmah v Abacha would have required some subjective knowledge and awareness of his own dishonesty (on the formulation advanced by Rix LJ) before Eric would have been considered to be dishonest. Arden LJ would have followed Eurotrust but with an element of considering Eric's own knowledge.
- (5) The High Court decisions to follow would consider Eric's personal attributes (deceitfulness, concern for his mother), his experience (limited schooling, little contact with other people), and his intelligence, and bring those factors to bear alongside a consideration of ordinary standards of honest behaviour, although Eric would not be able to rely on his personal motto or other beliefs. Clearly, while this approach has an element of sounding like the test in Tan, it tends to bring into account a number of subjective factors (which Lord Nicholls did mention, once, in his own judgment). The decision in *Starglade Properties Ltd v Nash*¹⁷⁹ considered the defendant's lack of education and lack of understanding of legal concepts as being important. This last approach is considered in the discussion to follow.

The sections that follow consider some more recent decisions in the wake of Abou-Rahmah v Abacha which have experienced problems with the application of the various approaches set out above. There is one last point before turning to the many decisions which have come in the wake of Abou-Rahmah and which display a variety of these five analyses: the definition of concepts which are popularly known as 'sociopathology' (more formally encompassing antisocial personality disorders, and some bipolar disorder) in any authoritative reference work on psychiatry or psychopathology will define those terms as including such a person having no understanding of common standards of behaviour or social mores, and indeed as involving 'a pervasive pattern of disregard for the rights of others'.¹⁸⁰ Sociopaths are often charming and often driven towards achieving their goals, but they exhibit a disconnect from the feelings or beliefs of other people, and from social norms in general. It is suggested that any subjective test of dishonesty allows the defendant to escape liability on the basis that she did not understand that other people would consider her behaviour to run contrary to the generally accepted standards of conduct in society. Such a subjective test is therefore more likely to absolve sociopaths from liability. This is not meant to be a flippant point. There is nothing at all amusing about mental illness. However, the sort of behaviour which is excused by subjective tests for dishonesty would appear at face to encompass these sorts of disorders. It is too easy for a defendant to escape liability simply by saying that she had not realised that reasonable people would consider her actions to have been dishonest. In this way, the more immoral a defendant is, the less likely she is to be found dishonest because she will claim she was unaware of ordinary people's morality. The point that is being made here, at root, is that subjective tests seem to have lost their moral centre in that the defendant is to be judged only by reference to her own standards as opposed to objective standards which the law sets down. Objective tests maintain the moral status of the law in this area: to judge our actions.

179 [2010] EWCA Civ 1314.

180 See Carr and McNulty, 2006, for example.

AG Zambia v Meer Care & Desai: what to make of experience and knowledge?

A formulation of the test for dishonesty, which draws heavily on the second passage quoted earlier from the judgment of Lord Nicholls in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan, has been suggested by Sir Anthony Clarke MR in an article to the effect that the test is an objective one but that nevertheless the court should take into account the circumstances in which the defendant was acting and the level of experience which the defendant had. His Lordship suggested in that article as follows:

The test is an objective one, but an objective one which takes account of the individual in question's characteristics, experience, knowledge, etc.¹⁸¹ . . . It is a test which requires a court to assess an individual's conduct according to an objective standard of dishonesty. In doing so, a court has to take account of what the individual knew, his experience, intelligence and reasons for acting as he did. Whether the individual was aware that his conduct fell below the objective standard is not part of the test.¹⁸²

This approach is necessarily inserting some subjectivity into the test.¹⁸³ What is one supposed to do having decided that the defendant is 'experienced' and 'intelligent'? Presumably, an intelligent or experienced person is to be held liable because of their experience and intelligence, whereas the stupid and inexperienced are to escape liability because of their stupidity and inexperience, even if their actions would have been considered to be dishonest by honest and reasonable people.

The purpose of this area of law is to protect the position of beneficiaries of fiduciary arrangements: therefore the risk of the stupidity of third parties dealing with the trust is thrown onto the beneficiaries. That has never been the approach of equity. Nevertheless, in *AG Zambia v Meer Care & Desai & Others*¹⁸⁴ Peter Smith J held that this was the proper approach, and this approach was followed in Markel International Insurance Co Ltd v Surety Guarantee Consultants Ltd.¹⁸⁵ In reliance on Lord Clarke's article Peter Smith J constructed a peculiar test for dishonesty in Attorney General of Zambia v Meer Care &

181 It should be noted that these two things are mutually exclusive: how can an objective test consider subjective characteristics?

182 Clarke, 'Claims against professionals: negligence, dishonesty and fraud' [2006] 22 Professional Negligence 70–85.

183 This approach was followed by Peter Smith J in other judgments in JD Wetherspoon plc v Van de Berg & Co Ltd [2009] EWHC 639 (Ch), Peter Smith J, and Independent Trustee Services Ltd v GP Noble Trustees Ltd [2010] EWHC 1653 (Ch), Peter Smith J.

184 [2007] EWHC 952 (Ch).

185 [2008] EWHC 1135 (Comm), [2008] All ER (D) 10.

*Desai*¹⁸⁶ to the effect that it 'is essentially a question of fact whereby the state of mind of the Defendant had to be judged in the light of his subjective knowledge but by reference to an objective standard of honesty'¹⁸⁷ and that '[t]he test is clearly an objective test but the breach involves a subjective assessment of the person in question in the light of what he knew at the time as distinct from what a reasonable person would have known or appreciated'. However, if the test is an objective test then it definitively does not require questioning the defendant's subjective state of mind. What Smith J's test produces is a situation in which one asks whether or not the defendant was consciously (that is, subjectively) dishonest and then whether or not that can correlate with an objective standard of honesty. Quite how these subjective and objective concepts are to be brought together is unclear because they appear to be opposites.

If one nevertheless wants this sort of hybrid test to be the test in English law then one must stop pretending that one is applying an objective test of the sort set out by Lord Nicholls in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan or in Dubai Aluminium v Salaam, or by the Privy Council in Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust, as considered above. On appeal, the Court of Appeal in *Attorney General of Zambia v Meer Care & Desai*¹⁸⁸ observed Smith J's use of this odd test in relation to dishonest assistance but did not cite any of the House of Lords, Privy Council or even Court of Appeal decisions considered thus far in its own deliberations as to the nature of the liability, which is really quite odd. There are decisions of the High Court which purport to be using an objective test but which nevertheless cannot stop themselves from delving into the subjective state of the defendant's own attitudes, knowledge and beliefs. One such is Markel International, considered next.

Markel International Insurance Co Ltd v Surety Guarantee Consultants Ltd

In Markel International Insurance Co Ltd v Surety Guarantee Consultants Ltd the defendant contended that he was not dishonest because of the circumstances in which he was acting. Those circumstances were that he asked the experienced bond traders with whom he was dealing whether or not all was well with a series of bond transactions and contended that he was entitled simply to rely on their answers without considering the matter further himself. After all, they were the experts and he had asked their professional advice, and then acted on it. The defendant contended therefore that he had not been dishonest because he had relied on the answers given to his questions by the professionals whom he was entitled to trust with those transactions. It is suggested that the court's deliberations should be restricted to a question as to whether or not in those circumstances an honest person would have acted as the defendant acted. After Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust, it is definitively not a question as to whether or not the defendant subjectively appreciated that her own behaviour was dishonest according to social mores. Therefore, it is suggested that this should not be considered to be a third approach to the question of dishonesty at all, but rather that it should be considered to be necessarily a part of the question as to whether or not the defendant was dishonest by the lights of honest and reasonable people, as required by Lord Nicholls in Tan.

186 [2007] EWHC 952 (Ch).

187 Ibid, para [334].

188 [2008] EWCA Civ 1007, para [151] et seq. The Court of Appeal ultimately failed to find any dishonesty on the facts of the case.

Nevertheless, in Markel the judge, Tearse J, spent a large amount of the latter stages of his judgment considering what the defendant honestly thought and did not think, as opposed to deciding objectively what the judge considered an honest person would have thought. So, despite his Lordship's analysis of the law, his approach lapsed almost absent-mindedly into a subjective examination of the defendant's own state of mind.¹⁸⁹ In that judgment many pages were spent on analysing the appropriate objectivity of the test for dishonesty and then, remarkably enough, many more pages considering the evidence as to what the defendant subjectively thought. If the test is one of objective dishonesty, then it cannot matter at all what the defendant thought subjectively because objective dishonesty (as set out in Tan) requires asking only what an honest and reasonable person would have done in the circumstances.

Starglade v Nash: the dilemma of triangulating between objective standards and subjective qualities

The decision of Judge Strauss QC at first instance in *Starglade Properties Ltd v Nash*¹⁹⁰ is another not entirely satisfactory exposition of this test, which was in turn overturned as to its treatment of the facts of the case by the Court of Appeal.¹⁹¹ What emerges clearly from this case is that the position under English law remains confusing for judges at first instance: it is unclear whether Twinssectra in the House of Lords is to be followed or Eurotrust in the Privy Council which re-interprets Twinssectra; it is unclear whether Arden LJ in Abou-Rahmah was speaking alone, and whether the judgments of Rix and Pill LJ constitute the majority; and it is unclear whether references in the cases to the defendant's 'knowledge' are references to her general knowledge, intelligence and experience, or whether it is a reference only to a knowledge of the facts available to her at the time. Therefore it is unclear to what extent the 'knowledge' of the defendant should be included in the judge's survey of the facts.

In Starglade, Larkstore bought land from Starglade. Starglade had had an expert report prepared into the condition of the soil at the site from Technotrade: that report was negligently prepared and there was subsequently a landslide at the site after Larkstore had begun to develop it. Consequently, Larkstore was sued by third parties whose properties had been damaged by the landslide. Larkstore negotiated with Starglade that Starglade would assign the benefit of its contract with Technotrade to Larkstore so that Larkstore could recover the cost of compensating those third parties from Technotrade. Starglade drove a hard bargain and convinced Larkstore to agree to pay one half of any compensation acquired from Technotrade to Starglade. An agreement was drawn up to this effect, with a specific provision that all money received from Technotrade would be held on trust and then divided in 189 See, for example, ibid, para [209]: 'For these reasons I have reached the conclusion that he did not honestly believe that his conduct in signing bonds in excess of the stated limits was justifiable' and more generally the defendant's motive in taking this role that he wanted 'a quiet life': none of this can matter because all that matters is what an honest person would have done in the circumstances. Elsewhere in the same case, where two other defendants were demonstrated to have assisted a breach of a company's fiduciary duties dishonestly (without there being any real question that they had been dishonest on any basis), then those two defendants were held liable for 'knowingly assisting' [sic] the beneficiary of that fiduciary relationship; see para [237].

190 [2009] EWHC 148 (Ch), [2010] WTLR 1267. This case was followed in Adelaide Partnerships Ltd v Danison [2011] All ER (D) 01 (Mar).

191 [2010] EWCA Civ 1314.

equal shares. However, when this money (over £300,000) was received, Larkstore paid it out to its ordinary creditors and did not pay anything to Starglade. Among the creditors who received money was Mr Nash. Mr Nash had seen the terms of the agreement between Starglade and Larkstore but it was found by Strauss QC that he was not an educated man, that he had not understood what a trust was, that he had thought that a company was entitled to use its money to pay its creditors in any way that it wished,¹⁹² and that therefore he had not known that there was a trust. Nevertheless, Starglade sued Mr Nash for dishonest assistance in the breach of trust committed by Larkstore in paying money out of a trust fund to people who were not entitled to it.

Judge Strauss QC considered himself caught between the competing authorities, as set out above. Nevertheless, his Lordship spent the entirety of the judgment before the fifty-fourth paragraph dealing with entirely subjective characteristics of Mr Nash's personality, experience, intelligence and attitude to the transaction in front of him. It is only in that fifty-fourth paragraph that Strauss QC addressed the notion of what ordinary mores would have required of Mr Nash, before deciding that what Mr Nash had done in this context, given that most people would not have known that a company could not pay its creditors in any order it saw fit, did not traduce ordinary standards of behaviour. His Lordship then held that in his view Mr Nash had not considered that ordinary people would have considered his behaviour to have been dishonest. Of particular interest is Strauss QC's elision of Lord Nicholls's idea of the defendant's knowledge with the more general idea expressed by Lord Clarke and Smith J that the defendant's knowledge includes his subjective knowledge, intelligence and experience. Oddly, Strauss QC considers these to be 'part of the same' concept of knowledge, even though the latter form is clearly subjective whereas the former was avowedly objective.

On appeal, in Starglade v Nash in the Court of Appeal,¹⁹³ the Chancellor held the following:

There is a single standard of honesty objectively determined by the court. That standard is applied to specific conduct of a specific individual possessing the knowledge and qualities he actually enjoyed.¹⁹⁴

This clearly takes the objective standard and makes it subjective in effect by limiting the 'objectively honest person' to a person who is subjectively the same as the defendant. Then the Chancellor held further that:

There is no suggestion in any of the speeches in Twinssectra Ltd v Yardley that the standard of dishonesty is flexible or determined by any one other than by the court on an objective basis having regard to the ingredients of the combined test explained by Lord Hutton.¹⁹⁵

192 Strauss QC admitted that he believed this to be the case, even though there is clear authority to the contrary, and entirely overlooking the fact that a company acting as trustee cannot pay trust property to third parties without committing a breach of trust.

193 [2010] EWCA Civ 1314, at [25]. Followed in Secretary of State for Justice v Topland Group plc [2011] EWHC 983 (QB), King J. See also Fiona Trust & Holding Corporation v Privalov [2010] EWHC 3199 (Comm), at [1437], per Andrew Smith J.

194 Starglade v Nash [2010] EWCA Civ 1314, [25]. Followed in Secretary of State for Justice v Topland Group plc [2011] EWHC 983 (QB), King J.

195 Starglade v Nash [2010] EWCA Civ 1314, [28].

Therefore, the law is returned to the position under Twinsectra, in spite of the decision in Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust. His Lordship then held:

The relevant standard, described variously in the statements I have quoted, is the ordinary standard of honest behaviour. Just as the subjective understanding of the person concerned as to whether his conduct is dishonest is irrelevant so also is it irrelevant that there may be a body of opinion which regards the ordinary standard of honest behaviour as being set too high. Ultimately, in civil proceedings, it is for the court to determine what that standard is and to apply it to the facts of the case.¹⁹⁶

What we have, ultimately, then, is a recognition that it is a question for the court to decide on a case-by-case basis what the appropriate standard is, while triangulating between the need to understand the inflexible ‘ordinary standards of honest behaviour’ and the need to ignore ‘the subjective understanding’ of the defendant while nevertheless considering his ‘knowledge and qualities’. All of this is conceptually incoherent unless one takes a pure objective approach to the root concepts in Tan and in Eurotrust.

Aerostar Maintenance International Ltd v Wilson: standing in the defendant’s shoes

The following useful summary of the principles has been set out in Aerostar Maintenance International Ltd v Wilson by Morgan J:

The test as to dishonesty, distilled from the above authorities,¹⁹⁷ is as follows. Dishonesty is synonymous with a lack of probity. It means not acting as an honest person would in the circumstances. The standard is an objective one. The application of the standard requires one to put oneself in the shoes of the defendant to the extent that his conduct is to be assessed in the light of what he knew at the relevant time, as distinct from what a reasonable person would have known or appreciated. For the most part dishonesty is to be equated with conscious impropriety. But a person is not free to set his own standard of honesty. This is what is meant by saying that the standard is objective. If by ordinary objective standards the defendant’s mental state would be judged to be dishonest, it is irrelevant that the defendant has adopted a different standard or can see nothing wrong in his behaviour.¹⁹⁸

In that case the defendant had expressed his view in e-mails that he considered his actions in ‘doing the dirty’ on a woman to be acceptable because she in turn had ‘done the dirty’ on someone else: as such, he considered his behaviour to have been justifiable. Nevertheless, it was held that his behaviour had been objectively dishonest and therefore his actions, even if ¹⁹⁶ Ibid. [32].

¹⁹⁷ Those authorities were: the decision of the Privy Council in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378, the decision of the House of Lords in Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley [2002] 2 AC 164 and the decision of the Privy Council in Barlow Clowes International Ltd v Eurotrust International Ltd [2006] 1 WLR 1476. And in his Lordship’s opinion, correctly, ‘the two decisions of the Privy Council represent the law to be applied in this jurisdiction: see Abou-Rahmah v Abacha [2007] 1 All ER (Comm) 827 at [66]–[70]’.

¹⁹⁸ [2010] EWHC 2032 (Ch), at [184].

justifiable subjectively in his own mind, were dishonest.¹⁹⁹ That much is unobjectionable. What is difficult, however, is the concept suggested by Morgan J of ‘putting oneself in the shoes of the defendant’. This is a concept about which one must be careful. By definition one person’s shoes will not fit everyone in the world: fitting into a person’s shoes is a very subjective activity – given the idiosyncrasies of length and width of foot, and taste in shoes – and is the antithesis of an objective approach where one size must necessarily fit all. To assess the situation while standing in the defendant’s shoes necessarily involves a large amount of subjectivity. The objective test set out in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan requires, it is suggested, that one must consider the circumstances in which that reasonable person must be acting (for example, that they were a solicitor of 30 years’ experience who had received a suspicious e-mail) but not about any of that person’s own moral code (for example, that they believed their clients were all liars and so were ripe for being the victims of theft). After all, in Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust it was held that:

The reference to ‘what he knows would offend normally accepted standards of honest conduct’ meant only that his knowledge of the transaction had to be such as to render his participation contrary to normally acceptable standards of honest conduct.²⁰⁰

And further:

Although a dishonest state of mind is a subjective mental state, the standard by which the law determines whether it is dishonest is objective. If by ordinary standards a defendant’s mental state would be characterised as dishonest, it is irrelevant that the defendant judges by different standards.²⁰¹

Therefore, even though the question of whether or not a person is being dishonest can only be proved with absolute certainty from within that person’s mind, the law can only judge a person’s actions objectively from the standpoint of what a person ought to have done in the circumstances of any given case. The court ought not to be standing in the defendant’s shoes.²⁰²

20.2.7 Dishonesty, the provision of professional services and negligence

The distinction between dishonesty and negligence in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan

In his judgment in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan,²⁰³ Lord Nicholls recognised that there is only a thin line between dishonest assistance and negligence, particularly in contexts in which the trustees are professionals, tendering their services under contract. In such a situation, it is possible that the same person might be liable for breach of contract, for breach of a duty of 199 Ibid, [185].

200 [2006] 1 WLR 1476, [15].

201 Ibid, [10].

202 It is often said that, so as to empathise with another person’s situation, you should ‘walk a mile in their shoes’. The only difficulty with that idea being that you will be a mile away and they will not have any shoes.

203 [1995] 3 All ER 97, 108.

care (that is, the tort of negligence) and for breach of trust in a situation in which there has been a breach of a trust. However, liability in equity rests on the dishonesty of the assistant, and it is not enough that they have been negligent or that they have breached a contract. Given what has been said thus far in this section, it is still somewhat surprising that in *Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley*²⁰⁴ a solicitor was able to contend that he did not consider his actions to be dishonest even though those actions constituted a breach of trust and a breach of the original solicitor's undertaking. There is only a narrow line here between common law negligence and dishonesty sufficient to found liability for an equitable wrong. The solicitor would appear to have been negligent in considering that paying money to Yardley which was only to have been used for the purpose of acquiring good title in property was something which could have been done lawfully. Potentially, Leach's liability at common law might also have been a tortious procuring of a breach of Sims's undertaking to Twinsectra.

The jump to liability for dishonest assistance is a significant one. One might have thought that the professional nature of a solicitor's role and the reliance placed by Twinsectra on the undertakings given to it by the solicitor Sims might raise the presumption that an honest person would have expected a solicitor in Leach's position to consider properly the nature of his obligations both to his client, Yardley, and to the lender, Twinsectra, who had paid the loan moneys into trust subject to a solicitor's undertaking. The solicitor, Leach, is considered by the House of Lords to be entitled to restrict his liability to common law claims in tort on the basis that his own lack of diligence as a solicitor failed to bring to his conscious mind the self-evident fact that if he paid the money to Yardley, he would be breaching the fiduciary obligations owed by Sims to Twinsectra – particularly given that those fiduciary obligations could be said to have been passed to him when he assumed Sims's role as Yardley's solicitor. This, it is suggested, weakens markedly the nature of a solicitor's fiduciary duties and also returns us to that form of thinking so evident in cases like Armitage v Nurse,²⁰⁵ whereby trustees are ever more capable of reducing their liabilities as trustees by reference to contractual exemption clauses, or the terms of their retainers, or (it appears) their own ignorance of their responsibilities under professional transactions.

By contrast, in *Walker v Stones*²⁰⁶ it was held that where a trainee solicitor committed a breach of trust which no reasonable trainee solicitor could have considered to have been in the interests of the beneficiaries, that trainee solicitor should be deemed to have acted dishonestly. It is suggested that this approach demonstrates a more sensitive appreciation of the nature of the reliance which is placed not only upon a solicitor's good faith, but also upon her competence and her observance of the regulatory norms which bind her legal practice. Where such a solicitor, even during training, commits a breach of trust which is not in the interests of the beneficiaries of a trust, the proper approach must be that that person owes a duty to account to those beneficiaries who suffer a loss as a result of that breach of trust.

204 [2002] 2 All ER 377.

205 [1998] Ch 241; see para 21.2 below.

206 [2001] QB 902, at 903.

The meaning of 'dishonesty' in other contexts relating to professionals

In *Bryant v Law Society*²⁰⁷ an interesting example of the test of 'dishonesty' arose before the Divisional Court in relation to two solicitors who were involved, in contravention of the Law Society's regulatory system on money laundering and other fraudulent transactions, in what was allegedly professional misconduct involving dishonesty. The solicitors' clients organised for large payments to be made through their solicitors, instead of through a bank as the parties' contracts required, without the solicitors asking any questions of their clients. The circumstances of the payments bore all the hallmarks of money laundering and were exactly the sort of transactions described as being prohibited in the relevant Law Society circulars. The criminal law test of dishonesty set out famously in *R v Ghosh*²⁰⁸ requires first that one identifies what is objectively dishonest, and secondly that one asks whether or not the defendant was aware that her conduct was dishonest. In Bryant v Law Society one of the solicitors in question suggested that he honestly believed that what he was doing was honest and reasonable. The court considered that the test of 'dishonesty' to be applied by the tribunal was a test which took into account the solicitor's own perspective on what was honest. The solicitors were found, on the application of the subjective test, nevertheless to have committed professional misconduct.

The question remains as to the operation of this test in the abstract. As with Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust, what of the situation in which the professional contends that her behaviour was subjectively reasonable and honest? The concern must be that because the defendant was so anti-social as to have an inappropriate sense of the proprieties of life and thus to have a personal morality which meant that she considered her objectively dishonest behaviour to be subjectively honest, then she would escape liability. What the court should have found in Bryant was that because this person (by his own admission) had failed to observe the requirements of proper behaviour then he should be held liable for dishonesty. In Twins v Yardley the majority of the House of Lords excused a solicitor from liability on the basis that it was a serious thing to condemn a professional man for dishonesty if he had not appreciated subjectively that that would be considered to be the case; in Bryant v Law Society the court expressed concern at the notion that a solicitor might otherwise be subjected to liability when he might not have realised that his actions would have been considered to have been dishonest by honest people. A better approach, it is suggested, would be to hold professional people (above all others) to an objective standard of honest behaviour. Professional people acting in their professional capacity should be expected to be rational and compliant with the appropriate professional ethics and regulatory rulebooks in the conduct of their duties. To excuse them on the basis of their imperfect understanding of what other people expect is for the law to demonstrate a sort of moral cowardice.

In essence, Bryant and Twins are cases involving professionals who have been accused of dishonesty in breaches of their fiduciary duties and whom the courts have sought to excuse from liability on the basis that the effects of a finding of dishonesty on such a professional would be profoundly damaging to their careers, instead of recognising that professionals ought properly to be held to a higher standard or at least to the standards contained in any professional regulations which bind them; and by inquiring into evidence as to what the defendant must subjectively have believed in the context, as opposed to focusing solely on what an honest person would have done objectively in those circumstances.

207 [2009] 1 WLR 163.

208 [1982] QB 1053.

This urge to protect professional people on account of their own moral weakness must stop. Leaving the criminal context aside for a moment, the question for private law is to identify what the law considers to be honest in the abstract (that is, objectively) and then to measure individual defendants up against that standard. One of the principal roles of law is to judge. Another role (of property law and contract law in particular) is to offer models to the citizenry by reference to which they can organise their communal activities. In either event, the role of the law is to judge which structures and activities are worthy of the support of law and which are not. Therefore, the law does not need to pander to the subjective standards of honesty and dishonesty of any individual defendant. Instead, the law stands in judgment over them. It is a matter for the criminal law to decide how squeamish it is about criminalising people who did not realise that ordinary decent people would have considered their behaviour to be dishonest, but there is no reason why anyone (solicitor or not) should escape liability to compensate a claimant under private law simply because they were similarly unconscious of the standards of the society around them. Ignorance of the law is generally considered to be no defence; so why should ignorance of the standards of honest conduct be a defence? This urge to require that the defendant must realise that what she was doing was contrary to social mores is weak-kneed liberalism of the most obvious kind. Liberalism is tolerant and open-minded; it is therefore weak when it is confronted by people who simply refuse to play the game, to recognise ordinary standards of common decency, and so forth. So, instead of condemning people who would be thought dishonest by the reasonable person, liberalism of this weak sort excuses them from liability if they had failed to notice what was evident to honest people and apologises for having troubled them. Our private law should condemn such people so as to protect those objective standards simply for the ethical imperative of preventing unconscionable benefit being taken from inappropriate behaviour and also pour encourager les autres.

20.2.8 Investment, risk-taking and dishonesty

Lord Nicholls expanded his discussion of ‘dishonesty’ to consider the taking of risk. Risk is expressly encompassed within the new test. Lord Nicholls held:

All investment involves risk. Imprudence is not dishonesty, although imprudence may be carried recklessly to lengths which call into question the honesty of the person making the decision. This is especially so if the transaction serves another purpose in which that person has an interest of his own.²⁰⁹

Therefore, an investment advisor who is employed by the trust could be liable for ‘dishonesty’ if she advises the trust to take a risk which is considered by the court to have been a reckless risk. The thinking is that if X advises the trustees to take a risk which is objectively too great, then X could be considered to have been dishonest in giving that advice. Lord Nicholls also considered that if that advisor took a fee or had some other stake in the transaction, then the likelihood of being found to have been dishonest increases. The basis of liability is that a third party 'takes a risk that a clearly unauthorised transaction will not cause loss . . . If the risk materialises and causes loss, those who knowingly took the risk will be accountable accordingly'.²¹⁰ For these purposes it is said that 'fraud includes taking a risk to the prejudice of another's rights, which risk is known to be one which there is no right to take'.²¹¹ Therefore, there is enormous potential liability in respect of advisors who advise trustees in any matter to do with investment or the treatment of their property.

209 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378, 387.

There is a difference where there is doubt whether the risk is authorised or not. In situations where an investment advisor retained by the trustees is unsure whether or not an investment is encompassed by the investment powers of the trust, the issue arises whether or not the investment advisor is acting dishonestly. The question is then how to deal with matters of degree relating to the authority of trustees and third parties.

In Lord Nicholls's opinion, it will be obvious in most cases whether or not a proposed transaction would offend the normal standards of honest conduct. It is suggested that this does not help us towards an understanding of how far this new test for dishonesty extends. Similarly, it does not help us to understand how a test for dishonesty is necessarily more certain than a test based on unconscionability, as suggested by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC.²¹²

Lord Nicholls's position can be criticised on two levels. The first is that the test for 'dishonesty' relies upon an artificial rendering of the word 'dishonesty' which is not necessarily comprehensible to a third party or a trustee. The second is that it does not cover the situation where the investment decision being made is in itself risky. An investment decision taken to achieve the best return for the trust will necessarily involve a higher level of risk than an investment which restricts its exposure to a risk level and a rate of return which is below the market average. There is no obvious distinction here between a risky investment which is authorised and an equally risky investment which is probably unauthorised.²¹³

Dishonesty therefore encompasses a level of risk which the court considers to be too great. Thus, an accessory may be liable where the risk taken was in furtherance of a contractual obligation to invest property and manage its level of risk. The court might consider that risk to be too great. Whereas the market might consider a particular investment to be standard practice, and even advisable in many circumstances, a court may nevertheless decide subsequently that the very fact that such an investment caused a large loss meant that the risk posed by that investment must have been too great. On the basis that it is the court's decision on the level of risk that counts, it is therefore difficult to counsel an investment advisor as to the approach to be taken to the investment of trust property.

It is not a failure to ascertain whether or not the investment is in breach of trust which is decisive of the matter, but rather whether or not the level of risk assumed is in breach of trust. His Lordship tells us that 'honesty is an objective standard'. Therefore, it is for the court to

210 Ibid.

211 Ibid.

212 [1996] AC 669.

213 See Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, Sweet & Maxwell, 2009, Ch 8.

measure the level of risk and, consequently, the honesty of the third party. The outcome would seem to depend upon ‘the circumstances known to the third party at the time’, which necessarily imports a subjective element. However, recklessness as to the ability of the trust to invest must similarly be a factor to be taken into account in deciding on the honesty of the third party investment manager.

It does appear that the range of matters brought within the ambit of dishonest assistance (dishonesty, recklessness, inappropriate risk-taking and fraud) points towards the creation of a general test of unconscionability, despite Lord Nicholls’s express assertion that this was not the case. The example of an investment advisor who is ‘dishonest’ on this technical meaning, while only actually being reckless as to the form of the investment, could be described as acting unconscionably, given the nature of his client. The test for ‘dishonesty’ that covers such a context, to use Lord Nicholls’s own words, ‘means something different’ from the natural use of ‘dishonesty’. A better approach, it is suggested, might be to admit that the test is really one of unconscionability, and thus to bring the issue back within the more formal ambit of constructive trusts as defined by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC.²¹⁴ See the discussion in section 20.3.5 on a similar issue.

Procedural questions in relation to pleading dishonest assistance

There have been cases in which the courts have been prepared to accept that a claim for dishonest assistance may be made out even if imperfectly pleaded if the pleaded facts disclose a sufficient suggestion of dishonest assistance.²¹⁵

20.2.9 The nature of the remedy

The defendant will be personally liable to account as a constructive trustee to the beneficiaries for any loss suffered by the breach of trust. This liability is based on the defendant’s dishonesty in assisting the breach of trust. It is based on compensating the beneficiaries’ loss. It is not concerned to subtract an unjust enrichment from the defendant. The nature of the remedy is considered in further detail below in section 20.7.1.

An argument that there is a proprietary claim arising from dishonest assistance

The remedy for dishonest assistance has been expressed by some judges as being either compensation for a loss caused as a result of a breach of trust or as a requiring an account for any profit made by the defendant.²¹⁶ This is a confusion into which we must not allow ourselves to fall. A remedy based on an account of profits will only ever be applicable in cases in which profits have been made; otherwise the remedy of personal liability to account as a dishonest assistant is predicated on the need to compensate a beneficiary for a loss resulting from a breach of trust, and so is not predicated on the defendant having earned profits. If the defendant was a fiduciary and if she earned unauthorised profits, then she would be required to account for those profits by holding those profits on constructive trust, as was discussed in Chapter 12.²¹⁷ This is a proprietary claim. By contrast, claims for dishonest assistance in a breach of trust are focused on a personal liability to account for the loss suffered by the beneficiaries as a result of the breach of trust with which the defendant assisted dishonestly. It may be that the same set of facts may give rise both to a remedy for dishonest assistance and to a proprietary constructive trust based on the unconscionable action of the defendant, demonstrated by her dishonesty, in relation to the trust property. This proprietary constructive trust could be based either on an action in tracing (considered in Chapter 19) or on the imposition of a constructive trust further to the general principle in *Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington*²¹⁸ against unconscionable misuse of property or on the basis that the defendant became trustee de son tort: but that constructive trust will only arise if the defendant still has some identifiable property in her possession. The remedy of personal liability to account as a result of dishonest assistance is a personal liability to account for the loss caused by the breach of trust (that is, a liability to compensate the beneficiaries for their loss flowing from the breach of trust). Therefore, the remedy stemming from dishonest assistance is a personal claim, and therefore any proprietary claim must be based on the principles set out under those other doctrines in other chapters of this book.

²¹⁴ Ibid.

²¹⁵ Caring Together Ltd (in liquidation) v Bauso [2006] EWHC 2345 (Ch), Briggs J.

²¹⁶ Yugraneft v Abramovich [2008] EWHC 2613 (Comm), [2008] All ER (Comm) 299, para [392], per Clarke J: citing Fyffes Group v Templeman [2000] Lloyd’s Rep 643; Ultraframe (UK) Ltd v Fielding [2005] EWHC 1638.

So, while dishonest assistance clearly does give rise to a purely personal remedy, the jargon of ‘constructive trusteeship’ causes confusion for some people. In the decision of Rimer J in *Sinclair Investment Holdings SA v Versailles Trade Finance Ltd (No 3)*²¹⁹ issues arose as to the precise nature of dishonest assistance as the result of a complex fraud. In essence, the claimant was induced to investment money in V Ltd as a result of fraudulent misrepresentations made by Cushnie and others as the directing minds of V Ltd to people who advised the claimant. V Ltd was a company which was part of the Versailles group of companies comprising many of the defendant companies. Fraud was found on the part of Cushnie and others in earlier litigation.²²⁰ The issue in this instance was whether or not the claimant could establish a proprietary right over a house in Kensington acquired by the defendants’ group of companies which was occupied by Cushnie. Cushnie was alleged to have been a dishonest assistant in a breach of fiduciary obligations by V Ltd in yet more, earlier litigation (Sinclair v Versailles Trade Finance Ltd (No 2)).²²¹ In the current litigation, two points were found. First, on the facts, Cushnie did not ever form a fiduciary relationship with the claimant because he did not deal directly with or for the claimant (but that is not a key issue here). Secondly, (which is an issue here) the claimant sought to argue that if Cushnie was a dishonest assistant then he ought to be required to hold property bought for him by companies in the Versailles group of companies on constructive trust for the claimant. It was held by Rimer J that being a dishonest assistant meant that one was responsible for paying ‘equitable compensation’ to the claimant beneficiary of the fiduciary arrangement, 217 Section 12.5.

218 [1996] AC 669.

219 [2007] EWHC 915 (Ch), 10 ITELR 58.

220 On the course of the litigation, see [2005] EWCA Civ 722, [2006] 1 BCLC 60 where the Court of Appeal refused to strike this case out as disclosing no cause of action with a reasonable prospect of success.

221 [2006] EWHC 573 (Ch).

but that did not mean that one became a trustee of any property for the claimant. The purpose of the remedy of account as a constructive trustee for dishonest assistance is only to make the dishonest assistant personally liable to compensate the beneficiaries for the loss which they have suffered as a result of the breach of trust.

There may be an argument for saying that, if the defendant had the traceable proceeds of trust property in her possession, then she should be liable to hold that property on constructive trust for the claimant. However, importantly, a dishonest assistant is not required to have trust property nor its traceable proceeds in her possession at any stage to be liable as a dishonest assistant: rather, the liability is based entirely on the wrong of assisting the breach of trust. So dishonest assistance is not a proprietary remedy.

When it is said that one is a 'constructive trustee' that does not mean that one becomes a trustee of any property; instead it means that one is treated as being liable to the beneficiaries to account to the beneficiaries for the loss suffered by the trust, just as if one were an express trustee liable under Target Holdings v Redferns. Therefore, one is not construed to be the trustee of identified property; rather, one is construed to be personally liable in the same way that an express trustee would have been personally liable for the breach. Hence Edmund-Davies LJ's view that this is really just 'a formula for equitable relief' (that is, this is a justification for imposing liability on a person who assists the breach of trust). Therefore, we could say that it is an actionable wrong in equity for a person to assist a breach of trust.

20.3 UNCONSCIONABLE RECEIPT

Where a person receives trust property in the knowledge that that property has been passed to her in breach of trust, the recipient will be personally liable to account to the trust for the value of the property passed away. A person is taken to have received property when it comes under her possession or control. The test for whether or not a defendant had the requisite knowledge requires that the defendant had one of the following three states of mind: actual knowledge of the breach of trust, or a wilful failure to make the inquiries which an honest and reasonable person would have made, or having wilfully shut her eyes to the obvious. A recent line of cases has required that the defendant will be liable for knowing receipt only if she has received property unconscionably, and therefore the detailed test of knowledge is being qualified. There was also a line of cases which suggested that the test should be a test of dishonesty. It is a defence to demonstrate the receipt was authorised under the terms of the trust, or that the recipient has lawfully changed his position in reliance on the receipt of the property.

20.3.1 Introduction

The second category of personal liability to account concerns strangers who receive some trust property when it has been transferred away in breach of trust. This has been described as a receipt-based claim analogous to equitable compensation.²²² This doctrine was referred to as 'knowing receipt' throughout the 20th century, although a line of cases in the 21st century has inserted a requirement that a defendant's behaviour in relation to the receipt of property must have been ‘unconscionable’ into the doctrine, and in consequence the doctrine is referred to here as ‘unconscionable receipt’. Such unconscionability, as will emerge from the discussion to follow, will involve knowledge of the circumstances surrounding the breach of trust. In essence, the doctrine operates as follows:

²²² El Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings [1993] 3 All ER 717; appealed [1994] 2 All ER 685.

Where a person knowingly receives trust property which has been transferred away from the trust or otherwise misapplied, and where that person has acted unconscionably, then that person will incur a personal liability to account as a constructive trustee to the beneficiaries of that trust for the amount of their loss.²²³

As Morritt V-C put it: ‘[a] claim for “knowing receipt” is parasitic on a claim for breach of trust in the sense that it cannot exist in the absence of the breach of trust from which the receipt originated.’²²⁴ Once a breach of trust has been proved, it is incumbent on the claimant to demonstrate that the defendant had the requisite knowledge²²⁵ and that the defendant acted unconscionably.²²⁶ Whether or not there has been receipt will generally be decided in accordance with the rules for tracing claims.²²⁷

The current case law on unconscionable receipt is set out in the discussion to follow in the following structure. First, a consideration of the competing authorities on what constitutes ‘receipt’. Second, because the concept of unconscionable receipt still includes a concept of ‘knowledge’, there is an examination of the authorities on knowledge. Third, an analysis of the change effected to the law by the introduction of the concept of ‘unconscionability’. Fourth, a consideration of a line of cases applying a test of dishonesty to the receipt-based claim, and an explanation of how those cases correlate with the concept of unconscionable receipt.

20.3.2 The nature of ‘receipt’

The first question is what actions will constitute ‘receipt’ under this category. In the decision of Millett J in Agip v Jackson,²²⁸ it was held that: ‘... there is receipt of trust property when a company’s funds are misapplied by any person whose fiduciary position gave him control of them or enabled him to misapply them.’ Therefore, a person receives trust property if she takes that property under her control or takes it into her possession. The cases are not precise in defining the manner in which the property must be ‘received’. Seemingly, it is enough that the property passes through the stranger’s hands, even if the stranger never had the rights of an equitable or common law owner of the property. Lack of proof of receipt will prevent a claim for knowing receipt being commenced, such a claim will be struck out.²²⁹ For example, a bank through which payments are made appears to be capable of being accountable for 223 This summary is the author’s own. It is culled from the principles set out in the cases to follow in the text.

224 Charter plc and another v City Index Ltd [2006] EWHC 2508 (Ch), [2007] 1 WLR 26.

225 Polly Peck International v Nadir (No 2) [1992] 4 All ER 769, 777, per Scott LJ.

226 Charter plc and another v City Index Ltd [2006] EWHC 2508 (Ch), [2007] 1 WLR 26.

227 El Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings [1993] BCLC 735, [1993] 3 All ER 717 and also in Chapter 19.

228 Agip v Jackson [1990] Ch 265, 286, per Millett J, [1991] Ch 547, CA.

229 Fraser v Oystertec [2004] EWHC 2225 (Ch); see also Compagnie Noga D’Importation et D’Exportation v Abacha [2004] EWHC 2601 (Comm).

knowing receipt of money paid in breach of trust.²³⁰ Once money is paid into a person's bank account, then the owner of that bank account will have received that money; or alternatively the bank may be considered to 'own' the money, subject to a debt in that amount owed to the account holder.²³¹ Equally, using another person's property to pay off one's own debts constitutes receipt of that other person's property.²³² More evidently, where consignments of hazelnuts, which had been appropriated in breach of trust, were delivered to the defendant and placed knowingly in storage by the defendant, that would constitute receipt.²³³

Issues with the notion of 'receipt'

A much cited test for what constitutes 'receipt' in this context is that set out by Hoffmann LJ in El Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings:²³⁴ but it was in different terms from that set out by Millett J (above) because it included taking trust property or the traceable proceeds of the trusts property into one's possession or under one's control:

For this purpose the plaintiff must show, first, a disposal of his assets in breach of fiduciary duty; secondly, the beneficial receipt by the defendant of assets which are traceable as representing the assets of the plaintiff; and thirdly, knowledge on the part of the defendant that the assets he received are traceable to a breach of fiduciary duty.

A number of problems arise with this formulation. First, the circumstances of the receipt do not require 'a disposal of his assets in breach of fiduciary duty' but rather there must have been property (not necessarily an 'asset'²³⁵) passed away in breach of fiduciary duty. The action need not be brought by the owner of the asset, for example the action may be brought by a beneficiary under an open-ended discretionary trust or by a shareholder bringing a derivative action on behalf of a company may be the plaintiff: neither would necessarily be said to be acting in relation to 'his assets' as an owner because the company owns its own property and the object of an open-ended discretionary trust may not have any proprietary rights until property is appointed to her. Secondly, interestingly, on Hoffmann LJ's formulation the defendant does not need to receive the original trust property but rather may receive other property provided that that other property constitutes the traceable proceeds of trust property. So, for example, if a painting was held on trust and that painting was sold in breach of trust, then receipt of the sale proceeds would constitute receipt of the traceable proceeds of the breach of trust because that money was derived from the original painting. Thirdly, it is problematic that there must be 'beneficial receipt' of the property because that would be to suggest that the recipient must become the owner of the property in equity; whereas the formulation by Millett J (quoted at the start of this section) is founded on the basis that the 230 Polly Peck International v Nadir (No 2) [1992] 3 All ER 769.

231 Ibid; Versailles Trade Finance Ltd v Artagent Ltd [2004] All ER (D) 318.

232 MT Realisations Ltd v Digital Equipment Co Ltd [2003] 2 BCLC 117.

233 Bank of Tokyo-Mitsubishi Ltd v Baskan Gida [2004] EWHC 945 (Ch), [2004] 2 Lloyd's Rep 395.

234 [1994] 2 All ER 685, 700; cited with approval in Charter plc v City Index Ltd [2007] 1 WLR 26, 31, per Morritt C.

235 One can, after all, own a tax loss, or own a chose in action which is currently generating a loss but which may yet show a profit (as with an interest rate swap).

defendant need only take the property under her control or into her possession. Acquiring control or possession of property does not make a person the owner of that property necessarily. This latter approach has the advantage of broadening the scope of liability to include people who knowingly pass property between themselves but in a way that ensures that they never acquire property rights in it.

Thus, it is suggested, Millett J correctly extended the ambit of liability to any person who commits the equitable wrong of taking property into her possession, for example as part of a money laundering scheme where property is put beyond the reach of its true beneficial owner. It is only under Millett J's formulation that all persons 'knowingly' and 'unconscionably' involved in the breach of trust can be held liable for knowing receipt. Strictly, if property were stolen from a trust and passed to the defendant, then the defendant could not become beneficially entitled to the stolen trust property²³⁶ and so on Hoffmann LJ's formulation could never strictly found liability for knowing receipt, which cannot be correct.

In *Uzinterimpex JSC v Standard Bank plc*²³⁷ the authorities relating to knowing receipt of money paid through a bank account were considered. On the facts it was held that when money was paid into an account, the entity holding that account had no knowledge of any breach of duty which would have made it unconscionable to deal with that money in accordance with the terms of its contractual obligations and therefore that it was not liable to account for knowing receipt. It was important to know whether or not the defendant had received the property. One key distinction which was made on those facts was whether or not the person holding the account was acting merely as an agent for others (that is, that it was acting in a 'ministerial capacity') or whether it had received the property in a beneficial capacity: it was held that holding the property simply as an agent would have suggested that the defendant ought not to be liable for knowing receipt because there would not have been appropriate receipt of the property because the receipt was only as agent.²³⁸ However, it is suggested that if the test for receipt is simply whether or not property has passed into the defendant's possession or control then it ought not to matter whether or not the defendant acquired beneficial rights in that money or took it under his control merely as an agent: instead, the focus should be on whether or not that receipt was coupled with the appropriate knowledge of the breach of trust.

20.3.3 The nature of 'unconscionability' in unconscionable receipt

The concept of unconscionability

The evolution of the doctrine of 'knowing receipt' into a doctrine predicated more generally on 'unconscionability' emerged from the decision of the Court of Appeal in *Bank of Credit and Commerce International v Akindele*²³⁹ in which it was held that, for a defendant to be liable in unconscionable receipt, it is enough to establish that he knew or ought to have known of the breach of trust or fiduciary duty. The model for unconscionability in this 236 Because that property would be treated as being held on constructive trust (and thus beneficially) for the victim of the crime: Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington [1996] AC 669.

237 [2008] EWCA Civ 819, [2008] Bus LR 1762, para [37] et seq., per Moore-Bick LJ.

238 Ibid at [39]. See Bryan, 1998.

239 [2000] 4 All ER 221.

context, it is suggested, can be found most clearly in the judgment of Nourse LJ in *Bank of Credit and Commerce International v Akindele*²⁴⁰ when his Lordship held as follows, doubting the efficacy of a categorisation based on knowledge:

What then, in the context of knowing receipt, is the purpose to be served by a categorisation of knowledge? It can only be to enable the court to determine whether, in the words of Buckley LJ in Belmont Finance Corp Ltd v Williams Furniture Ltd (No 2),²⁴¹ the recipient can ‘conscientiously retain [the] funds against the company’ or, in the words of Sir Robert Megarry V-C in In re Montagu’s Settlement Trusts,²⁴² ‘[the recipient’s] conscience is sufficiently affected for it to be right to bind him by the obligations of a constructive trustee’. But, if that is the purpose, there is no need for categorisation. All that is necessary is that the recipient’s state of knowledge should be such as to make it unconscionable for him to retain the benefit of the receipt.

For these reasons I have come to the view that, just as there is now a single test of dishonesty for knowing assistance, so ought there to be a single test of knowledge for knowing receipt. The recipient’s state of knowledge must be such as to make it unconscionable for him to retain the benefit of the receipt. A test in that form, though it cannot, any more than any other, avoid difficulties of application, ought to avoid those of definition and allocation to which the previous categorisations have led. Moreover, it should better enable the courts to give commonsense decisions in the commercial context in which claims in knowing receipt are now frequently made . . .²⁴³

Therefore, the defendant is taken to have acted unconscionably if his knowledge was such that (to borrow from Nourse LJ) it would be unconscionable for him to retain any benefit taken from the receipt of the property, or (preferably, it is suggested) it would cause the beneficiaries uncompensated loss without the defendant having a good defence or an absence of knowledge.²⁴⁴ The significance of this model is the approximation of ‘unconscionability’ to the pre-existing test of ‘knowledge’. The ostensible uncertainty in the word ‘unconscionability’ is removed by equating that word to the clear test of knowledge to emerge after Re Montagu’s Settlements, a case which is considered in detail below. What remains unclear, however, are those categories of things which may be considered to be ‘unconscionable’ but which are beyond the test of knowledge.

The effect of using a concept of ‘unconscionability’ in the cases has been a likelihood that the defendant will escape liability. So, in *Bank of Credit and Commerce International v Akindele*²⁴⁵ itself Chief Akindele, the defendant, was a client of a bank, BCCI, which later collapsed amid systematic fraud among many of that bank’s officers.²⁴⁶ The defendant had 240 [2001] Ch 437, [2000] 4 All ER 221.

241 [1980] 1 All ER 393, 405.

242 [1987] Ch 264, 273.

243 [2001] Ch 437, 455.

244 It is suggested that Nourse LJ’s formulation presents the difficulty that it focuses on the defendant having taken a benefit and thereby strays too close to rendering this doctrine a restitutionary doctrine concerned with the reversal of an unjust enrichment, whereas the purpose of this doctrine is to compensate the beneficiaries for any loss occasioned by a breach of trust.

245 [2000] 4 All ER 221.

246 See, for example, Adams and Frantz, 1992.

effectively been promised a very high return on his investments by the bank's officers and those bank officers sought in breach of their fiduciary duties to the bank to procure the defendant that return on his investments even though his investments had not performed nearly so well. The question at issue was whether in relation to a series of payments to the defendant he had at any time had knowledge of the breaches of fiduciary duty involved. It was found on the facts that the defendant had heard rumours about goings-on inside the bank. Under the test for knowledge set out in Baden v Société Générale, it might have been enough to demonstrate knowledge to show that the defendant had had knowledge of factors which would have put an honest and reasonable man on inquiry as to the propriety of the actions of the bank's officers. However, Nourse LJ held that in general terms there was nothing on the facts to demonstrate that the defendant had acted unconscionably in general terms and therefore it was held that the defendant would not be liable for knowing receipt. Thus, even though he would have been treated as having had constructive knowledge of the fraud, because he was not found to have acted unconscionably he was not liable under the receipt claim. The effect of the notion of unconscionability was to permit the court to reach the conclusion which it wanted to reach on the facts: that is, to absolve the defendant of liability even when a stricter test may have made him liable to account to the bank because he had had knowledge of factors which might have put a reasonable person on inquiry.

Carnwath LJ took a similar approach to Nourse LJ in the Court of Appeal in Charter plc v City Index Ltd.²⁴⁷ Carnwath LJ (with whom Mummery LJ agreed) took the view that the test of unconscionability in BCCI v Akindele is now to form part of the appropriate test in cases of receipt of property in breach of trust.²⁴⁸ As his Lordship put it:

liability for 'knowing receipt' depends on the defendant having sufficient knowledge of the circumstances of the payment to make it 'unconscionable' for him to retain the benefit or pay it away for his own purposes.

The notion of unconscionability is therefore linked to the requirement of knowledge. On this model of the test, it is not that the defendant has acted unconscionably in general terms which imposes liability, but rather it is a question as to whether or not the defendant had such knowledge of the circumstances so as to make his retention or dealing with the property unconscionable. Thus, having knowledge which would satisfy the test for constructive knowledge that the property was passed to him in breach of trust, as in Re Montagu, would also constitute an unconscionable circumstance for the defendant to have received that property.²⁴⁹ However, Carnwath LJ focused on the benefit being retained by the defendant. If the benefit had been retained, then there would prima facie be a tracing claim available into that benefit. That is not the purpose of liability for knowing (or, unconscionable) receipt: liability for unconscionable receipt is predicated on the defendant being liable to compensate the 247 Charter plc v City Index Ltd [2008] 2 WLR 950.

248 Ibid., [31].

249 For example, where there has been fraud in the movement of money from an account held for the benefit of the claimant to an account held by the defendant then there will have been an unconscionable receipt of that money by the defendant, as in Papamichael v National Westminster Bank plc [2003] EWHC 164 (Comm), [2003] 1 Lloyd's Rep 341.

beneficiaries for any loss occasioned to the trust by the breach of trust, as a result of his unconscionability.

The court in *Criterion Properties Ltd v Stratford UK Properties*²⁵⁰ applied the unconscionability test in circumstances relating particularly to ostensible authority in relation to the capacity of a company to enter into transactions including a joint venture agreement seeking to fend off a takeover. In *Criterion Properties plc v Stratford UK Properties LLC*²⁵¹ the Court of Appeal approved the flexibility of the notion of ‘conscionability’²⁵² in relation to a claim brought on behalf of shareholders to the effect that the directors of a company had knowingly committed breaches of duty by entering into arrangements which would prevent a takeover of that company by third parties. The Court of Appeal in *Niru Battery Manufacturing Co v Milestone Trading Ltd*²⁵³ expressed its support for the test of unconscionability.²⁵⁴

The organisation of this discussion

The foregoing has established two things. First, that the concept at play here is ‘unconscionable’ receipt and not simply ‘knowing’ receipt; and, secondly, the concept of ‘knowledge’ in the cases remains significant as the primary concept to be identified in fixing a defendant with liability for unconscionable receipt, prior to inquiring whether or not she also acted unconscionably.

20.3.4 The nature of ‘knowledge’

The fundamental question is what constitutes ‘knowledge’ in this context. As Lord Browne-Wilkinson held in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC:

If X has the necessary degree of knowledge, X may himself become a constructive trustee for B on the basis of knowing receipt.²⁵⁵ But unless he has the requisite degree of knowledge he is not personally liable to account as trustee.²⁵⁶ Therefore, innocent receipt of property by X subject to an existing equitable interest does not by itself make X a trustee despite the severance of the legal and equitable titles.²⁵⁷

It is important to note that the test in this area is one of ‘knowledge’ and not ‘notice’. Rather than depend on the imputed notice as used in conveyancing law or in relation to undue

250 [2003] 1 WLR 218, CA.

251 [2003] 2 BCLC 129. Carnwath LJ, having been the trial judge in BCCI v Akindele, acknowledged that the Court of Appeal had overruled his own preference for a test of dishonesty at first instance: [2001] Ch 437, 455, per Nourse LJ.

252 [2003] 2 BCLC 129, [38].

253 [2004] 2 WLR 1415, [2004] 1 Lloyd’s Rep 344, para 188, per Sedley LJ.

254 The following High Court cases have also followed Akindele: Independent Trustee Services Ltd v GP Noble Trustees Ltd [2010] EWHC 1653 (Ch), per Peter Smith J; Law Society of England and Wales v Habitable Concepts Ltd [2010] EWHC 1449 (Ch), per Norris J.

255 [1996] AC 669.

256 Re Diplock [1948] Ch 465 and Re Montagu’s Settlement Trusts [1987] Ch 264.

257 [1996] 2 All ER 961, 990.

influence, the courts have focused instead on whether or not the defendant has knowledge of material factors. If the defendant is to be fixed with personal liability to account, then it is thought that the defendant must be demonstrated to know those factors which will attach liability to her. The further question, however, is what a person can be taken to ‘know’. The most significant judicial explanation of the various categories of knowledge was that set out by Peter Gibson J in Baden v Société Générale,²⁵⁸ as follows:

- (a) actual knowledge;²⁵⁹
- (b) wilfully shutting one’s eyes to the obvious;²⁶⁰
- (c) wilfully and recklessly failing to make inquiries which an honest person would have made;
- (d) knowledge of circumstances which would indicate the facts to an honest and reasonable man;
- (e) knowledge of circumstances which would put an honest and reasonable man on inquiry.

The fourth and fifth categories are the most interesting, given that they are potentially the broadest. The first three categories of knowledge are taken to indicate forms of actual knowledge of the circumstances.²⁶¹ The actual knowledge categories encompass situations in which the defendant knew the material facts, regardless of whether or not she tried to ignore them. The last two, it is suggested, are really indicators of constructive knowledge.²⁶² However, these five categories were whittled down to the first three for the purposes of liability for knowing receipt in Re Montagu.²⁶³ The three are thus as follows:

- (a) actual knowledge;
- (b) wilfully shutting one’s eyes to the obvious;
- (c) wilfully and recklessly failing to make inquiries which an honest person would have made.

The reason for this restriction was that they included a necessary element of wilful or deliberate behaviour on the part of the defendant who cannot be proved to have actually 258 Baden v Société Générale pour Favoriser le Développement du Commerce et de l’Industrie en France SA [1993] 1 WLR 509. For a discussion of categories of knowledge relating to commercial law, see Manifest Shipping Co Ltd v Uni-Polaris Shipping Co Ltd [2003] 1 AC 469; Seb Trygg Holding Aktiebolag v Manches [2005] EWHC 35 (Comm), para [128] et seq.

259 Where there is proof that a defendant actually knew, then that will be sufficient to make out the claim: Bank of Tokyo-Mitsubishi Ltd v Baskan Gida [2004] EWHC 945 (Ch), [2004] 2 Lloyd’s Rep 395. In Dyson Technology Ltd v Curtis [2010] EWHC 3289 (Ch) it was held that because the amounts which were paid into the defendant’s hands were so large she would be considered to have had actual knowledge of the breach of fiduciary duty which underpinned those payments. There was also reference there to ‘personal and proprietary claims against the second defendant in knowing receipt’, which cannot be correct because such a claim is purely personal in nature, at [190].

260 See Manifest Shipping Co Ltd v Uni-Polaris Shipping Co Ltd [2003] 1 AC 469.

261 Cf White v White [2001] 1 WLR 481 – ‘knowledge’ in relation to knowledge as to whether or not a vehicle was uninsured.

262 Agip v Jackson [1989] 3 WLR 1367, 1389, per Millett J.

263 [1987] Ch 264.

known of the facts which were alleged.²⁶⁴ As considered below in relation to Re Montagu itself, Megarry VC preferred to exclude the fourth and fifth categories because they did not require wilfulness on the part of the defendant, and therefore if a defendant claimed to have forgotten the knowledge which previously she had had, then she would be held liable for knowing receipt. Megarry VC preferred to exclude such liability. It is tempting then to approach this test of knowledge as creating rigid categories, although, as Scott LJ held in Polly Peck, these categories are not to be taken as rigid rules and ‘one category may merge imperceptibly into another’.²⁶⁵ These categories were rendered slightly more memorably by counsel in Baden as ‘actual knowledge’, ‘Nelsonian knowledge’,²⁶⁶ and ‘naughty knowledge’ respectively.²⁶⁷

The issue is stated most clearly in Lord Selborne LC’s dicta in *Barnes v Addy*²⁶⁸ distinguishing between ‘knowing receipt’ and ‘knowing assistance’. This is rendered as the difference between two things: first, the liability of a person as ‘recipient’ of trust property or its traceable proceeds constitutes knowing receipt; whereas, secondly, the liability of a person as ‘accessory’ to a trustee’s breach of trust constitutes dishonest assistance.

20.3.5 The acid test for knowledge – ‘should you have been suspicious?’

The acid test

The third category of knowledge in Baden v Société Générale quoted above is difficult to define because it deals with situations in which the defendant could have been expected to have asked more questions or investigated further the source of the property. This form of constructive knowledge is best explained by Scott LJ in Polly Peck International v Nadir (No 2),²⁶⁹ where he held that the acid test in such situations was whether or not the recipient of the property ‘ought to have been suspicious’ that the property had been acquired in breach of trust.²⁷⁰ This rule of thumb, it is suggested, gives a clear indication of the manner in which judges will approach the witnesses in cases of this sort: if it is difficult to prove one way or another what the recipient knew or did not know, what the recipient had asked or ought to have asked, the trial judge will instead ask herself ‘ought the recipient to have been suspicious as to the source of this property?’²⁷¹

264 See Imobiliari Pty Ltd v Opes Prime Stockbroking Ltd [2008] FCA 1920, (2009) 252 ALR 41, at [27]: ‘knowledge of facts that would put an honest and reasonable person on notice (but not merely inquiry) of a real and not remote risk that the transfer was in breach of trust or fiduciary duty or involved the misapplication of trust property’.

265 Polly Peck International v Nadir (No 2) [1992] 3 All ER 769.

266 Although see Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley [2002] 2 All ER 377, 383, per Lord Hoffmann, criticising the image which this nomenclature summons up of Admiral Nelson at Copenhagen.

267 Hayton, 1995:2, 412.

268 (1874) 9 Ch App 244, 251–52.

269 [1992] 4 All ER 769.

270 Eagle Trust v SBC (No 2) [1996] 1 BCLC 121; Hillsdown plc v Pensions Ombudsman [1997] 1 All ER 862.

271 In this sense the definition of knowledge in knowing receipt cases appears to be slightly broader than in dishonest assistance cases. In the latter, as considered below, the court has tended to concentrate on the categories of actual knowledge.

Similarly, in Macmillan v Bishopsgate,²⁷² it was held that account officers were not detectives and therefore not to be fixed with knowledge which they could only possibly have had if they had carried out extensive investigations, in a situation in which they had no reason to believe that there had been any impropriety in passing money from companies controlled by the late Robert Maxwell. It was held that they were ‘entitled to believe that they were dealing with honest men’ unless they had some suspicion raised in their minds to the contrary. In El Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings,²⁷³ Millett J held that liability for knowing receipt would attach ‘in a situation in which any honest and reasonable man would have made inquiry’. In short, the issue is whether or not the circumstances are such as to require a person to be suspicious, so that their conscience would encourage them to make inquiries. If there is nothing about the circumstances to make the recipient suspicious, then they will not be held to have had knowledge under the third category of knowledge. Where there is something about the context which should make the recipient suspicious, then the recipient should make reasonable inquiries; if those inquiries produce no information or if the recipient is deceived when making those inquiries, then she will be absolved from having knowledge of those circumstances. Therefore, recipients of property such as banks should make reasonable inquiries.

Knowledge may depend on context

The case of *Polly Peck v Nadir (No 2)*²⁷⁴ is a useful illustration of the principle in action. The facts related to the actions of Asil Nadir in respect of the insolvency of the Polly Peck group of companies. This particular litigation referred to an action brought by the administrators of the plaintiff company against a bank controlled by Nadir, IBK, and the Central Bank of Northern Cyprus. It was alleged that Nadir had been responsible for the misapplication of substantial funds in sterling which were the assets of the plaintiff company. It was claimed that the Central Bank had exchanged the sterling amounts for Turkish lire either with actual knowledge of fraud on the plaintiff company or in circumstances in which the Central Bank ought to have been put on inquiry as to the source of those funds. The plaintiff claimed against the Central Bank personal liability to account as a constructive trustee as a result of knowing receipt of the sterling amounts which had been exchanged for lire.

The Central Bank contended that it had no such knowledge, actual or constructive, of the source of the funds. It argued that large amounts of money passed through its systems as a central bank on a regular basis, and that as such it should not be on notice as to title in every large amount. The Court of Appeal held that there was no requirement to prove a fraudulent misapplication of funds to found a claim on knowing receipt. It was enough to demonstrate that the recipient had the requisite knowledge both that the funds were trust funds and that they were being misapplied. On the facts of this case, it was held that the simple fact that the plaintiff company was exchanging amounts of money between sterling and lire via IBK was not enough to have put the Central Bank on suspicion that there had been a breach of trust.

In deciding whether or not the Central Bank ought to have been suspicious, Scott LJ preferred to approach the matter from the point of view of the ‘honest and reasonable 272 [1996] 1 WLR 387. See also United Mizrahi Bank Ltd v Doherty [1998] 1 WLR 435; Bank of Scotland v A Ltd (2001) The Times, 6 February.

273 El Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings [1993] 3 All ER 717, appealed [1994] 2 All ER 685.

274 [1992] 4 All ER 769.

banker',²⁷⁵ although he did express some reservations that this was not necessarily the only test.²⁷⁶ It does appear, however, that the reasonableness of the recipient's belief falls to be judged from the perspective of the recipient itself. On the facts, it was held that there was no reason for suspicion because large amounts of money passed through the Central Bank's accounts regularly, and there was nothing at the time of this transaction to cause the bank to be suspicious of this particular transaction.

Knowledge is subjective and therefore knowledge can be forgotten

The tests of knowledge have been demonstrated to have been subjective in the decision of Megarry VC in Re Montagu's Settlement,²⁷⁷ in which the 10th Duke of Manchester was a life tenant beneficiary under a settlement created by the 9th Duke. On the terms of the settlement, the trustees considered themselves to have a power to appoint chattels to the 10th Duke, which meant that the trustees considered that they were able to transfer absolute title in those items of property to the 10th Duke rather than holding them on trust during his life and then for his successor in title after his death. Thus, it was in breach of trust that the 10th Duke and the trustees lapsed into the habit of treating all of the valuable chattels held on trust as belonging absolutely beneficially to the 10th Duke. The Duke took a variety of chattels including a very valuable portrait by the Dutch master Van Dyck and an historic antique in the form of a trunk belonging to Katherine of Aragon. Auctions of trust property took place at the family's castle and at the London auctioneers Christie's. After the 10th Duke's death, the issue arose whether or not the 10th Duke's estate should have been held liable for knowing receipt of these chattels in breach of trust.

Megarry VC took the view that there had been 'an honest muddle' in this case. It was found as a fact that the 10th Duke had undoubtedly had actual knowledge of the terms of the trust at one stage in part because explicit references were made to the relevant provisions of the settlement in correspondence between the parties. Nevertheless, his Lordship accepted that the Duke might have forgotten the detailed terms of the settlement over time. Consequently, it was held that a defendant does not have the requisite knowledge on which to base a claim for knowing receipt if the defendant has genuinely forgotten the relevant factors.²⁷⁸ Because the three categories of knowledge applied in Re Montagu were all predicated on wilful behaviour or actual knowledge, having forgotten information would absolve a person from having had knowledge of that information at the material time.

The counter-argument was made that the solicitors knew the terms of the settlement throughout and that the Duke should be imputed with the knowledge of his solicitors. However, Megarry VC held, in support of the idea that one should be liable for knowing receipt only if one had knowledge of the relevant factor, that the knowledge of a trustee-solicitor or other agent should not be imputed to the defendant. That is, you do not 'know' something simply because your agent knows it. Thus, the distinction is drawn with the 275 [1992] 4 All ER 769, 778–80; Finers v Miro [1991] 1 WLR 35.

276 Ibid., 778.

277 [1987] Ch 264.

278 Re Montagu was followed on the question of forgetting negating knowledge in MCP Pension Trustees Ltd v AON Pension Trustees Ltd [2010] EWCA Civ 377, [2011] 1 All ER (Comm) 228, at [14], per Elias LJ.

doctrine of notice under which notice can be imputed from agent to principal.²⁷⁹ Therefore, while the Duke had forgotten the terms of the trust, he was not to be imputed with his lawyers' knowledge that for him to treat the property as his own personal property would have been in breach of trust.

The categories of knowledge set out in Baden v Société Générale were five, including failure to make the inquiries which an honest person would have made without the need that failure to make those inquiries had been wilful. If the defendant was not required to have acted wilfully or intentionally, then it would be easier to fix the defendant with knowledge than in circumstances in which the claimant was required to prove that the defendant had acted intentionally in failing to make reasonable inquiries as to the source of the property which he had received. Thus, Megarry VC narrowed the scope of the knowledge test to the first three categories of knowledge set out in Baden v Société Générale, thus incorporating acts which the defendant conducted wilfully or deliberately, or facts of which he had actual knowledge. Consequently, no liability for knowing receipt attached to the 10th Duke nor to his estate.

Misuse of confidential information and trust property

In a different case, the question arose whether or not misuse of confidential information could lead to knowing receipt. In Satnam Investments Ltd v Dunlop Heywood,²⁸⁰ Satnam's agents (DH) had passed on confidential information to the claimant's business rival, Morbaine. Morbaine then relied upon this information in acquiring a development site which Satnam had wanted to buy. The Court of Appeal rejected an argument that Morbaine held the site on constructive trust for Satnam. It was argued, inter alia, that Morbaine had been the recipient of trust property in that, it was said, the confidential information itself should have been deemed to have been property of the trust. Nourse LJ held:

Clearly, DH and Mr Murray can be regarded as trustees of the information and, clearly, Morbaine can be regarded as having been a knowing recipient of it. However, even assuming, first, that confidential information can be treated as property for this purpose and, secondly, that but for the disclosure of the information Morbaine would not have acquired the Brewery Street site, we find it impossible, in knowing receipt, to hold that there was a sufficient basis for subjecting the Brewery Street site to the constructive trust for which Satnam contends. The information cannot be traced into the site and there is no other sufficient nexus between the two.

The problem which the court encountered here was in interpreting this transmission of confidential information as being causally linked to Morbaine's subsequent acquisition of the development site which Satnam had wanted to acquire itself.²⁸¹ The problem with this approach is that, if Morbaine acted knowing of Satnam's intentions and knowing that the 279 See Chapter 29 on the doctrine of notice.

280 [1999] 3 All ER 652.

281 This passage was approved in Ultraframe (UK) Ltd v Fielding [2005] EWHC 1638 (Ch), [2005] All ER (D) 397.

information was treated as being confidential, then Morbaine would have exploited valuable commercial information to its own benefit and thus to the detriment of Satnam. Therefore, Morbaine's gain was made unconscionably – assuming the presence of knowledge – at Satnam's expense.

Difficulty with the approach in Satnam Investments Ltd v Dunlop Heywood was expressed in *Rockbrook Ltd v Khan*²⁸² where Mr Khan had talked two other people out of investing in land and had instead sought to exploit the land on his own account, contrary to an alleged agreement between the parties to the contrary. On the facts no 'dishonesty' was proved.²⁸³ The judge's difficulty in Rockbrook was that Nourse LJ had continued on from the passage quoted above to suggest that a claim for dishonest assistance would have been appropriate if Morbaine could have been demonstrated to have been dishonest: the difficulty being in explaining why liability for dishonest assistance should arise in a situation in which no nexus between the information and the acquisition of the site could be demonstrated which would have been sufficient to impose liability for knowing receipt.

Knowing receipt in complex commercial fraud

It seems useful to present an example of the type of complex commercial fraud which is often at the root of knowing receipt claims. The case of *El-Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings*²⁸⁴ is a good example of a complex commercial fraud involving knowing receipt of property. Three Canadians, who operated two Dutch 'shell' companies,²⁸⁵ bribed a Swiss investment manager in Geneva to invest the plaintiff's funds through those shell companies as part of a fraudulent share selling scheme. These shell companies held no other assets and carried on no trade. Their existence was solely to hold assets for the Canadians. The Canadians then passed the profits of their share selling scheme through a range of different locations – including Geneva, Gibraltar and Panama – in an attempt to launder their money. Money laundering in this sense is the process by which a shyster tries to hide the source of money by paying it through a number of bank accounts in a number of jurisdictions, by winding up the companies which own those bank accounts, by mixing those moneys with other moneys, by changing these moneys into different currencies, and so on until the original money becomes unidentifiable or very difficult to identify indeed. Some of the moneys which the Canadians had moved around the world were invested in a property company, called 'DLH', in London. When the plaintiff discovered the original fraud in Geneva, he brought proceedings against DLH for knowing receipt on the basis, first, that property had been taken from the plaintiff in breach of trust and passed to DLH so that DLH had received it, and, secondly, that DLH had received the property with knowledge of the breach of trust. It was held by the Court of Appeal that the chairman of DLH, even though he played no part in the ordinary management of DLH, had been the person who organised for the investment to pass into DLH. Therefore, in this context the chairman had been 'the directing mind and will' of the

282 [2006] EWHC 101 (Ch).

283 Ibid, para [42].

284 [1994] 2 All ER 685, [1994] 1 BCLC 464, [1994] BCC 143.

285 A shell company being a company, for these purposes, which carries on no trading or other activities, and which therefore exists solely to hold assets for the human beings who control it or to act as a front for those human beings.

company and therefore any knowledge which he had had as to the source of these funds would be attributed to the company. It was held that the chairman had had sufficient knowledge of the manner in which the investment had been acquired to constitute knowledge of the fraud and breach of fiduciary duty, and therefore that knowledge would be attributed to DLH. Consequently, DLH was held to be liable for knowing receipt of these moneys.²⁸⁶

20.3.6 Dishonesty in unconscionable receipt

The alternative test of 'dishonesty'

In the Court of Appeal in *Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley*²⁸⁷ Potter LJ made it clear that, in his opinion, the applicable test for both knowing receipt and dishonest assistance was one of 'dishonesty' as set out in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan, considered above. This confirmation of the position of English law²⁸⁸ indicates a movement away from knowledge as the basis for the receipt-based claim. It is clear that the same test was being used by Potter LJ both for dishonest assistance and knowing receipt (even though he acknowledged that one claim was receipt-based and the other was not).

In his judgment, Potter LJ made frequent references to the old knowledge-orientated ideas of the defendant 'shutting his eyes to the obvious'.²⁸⁹ However, the Court of Appeal in Twinsectra, followed by the High Court in *Bank of America v Arnell*²⁹⁰ and the Court of Appeal in Heinl and Others v Jyske Bank,²⁹¹ used the established Baden categories within which to analyse the mental state of the defendant (for example, wilfully shutting your eyes to the obvious), but were concerned with whether or not that person was honest or dishonest, as opposed to whether or not that person had knowledge of some breach of trust. Therefore, a number of Court of Appeal decisions have focused on asking whether or not the defendant had been dishonest when she received property in breach of trust.

Whichever test is used, there remains the problem of witness credibility for the judge. In that sense, the question which the judge will continue to ask himself, regardless of which test 286 On the facts of Uzinterimpex JSC v Standard Bank plc [2008] EWCA Civ 819, [2008] Bus LR 1762, para [37] et seq., per Moore-Bick LJ, even though the defendant was not acting simply as an agent (but rather was acting in part as trustee and in part in relation to its own rights) it was nevertheless found that there was insufficient proof of knowledge to make the defendant liable for knowing receipt. The defendant was acting as the agent of a number of banks who had acted as a syndicate in lending money to the claimant. The role of the agent in syndicated lending is to ensure proper payment by the borrower, to ensure the lenders and borrower obey the terms of their contract, and to supervise both property put up as security and to transmit payments between the parties (on which see Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, Sweet & Maxwell, 2009, Chapter 34). The complex loan contract provided that the defendant was to act as trustee of some property put up as security for the syndicate banks and to act as agent in relation to other obligations. Nevertheless, there was no evidence of knowledge of a breach of duty and therefore the defendant could not be fixed with liability for knowing receipt.

287 See, for example, Nicholls, 1998.

288 Tan was a Privy Council decision.

289 There is mention of 'not dishonest', he [the judge at first instance] was referring to the state of conscious [sic], as opposed to "Nelsonian" dishonesty . . .': ibid, 462, col 2.

290 [1999] Lloyd's Rep Bank 399.

291 [1999] Lloyd's Rep Bank 511.

is used, is: ‘do I believe that this witness acted like an honest person?’ Beyond that, there will clearly be an important distinction at the edges as to whether or not the defendant should also have realised that other people would have considered her actions to have been dishonest.

Perhaps there appears to be only a marginal shift between a test of knowledge and a test of dishonesty, but it is suggested that it could make a significant difference in borderline cases. A test based on knowledge is concerned with the state of mind of the defendant and seeks to establish precisely what that particular defendant knew. In that sense, a test of knowledge is in line with the core equitable principle that the court is concerned with the state of mind of the defendant as part of an in personam action. A test based on dishonesty (in the definition given to that term by Lord Nicholls) is a test not solely concerned with the particular mental state of the defendant, but rather primarily with what an honest person would have done in the defendant’s place: that is, the court will attempt to establish what an objective, reasonable person would have done in those circumstances. There is therefore a partial shift here in the Twinside v Yardley decision in the Court of Appeal: the trigger for liability is ‘what an objective, honest person would have done’ rather than ‘what did the defendant know?’²⁹²

Subsequently, the Court of Appeal in *Niru Battery Manufacturing Co v Milestone Trading Ltd*²⁹³ has doubted that dishonesty is a requirement of liability for knowing receipt, relying on the decision in Belmont Finance Corp Ltd v Williams Furniture Ltd.²⁹⁴ A preference for a test of unconscionability, which expressly disavows a test of dishonesty in this context, was upheld in Criterion Properties plc v Stratford UK Properties LLC.²⁹⁵ The Court of Appeal in this case preferred the flexibility of the notion of ‘conscionability’,²⁹⁶ albeit in relation to a claim brought on behalf of shareholders that the directors of a company had knowingly committed breaches of duty in entering into arrangements which would have prevented a takeover of that company by third parties.

Difficulties with some of the judicial explanations of knowing receipt, and errors based on unjust enrichment

The judgment of Arden LJ in Charter plc v City Index Ltd, with which neither of the other members of the Court of Appeal agreed, requires some criticism because it suggests some fundamental misconceptions about the notion of knowing receipt. As was the case with the judgment of Arden LJ in Abou Rahmah v Abacha, much of the judgment is somewhat elliptically expressed. The following points can, however, be made. First, Arden LJ favours us with the following explanation of the principles:

292 Twinside v Yardley [1999] Lloyd’s Rep Bank 438, 464, col 2, per Potter LJ, quoting Lord Nicholls in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378.

293 [2004] 2 WLR 1415, [2004] 1 Lloyd’s Rep 344, para 188, per Sedley LJ.

294 [1980] 1 All ER 393. Similarly, Polly Peck International plc v Nadir (No 2) [1992] 4 All ER 769, 777, per Scott LJ and Eagle Trust plc v SBC Securities Ltd [1993] 1 WLR 484, 497, per Vinelott J have held that proof of fraud is not a pre-requisite of a claim for knowing receipt.

295 [2003] 2 BCLC 129. Carnwath LJ, having been the trial judge in BCCI v Akindele, acknowledged that the Court of Appeal had overruled his own preference for a test of dishonesty at first instance: [2001] Ch 437, 455, per Nourse LJ.

296 [2003] 2 BCLC 129, [38].

The expressions ‘constructive trust’ and ‘liable to account’ are portmanteau expressions that can be used to define the remedies for different sorts of causes of action, including breach of trust, and different types of relief. Despite this, it is important in the context of the question at issue on this appeal to distinguish between a claim that a person should pay damages to make good the claimant’s loss and a claim that a person should account for profits which he has made by the use of the claimant’s property.²⁹⁷

A number of points arise. As emerged in Chapter 12, constructive trusts are not limited to cases of breach of trust. Furthermore, neither liability to hold property on constructive trust nor liability to account for involvement in a breach of trust involve ‘damages’. Damages are limited to actions at common law and involve questions as to foreseeability, formal questions of causation, proximity, and so forth:²⁹⁸ all of which were elements which are excluded from liability to account in relation to losses caused by a breach of trust by the House of Lords in Target Holdings v Redferns.²⁹⁹ Disastrously the headnote in the Weekly Law Reports refers to this doctrine as the ‘tort of knowing receipt’ which cannot possibly be correct because that would constitute another example of the fusion fallacy whereunder common law and equitable doctrines are incorrectly bundled together. Furthermore, liability for knowing receipt, which is a personal remedy, is separate from the proprietary constructive trust which is imposed over the receipt of secret profits by a fiduciary. Secondly, liability for receipt of trust property is somewhat uncomfortably divided between ‘claims for unjust enrichment based on the wrongful conduct of the defendant (known as knowing receipt) and claims for unjust enrichment based on innocent receipt (often called claims for money had and received)’ by Arden LJ.³⁰⁰ Knowing receipt is not predicated on unjust enrichment. By definition, a defendant will be liable to account for knowing receipt if she has received trust property knowing of the breach of trust and has since disposed of the property without earning any profit from the transaction. Thus, the defendant need not be enriched to be liable for knowing receipt. Liability is based on the need to compensate the beneficiaries’ loss. This is why we must understand the liability as being based on the wrong of knowing and unconscionable receipt of trust property. A claim for money had and received is generally understood as arising at common law when the defendant has acquired an enrichment at the claimant’s expense as the result of some unjust factor. Thirdly, Arden LJ suggested that the purpose of the doctrine of knowing receipt ‘is imposed to deter trustees’; whereas it is suggested that the liability is in fact imposed to compensate the loss suffered by the beneficiaries as a result of the breach of trust. It is suggested in consequence that Arden LJ’s remarks are unhelpful.

297 Charter plc v City Index Ltd [2008] 2 WLR 950, [64]. They are not really ‘portmanteau’ expressions: the dictionary definition of the term ‘portmanteau’ is a composite word formed by fusing two words together as in ‘smog’ which is a portmanteau combination of ‘smoke’ and ‘fog’.

298 A point which Arden LJ acknowledges at ibid at [74].

299 [1995] AC 421.

300 Charter plc v City Index Ltd [2008] 2 WLR 950, [62].

The present state of the law: a viable model of 'unconscionable receipt'

At the time of writing, the preponderance of recent judicial opinion in variously constituted Courts of Appeal is that the test is a test of 'unconscionability'.³⁰¹ That means that the court must ask itself whether or not the manner in which the defendant came to receive the property was unconscionable. It is suggested, adapting the dicta of Carnwarth LJ in Charter plc v City Index plc, that the approach should be to ask first whether or not the defendant had one of the requisite types of knowledge from Montagu. If there is such knowledge then this may demonstrate unconscionability, or that may need to be proved separately as in Akindele. Alternatively, in the absence of proof of the requisite categories of knowledge, the court should consider whether or not there was something unconscionable about the circumstances of the case more generally. The notion that this area of the law should be based on a loose notion of unconscionability has been criticised.³⁰² It is suggested that this need not be a problem if the concept of unconscionability in this context is filled in appropriately. If the court considers that an honest person could not have considered the transaction to be honest or reasonable in the circumstances, then the court is likely to find that that person had knowledge, or that she was dishonest, or that she had acted unconscionably – whichever form of the test is applied.³⁰³ Therefore, the concept of 'unconscionability' can be understood as being satisfied if unconscionability is based on the long-standing tests of knowledge or of dishonesty (as discussed already in this chapter), and only if those tests are not satisfied should unconscionability be based on some more general idea that the defendant has acted unconscionably in the circumstances.

This last conception of unconscionability is, it is suggested, an entirely appropriate development of equitable doctrine to prevent the beneficiaries suffering loss as a result of the equitable wrong of receiving trust property knowing of a breach of trust or in any other circumstance in which the court considers that receipt of property to have been dishonest or unconscionable. The most useful way forward through this thicket, it seems to me, is to remind ourselves of Scott LJ's comment in Polly Peck v Nadir (No 2) that whatever the test that is to be applied the judge is ultimately always called upon to decide whether or not the defendant 'ought to have been suspicious'³⁰⁴ as to the provenance of the property in the circumstances by the lights of honest people. In that sense it is suggested that, regardless of the niceties of the tests, in the bulk of cases the court will need to decide whether or not the individual defendant ought to have realised that property was being passed to her in breach of trust. The test of 'unconscionability' should be understood in that light; and if it is, then it is not too vague to be useful in this context.

The difficult decision of Morris QC in the High Court in *Armstrong DLW GmbH v Winnington Networks Ltd*³⁰⁵ concerned an EU emissions trading licence which was held electronically and which could be traded.³⁰⁶ Electronic registration of ownership was taken, in essence, to constitute ownership. As the result of a phishing scam, the claimant was 301 BBCI v Akindele [2001] Ch 437, 455, per Nourse LJ; Niru Battery Manufacturing Co v Milestone Trading Ltd [2004] 2 WLR 1415; [2004] 1 Lloyd's Rep 344, para 188, per Sedley LJ; Criterion Properties plc v Stratford UK Properties LLC [2003] 2 BCLC 129; Charter plc v City Index Ltd [2008] 2 WLR 950.

302 Crown Dilmun v Sutton [2004] EWHC 52 (Ch), para [23].

303 Ali v Al-Basri [2004] EWHC 2608, [195].

304 Polly Peck International v Nadir (No 2) [1992] 4 All ER 769.

305 [2012] 3 WLR 835.

306 In that sense, it resembles the licence considered in Re Celtic Extraction in Ch. 3.

induced to transfer title to that licence to rogues purporting to act on behalf of the defendant. In relation to a claim based on ‘unconscionable receipt’, the decision in Re Montagu (which was mentioned in other contexts) was overlooked to the extent that it reduced the number of categories of knowledge from five in Baden v Societe Generale to only three, because Morris QC discussed all five of them as being indicators of unconscionability. So, in that judgment, whether or not a person has acted unconscionably is treated as being decided if that person had knowledge of the breach of trust in any one of the five Baden categories. This is problematic because the receipt claim was based on only three of those categories after Montagu, and because it treats a person as having acted unconscionably if they had ‘notice’ of the breach of trust (i.e. if their agents had had knowledge of the breach) as opposed to the defendant herself having to have ‘knowledge’ of that breach. It is suggested that this authority should be ignored to the extent that it disagrees with established authority considered above.

20.3.7 The nature of the remedy

The defendant will be personally liable to account as a constructive trustee to the beneficiaries for any loss suffered by the breach of trust. This liability is based on the defendant’s unconscionability, dishonesty or knowing actions when receiving property further to the breach of trust. It is based on compensating the beneficiaries’ loss. It is not concerned to subtract an unjust enrichment from the defendant, even though the property had passed through the defendant’s hands at some time. The nature of the remedy is considered in further detail below in section 20.7.1.

20.4 DEFENCES

20.4.1 Bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the breach of trust

Among the only available defences against a claim for knowing receipt are, first, that the defendant was a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the claimant’s rights. Where the defendant can demonstrate that she purchased the property in good faith (which would in any event cancel out a claim for knowing receipt in that the requirement of bona fides would require an absence of knowledge or dishonesty).³⁰⁷ This defence is considered in greater detail in section 19.6 above.

20.4.2 Change of position

In circumstances in which the defendant can demonstrate a change of position in good faith in reliance on receipt of trust property, the defendant would be entitled to resist the claim for personal liability to account.³⁰⁸ The court will measure the comparative justice and injustice of requiring the defendant to account for knowing receipt of property, when the defendant had changed her position in reliance on receipt of that property, measured against the injustice of denying the claimant an account from the defendant equal to her loss. This defence would be unavailable where the defendant is demonstrated to have had sufficient knowledge of the breach of trust, or to have acted dishonestly. So, for example, in Barros Mattos v MacDaniels Ltd,³⁰⁹ where the defendant had knowingly received money which had been stolen from a bank, and where the defendant was consequently found to have committed an illegal act itself, the defence of change of position would not be available. Therefore, it is unlikely that the defence would be available if the mens rea were satisfied, unless the defendant could demonstrate that the purchase or the change of position took place before the defendant had acquired the requisite knowledge. This defence is considered in detail in section 19.6 and the reader is therefore referred to that discussion.

³⁰⁷ Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

³⁰⁸ Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale [1991] 3 WLR 10.

20.4.3 Release

The defendant will be able to defend a claim to dishonest assistance or knowing receipt on the basis that she has been released from liability by the beneficiaries. This defence is considered in greater detail in section 19.6 above.

20.5 THE PARTICULAR QUESTION OF LIABILITY TO ACCOUNT IN CORPORATE CONTEXTS

20.5.1 The personal liability to account of employees of companies, and the liability of that company for personal liability to account

Liability for dishonest assistance may attach to anyone who provides advice to trustees or who otherwise advises trustees as to the management of the trust property. In such situations it may be difficult to know whether liability attaches to the individual who gives that advice or whether liability can attach to a company or partnership which employs the advisor. The clearest example of such liability would arise in relation to advice given to trustees as to the investment of the trust fund where the advisor is dishonest in the provision of the advice which is given to the trustees. It is not required, in relation to dishonest assistance, that the trustees be dishonest, and therefore it would be sufficient to establish liability to account if the advisor can be shown to have been dishonest.³¹⁰ If the individual advisor receives a personal commission from the transaction which caused the breach of trust, then that would increase the likelihood of her being proved to have acted dishonestly.³¹¹ The further question is whether or not the company which employs the advisor would also be fixed with any knowledge or dishonesty of the advisor. In general terms, if the advisor were a controlling mind of the company, then that company can itself be held to have had the same mens rea as the individual advisor.³¹² So, the Chief Executive Officer of a company may be its controlling mind or the managing director of a division within a large company may be part of its controlling mind, but a junior employee or a mere branch manager in a nationwide supermarket chain would not be.

309 [2004] 3 All ER 299, [2004] EWHC 1188 (Ch).

310 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378.

311 Ibid.

312 Tesco Supermarkets v Natrass [1972] AC 153.

Liability for dishonest assistance will also attach to any person who assists a breach of a fiduciary duty by a director of a company who breaches her duties to that company.³¹³ So, if a defendant dishonestly procured the transfer of property away from a company so that it was passed, for example, to a competitor company in breach of the director's duties to the first company, that would make the defendant liable to the first company to account as a constructive trustee for any loss which it suffered as a result of that breach of duty.³¹⁴

The same analysis holds in relation to the knowledge which is required to be proved in relation to a claim for knowing receipt. So, in Crown Dilmun v Sutton,³¹⁵ the controlling mind and managing director of a company learned of an opportunity to develop a football ground which he should have exploited for the benefit of that company: instead, he created a new company (the second defendant) to exploit that opportunity on his own account. It was held that the knowledge of the director would be transferred to the second defendant because the director was the controlling mind of the second defendant also. Therefore, the receipt of profits from the development of the football ground which passed through the second defendant's bank accounts led to the second defendant being liable for knowing receipt of those profits (further to the constructive trust imposed over those personal profits further to Boardman v Phipps).³¹⁶ To be able to fix the company with liability has the advantage of providing a defendant which is more likely to be able to make good the beneficiaries' loss than an individual employee.³¹⁷

The controlling mind of a company is not necessarily the same person as the person who carries on the management of that company. However, it is important to consider from case to case and transaction to transaction who is the controlling mind of the company in that context. So in *El-Ajou v Dollar Land Holdings*³¹⁸ the plaintiff had been defrauded of his money in Geneva by an investment manager who diverted that money into companies controlled by two men who had bribed him to do so. The plaintiff's money was moved around the world in an attempt to disguise its source before the traceable proceeds of that money were ultimately invested in a London property company called 'DLH'. The investment had come to DLH through its chairman, a man who ordinarily took no part in the day-to-day management of the company. It was found that only the chairman had sufficient knowledge of the manner in which the money had come to be invested in DLH, but not any of the other directors of DLH. It was held at first instance by Millett J that while it was possible to trace the moneys into the hands of DLH, it was nevertheless not possible to prove that DLH had knowledge of the fraud because only the chairman, who did not participate in the ordinary management of the company, had had the requisite knowledge. The matter was then appealed to the Court of Appeal. It was confirmed that the test for demonstrating that a 313 Brown v Bennett [1999] 1 BCLC 649, [1999] BCC 525; Natural Extracts Pty Ltd v Stoller (1997) 24 ACSR 110. See also Consul Development Pty Ltd v DPC Estates Pty Ltd (1975) 132 CLR 373, 396, per Gibbs J. Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan related to a breach of trust, as opposed to a breach of a director's duty to its company.

314 Cf section 12.5.

315 [2004] 1 BCLC 468. This decision applies Satnam Investments Ltd v Dunlop Heywood & Co Ltd [1999] 1 BCLC 385, [1999] 3 All ER 652; Criterion Properties Ltd v Stratford UK Properties plc [2003] 2 BCLC 129, [2003] 1 WLR 218.

316 [1967] 2 AC 46.

317 An employee will also be personally liable for any fraud which she commits in the course of her employment, over and above any liability attaching to her employer: Standard Chartered Bank v Pakistan National Shipping Corp [2003] 1 AC 959.

318 [1994] 2 All ER 685, [1994] 1 BCLC 464, [1994] BCC 143.

company has knowledge of something is that ‘the controlling mind’ or ‘the directing mind and will’ of the company had knowledge of whatever has been alleged. On these facts, there were different people within DLH who acted as the directing mind and will of DLH in different contexts. In that case, it was necessary to identify the person who was the directing mind and will in the particular context in relation to the act or omission which was the basis of the complaint. On these facts, even though the chairman of the company ordinarily played no part in the day-to-day management of the company, he had been the person who had organised the investment by the Canadians in DLH and he had acted without any of the requisite resolutions of the board of directors in so doing: these factors suggested that the chairman was the directing mind and will in this particular context because he had assumed managerial control of this transaction. Therefore, any knowledge which the chairman had about these transactions could be attributed to DLH. On the facts it was therefore held that the chairman and consequently DLH had had the requisite knowledge of the circumstances which had led to the Canadians making the investment in DLH. By contrast, a person who was merely the chairman of a company, but who never carried out the day-to-day management of that company nor took control of any given transaction, would not be the controlling mind of that company. Therefore, sometimes one must look for the person or people who actually control the company, and not simply look at the people who are installed as figureheads.³¹⁹

The same principle as that in El Ajou was applied by the Privy Council in Lebon v Aqua Salt Co Ltd.³²⁰ In the Privy Council in *Meridian Global Funds Management Asia Ltd v Securities Commission*³²¹ it was held that when deciding the obligation of a company which traded in securities to report that it held a given number of a particular type of share so as to comply with securities regulation, the knowledge which should be attributed to the company would be the knowledge of the people who were authorised to acquire those shares on behalf of the company. This approach is not limited to a single person or to a small group of people who run the entire organisation – which would tend to make it difficult to demonstrate knowledge in relation to a large organisation where a function like acquiring shares might be conducted at a much lower level within the company – but rather identifies knowledge in the hands of the individuals who could bind the company in those transactions. Where information comes to the attention of one director of a company, that may be treated as knowledge held by the company even if that director did not inform other board directors of the facts.³²²

20.5.2 The personal liability to account of financial advisors and financial institutions

The particular context of investment advice

There are particular problems associated with financial advice. In the previous paragraph, we considered the general problem of fixing liability both on employees of companies and on the 319 See now also Stone & Rolls Ltd v Moore Stephens [2008] Bus LR 1579.

320 [2009] UKPC 2, [2009] 1 BCLC 549; also applied in Meridian Global Funds Management Asia Ltd v Securities Commission [1995] 3 All ER 918, [1995] 2 BCLC 116; and in Jafari-Fini v Skillglass Ltd [2007] EWCA Civ 261.

321 [1995] 3 All ER 918, [1995] 2 BCLC 116.

322 Jafari-Fini v Skillglass Ltd [2007] EWCA Civ 261.

companies themselves. The further dimension which applies to financial or investment advice raises three issues. First, we should observe that all investment involves risk and therefore any investment advisor who gives advice to a trustee will be advising that trustee to take a risk. As was considered by Lord Nicholls in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan, if an advisor is advising the taking of reckless risks, then this might call into question the honesty of the defendant.³²³ Secondly, investment advisors are regulated by the Financial Services Authority under the auspices of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, and therefore their case law liabilities are supplemented by regulatory requirements. Thirdly, ‘investment advisors’ may either be financial institutions (which are companies or banks or partnerships) or the employees of such financial institutions. Typically, the financial institution will enter into contracts with clients and the financial institution will receive property from clients, although it is the employee who will make all of the decisions and will give all of the advice. Each of the heads of liability is considered in the following paragraphs.

Dishonest assistance by investment advisors

Lord Nicholls applied his test for ‘dishonesty’ in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan to the particular context of investment advisors in the following manner:

All investment involves risk. Imprudence is not dishonesty, although imprudence may be carried recklessly to lengths which call into question the honesty of the person making the decision. This is especially so if the transaction serves another purpose in which that person has an interest of his own.³²⁴

It may be that an investment advisor will be liable to account to the beneficiaries of her trustee customer for any loss caused by an investment strategy which is both a breach of trust and one which is considered to have been recklessly imprudent in that context. Furthermore, there are contexts in which modern market practice permits stockbrokers not to acquire securities for their clients in the open market, but rather those stockbrokers – referred to as ‘market makers’ in the market jargon – sell securities which they already own to their clients (including trustees) and so have a conflict between their personal interests in selling those securities and the interests of their clients. The advisor will therefore stand to make a profit from the transaction by way of commission and will thus increase the likelihood that she will be held to have been ‘dishonest’ in the sense identified in the passage quoted above. The basis of this form of liability is that the investment advisor:

takes a risk that a clearly unauthorised transaction will not cause loss. . . If the risk materialises and causes loss, those who knowingly took the risk will be accountable accordingly.³²⁵

323 [1995] 2 AC 378, 387.

324 Ibid.

325 [1995] 2 AC 378, 387.

Thus, an investment advisor may be liable in circumstances in which the risk taken in acquiring a particular financial instrument if the court considers the risk associated with that instrument to have been too great.³²⁶ In general terms, a person who is ‘guilty of commercially unacceptable conduct in the particular context’ of the transaction at issue is likely to be held to have acted dishonestly;³²⁷ this is particularly so where that behaviour also contravenes the requirements of financial regulation.³²⁸ So, where an investment advisor procured investments for beneficiaries in a market – here, a short-lived market in insurance and reinsurance losses – which was considered always to have been unsustainable by financial regulators, that advisor would have been a dishonest assistant in a breach of trust due to the level of risk involved.³²⁹ The regulator found that the risk management procedures across the investment advising firm were ‘well below what would have been expected’ from professional advisors in that general marketplace.³³⁰

It will also be important to consider the comparative expertise of the advisor and the person who was the victim of the breach of trust, in line with FSA regulation, which requires such measurement of the client’s expertise. Where the client is inexpert and the advisor encourages the taking of a risk which is incommensurate with that client’s level of expertise, then a finding of dishonest assistance is all the more likely.³³¹ So, where an investment advisor advised complex investments in real property in the UK through offshore companies, when the client had originally wished only to acquire accommodation for a child who was to study in the UK, and where that client had expertise only in running a successful business selling pottery but not in financial investments, then these factors would support a finding of dishonesty.³³² Further, where the defendant ignored regulatory guidance as to the manner in which clients should be treated, and particularly where the defendant back-dated documents and prepared documents containing untrue statements, dishonesty would be clearly demonstrable on the facts.³³³ By contrast, the absence of any likelihood of a personal profit being realised by the defendant would tend to argue against dishonesty.³³⁴

Unconscionable receipt of property by investment advisors

Among the positive obligations which are imposed on regulated investment advisors and other financial institutions are requirements that they act in the client’s best interests in all

326 If the FCA’s Conduct of Business rulebook required a particular level of treatment for a particular type of client and the investment advisor failed to observe those obligations, then the likelihood that the advisor will be held to have acted ‘dishonestly’ in this sense is all the greater.

327 Cowan de Groot Properties Ltd v Eagle Trust plc [1992] 4 All ER 700, at 761, per Knox J, approved by Lord Nicholls in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378, at 390.

328 See also Heinl v Jyske Bank Ltd [1999] Lloyd’s Rep Bank 511, at 535, per Colman J; and Bank of Scotland v A Ltd [2001] 3 All ER 58; Tayeb v HSBC Bank plc [2004] 4 All ER 1024.

329 Sphere Drake Insurance Ltd v Euro International Underwriting Ltd [2003] EWHC 1636 (Comm).

330 Ibid.

331 Manolakaki v Constantinides [2004] EWHC 749 (Ch).

332 Ibid. On the facts of this case, only procedural matters were at issue and no definitive finding was made on the facts of the case.

333 Ibid. See generally AS Hudson, ‘Trusts and finance law’, in D Hayton (ed) The International Trust, 3rd edn, Jordans, 2011, 638; Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, 2nd edn, Sweet & Maxwell, 2009, Chapter 3.

334 Ibid.

circumstances. Thus, each investment firm is required to act ‘honestly, fairly and professionally in accordance with the best interests of its client’.³³⁵ Further, they are required to ensure the ‘best execution’ of client transactions such that they acquire the best available price ‘investment firms take all reasonable steps to obtain, when executing orders, the best possible result for their clients taking into account price, costs, speed, likelihood of execution and settlement, size, nature or any other consideration relevant to the execution of the order’.³³⁶ These, it is suggested, impose positive fiduciary obligations on regulated ‘investment firms’.³³⁷ Banks also face statutory obligations to report transactions where there are suspicions of money laundering or other criminal activity.³³⁸

In circumstances in which a person receives trust property in the knowledge that that property has been passed in breach of fiduciary duty, the recipient will be personally liable to account to the trust for the value of the property passed away.³³⁹ In relation to investment advice, the advisor must therefore be demonstrated to have received by that advisor for her to be liable for knowing receipt. Frequently, an investment advisor (particularly if that advisor takes funds from the client and invests on their behalf) will maintain accounts for its customers so that the advisor will organise that the money which it holds to its customer’s account is invested in the requisite investments. In such a situation, the advisor will receive the trust property and so be liable for knowing receipt.

The more difficult question is: who is it who receives the trust property? Typically, the individual who provides investment advice will be employed by a financial institution and it will be that institution which holds the client’s account and which will receive the trust property. Consequently, it will be necessary to show that the financial institution which receives the trust property had the requisite knowledge to justify the imposition of liability to account as a constructive trustee. The categories of knowledge applicable in this context are actual knowledge of the breach of trust; wilfully shutting one’s eyes to the obvious fact that the property was paid away in breach of trust; and wilfully and recklessly failing to make inquiries which an honest person would have made so as to discover that the property was passed away in breach of trust.³⁴⁰ As Scott LJ held in Re Polly Peck plc v Nadir (No 2),³⁴¹ these categories are not to be taken as rigid rules and ‘one category may merge imperceptibly into another’.³⁴² In that case, it was held that there was no requirement to prove a fraudulent misapplication of funds to found a claim on knowing receipt; rather, it was enough to demonstrate that the recipient had had the requisite knowledge both that the funds were trust funds and that they were being misapplied. Scott LJ approached the liability of commercial people from the perspective, in a case involving the liability of a bank, of an ‘honest and reasonable banker’.³⁴³ In that sense, it is important to look to regulatory norms to consider how a commercial person in the circumstances of the defendant might have been expected to act in 335 MiFID, art 19(1); COBS, 2.1.1R.

336 COBS, 11.2.1R, et seq.

337 See Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, 2nd edn, Sweet & Maxwell, 2013, paras 10–16 et seq., and 10–41 et seq.

338 The procedure for making disclosure and acquiring consent is set out in Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, ss 335 and 338: see Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, para 15–42.

339 Per Scott LJ in Polly Peck International plc v Nadir (No 2) [1992] 4 All ER 769.

340 The original five categories are restricted to three by Re Montagu [1987] Ch 264.

341 Per Scott LJ in Polly Peck International plc v Nadir (No 2) [1992] 4 All ER 769.

342 Per Millett J in Agip (Africa) Ltd v Jackson [1989] 3 WLR 1367, 1389.

343 Polly Peck International plc v Nadir (No 2) [1992] 4 All ER 769, 778–80.

any particular market because, it is suggested, such regulatory norms will supply an objective statement of how such a person should have behaved in the circumstances, inter alia, with reference to the inquiries which they should have made as to the source of the property which they received.³⁴⁴

20.5.3 An issue in relation to bank accounts

On the cases decided before Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan,³⁴⁵ the primary distinction between knowing receipt and dishonest assistance was expressed to be that dishonest assistance required that there be some fraud in the misapplication of trust funds.³⁴⁶ The primary difference between dishonest assistance and knowing receipt since Tan is the introduction of a radical distinction between a test for dishonesty and a test for knowledge respectively. That distinction is often difficult to make in the case of banks. Where X Bank allows a cheque drawn on a trust account to be paid to a third party's account, the bank may be liable for dishonest assistance. Where the third party's account was overdrawn, the credit of the cheque will make the bank potentially liable for knowing receipt where the funds are used to reduce the overdraft, because in the latter instance the bank receives the money in discharge of the overdraft loan. Similarly, where the bank charges any fees in connection with the transfer, then some part of the trust property will have been received.³⁴⁷ However, in Polly Peck International v Nadir (No 2),³⁴⁸ Scott LJ held that the bank was liable only for dishonest assistance because it had acted only as banker. The risk for the bank is that a remedy based on dishonest assistance will require the bank to pay over funds which it has never received.

20.6 THE PERSONAL REMEDY IN RE DIPLOCK

Where a beneficiary under a will has been underpaid or unpaid, that beneficiary may bring a personal action against any beneficiary who has been overpaid from the assets of the will trust. The remedy is a personal remedy against that overpaid person for the amount of the overpayment. This remedy emerges from the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Diplock.³⁴⁹ It is unclear whether or not this remedy is available in relation to a trust which was created inter vivos, or whether it is only available in relation to will trusts as in Diplock itself. Commentators such as the editors of Lewin on Trusts are of the view that there is no principled reason for denying the general applicability of this remedy in relation to ordinary trusts just as it is available in relation to recovery under will trusts or to recovery against next of kin in relation to intestacy proceedings.³⁵⁰

344 It does appear however, that the reasonableness of the recipient's belief falls to be judged from the perspective of the recipient itself.

345 [1995] 2 AC 378.

346 See Vinelott J in Eagle Trust plc v SBC Securities Ltd [1992] 4 All ER 488, 499; Scott LJ in Re Polly Peck [1992] 3 All ER 769, 777.

347 See Oakley, 1997, 186 et seq.

348 [1992] 4 All ER 769.

349 Re Diplock [1948] Ch 465; approved in general terms by the House of Lords in Ministry of Health v Simpson [1951] AC 251. See also Re Leslie Engineering Co [1976] 1 WLR 292, 299, per Templeman J who considered the application of this remedy in relation to wrongly paid out assets in a corporate liquidation.

350 Lewin, 2000, 1334.

20.7 QUESTIONS AS TO THE NATURE OF THE LIABILITY OF STRANGERS

20.7.1 A question as to the extent of the remedy of personal liability to account

Will liability be limited according to fault?

There is one key problem with the remedy of personal liability to account. The liability attaches to the defendant either for receipt or for assistance, provided that the relevant mens rea of knowledge or dishonesty has been satisfied. The defendant is then liable for the whole of the loss suffered by the beneficiaries, the remedy appearing to be an all-or-nothing remedy on the decided cases. The only defences would appear to be those available to express trustees, considered above at section 20.5, including the beneficiaries' acquiescence in the defendant's actions. However, there is a different sense in which the defendant's liability might be reduced: that is, to recognise that the defendant is possibly not culpable for the whole of the loss. There is no equitable defence comparable to the common law defence available to the defendant in the form of the defence of contributory negligence in relation to the law of tort, in which the defendant can admit liability but nevertheless demonstrate that the claimant's loss was not due entirely to the defendant's actions. The defendant to a claim for liability to account in equity has not been awarded such a defence in the cases considered here. It would seem, in general terms, possible for a court of equity to exercise its discretion so as to measure the extent of the defendant's culpability for the loss suffered by the beneficiaries.

Suppose, for example, that the defendant was secretary to a fiduciary who intended to defraud the trust by transferring all of the trust's money into his personal bank account and then to disappear to a new life in the South of France. Suppose further that the fiduciary told the secretary of his entire plan one evening in the office and asked her to go out and buy him three large Samsonite suitcases in which he could conceal the cash. If the secretary was uneasy as to whether or not her boss was joking, and agreed to buy her boss's suitcases and then watched her boss fill the suitcases with the cash he had drawn from the bank that morning, we would have to say that she assisted the breach of trust in the broadest possible sense. We might also say that she was dishonest for not doing what an honest person would have done³⁵¹ – perhaps to have asked her boss outright whether or not he had in fact stolen that cash from the trust's bank account. Nevertheless, she has no actual knowledge that a crime is taking place and she is not directly involved in the commission of the crime.

An easier situation would be that in which the secretary agreed to have the money paid into bank accounts which she opened under false names at her boss's instruction so that her boss would not be suspected of having taken the money from the bank accounts. Here we might consider that the secretary was more dishonest than before because she had undertaken dishonest acts – opening the bank accounts under a false name – which assisted the breach of trust. Consequently, the secretary's level of liability would appear to be much higher in this circumstance than in the preceding example where she was possibly innocently caught up in someone else's fraud. In this situation, an honest person would have asked why she was being asked to open bank accounts in false names, at the very least. In either situation, theoretically, the secretary may be held to be liable for acting dishonestly on an objective test like that in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan.

351 The test laid down by Lord Nicholls for 'dishonesty' in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378.

The question arises whether her liability ought to be the same in both factual situations. In the first example, she would be able to claim that she was only partly responsible for the loss suffered by the beneficiaries because, while perhaps not entirely honest, she was not after all the person who stole the money. Nevertheless, if her boss absconded so that he could not be found so as to be sued, the claim based on personal liability to account may impose liability on the secretary for the entirety of the loss,³⁵² whereas in the second example the secretary would clearly be far more culpable for the loss suffered by the trust and yet there is nothing, as yet, on the cases to indicate that her liability would be any greater than in the first example. It is suggested in such a situation that a court of equity ought to measure the extent to which that secretary was liable and require her to account to the beneficiaries only to that extent. The court ought to impose liability to an extent commensurate only with the extent of the defendant's culpability for the loss suffered by the breach of trust.

Causation and loss

What is unclear is the extent to which a dishonest assistant is liable only for losses which flow directly from her assistance or for the whole of the losses flowing from the breach of trust if those losses are larger than those caused by the assistance.³⁵³ Suppose there is a breach of trust whereby four oil paintings, which were held on trust, were taken from the trust fund and sold. If the assistant assisted only with the appropriation of one of the four paintings – perhaps because she was a security guard in the gallery where that one painting was stored – then it would seem reasonable to find that the defendant be liable for the loss stemming from the loss of that one painting rather than from all four. Otherwise, the question is the same question as in the preceding section: that is, to what extent can liability be reduced if one contributes only in part to a larger conspiracy which causes a large loss to the beneficiaries? So, if I am one of four conspirators, should I be liable for only one quarter of the total loss suffered by the beneficiaries, as a defendant to a negligence claim might be mutatis mutandis? Alternatively, assuming I am a security guard over an art gallery, if my dishonest assistance was intended to cause a single oil painting to be vulnerable to thieves (perhaps by switching off a single circuit on the alarm) but if I could not have conceived that the thieves would thus be able to steal the three further works of art at the same time, should I be liable for the entire loss or only for the loss which I anticipated as a result of my assistance? On the basis of the liability imposed on express trustees by Target Holdings v Redferns,³⁵⁴ it is not necessary to demonstrate causation or foreseeability; rather, liability will attach for the entire loss once there is some general causal connection between the action and the loss.

352 Ibid.

353 Derksen v Pillar [2002] All ER (D) 261, [32]. This case raised these issues but, being an interlocutory hearing, did not need to dispose of them.

354 [1996] 1 AC 421.

20.7.2 The distinction between the receipt-based and the assistance-based claim

Clearly there is a distinction to be drawn between receipt-based liability (knowing receipt) and fault-based liability (dishonest assistance). The latter claim is based solely on the wrong committed by the defendant in dishonestly assisting the breach of trust. As highlighted in section 20.2 above, the potential liability of advisors extends beyond those who are actively deceitful to those who take reckless risks in relation to property held on trust. In practice, this means that an advisor who advocates an investment which later loses the beneficiaries a large amount of money may be considered to have advocated a reckless risk and so be potentially liable for dishonesty.³⁵⁵

The difference between the two claims was stated in the following terms by the Court of Appeal in Grupo Toras v Al-Sabah:³⁵⁶

The basis of liability in a case of knowing receipt is quite different from that in a case of dishonest assistance. One is a receipt-based liability which may on examination prove to be either a vindication of persistent property rights or a personal restitutionary claim based on unjust enrichment by subtraction; the other is a fault-based liability as an accessory to a breach of fiduciary duty.

The suggestion made here is that knowing receipt is a property law claim that seeks to vindicate the property rights of the claimant. The form of vindication is not a restoration of the original property to the claimant, but rather a cash payment equivalent to the value of that lost property to the beneficiary. It is said by some that the claim is based on reversal of unjust enrichment:³⁵⁷ but this is simply not a tenable position. It is said by those people that the unjust enrichment takes effect by way of subtraction of the enrichment: however, the measure of liability here is the loss to the beneficiaries and not the enrichment gained by the defendant. It may well be that the defendant received property worth £10,000 but was enriched by only £500 (for example, by way of a commission): in that circumstance, the claimant would be entitled to only £500 by way of subtraction of the unjust enrichment, whereas the remedy of knowing receipt entitles the beneficiaries to recover their entire loss, that is, £10,000, from the defendant and not merely the extent of her enrichment. Similarly, the claim for dishonest assistance realises a remedy equal to the loss suffered by the beneficiaries.

Nevertheless, it has been suggested that the knowing receipt claim is restitutionary in many contexts.³⁵⁸ There is another basis on which a suggestion that knowing receipt is restitutionary can be rejected. Knowing receipt is predicated on the knowledge of the defendant that there has been some breach of trust. In consequence, knowing receipt is not concerned to impose liability to return property to the claimant – because that would form a tracing claim – but rather to compensate the beneficiaries for the loss which they suffered in part because of the defendant's receipt of property in breach of trust. That liability is faced not because the defendant retains some traceable proceeds of that trust property in her hands,

355 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378.

356 (2000) unreported, 2 November, CA.

357 See also Millett, 1998:2, 399: arguing for replacing constructive trusteeship by restitution. Also Fox, 1998, 391: considering what form of 'notice' is required in knowing receipt, and Smith, 1999, 294.

358 Birks, 2002:2.

but rather because her knowledge of the breach of trust constituted that receipt a wrongful act. Where alternative tests of dishonesty or of unconscionability are imposed, rather than one of knowledge, that merely underlines the assertion that the claim is fault-based, and so not within the restitutionary canon. The requirement that the defendant must have acted unconscionably only underlines this point. There may be circumstances in which the defendant looks to be effecting restitution where the loss is equal to the value of the property received, but it is perfectly possible that the liability for which the defendant is liable as though a trustee is greater than the value of the property received in breach of trust. Therefore, the liability is a liability in equity, which was recognised as long ago as Barnes v Addy as imposing liability for the defendant's participation in a breach of trust. The form of equitable compensation for which trustees may be liable in relation to breach of trust was considered in section 18.3.

The further point relates to that made at section 12.9 above as to the possibility of the court deciding that the defendant was only liable in part for the loss suffered by the beneficiaries, and therefore that she would be liable only for the loss which could be said to have been caused by her act. It is suggested that an equitable remedy of liability to account should permit a flexible obligation on the part of the defendant to account to the extent to which she is culpable for the loss. This would be broadly in line with the remedy for a person who was expressly appointed as a trustee, for whom there is liability only where there is some causal connection between the breach of trust and the loss.³⁵⁹

359 Target Holdings v Redfems [1996] 1 AC 421.

Part 7

Commercial uses of trusts

This page intentionally left blank

Commerce, international trusts law and dealing with property

21.1	INTRODUCTION	1037
21.2	EQUITY AND COMMERCE	1039
21.2.1	Keeping equity out of commercial transactions	1039
21.2.2	Developing the commercial trust	1042
21.2.3	The interaction between trusts law and contract law	1044
21.2.4	Exclusion of liability through the trust instrument or through contract	1047
21.2.5	Themes in international trusts law	1050
21.2.6	The nature of equitable remedies in company law	1057
21.2.7	Equity as a risk	1059
21.2.8	In defence of equity	1060

21.1 INTRODUCTION

This chapter considers the way in which trusts are used in commercial transactions. One of the themes in many of the later sections of this book is the difficulties which ensue when disputes arising from the real-world activities of the parties to litigation – for example, the financial transactions at issue in the local authority swaps cases – are dealt with by the courts according to the long-established norms of legal categories like contract law, trusts law and so on. What happens frequently is that the lawyers translate issues from the language of finance and commerce into the language of law. Sometimes this can lead to the courts dealing with the parties' dispute in ways which they did not expect. This is mainly because law uses its own language and its own concepts when thinking about disputes. Law is primarily all language.¹ In studying this subject of equity and trusts, the reader has had to learn a new language in which ordinary English words like 'demise', 'trust' and 'interest' have been given technical meanings by lawyers. This process of translation arises in all litigation. This chapter will consider the particular context of commercial transactions – replete with their own technical language, their own norms and their own objectives – when they come into contact with equity. As we shall see, commercial people tend to be very suspicious of the use of the sort of discretionary judicial remedies considered in this book, although they have been eager to exploit express trusts, floating charges and the early trust-based company models developed by equity. The use of equitable concepts by commerce has been a complex process.

¹ See generally Goodrich, 1990.

In this Part of this book we are considering differences in approach from commercial law, equity, the law of property, partnership law and company law. It seems a little counter-intuitive that cases decided ultimately by the same members of the House of Lords and Court of Appeal² can nevertheless generate different legal rules depending on the question that is put to them. Nevertheless, it is true. As will emerge from the discussion to follow, commercial law has developed different forms of estoppel (at common law) and different forms of rules as to proprietary rights in mixed funds in some contexts. So in this chapter we will see that commercial lawyers have adopted a different approach to title in mixtures of property from that in the law of trusts. An example of this phenomenon is the requirement in the law of trusts that property be segregated for there to be a possibility of asserting proprietary rights over it,³ which is met by some commercial law cases and statute on the basis that the claimants may be considered to be tenants in common of a mixed fund without the need for identification of their segregated share.⁴ We will observe a number of contexts in which the approaches of other areas of law to problems long-decided by judges in relation to the law of trusts have taken different and anomalous paths.

In many situations, the reasons for this difference in path will be a desire among commercial lawyers for commonsensical approaches to business questions. So in commercial law we will first examine an impatience with the niceties of equity before exploring the detail of particular rules which show a difference in the thinking of trusts lawyers and commercial lawyers – as though equity were something which can be taken up or left at will. In effect, we will observe that there is frequently one rule for commercial people and a different rule for everyone else.⁵

What is perhaps also surprising is the notion that lawyers are not omni-capable, but rather prefer to specialise in a narrow group of rules which are unique to their own field of specialisation. Naively, one might think that any ‘lawyer’ ought to know of all the rules of property and apply them evenly in the contexts of commerce, intellectual property and so forth, as one would in relation to an ordinary land dispute.⁶ In truth, lawyers in practice tend to become specialised in particular areas of law and so do not have such a breadth of knowledge. Perhaps it is a feature of our rapidly changing world that it is impossible to know everything that relates to all areas of law; instead we are separated into our own ghettos of special competence.⁷ It is only if those, at one time, globalising and fragmenting processes are observed that we can hope to understand how commercial law could ever succeed in separating its own norms from the ordinary norms of equity.

2 Much of the difference, of course, rests with the different divisions of the High Court.

3 Re Goldcorp [1995] 1 AC 74, considered at section 3.4 above.

4 Sale of Goods (Amendment) Act 1995.

5 A phenomenon which I have referred to elsewhere as the privatisation of law by commercial people: meaning that commercial people, through arbitration and other devices, are able to hide their disputes from the ordinary processes of law and are able to convince the courts that their particular economic context requires special treatment.

6 Hudson, 2004:4.

7 Elias, 1990; Hudson, 2004:4.

21.2 EQUITY AND COMMERCE

21.2.1 Keeping equity out of commercial transactions

One of the principal interactions between commercial law and equity has been a desire on the part of commercial lawyers to keep equity out of commercial cases.⁸ The thinking is this: the law dealing with commercial contracts requires certainty so that commercial people can transact with confidence as to the legal treatment of their activities. Consequently, it is said, discretionary remedies and equitable doctrines are likely to disturb commercial certainties and therefore should be avoided. However, what this thinking fails to admit is the need for some ethical norms to govern commercial life in the same way that they govern non-commercial life. This is accepted to some extent by commercial lawyers in any event: the laws on fraud, on restitution of mistaken payments and so forth impose a morality as to the legal treatment of such phenomena. Furthermore, the whole edifice of the regulation of financial markets, codes of practice for many business activities and so on also indicate an acceptance by policymakers and by commercial people that commercial activity cannot exist in a state of complete anarchy. What the commercial lawyers are keen to avoid is any further discretion on the part of judges to interfere with the terms of their carefully crafted contractual documentation and also, in some markets, the well-understood conventions on which such transactions are carried out.

Many commercial markets develop their own legal norms which they seek to protect because their users consider them to be efficient, or because there is a settled understanding between those users as to how they operate so that they control the amount of risk involved in their business activities. The standard market documentation and the jargon used in financial derivatives markets are very good examples of this phenomenon of the conflict between legal norms and commercial norms.⁹ The local authority swaps cases, such as Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC,¹⁰ were the first to bring derivatives (in the form of interest rate swaps) before a court. Before then, the lawyers advising the investment banks had formed a settled, common view that such transactions would cause no problems when conducted with local authorities. In such a situation, in theoretical terms, the closed world of the derivatives markets – a small community of investment bankers specialising in structuring these highly complex financial instruments for large corporate clients, serviced by specialist lawyers in the major commercial law firms – met the closed world of the legal system – with its notions of proprietary rights, of restitution of money, and of the limited powers of local authorities – with the result that their norms clashed.¹¹ The investment banks had thought that their contracts were valid, whereas the courts held that they were void.¹² The investment banks then thought that the complex contracts used to document derivatives transactions¹³ would govern the manner in which those transactions were unwound, with the result, inter alia, that they would receive compound interest on the moneys which had been transferred to the local authorities under those transactions; whereas 8 Millett, 1998; Goode, 1998.

9 Hudson, 2002, 93; Hudson, 2006.

10 [1996] AC 669.

11 Hudson, 1999:1, which is an analysis of these cases generally; Hudson, 2000:2, on the systemic irritation (to use the theoretical jargon) between principles of finance and principles of law.

12 Hazell v Hammersmith & Fulham [1992] 2 AC 1.

13 Hudson, 2002, 379, Hudson, 2006.

the courts held, first, that where the contracts were beyond the powers of the local authority the terms of those contracts were ineffective¹⁴ and, secondly, that there was no entitlement to compound interest in circumstances in which the claimant retained no title in the property transferred, whether under trust or otherwise.¹⁵ It is this kind of conflict between the law – principally equity – and commercial practice which makes commercial people and their advisors nervous of equity. Equally, however, for those not bound in such markets, our concerns might equally well be with ensuring the power of the law and of equity in controlling commercial activities which contradict such norms.

This suspicion of the role of equity in commercial disputes is not restricted to the horny-handed practising lawyers but also is a commonplace of judicial thinking. In considering the types of trusts and remedies which equity leaves open to judges, the judges tend to consider it unsurprising that commercial lawyers, industrialists and bankers do not want to entrust their well-being to complicated ideas like equitable tracing, equitable compensation, and constructive trusts. As Mason put it:¹⁶ there is strong resistance, especially in the United Kingdom, to the infiltration of equity into commercial transactions . . . [arising] from apprehensions about the disruptive impact of equitable proprietary remedies, assisted by the doctrine of notice, on the certainty and security of commercial transactions.

It is in response to these fears that many distinct, commercial marketplaces have sought to develop standardised contractual documentation which allocates risks and imposes responsibilities in the event of a number of specified occurrences in an effort, primarily, to exclude the need to resort to general legal principles in relation to their shared contracts.

So it is that the shipping community has devised the Hague-Visby Rules and the Hamburg Rules in relation to carriage of goods by sea. Similarly, the construction industry has developed the JCT 500 contract not only to standardise the legal provisions of ordinary transactions, but also to arrive at a common understanding of the risks which are to be borne by the contracting parties. In both cases what we see is an autopoietic¹⁷ closure of the legal norms and the commercial goals of those parties: that is, an attempt to separate off the legal treatment of that activity from other areas of human activity.¹⁸

On a slightly different model, many areas of international banking practice have sought to develop standard form contracts both for well-established areas of activity like commodities trading and also for more anarchic and less well-understood areas like financial derivatives. The aim is to reduce the risk associated with these markets by standardising the contracts which market participants sign, and also to create the impression that there are standard conventions governing the conduct of such business. It is also hoped by its participants that the international derivatives market can be sealed off (or autopoietically closed) from general

14 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1994] 4 All ER 890, CA.

15 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669, HL.

16 Mason, 1997/98, 5; Lonrho Exports Ltd v Export Credits Guarantee Department [1999] CL 158, 182.

17 Autopoiesis being a theory based on the science of biology considering how closed cells are able to ingest and excrete material: in the same way social systems are said to become closed off from one another, leading social scientists to study the ways in which information, norms and communications are exchanged between such systems. See Teubner, 1994.

18 Hudson, 1999:4; and Hudson, 2000:2.

legal norms. The assumptions blithely made by the parties are that, first, it is a desirable thing for bankers to be permitted to generate their own norms without outside agencies (like the courts) having the right to intervene and, secondly, that the norms of ordinary private law ought not to be permitted to comment on the probity of the actions of participants in such markets. In effect, the bankers want to be hermetically sealed off from the ordinary law because they consider that there is something different and special about commercial life.¹⁹

These marketplaces are therefore attempting to close themselves off from censure by the outside world. The aim of the commercial or finance lawyer is generally to remove the need to rely on litigation or the application of the courts' discretion. A reasonable expression of these concerns can also be found in the words of Lord Browne-Wilkinson: '... wise judges have often warned against the wholesale importation into commercial law of equitable principles inconsistent with the certainty and speed which are essential requirements for the orderly conduct of business affairs.'²⁰ These principles are derived from older authorities such as Barnes v Addy,²¹ as well as being discernible in more modern ones such as Scandinavian Trading Tanker Co AB v Flota Petrolera Ecuatoriana.²² For finance lawyers, maintaining the distance between the counterparties and the courts is the primary element in their risk management functions. The advising lawyer's role is primarily a prophylactic one.

This issue of certainty is typically linked by the judiciary to a need to protect the integrity of commercial contract and not to allow other considerations to intrude unless absolutely necessary. The problem is said to be the intervention of some legal principle outwith the expectation of the parties. As Robert Goff LJ has said:²³

It is of the utmost importance in commercial transactions that, if any particular event occurs which may affect the parties' respective rights under a commercial contract, they should know where they stand. The court should so far as possible desist from placing obstacles in the way of either party ascertaining his legal position, if necessary with the aid of advice from a qualified lawyer, because it may be commercially desirable for action to be taken without delay, action which may be irrecoverable and which may have far-reaching consequences. It is for this reason, of course, that the English courts have time and again asserted the need for certainty in commercial transactions – the simple reason that the parties to such transactions are entitled to know where they stand, and to act accordingly.

The essence of commercial certainty is therefore said to be the minimal use of discretionary remedies. See, for example, Leggatt LJ in the Court of Appeal in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC,²⁴ who was moved by similar concerns and cited his own words from the earlier case of Scandinavian Trading Tanker Co AB v Flota Petrolera Ecuatoriana.²⁵

19 Hudson, 2000:1, Chapter 1.

20 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669, 695.

21 (1874) 9 Ch App 244.

22 [1983] 2 WLR 248.

23 Ibid., 257.

24 [1994] 4 All ER 890.

25 [1983] 2 WLR 248, 258.

Tempting though it may be to follow the path which Lloyd J was inclined to follow in The Afvos,²⁶ we do not feel that it would be right to do so. The policy which favours certainty in commercial transactions is so antipathetic to the form of equitable intervention invoked by the charterers in the present case that we do not think it would be right to extend that jurisdiction to relieve time charterers from the consequences of withdrawal.

However, it might also be argued that equity offers a particularly valuable means by which our social mores and culture can express affirmation or disapprobation of certain forms of commercial activity.

21.2.2 Developing the commercial trust

The issue is therefore whether a particular form of trust is called for which would satisfy the needs of commercial people, and if so, what the fundamentals of such a trust would be. The ordinary trust developed as a means of enabling land to be vested in one person but held ‘to the use of another’. The trust evolved, as considered in Chapter 2, to deal with all forms of property, from land through choses in action to assets like non-transferable milk quotas.²⁷ A more modern statement of the nature of the trust delivered by Lord Browne-Wilkinson identified it as being founded solely on the regulation of the conscience of the trustee.²⁸ The fact cannot be avoided that the trust is an ethical response to the knowledge and the conscience of the common law owner of property.

The argument would be that these foundations are insufficient to sustain the precise needs of commercial people in a global market economy; that there ought to be trusts developed which cater specifically for commercial situations. For example, the role of the Quistclose trusts fits, for some writers, into a stream of discussion about retention of title in commercial contracts generally – see Chapter 22 below²⁹ – the argument being that equity is responding to the needs of commercial people and using the trust structure to fit into that context. Similarly, in the local authority swaps cases, complex subject matter from the world of global finance intruded into a seismic debate about the structure and future legal treatment of personal and proprietary rights to property.³⁰

It is this writer’s opinion that the law should not pander to those wishes but that it should generate principles which are suitable for deciding such cases in the abstract. Evidently, that is a proposition which requires some expansion: the line between ‘pandering’ and ‘acting suitably’ may appear to be paper thin. The core of the problem is that the traditional rules relating to the availability of proprietary remedies sit uneasily in the commercial context. Principles which were created with family trusts in mind do not respond well to the requirements and challenges of commercial contracts. As Lord Browne-Wilkinson said in Target Holdings v Redferns:³¹

26 [1980] 2 Lloyd’s Rep 469.

27 Don King Productions v Warren [1998] 2 All ER 608; affirmed [1999] 2 All ER 218; Re Celtic Extraction Ltd (In Liquidation); Re Bluestone Chemicals Ltd (In Liquidation) [1999] 4 All ER 684; Swift v Dairywise Farms [2000] 1 All ER 320 (milk quotas are property, even if nontransferable).

28 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669, HL.

29 Worthington, 1996; Moffat, 1999.

30 Hudson, 2000:2, 62.

31 [1996] AC 421.

In the modern world the trust has become a valuable device in commercial and financial dealings. The fundamental principles of equity apply as much to such trusts as they do to the traditional trusts in relation to which those principles were originally formulated. But in my judgment it is important, if the trust is not to be rendered commercially useless, to distinguish between the basic principles of trust law and those specialist rules developed in relation to traditional trusts which are applicable only to such trusts and the rationale of which has no application to trusts of quite a different kind.³²

As his Lordship said, there is a need for equity to winnow out those principles which are of use only in family and similar situations. Similarly, equity must ensure that it does develop specialist rules which are appropriate to the deciding of commercial cases. It is perhaps somewhat ironic that Lord Browne-Wilkinson both set out this call for the possible need for equity to adopt a new approach in the commercial context and then delivered the leading speech in the House of Lords in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC,³³ in which the existing rules are consolidated in contradistinction to laying the groundwork for the development of such new commercial principles.

There are a number of problems for the Chancery courts in considering commercial transactions. The first is that it is often possible for the courts to interfere with freedom to contract only where there has been some unconscionable behaviour which amounts to provable fraud. The other is the difficulty of intruding on freedom of contract by replacing the precise terms of the agreement with some standard arrived at by applying principles according to conscionability – for example, by judges fixing the price of the contract.

For example, how is equity to respond to a situation in which someone contends that a commercial contract was unjust on the basis that, ex post facto, the claimant has suffered greater losses than that person had expected? One approach would be to leave the parties to reap what they have sown – that is, you entered into the contract, you must bear its consequences. That might appear to be a suitable approach where the parties are of equal bargaining strength.³⁴ Alternatively, we might take the approach that some transactions necessarily place one person in a position of strength as against another person. An example would be as regards a mortgage over residential property, in which the mortgagee will typically have greater expertise than the mortgagor.³⁵ In many circumstances, statute will intervene to protect the inexperienced party from an unconscionable bargain.³⁶

In his book The Rise and Fall of Freedom of Contract, Professor Atiyah addressed precisely this difficulty of legal intervention in contracts which proved ultimately to be to the disadvantage of one party or another.³⁷ As he put it:

A person who indulges in a foolish speculation is apt to feel, after the speculation has failed, that it was an unfair arrangement. Of course, the same is true of any transaction which necessarily involves some element of risk, though that is not nearly so obvious to the parties involved.

32 See Nolan, [1996] LMCLQ 161.

33 [1996] AC 669.

34 Multiservice Bookbinding v Marden [1979] Ch 84, per Browne-Wilkinson J.

35 Fairclough v Swan Brewery [1912] AC 565; cf Knightsbridge Estates Trust v Byrne [1938] Ch 741.

36 See, eg, Consumer Credit Act 1974, s 137.

37 Atiyah, 1979, 174.

So, the person who suffers such a loss is likely to argue that there was unconscionable behaviour in the dealing which led to the creation of the arrangement in the first place. In the 18th century, the South Sea Bubble crisis produced a litany of litigation. For example, there were a number of decisions which set aside contracts on the basis that they were ‘against natural justice’, in the words of the court in Stent v Baillie,³⁸ simply because the losses which they generated were considered by the judges of the time to be so extraordinarily large. In Stent v Baillie, shares had been sold at a vastly inflated price at the height of speculative fever and the courts were not prepared to enforce the contracts. Similarly, inflated house prices were not enforced by the courts where the purchaser had lost money after the South Sea Bubble burst, even though he had already contracted for the purchase of the property.³⁹ The Lord Chancellor held in *Savile v Savile*⁴⁰ that the property ‘would appear dear sold and consequently a bargain not fit to be executed by this court’. As Professor Atiyah saw it, there was a clash of moralities between the ‘paternal, protective Equity’ of the old school and ‘the newer individualism, stressing risk-taking, free choice, rewards to the enterprising and sharp, and devil take the hindmost’.⁴¹ What better summary of the role of equity in the context of commercial markets? What we need not do, however, is to abandon the notion of conscience, because that is a sufficiently flexible idea to be applied in commercial and in non-commercial contexts: a notion considered again in Chapter 32.⁴² The parallel with contract law, however, is one which has been developed further by some commentators, as considered next.

21.2.3 The interaction between trusts law and contract law

The contractarian argument

By contrast with the problems identified above in equity’s perceived uncertainty, contract law is often considered to offer a haven of dependability for commercial lawyers. Consequently, in commercial practice there is a drive to displace the perceived uncertainties of trusts law, and in particular the beneficiary principle, in favour of the more familiar territory of the law of contract. The chief advocate of this view has been Professor Langbein. Langbein is determined that every trust is part of a larger contract, and therefore that there is no need to consider the nature of the trust in isolation from the contractual matrix of which it forms a part.⁴³ The argument proceeds as follows. All trusts are said to be based on a contract between the settlor and the trustee such that the prevailing code of law governing that relationship is to be considered to be the law of contract rather than the law of property. In most commercial situations, this analysis-opening assertion will frequently – but not always⁴⁴ – be correct. Commercial parties will receive advice from lawyers and others as to 38 (1724) 2 P Wms 217.

39 Savile v Savile (1721) 1 P Wms 745, (1721) 24 ER 596. Also Keen v Stuckley (1721) Gilb Rep 155, (1721) 25 ER 109.

40 Savile v Savile (1721) 1 P Wms 745, (1721) 24 ER 596, 597.

41 Atiyah, 1979.

42 See section 32.2 below.

43 Langbein, 1995, 625.

44 See Re Kayford [1975] 1 WLR 279, considered in para 3.3.1 above, a commercial situation involving a mail order company’s dealings with its customers where the trust was unconscionous.

the creation of their trust. The trustees will often be professionals who, as professionals, will agree to act as trustees only if their duties and liabilities are controlled by contract.⁴⁵ Consequently, Langbein considers this contract to be the heart of the trust because it sets out the precise ambit of the trustees' obligations. This would not mean, inter alia, that it would be necessary for there to be any beneficiary able to satisfy the beneficiary principle,⁴⁶ but rather it would be sufficient to establish a trust if there were a contract demonstrating an intention to create a trust. Such a view means that all questions as to the enforceability of the trust fall to be considered by reference to the law of contract rather than the law of trusts.

Before continuing any further with this analysis it is worth pointing out that this fundamental assertion is wrong. Many trusts are not bound up with a contract. In relation to commercial practice, it is true that there will commonly be a commercial contract which uses a trust as a device to hold security for payment, or a contract for services whereby some person will be limiting his liability and identifying his fee in return for acting as trustee. To that extent there will be a contract; and to that extent the Court of Appeal has held that this contract ought to limit even trustees' liability for breach of trust if the terms of the contract require that – even where the trustee has been guilty of gross negligence.⁴⁷ However, many express trusts arise without a contract in will trusts and in situations like those in *Paul v Constance*⁴⁸ or Re Kayford,⁴⁹ where the courts imply that the parties have created something akin to a trust but which the parties themselves did not realise was a trust. These sorts of 'unconscious express trusts' may occur naturally in the wild in great profusion but they are unlikely to have enough at stake to reach the Chancery courts: that is, there are probably many of them in the world but very few of them will ever be litigated upon. Self-evidently, constructive trusts and resulting trusts do not depend upon a contract for their existence. Langbein does acknowledge that there are a few exceptional cases, such as will trusts, but he does not include the very common examples of resulting, constructive, unconscious express and implied trusts in that list. It is not true to say that trusts are built on contracts in all cases: consequently, I would suggest that we should treat with caution any argument that the principles of express trusts law be overthrown in favour of contractarian or other obligations-based theories.⁵⁰

To return to the central argument of Langbein's essay: trusts should be considered as being contracts at root and therefore it should not matter that there is or is not a beneficiary who can satisfy the beneficiary principle. This is particularly important for a range of vehicles used to hold assets for tax avoidance purposes, whereby those who contribute to a fund might wish to appear to have no beneficial interest in that fund for tax purposes but nevertheless be able to rely on the assistance of a discretionary trustee looking favourably upon them when the time comes to distribute the fruits of the fund. It is important that no individual be identifiable as a beneficiary for two reasons. First, so that no revenue authority can identify any profit-generating property in any of the participants. Secondly, so that no individual can claim entitlement to the fund in the absence of any other person and so establish a beneficial

45 See para 8.5.1 above.

46 See section 4.1 above.

47 Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241.

48 [1977] 1 WLR 527.

49 [1975] 1 WLR 279.

50 Matthews, 2002, 144.

claim to the fund ahead of the participants. This second feature means that there is no beneficiary capable of satisfying the beneficiary principle.

Trusts in investment contracts

In this book we have already considered the interaction of trusts and contract on a number of occasions. First, when seeking to define a trust by explaining that it imposed fiduciary duties on a trustee such that it was different from an ordinary contract which would not impose duties of that quality. Secondly, when considering the ability of trustees to exclude their own liability for dishonesty by means of an exclusion clause in the contract for their professional services.⁵¹ Thirdly, when considering the common intention constructive trust which awarded rights in the home in situations, inter alia, in which couples had entered into quasi-contractual agreements, arrangements or understandings as to the equitable ownership of the home.⁵² It was also considered in that discussion that the rules which equity was developing appeared to be more rigid and so more akin to common law doctrines than to classically equitable ones.⁵³ In each of these situations it was evident that contractual thinking was creeping into the law of trusts.

It was in a fourth context, however, that the key to the similarities between trust and contract emerged. In relation to trusts used for investment purposes – whether occupational pension funds or unit trusts – the role of the contract is important. There are a number of circumstances in which investment managers use trust structures for investment funds. Pension funds, insurance company-managed investment funds and unit trusts are all structured as trust funds. Also of importance in corporate finance are eurobond trustees and debenture trustees, both of which are required by applicable regulation to oversee securities issues in those contexts. There is a tension at the heart of each fund: on the one hand the parties' principal concerns are the performance of the fund's investments and the performance of their investment contract, whereas the legal analysis of their relationship is that of trustee and beneficiary. It has been suggested by some commentators that, for example, unit trusts ought to be considered to be in truth contracts rather than trusts (given that that is the parties' fundamental purpose)⁵⁴ with the result that the ordinary principles of the law of trusts would not apply to their arrangements.⁵⁵

In unit trusts, the investment manager and the investor enter into a contract for the investment of money in which the existence of a trust fund to hold the pooled investment capital appears to be secondary to the underlying commercial purpose of investment.⁵⁶ In the occupational pension fund it is clear that the management of the fund will require consideration of the pensioner's contract of employment as well as the scheme rules in many situations.⁵⁷ Therefore, in both of these contexts, the existence of a trust used to manage the capital is collateral to some underlying contractual purpose. The result of this observation might be 51 See para 8.5.1 above: Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241. Cf Walker v Stones [2000] 4 All ER 412.

52 See para 15.4.2 above.

53 See para 15.9.2 above.

54 Sin, 1997.

55 Hudson, 2000:1, generally.

56 See Thomas and Hudson, 2004, Chapter 51.

57 See para 26.1.1 below.

that we would consider such arrangements to be contractual in nature and so apply the rules of the law of contract to their analysis, rather than stricter trusts law rules as to fiduciary obligations and so forth. However, that there are contracts in place in these situations does not displace the existence of trusts in parallel. It is true to say that the contract might contain many of the terms governing the trustees' obligations, but that is no different, it is suggested, from those trusts obligations being contained in a trust deed in the same terms. The more important factor is that there are trusts in both of these contexts, and that trusts were selected by Parliament in the Pensions Act 1995 and in the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000⁵⁸ as being the most appropriate vehicle for the management of the capital in both. Therefore, the role of the trust outweighs the terms of the contract remains important. Trustees are obliged to obey those provisions in the pensions and in the unit trusts legislation which prevent the wholesale limitation of their liabilities in many circumstances.⁵⁹ Legislative policy was to maintain the duties of trustees as fiduciaries over these scheme managers as opposed to defining their obligations as being governed entirely by contract. Consequently, while we might identify a contractual, commercial purpose at the root of these funds, there is no doubt that the legal norms which govern them are trusts-based norms. The principles of trusts law are not intended to be limited in such situations. Rather, the trust continues to be used here precisely because it is something different from a contract: in particular because it is a mechanism by which those who manage property on behalf of others can be held to account.

The next two sections consider the ways in which the contractarian basis of trusts has been applied to trusts in other jurisdictions for the avoidance of taxation and other regulatory rules. Discussions of the investment models considered in this section can be found at www.alastairhudson.com/trustslaw.

21.2.4 Exclusion of liability through the trust instrument or through contract

One further context in which this contractarian argument is significant is in relation to the obligations of trustees. As was discussed in great detail in Chapter 8,⁶⁰ the Court of Appeal has held that trustees are able to limit their liabilities by including a provision in their contract of appointment which excludes liability for a range of defaults, including gross negligence, but not dishonesty.⁶¹ It is significant that the courts have found that a trustee's obligations are not mandatory in the sense that they are not enforced strictly in the abstract. Rather, a trustee can escape liability for gross negligence on the basis that he has contracted with the settlor to have his liability so excluded. This disturbs the ordinary understanding that a trustee's obligations are owed principally to the beneficiaries and that the settlor drops out of the picture qua settlor once the trust has been properly constituted.⁶² The alternative view would have been to say that, as a fiduciary, the trustee owes certain duties of competence and good faith to the beneficiaries which cannot be excluded by contract. That the law does not presently take that view is a serious abrogation of the principle that the trustees must do the best possible for the beneficiaries in all circumstances. The rationale behind this rule is easy to 58 Both of which continued the policies of earlier legislation in this respect.

59 See Thomas and Hudson, 2004, Chapter 51.

60 See para 8.5.1 above.

61 Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch 241.

62 Paul v Paul (1882) 20 Ch D 742.

identify of course: if the trustee could not rely on such contractual protection she might have refused to act as trustee at all, and therefore it would be wrong to expose her to liabilities which she had not voluntarily assumed. The great irony is that it will only be professional trustees who will be sufficiently knowledgeable to have such an exclusion clause included in their conduct of business agreement; non-professionals acting as trustees will not know that they ought to include such a provision to limit their liabilities. In consequence, the professional trustees will escape liability for failing properly to perform the actions for which they are being paid large fees and on the basis of which they have forged their professional reputations; amateur trustees will face liability for exactly the same sorts of defaults when they have never held themselves out as being professional trustees at all.

The development of these quasi-contractual exclusion clauses for the liabilities of trustees does appear to be – even if only for those trusts where there are contracts for services in place with the trustees – a limitation on the liabilities of the trustees imposed entirely by the law of contract. It could be suggested that this indicates that the obligations of the trustee are therefore personal obligations owed to the beneficiaries and not proprietary duties.⁶³ The alternative argument is that this development of exclusion clauses does no violence to the trust concept at all: the contract merely stands for the expression of the trustees' duties which could have been contained in a trust deed but which were included instead in a contract for services or a conduct of business agreement. The real question is a more essential one than that, however.

The real question is: if the trustees' duties are limited to such an extent, do they fall to be categorised as trustees' duties at all? The heart of the law on express trusts – remember, these questions do not arise in relation to constructive or resulting trusts – is that where the trust has been consciously created by the settlor in circumstances in which the legal owner of property is impressed with obligations of good conscience towards another person in relation to that property, there will be a trust. It is open to the settlor to limit the liabilities of that trustee as to her competence and so forth in the management of that property. The case law has never contained a quasi-statutory list of positive obligations which are borne by the trustee; rather, those obligations have tended to be negative: thou shalt not make secret profits;⁶⁴ thou shalt not permit conflicts of interest;⁶⁵ thou shalt not favour one beneficiary over another.⁶⁶ Positive obligations would require the trustees to perform given obligations to a given standard. The only senses in which the case law has imposed such obligations are in the limited contexts of generating the maximum feasible return in line with market practice,⁶⁷ investing as though for someone for whom one felt morally bound to provide,⁶⁸ and providing the beneficiaries with information as to the manner in which the trustees have managed the trust.⁶⁹ Therefore, there is, in truth, little that is added to trusts law by accepting that if the settlor agrees to limit the trustees' liabilities from the outset then the terms of that trust can be depended upon.

63 Penner, 2002.

64 Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46.

65 Ibid.

66 Nestlé v National Westminster Bank plc [1993] 1 WLR 1260, [1994] 1 All ER 118.

67 Ibid.

68 Speight v Gaunt (1883) 22 Ch D 727.

69 Re Beloved Wilkes Charity (1851) 3 Mac & G 440.

What is new, perhaps, is the idea that the trustee need act only honestly, but not necessarily competently, in the performance of her office as trustee. The root of the trust is identified in the speech of Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC (see para 21.2.2 above) as being concerned with the conscience of the legal owner of property. Therefore, provided that the trustee does not act in bad faith – through fraud, dishonesty, or similarly acting otherwise than as an honest person would have acted in those circumstances – then this accords with a restricted reading of that central principle. It is not to restrict the liabilities of the trustee to those of a mere party to an ordinary contract, because such a person would not ordinarily be liable, for example, to hold unauthorised profits from that contract on constructive trust for the beneficiaries, nor to provide for equitable compensation in the event that the beneficiaries suffered any loss from any breach of duty, nor (most significantly) to acquire a priority in that person's insolvency. There are enormous benefits to identifying someone as a trustee, even if the liability of such a trustee can be limited by contract. One problem which would be created if trusts were deemed to be a species of contract would be that trustee exemption clauses demanded by professional trustees might be considered to be unfair contract terms and might be unenforceable.

The courts have apparently accepted the notion that there is nothing wrong in principle with restricting one's liabilities as a trustee by means of contract, even in cases such as Walker v Stones,⁷⁰ in which the Court of Appeal otherwise expressed a nervousness at the idea that trustees should be able to use contractual exclusion clauses as a shield in all cases. There is nothing wrong in principle, of course, with the suggestion that my conscience is not affected if I undertake to manage your investments as a trustee entirely on the basis that I will do so only provided that I do not undertake any liability to you in the event that I act negligently. Suppose I make this stipulation because I am not a financial expert and therefore do not want to be held to account as though I was one. In such a situation, if the settlor agrees to my stipulation from the outset, I cannot be said to have acted in bad conscience if I do make negligent investments and seek not to be liable for the losses which those investments cause to you. Rather, our concern is with professional trustees who take large fees based on their assumed professional competence but who then seek to hide behind exclusion of liability clauses in the event that they turn out to be less adept than they had at first suggested. At first blush, the same argument applies to them: they have only agreed to act based on stipulations as to the limits of their liability, and consequently they are entitled to rely on them because otherwise they would not have entered into the contract. In such a situation, the question of conscience is a different one, as the House of Lords accepts in Twinsectra v Yardley.⁷¹ In that case, the test for dishonesty – at issue in *Armitage v Nurse*⁷² and *Walker v Stones*⁷³ – was expressed to be both an objective question as to how an honest person would have behaved in the circumstances and a subjective question as to whether or not the defendant realised that her behaviour would be considered to have been dishonest. In relation to a professional trustee, particularly one regulated under the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, it is suggested that any failure to observe the standards of financial regulation ought to constitute unconscionable behaviour on this subjective standard: that is, a

70 [2000] 4 All ER 412.

71 [2002] 2 All ER 377.

72 [1998] Ch 241.

73 [2000] 4 All ER 412.

professional trustee subject to such regulation cannot be permitted to act otherwise than in accordance with the diktat of such regulation. Thus, it is possible to impose ‘external’ constraints based on conscionability by courts of Equity while also observing the ‘internal’ limitations on liability imposed by any contract between trustee and settlor. In this way the notion of conscience, properly understood, can be adapted to apply effectively to commercial and to non-commercial situations. This issue is considered in greater detail in Chapter 32.⁷⁴

21.2.5 Themes in international trusts law

There are two principal themes in international trusts law which are dealt with in outline here. The first is the Hague Convention on the Recognition of Trusts, which concerns the recognition of the trusts law of some jurisdictions in other jurisdictions. The second is the pressure to adopt the contractarian approach to trusts law, outlined in para 21.2.3 above, brought to bear by offshore ‘tax havens’ to support the central place of trusts services in their economies.

Recognition of trusts

The Hague Convention on the recognition of trusts (that is, the Hague Convention on the Law Applicable to Trusts on their Recognition 1985) was incorporated into English law by the Recognition of Trusts Act 1987. There is not space here to consider this legislation in great detail.⁷⁵ Briefly put, the purposes of the Convention are threefold. First, to permit the settlor to provide for the governing law of a trust. That means that the system of rules which governs any disputes as to the trust can be selected by the settlor and therefore might not be English law. This raises the problem (in the next section) as to whether or not English law would recognise the analysis placed on a trust dispute by the chosen governing law if some question of English law – most probably revenue law – were raised. Secondly, a trust created in that manner is to be recognised in other signatory jurisdictions. Thirdly, the Convention seeks to preclude any signatory state through its trusts law seeking to disapply the more favourable rules of another state.

The Convention applies to trusts which are created voluntarily, and therefore does not apply to trusts implied by law.⁷⁶ Also outwith the scope of the Convention are testamentary trusts and lifetime settlements of foreign immovables and movables, in which cases ordinary rules of conflict of laws will apply. The choice of law in relation to a trust which does fall within the Convention is effective only if the system of rules chosen recognises the trust concept.⁷⁷ However, significantly, it is not necessary for the system of law chosen to have any connection with the trust, so that, for example, a trust declared in England by an English settlor with English trustees can theoretically have a different system of law from English law. It is possible to select different systems of law to govern different parts of a trust.

⁷⁴ See section 32.2 below.

⁷⁵ The reader is referred to Harris, 2002, generally.

⁷⁶ Hague Convention, Art 6.

⁷⁷ Ibid.

Where no express choice of law is made, the ‘law with which it is most closely connected’ will be the governing law of the settlement.⁷⁸ Therefore, the court will look at all the circumstances, including the jurisdiction where the settlor, trustees and beneficiaries are resident, the locus of the property and so forth. Weighing those factors, it will identify the jurisdiction with which the settlement has the closest connection.

Significantly, however, where there are overriding rules of the forum seized of the question, the Convention provides that that forum so seized is entitled to decide, if the trust has such a weak connection with the jurisdiction of its governing law, that the mandatory rules of the jurisdiction hearing the question should be applied instead.⁷⁹ This provision would be the Achilles heel for tax avoidance schemes which seek to select an artificial system of law as the governing law of the trust.

However, many commentators have suggested that these mandatory rules are limited to rules of conflict of laws and of international comity.⁸⁰

Offshore trusts services

The central question for offshore trusts service providers is whether or not the trust should be considered by English law to be equivalent in all material respects to the contract such that the beneficiary principle could be done away with. The clearest explanation of these offshore trusts structures is provided by Lord Walker in *Schmidt v Rosewood*⁸¹ in the opening paragraph of his opinion in the following terms:

It has become common for wealthy individuals in many parts of the world (including countries which have no indigenous law of trusts) to place funds at their disposition into trusts (often with a network of underlying companies) regulated by the law of, and managed by trustees resident in, territories with which the settlor (who may be also a beneficiary) has no substantial connection. These territories (sometimes called tax havens) are chosen not for their geographical convenience (indeed face-to-face meetings between the settlor and his trustees are often very inconvenient) but because they are supposed to offer special advantages in terms of confidentiality and protection from fiscal demands (and sometimes from problems under the insolvency laws, or laws restricting freedom of testamentary disposition, in the country of the settlor’s domicile). The trusts and powers contained in a settlement established in such circumstances may give no reliable indication of who will in the event benefit from the settlement. Typically it will contain very wide discretions exercisable by the trustees (sometimes only with the consent of a so-called protector) in favour of a widely-defined class of beneficiaries. The exercise of those discretions may depend upon the settlor’s wishes as confidentially imparted to the trustees and the protector. As a further cloak against transparency, the identity of the true settlor or settlors may be concealed behind some corporate figurehead.

⁷⁸ Ibid, Art 7.

⁷⁹ Ibid, Art 16.

⁸⁰ Mowbray et al, 2001, 297.

⁸¹ [2003] UKPC 26, [2003] 2 AC 709. Charman v Charman [2005] EWCA Civ 1606, [2006] 2 FLR 422, considers these issues in relation to ancillary relief proceedings in a matrimonial dispute.

Such trusts can be used simply to shelter assets from regulatory oversight, or to achieve objectives which are impossible in the settlor's home jurisdiction, or simply to hold the assets, or to hide assets from family members and others. While these structures are executed as trusts, they often also support investment arrangements between the service provider and the settlor-investor. The trust in such circumstances is merely a vehicle to make the investment possible. The parties' principal intention will be the investment contract between them. By reducing the trust from the level of a proprietary relationship, as traditionally understood in the English tradition in cases such as Saunders v Vautier, to that of a mere contract as Langbein suggests,⁸² the trust can be used as an investment device without the investors being recognised for tax purposes as having proprietary rights in the trust fund. Those jurisdictions commonly referred to as 'tax havens' have generally altered their own trusts law codes to accept as trusts such devices where there is no equitable, proprietary title for the beneficiary.⁸³ The concern of practitioners in such jurisdictions is that if English courts will not accept such structures as being trusts (and therefore consider the client-taxpayer to be still the absolute owner of the property on resulting trust principles),⁸⁴ then a so-called 'limping trust' is created⁸⁵ which would be accepted as being validly constituted in their jurisdiction but not in England. The argument is advanced by others⁸⁶ that there is no need to enforce the beneficiary principle strictly if there is some other person (typically dubbed a 'protector' or 'enforcer' in such a jurisdiction) who can sue as though a beneficiary under the trust, so satisfying the beneficiary principle by other means.

Trusts are problematic for financial regulators and law enforcement agencies generally because trusts can be created casually and trustees are not obliged to post accounts with any central agency (unlike companies in most jurisdictions). Consequently, trusts structures are frequently used by people who want to launder money associated with drug trafficking, arms dealing, or funding terrorism, as well as by people who more generally want to keep their financial affairs beyond the knowledge of financial regulators or tax authorities. The suggestion that English law should dispense with the beneficiary principle is therefore a proposal that, beyond trusts being used for these purposes, the beneficial owner of the property held on trust need not even have any proprietary right in the property which is, in reality, being held at her direction and for her benefit. The trust without the beneficiary principle would therefore make it easier for drug traffickers, arms dealers and terrorists to conceal their financial affairs in England and Wales, let alone in tax havens. Given the global climate at the time of writing, it is suggested that this is a development which should self-evidently be resisted.

In short, the matter is this: the trusts service providers in the tax havens want English trusts law to be fundamentally changed so that their clients can avoid liability to tax, or so that their clients can put assets beyond the reach of financial services and other regulatory authorities. While I am confident that this may be an exciting notion to many revenue law practitioners, I consider this to be a conspicuously bad reason to change English trusts law. These clients should simply pay their tax and give themselves up to regulation; English trusts law need not change.

82 As it is increasingly understood in the USA, with the possible exception of Nebraska.

83 For a discussion of these structures see the opening section of Lord Walker's judgment in Schmidt v Rosewood Trust Ltd [2003] UKPC 26, [2003] 3 All ER 76.

84 Vandervell v IRC [1967] 2 AC 291, HL.

85 Waters, 2002.

86 Hayton, 2001.

An example of an international trusts law code: STAR trusts in the Cayman Islands

This section gives an example of a trusts law code which was created solely to attract inward investment to a tax haven: in this instance, that is the STAR trust regime in the Cayman Islands. There are many other examples, as discussed in Thomas and Hudson, The Law of Trusts or the encyclopaedia International Trusts Law.⁸⁷

Much of the attraction of the STAR regime, in trusts law terms, is its approach to beneficiary principle and the possibility that the investor-settlor does not need to be identified as a beneficiary for her to take a benefit from the trust in practice.⁸⁸ The ‘STAR trust’ was created by statute in the Cayman Islands. The term ‘STAR’ derives from the name given to the statute – the ‘Special Trusts (Alternative Regime) Law 1997’ – which created this ‘special trust’ originally. That statute has since been consolidated into Part VII of the Trusts Law (2001 Revision). Cayman Islands trusts law operates in the following way by creating two types of trusts: ordinary trusts and STAR trusts.

The STAR trust does not require there to be a beneficiary who has any enforceable equitable rights; rather there will be an ‘enforcer’ who can proceed against the trustees in the event that the trustees do not perform their duties properly. So, in s 100(1) of the 2001 Revision Law (which used to be s 7(1) in the 1997 Law, which is the statute referred to in the journal literature debate discussed below):

A beneficiary of a special trust does not as such have standing to enforce the trust, or an enforceable right against a trustee or an enforcer, or an enforceable right to the trust property.

Clearly, this would not satisfy the beneficiary principle (as currently understood) in England because the beneficiary cannot enforce the trust in their capacity as a beneficiary and the beneficiary does not have an enforceable right to the trust property. However, it is valid under Cayman Islands trusts law. Furthermore, under s 100(2), only enforcers appointed for that purpose are entitled to enforce the trust. The enforcers are given the same rights as beneficiaries under an ordinary trust, although that should be interpreted to mean that they have rights of enforcement and not rights to take the trust property beneficially in that capacity. The enforcer ‘has the rights of a trustee’ under s 102(b).

If the investor does not have an equitable proprietary interest in the trust property, then (the argument runs) she will not have any rights to the profits earned from that trust, and therefore she will not be taxable on those profits. The efficacy of this argument under UK tax law has yet to be tested. The danger is that the UK position will be held to be that there must be someone with a proprietary right to the trust fund for there to be a valid trust, and that if there is no-one with such a valid right then the property rights will be deemed to pass back to the investor-settlor on resulting trust. The effect of that, under UK tax law, would be that tax on the trust’s profits would be assessable at the investor-settlor’s rate of tax.

Prof Paul Matthews has identified several problems with the STAR trust.⁸⁹ The key points are summarised here very briefly. First, the beneficiaries have no rights to enforce the trust 87 International Trusts Law is published by Jordans Publishing; as is the book which is distilled from that encyclopaedia, D Hayton (ed), The International Trust, 3rd edn, Jordans Publishing, 2011.

88 See Chapter 4 generally.

89 P Matthews, ‘Shooting STAR: the new special trusts regime from the Cayman Islands’ (1997) 11 Trust Law International 67.

as a result of s 100(1), which opens them up to abuse by the commercial operators of the trust and their appointed trustees. Secondly, the beneficiaries have no property rights in the trust property as a result of s 100(1). Consequently, the beneficiaries have only the 'bare enjoyment' of the property but no means of enforcing their rights to it. Thirdly, the enforcer is expressly empowered to act as though a trustee which confuses the fiduciary structure of the trust. Fourthly, no STAR trust can be void due to the uncertainty of its 'objects or mode of execution', which gives the trustees enormous power to act as though they were the settlor. Fifthly, the definition of a 'beneficiary' is so very broad – including 'a person who will or may derive a benefit or advantage, directly or indirectly, from the execution of a special trust' – that it may create problems as to the identity of the beneficiary.

Duckworth (who drafted the STAR trust legislation) responded to Matthews' critique.⁹⁰ Those arguments, in outline, were as follows. First, the STAR trust is intended to encompass a very broad range of situations and is consequently broadly expressed. For example, the STAR trust enables settlors to create so-called 'spendthrift trusts' so as to prevent unreliable family members from being able to take possession of the trust property as is possible in English law under the Saunders v Vautier principle (unless the trust is carefully structured). Secondly, it is common for there to be trusts – such as discretionary trusts – in which the beneficiaries have restricted property rights in practice. Thirdly, the enforcer protects the beneficiaries so that the beneficiaries do not need to have equitable rights. This is said to render the beneficiary principle unnecessary. Fourthly, STAR trusts will always be valid under Cayman Islands law, whereas English trusts may be invalid under the beneficiary principle. Fifthly, the definition of 'beneficiary' was intended to be as broad as possible.

There were several articles traded between Matthews and Duckworth in the so-called 'Star Wars debate'.⁹¹ There was simply no common ground between these two commentators: one setting out the problems from an English law perspective and the other advocating a business model which he had created in his own jurisdiction.

Professor David Hayton, as he then was, addressed the problem of the beneficiary principle head on.⁹² In essence, Hayton revisited the detail of the judgment in Re Denley and its use of the principle which was identified in Morice v Bishop of Durham to the effect that the mischief at which the beneficiary principle is directed is ensuring that there is someone in whose favour the court can decree performance. As Hayton explained the reasoning in Denley, there do not need to be beneficiaries with immediate possession of rights in the trust property; rather it is enough if there is someone who can control the trustees by taking them to court so that there is then someone in whose favour the court can decree performance. By extension, Hayton argues that the enforcer (or protector) concept provides someone in whose favour the court can decree performance of the trust: that does not need to be the beneficiary. Thus, argues Hayton, the trust's irreducible core content can include beneficiaries without rights against the trustees.

90 A Duckworth, 'STAR WARS: The Colony Strikes Back', (1998) 12 Trust Law International 16.

91 P Matthews, 'STAR: big bang or red dwarf?' (1998) 12 Trust Law International 98; A Duckworth, 'STAR WARS: Smiting the Bull', (1999) 13 Trust Law International 158; P Matthews, 'Paul Matthews writes', (1999) 13 Trust Law International 168.

92 D Hayton, 'Developing the Obligation Characteristic of the Trust' (2001) 117 LQR 97. See also the essays in D Hayton, Extending the Boundaries of Trusts and Similar Ring-fenced Funds, Kluwer Law International, 2002 (including a reprint of LQR article).

Protectors and enforcers

Protectors do not exist formally in English trusts law in the sense that the term ‘protector’ has no technical meaning in English law, and yet protectors are used frequently. That may seem to be an impossible paradox but it is a fair representation of the position in practice. It is commonly the case that someone – we shall call them a ‘protector’, although sometimes the term ‘enforcer’ is used, sometimes ‘appointor’ – is appointed under the terms of a trust to look after the interests of the beneficiaries by controlling some of the trustees’ functions or by ensuring that the settlor’s intentions are put into effect. This may be done by giving the protector a right to veto the actions or decisions or exercises of discretion by the trustees, or by giving the protector the right to appoint trust property for specified purposes, or by giving the protector the right to appoint or remove trustees, or by giving the protector the right to negotiate and to settle trustees’ fees and other commissions.⁹³ This needs to be done, for UK tax purposes, in such a way that the trustees do not appear to have their freedom to manage the trust’s affairs controlled by the protector.⁹⁴

The question arises as to the proper analysis of the protector’s role under English trusts law. It is important to remember that in the English trusts lexicon there is no single definition of what is meant by the term ‘protector’. Under many other systems of trusts law – particularly in offshore jurisdictions – specific legislation has been drafted to specify the role and purpose of such protectors. In England and Wales, however, no such legislation nor any such case law principles exist. Thus the following analysis is predicated entirely on argument, rather than on authority. For many practitioners in the international trusts law world protectors are so commonplace that the discussion to follow may dismay them.

The first possibility is that protectors are in fact trustees themselves. The careful structuring of the tax avoidance specialist will seek to have the protector occupy no trustee-like role; however, if the protector is able to veto the decisions of trustees and so forth then the issue must arise whether or not the protector is in truth acting as some sort of trustee. If the trustees decide to invest in x and the protector intervenes to prevent an investment in x, how are we to understand the power of this protector? This person has the right to gainsay the decisions of trustees and therefore she must be acting with a power equivalent to that of trustees. Could this protector act capriciously in so doing? The answer must be ‘no’. If the protector is able to overturn the decisions of the trustees, then the protector is empowered to act in relation to another person’s right in property, namely the beneficiaries. This must constitute a fiduciary role if it involves control of the decisions of the trustees themselves. Given that the protector’s actions will have direct effects on the rights of the beneficiaries to the trust fund, it must be the case that the protector is occupying a fiduciary capacity in deciding whether or not to gainsay the decisions of the trustees. Taking control of the decisions of the trustees in this manner means that the protector is able to take control of the rudder of the trustees’ actions and decisions. I would suggest that if this person were not named ‘protector’ in the trust instrument already then any person who took control of the trust in this fashion would be considered to be a trustee de son tort and so be construed to be a trustee.⁹⁵ That is, ‘if one, not being a trustee . . . takes upon himself to intermeddle with trust matters or to do acts characteristic of the office of trustee, he may therefore make himself what is called in law trustee of his own wrong'.⁹⁶ Either way, the protector is acting in loco trustee and so must be considered to be a species of trustee with control over certain aspects of the trust property.

93 See Venables, Non-resident Trusts, Key Haven Publications, 1999.

94 Venables, 1999.

95 See para 12.8.

The second possibility relates to the preceding section whereby the protector exists so that there need not be any beneficiary with vested proprietary rights which might attract liability to tax. The trustees' aim is to seek investors who will contribute to the trust fund in the expectation that the presence of a protector will replace the need for the beneficiaries to have any vested proprietary rights in that trust fund – if the investors retain no proprietary rights then it is hoped that there will be no tax payable on any profits their investments realise and furthermore the protector's presence will also enable them to supervise the activities of the trustees on behalf of the beneficiaries.⁹⁷ The difficulty, as explained in the previous paragraph, is that English law does not permit a trust to come into existence without a beneficiary.⁹⁸ Thus, even if an offshore jurisdiction were to enact legislation permitting a trust to exist without investors needing to have equitable proprietary rights, there would be the problem that such a trust would not be recognised as being valid in England and Wales, and therefore the investor would be treated as continuing to hold an equitable interest in her investment on resulting trust principles. For this English law analysis not to apply to an offshore trust the protector would be required actually to have the equitable interest in the property vested in it. That would be something which the investor may not wish to countenance, particularly given that the purpose of the transaction would be to transfer the profits to the investors so that the protector would not really be intended to hold the equitable interest. The consequence of pretending that the protector owned the equitable interest when in reality it would be treated as though it remained the property of the investor would be that the trust would be treated as being a sham and the equitable interest treated by English law as belonging to the investors. The sham doctrine is considered briefly in the section after next. The next section will consider another structure which frequently causes problems of sham trusts: revocable trusts.

Revocable trusts

The preceding section considered, in its later stages, the problem of some protector arrangements being deemed to be shams. Another structure which is frequently used in tax avoidance arrangements – whether within England and Wales, or cross-border – is that of the revocable trust. In an effort to avoid liability to tax stemming from equitable ownership of the profits derived from a trust fund, the owner of profit-generating property may settle that property on trust on terms that she shall henceforth have no rights in the property but so that ⁹⁶ Mara v Browne [1896] 1 Ch 199, 209, per Smith LJ.

⁹⁷ Now protectors are nothing new. There are protectors in English law, albeit in different forms. They are principally regulators, like the FSA and Pensions Regulator, or ombudsmen. These regulators are different from the protector in that they do not have a simulacrum of the property rights of a beneficiary at their disposal to entitle them to sue trustees for breach of trust, but they do have statutory powers of investigation, scrutiny and censure. Accordingly, it is suggested that there are already models in the UK for the protection of investor-beneficiaries which are already applied to unit trusts, pension funds and even trustees in Eurobond transactions.

⁹⁸ As discussed in section 4.2 in detail.

the trust instrument contains a power for the settlor to cancel or revoke the trust and recover the property once the tax bill has been settled. If done correctly this would mean that the trust would pay a lower rate of tax than the settlor. The danger is that this revocable trust would be deemed to be a sham whereby the settlor was seeking to pull the wool over the eyes of HM Revenue and Customs. Consequently, the profits from that sham trust would be deemed to belong absolutely to the settlor so that she would have to pay the tax on any attributable profits. This sort of arrangement is ordinarily organised as a discretionary trust in practice – so as to avoid simply having a taxable, revocable trust which returns the entire interest to the settlor – with the result that the trustees have a very large class of objects to whom they may transfer the trust property, one of whom is the settlor. Needless to say, in carrying out the settlor’s plan, the trustees then exercise their discretion so as to transfer the property back to the settlor. The dangers for the settlor are whether or not that trust will be treated as a sham, and whether or not under revenue law the settlor will be deemed still to be the absolute owner of the property for tax purposes in any event. The detail of revenue law is outside the scope of this book; whereas the principles relating to sham trusts are outlined below.

Sham trusts

As considered in the two preceding sections there is a risk that a number of trusts structures which are used in international trusts law practice and in tax avoidance practice may be held to be shams and so held to be of no effect such that the trust property is deemed to be held on resulting trust for the settlor. In defining what is meant by a ‘sham’, Diplock LJ held that a sham constitutes:⁹⁹ ‘acts done or documents executed by the parties to the “sham” which are intended by them to give to third parties or to the court the appearance of creating between the parties legal rights and obligations different from the actual legal rights and obligations (if any) which the parties intended to create.’

Therefore, a sham is a scheme of action or a pattern of documentation which seeks to create the impression that the state of affairs is one thing when in fact it is something else. An example would be the purported creation of a trust to make it appear that the settlor had divested herself of property, whereas in fact the property is still to be held for her use and enjoyment in fact such that it could be said that she still owns it outright.¹⁰⁰ It is a requirement of finding a transaction to be a sham that the parties to that sham intended to deceive other people as to the nature of their true rights.¹⁰¹ The principles surrounding sham trusts were considered in detail in section 3.3.3. International trusts law practice is thus concerned with structuring arrangements so as to permit regulatory or tax avoidance across borders, always with the worry that English law would consider a structure involving a UK resident to be a sham or to be taxable or to be subject to UK regulatory control.

21.2.6 The nature of equitable remedies in company law

There are two principal forms of equitable remedy in company law: the first relates to the rights of shareholders to prevent unfairly prejudicial conduct being exerted over them, and ⁹⁹ Snook v London and West Riding Investments Ltd [1967] 2 QB 786, 802.

¹⁰⁰ Minwalla v Minwalla [2004] 7 ITELR 457.

¹⁰¹ Scott v Federal Commissioner of Taxation (No 2) (1966) ALJR 265, 279, per Windeyer J.

the second relates to the obligations of directors to the company generally.¹⁰² To begin with the directors' duties, ss 170 et seq. of the Companies Act 2006 introduced a statutory code of directors' general duties. These duties are 'based on certain common law rules and equitable principles'¹⁰³ and 'shall be interpreted and applied in the same way as common law rules or equitable principles'.¹⁰⁴ The three duties which are more obviously based on equitable fiduciary doctrines are: the duty to avoid conflicts of interest;¹⁰⁵ the duty not to accept benefits, such as bribes and secret commissions;¹⁰⁶ and the duty to declare interests in transactions.¹⁰⁷ The 2006 Act expressly incorporates these long-standing equitable doctrines to provide remedies for breach of these director's duties.¹⁰⁸ There is no doubt about the connection here between mainstream company law and the principles of equity.

Shareholders have a range of rights expressed in the company's constitution (its articles of association) and generally under the Companies Act 2006. For the most part, control of the company is exercised by the company's management in accordance with the powers given to them by the articles of association, and otherwise are exercised by the majority of shareholders voting in the company's general meetings. This power of the majority shareholders (that is, shareholders together holding more than 50% of the voting rights in the company) is expressed in the decision in Foss v Harbottle,¹⁰⁹ which provides that the decision of the majority shareholders will not be displaced by the court because the majority will be able to enforce or ratify their wishes through a vote at the general meeting in any event. There are four exceptions to this principle, however: two of which are important for present purposes.¹¹⁰

First, further to s 994 of the Companies Act 2006, a shareholder has an action where the affairs of the company have been conducted in a way that is unfairly prejudicial to her. In relation to the s 994 action, there has been the most confusion in relation to the nature of equitable doctrine. Lord Hoffmann held in *O'Neill v Phillips*¹¹¹ that:

In [s 994] Parliament has chosen fairness as the criterion by which the court must decide whether it has jurisdiction to grant relief. It is clear from the legislative history . . . that it chose this concept to free the court from technical considerations of legal right and to 102 For a more detailed discussion of shareholders' rights and directors' duties see Alastair Hudson, Understanding Company Law, Routledge-Cavendish, 2010, and Girvin, Hudson and Frisby, Charlesworth's Company Law, 18th edn, Sweet & Maxwell, 2010.

103 Companies Act 2006, s 170(3).

104 Ibid, s 170(4).

105 Ibid, s 175.

106 Ibid, s 176.

107 Ibid, s 177.

108 Ibid, s 178.

109 (1843) 2 Hare 461.

110 First, where a shareholder (even a minority shareholder) has a personal right (for example, under contract). Secondly, where the shareholder brings a derivative action further to s 260 et seq of the Companies Act 2006. A derivative action is one in which the shareholder brings litigation in the name of the company seeking a remedy against the directors 'arising from an actual or proposed act or omission involving negligence, default, breach of duty or breach of trust by a director of the company' (Companies Act 2006, s 260(3)). Thirdly, further to s 994 et seq on the basis of conduct which was unfairly prejudicial to the claimant shareholder. Fourthly, where the company is wound up on the 'just and equitable' ground under s 122 of the Insolvency Act 1986.

111 [1999] 2 All ER 961.

confer a wide power to do what appeared just and equitable. But this does not mean that the court can do whatever the individual judge happens to think fair. The concept of fairness must be applied judicially and the content which it is given by the courts must be based upon rational principles.

This is an unreconstituted common lawyer's approach to a doctrine in which the court has been given an express statutory power to do what is 'just and equitable' so as to prevent 'unfairness'. (Nothing could be more equitable than that!) Furthermore, it supposes that this general statutory power must necessarily be limited by a judicial gloss with principles which are necessarily not contained in the statute. Quoting Warner J in Re JE Cade & Son,¹¹² Lord Hoffmann returned to the common lawyer's view that 'the court . . . has a very wide discretion, but it does not sit under a palm tree'. In particular, his Lordship wishes to focus on the nature of companies as businesses in which the applicable notions of fairness would have to be interpreted in accordance with the parties' commercial purposes. Therefore, it is held that 'unfairness' can only be demonstrated if it is contrary to the terms of the company's articles of association. This is a serious restriction on the courts' powers. For example, if the majority shareholders voted to limit the payment of dividends only to the majority shareholders under a power contained in the company's constitution (that is, its articles of association), this would be unfair on the minority shareholders because it would prevent them from taking any profit from the company, but the effect of Lord Hoffmann's approach would be that simple unfairness would be insufficient to allow the minority shareholders to seek to have that decision set aside on grounds of unfairness.

Section 122 of the Insolvency Act 1986 grants the court the power to wind up a company where it appears to the court to be 'just and equitable' to do so. It was held by Lord Wilberforce in the leading case of *Ebrahimi v Westbourne Galleries*¹¹³ that when exercising this power 'as equity always does, to enable the court to subject the exercise of legal rights to equitable considerations; considerations, that is, of a personal character arising between one individual and another, which may make it unjust, or inequitable, to insist on legal rights, or to exercise them in a particular way'. This approach is different to the approach taken by Lord Hoffmann in O'Neill v Phillips in that it accepts that the court may take a generally equitable view of the circumstances by considering whether or not the exercise of a person's legal rights are equitable in the specific circumstances. That the directors owe fiduciary duties to the company and that the Companies Act 2006 grants the shareholders rights to proceed against the company (and thus indirectly the other shareholders) should be taken to mean that it is appropriate to apply equitable doctrines in deciding whether or not the affairs of the company are being operated suitably.

21.2.7 Equity as a risk

Equity itself is said to constitute a risk, as considered in para 12.2.2. A risk, that is, of disturbing the commercial certainty of the parties to a transaction. The economic impact of equity intruding in such circumstances is taken for granted: it is assumed that it could only 112 [1992] BCLC 213 at 227.

113 [1972] 2 All ER 492 at 500, [1973] AC 360 at 379.

be bad. Many members of the English judiciary take the approach that well-understood components of contract law should govern the availability of equitable remedies in these situations. The approach of Lord Woolf in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC is particularly instructive in this context. In his Lordship's view, the availability of equitable proprietary remedies in commercial transactions ought to be predicated on whether or not either party could reasonably have foreseen that in the ordinary course of things the loss was likely to occur.¹¹⁴

As Atiyah has explained the interaction of the risk and the use of contract:¹¹⁵

In the market, parties were expected to calculate rationally the various risks, whether of past or of future events, which might affect the value of the contract. Provided that there was no fraud, and provided that the bargaining process was itself fair, the result must be deemed to be fair. Unexpected events, unknown factors, whether occurring before or after the contract was made, were not to be allowed to upset the resultant bargains. In principle all such risks were capable of being perceived and evaluated; in practice, not everybody succeeded in doing so. Or doing it very well . . . The whole point of the free market bargaining approach was to give full rein to the greater skill and knowledge of those who calculated risks better. . . . He who failed to calculate a risk properly when making a contract would lose by it, and next time would calculate more efficiently.

On the other hand, in Atiyah's conception, the purpose of the contract is to evaluate the risks between commercial parties and, even more broadly, to identify a policy underpinning the law of promoting greater economic efficiency by requiring commercial people to become better at evaluating such risks before forming contracts. It is suggested that this goes too far and blithely accepts that markets and free acceptance of risk necessarily constitute the most efficient economic solution: particularly given that it has no strategy for ensuring equity between contracting parties (in the sense that an economist would understand that term as meaning something akin to 'fairness') nor any explicit conception of what constitutes an efficient solution in any particular circumstance.¹¹⁶

21.2.8 In defence of equity

As considered below, this commercial detestation for equity masks two things. First, at a technical level, it overlooks the important role which equity has played in developing commercial concepts. The secured interest would be impossible without the trust, and a more flexible form of secured interest over a changeable fund of property would have been impossible without equity's development of the floating charge. Secondly, at a more general level, it would not be enough for commerce to be left to its own devices outwith the normative reach of the legal system. Whether a positivist (believing that law operates as a sovereign over its subjects, like Austin) or a natural law enthusiast (believing that law draws on some greater principle of what is 'right', like Fuller), the reader must agree that law operates on the basis of enforcing some very general conception of right and wrong. So it is that 114 [1996] 2 All ER 961, 1016; citing, with approval, Mann, 1985, 30.

115 Atiyah, 1979, 437.

116 See Le Grand, 1991, 20 et seq; Le Grand, 1982, especially 1–19; Evans, 1998, especially 17 et seq.

equity has tended to limit itself to the prevention of fraud and the enforcement of good conscience. For commercial law to seek to avoid equity would be to allow commerce to escape the norms of the legal system which are nevertheless enforceable against all ordinary citizens. This would be a particularly pernicious development which would permit the already powerful corporate and commercial interests to set up their own legal system: in effect, it would be to produce one law for them and another law for the rest of us.

Nothing in this discussion should be taken to support the view that commercial practice ought to be able to develop its own distinct rules and norms. Rather, it is suggested that norms and rules should be developed which take into account the very particular context in which commerce operates: an approach which may require that commercial organisations (like pension funds perhaps) are required to act in a way which is particularly sensitive to the needs of their clientele, instead of permitting commercial practice to set out its own contractual norms. What is suggested is that equity should consider the context of commercial activity in the same way that it considers all cases in their own contexts; what cannot be acceptable is that commercial people are able to pick and choose which laws they wish to be bound by and which they wish to ignore.¹¹⁷

117 For a consideration of the development of a form of capitalism which operates outwith national, legal boundaries and the pernicious effects which that may have, see Klein, 2000 and Bauman, 2000.

Quistclose trusts

22.1	INTRODUCTION	1063
22.2	RETENTION OF TITLE AND PLEDGE	1064
22.2.1	Romalpa clauses – right in specific property	1064
22.2.2	Transfer of title and pledge	1064
22.3	THE FUNDAMENTALS OF QUISTCLOSE TRUSTS	1066
22.3.1	Quistclose trusts in outline	1066
22.3.2	The decision in Barclays Bank v Quistclose	1067
22.4	CATEGORISING THE QUISTCLOSE TRUST	1070
22.4.1	The issue	1070
22.4.2	Resulting trust	1071
22.4.3	Express trust	1074
22.4.4	Constructive trust	1076
22.4.5	The Quistclose trust as a retention of title: the Twinsectra model	1078
22.4.6	Analysing the key decisions closely	1080
22.4.7	The nature of the Quistclose trust is dependent on the terms of the loan contract	1084
22.4.8	The safest commercial approach to controlling borrowed moneys	1085
22.4.9	The Quistclose trust as a form of purpose trust	1086
22.4.10	Two different commercial contexts in which Quistclose trusts are significant	1086
22.4.11	The rights of third parties to the loan moneys	1092
22.4.12	Conclusion	1092

OVERVIEW

A Quistclose trust comes into existence in relation to a loan contract when the intention of the parties is that the borrower is required to use the loan moneys for a specified purpose. In the event that the borrower goes into insolvency, the loan moneys are deemed to have been held on trust for the lender. The issue is as to the basis on which this trust comes into existence. In Barclays Bank v Quistclose, Lord Wilberforce held that a primary trust took effect over the loan moneys until they were used for their assigned purpose, and a secondary trust came into existence so as to carry the equitable interest back to the lender. This was interpreted by many commentators as being a resulting trust. Lord Wilberforce himself expressed this as a combination of common law and equitable principles such that an equitable remedy granted property rights to the lender in the event that the terms of the contract were not performed. In Twinsectra v Yardley, Lord Millett considered that this was a resulting trust which operated so that sufficient title was transferred to the borrower to carry out the terms of the loan contract but that the lender otherwise retained the equitable interest in the loan moneys.

22.1 INTRODUCTION

The most significant overlap between commercial activity and the law of trusts (as commonly understood by commercial lawyers in terms of sale of goods, loan contracts and so forth) relates to taking title in goods and to the acquisition of security as part of a transaction. Typically, the issue is as follows: in creating a commercial contract, how do the parties acquire or retain title (as appropriate) in property which is used or transferred for the purposes of that contract? This chapter considers the manner in which contract law and the law of trusts variously deal with these questions.

There are three issues considered here. First, the manner in which a titleholder in property may seek to retain title in that property even though it is being used for the purposes of a contract. The titleholder would wish, in an ideal world, to remain the absolute owner of that property. This will be possible where the property is, for example, plant or machinery which remains entirely separate from all other property. The more difficult situation arises when the property is mixed with other property so that it is impossible to identify that property in its original form. For example, where sugar is used to manufacture chocolate: once the chocolate has been manufactured it will not be possible to identify the sugar separately as sugar. Consequently, the titleholder would want to acquire some rights in the chocolate which are distinct from the rights of any other contracting party. Secondly, in a contract of loan, there are issues as to the forms of security which the lender could acquire. The lender may take a charge or mortgage over property owned absolutely by the borrower as security for the performance of the loan (as considered in Chapter 23 in relation to mortgages). Alternatively (and the third issue), the lender may impose a condition on the purposes for which the loan moneys can be used so that those loan moneys are held under a Quistclose trust for the lender.¹ The options for the lender vary between retaining title in the loan moneys before they are spent, acquiring rights over a mixed fund of property, or acquiring that form of right identified with the Quistclose trust. This chapter will consider these various possibilities, but its principal focus will be on the nature of Quistclose trusts.

There are then two final sections which consider in outline the manner in which trusts structures are used in relation to debt securities: eurobonds and debentures. Securities in this sense are financial instruments which can be traded on the open market which evidence a debt. They differ from an ordinary loan contract in that such a contract is created privately between the lender and the borrower; and whereas the benefit of a loan contract could be transferred to another person, it is not traded on an open exchange in the same way as a bond. In relation to both of these debt securities, a trustee is used as a regulatory device to ensure that the company issuing the bond or the debenture performs its obligations properly. The trustee is entitled to sue on behalf of the bondholders or the debenture holders in the event of default. A trust is used in these circumstances for two reasons. First, the presence of the trustee ensures, it is hoped, the proper performance of the debtor's obligations but, secondly, there is also the utility of the notion of 'trust' which operates to reassure investors that their acquisition of bonds is not entirely unprotected. These two contexts serve to round off this chapter's analysis of the interaction of commercial trusts with commercial lending.

¹ Barclays Bank v Quistclose Investments Ltd [1970] AC 567.

What will emerge from this discussion is another example of concepts of contract and of property mixing to allocate rights in assets used as part of commercial transactions. The techniques are the same: can the parties demonstrate that they still have title in assets, or can they assert title to some assets in the event that the counterparty to the contract fails to perform?

22.2 RETENTION OF TITLE AND PLEDGE

This short section summarises the legal treatment of contractual provisions relating to retention of title in property, and the opposite position where title is transferred outright to the counterparty to a contract by way of a pledge. These two structures will throw into relief the uses of trusts later in this chapter and the use of charges and equitable mortgages considered in Chapter 23. The purpose of these short outlines, then, is to set out the manner in which the laws of property and contract deal with those questions in contrast to the main discussion point of this chapter: the Quistclose trust.²

22.2.1 Romalpa clauses – right in specific property

A Romalpa clause is a contractual provision which enables the titleholder to property to retain common law rights in that property.³ In relation to a contract in which property is to be used as part of the contractual purpose, that property will remain the property of the provider both at common law and in equity,⁴ unless that property becomes mixed with other property so as to be indistinguishable, leaving only rights in equity for the claimant.⁵ In the latter situation, it would be a matter for construction of the contract as to the rights which the provider of the property was intended to acquire. It is likely that that would disclose a floating charge in many instances. In general a retention of title under a Romalpa clause would prevent another party to that contract from passing good title to a third party under the nemo dat principle (considered in Chapter 21), although a third party with notice of the contract would be precluded from taking good title in any event.⁶

22.2.2 Transfer of title and pledge

The trust transfers only equitable title to the beneficiaries of the trust arrangement subject to the limitations and provisions of the trust itself. Typically the trust will make the rights

2 Ibid.

3 Aluminium Industrie Vaassen BV v Romalpa Aluminium Ltd [1976] 1 WLR 676.

4 Ibid.

5 Clough Mill v Martin [1984] 3 All ER 982.

6 De Mattos v Gibson (1858) 4 De GF & J 276, (1858) 45 ER 108.

of the parties contingent on their performance under the terms of any commercial contract. A pledge, as ordinarily understood,⁷ would involve the owner of property parting with possession of the property by delivering it to the secured party, without giving that secured party the right to deal with that property as though its absolute owner.⁸ The secured party is prevented from dealing with the property as its absolute owner until such time as its proprietary rights do crystallise. In the event that those rights crystallise, thus vesting almost absolute title in the secured party, the secured party is entitled to sell the pledged asset to make good the counterparty's failure in performance of the principal contract.⁹ The pledgee's rights are to apply the property to discharge the pledgor's obligations and are not a transfer of absolute title because such a transfer of title would entitle the pledgee to retain any surplus in the value of the property over the debt owed to the pledgee.¹⁰

The precise rights of the secured party will turn on the manner in which they are expressed by the pledge agreement. A pledge agreement may provide, quite simply, that the secured party is entitled to absolute title in the pledged assets in the event of non-performance by its counterparty, thus establishing a different case to that set out immediately above. More commonly, a contract would provide that the secured party is entitled to take absolute title in the pledged assets only up to the value of any amount owed to it by its counterparty. Within this second analysis, the pledge contract might provide that the pledgee takes no proprietary title until some default of the pledgor identified in the agreement, and has merely a possessory interest until that time. As witness to this analysis, it was held in The Odessa:¹¹

If the pledgee sells he does so by virtue of and to the extent of the pledgor's ownership, and not with a new title of his own. He must appropriate the proceeds of the sale to the payment of the pledgor's debt, for the money resulting from the sale is the pledgor's money to be so applied.

It is suggested that that analysis must necessarily be contingent on the precise terms of the pledge agreement and the form of rights which they purport to grant to the secured party.¹² There are then two options: either the secured party is entitled to take title in the assets themselves, or it is entitled only to sell the assets and take such proportion of those sale proceeds as is required to offset the counterparty's outstanding obligations. In deciding which is applicable, recourse must be had to the precise terms of the pledge agreement.

7 The most common example of a pledge would be an arrangement with a pawnbroker.

8 The Odessa [1916] 1 AC 145.

9 The secured party will be trustee, it is suggested, of any such surplus between the time it is received and its payment to the counterparty. Where the surplus has not been segregated from the amount which the secured party is entitled to retain in discharge of the counterparty's failure to pay, the entire sale proceeds of the pledged assets are held on trust by the secured party in proportion to the amount to which each party is entitled: Re Goldcorp [1995] 1 AC 74, at sections 3.4 and 21.1 above.

10 Re Hardwick, ex p Hubbard (1886) 17 QBD 690. Cf Carter v Wake (1877) 4 Ch D 605; Fraser v Byas (1895) 11 TLR 481.

11 [1916] 1 AC 145, 159.

12 See generally Palmer and Hudson, 1998.

22.3 THE FUNDAMENTALS OF QUISTCLOSE TRUSTS

22.3.1 Quistclose trusts in outline

A general definition of the Quistclose trust

Commercially-speaking, a Quistclose trust is a means by which a lender of money can retain a 'security interest' in loan moneys by inserting a clause into the loan contract which provides that the borrower may use those loan moneys only for specified purposes. If the borrower uses the money for some other purpose, then a trust is imposed on the moneys in the lender's favour. This form of trust is particularly significant as a means of protecting the lender against the borrower's insolvency because the loan moneys are treated as being held on trust for the lender and therefore are not distributed in the insolvency proceedings as part of the insolvent borrower's estate. Even if the borrower remains solvent after lending the money then the lender has a right under the Quistclose trust to recover the loan moneys or to trace those loan moneys into the hands of any third party who has received them in breach of the loan contract.

While this will serve as an adequate description of the commercial usefulness of a Quistclose trust a number of complex legal questions arise.¹³ First, it will be important to identify precisely what sort of 'security interest' the lender acquires. Secondly, it will be important to know whether the lender 'retains' a right in the original loan moneys throughout the life of the loan contract, or whether that right only comes into existence for the first time when the borrower disobeys the terms of the loan contract, or whether the right comes into existence in some other way. Thirdly, it will be important to know what form of trust – express trust, resulting trust, constructive trust, or some other construct – best explains the Quistclose trust. Fourthly, while all of the preceding issues have generated a complex legal literature in the abstract, it may be important to consider how the precise terms of any loan contract alter the appropriate analysis on the facts of any given case. Before turning to these questions, however, we should consider chronologically the cases which have given rise to the modern Quistclose trust concept.

The source of Quistclose trusts

The Quistclose trust takes its name from the decision of the House of Lords in Barclays Bank v Quistclose.¹⁴ The principle in Barclays Bank v Quistclose in turn derives from a number of earlier decisions including Hassall v Smither.¹⁵ In short, where a transferor transfers property subject to a contractual provision that the transferee is entitled only to use that property for limited purposes, then the transferee will hold the property on trust for the transferor in the event that the property is used for some purpose other than that set out in the contract. Significantly, in the event that the transferee purports to transfer rights to some third party in breach of that contractual provision, the transferor is deemed to have retained its rights under a trust which will preclude the transferee from acquiring rights in that property. At present 13 See, for example, Thomas & Hudson, 2004, 292 et seq; Priestley, 1987, 217; Ricketts, 1991; Bridge, 1992; Payne, 2000; Chambers, 1997, Ch 3; Worthington, 1996, Ch 3; Thomas, 1998, 260; and more generally Swadling (ed), 2004.

14 [1970] AC 567.

15 (1806) 12 Ves 119; Toovey v Milne (1819) 2 B & Ald 683, (1819) 106 ER 514.

the Quistclose arrangement has been applied only to loan moneys but, as Worthington suggests, there is no reason in principle why it should apply only to money and not to other forms of property.¹⁶ This issue is discussed below.¹⁷ The following discussion will examine the Quistclose decision and the various explanations for the nature of the trust created.

22.3.2 The decision in Barclays Bank v Quistclose

The decision in Barclays Bank v Quistclose itself

In *Barclays Bank v Quistclose*¹⁸ a loan contract was formed by which Quistclose lent money to Rolls Razor Ltd on the condition that the loan moneys were to be used solely for the payment of dividends to its preferred shareholders. That money was held in a share dividend bank account separate from all other moneys. Memorably, Harman LJ described Rolls Razor as being ‘in Queer Street’ at the time – referring to the fact that the company had already exceeded its overdraft limit with the bank on its general bank account and was clearly in financial difficulties. The specific purpose for the loan, after negotiation between Quistclose and the company, was to enable the company to pay a dividend to an identified category of shareholders but it was a condition of this arrangement that the loan money was not to be used for any other purpose. In the event Rolls Razor went into insolvency before the dividend was paid. Therefore, the loan money rested in a bank account held with Barclays Bank without being paid in fulfilment of the term of the loan contract. Rolls Razor’s bank accounts with Barclays Bank were in overdraft: an overdraft is, in effect, a loan made by a bank to the person who is entitled to draw on the overdraft. Therefore if a bank uses money to pay down an overdraft then it is using that money to pay off a loan owed to it. Once Rolls Razor had become insolvent, Barclays Bank was concerned to pay off the overdraft which it had provided to Rolls Razor. Consequently, Barclays Bank argued that it should be entitled to set off the money held in the share dividend account against the overdraft which Rolls Razor had with the bank. Quistclose contended that the money in the share dividend account was held on trust for Quistclose and therefore that the bank was not entitled to set that money off against the outstanding overdraft on Rolls Razor’s other account.

The House of Lords decided that the loan money held separately in the share dividend bank account should be treated as having been held on trust for Quistclose. The trust was said to have come into existence on the basis that the specified purpose of the loan had not been performed and that the loan moneys were purportedly being used for a non-authorised purpose. Furthermore, the House of Lords held unanimously that the money in the share dividend account was held on resulting trust for Quistclose.

Lord Wilberforce upheld the resulting trust in favour of Quistclose on the basis that it was an implied term of the loan contract that the money be returned to the Quistclose in the event that it was not used for the purpose for which it was specifically lent. Lord Wilberforce found that there were two trusts: a ‘primary trust’ (which empowered Rolls Razor to use the money to pay the dividend) and a ‘secondary trust’ (which required Rolls Razor to hold the money on resulting trust for the bank if it was not used to pay the dividend). As his Lordship held:

16 Worthington, 1996, 63. See now also Farepak Food & Gift Ltd [2006] All ER (Dec) 265 (D).

17 Section 22.4.9.

18 Barclays Bank v Quistclose Investments Ltd [1970] AC 567.

In the present case the intention to create a secondary trust for the benefit of the lender, to arise if the primary trust, to pay the dividend, could not be carried out, is clear and I can find no reason why the law should not give effect to it.

From this proposition we can derive the general principle that Quistclose trusts take effect as resulting trusts by means of this two-level, primary/secondary trust structure. We will probe this idea in greater detail below.

Examples of Quistclose trusts

The case of *Twinsectra v Yardley*¹⁹ gives us another factual example of circumstances in which a Quistclose trust might arise. In that case moneys were lent by Twinsectra to Yardley. Twinsectra wanted the security of knowing that the loan moneys would only be used for specified purposes which were specified in the loan contract. Yardley's solicitor was also required to give a formal undertaking to Twinsectra as to the proper use of the money. The first solicitor was replaced by a second solicitor, Leach, who paid away the loan moneys in accordance with Yardley's instructions: those instructions were in breach both of the terms of the loan contract and also of the terms of the undertaking which the first solicitor had given and by which Leach had agreed to be bound. The loan money was spent and Yardley was unable to repay the loan, so Twinsectra sought to recover their loss. This case is discussed in detail in section 20.2.5 in relation to Leach's potential liability for the misuse of the loan money. Lord Millett, in a minority speech, held that this arrangement had also created a Quistclose trust because there was a contractual limitation on the use of the loan moneys. None of the other law lords expressed a view on the detail of the Quistclose trust question in their speeches. The precise nature of the Twinsectra trust suggested by Lord Millett is considered below; for the present we are simply trying to understand the sort of factual bases on which a Quistclose trust will come into existence.

In similar fashion to Twinsectra v Yardley, a solicitor's undertaking was given in *Global Marine Drillships Ltd v Landmark Solicitors LLP*²⁰ to the effect that money had been placed by Global Marine with its solicitors, Landmark, and a Ms Jones so that it was to be held on trust by them and so that it was to be used for the purpose identified in the solicitor's undertaking. This arrangement was held to constitute a Quistclose trust.²¹ In essence, the moneys had been passed by Ms Jones and Landmark to third parties after they had been put under pressure by them to do so; in consequence, Henderson J held that the Quistclose trust principle applied to those moneys, which would permit Global Marine to trace after them.

Another example of a Quistclose trust arose in Templeton Insurance Ltd v Penningtons Solicitors LLP,²² a case in which money was lent by Templeton to clients of Penningtons, a firm of solicitors, to purchase a 'brown-field' development site. These moneys were lent on the condition that the loan moneys would be held by Penningtons subject to a solicitor's undertaking that the money was to be used to complete the purchase of that land or, in the event that the sale could not be completed, on the condition that the loan money would be

19 [2002] 2 AC 164.

20 [2011] EWHC 2685, Henderson J.

21 These proceedings were summary proceedings (that is, they were brought seeking to terminate the litigation without the need for a full trial) and therefore did not need to pursue matters to a conclusion.

22 [2006] EWHC 685 (Ch).

held in Pennington's client bank account on trust for the lender. It was held that this constituted a Quistclose trust in favour of Templeton.

There are numerous other examples on the cases. Most of the cases require that the loan contract identify a single, specific use of the loan moneys. In Re Northern Developments Holdings Ltd,²³ the loan money was paid for 'the express purpose of providing money for the subsidiary's unsecured creditors over the ensuing weeks and for no other purpose' and consequently a Quistclose trust was upheld. In *Re EVTR*²⁴ the loan money was advanced 'for the sole purpose of buying new equipment', with the same result. Similarly, in *General Communications Ltd v Development Finance Corporation of New Zealand Ltd*²⁵ the loan money was paid 'for the express purpose' of purchasing new equipment, with the result that a Quistclose trust was found.

Outright transfers of the loan moneys mean there is no Quistclose trust

A Quistclose trust requires that the loan moneys are transferred subject to a specific obligation to use the moneys only for a specified purpose. There will not be a Quistclose trust if the loan moneys are transferred outright to the borrower, as would be the case in an ordinary loan contract, without any obligation to use the loan moneys only for a specified purpose being imposed on the borrower.²⁶ Otherwise, there is a tendency for claimants who have had their property misused to seek to claim that the defendant ought to have used that property for such-and-such a purpose, and so that a Quistclose trust should be taken to have arisen over the property, even though there was no contractual provision which required such a use of that property.²⁷

It must be proved, of course, that it was the intention of the parties that these loan moneys were to be used for identified purposes and were not simply loans made in the ordinary way whereby the borrower can use the money as he or she so chooses.²⁸ The same point arose before the High Court of the Isle of Man in Du Preez Ltd v Kaupthing Singer & Friedlander (Isle of Man) Ltd,²⁹ where a customer of a bank argued that when it had instructed that bank to transfer moneys through its accounts to a third party then that constituted a Quistclose trust over those moneys which bound the bank to that purpose. (It should be remembered that money held in a bank account is not held on trust by the bank unless a trust is expressly created over it.³⁰) The reason for arguing for the existence of such a trust was that the bank had gone into insolvency and therefore the customer sought to argue that those moneys were impressed with a trust so that they would not simply be distributed among the unsecured

23 Unreported, 6 October 1978, per Megarry V-C.

24 [1987] BCLC 646.

25 [1990] 3 NZLR 406, 432.

26 Abou-Rahmah and Others v Abacha and Others [2005] EWHC 2662 (QB), [2006] 1 Lloyd's Rep 484.

27 Re Farepak Food and Gift Ltd [2006] All ER (D) 265 (Dec).

28 Soutzos v Asombang [2010] EWHC 842 (Ch), [2010] BPIR 960, Newey J.

29 [2011] WTLR 559, (2010) 12 ITEL 943. See the same point at first instance in Habana Ltd v Kaupthing Singer & Friedlander (Isle of Man) Ltd [2011] WTLR 275, (2009–10) 12 ITEL 736. Reference was made to the Isle of Man case Magenta Finance & Trading Co v Savings and Investment Bank (In Liquidation) [1985] Fin LR 237 where a tracing order was refused to a customer in relation to moneys which had already been distributed as part of the bank's settlement of its debts.

30 Foley v Hill (1848) Cas 28, 9 ER 1002. On these facts there had not been even an express trust created over these moneys by the customer at any time, as was found at first instance.

creditors of the bank. However, there was no proof that the parties had had any such intention, and therefore no Quistclose trust was found. This was simply a transfer of moneys between bank accounts and therefore there was nothing about the circumstances, and certainly no discussions between the parties, to the effect that those moneys were intended to be held on trust.³¹

So much for the precise facts of the decisions which have illustrated the decision in Barclays Bank v Quistclose: the issue now is to identify what type of a trust a Quistclose trust is. To do this we will need to examine a range of different analyses which have been proposed in cases after the decision of the House of Lords in Quistclose. As we identify each different analysis we will pause to consider whether or not each argument is watertight before moving on to the next analysis. Therefore, we shall consider arguments for resulting trust, express trust and constructive trust in that order. As will emerge below, the speech of Lord Millett in *Twinsectra v Yardley*³² has received a great deal of support although,³³ it is suggested, there are some gaps in its logic: this approach is considered last.

22.4 CATEGORISING THE QUISTCLOSE TRUST

22.4.1 The issue

Categorising the Quistclose trust within the pantheon of established forms of trust is problematic. The real problem is explaining the nature of the rights of the lender, the rights of the borrower and the time at which those rights come into existence. This two-layered trust structure used by Lord Wilberforce in Barclays Bank v Quistclose (combining a primary and a secondary trust) is unique to the case law in this area – although it would be possible to create a complex express trust which mimicked it. What is significant is that the Quistclose trust will be imposed in circumstances in which the parties to a loan contract have been silent as to the precise construction which is to be placed on their contract. The courts have not yet considered a contract which expressly imposed a categorisation on its trust: the suggestion which is made below is that such an express categorisation would be decisive of the question. For present purpose we shall have to consider this question in the abstract. It should be recalled that the House of Lords in Barclays Bank v Quistclose has used the expression ‘resulting trust’ to describe this arrangement.³⁴ It is with this analysis that we shall begin.

31 A poor argument was raised in Annabel's (Berkeley Square) Ltd v Revenue and Customs Commissioners [2009] 4 All ER 55, at [31] to the effect that in a tronc arrangement for tips in a nightclub and restaurant, the tronc-master who held the tips should be considered to have done so under a primary trust for the employees and a secondary trust for the employer based on Quistclose v Barclays Bank. Two points arise. First, this argument did not deal with the obvious point that hitherto the authorities which have considered this area of law properly have recognised that it relates solely to loan contracts, not arrangements which clearly constitute express trusts in general terms. Second, there is no good reason why the employer should take beneficial rights in a tronc when any surplus funds should clearly be distributed proportionately among the wait staff for whom they were intended by the customers.

32 [2002] 2 AC 164.

33 See for example, Underhill and Hayton, 2002 and Templeton Insurance Ltd v Penningtons Solicitors LLP [2006] EWHC 685 (Ch).

34 Ibid, and Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington [1996] AC 669, per Lord Browne-Wilkinson.

22.4.2 Resulting trust

The argument for resulting trust: are there two different types of resulting trust here?

The first explanation of the nature of a Quistclose trust, which was accepted by Lord Wilberforce in Barclays Bank v Quistclose, is that the Quistclose trust transfers the equitable interest in the loan moneys back to the lender on resulting trust. This analysis suggests that title in the loan moneys passes away from the lender to the borrower, under Lord Wilberforce's 'primary trust', before then bouncing back to the lender on resulting trust when the 'secondary trust' comes into existence at the moment when the borrower has breached the terms of the loan contract. It should not be forgotten that the lender also retained rights to sue at common law for breach of contract, if the defendant were solvent. Lord Wilberforce held that it was clearly the 'mutual intention' of the parties on these facts that the loan moneys should not become part of the assets of Rolls Razor Ltd but rather that those moneys were to be used to pay the dividend.³⁵ Indeed, his Lordship held that this was 'the essence of the bargain'.³⁶

By contrast, as is considered in greater detail below, Lord Millett in the House of Lords in *Twinsectra v Yardley*³⁷ recognised that this sort of trust is a resulting trust³⁸ but Lord Millett's explanation of the resulting trust form of Quistclose trust was that the lender retained ownership of the equitable interest in the loan moneys throughout the life of the transaction.³⁹ Therefore, this resulting trust would not really involve any property 'jumping back' to the lender (as a resulting trust, taken literally, is supposed to do⁴⁰): instead the resulting trust would be recognising that the lender had had some equitable ownership of the loan moneys until the borrower used them for their proper purpose. If the loan moneys were not used for their proper purpose, then the resulting trust would recognise the continued equitable ownership on the part of the lender. (There are, however, difficulties with the way in which Lord Millett expresses this idea, as considered below at para 22.4.5.)

The Quistclose approach can be distinguished from the transaction at issue in *Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington*⁴¹ (which denied the existence of any proprietary rights on resulting trust to effect restitution of unjust enrichment in general terms) on the basis that the moneys paid in that case were transferred outright without any condition being placed on their use – although it should be remembered that Lord Browne-Wilkinson did expressly accept that a Quistclose trust is a form of resulting trust. The Quistclose trust, by distinction, operates only in circumstances in which there is a condition attached to the purpose for which the loan moneys are to be used. The principle reason for supporting a resulting trust in favour of the lender appears to be that, if the court held otherwise, it would permit the borrower to affirm the transaction in part (by taking the loan moneys and passing that money to creditors on insolvency) but to refuse to be bound by the condition that the property could only be used for a specified purpose.⁴²

35 Barclays Bank v Quistclose [1970] AC 567, 580.

36 Ibid.

37 [2002] 2 AC 164.

38 Ibid., para [100].

39 See Thomas and Hudson, 2004, 293.

40 See 11.1, where the expression resulting trust is said to derive from the Latin 'resalire' meaning to 'jump back'.

41 [1996] AC 669.

42 Re Rogers (1891) 8 Morr 243, 248, per Lindley LJ.

Therefore, on this analysis, the Quistclose trust would appear to operate such that the borrower has title to the money at common law and is entitled to dispose of it in the way provided for in the contract subject to the fact that equity prevents the borrower from using that money for any purpose other than the purpose set out in the loan agreement. Consequently, the lender retains an interest in the money on resulting trust principles throughout the life of the transaction which entitles the lender to recover that property if the purpose is not carried out. The fact that this interest appears to be continuous throughout the transaction is the element which gives rise to the argument that this trust is a resulting trust, rather than a new constructive trust imposed by the court when the borrower seeks to act unconscionably.

On this analysis the Quistclose right appears to be similar to the Romalpa clause under which a person who transfers property to another for the purposes of a contract expressly retains title in that property during the life of the contract. As such, it should properly be said that the right comes into existence at the time that the contract is created. Therefore, the lender should be treated as holding that right in the property from the moment of the creation of that contract.

Against a resulting trust: the equitable interest comes into existence too late

The principal problem with Lord Wilberforce's model of the Quistclose trust is explained by reference to the diagram set out immediately below. That problem concerns the fact that a resulting trust will only come into existence once the loan moneys have been misused and therefore the lender's security interest is created only after there has been a breach of contract. Therefore, it is suggested, this security interest will come into existence too late to be of use in many circumstances. The time sequence in a Quistclose transaction should be understood as operating in the following way:

Day 1: Loan contract entered into between lender and borrower, including a provision that the borrower use the money only for a specific purpose.	Day 2: Loan moneys transferred at common law to borrower.	Day 3: Borrower breaches the term in the loan contract by using the money for an unspecified purpose.	Day 4: Lender seeks to recover the loan moneys as a result of the breach of the term in the loan contract.
--	--	--	---

It is not necessary in practice that these events take place on different 'days'; and so you may prefer to think of them as 'stages'; although I do think that breaking them out into different 'days' makes the explanation easier. So, to consider the table. The loan moneys are transferred outright to the borrower on Day 2. The borrower is the absolute owner of the loan moneys on Day 2. The loan moneys are then paid away by the borrower on Day 3. Lord Wilberforce's resulting trust analysis says that the secondary trust only comes into existence once the moneys have been misused. Therefore, the resulting trust will only be able to bite if the loan moneys are still separately identifiable on Day 3, or on the day when the claim is brought.

The question as to the categorisation of Quistclose trusts is therefore as follows: does the lender retain some equitable interest in the loan moneys from Day 1, or are all rights given up on Day 2 with the transfer of the loan moneys, or does the lender only re-acquire rights in the money on Day 3? For there to have been a trust it cannot be that the lender acquires rights in the loan moneys only on Day 4 because that would be to make the trust remedial, something which is not possible at English law.⁴³ The principal problem with having the resulting trust come into existence on Day 3 is that there is only a security interest for the lender after the breach of contract has been committed. By the time that the lender's interest comes into existence the money will have disappeared and the borrower may already be insolvent. The most satisfying approach would be one which imposes a property right in favour of the lender from Day 1, as suggested below in relation to the use of express trusts. It is true that even such a structure runs the risk that the borrower will still misuse the money in practice, but at least the property right will have pre-dated any insolvency of the borrower.

It might be possible to analyse Lord Wilberforce's model differently. It could be argued that the purpose of the primary trust is to impose a trust over the loan moneys throughout the life of the loan contract. However, this would be an express trust – as is considered below – and it would seem illogical to have a resulting trust come into existence on Day 3 which superseded the primary, express trust.

Lord Millett's version of the resulting trust could be understood as meaning that there is a retention of an equitable interest in favour of the lender throughout the loan contract too – although, again, it is difficult to see how this differs from an express trust, as considered below.⁴⁴ The better analysis might be to think of this form of Quistclose trust as being an express trust, which Lord Millett does not do, which is imposed from the outset in the loan contract on Day 1 and which grants the borrower a power to use the money for the contractually specified purpose. Significantly, if the trust comes into existence on Day 1, then the lender has her security interest before the breach of contract. If the purpose is contravened then the express trust provides that the money is held on trust by the borrower for the lender absolutely from that time onwards.

Against a resulting trust: retention, not transfer

In advancing the argument that a Quistclose trust is a resulting trust, it is commonly said that the trust imposed on the borrower when seeking to use the property for an unauthorised purpose does have the hallmarks of a resulting trust properly so-called because it returns equitable title in property to its original owner once that original owner had transferred title away. Alternatively, in rebutting the contention that a Quistclose trust is a resulting trust, it could again be argued that the retention of rights by the original owner constitutes a creation of an equitable interest and not a recovery of an equitable interest after some transfer away on a typical resulting trust model. After all, the secondary trust could be said to have created the equitable interest for the first time, as opposed to returning it to the lender.

The principal weakness of a resulting trust analysis, from a security interest perspective, is the time at which the lender acquires its proprietary rights. The resulting trust is said by Lord Wilberforce in Barclays Bank v Quistclose to come into existence in the form of a secondary trust only at the time at which the borrower misuses the loan moneys. If the loan moneys were received on Monday before the borrower went into insolvency on the Tuesday before the loan moneys were misused contrary to the terms of the contract on the Wednesday, then the resulting trust would only come into existence after the borrower had gone into insolvency. Therefore, the lender would not have a proprietary right, on this analysis, before the insolvency and would therefore not be a secured creditor. The risk for the lender is that there is no resulting trust over the loan moneys between the time of transfer to the borrower and the misuse of the money.

43 Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington [1996] AC 669.

44 Hackney, 1987, 154; Payne, 2000.

In the manner this form of resulting trust is explained by Lord Millett in Twinsectra v Yardley, there is a retention of title by the lender. However, a trust in which the beneficiary 'retains' rights from the outset is not a resulting trust. A Quistclose trust, significantly, does not arise on the basis of a transfer of property away from the lender which is then returned to the lender. As such it could not be a resulting trust, as a resulting trust is ordinarily described.⁴⁵ If there were an outright transfer of the loan moneys from the lender to the borrower, as ordinarily happens in loan contracts, the lender would cease to have any title in the property which could be held on resulting trust.⁴⁶ So, Worthington juxtaposes the Quistclose trust with a transfer in the sale of goods context in which the seller gives up title to the buyer as part of the sale contract and therefore does not retain rights in the property.⁴⁷ Rather, an alternative conceptualisation of this structure would be that the lender transfers the loan moneys to the borrower on the basis that the borrower is entitled to use those moneys for the contractually specified purpose. If that purpose is carried out the lender is bound by the contract to release any proprietary rights in the loan moneys; if the purpose is not carried out the lender does not release those proprietary rights. The equitable interest in the loan money does not leave the lender – it would be, in fact, an express trust contained in the contract. The express trust analysis and the reasons for preferring it are considered next.

22.4.3 Express trust

The express trust analysis

The analysis of the Quistclose trust as a form of express trust would proceed as follows. The lender enters into a contract of loan with the borrower. That contract does not conform to the ordinary presumption of a loan contract that the lender intends to transfer outright all of the interest in the loan moneys but rather contains an express contractual provision which precludes the borrower from using the money for any purpose other than that provided for in the contract. The contract could be understood as containing an express trust for the benefit of the lender on the following terms: the loan moneys will be advanced to the borrower as trustee with a power to pay away that money for the purposes specified in the loan contract and for no other purpose; otherwise the loan moneys are held on trust for the lender by the borrower until the loan moneys are used for the contractual purpose. Those terms would continue: if the borrower purports to use the loan moneys for any other purpose then the borrower will be acting in excess of her power, such that the exercise of the power will be void, and those loan moneys would continue to be held on trust for the benefit of the lender. The lender would be able to trace the loan moneys into the hands of any third party and so recover them, as considered in Chapter 19. The borrower would be liable to account to the lender for any breach of trust, as considered in Chapter 18.

The lender's rights under the express trust would come into existence from the moment that the loan contract was created. The lender's security interest would therefore be in existence from the date of the creation of the contract. What would be required would be sufficient certainty of intention to create an express trust from that moment as opposed to transferring absolute title in the loan money to the borrower, as is more usual in relation to loan contracts.

45 Ibid.

46 Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington [1996] AC 669.

47 Worthington, 1996, 44.

What is perhaps difficult about this analysis is that, first, it has not been upheld in an English case yet, although it has been upheld in Australia;⁴⁸ and secondly, it is perhaps sufficiently complex to require drafting explicitly in a loan contract, otherwise a court may be reluctant to infer its existence. It is clearly the most advantageous analysis of a Quistclose arrangement, it is suggested, because it offers the neatest protection for the lender of the money throughout the life of the loan contract by not relying on the commission of a breach of contract before the trust comes into existence for the first time.

More frequently the cases have turned on contracts in which it is not clear what the parties intended. Such contracts may nevertheless disclose an express trust (such intention being capable of imputation by the court as an unconscious express trust).⁴⁹ As contended in the diagram in para 22.4.2, the lender does not part with equitable title in a Quistclose situation: rather, the lender retains equitable title in the loan moneys. That retention of title in which the borrower acquires legal title (and thus the ability to pay the loan moneys into its own bank account) coupled with the retention of the equitable title by the lender and the contractual limitation on the use of the property, constitutes this Quistclose trust as a form of express trust.⁵⁰ It is suggested that it would have been preferable if Lord Millett had referred to his trust in Twinsectra v Yardley as being an express trust rather than a resulting trust, as considered below. What his Lordship did not do was to explain the nature of the borrower's power to use the loan moneys.

An example of the express trust analysis

The Australian case of Re Australian Elizabethan Theatre Trust has held that there is no need for a separate analysis of the Quistclose trust and that, instead, ordinary principles of express trust law are sufficient to explain the appropriate property law principles.⁵¹ Thus, it is said,⁵² there is an express trust with two limbs: one granting a power to the borrower to use the loan moneys for the contractually-specified purpose and the second which provides that any misuse of the loan moneys causes the entire equitable interest to be held for the lender.⁵³ In *Templeton Insurance Ltd v Penningtons Solicitors LLP*⁵⁴ there was a suitable factual matrix to permit this analysis. Templeton wanted to lend money to J for the purposes of buying an identified plot of land for development. The loan contract was structured so that Templeton did not pay the money to J but rather paid it to Penningtons, J's solicitors, subject to a solicitor's undertaking on Penningtons' part that Penningtons would keep the money in its client account only to be used to acquire the absolute title in the development land, or else to be held in an identified account so as to collect interest for Templeton. Whereas Lewison J analysed 48 Re Australian Elizabethan Theatre Trust (1991) 102 ALR 681, 691, per Gummow J.

49 As in Paul v Constance [1977] 1 WLR 527.

50 Thomas, 2000.

51 Re Australian Elizabethan Theatre Trust (1991) 102 ALR 681, 691, per Gummow J.

52 Ibid. See Thomas and Hudson, 2004, para 9.84.

53 General Communications Ltd v Development Finance Corporation of New Zealand Ltd [1990] 3 NZLR 406, 432.

54 [2006] EWHC 685 (Ch).

this transaction on the basis of Twinsectra v Yardley – a resulting trust analysis – it would have been possible to say that Penningtons held the money as trustee under an express trust which could be inferred from the circumstances of paying the money into a client account⁵⁵ and that Penningtons had a limited power as trustee to advance the loan moneys to complete the purchase of the development land. If Penningtons had breached the terms of the trust then it would have acted in excess of that power and in breach of its obligations as trustee.

Against the express trust

The principal argument against the express trust model, it is suggested, is not a theoretical objection but rather a practical one: in Barclays Bank v Quistclose and in Twinsectra v Yardley, two differently-constituted Houses of Lords have not found that there was an intention to create an express trust. Perhaps after Lord Wilberforce's dicta in Barclays Bank v Quistclose the courts have become locked into a resulting trust analysis which has prevented them from seeing the trust in any other way. Lord Wilberforce's 'primary trust' does suggest the existence of some form of trust from the time of the creation of the loan contract and, it is suggested, this could be understood as being an express trust in relation to which the borrower has a power to advance the money for the purposes identified in the loan contract. Equally, Lord Millett's retention of title could be understood as being a retention of title on the basis of an express trust, which would have been a more comfortable analysis than a resulting trust where that resulting trust would ordinarily be understood as coming into existence at some time after the loan contract had been created. That is, if the lender is taken to have retained some interest in the loan money from the creation of the contract, then it could have been said that that interest takes the form of an equitable interest under an express trust. Nevertheless, the express trust analysis does not have the support of English authority at present.

To return to the diagram at para 22.4.2 above, the finding of an express trust would require that that trust be created on Day 1 at the same time as the loan contract is created. Thus, when the loan moneys are transferred to the borrower, they are transferred to the borrower as trustee. This would need to be made clear on the terms of the loan contract. In this sense the lender would be retaining an equitable interest in the money. This goes against the ordinary mechanism of a loan contract whereby the lender transfers absolute title to the borrower, as opposed merely to the legal rights of a trustee.

22.4.4 Constructive trust

The argument in favour of a constructive trust

The third explanation of the nature of these trusts would be that the Quistclose trust could be considered to be a constructive trust on the general basis that it would be unconscionable for the lender to assert title to that money if it was not used for the purpose for which it was lent. The Quistclose trust principle was stated in *Carreras Rothmans Ltd v Freeman Mathews Treasure Ltd*⁵⁶ to be that:

55 As was the case in Target Holdings v Reforms [1996] AC 421 and in Boscawen v Bajwa [1996] 1 WLR 328.

56 [1985] Ch 207, 222.

equity fastens of the conscience of the person who receives from another property transferred for a specific purpose only and not therefore for the recipient's own purposes, so that such person will not be permitted to treat the property as his own or to use it for other than the stated purpose.

This statement could be taken to be authority for one of three competing understandings of the Quistclose arrangement. At first blush, the reference to the 'conscience' of the recipient equates most obviously to a constructive trust, although these dicta are capable of multiple analyses. This judgment was given immediately at the end of the trial, whereas it is more usual for a judge to retire to reflect on his judgment at the end of a complex trial, and therefore some commentators⁵⁷ have suggested that this expression should not be relied upon too closely as requiring any particular analysis of the Quistclose trust. In line with the general theory of trusts advanced in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington, to define the Quistclose trust as operating solely on the conscience of the recipient of the money is merely to place the situation within the general understanding of the trust as part of equity, rather than to categorise it necessarily as any particular type of trust.

Against a constructive trust

The principal argument against the imposition of a constructive trust is that the equitable interest of the lender appears to exist before the borrower seeks to perform any unconscionable act in relation to the property. As the speech of Lord Browne-Wilkinson in *Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington*⁵⁸ reminds us, a constructive trust only comes into existence when the trustee has knowledge of some factor which affects her conscience. In the context of a Quistclose arrangement the rights of the lender arise under the contract and therefore pre-date the transfer of the loan moneys. A constructive trust would seem to require that the borrower misapply the loan moneys before her conscience could be affected so as to create a constructive trust. It is not the court imposing a constructive trust to grant rights, nor to restore pre-existing rights, to the lender. Rather, the lender appears to have retained its proprietary rights throughout the transaction. So, if the contract is created on Day 1 and the loan moneys are transferred to the borrower on Day 2, it is not until Day 3, when the borrower misuses the money contrary to the terms of the contract, that any constructive trust could come into existence because it is only on Day 3 that there is any unconscionable action in the form of the misuse of the loan moneys. If the borrower had gone into insolvency on Day 2 then there would be no effective proprietary rights in favour of the lender over the loan money because the insolvency would have occurred before those constructive trust rights came into existence.

One further shortcoming with the analysis of this form of trust as a kind of constructive trust is that it really avoids the question of what form of trust is a Quistclose trust: bracketing it off as being something imposed by operation of law is to ignore the structure used by the parties and the two-tier trust accepted by the courts in Quistclose. Its strength is that it recognises that, where the parties have failed to create a conscious express trust, it is 57 Thomas and Hudson, 2004, 292 et seq.

58 [1996] AC 669.

necessarily equity which intervenes to allocate title between the parties. That intervention is to police the conscience of the borrower as trustee in the manner in which she deals with the loan moneys.

22.4.5 The Quistclose trust as a retention of title: the Twinsectra model

The nature of the Twinsectra model

An alternative analysis of the Quistclose trust, as considered in outline above, was advanced by Lord Millett in his minority speech in the House of Lords in Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley.⁵⁹ The approach advanced there was that the Quistclose trust should be considered to be akin to a retention of title by the lender whereby the lender effectively retains an equitable interest in the property throughout the transaction. In that case a solicitor permitted loan moneys to be used by his client in breach of the express terms of a loan contract. On this analysis, a Quistclose trust enables a party to a commercial contract to retain their equitable interest in property provided as part of a commercial agreement. There is a similarity between Quistclose trusts in equity and Romalpa clauses at common law (as considered in section 22.2 above) to the extent that the original titleholder is able to retain rights in property: in Romalpa clauses it is the absolute title which is retained whereas in Quistclose trusts it is the equitable interest which is retained. Lord Millett took the view that the solicitor's undertaking to use the money only for a limited purpose gave rise to a Quistclose trust. His Lordship took the opportunity to ventilate the following understanding of a Quistclose trust:

The Quistclose trust is a simple, commercial arrangement akin . . . to a retention of title clause (though with a different object) which enables the borrower to have recourse to the lender's money for a particular purpose without entrenching on the lender's property rights more than necessary to enable the purpose to be achieved. The money remains the property of the lender unless and until it is applied in accordance with his directions, and in so far as it is not so applied it must be returned to him. I am disposed, perhaps predisposed, to think that this is the only analysis which is consistent both with orthodox trust law and with commercial reality.⁶⁰

The lender could therefore be taken to retain the equitable interest in the loan moneys throughout the life of the contract.⁶¹ However, a closer reading of Lord Millett's words, quoted above, and in particular the expression 'the money remains the property of the lender', could be read so as to suggest that the property remains absolutely the property of the lender: that is, the entire title, both legal and equitable, could be said to remain with the lender. It is suggested, however, that this analysis would mean that there was no trust of any sort at all because no title would have passed to the borrower so as to constitute a trust of any sort. Instead, the lender would have remained the outright, absolute owner of the 59 [2002] 2 All ER 377. See also Lord Millett in Re Crown Forestry Rental Trust; Latimer v Commissioner of Inland Revenue [2004] 4 All ER 558, [2004] STC 923 and Millett, 1985. For an analysis of this approach see Penner, 2004.

60 [2002] 2 All 377, 398–99.

61 Ibid, 398, para 80. This approach was followed in Re Margareta Ltd, Freeman v Customs and Excise [2005] All ER (D) 262, per Crystal QC (sitting as a Deputy Judge in the High Court), para [15] et seq.

money. This is not how loan contracts operate: ordinarily the borrower becomes absolute owner of the money. Perhaps the use of the vague term ‘property’ by Lord Millett here is unfortunate. Maybe, the lender would remain the owner of all of the property rights in the borrowed money and the borrower would be merely the bailee of the borrowed money until such time as it was applied for the contractually-specified purpose:⁶² again this seems unlikely on most loan contracts. It is suggested that Lord Millett’s expression ‘the money remains the property of the lender’ should be interpreted to mean that it is merely all of the equitable interest in the money which remains vested in the lender, and that the borrower is vested either with the legal title in that money so as to be entitled to use it for the purpose identified in the loan contract as a trustee, or else with a power to advance that money for the contractually-specified purpose. Consequently, the lender’s equitable interest must be defeasible by the borrower’s proper use of the money, with the result either that the borrower has the power as trustee of the money to defeat the lender’s rights in that money or alternatively that the borrower itself has an equitable interest in the money which is contingent on the borrower’s proper use of the loan moneys. This last analysis would suggest that the lender does not hold all of the equitable interest, but rather holds all of the equitable interest except for that part represented by the borrower’s contingent rights; or alternatively that the borrower has a mere power to use the money subject to the lender’s outright title.

It is suggested, then, that the least satisfactory analysis of a Quistclose trust would be that the lender retains absolute title in the money because that would deny the existence of a trust. It would be the case that the lender retained absolute title in the loan moneys if the loan contract provided that the borrower had merely a facility with the lender such that the borrower could instruct the lender to make payment of the loan moneys to a third party identified in the loan agreement (in a manner similar, perhaps, to a letter of credit facility).⁶³ In such a situation, however, there would be no trust but rather merely a contractual right to instruct the lender to transfer the money at the borrower’s instruction in the manner provided for in the loan agreement. In accordance with commercial reality, this mimics a retention of title clause with title in the money only passing once the money is used for its specified purpose. Similarly, the borrower does not acquire full title in the property because that would defeat the purpose of the arrangement if the borrower were found to have an entirely free use of the money.⁶⁴ However, for there to be a trust at all there must be a declaration of a trust such that there is a division between the ownership of the legal and of the equitable interests in the loan moneys between two or more people. As considered earlier in this chapter, the commercial purpose of a Quistclose trust – that the borrower be prevented from using borrowed moneys for some purpose other than that agreed between borrower and lender – can be achieved by a number of devices by which the lender retains some proprietary rights in the loan moneys and thus makes those moneys available to the borrower but without vesting absolute title in the loan moneys in the borrower. It is suggested that deciding which of those models has been used will depend upon a proper analysis of the terms of the individual loan contract.

62 As Lord Browne-Wilkinson reminded us in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington [1996] AC 669: if there is no separation of the equitable title from the legal title such that a trustee or trustees hold the equitable title for identified beneficiaries, then there is no trust: rather, absolute title remains with the outright ‘owner’ of the property – the person whom civilian lawyers would consider to have dominium in the property.

63 See Millett, 1985.

64 Twinsectra v Yardley [2002] 2 All ER 377, 399, para 81.

There is one other problem with Lord Millett's formulation, which falls into two parts. First, the Twinsectra trust is said by Lord Millett to be a resulting trust. Secondly, despite it being a resulting trust the lender is said to retain her interest in the loan property. A resulting trust operates by the property 'jumping back' to the beneficiary of that resulting trust. In the example of a Quistclose arrangement, as under the diagram set out in para 22.4.2 above, this would necessitate that the resulting trust could only come into existence on Day 3 when the trust money is misused and, in any event, only once the interest in the property has been transferred away to the borrower. This does not sit well, however, with the notion that the lender has retained an interest in the loan money. The lender has either relinquished her rights in the money so that a resulting trust can come into existence later, or else the lender has retained an equitable interest in the loan money as from Day 1 in which case that equitable interest cannot be said to jump back to the lender because she has retained it throughout. Alternatively, we would have to re-write our understanding of a resulting trust as a doctrine which returns ownership to its beneficiary. It is suggested that there is no need for that, however, because this is simply a confusion between an inappropriate resulting trust and a more useful express trust which is to be inferred from the circumstances.

Thus Lord Millett has only served to raise as many questions as he has answered. The commercial difficulties with Lord Millett's model of the Quistclose trust are considered at para 22.4.8 below.⁶⁵

22.4.6 Analysing the key decisions closely

We can only understand the arguments about the nature of a Quistclose trust if we focus in detail on the precise formulations used by the courts. In that vein, let us bore down a little more deeply into the detail of the dicta of Lord Wilberforce in Barclays Bank v Quistclose. The main argument advanced by Barclays Bank was that there was only a loan contract between Quistclose and Rolls Razor, and under banking law there is a clear principle that loan contracts and contracts for bank accounts in themselves do not create a trust relationship.⁶⁶ Lord Wilberforce, however, was prepared to imply the existence of a trust on the facts in line with earlier cases like Re Rogers where the existence of the trust was predicated on the important fact that the loan contract contained a statement of a limited purpose for which the loan money could be used.⁶⁷ It is important to dwell a little on the precise words which Lord Wilberforce used. His Lordship held that: '[i]t is not difficult to establish precisely upon what terms the money was advanced . . . to Rolls Razor Ltd. There is no doubt that the loan was made specifically in order to enable Rolls Razor Ltd. to pay the dividend . . . and for no other purpose'.⁶⁸ The parties' contractual purpose was clear: the money was to be used only for a limited purpose.

Lord Wilberforce continued:

65 See also GW Thomas and AS Hudson, The Law of Trusts, 2004, para 49–14 et seq for a more detailed discussion of Quistclose trusts in general.

66 See Alastair Hudson, The Law of Finance, Sweet & Maxwell, 2009, para 30–4. See Foley v Hill (1848) 2 HL Cas 28, 9 ER 1002, 1005, per Lord Cottenham LC.

67 [1970] AC 567, 581.

68 Ibid.

There is surely no difficulty in recognising the co-existence in one transaction of legal and equitable rights and remedies: when the money is advanced, the lender acquires an equitable right to see that it is applied for the primary designated purpose.⁶⁹ when the purpose has been carried out (that is, the debt paid) the lender has his remedy against the borrower in debt: if the primary purpose cannot be carried out, the question arises if a secondary purpose (that is, repayment to the lender) has been agreed, expressly or by implication: if it has, the remedies of equity may be invoked to give effect to it, if it has not (and the money is intended to fall within the general fund of the debtor's assets) then there is the appropriate remedy for recovery of a loan.⁷⁰

This passage means that there is no problem both with having obligations at common law (that is, to repay the loan) and also obligations in equity (that is, to hold the money on trust until it is used for the specified purpose). Thus, if the purpose is performed then the lender has rights against the borrower at common law under the terms of the contract (that is, 'has his remedy in debt'). The 'secondary obligation' arises in equity either on the express terms of the contract or impliedly from the circumstances. The 'remedies of equity' in this context are the 'secondary trust' which requires that the loan money is held on trust if it is not used for the specified purpose. Interestingly, though, Lord Wilberforce expressed this in terms of being a general 'equitable right' rather than explicitly a resulting trust: an idea to which we shall return below. A similar formulation has been used by Lord Millett in Twinsectra v Yardley,⁷¹ and approved by Evans-Lombe J in Cooper v PRG Power Ltd,⁷² to the effect that 'when the money is advanced, the lender acquires a right, enforceable in equity, to see that it is applied for the stated purpose, or more accurately to prevent its application for any other purpose': again, it is an equitable ability to prevent misuse of the money. As Lord Wilberforce continued:

I can appreciate no reason why the flexible interplay of law and equity cannot let in these practical arrangements, and other variations if desired: it would be to the discredit of both systems if they could not. In the present case the intention to create a secondary trust for the benefit of the lender, to arise if the primary trust, to pay the dividend, could not be carried out, is clear and I can find no reason why the law should not give effect to it.

Therefore, the Quistclose trust arises from the interplay of the ordinary principles of the contract of loan at common law and the equitable principles which prevent ownership of the loan money being passed to a third party if it is misused. The manner in which the Quistclose trust arises is then by means of a 'secondary trust' coming into existence for the benefit of the lender if the 'primary trust . . . cannot be carried out'. Three points emerge. First, this trust was based on that interaction of primary and secondary trusts being the intention of the parties, an idea which has been approved in subsequent cases.⁷³ For example, in 69 In re Rogers, 8 Morr. 243, per both Lindley LJ and Kay LJ.

70 Barclays Bank v Quistclose [1970] AC 567, 581–582.

71 [2002] 2 AC 164, para [69].

72 [2008] BCC 588, para [13].

73 Re Niagara Mechanical Services International Ltd (in admin) [2001] BCC 393; Shalson v Russo [2003] EWHC 1637 (Ch), [2005] Ch 281; Cooper v PRG Power [2008] BCC 588.

*Abou-Rahmah v Abacha*⁷⁴ it was held that there could not be a Quistclose trust if the parties' intentions were that money was paid 'unconditionally' from one to the other. Secondly, this does not require that the borrower must have misused the money; instead, it only requires that the purpose 'cannot be carried out' for whatever reason, whether because of the borrower's insolvency or some other event. Thirdly, this form of trust must be a resulting trust because the equitable interest arises for the first time once the primary purpose cannot be carried out. Moreover, because the House of Lords was asked specifically in this appeal whether or not a resulting trust came into existence, we must assume that they are therefore upholding the existence of a resulting trust on this appeal even though the expression 'resulting trust' is not used by Lord Wilberforce.

It is this last conceptualisation of the Quistclose trust which we should pursue into the model advanced by Lord Millett in Twinsectra v Yardley. Lord Millett upheld the theory of the Quistclose trust being a resulting trust, but explains its nature differently from Lord Wilberforce in the Quistclose case. We shall focus on two passages in particular from his Lordship's speech. First, paragraph 81 of the judgment, which was considered in outline above, which reads as follows:

On this analysis, the Quistclose trust is a simple commercial arrangement akin . . . to a retention of title clause (though with a different object) which enables the borrower to have recourse to the lender's money for a particular purpose without entrenching on the lender's property rights more than necessary to enable the purpose to be achieved. The money remains the property of the lender unless and until it is applied in accordance with his directions, and insofar as it is not so applied it must be returned to him. I am disposed, perhaps pre-disposed, to think that this is the only analysis which is consistent both with orthodox trust law and with commercial reality. . . .

The second sentence is very problematic: 'The money remains the property of the lender unless and until it is applied in accordance with his directions, and insofar as it is not so applied it must be returned to him.' There is a clear contradiction in terms here: if the money remains the property of the lender then how can it possibly be returned to him? If I retain property then I cannot possibly ask you to return it to me later because I have kept it. Imagine that you ask to borrow my umbrella because it is raining and I refuse to lend it to you,⁷⁵ if I were then to come to you the next day and demand that you return my umbrella you would say 'well, you kept your umbrella so how can you possibly have it returned to you?' It is the same problem with Lord Millett's formulation here: if the lender retains the money, it cannot logically be returned to him. What we might take Lord Millett to mean is that ownership of the money in equity remains with the lender even if possession of the money is passed to the borrower, such that the borrower has to return possession of the money to the lender. Similarly, Lord Millett's reference to 'the property' is unclear because we cannot know if it means retention of absolute title (which would negate the possibility of there being a trust) or whether it is supposed to mean only retention of an equitable interest under a trust.

74 [2005] EWHC 2662 (QB), [2006] 1 Lloyd's Rep 484.

75 I can be capricious like that, especially with umbrellas because you never get them back.

The following paragraph from Lord Millett's speech also presents problems; it is paragraph 100:

As Sherlock Holmes reminded Dr Watson, when you have eliminated the impossible, whatever remains, however improbable, must be the truth. I would reject all the alternative analyses, which I find unconvincing for the reasons I have endeavoured to explain, and hold the Quistclose trust to be an entirely orthodox example of the kind of default trust known as a resulting trust. The lender pays the money to the borrower by way of loan, but he does not part with the entire beneficial interest in the money, and in so far as he does not it is held on a resulting trust for the lender from the outset. Contrary to the opinion of the Court of Appeal, it is the borrower who has a very limited use of the money, being obliged to apply it for the stated purpose or return it. He has no beneficial interest in the money, which remains throughout in the lender subject only to the borrower's power or duty to apply the money in accordance with the lender's instructions. When the purpose fails, the money is returnable to the lender, not under some new trust in his favour which only comes into being on the failure of the purpose, but because the resulting trust in his favour is no longer subject to any power on the part of the borrower to make use of the money. Whether the borrower is obliged to apply the money for the stated purpose or merely at liberty to do so, and whether the lender can countermand the borrower's mandate while it is still capable of being carried out, must depend on the circumstances of the particular case.

Again, as with paragraph 81, there is a problem in that we are told that the money 'remains throughout in the lender' and yet that 'the money is returnable to the lender'. Furthermore, the Quistclose trust is held explicitly to be a resulting trust, even though ownership of the money is said to remain with the lender. Therefore, this is not a resulting trust as Prof Birks has explained it because a resulting trust ordinarily requires that equitable ownership of the property has passed away and that it then 'jumps back'⁷⁶ to the lender. That cannot happen if the lender retains equitable ownership of the loan money throughout the loan contract. Alternatively, we must reject Prof Birks's analysis of a resulting trust and instead accept that Lord Millett has established that resulting trusts are merely a 'default trust' in which a court of equity simply recognises that when there is a question as to the ownership of property then we should recognise that the last owner of that property is still its owner. This is the analysis which is advanced in Chapter 11 of this book of resulting trusts in general: an automatic resulting trust operates in circumstances in which it is unclear who is the owner of property so as to declare that the property is held on trust for the last person who was undoubtedly the owner of that property.

We are told that the borrower has merely a power to use the money for the described purpose (just like the powers discussed in Chapter 3). The money is said 'to be returnable to the lender' (oddly even though the lender has nevertheless retained equitable ownership of it) because the power disappears (apparently) once it is not performed. In the final sentence, Lord Millett acknowledges that the precise nature of the parties' obligations will depend upon the precise terms of the contract between them. Therefore, we have a very stylised form of resulting trust in the speech of Lord Millett. This model is necessary for Lord Millett's analysis and yet Lord Millett delivered a dissenting speech in the House of Lords, and as such it is difficult to know what the force of this model is in English trusts law. What is important to note is that subsequent cases have supported it, and thus have lent it some gravitas. It is nevertheless suggested that the better analysis would be to infer the existence of an express trust (just as in *Re Kayford*⁷⁷) from the circumstance.

76 See section 11.1 of this book.

22.4.7 The nature of the Quistclose trust is dependent on the terms of the loan contract

The effect of the terms of the loan contract

While the preceding analysis of the Twinsectra model⁷⁸ of the Quistclose device might appear to present a step towards a settled understanding of the Quistclose trust, it is suggested nevertheless that the precise nature of any given Quistclose arrangement will depend upon the structure of the loan agreement which the parties have effected. It might of course be that the loan moneys are not to be advanced to the borrower until the contractually-specified object has been performed or under terms whereby the bank insists on a payment facility which can only be used for the completion of that specified purpose, such as by way of a banker's draft in favour of the third party who is specified in the loan contract. The use of the loan moneys might be made available to the borrower subject to a trust arrangement made explicit in the loan contract that the funds were to be held by some custodian subject only to a power to use them for the contractually specified purpose. In consequence, the commercial objective of a Quistclose trust would be achieved without the use of either a traditional Quistclose model (with its primary and secondary trust) or the Twinsectra model (with the retention of rights in the property by the lender). In *Mundy v Brown*⁷⁹ it was considered particularly significant, in reliance upon the dicta of Lord Millett in Twinsectra v Yardley, that the moneys had not been left at the free disposal of the recipient, but rather that the intentions of the parties were that the recipient was obliged to use those moneys only for a specified purpose. This is, in effect, just another way of looking at the recipient's obligation being to observe the purpose specified in the contract.

Alternatively then, as discussed above, a Quistclose trust could be conceived of on the basis that the loan moneys are subject to an express trust under which the borrower acts as trustee with a power to use the trust property for the purpose specified in the contract, but for no other. The benefit of such a structure would be that the borrower, as trustee, would bear personal liability for the breach of any trust as well as an obligation to reconstitute the trust fund in the event that the moneys were transferred away for some purpose other than that specified in the contract. For such an express trust analysis to be viable in any given circumstance, it would be necessary for there to be sufficient intention on the part of the contracting parties for the borrower to hold the loan moneys on trust from the outset of the transaction, and not simply that the trust is enforced by the court subsequently to prevent the borrower unconscionably from seeking to apply those moneys otherwise than for the contractually agreed purpose. In other words, the loan contract would need to make this express trust explicit on its face. This analysis of a loan contract does not conform to the ordinary presumption of a loan contract that the lender intends to transfer outright all of the interest in the loan moneys but rather contains an express contractual provision which precludes the borrower from using the money for any purpose other than that provided for in the contract. A well-drafted contract may well provide that the borrower shall hold the loan moneys on trust for the lender until such time as the contractually stipulated purpose is performed. At that time the borrower would be obliged to transfer the money outright. Such a contract would clearly contain an express trust. More frequently the decided cases have considered loan contracts in which it is not clear what the parties intended. Such contracts may nevertheless suggest the existence of an express trust (such intention being capable of imputation by the court in an unconscious express trust).⁸⁰ The question is to identify the most secure method of structuring a Quistclose trust arrangement to protect against these uncertainties.

77 [1975] 1 WLR 279.

78 [2002] 2 All ER 377, 398–399.

79 [2011] EWHC 377 (Ch).

22.4.8 The safest commercial approach to controlling borrowed moneys

If a lender is seeking to protect itself against either the misbehaviour of the borrower or the insolvency of the borrower, then it is suggested that, instead of using a Quistclose trust, the following structure would be the safest approach: the lender should remain the absolute owner of the loan moneys and never transfer them to the ‘borrower’ but rather should merely grant a facility to the borrower to instruct the lender when to make payment such that it is the lender itself who transfers the loan moneys for the contractually specified purpose at the borrower’s order. The lender, then, should not transfer legal title nor indeed any title to the borrower. Rather, the lender should pay the loan moneys into a separate bank account which is held in the lender’s sole name without any declaration of trust in favour of the borrower. The borrower should then have a mandate, granted by contract, to direct the bank when the appropriate time has arisen to make the payment to the person or for the purpose identified in the loan contract. Thus, the borrower cannot acquire title in the loan moneys should it become insolvent, nor can the borrower use the money for any purpose other than that specified in the contract.

The workings of the Quistclose trust, in the wake of Lord Millett’s speech in Twinsectra v Yardley, are explained by Thomas and Hudson as operating in the following way:

Akin to a retention of title clause (though with a different object) [the Quistclose trust] enables the borrower to have recourse to the lender’s money for a particular purpose without entrenching on the lender’s property rights more than necessary to enable the purpose to be achieved. The money remains the property of the lender unless and until it is applied in accordance with his directions, and in so far as it is not so applied it must be returned to him, notwithstanding the borrower’s insolvency. It is therefore a form of asset protection.⁸¹

It is suggested that this is the clearest description of the best means of using a Quistclose trust. It avoids the ambiguity in Lord Millett’s formulation⁸² in which Lord Millett refers to the trust as arising as a ‘resulting trust’, suggesting that title had passed to the borrower only 80 Paul v Constance [1977] 1 WLR 527.

81 Thomas and Hudson, The Law of Trusts, Oxford University Press, 2004, 292.

82 Twinsectra v Yardley [2002] 2 AC 164, 187–193.

to jump back on resulting trust when the borrower breaches the term of the contract. It is possible that Lord Millett intended the trust to come into existence at the same time as the loan contract but the reference to a resulting trust makes this unclear. Therefore, the contested forms of Quistclose trust should not be used. After all, no commercial client would be content to take a troubled form of equitable interest over money instead of the retention of absolute title which I am advocating here.

In my suggested structure, the assets remain the property of the lender throughout the life of the transaction but the borrower has a power to direct the use of that money. This structure would achieve three things. First, the lender would retain proprietary rights in the loan moneys. Secondly, the lender itself would be able to vet the purposes for which the moneys are intended to be used rather than rely on the good faith of the borrower under an ordinary outright transfer of loan moneys. Thirdly, the moneys retained in the account would constitute an identifiable fund which could be subjected to a trust without confusion as to its identity.

I have suggested in the passage before the quotation from Thomas and Hudson above a further refinement to the effect that the lender should limit the borrower's power to spend the money without the lender's prior consent. This change would require that there is no trust created at all: instead the lender should retain absolute title in the money and instead simply agree contractually to transfer it directly to the third party identified in the loan contract at a time when the borrower may direct. By controlling the borrower's use of the money by preventing the borrower from having any property right in it, the lender is protected against the borrower's insolvency and should be able to protect itself against misapplication of the money by its own clerks ensuring that the moneys are being advanced for the contractually specified purpose before paying them away themselves on behalf of the lender.

22.4.9 The Quistclose trust as a form of purpose trust

The argument has been raised that a Quistclose trust is a form of abstract purpose trust whereby the trust comes into existence for the purpose of retaining title in money. However, it is suggested that it is not a purpose trust, which ought properly to be void due to its lack of a beneficiary, but rather there will always be a beneficiary of the trust arrangement, whether the lender or the borrower, who can take an immediate interest in the loan money. Which of them takes that interest from time to time is dependent on whether or not it has been used in accordance with the terms of the loan contract. Therefore, this form of trust will be valid because there is some person who has an equitable interest in the property, such that the beneficiary principle is satisfied. In truth there are many 'purpose trusts' of some sort which are given effect in English law, provided that there is also some beneficiary of the trust. So, there is no objection to a trust for the benefit of identified persons also containing a statement of a purpose for which the trust property is to be used. The trust is valid because there are beneficiaries and what is more the trustees have a clear statement of their goals as trustees in the form of their obligations and powers.

22.4.10 Two different commercial contexts in which Quistclose trusts are significant

The Quistclose trust in the abstract

There are two different practical contexts in which a Quistclose trust may be important. The first is that in which the borrower of the money goes into insolvency. The purpose of the Quistclose trust will be to keep the loan moneys separate from the borrower's estate which will be divided up among the borrower's unsecured creditors. The second context is that in which the borrower has transferred the loan money to some third party so that the lender will have difficulty in recovering it. The discussion of Quistclose trusts in the cases and amongst the commentators has tended to focus on their advantages in protecting against insolvency and has therefore simply assumed that the loan money would be separately identifiable in a bank account so that it could form the subject matter of a trust without undue complication. However, what if the loan money has been paid away and it is not separately identifiable in a way which satisfies the requirement of certainty of subject matter in trusts law?

In addressing these different contexts we should begin by reminding ourselves of the example used in para 11.3 to describe a Quistclose trust. It went as follows:

Suppose Laura agrees to lend money to Bill. Bill is facing personal bankruptcy. His business is the manufacture and sale of modern, metal furniture. Bill has been unable to sell enough of his furniture but he thinks that if he were able to adapt his machinery to manufacture a particular type of fashionable furniture then he would be able to move back into profit. Laura therefore agrees to lend Bill £10,000 on the condition that the money is only to be used to adapt that machine. The money is transferred to Bill. The next week, Bill is declared insolvent and his trustee in bankruptcy seeks to divide up the £10,000 among Bill's creditors.

In dealing with the first context in which Quistclose trusts are used – to guard against the borrower's insolvency – this hypothetical example was explained as being analysed legally in the following manner:

The Quistclose trust means that the £10,000 is held on trust for Laura and therefore does not form part of Bill's estate for insolvency purposes. Consequently, Laura will be able to recover the loan money (and using the rule in Saunders v Vautier, as the sole beneficiary under the Quistclose trust, she will be able to compel the trustee to transfer the money to her absolutely).

However, instead of Bill going into insolvency and leaving the £10,000 easily identifiable, suppose that Bill had used the money in the following way:

In breach of the contractual condition, Bill decides to use the money to pay one of his suppliers of leather, Caroline. Caroline has paid the money into her general bank account and mixed it up with her other money.

In this changed set of facts it is not possible simply to impose a trust over 'the loan money' because the loan money has ceased to exist separately from the other money in Caroline's bank account. It could be said that the Quistclose trust could not be imposed because of lack of certainty of subject matter.⁸³ However, in this context, the utility of the Quistclose trust – as is discussed in detail in Chapter 19 – is in giving Laura the equitable foundation to trace her loan money into Caroline's general bank account and to impose an equitable remedy (such as a charge or a lien) over that general bank account so as to recover her money. To trace her money into a mixed account like this, Laura would be required to demonstrate that she had had an equitable interest, such as an interest under a trust, in the loan money before it was misapplied.⁸⁴ The Quistclose trust grants Laura such an interest and so permits her to trace her money into this mixed account. This second use of Quistclose trusts is the main focus of this section after we have outlined the applicable principles of insolvency law which are important in this context.

83 MacJordan v Brookmount [1992] BCLC 350.

Insolvency

If a person – whether a human being or a company – goes into bankruptcy or insolvency, liquidation or administration, then that person is not at liberty to dispose of its property as it may otherwise wish. Frequently, trusts are used as shelters against insolvency of all of the types just mentioned by providing that the person whom it is feared might go into insolvency is merely the trustee of property which would otherwise be considered to be her own property and which would consequently fall to be divided up among her creditors on her insolvency. Quistclose trusts are one means of shielding money against a borrower's insolvency in loan transactions. However, sham trusts are often used so as to give the mere appearance of separating property from the insolvent person's assets whereas the insolvent person continues to use the property as though it remains entirely her own.⁸⁵ The Insolvency Act 1986 gives the court the power to unpick transactions – such as the settling of property on trust – which are done in an attempt to elude the effects of personal bankruptcy or corporate insolvency. In relation to a personal bankruptcy, if the bankrupt had entered into any transaction with anyone at an undervalue then the trustee in bankruptcy may apply to the court, inter alia, to have the transaction set aside and any property transferred or settled on trust restored to the position it was previously.⁸⁶ Similarly, if a bankrupt has given a 'preference' to anyone then that transaction may be treated in the same manner.⁸⁷ If a transaction is undertaken at an undervalue so as to defraud the insolvent person's then creditors or future creditors, then the court may order the return of the position to the status quo ante as though the transaction had not taken place.⁸⁸ This statutory power is considered in detail at para 11.4.7. By providing that the lender retains or re-acquires (depending on whether it is an express or a resulting trust) title in the loan moneys, a Quistclose trust provides that the lender has a beneficial interest in those loan moneys which she will retain even if the borrower goes into insolvency.

Quistclose trust as an equitable device enabling tracing where the loan moneys have been put beyond reach

Much of the debate surrounding Quistclose trusts proceeds on the basis of an abstract intellectual analysis of the structure itself. Primarily, the question has been put as to whether 84 Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington [1996] AC 669.

85 See section 3.3.

86 Insolvency Act 1986, s 339.

87 Ibid, s 340.

88 Ibid, s 423.

a Quistclose trust is truly a resulting trust, or an express trust or simply a different form of trust altogether.⁸⁹ For the purposes of this section, however, the more important question is as to the manner in which a contractual provision sets out to achieve the general aim of a Quistclose trust: that is, to provide security for the lender in relation to loan moneys which were to have been used only for a specified purpose. The assumption made by many of the judges when dealing with Quistclose trusts is that the borrower is obliged to keep the money separate from all other moneys, so as to use that money for the contractually-specified purpose, and that consequently there will be some identifiable fund over which the Quistclose trust can take effect in a way that will avoid it being declared to be invalid under the principle that there be sufficient certainty of subject matter.⁹⁰ The principal difficulty, it is suggested, with the operation of Quistclose trusts is that the borrower who breaches the stipulation in the loan contract that the loan moneys be used only for a specified purpose will necessarily have paid those moneys away such that there may not be a fund over which such a trust can take effect. To put it crudely: the money will have gone, so what use is the Quistclose trust? That problem is considered in this section.

It is suggested that the central issue in the design of a Quistclose structure is that it ought properly to be ineffective in the event that the loan moneys or their traceable equivalent are not identifiable in the hands of the borrower. Suppose, for example, that a loan is made to a borrower subject to an express contractual provision that the loan moneys are to be used solely to discharge sums owed to identified trade creditors. If those loan moneys were in fact dissipated by the borrower on general expenses otherwise than for those identified trade creditors, such that the moneys had passed into a general current account which had subsequently gone overdrawn, then it would be impossible to identify property which could be the subject matter of a trust in that general current account. In theory, the Quistclose trust would exist because of its inclusion in the loan contract. However, where there is no identifiable subject matter of a trust, that trust will fail.⁹¹

As considered briefly above, that is not the principal strength of the Quistclose trust in these circumstances, however. What the lender will need to do in such circumstances is to trace after the loan moneys to seek to take title over whatever substitute property has been acquired with the loan moneys or to take title over whichever bank account comes to be the moneys last resting place. Only equitable tracing can trace loan moneys through mixtures: such as bank accounts in which the loan moneys have been mixed with other money (see section 19.4). Equitable tracing can only be begun if the claimant had an equitable interest, 89 Yet another explanation would be that the Quistclose trust is properly to be considered as a constructive trust on the basis that it would be unconscionable for the lender to assert title to that money if it was not used for the purpose for which it was lent, on which see the dicta from Carreras Rothmans Ltd v Freeman Mathews Treasure Ltd [1985] 1 Ch 207 reproduced above. The principal shortcoming with the analysis of this form of trust as a kind of constructive trust is that the equitable interest of the lender appears to exist before the borrower seeks to perform any unconscionable act in relation to the property. In the context of a Quistclose arrangement the rights of the lender arise under the contract and therefore pre-date the transfer of the loan moneys. A constructive trust would seem to require that the borrower misapply the loan moneys before her conscience could be affected so as to create a constructive trust: Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669. It is not the court imposing a constructive trust to grant rights, or restore pre-existing rights, to the lender. Rather, the lender would ordinarily appear to have retained its proprietary rights throughout the transaction.

90 See para 3–01.

91 See para 3–01 et seq.

such as an interest under a trust, in those loan moneys: simply having absolute title in the loan moneys would not be enough to commence an equitable tracing claim.⁹² What the Quistclose trust analysis would provide is exactly such an equitable interest on the basis of which the lender could seek to trace those funds in equity through other bank accounts.⁹³ This is a very important strength of the Quistclose trust.

Can a Quistclose trust arise in situations not connected to loan contracts?

Quistclose trusts have arisen only in relation to loan contracts thus far on the decided cases. It has been suggested by Sarah Worthington that this need not necessarily be the case because there seems to be nothing about the Quistclose technique per se which means that the trust could only take effect over money and only when that money is being loaned.⁹⁴ In the High Court in Re Farepak Food and Gifts Ltd,⁹⁵ Mann J considered the availability of a Quistclose trust over moneys which had been pre-paid in the expectation of being exchangeable for goods in the future. There was no contract of loan. The point that Quistclose trusts had only previously arisen in relation to loan contracts was not taken by Mann J. No such trust was found on the facts because it was not found to have been within the contemplation of the parties. However, had the facts been different, there was nothing in the judgment to suggest that that trust would not have been imposed by Mann J.

The reason why Mann J found that there was no Quistclose trust was because it would have made no business sense on the facts for Farepak to have been intended to put all of the moneys received to one side subject to a Quistclose trust. It is not clear from the judgment on what basis a Quistclose trust was being argued for by counsel: there was no contract of loan and therefore this would have been a novel type of Quistclose trust; and it is not clear what the purported use of the money should have been to lead to the inference of a Quistclose trust in these circumstances. Therefore, it is difficult to know against what Mann J was arguing. His Lordship held as follows:

I have already held that the money is taken by the Agents as agent for Farepak. That of itself does not militate against the existence of a Quistclose trust. However, there is no suggestion that the Agent was expected to keep the money separate from other money (or indeed his or her own), and it is indeed known that it was mixed with the money of others and paid over to Farepak with the money of others. Again, that of itself it not inconsistent with a Quistclose trust, but it does not help.⁹⁶

However, normal service appears to have been resumed as his Lordship carried on in the following manner:

But crucially, there is no suggestion that the money ought to have been put on one side by Farepak pending the transmutation from credited money to goods or vouchers. If

92 Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington [1996] AC 669.

93 Ibid, para 33–97.

94 Worthington, 1996.

95 [2006] All ER (D) 265 (Dec).

96 Ibid, [34].

there were a Quistclose trust then that obligation would have been inherent in it, but the business model would have made no sense. It would have required Farepak to have kept all the customer moneys in a separate account from January until November, untouched until the time when the goods or vouchers were acquired and then sent out. That is completely implausible. It would turn Farepak into a very odd savings organisation. Even banks do not have to do that.⁹⁷

There is, however, nothing to prevent the finding of a Quistclose trust that the trustees were permitted to use the property subject to the Quistclose trust in the approved manner – that is, subject to a power to use the property otherwise held on trust – but such that any breach of the conditions on which the property was to be used would cause the imposition of the Quistclose trust to prevent the misuse and/or to permit the beneficiaries to begin a tracing claim to recover their property. Therefore, it is suggested, Mann J could have held that the moneys were subject to an express trust such that Farepak could use the money for appropriate purposes in the running of the Christmas fund but so that a Quistclose trust would be imposed in the event that they purported to misuse any of the property.

In the interesting case of *Cooper v PRG Power Ltd*⁹⁸ an employee of a company was provided with a Mercedes car. The car was acquired by means of the employee entering into a hire purchase finance contract with the supplier and the company then paid all of the amounts owed by its employee under the contract. The employee left his employment but wanted to keep the car. However, there were amounts left unpaid on the finance agreement, so the company agreed to contribute £3,000 to the lump sum which the employee had to pay under that contract so as to acquire absolute title in the car. For reasons of administrative convenience (because the company had made all of the payments thus far) the company agreed to make the full lump sum payment to the car supplier but required its former employee to pay his part of the lump sum (£34,239) to it first. The employee duly paid the money to the company but the company went into insolvency. As a result the cheque was dishonoured (that is, it ‘bounced’). The employee therefore wanted to show that the amount of £34,239 was held on Quistclose trust for him because it was intended to be used only for the limited purpose of acquiring absolute title in the car. It was held by Evans-Lombe J that there was a Quistclose trust over the money because the parties’ intention was that the money was to be used only for that limited purpose such that the employee would retain equitable ownership of it until it was used for that purpose. (Somewhat unfortunately this was described as being a ‘purpose trust’.)

Three important points arise as a result of the decision in Cooper v PRG Power Ltd. First, interestingly, there was no loan between the employee and the company unlike ordinary Quistclose trusts. Therefore, strictly this should not have been a Quistclose trust and instead should have been an ordinary express trust – as in Re Kayford – whereby money was intended to be kept separate from all other money and used for an identified objective. (Indeed in recent cases many barristers seem content to argue for Quistclose trusts in many circumstances in which a better knowledge of ordinary express trusts law would lead them to argue for an ordinary express trust.) Secondly, importantly, it was held that the money to be subjected to the Quistclose trust does not need to be held separately from all other money.

97 Ibid.

98 [2008] EWHC 498, [2008] BCC 588.

Therefore, the lender's equitable interest exists even if the money disappears into a general bank account such that there is no certainty of subject matter. However, the importance of Lord Millett's analysis in Twinsectra v Yardley was that the payer of the money retained an equitable interest in the money throughout the transaction. Therefore, coming to the third point, the payer is able to trace in equity into the mixed bank account which contains the misused money and establish an equitable remedy over that mixed bank account equal to the amount of money to which the payer is entitled. (Tracing of this sort was discussed in Chapter 19.)

22.4.11 The rights of third parties to the loan moneys

It has been suggested in one decided case⁹⁹ that, if the loan contract required that the borrower pay the loan moneys to X then X would acquire an equitable interest in the loan moneys before they were even paid to him. It is suggested that such an analysis could only be possible if the third party's acquisition of such rights were demonstrably within the contemplation of the parties.

22.4.12 Conclusion

As the playwright and diarist Alan Bennett once said, when writing one wonders if one has merely succeeded in adding to the number of words in the world, rather than adding anything of significance. Given the sheer volume of discussion of the Quistclose trust this is perhaps just another opinion tossed into the ether. However, it does appear to me that a Quistclose trust is properly to be considered to be a form of commercial express trust contained in a contract which retains an equitable interest for the lender of money until such time as that interest is discharged by the application of the loan moneys for their contractually-stipulated purpose.

⁹⁹ Re Northern Developments (Holdings) Ltd, 6 October 1978 (unreported).

Mortgages, charges and taking security

This chapter is available on the companion website at <http://www.routledge.com/cw/hudson/>

This page intentionally left blank

Part 8

Welfare uses of trusts

This page intentionally left blank

Occupational pension funds

This chapter is available on the companion website at <http://www.routledge.com/cw/hudson/>

Charities

25.1	INTRODUCTION	1100
25.1.1	Context	1100
25.1.2	The structure of this chapter: the changes effected by the Charities Act 2011	1101
25.1.3	Categories of charitable trust under the case law	1102
25.1.4	The definition of ‘charitable purposes’ in the Charities Act 2011	1104
25.2	THE SPECIAL FEATURES OF CHARITIES	1108
25.2.1	The trusts law advantages of charitable status	1108
25.2.2	The tax advantages of charitable status	1111
25.3	FACTORS WHICH MAY NEGATE A FINDING OF CHARITABLE STATUS: THE NEED FOR A CHARITABLE INTENTION, BUT NO POLITICAL PURPOSES	1112
25.3.1	Sufficient intention to create a charitable trust	1112
25.3.2	Political purposes	1114
25.3.3	A note before we proceed	1116
25.4	RELIEF AND PREVENTION OF POVERTY	1117
25.4.1	Introduction	1117
25.4.2	What is ‘poverty’?	1120
25.4.3	What is meant by ‘relief’ and by ‘prevention’?	1122
25.4.4	Limits on the class of people taking a benefit	1123
25.5	TRUSTS FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF EDUCATION	1126
25.5.1	Introduction	1126
25.5.2	What is ‘education’?	1126
25.5.3	The ‘public benefit’ requirement	1130
25.6	TRUSTS FOR RELIGIOUS PURPOSES	1135
25.6.1	Introduction	1135
25.6.2	What is a ‘religion’ in charities law?	1136
25.6.3	The requirement of public benefit	1140
25.7	OTHER PURPOSES BENEFICIAL TO THE COMMUNITY	1143
25.7.1	Introduction	1143

25.7.2	The nature of the fourth head: other purposes beneficial to the community	1144
25.7.3	The requirement of a public benefit	1144
25.7.4	The remaining purposes beneficial to the community under the Charities Act 2011	1147
25.8	THE NEW CATEGORIES OF CHARITABLE PURPOSE UNDER THE CHARITIES ACT 2011	1148
25.8.1	An introduction to the Act	1148
25.8.2	The advancement of health or the saving of lives	1148
25.8.3	The advancement of citizenship or community development	1149
25.8.4	The advancement of the arts, culture, heritage or science	1149
25.8.5	The advancement of amateur sport	1150
25.8.6	The advancement of human rights, conflict resolution or reconciliation or the promotion of religious or racial harmony or equality and diversity	1151
25.8.7	The advancement of environmental protection or improvement	1151
25.8.8	The relief of those in need by reason of youth, age, ill-health, disability, financial hardship or other disadvantage	1151
25.8.9	The advancement of animal welfare	1152
25.8.10	The promotion of the efficiency of the armed forces of the Crown	1154
25.8.11	The promotion of the efficiency of the police, fire rescue and ambulance services	1154
25.8.12	Recreational charities	1155
25.9	CY-PRÈS DOCTRINE	1157
25.9.1	The case law position	1158
25.9.2	Exclusivity of purpose	1160
25.9.3	The mechanics of the cy-près doctrine under statute	1161
25.10	THE REGULATION OF CHARITIES	1166
25.11	A BRIEF SURVEY OF THE PUBLIC BENEFIT TEST IN THE LAW OF CHARITIES	1167

OVERVIEW

The case law on charitable trusts has always divided between trusts for the relief of poverty; trusts for the advancement of education; trusts for the advancement of religion; and trusts for other purposes beneficial to the community. However, the enactment of the Charities Act 2011 has had the effect of expanding the categories of 'charitable purpose' beyond those categories set out by the case law. The first three categories – the prevention and relief of poverty, the advancement of religion and the advancement of education – remain, but the fourth category has been replaced by a statutory list of purposes. That statutory list includes: the advancement of health or the saving of lives; the advancement of citizenship or community development; the advancement of the arts, culture, heritage or science; the advancement of amateur sport; the advancement of human rights, conflict resolution or reconciliation or the promotion of religious or racial harmony or equality and diversity; the advancement of environmental protection or improvement; the relief of those in need by reason of youth, age, ill-health, disability, financial hardship or other disadvantage; the advancement of animal welfare. Consequently, the bulk of this chapter deals with the long-established case law categories of charitable purpose first before turning to consider the various statutory categories later on.

Trusts for the relief of poverty must relieve the poverty of some person. 'Poverty' means 'something more than going short' but does not require absolute destitution. It is apparently the case that it need not be a broad section of the community which stands to benefit from the trust. Rather, trusts for the relief of poverty are presumed to have a generally altruistic motivation and are therefore enforceable as being charitable. There have been subtle but significant alterations to the poverty charities in the Charities Act 2011 which call into question trusts for the relief of the poverty of only a small number of people.

Trusts for the advancement of education require that there is some institution of education benefited, or that the purpose of the trust is to generate research which will be published for the public benefit. Trusts for the pursuit of sport fall within the charitable head provided they are annexed to some institution of education. In many cases, educational charitable trusts have been used as fronts for the provision of benefits to a private class of individuals. Consequently, the courts have developed a requirement that there be a sufficient public benefit, which requires that there is no 'personal nexus' between the people who stand to benefit and the settlor of the trust.

Trusts for the advancement of religion are required to have a sufficient public benefit, such that, for example, the works done and the prayers said by a cloistered order of nuns, though religious, would not be charitable in legal terms. Religion is concerned with 'man's relations with God' and therefore excludes many modern new age religions and cults.

Other purposes beneficial to the community require sufficient public benefit. A community must be more than a mere fluctuating body of private individuals (such as employees of a small company). 'Benefit' will accrue from the maintenance of public buildings, the provision of facilities for the disabled within a community, but under case law will not be said to accrue from mere recreation or social events (subject to statute). Political purposes promoting a change in legislation will not be charitable.

25.1 INTRODUCTION

25.1.1 Context

The law relating to charities is a subject in itself, separate from the ordinary law of trusts and commanding its own distinct treatment in the practitioners' treatises and in textbooks.¹ The law relating to charities does not itself conform neatly with the law on express trusts which we have already considered in Part 2. That the law of charities forms part of trusts law is an accident of history. Charities were originally overseen by the ecclesiastical courts and, as will emerge, retain many of the seeds of their religious heritage in the modern law. This part of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction was subsumed by the Courts of Chancery, in particular by those Lords Chancellor who were themselves bishops, and charities were consequently administered in a manner broadly similar to express trusts. A charity is an institution which acts in the public benefit, especially (in the words of the Oxford English Dictionary) to relieve need or distress, or to provide for the communal services more generally. Charities do not seek to earn profits for any purpose other than their charitable purposes. It will be the principal focus of this chapter to explore precisely what English law considers a charitable purpose to be.

¹ Tudor, 2003; Picarda, 2007.

Charities form an essential part of social welfare provision in many Western countries. The charitable sector in the USA stands in place of a welfare state in many contexts, relying on corporations and private individuals to shore up areas of social endeavour by donation or annuity. In the UK, the ‘third sector’ (as it has become known) provides important support in particular areas of social need by raising funds from the public, or by means of corporate or other donation. Charities are referred to as the ‘third sector’ because they are neither part of the public sector, because they are not run by the state, but nor are they entirely private bodies. While the charitable third sector, operating somewhere between the public sector and the private sector, does provide important services and support, it has not been admitted historically by any governmental administration that it is meant to act as a replacement for the welfare state, although there are signs that the Labour government and the Conservative Party are both interested in enhancing the role of the charitable sector in providing services which would otherwise have to be provided by government. The principal problem with this approach, it is suggested, is that charities are not democratically accountable in the way that governments are, and therefore it may be difficult to control the decisions of charitable bodies.

Consequently, the charitable sector occupies a difficult middle ground between the private and public sectors. There are issues of public law (or, administrative law) which centre on the equivocal nature of charities as institutions aimed at providing good public works by entities which are not publicly accountable in the way that central or local government are. Therefore, it is unclear how these bodies ought to be controlled. Responsibility for charities lies with The Charity Commission, a public body created originally by the Charities Act 2006. A perception of widespread mismanagement, and possibly corruption, in the charitable sector had previously led to the enactment of the Charities Acts of 1960 and 1993, with the purpose of creating regulatory bodies which would scrutinise and regulate the affairs of charities more closely than before. Shortcomings were said to include irregular keeping of accounts by charities and a lack of control on the part of the Charity Commissioners to ensure that money was being applied as required by the charities’ own purposes. The Charities Act 2006 has changed the Charities Commissioners into The Charity Commission in an attempt to renew the regulation of charities yet again.

25.1.2 The structure of this chapter: the changes effected by the Charities Act 2011

The Charities Act 2011 has consolidated nearly all of the earlier charities legislation into a new Act. In particular, the important developments in the now-repealed Charities Act 2006 have been transposed into the 2011 Act without substantive change.

The Charities Act 2006 effected some important changes on this topic; those changes are now contained in the Charities Act 2011. The principal purpose of this chapter is to consider the law relating to deciding which purposes will be charitable and which purposes will not be charitable. There is a huge case law on the question which purposes are or are not charitable. The up-shot of that case law was that there were three clear ‘heads’ (or, categories) of charitable purpose: the relief of poverty, the advancement of religion and the advancement of education. There was a fourth, catch-all category: ‘other purposes beneficial to the community’. If one could not demonstrate that one’s purpose fell within one or other of the first three heads of charity, then one attempted to argue that it fitted under this fourth, general head. Much of the case law related to the extent of this fourth category. One of the main effects of the Charities Act 2011 has been to extend the heads of charity into areas which the case law had previously refused to acknowledge as being charitable. Consequently, the structure of this chapter continues to reflect the discussion of the first three heads of charity at the outset (because the 2011 Act leaves them largely unaffected²); then we turn to consider in outline how the case law on the fourth head divided itself because the courts may yet decide to retain that category either as a means of interpreting the Act or regardless of the Act; and then finally to consider in turn each of the new heads of charity created originally by the 2006 Act, reflecting particularly on how some of these new heads of charity impact on the old case law. The old case law and the new statutory provisions necessarily interact with one another, as will emerge from the discussion to follow.

The remainder of the chapter then considers two issues: first, the new regulatory structure for the administration of charities by The Charity Commission and, secondly, the cy-près doctrine. The chapter ends with an analysis of the important ‘public benefit test’ in charities law.

25.1.3 Categories of charitable trust under the case law

The aim of this introduction is to give some explanation of the importance and context of charities law. However, it is difficult to understand modern charities law without some notion of its history. Divorced from its history, the structure of modern charities law would make little sense.

The roots of the law of charity

The roots of the law of charities are based in the historical division of the country into parishes in which the Church played an important role both in dealing with poverty and in providing education. The earliest schools (now known as the fee-paying ‘public’ schools), were originally operated by the churches to provide education for the children of people who were not wealthy enough to afford private tutors. An Act of 1530 also dealt with begging and outlawed “vagabondage”, while confirming the role of the parish in taking responsibility for its own poor people. Consequently, the three principal forms of charity were relief from poverty, the advancement of education and the advancement of religion: those three activities went hand-in-hand. Over time ‘other purposes beneficial to the community’ were added to this list.

The preamble to the Statute of Elizabeth 1601

In the development of the law controlling the giving of alms to the poor, the law dealing with the dispossessed was eventually crystallised into the 1601 Statute of Elizabeth.³ The aim of the 1601 statute appears to have been to reduce the obligations for the care of paupers which had been placed on parishes.

2 There are, however, some important, subtle changes introduced by the Charities Act 2011.

3 43 Eliz I, c 4, 1601, more commonly known as the Charitable Uses Act 1601.

The preamble to the 1601 statute set out a number of categories of activity which would be considered to be charitable, as follows:

The relief of aged, impotent and poor people, the maintenance of sick and maimed soldiers and mariners, schools of learning, free schools and schools in universities, the repair of bridges, ports, havens, causeways, churches, sea-banks and highways, the education and preferment of orphans, the relief, stock or maintenance for houses of correction, the marriage of poor maids, the supportation, aid and help of young tradesmen, handicraftsmen and persons decayed, the relief or redemption of prisoners or captives and the aid or ease of any poor inhabitants concerning payment of fifteens, setting out of soldiers and other taxes.

While this statute was repealed by the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act 1888, its spirit lived on in the common law and by virtue of s 38(4) of the Charities Act 1960. Despite confusion over the effect of the 1888 Act and the Charities Act 1960 (under neither of which was it entirely clear whether or not the Preamble to the 1601 statute was intended to have been repealed in toto), it is clear that the courts have incorporated the practice of allocating charitable status to purposes analogous to the Preamble of 1601 into common law. In *Scottish Burial Reform and Cremation Society v Glasgow City Council*⁴ the House of Lords accepted that the case law flowing from the preamble should be accepted as keeping ‘the law of charities moving as new social needs arise or old ones become obsolete or satisfied’.⁵ In that case a trust for the maintenance of a crematorium was found to have been a charitable purpose.

Therefore, it has been accepted that a purpose will be charitable if it can be shown to fall within the Preamble to the 1601 statute or where it ranks by analogy with one of the purposes set out in that preamble. So in *Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales v Attorney-General*⁶ the dissemination of law reports was found to be a purpose beneficial to the community. Typically, the court will refer to the case law as to the definition of a ‘charitable purpose’ rather than grappling expressly with the preamble itself. Therefore, the four categories of charity considered in this chapter are those followed by the courts, as considered immediately below.

The roots of the case law on charities

The starting point for much of the case law on the definition of a ‘charitable purpose’ is Pemsel’s Case.⁷ It was in that decision that Lord Macnaghten set out the four categories of charity which are recognised by the case law on charities today and which are preserved in the Charities Act 2011:

4 [1968] AC 138; Re Hummeltenberg [1923] 1 Ch 237 (training mediums). Cf Funnell v Stewart [1996] 1 WLR 288 (faith healing).

5 Ibid, 154, per Lord Wilberforce.

6 [1972] Ch 73, 88.

7 Commissioners for the Purposes of Income Tax v Pemsel [1891] AC 531.

- (1) the relief of poverty;
- (2) the advancement of education;
- (3) the advancement of religion; and
- (4) other purposes beneficial to the community.

The first three categories, with some oddities, form comparatively straightforward tests for whether or not a trust's purpose is a valid charitable purpose, whereas the fourth offers greater scope for interpretation. In short, before the Charities Act 2006, the lawyer was concerned to decide in the first place whether or not the trust purpose in question fell within one of the first three charitable purposes under the case law: if not, attention then turned to whether or not it could fall within the fourth, general head. In the next section we consider the effect of the Charities Act 2011 on these categories of charitable purpose.

25.1.4 The definition of 'charitable purposes' in the Charities Act 2011

The role of the Charities Act 2011

The Charities Act 2011 is primarily a consolidating statute which, for our purposes, transposes the new statutory scheme for charities in the Charities Act 2006 into the new legislation. The 2006 Act had marked a sea-change in the categories of charity because it created nine new categories of charity which had not been settled in the earlier case law. The intention was to broaden the type and number of charities in existence, not least so that the shrinking welfare state could be supplemented by charitable activity in areas of perceived social need. Some of the new charitable purposes – such as the emphasis on the environment – mark very new political priorities; whereas other new purposes – such as the acceptance of sport as a potentially charitable activity – resolve long-standing difficulties in the case law.

The meaning of 'charity' as disclosing a 'charitable purpose'

A 'charity' is defined in s 1 of the Charities Act 2011 as being 'an institution', which can be a trust or a company under English law, 'which is established for charitable purposes only' and 'falls to be subject to the control of the High Court in the exercise of its jurisdiction with respect to charities'.⁸ Thus, to know whether or not a trust purpose will constitute a charity we must establish whether or not that purpose can be defined as being a 'charitable purpose', as considered in the next section.

The definition of 'charitable purposes' in the Charities Act 2011

A 'charitable purpose' is one which fulfils two requirements, as set out in s 2(1) of the Act. First, it must fall within the list of purposes set out in s 3(1) of the 2011 Act, as considered in the remainder of this section; and, secondly, it must satisfy the 'public benefit' test, as is considered in the next section of this chapter. So the definition of 'charitable purposes' in the Charities Act 2011 is found in s 3(1) in the following manner. There are thirteen categories, of which the first three and the last one refer back to the pre-existing case law on the definition of a charitable purpose.

⁸ Charities Act 2011, s 1(1).

- (a) the prevention or relief of poverty;
- (b) the advancement of education;
- (c) the advancement of religion.

These first three categories are therefore very similar to the initial three case law categories of charitable purpose; whereas the following categories were new to charities law in 2006:

- (d) the advancement of health or the saving of lives;
- (e) the advancement of citizenship or community development;
- (f) the advancement of the arts, culture, heritage or science;
- (g) the advancement of amateur sport;
- (h) the advancement of human rights, conflict resolution or reconciliation or the promotion of religious or racial harmony or equality and diversity;
- (i) the advancement of environmental protection or improvement;
- (j) the relief of those in need by reason of youth, age, ill-health, disability, financial hardship or other disadvantage;
- (k) the advancement of animal welfare;
- (l) the promotion of the efficiency of the armed forces of the Crown, or of the efficiency of the police, fire and rescue services or ambulance services;
- (m) any other purposes within subs (4) [that is categories of charitable purpose which are already accepted under the case law on charities].

Each of these new categories of charitable purpose is considered in turn later in this chapter in section 25.6, after a discussion of the existing heads of charity set out in the first three categories in the statutory list. The importance of the new categories is that they either give validity to some purposes which the case law refused to recognise as being charitable, or that they bring novel purposes under the umbrella of charitable purposes as part of government policy. Among the purposes which are now included in the list of charitable activities which might otherwise have been excluded from being charitable by the old case law are purposes such as animal welfare, campaigning for human rights and environmental protection. The detail of these changes is considered later in the chapter. Before that we need to introduce some more of the essential features of charities law.

The reduced significance of the Preamble to the Statute of 1601

The Charities Act 2011 seeks to displace the importance of the Preamble to the 1601 Statute in defining the meaning of ‘charitable purposes’. Thus any references to the Preamble of the 1601 Act in any documents constituting a charitable trust or company are now to be read as references to the Charities Act 2011, so that it is the new Act which now governs the validity of charities.⁹ This objective was perhaps over-emphasised because the case law on ⁹ Ibid, s 1(2).

the meaning of ‘charitable purpose’, as considered in the remainder of this chapter, has developed regardless of the Preamble in most circumstances, with only older cases on the fourth head of charity being closely concerned with defining ‘charitable purpose’ by analogy with the contents of that Preamble.

The continued validity of charitable purposes accepted in the old case law

What is particularly important is that categories of charity which have been accepted in the old case law continue to be valid under the 2011 Act. Thus, it is provided in s 3(1)(m)(i) of the 2011 Act that any purposes which are ‘recognised as charitable purposes by virtue of section 5 (recreational and similar trusts, etc.) or under the old law’, are recognised as being charitable purposes under the 2011 Act. Thus, categories of charity under ‘the old law’ will still be valid charities even if they are not explicitly contained in the s 3(1) list. Similarly, any purposes which ‘may reasonably be regarded as analogous to, or within the spirit of’ any of the categories in paragraphs (a) to (l) will be charitable purposes, as will any types of trust which are ‘analogous to, or within the spirit of’ the old charities law. Therefore, in effect, other types of charitable purpose under the old case law will continue to be recognised as charitable purposes regardless of whether or not they appear explicitly in the list of charitable purposes in s 3(1) of the 2011 Act. Consequently, it is still important to consider those categories of charitable purpose which have been upheld by the pre-2011 case law precisely because the 2011 Act maintains their validity.

The statutory test of ‘public benefit’

As considered above, it is a pre-requisite of a trust purpose being held to be a charitable purpose that it is ‘for the public benefit’ under s 2(1)(b) of the 2011 Act. This statutory requirement of public benefit is expressly stated to be a public benefit as currently understood under the case law in the law of charities.¹⁰ So, it is important to consider what the case law has defined a ‘public benefit’ to be. You are referred to the detailed discussions later in this chapter of the concept of ‘public benefit’ in relation to the case law on educational purposes and on religious purposes. In the following section is a rough rule of thumb as to what will constitute a ‘public benefit’ and in the section after that it is suggested that the case law, however, did not require that charities for the relief of poverty need be for the public benefit and therefore it will remain a complex matter knowing what constitutes a public benefit in this context.

A rough rule of thumb as to ‘public benefit’ in the case law

The test for a public benefit is ordinarily understood negatively by considering what will not constitute a public benefit. So, in the House of Lords in *Oppenheim v Tobacco Securities Trust*¹¹ Lord Simonds held that there could not be a public benefit if there was a nexus (or, connection) between the people who established the charity and the people who were intended to benefit such that the people who stood to benefit could not be said to constitute ¹⁰ Ibid, s 3(3).

¹¹ [1951] AC 297.

a section of the public. In that case, where a company sought to establish a trust to pay for the school fees of the children of its employees, it was held that there was no public benefit because there was a nexus (or, connection) between the children who were to benefit and the company which was establishing the trust. The children of employees did not constitute a section of ‘the public’ and therefore there was no ‘public’ benefit. In relation to charities which are created for general purposes, it was suggested by Russell LJ in *ICLR v Attorney-General*¹² that where a trust purpose removes the need for statutory or governmental action by providing a service voluntarily, the organisation providing that service should be deemed to be acting for the public benefit and so to be acting charitably. However, there have been recent cases, particularly relating to the advancement of religion, which have suggested that if a purpose could possibly be interpreted so as to be for the public benefit, or even if it could not be so interpreted but nevertheless if the trustees would operate the trust so that there would be a public benefit in practice, then that purpose can be considered to be for the public benefit.¹³ These principles are considered in greater detail in the various discussions of ‘public benefit’ in relation to the case law heads of charity elsewhere in this chapter.

The requirement for a public benefit: distinguishing two lines of authority on the decided cases

The law of charities teems with case law: there are many hundreds of decisions relating to the validity of individual trusts as charitable purposes. Many of those cases are difficult to reconcile in the abstract because they are so dependent on their own facts. However, it is possible to identify some key themes in relation to judicial attitudes to charitable purposes. There is one very important division which can be made between cases which apply a technical ‘public benefit’ requirement and other cases which are satisfied if there is some genuine charitable intention on the settlor’s part. The purpose of this short section is to draw out one key area of debate. It is suggested, therefore, that there has been a general division in the courts’ attitudes to purportedly charitable trusts over the years into two conflicting approaches:

- (1) a requirement that the applicant only needs to show a genuine charitable intention for there to be a valid charitable purpose trust (see *Dingle v Turner*¹⁴ below), or
- (2) a requirement that the applicant demonstrate that there is no personal nexus between the settlor and the class of people to be benefited, but rather that there is a sufficiently public benefit from the trust’s purpose before it can be a valid charitable purpose (see *Re Compton*¹⁵ below).

This theme of conflict between these two approaches will be followed in the case law considered below. The main point is this. There is a significant difference between establishing, first, that there is something intrinsically charitable in the creation of a trust, compared with, second, a merely evidential question of demonstrating that there is a predominantly public ¹² [1972] Ch 73.

¹³ See, eg, Re Hetherington [1990] Ch 1.

¹⁴ [1972] AC 601.

¹⁵ [1945] Ch 123.

rather than a private benefit in the purposes of that particular trust. The former approach considers the intrinsic merits of the trust purpose which is proposed. Thus, even if only a small number of people will take a benefit from the trust, the court may still find that it is a valid charitable trust if the settlor's intentions are genuinely charitable. By contrast with such examples of a genuine charitable intention, there have been a number of cases in which settlors have sought to win the tax breaks which charitable trusts attract by pretending to create charitable trusts which are in truth intended only to benefit people who are closely linked to the settlor personally. It is because of this sort of abuse that the second approach was developed. The second approach therefore looks to see how the trustees are actually running the trust and whether or not they are achieving sufficiently public, charitable effects for a large number of people. Thus, defeating this sort of abuse of charitable status has prompted some courts to require the existence of a public benefit to demonstrate that the settlor is not simply trying to achieve tax breaks.

The Charities Act 2011 has extended the requirement of 'public benefit' to all forms of charity in the manner discussed below (in that there are now some questions as to exactly how it will apply to trusts for the relief and prevention of poverty). The cases which created the public benefit approach were more concerned with demonstrating that the settlor's intention is to benefit a sufficiently broad category of the public rather than to attract the tax benefits of charitable status to something which is in truth a trust intended to benefit a private class of beneficiaries. This is particularly true in relation to some of the educational charities considered below in which companies sought to acquire tax benefits for paying for the school fees of their employees' children.¹⁶ In those cases, the issue resolves itself to a question of whether or not the company can prove that a sufficiently large proportion of the public will benefit from the trust.

There is one further theme which is worthy of mention at this stage. The courts are eager to find a charitable trust valid wherever possible.¹⁷ I would suggest that this line of cases can be understood as fitting into the approach which seeks to validate genuine charitable purposes. This approach goes beyond any of the tendencies in the case law relating to private trusts to interpret such trusts so as to make them valid. Clearly this underscores the policy addressed at granting advantages to charities which are not available to other forms of institution, such as private trusts or trading companies. Therefore, in practice the courts have tended to try to validate genuine charitable purposes whenever they are convinced that the settlor's motives are genuinely charitable and not directed, for example, at the achievement of some undeserved relief from tax.

25.2 THE SPECIAL FEATURES OF CHARITIES

25.2.1 The trusts law advantages of charitable status

Are charities 'trusts' at all?

In the early law of charities, the admission of trust purposes to charitable status and the general, legal treatment of charities were the responsibility of individual parishes and ¹⁶ Oppenheim v Tobacco Securities Trust Co Ltd [1951] AC 297.

¹⁷ Re Hetherington [1990] Ch 1; Guild v IRC [1992] 2 AC 310.

therefore fell under the ecclesiastical courts' jurisdiction. Over time, the Courts of Chancery acquired responsibility for charities organised as trusts and thus the jurisprudence of charities and the jurisprudence of trusts have come to sit uneasily one beside the other.¹⁸

There are a number of interesting features of the charitable trust. Primarily, the trustee/beneficiary structure is somewhat more complicated in the case of a charitable (or public) trust than in a private trust. The triangle of settlor-trustee-beneficiary does not apply in the case of public trusts such as charities. There is necessarily a requirement of an intention to create a trust, requiring some person to act as settlor, and there are also trustees appointed to oversee the trust property and to promote the objectives of the trust. However, there is no nexus between trustee and beneficiary precisely because there are no individual beneficiaries. This is because the Attorney-General sues in place of beneficiaries to enforce the purposes of the charity against the trustees. While charities will seek to benefit individuals or groups of people, those people are not beneficiaries in the trusts law sense because they do not acquire proprietary rights in the property held on trust for the charitable purpose. Therefore, the powers of trustees are de facto more wide-ranging because they are not susceptible to the direct control of any beneficiary: only regulation by The Charity Commission and litigation brought by the Attorney-General in loco cestui qui trust (or, as though a beneficiary).

As will be clear from the discussion in this chapter, there is a requirement that a charitable trust take effect for the public benefit (with the exception of some cases to do with relief of poverty) and therefore there cannot be individual beneficiaries capable of enforcing the trust by definition. Indeed, it is this writer's view that charitable trusts are not properly trusts at all, but rather a form of quasi-public body in which the officers have fiduciary duties which are overseen by a regulatory structure made up of the Attorney-General and The Charity Commission.

Charitable companies

Charities can also be organised as companies. They need not be trusts. Strictly, the law on companies is outside the scope of this book. Whereas companies are ordinarily organised so that they have shareholders who own shares in the company, it is more usual for charitable companies to be organised as 'companies limited by guarantee' which do not have shareholders nor a share capital. This form of company limited by guarantee is thus closer to the American notion of a 'not-for-profit' company in relation to which the company limited by guarantee does not have to make profits so as to be able to pay dividends to its shareholders. Instead, its purposes are limited to the pursuit of its charitable goals. In Australia charities law was changed so that charities can only be organised as companies and not as trusts. The purpose behind this change was to limit the possibilities for fraud and mismanagement of charitable trusts. A company will be required to publish accounts annually and its internal structure will be more formalised than the looseness of structure which trusts law ordinarily permits. The downside to the refusal of charitable trusts is that it is comparatively easy for small communities or for people who have little money and little legal expertise to create socially useful charitable trusts; whereas the creation and operation of a charitable company involves a large amount of formality and complexity which in turn requires a large amount of professional expertise. This chapter, however, shall continue to consider only charitable trusts, and the general principles relating to charitable purposes which are applicable thereto.

18 Matthews, 1996.

Formalities

There are a number of advantages in applying charitable status to a trust. As seen in the preceding Part 2 Express trusts there are a number of formalities and issues of certainty to be satisfied before a trust will be valid. For the most part, charitable trusts are exempted from these pre-requisites. Some of the most obvious advantages of charitable status are the following.

First, the rules as to perpetuities do not apply to charitable trusts. The rules against inalienability and remoteness of vesting do not apply to charitable trusts, therefore endowment capital and income can be tied up indefinitely.¹⁹ Clearly, a charitable purpose would be expressed by a purpose such as ‘to accumulate capital to relieve poverty in the East End of London’. If that were an ordinary private trust, it would be potentially void as a purpose trust and also void on the ground that it would make the property inalienable. However, the aim of charities is to amass large amounts of money, know-how and property to achieve socially-desirable objectives. Therefore, it is important that ordinary principles of trusts law are not allowed to operate so that these charitable intentions are frustrated.

Consequently, trust objects are valid despite being for abstract purposes provided that those purposes are charitable purposes. As will emerge in this chapter, the term ‘charitable purpose’ has a very specific legal meaning beyond any vernacular definition. The explanation for the relaxation of this core rule of the law of trusts is that the trust will be overseen by the Attorney-General and/or The Charity Commission in any event. Similarly, there is no need to satisfy the certainty of objects rule so long as there is a general charitable intention. The cy-près doctrine, considered at the end of this chapter, governs the application of assets where the precise objects of any charitable trust are uncertain or impossible to ascertain.

There are also differences in the manner in which the trust is organised in that the trustees do not need to act unanimously, rather they need only act by majority. This relaxation of the rules for the administration of trusts, as considered in Part 3, again is aimed at facilitating the use of trusts for charitable purposes. There is a question, in any event, as to why it is that trusts are used as a structure for charitable purposes. Recent developments in Australia have seen the company be designated as the only possible means for carrying out a charitable purpose.²⁰ The aim of that reform is to restrict the use of charities and to ensure that proper accounts are filed, as required for all companies.

However, the focus on using the company as the only form of charitable body loses some of the informality which is possible where a charity is created on a cottage-industry basis. A trust can be created with comparative informality without the need for the complexity and expense of producing accounts, keeping detailed minutes of meetings, maintaining a share register, and so forth which are required by company law. One of the keynotes of the English law charity is that it can be created with great informality: the applicant need only declare a trust over property and then fill in the forms demonstrating charitable intention, trustee structure and so forth which are required by The Charity Commission before granting 19 Christ's Hospital v Grainger (1849) 1 Mac & G 460.

20 Bryan, 1999.

registration. This means that comparatively small sums of money and low levels of expertise will not prevent community groups from setting up local charities for the general, public benefit just as effectively as national charities managing millions of pounds and employing professional staff. This informality, it is suggested, is characteristic of the English law charity as a result of its roots in local parish care for the poor. Through the Victorian era much charitable activity was dependent on the (sometimes stern) philanthropy of men like Gradgrind in Dickens's Hard Times who gave of their time and their money in the betterment of their fellow men and women. Such altruism relied in large part on the ability of such people to create their own charities and to administer them with some level of informality.

25.2.2 The tax advantages of charitable status

Advantages to charities

The primary benefit of charitable status (beyond the altruistic benefits of being empowered to do good works) is freedom from most of the taxes paid by individuals and corporations. Charities are free from the income taxes paid by both individuals and trusts. They are similarly free from corporation tax paid by companies and unincorporated associations. In terms of chargeable gains resulting from the disposal of capital assets, whereas individuals, private trusts and corporations would pay capital gains tax in ordinary circumstances, charitable trusts are free from capital gains tax. Similarly, aside from central governmental taxes, charities are also free from council tax and other local taxes. However, charities are subject to value-added tax (VAT) which is chargeable on any person who supplies goods or services to other persons. In circumstances in which charities are providing such goods or services, there is no reason in principle why they should be free from such a tax.

The freedom from tax means, in terms, that other taxpayers are subsidising the charitable sector (through higher rates of tax than would otherwise be necessary) by freeing charities from liability to tax. The most tax-efficient structure for a charitable trust is frequently to organise itself as a charitable company, rather than as a trust, which will be liable for all the trustees' fiduciary duties and which would then covenant to pay all of its profits to the charity, thus attracting tax relief.

Advantages to third persons

It is not only charities who benefit from the removal of liability to tax from charities. Individuals who make deeds of covenant in favour of charities (under which they pay regular sums to charity) typically have the covenanted amount treated as part of the charity's income for tax purposes. Similarly, companies can have some of the tax they pay recouped by giving gifts to charity (see, for example, the discussion below on companies' educational charities). This ability which charities have to recover the tax paid by donors led to a spate of tax avoidance schemes in the 1960s and 1970s when the highest income tax rates in the UK remained above 60% for some time. Taxpayers falling into super-tax brackets would covenant money to charities. The charity would then be able to recover the tax paid by the taxpayer from the Inland Revenue. In many circumstances, the charity would then pay the tax deducted back to the taxpayer (typically offshore) as part of a complex tax avoidance arrangement.

Suppose the following situation in illustration of this scheme.

The charity would receive a donation (say, £40,000 after tax had been deducted) and recovered the tax paid by the taxpayer (£60,000 at a 60% tax rate) and then paid the recovered tax covertly to the taxpayer (£60,000). Consequently, the taxpayer earned more money through this route than through paying tax in the ordinary way. When some tax rates rose to 98% under super-tax, the taxpayer could (on £100,000 income) pay £2,000 to charity and have the charity recover £98,000 from Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs.

In the 1990s, developments in legislation and case law made these types of simple schemes impossible by ignoring any 'artificial steps' in such transactions.²¹ More recent case law on tax avoidance has removed the presumption against artificiality in favour of an approach which subjects each taxing statute to ordinary principles of statutory interpretation.²²

25.3 FACTORS WHICH MAY NEGATE A FINDING OF CHARITABLE STATUS: THE NEED FOR A CHARITABLE INTENTION, BUT NO POLITICAL PURPOSES

25.3.1 Sufficient intention to create a charitable trust

In general terms

The settlor must have had an exclusively charitable intention in creating her trust for it to be a valid charitable purpose. The courts have tended to disallow ostensibly charitable purposes if there has been some failure to disclose a purpose which is exclusively charitable. This chapter will consider the detail of each of the heads of charity. The structure of that analysis will be to examine each of those heads and then to consider those factors which will deprive an institution of charitable status, even if it is prima facie charitable. So, if a settlor has two purposes behind his trust, one charitable and the other not, then the trust may not be held to be a valid charity. By the same token, however, some courts will seek to validate a genuinely charitable purpose wherever they find one.²³ Evidently, as with all forms of trust, there is a requirement that there be sufficient intention to create a charitable trust on the part of the settlor before that trust will be deemed to be charitable. Thus, in Re Koeppler,²⁴ Slade LJ looked to the general charitable intention of a testator who had sought to leave money for the furtherance of a charitable project on which he worked. It was held that, even where a gift is expressed in vague terms, it would be interpreted as having been charitable. It is clear from the decided cases that the court will tend to find trusts with a genuine charitable intention valid wherever possible.²⁵ This theme is considered further in relation to the cy-près doctrine at the end of this chapter. At this stage it is sufficient to point out that the courts will give effect to a genuine charitable intention wherever they find one.

21 Ramsay v IRC [1982] AC 300, Furniss v Dawson [1984] 2 WLR 226.

22 Barclays Mercantile Business Finance Ltd v Mawson [2004] UKHL 51, [2005] 1 AC 684, [2005] 1 All ER 97.

23 Re Hetherington [1990] Ch 1.

24 [1984] 2 WLR 973.

25 Incorporated Council for Law Reporting v Attorney-General [1972] Ch 73; Guild v IRC [1992] 2 AC 310.

Need for exclusivity of charitable intention

It is important that the settlor's purpose be exclusively charitable. That means the settlor will not be able to confuse a charitable with a non-charitable purpose and hope to have the trust recognised as being charitable. The case law has taken a very strict approach to this question in many cases.²⁶ If the settlor were to declare that property be held on 'charitable or other purposes', then the trust would not be a valid charitable trust because that could potentially be applied by its trustees for a charitable purpose or alternatively for a non-charitable purpose.²⁷ The uncertainty introduced by the word 'or' is crucial. The rationale for disallowing such trusts from being charitable trusts is that it is possible for the trustees to apply the property either for charitable purposes or potentially for some other purpose which is not charitable. However, there have been cases in which the use of the disjunctive 'or' in these circumstances has been coupled with a purpose which the court has been able to accept as being almost charitable: such as 'charity, or any other public objects in the parish of Farringdon'²⁸ and '[charity] or some similar purpose in connection with it'²⁹ because in those circumstances the court was prepared to interpret that provision as meaning that the trustees were still required to use the trust property for purposes which were charitable, even if they may have some other features as well as their charitable nature.

Cases in which the settlor has provided that property be settled for a 'charitable and other purpose' have tended to receive a more generally benign construction where the court has been able to interpret the word 'and' as connoting an intention either that the trustees must administer the trust in a charitable manner even if some other, incidental purpose is also to be achieved, or that the other purpose must be also be charitable – or at least not detract from the underlying charitable purpose.³⁰ However, where that provision is interpreted to mean that the trust need have charitable purposes only as part of its core goals, then it will be invalid as a charitable trust: for example, 'benevolent, charitable and religious purposes' where charity was found to be only one of three purposes in which 'benevolent' does not mean 'charitable',³¹ and similar situations where purposes were grouped so as to make them appear to be in the alternative.³²

It is suggested that, in the wake of more benignant constructions like that in *Guild v IRC*³³ and *Re Hetherington*³⁴ in recent years, that the courts are less likely to invalidate trusts on the basis of lack of exclusivity of purpose than was the case in many of the preceding decisions. However, 26 Blair v Duncan [1902] AC 37 (charitable or public purposes); Chichester Diocesan Board of Finance v Simpson [1944] AC 341 (charitable or benevolent purposes); Re Coxen [1948] Ch 747 (quantification of separable charitable and non-charitable elements). Cf Re Best [1904] 2 Ch 354 ('charitable and benevolent'); Attorney-General v National Provincial and Union Bank of England [1924] AC 262 ('such patriotic purposes or objects and such charitable institution or institutions or charitable object or objects. . .'); Charitable Trusts (Validation) Act 1954.

27 Re Macduff [1896] 2 Ch 451; Blair v Duncan [1902] AC 37; Houston v Burns [1918] AC 337.

28 Re Bennett [1960] Ch 18.

29 Guild v IRC [1992] 2 AC 310.

30 Blair v Duncan [1902] AC 37, supra; Re Sutton (1885) 28 Ch D 464; Re Best [1904] 2 Ch 354.

31 Williams v Kershaw (1835) 5 Cl & F 111; also Morice v Bishop of Durham (1805) 10 Ves 522.

32 Re Eades [1920] 2 Ch 353; Attorney-General v National Provincial and Union Bank of England [1924] AC 262; Attorney-General for the Bahamas v Royal Trust Co [1986] 1 WLR 1001.

33 [1992] 2 AC 310.

34 [1990] Ch 1.

that does not mean that the courts will accept as charitable those trusts which are not exclusively charitable. Rather, they will be prepared to accept both that the underlying intention can be construed as being charitable and that the trustees will in practice apply the trust property so as to make it operate as a charitable trust: that is, by applying the property only for strictly ‘charitable’ purposes and not also for more generally ‘benevolent’ but non-charitable purposes.

In *Re Harding*³⁵ Lewison J applied this notion of validating charitable, testamentary gifts wherever possible in relation to a purpose which in itself was so broadly drafted that it could not have disclosed an exclusively charitable purpose. The bequest was to the effect that property was to be held ‘in trust for the black community of Hackney, Haringey, Islington and Tower Hamlets’. Lewison J held that this purpose should be interpreted so as to make it valid. However, it is suggested that that bequest was so broadly drafted that it did not disclose a charitable purpose but nor did it make clear what the trustees would or would not be permitted to do with the property. Remarkably, Lewison J held that to comply with s 34(1) of the Race Relations Act 1976 the specific ethnic limitation in the bequest should be treated as having been removed – so in the end, the bequest was simply ‘for the benefit of the people’ of four large London boroughs. Other than the notion that this is to be for the benefit of those people (more than a million in all probability), there is nothing either to tell us when the trustees have performed or not performed their duty, nor that this is necessarily a charitable use. As Lewison J put it, cryptically enough, in the final substantive sentence of his judgment ‘[t]he precise nature of the trusts can be dealt with by a scheme’³⁶ – in other words, the trustees will be required to generate a scheme for using the property which would satisfy The Charity Commission and/or the courts.

25.3.2 Political purposes

The theoretical outline

The notion of charity has been taken by English law to exclude any attempt to promote political purposes, even where the end-goal of such a political policy is aimed at the benefit of a community. Where a goal is avowedly political, the courts will not uphold it as a valid charitable purpose.³⁷ The stated reason for this principle is that it would be beyond the competence of the court to decide whether or not that purpose would be for the benefit of the community.

Furthermore, Lord Simonds in *National Anti-Vivisection Society*³⁸ cited with approval the argument that the court must assume the law to be correct and therefore could not uphold as charitable any purpose which promotes a change in the law. This jurisprudential approach does appear to be a little thin. Given that judges contentedly take it upon themselves to interpret, limit and extend statutes (as well as occasionally recommending the creation of new statutes to shore up the common law), it is peculiar to see judges so coy in the face of an argument being advanced that legislation might be changed.

Clearly, there will be factual circumstances in which a charitable purpose is advanced for political ends. For example, a charitable purpose to care for the elderly may also serve as a vehicle for pressuring central government into changing its policy on the treatment of elderly

35 [2008] 2 WLR 361.

36 Ibid, para [27].

37 National Anti-Vivisection Society v IRC [1940] AC 31.

38 Ibid.

people. It is common for charities to campaign for the advancement of their cause as a collateral object to the charitable purpose. As a general rule of thumb, the courts will consider activities as being political if they involve campaigning for a change in the law. However, there will necessarily be a large range of activities which fall short of such campaigning but which go beyond the pursuit of the charitable objective. So, for example, the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals (RSPCA) has as one of its many objectives the goal of a change in the law relating to testing on animals: this is something which is ordinarily a void political purpose (as is considered in the next section) but which does not call the charitable status of the RSPCA into question because it is merely one of its minor objectives.

The strict rule

The leading case of *National Anti-Vivisection Society v IRC*³⁹ before the House of Lords considered the question whether or not the society's political campaigning for the banning of vivisection⁴⁰ would prevent its purposes from being defined as being charitable. The type of political campaigning undertaken was to procure a change in the law so that vivisection would be banned outright. Lord Simonds considered the society's aims to be too political to qualify as a charity on the basis that an aim to change legislation is necessarily political. Consequently, the society was found not to be charitable and therefore not exempt from income tax. It is suggested that this approach creates a strict rule for charitable status. In applying the approach of Lord Simonds, it must be the case that to advance a change in the law as a core aim of the trust will be to take outwith the definition of charity necessarily.⁴¹

There is a theoretical problem as to whether or not the court could decide that the benefit of one side of a political argument (for example, banning vivisection) outweighs another. Suppose for example a trust with a purpose to advance the medical utility of experiments on animals in the search for a cure for cancer. By admitting the medical trust to charitable status the law is impliedly accepting that side of the political argument. Clearly, the argument in defence of the current position is that the law is outside politics. However, it is clear that the effect of the law is to favour some political points of view over others.

As with all trusts law issues, the question is to use the correct structure for the statement of aims. The RSPCA is registered as a charity, even though it works to stop vivisection in some contexts. The reason why it is upheld as being charitable despite its attempts to stop vivisection are that the anti-vivisection attitudes it holds are only a part of its activities. Similarly, in Bowman v Secular Society,⁴² Lord Normand held that a society whose predominant aim was not to change the law, could be charitable even though its campaign for a change to legislation was merely a subsidiary activity. It is a question of degree whether a society seeks to change the law as its main focus, or whether it espouses ends which incidentally require a change in the law. It is unclear where the law of charities draws that particular line.

39 Ibid.

40 'Vivisection' means animal experimentation.

41 Even though animal welfare is now one of the statutory heads of charity, as discussed below, if this society continued to campaign for a change in the law then that would mean that it would still be pursuing a non-charitable, political purpose.

42 [1917] AC 406.

Arguments for flexibility

If the approach in *National Anti-Vivisection Society v IRC*⁴³ were to be followed to its logical conclusion, it would mean that housing charities like Shelter would be able to research into improving housing conditions while helping the homeless, but that it would not be able to publish its results for fear that they would be recommending a change in the law. In McGovern v Attorney-General,⁴⁴ the human rights campaigning organisation Amnesty International was held not to be charitable, despite its good works, because it campaigned for changes in the laws of many nations. The court held that it was not for the court to decide whether or not the changes in the law which it sought would be in the public interest or not. However, the Charity Commissioners have suggested that an organisation may supply information to the government regarding changes in the law without forfeiting its charitable status. Without this flexibility being built into the law, many charities would not be able to disseminate the important information which only they are able to amass.

On the cases it is clear that a trust for the discussion of political ideas is not itself void under the rule in the National Anti-Vivisection case.⁴⁵ For example, it is not an invalid activity under the law of charities for a university students' union to discuss political matters⁴⁶ but it is not a charitable purpose to campaign on a political issue or to apply funds to an organisation formed to change the law or public policy. So in *Webb v O'Doherty*⁴⁷ a students' union wanted to pay funds to a national committee of students which sought to apply pressure to stop the conflict in the Persian Gulf in 1991 but the union was not able to uphold this purpose as a charitable purpose because it was found to be politically motivated. As Lewison J put it: 'there is a distinction between the purposes or objects of a charity and the means by which it promotes those purposes or objects'.⁴⁸ Thus, a court may consider the fact that an organisation does in fact pursue political objectives and so deny that organisation charitable status, or contrariwise look to the charitable means by which it promotes its objectives.

25.3.3 A note before we proceed

For the student of trusts law, charities can offer a comparatively welcome relief from the complexities of forming express private trusts, as considered in Part 2, and from implied trusts in Parts 4, 5 and 6, or the many equitable remedies in Part 9. The central question with reference to charities for our purposes is to decide in what circumstances a trust will be held to be charitable. In any charities problem, the subject matter should be divided clearly between the various different categories of charitable trust: trusts for relief of poverty, trust for educational purposes, trusts for religious purposes and trusts for other purposes beneficial to the community as listed in s 3(1) of the Charities Act 2011. Sections on charities in trusts law textbooks are capable of being extremely long, given the enormous variety of the case law. However, it is proposed in this chapter to concentrate on the leading cases in each

43 [1940] AC 31.

44 [1982] 2 WLR 222.

45 [1940] AC 31.

46 Attorney-General v Ross [1986] 1 WLR 252; Re Koepler's WT [1986] Ch 423.

47 (1991) The Times, 11 February.

48 Hanchett-Stamford v Attorney-General [2008] 4 All ER 323, para [17].

of the four categories and then tease out some of the inconsistencies among some of the other decisions. This may then prove to be a banker at exam time.

25.4 RELIEF AND PREVENTION OF POVERTY

Trusts for the relief of poverty must relieve the poverty of some person. 'Poverty' means something more than simply 'going short' but does not require absolute destitution. It is apparently unnecessary that a broad section of the community stand to benefit from the trust. Rather, trusts for the relief of poverty are presumed to have a generally altruistic motivation and are, therefore, enforceable as being charitable. There is no need for a 'public benefit' – a factor which has led to the anomalous trusts for the benefit of relatives which appear, prima facie, to be private trusts, although the Charities Act 2011 may call the validity of these trusts into question. Furthermore, the 2011 Act has introduced the new concept of 'the prevention of poverty' to that head of charity.

25.4.1 Introduction

The scope of the poverty category

The first category of charitable purpose under the case law is that of the relief of poverty. This is the clearest category of charitable purposes in many ways. Having considered the birth of the law on charities in terms of a development of the legislation dealing with the poor above, poverty is the most straightforward illustration of a charitable intention. The Charities Act 2011 has a slightly different concept of this category from that in the case law: the case law referred only to 'the relief of poverty', whereas s 3(1)(a) of the 2011 Act provides for 'the prevention or relief of poverty'. The effect of this slight change is considered below: in essence, preventing someone from going into poverty, as opposed simply to dealing with that poverty once it has happened, appears to be part of the law now.

In the discussion to follow, we shall consider the leading case on trusts for the relief of poverty which was decided before the Act came into force, on the basis that it is provided in s 4(3) of the Charities Act 2011 that any purposes which are 'recognised as charitable purposes under existing charity law', for example under the old case law, will continue to be recognised as charitable purposes. We will, however, need to consider some old cases known as the 'poor relatives' cases more carefully in the light of the 2011 Act.

The leading case: Dingle v Turner

The leading case in relation to the relief of poverty is the decision of the House of Lords in Dingle v Turner,⁴⁹ which forms the centrepiece of this section. Characteristic of the approach of the courts in this area is the 'purposive' decision of Lord Cross. Of further interest is the historical context of cases on the creation of trusts expressed to be for the relief of impoverished relatives, whether they should properly have been considered to be charitable given the nexus between settlor and beneficiary, and the suitability of such trusts in the modern context.

49 [1972] AC 601.

The trust in Dingle v Turner concerned a bequest of £10,000 to be applied ‘to pay pensions to poor employees of E Dingle & Company’. Those arguing that the bequest be held invalid sought to rely on Oppenheim v Tobacco Securities Trust,⁵⁰ and also Re Compton,⁵¹ which had held that a trust could not be charitable if ‘the benefits under it are confined to the descendants of a named individual or company’.⁵² It was contended, further, that the poor relations cases were simply an anomaly in the development of this core principle and that the Dingle trust could not be validated by analogy to those cases.⁵³

Lord Cross did not allow this appeal. He explained that the rule in Re Compton was not one of universal application in the law of charities, particularly in relation to trusts for the relief of poverty. His speech had two main points: first, that the Compton principle was intellectually unsound in itself and, second, that trusts for the relief of poverty required a different test from other forms of charitable trust which did not require a public benefit.

As to the first strand of his Lordship’s decision, the approach taken by Lord Cross was to say that the meaning of the term ‘public’ in the public benefit test was itself a difficult one. The expression which was frequently used in previous cases to contrast with the term ‘public’ was the term ‘a mere fluctuating body of private individuals’, by which the courts meant that if the people who would benefit from a trust purpose would be merely a fluctuating body of private individuals then they could not constitute a sufficiently large section of the public to constitute a charity. However, Lord Cross in Dingle v Turner pointed out that logically the public was itself just such a fluctuating body of private individuals: that is, the total population may be 60 million private individuals in the UK but it was still a fluctuating body of private individuals. Therefore, this was an insufficient rendering of the difference between the terms ‘private’ and ‘public’ class. Lord Cross explained that the residents of a particular London borough could be both a section of the public and a fluctuating body of private individuals. There would be no doubt that ‘all of the residents of the Royal London Borough of Kensington and Chelsea’ would constitute a valid section of the public for the purposes of the law of charity. Nevertheless, logically, the total number of inhabitants of Kensington and Chelsea would be a fluctuating body of private individuals: that is, some will be born and some will die, some will move into the area and some will move out of it (such that their identities will fluctuate), and each of those inhabitants is a private citizen, even though collectively they constitute a section of the public. Similarly, to talk of ‘the blind’ would be to define a section of the public, even though its members have a common characteristic which binds them together. That means the law of charities will accept that a trust for the benefit of the ‘blind in the UK’ will be a valid charitable purpose, although logically again this class constitutes a group of private individuals with a link between them and so, logically again, it ought to fail on a literal application of the Compton test. Therefore, Lord Cross sought to demonstrate that the Compton test was not logically appealing and so Lord Cross chose not to follow it in relation to trusts for the relief of poverty.

His Lordship then turned to the question of the validity of a trust for the benefit of employees of a company, and the argument that such a class would be a private class (and so arguably invalid under charities law) on the basis that the people who were to benefit from

50 [1951] AC 297.

51 [1945] Ch 123.

52 Oppenheim is a case relating to educational purpose trusts, considered below at para 27.3.3.

53 Considered below at para 27.3.

the trust were bound together by a common factor. It was held that, even when considering gifts to employees of a large company, it might be that a particular corporation would employ many thousands of people and therefore constitute a numerically larger class than were resident in a particular borough. It would be illogical to consider the former to be a void private class, whereas the latter would be a valid section of the public, when the former is a numerically larger class than the latter. For example, the Post Office employs hundreds of thousands of sorting staff and delivery staff in the UK and so a trust ‘for the benefit of employees of the Post Office’ would fail a literal application of the Compton test (because all of the people who would benefit worked for the same organisation) even though the class which could benefit would constitute a statistically significant proportion of the population. By contrast a trust for the benefit of the inhabitants of a small town would pass the literal application of the Compton test but oddly the people who stood to benefit from the trust would be numerically smaller than in the Post Office example. Lord Cross suggests that the Post Office trust could be valid, provided that the settlor’s intention was a genuinely charitable one. It is the settlor’s intention which is said to be vital in Dingle v Turner. In the words of Lord Cross:

Much must depend on the purpose of the trust. It may well be that, on the one hand, a trust to promote some purpose, prima facie charitable, will constitute a charity even though the class of potential beneficiaries might fairly be called a private class and that, on the other hand, a trust to promote another purpose, also prima facie charitable, will not constitute a charity even though the class of potential beneficiaries might seem to some people fairly describable as a section of the public.

It is suggested that the opening words of these dicta (with this author’s own italics) sum up the approach of the House of Lords in Dingle most accurately in this area. This encapsulates Lord Cross’s second line of argument. The court is prepared to adopt a purposive approach to charitable purposes genuinely concerned with the relief of poverty. To put it crudely, if you are genuinely acting with a charitable purpose in the relief of poverty, then your trust will be valid.

The point of distinction from the Compton and Oppenheim line of cases was said to be the fact that those cases involved trusts whose purpose was to acquire ‘an undeserved fiscal immunity’. In short, the court would be prepared to support a genuinely charitable motive, although in the absence of such a motive the court would refuse to find the trust charitable. It is suggested that charitable motives are more obviously demonstrated in relation to the relief of poverty (provided those receiving the benefits can be shown to be genuinely impoverished), unlike cases in which companies are seeking to acquire tax benefits for their directors and other employees by setting up educational trusts which benefit only the children of their own employees. Lord Cross described this as the ‘practical justification . . . if not the historical explanation’ for the distinction between trusts for the relief of poverty and other trusts.

It is possible to return to the earlier distinction between decisions based on finding an underlying charitable intention on the one hand, and seeking a sufficient public benefit on the other hand. Dingle v Turner is clearly demonstrative of the line of cases which are concerned with the identification of an underlying charitable motive for the trust. Lord Cross considered this to be more important than seeking to address a purely evidential question as to whether or not a sufficient section of the public will be benefited by the operation of the trust.

Having considered the leading case, it is worth exploring the requirements for a charitable trust for the relief of poverty. There are two core questions concerned with the relief of poverty: first, what is 'poverty', and second, what is 'relief'? These two questions will be considered in turn.

25.4.2 What is 'poverty'?

There is a perennial discussion between political scientists as to the meaning of the term 'poverty'. In forming public policy there is a temptation to set an absolute measurement of poverty, bound to income levels, health and housing requirements perhaps. Once an individual reaches that absolute measurement, that individual ceases to be poor. There are two principal problems with this approach. First, the setting of such levels would necessarily cause disagreement as to what constitutes a level of poverty. Second, there is the issue of general social enrichment which might render such standards obsolete over time, such that an income level for poverty set in the 1960s would now be meaningless as a result of inflation and the greater distribution of consumer goods amongst the whole population. (On this issue see generally the work of Townsend.⁵⁴)

The contrary argument is that there should not be absolute standards of poverty set because the question of impoverishment is something which should always be relative to standards of living at any period of time in any social context. However, the counter-argument is that it becomes impossible to eradicate poverty if the measurements are allowed to shift in this way.

On the cases, there are precious few clear statements on the meaning of 'poverty'. In Mary Clark Homes Trustees v Anderson,⁵⁵ Channell J held that poverty was a relative term which would consider someone to be poor if he is in 'genuinely straitened circumstances and unable to maintain a very modest standard of living for himself and the persons (if any) dependent upon him'.⁵⁶ Even this approach does not require destitution. Nor is there any sense of the length of time for which those who are to benefit from the trust are required to be in straitened circumstances: presumably that must last for more than one or two days. What is interesting about this approach is that it focuses on the poverty of individuals benefiting from the munificence of the charity and not on the framing of the charity's objects to apply solely to people in general terms as though that category must be sufficiently impoverished. This chimes in with the acceptance in *Dingle v Turner*⁵⁷ that the trust need not be demonstrated to be for the public benefit. Given the all-encompassing nature of the case law definitions, the meaning of poverty can be most clearly demonstrated by examples, as set out in the following sections.

Examples of poverty

The difficulty for the courts is then to establish a test for deciding in any case whether or not a particular trust is sufficiently directed at the relief of poverty. To be honest, there is no very 54 Townsend, 1979, and the work of the Child Poverty Action Group generally.

55 [1904] 2 KB 745.

56 Quotation taken from Tudor, 1995, 29; see also Re Clarke [1923] 2 Ch 407; Re De Carteret [1933] Ch 103; Shaw v Halifax Corp [1915] 2 KB 170; see also Cross (1956) 72 LQR 182.

57 [1972] AC 601.

clear definition of ‘poverty’ in the law of charities. The cases have taken the view that poverty does not necessitate proof of outright destitution, rather it can encompass which exceeds simply ‘going short’.⁵⁸ There are a number of examples of situations in which the courts have held cases of financial hardship, rather than grinding poverty, to be within the technical definition of ‘poverty’. For example, a trust for ‘ladies of limited means’ has been held to be charitable⁵⁹ together with the (gloriously expressed) trust for the benefit of ‘decayed actors’.⁶⁰ It is difficult to know exactly what a ‘decayed actor’ is, but I think it is a wonderful idea. In the 17th century this term ‘decayed’ had as one of its meanings ‘to have declined in prosperity’:⁶¹ so, again, it did not require that the person benefiting had become entirely destitute but rather simply that they were in greatly straitened circumstances. Significantly, that we cannot know exactly what a decayed person is, despite its inclusion in the 1601 Statute of Elizabeth (and assuming it is not meant literally as someone decomposing), does not stop the purpose from being a valid charitable purpose. It is an illustration of the type of vague trusts provision which courts are prepared to admit as valid in the context of charitable trusts for the relief of poverty whereas they would never satisfy the tests for conceptual certainty for express private trusts considered in Chapter 3 The creation of express trusts. Another example is a trust for the benefit of members of a club who have ‘fallen on evil days’, which would have been too vague an expression for ordinary private trusts purposes.⁶²

Poverty and the preamble

There was an argument raised as to notion of poverty in the preamble to the 1601 statute in the case of Joseph Rowntree v Attorney-General.⁶³ It was argued that the expression ‘aged, impotent and poor’ in the preamble to the 1601 Statute should be read so as to require the class forming the charitable purpose to be all three of those things, such that someone who was not (for example) aged would not fall within the test. It was held that the three terms should be considered disjunctively so that a beneficiary need only fit one of these descriptions.⁶⁴ Therefore, if the beneficiary is aged and impotent but not poor, then the trust will be held to be valid.⁶⁵ It has been held that a person aged 50 was ‘aged’ (although that was in a decision in 1889 when life expectancies were shorter).⁶⁶ After the enactment of the Charities Act 2006, the role of the 1601 Preamble will nevertheless be limited.

58 Re Coulthurst’s Will Trusts [1951] Ch 661, at 666 (more than ‘going short’); Re Cottam [1955] 3 All ER 704 (flats at ‘economic rents’); Joseph Rowntree Memorial Trust Housing Association Ltd v Attorney-General [1983] 1 All ER 288 (special housing for the elderly; ‘alleviation’ of poverty constitutes ‘relief’).

59 Re Gardom [1914] 1 Ch 662.

60 Spiller v Maude (1881) 32 Ch D 158.

61 See, for example, the definition of the word ‘decay’ in the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary, which contains this sense among numerous others.

62 Re Young [1951] Ch 344.

63 [1983] 1 All ER 288.

64 Re Resch’s Will Trusts [1967] 1 All ER 915.

65 Re Glyn’s WT (1950) 66 TLR 510; Re Bradbury; Re Robinson [1951] Ch 198; Re Cottam [1955] 3 All ER 704; and Re Lewis [1955] Ch 104.

66 Re Wall (1889) 42 Ch D 510.

Poverty and social class

There have been cases in which the largesse of the courts has been pushed to its limits. A number of charitable purposes have been expressed to be for the relief of the poverty of the 'working classes'. It was held in *Re Sanders' WT*⁶⁷ that the 'working class' do not constitute a section of the poor. It is necessary to define in some way those in poverty, as opposed to those who could be merely expressed to be working class. However, in *Re Niyazi's WT*⁶⁸ it was held that a gift for the construction of a working men's hostel in an area of extreme poverty in Cyprus created a valid charitable trust for the relief of poverty on the basis that the class of persons described could be considered, in all the circumstances, to be suitably impoverished.

The latter case of Niyazi illustrates the acceptance of the courts that there is a need, with reference to charitable trusts, to look to the manner in which the money is to be used in fact to determine whether or not there is sufficient charitable intention. This has tended to be the approach of the courts in situations in which it would be possible for both rich and poor people to benefit from a particular trust on the face of the trust. Therefore, in *Re Gwyon*⁶⁹ a trust for the provision of clothing for boys was held to be invalid on the basis that there was no necessary requirement that the boys in question be in poverty. Rather, the court accepted that the money would be applied de facto by the trustees for the benefit of poor boys only. This purposive approach has led to the validity of a number of charitable trusts for the relief of poverty which would otherwise have appeared to have been uncertain in their charitable intent.

25.4.3 What is meant by 'relief' and by 'prevention'?The relief of poverty

The term 'relief' is not intended to lead to resolution of the poverty experienced by those who receive the benefits of the trust. Rather, it is sufficient that there be some alleviation of the poverty as a result of the activities of the trust.⁷⁰ Therefore, a trust for the relief of poverty of millionaire food merchants by means of food parcels, would not be a valid charitable trust for the relief of poverty as there is no poverty which would actually be relieved by such a trust because the recipients are already millionaires. However, it would appear that a genuine charitable intention to relieve poverty by opening a soup kitchen which also occasionally provided food to people who were not impoverished would not be invalid, provided that the poverty of others who were impoverished was being relieved. So, it is said, it cannot be a trust for the relief of poverty if the soup kitchen provides millionaires with food because millionaires would not be in need of such soup to relieve any poverty. Whereas, a soup kitchen for the benefit of the genuinely impoverished will be a valid charity for the relief of poverty.⁷¹

67 [1954] Ch 265.

68 [1978] 1 WLR 910.

69 [1930] 1 Ch 255.

70 Joseph Rowntree Memorial Trust Housing Association Ltd v Attorney-General [1983] 1 All ER 288.

71 Biscoe v Jackson (1887) 35 Ch D 460.

The prevention of poverty

The Charities Act 2011, s 3(1)(a) adds the notion of the ‘prevention’ of poverty to this category. The principal effect of this change would be to remove the requirement that the people who are to be helped must already be in poverty. Thus it would be a valid charitable purpose if someone anticipated that a person was going to fall into poverty and so took some action by constituting a trust to prevent that state of affairs arising. This could clearly be open to abuse. Suppose two examples. First, if a trust was created to provide a hostel for young people in London who found themselves with no home then that would be preventing those people from falling into poverty by dint of giving them somewhere to live, especially so if the trust also helped them to find work or gave them enough money to afford food and clothing. Second, suppose that a trust was created for the benefits of the permanent inhabitants of Marlow in Buckinghamshire, one of the richest towns in the country, in case any of its permanent inhabitants should possibly fall into poverty. Suppose further that the settlor’s real objective was to achieve the tax benefits of charitable status so that all of the money which he gave to the charity received tax relief but was never paid out to any impoverished people and instead was used to pay for dinners for himself and his millionaire friends at the golf club. In this example, whereas the trust appears to be worded so as to prevent poverty, in fact it is not being so used. The difficulty with the notion of prevention is that it supposes action before poverty has necessarily arisen. However, it is suggested that Lord Cross’s test in Dingle v Turner remains the best one in this context because it will deny charitable status only to those trusts which do not disclose a genuine charitable intention: something which exists in the first of my examples but not the second.

25.4.4 Limits on the class of people taking a benefit

It is a peculiarity with reference to the rules for charitable trusts for the relief of poverty that the settlor can validly define a limited group of people who are entitled to benefit from the trust, and can even show a nexus the intended beneficiaries.

Is there a need for a public benefit?

It was held in *Dingle v Turner*⁷² that a trust for the relief of poverty does not have to be shown to be for the general public benefit, as long as it does go beyond the relief of the poverty of a single, individual beneficiary. Therefore, the applicant would be required to show that the trust was more than a private trust for the benefit of a fixed class of beneficiaries which merely sought to attract the fiscal advantages of charitable status. However, it is acceptable for the people who will actually benefit from the trust to be related, or otherwise linked, to the settlor (as considered immediately below). Thus in Dingle v Turner a trust for the relief of poverty of poor employees was upheld as a valid, charitable purpose, despite the link between the settlor and the intended class of beneficiaries as employer and employees.

Consequently, it has been held that a trust for the purpose of establishing a home for elderly Presbyterians was held to be a sufficiently broad public benefit, even though the category of people who could have benefited was limited.⁷³ In that case there was sheltered

72 [1972] AC 601.

73 Joseph Rowntree Memorial Trust Housing Association Ltd v Attorney-General [1983] 1 All ER 288.

accommodation provided by a company (Joseph Rowntree Memorial Housing Association Ltd) which both charged occupants for their accommodation and which made that accommodation available only to a limited number of people. It was held by Peter Gibson J that neither of these factors disqualified the purpose from qualifying as a charitable purpose. Just as in Re Neal,⁷⁴ Goff J had upheld a trust which charged occupants of an old persons' home as being charitable; similarly Buckley J in Re Payling's WT.⁷⁵ In such cases, where there is an intention to provide for 'succouring and supplying the needs of old persons because they were old persons' was sufficient to found a charitable intention to relieve poverty – provided also that these old persons were in need of the help that they were given. An organisation which had assumed responsibility for the maintenance and management of many properties from a local authority was held not to have exclusively charitable purposes because it conferred private benefits on individual tenants as part of its activities.⁷⁶

The Charities Act 2011 requires that any charitable purpose both be on the list of charitable purposes – as the prevention and relief of poverty is under s 3(1)(a) – and also be 'for the public benefit'. There is no exception, it seems, from the requirement of a public benefit for poverty trusts, even though the effect of Dingle v Turner was that there would not need to be a public benefit in trusts for the relief of poverty. Therefore, we must consider whether poverty trusts now do require a public benefit to be valid, or whether the old case law approach which did not require such a public benefit still lives on. We must consider the effect of s 4(3) of the 2011 Act which provides that the 'reference to the public benefit is a reference to the public benefit as that term is understood for purposes of the law relating to charities'. This provision should, it is suggested, be understood to mean that the requirement for a public benefit under the statute is to be interpreted in accordance with the understanding of the term public benefit as applied in the case law on charities before 2006 (when the statutory concept was first introduced). The understanding of the public benefit requirement before the Act came into force was that that public benefit requirement did not apply to poverty trusts. Thus, s 4(3) should be interpreted so as to mean that no public benefit is required in relation to a trust for the prevention or relief of poverty. To do otherwise would be to overrule a long line of cases, including Dingle v Turner, which have granted charitable status to trusts for comparatively small numbers of people provided that there was a genuine charitable intention to relieve poverty involved. The alternative reading would be to take this provision to mean that a public benefit test must apply to poverty trusts as well, and that that public benefit test should be the same as the public benefit test applied on the authorities in charities law generally. As considered below in relation to the 'poor relations cases', such as Re Scarisbrick,⁷⁷ there are some cases in which the link between the settlor and her own relatives does make the finding of a charitable purpose somewhat eccentric. Those cases can only be explained as demonstrating a genuine charitable intention to relieve the poverty of people for whom one is not morally bound to provide. Otherwise, I must confess to a personal preference for the Dingle v Turner formulation of the test for charitable status over the formulaic 'public benefit' test because it does ensure that genuine charitable intentions are not frustrated simply because the settlor is considered to be relieving too little poverty to constitute a benefit to the public at large.

74 (1966) 110 SJ 549.

75 [1969] 1 WLR 1595; cf Re Martin (1977) 121 SJ 828.

76 Helena Housing Ltd v Revenue and Customs Commissioners [2011] STC 1307, TCC.

77 [1951] Ch 622.

Charging for services

It is not an objection to its charitable status that a charity charges generally for the services which it provides⁷⁸ nor that it receives rent for accommodation provided.⁷⁹ Similarly, charities can trade in general terms without necessarily threatening their charitable status under trusts law principles.⁸⁰

This permission granted to charities to trade and to charge those who benefit from its services is in spite of the general statement by Rowlatt J that charity is to be provided by way of ‘bounty and not bargain’.⁸¹ However, that ideal was limited to its own facts in that case by Peter Gibson J in Joseph Rowntree where it concerned the obligation on a mutual society (that is, a society providing benefits for its own members on the basis of contract) which sought to acquire charitable status in circumstances in which it charged those same members for its services. It has even been held that the making of loans to poor people may be charitable purposes.⁸²

Links to the settlor – trusts for the benefit of poor relatives

Following on from the issue of the breadth of public benefit necessary to create a valid trust for the relief of poverty, is the question of the closeness of the links between settlor and the people who are to be benefited. For charitable purposes other than the relief of poverty, it is important that the class of purposes to be benefited must not be defined by reference to their proximity to the settlor. In terms of trusts for charitable purposes, it stands to reason that a settlor could not create a settlement ‘for the benefit of my two poor children’ and then claim that it is a charitable trust for the relief of poverty. Such a trust would clearly be an express private trust in relation to which the children were intended to be beneficiaries. It would stretch the credulity of the court to suppose that a parent could permit her children to live in poverty and then to be entitled to charitable tax breaks in supporting them. However, it has been held that to define a charitable purpose for the relief of poverty of the settlor’s poor relations would not affect its validity as a charitable bequest.⁸³ So in *Re Scarisbrick*⁸⁴ a testatrix provided that property be held on trust ‘for such relations of my said son and daughters as in the opinion of the survivor of my said son and daughters shall be in needy circumstances’. It was held by the Court of Appeal that this was a valid charitable trust for the relief of the poverty of such persons.⁸⁵ It is from this line of decisions that trusts for the benefit of poor relations have been upheld as being valid charitable trusts. This line of cases would be overruled if the public benefit test in s 2(1)(b) of the 2011 Act were interpreted as applying to trusts for the relief of 78 Re Cottam [1955] 1 WLR 1299; Re Resch’s WT [1967] 1 All ER 915; Abbey Malvern Wells v Ministry of Local Government and Planning [1951] Ch 728.

79 Re Estlin (1903) 72 LJ Ch 687; Joseph Rowntree Memorial Trust Housing Association Ltd v Attorney-General [1983] 1 All ER 288.

80 Incorporated Council for Law Reporting v Attorney-General [1972] Ch 73.

81 IRC v Society for the Relief of Widows and Orphans of Medical Men (1926) 11 TC 1.

82 Re Monk [1927] 2 Ch 197. The reader is referred to the essay on www.alastairhudson.com/trustslaw on Co-operatives, Friendly Societies and Trusts for a discussion of mutual societies.

83 Re Scarisbrick [1951] Ch 622.

84 Ibid.

85 Following Attorney-General v Price (1810) 17 Ves 371; Gibson v South American Stores [1950] Ch 177; Re Cohen [1973] 1 WLR 415; see also Re Segelman [1995] 3 All ER 676.

poverty because there is clearly a nexus between the settlor and the people who are intended to benefit from the trust. But for the poverty of the relations involved, such trusts would clearly be private express trusts. Notably, there can be no presumption that a purpose is for the public benefit, as expressed by s 4(2), which overrides s 4(3) (as set out in s 4(4)).

25.5 TRUSTS FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF EDUCATION

Trusts for the advancement of education require that there is some institution of education benefited or that the purpose of the trust is to generate research which will be published for the public benefit. Trusts for the pursuit of sport fall within the educational head of charity, provided that they are annexed to some institution of education. In many cases, educational charitable trusts have been used as sham devices for the provision of tax and other benefits to a private class of individuals. Consequently, the courts have developed a requirement that there be a sufficient public benefit which requires that there be no 'personal nexus' between the people who stand to benefit and the settlor of the trust.

25.5.1 Introduction

The discussion in this section considering the nature of charitable educational trusts falls into two halves. The first half will consider the decision in *IRC v McMullen*⁸⁶ (a decision of the House of Lords which offers the most accessible entry point to the concept of education) and other cases which define what is meant by the term 'education' in this context. The second half will consider the tax avoidance cases in which corporations sought to benefit their employees by using sham charities. These cases demonstrate the extent to which it is necessary to demonstrate some public benefit to be classified as a truly charitable trust.

25.5.2 What is 'education'

Education in general terms

The first issue is to decide what exactly is meant by the term 'education' in the context of the law of charities. Clearly trusts purposes involving schools and universities fell within the cases analogous to the preamble of the 1601 statute; however, the case law has developed a more sophisticated understanding of what constitutes an educational purpose, as considered below. The contexts in which there is greater confusion surround trusts set up for the study of more esoteric subjects, or even simply to advance an ideological position, which are not annexed to any accepted educational institution.

What is clear is that 'education' in the charitable sense is not limited to teaching activities in schools and universities. Rather, education can involve activities not in the classroom such as sport⁸⁷ or the establishment of a choir⁸⁸ or the payment of staff in educational establishments.⁸⁹ It will also involve the establishment of companies to provide education, subject

⁸⁶ [1981] AC 1.

⁸⁷ IRC v McMullen [1981] AC 1; London Hospital Medical College v IRC [1976] 1 WLR 613 (sport in universities).

⁸⁸ Royal Choral Society v IRC [1943] 2 All ER 101.

⁸⁹ Case of Christ's College, Cambridge (1757) 1 Wm Bl 90.

to the proviso that they must not seek to make a profit (of the sort which would be distributed among shareholders like a trading company).⁹⁰

Research, as considered below, will also be a valid educational purpose in many circumstances⁹¹ as will the educational advancement of the works of a renowned classical composer.⁹² Gifts to established museums will also be charitable as being educational purposes.⁹³ Gifts to other sorts of institutions might not be charitable. In *Re Holburne*⁹⁴ an art museum had been founded and it was held to be of public benefit for the purpose of education. By contradistinction, merely keeping intact a collection of eclectic objets d'art (some described in evidence as being 'atrociously bad') for the benefit of the National Trust was held not to have been charitable because it was considered to be impossible for the court to establish any merit in the objects nor any public utility in the gift.⁹⁵

Provided that there is a genuine charitable intention evident in the words, the courts will be prepared to validate such a trust wherever possible.⁹⁶ The main caveats are that there must be sufficient public utility and sufficient public benefit (which terms might be synonymous, depending on the context) in the purpose.

The reason why the allocation of charitable status to these purposes is important is that it frees them from liability to pay tax on their ordinary activities. A number of the key areas of controversy are considered in the sections which follow.

Research, teaching and ideology

One leading case in this context is that of *Re Hopkins*⁹⁷ under which a bequest had been made to the Francis Bacon Society. The aim of the society was to prove that Bacon was in fact the author of the works generally attributed to William Shakespeare. The court held that this purpose was educational because it was 'of the highest value to history and to literature'. The contention had been made in favour of the purpose being found to be charitable that the Society would tend to publish its work. Consequently, the court held that the fact that the research would be made public would lean towards finding of charitable status, thus illustrating the requirement that there be some public benefit resulting from the gift.

A case reaching a different conclusion was that of Re Shaw.⁹⁸ The trust at issue in that case concerned a bequest made by the great socialist playwright and man of letters George Bernard Shaw. Shaw had left money to be applied towards research to create a new alphabet. Ultimately, it was hoped that this research would have led to the creation of a new common language, in line with Shaw's humanist philosophy, so that his works could be comprehensible to all nations no matter what their mother tongue and so that peace might be founded 90 Abbey Malvern Wells Ltd v Ministry of Local Government and Planning [1951] Ch 728; Re Girl's Public Day School Trust [1951] Ch 400.

91 McGovern v Attorney-General [1982] Ch 321.

92 Re Delius [1957] Ch 299.

93 British Museum Trustees v White (1826) 2 Sm & St 594.

94 (1885) 53 LT 212; (1885) 1 TLR 517.

95 Re Pinion [1965] Ch 85; following Re Hummeltenberg [1923] 1 Ch 237. Cf Funnell v Stewart [1996] 1 WLR 288.

96 Re Koeppler's WT [1986] Ch 423.

97 [1965] Ch 699; Shapiro, 2010 which presents the case that Shakespeare wrote his own work, albeit occasionally in collaboration with others, very cogently.

98 [1958] 1 All ER 245, confirming [1957] 1 WLR 729. See also Re Shaw's WT [1952] Ch 163.

through this common language. It was held by Harman J (never the most liberal of judges) that this purpose was not a charitable purpose because it involved propaganda.

The two cases of Shaw and Hopkins deserve a little comparison. In Hopkins it was held that there could be a valid, charitable purpose based on an ideological commitment to the idea that the son of a Midlands glove-maker could not have written Hamlet, King Lear, or the rest of the staples of the English literary canon. Instead, the Francis Bacon Society seem to take the view that it must have been the university-educated Bacon who produced such works of genius. On the other hand, a determination that war and conflict could be reduced if different nations spoke a common language (made possible by the development of a new alphabet) was held not to be a charitable purpose. The latter purpose clearly has, at its root, a commitment to the public benefit. (What could be more beneficial to the public than the prevention of war?) Therefore, it is not that element which explains the difference between the decisions. Rather, it is a murkier thread in the case law that there are certain activities which judges are prepared to accept are beneficial to the public in the manner which the judiciary chooses to interpret that term.

The decision in Hopkins, delivered by Wilberforce J, considered Shaw and sought to expand the definition of 'education' used by Harman J to extend beyond a necessity that there be teaching. Rather, it would be sufficient that research be carried out either for the benefit of the researcher or with the intention that it be published. Provided that there was some element of publication, and thereby public benefit, that would qualify as a charitable purpose.

Slade J set out the principles on which a court would typically find that research work would be held charitable in McGovern v Attorney-General:⁹⁹

(1) A trust for research will ordinarily qualify as a charitable trust if, but only if, (a) the subject matter of the proposed research is a useful subject of study; and (b) it is contemplated that knowledge acquired as a result of the research will be disseminated to others; and (c) the trust is for the benefit of the public, or a sufficiently important section of the public. (2) In the absence of a contrary context, however, the court will be readily inclined to construe a trust for research as importing subsequent dissemination of the results thereof. (3) Furthermore, if a trust for research is to constitute a valid trust for the advancement of education, it is not necessary either (a) that a teacher/pupil relationship should be in contemplation, or (b) that the persons to benefit from the knowledge to be acquired should be persons who are already in the course of receiving 'education' in the conventional sense.

Therefore, the term 'education' will encompass research carried out outside schools or universities, provided that there is an intention to publish that research or to make its benefits available to the public. Beyond academic research, the courts have also been prepared to find that the practice of high quality craftsmanship will also be of educational value to the public in charitable terms.¹⁰⁰

99 [1982] Ch 321: see also that judge in Re Besterman's Will Trusts (1980) The Times, 21 January.

100 Commissioners of Inland Revenue v White (1980) 55 TC 651.

Sport and education

In the leading case of IRC v McMullen,¹⁰¹ the House of Lords considered the charitable status of a trust created to promote the playing of Association Football and the playing and coaching of other sports, provided that it is done within schools or other educational establishments. The contention was made that the playing of sport ought properly to be considered a part of education, in the same way that sitting in a classroom is generally supposed to be educational. The leading speech was delivered by Lord Hailsham, who held that this purpose was indeed educational because sport was essential to the development of young persons.

However, sporting purposes will not, in themselves, be charitable. A trust to provide a cup for a yachting competition was not held to be charitable¹⁰² and the same was held in relation to a cricket competition.¹⁰³ It does appear that the link to formal education is a necessary one, in the terms that Lord Hailsham described in McMullen, as was decided in *Re Mariette*¹⁰⁴ a case in which a trust for the conduct of sport in a school was found to have been charitable. Trusts in relation to the conduct of sports and cultural activities at university have also been held to be charitable purposes.¹⁰⁵ (In this writer's opinion, all this supposes that drinking while wearing a rugby shirt counts as either a sport or culture.)

Where to draw the line at the extent of charitable purposes in this area is a difficult issue. In *Re Dupree's Deed Trusts*¹⁰⁶ Vaisey J was uneasy about the limits on this charitable educational purpose. When validating a trust to provide funds for an annual chess tournament for young men under the age of 21, his Lordship sensed that:

one is on rather a slippery slope. If chess, why not draughts? If draughts, why not bezique, and so on, through to bridge and whist, and by another route, to stamp collecting and the acquisition of birds' eggs? Those pursuits will have to be dealt with if and when they come up for consideration.

Therefore, there will come practical limits on the types of pursuits which will be genuinely charitable – although the cases will not give us hard-and-fast principles on which to make such decision in advance.

Business and charity

Many charities carry on trading activities to support their underlying charitable purposes. As considered above, it is not an objection to its charitable status that a charity charges generally for the services which it provides¹⁰⁷ nor that it receives rent for accommodation provided.¹⁰⁸

101 [1981] AC 1.

102 Re Nottage (1985) 2 Ch D 649.

103 Re Patten [1929] 2 Ch 276.

104 [1915] 2 Ch 284.

105 London Hospital Medical College v IRC [1976] 2 All ER 113; Attorney-General v Ross [1985] 3 All ER 334.

106 [1945] Ch 16, 20.

107 Re Cottam [1955] 1 WLR 1299; Re Resch's WT [1967] 1 All ER 915; Abbey Malvern Wells v Ministry of Local Government and Planning [1951] Ch 728.

108 Re Estlin (1903) 72 LJ Ch 687; Joseph Rowntree Memorial Trust Housing Association Ltd v Attorney-General [1983] 1 All ER 288.

By the same token, charities can trade without the carrying on of the trade itself calling their charitable status into question under trusts law principles.¹⁰⁹

Therefore, the fact that a purpose involves trading with the public will not preclude the organisation involved from being a charity. In this way in Incorporated Council for Law Reporting v Attorney-General,¹¹⁰ the ICLR had been permitted registration as a charity. It was held that, because the law reports are essential for the study of law, they must be considered to be educational and also valid as a purpose beneficial to the community under the fourth head of charity. Therefore, the publication of law reports and all other attendant activities fall within the head of education in relation to their research function and their contribution to education ordinarily so-called in universities.¹¹¹

An important note for students of law

As a service to law teachers around the world I will also tarry briefly over the following words of Buckley LJ in ICLR v Attorney-General as to the importance of reading cases:

In a legal system such as ours, in which judges' decisions are governed by precedents, reported decisions are the means by which legal principles (other than those laid down by statutes) are developed, established and made known, and by which the application of those legal principles to particular kinds of facts are illustrated and explained. Reported decisions may be said to be the tissue of the body of our non-statutory law . . . In a system of law such as we have in this country this scholarship can only be acquired and maintained by a continual study of case law. [Emphasis added]

It is perhaps ironic that in a textbook such as this I belabour the importance of reading cases. What this book aims to do is to give you, dear reader, a flavour of the many impulses behind those decisions and their practical effects on the world in which we live. But there is no substitute for going out and reading that material for yourself and for living that life for yourself. In the words of Dickens in David Copperfield, this book seeks only to be 'guide, philosopher and friend' – it cannot be a replacement for your own reading, thought and effort.

25.5.3 The 'public benefit' requirement

In this chapter we have already considered trusts for the relief of poverty. In that context it was found unnecessary to demonstrate a public benefit to qualify as a charity. The rationale given in the old case law was that giving property for the relief of poverty will typically constitute a charitable purpose in and of itself. That discussion was contrasted with tax avoidance cases in which corporations have sought to gain tax advantages for themselves and their employees by creating trusts which had the form of charitable purposes but which were in substance private trusts for the benefit of employees and their families. In consequence, it has become important in the context of educational trusts to look beyond the apparent purpose of the trust to require some evidence that the trust is intended to be run as a de facto charity. Therefore, the requirement of sufficient public benefit has emerged. All charities must be for the public benefit.¹¹² The requirement for a public benefit was always a part of charities law relating to the advancement of education. It is provided in s 4(3) of the Charities Act 2011 that any purposes which are ‘recognised as charitable purposes under existing charity law’, for example under the old case law, will continue to be recognised as charitable purposes. Consequently it is supposed that the old case law will continue in effect for the application of the public benefit test to purposes for the advancement of education.

109 Incorporated Council for Law Reporting v Attorney-General [1972] Ch 73.

110 [1972] Ch 73.

111 See also on similar points Beaumont v Oliviera (1864) 4 Ch App 309; Re Lopes [1931] 2 Ch 130; Royal College of Surgeons v National Provincial Bank [1952] AC 631; Re British School of Egyptian Archaeology [1954] 1 All ER 887; provided that the objects are exclusively charitable: Royal College of Nursing v St Marylebone Corporation [1959] 3 All ER 663.

The problem

Suppose the following facts. MegaCorp Plc, employers of 200,000 people in the UK, decide to set up a trust which has only one purpose – ‘to provide educational opportunities for young people in the UK’, giving the trustees unfettered discretion to receive applications for grants and to apply the money as they see fit. On its face, that purpose looks straightforwardly charitable. However, suppose that all of the money is distributed only to defray the school fees of children of the board of directors. In that situation, the trust would be one run simply as a private trust. Therefore, it would fall to be taxed as an ordinary trust would. Alternatively, if the money was paid out over a ten-year period to children who had no family connection with the company, the trust would be a charitable trust. It depends on whether or not the trust is run for the public benefit.

The difficulty would come if money was given out for the benefit of children of the 200,000 ordinary employees (otherwise than on the basis of their poverty). One argument might be that such children formed a sufficiently large section of the public to enable the trust to be considered to be a charitable one.¹¹³ Alternatively, it could be said that the trust remains a private trust de facto because money is only applied to those with a nexus to the settlor.¹¹⁴ The trustees may, for form’s sake, pay 10% of the available money to children entirely outside any nexus to the company. In such a situation, the argument would still appear to be that the trust is predominantly a private trust.¹¹⁵ The question would then be: what if the trustees paid 50% to those outwith any nexus with the company, and 50% to those who were the children of employees? These issues are considered in the sections to follow.

The ‘personal nexus’ test

The leading case is that of *Oppenheim v Tobacco Securities Trust*¹¹⁶ in which the House of Lords considered a trust which held money from which the income was to be applied for the education of the children of employees of British-American Tobacco Co Ltd. That company

112 Charities Act 2006, s 2(1)(b).

113 Cf Dingle v Turner [1972] AC 601.

114 Oppenheim v Tobacco Securities Trust Co Ltd [1951] AC 297.

115 IRC v EGA [1967] Ch 123 below; Re Koettgen [1954] Ch 252 below.

116 [1951] AC 297.

was a very large multi-national company employing a large number of people. The trust would have been void as a private trust on the basis that it lacked a perpetuities provision. It was argued, however, that the purpose was charitable and therefore that no perpetuities provision was necessary. Lord Simonds followed *Re Compton*¹¹⁷ in holding that there was a requirement of public benefit to qualify as an educational charity.

The phrase that was used by the court to encapsulate the test was whether or not those who stood to benefit from the trust constituted a sufficient 'section of the community'. Lord Simonds held that:

A group of persons may be numerous, but, if the nexus between them is their personal relationship to a single propositus or to several propositi, they are neither the community nor a section of the community for charitable purposes.

Therefore, it was held that the trust at issue could not be a charitable trust because of the nexus between those who stood to benefit from the trust and the propositus (the company) which was settlor of that trust.

The in-between cases

The heading for this section (the 'in-between cases') is not intended to suggest that there are cases which seek to apply different tests. Rather, there are cases which indicate that the court, and HM Revenue and Customs, will take flexible approaches to charitable trusts in some cases. For example, the court in *IRC v Educational Grants Association*¹¹⁸ supported the core principle that where a trust is for the benefit of private persons it cannot be a charitable trust. In that case, however, there was a trust created with the apparently charitable purpose of holding property on trust 'for the education of the children of the UK'. In fact the trust was actually operated predominantly by the trustees to provide funds for the education of children of employees of the company Metal Box. This application for the employees of the company and their children accounted for 80% of the trust fund. The remaining 20% was applied for ostensibly charitable purposes. It was held that there could be no permissible exemption from tax on the grounds of charitable status on these facts because the trust was being run as a de facto private trust.

The older case of Re Koettgen,¹¹⁹ a decision of Upjohn J, upheld a trust as charitable where the assets were applied 75% as a private trust and only 25% for the public benefit. This decision was rationalised in IRC v EGA as being properly considered as a trust for a public class, with a direction to the trustees to give preference to a private class who fell within the definition of that public class. Thus in Koettgen the trustees were required by the terms of the trust to give money to the public, but also directed to prefer that part of the public which also had a nexus with the settlor. Clearly, therefore, this was a de facto private trust which was masquerading as an entirely charitable trust for the public benefit. Consequently, in practice here, charitable tax relief was allowed only to the extent that the trustees could demonstrate that the property had in fact been applied for the public benefit; that is only for 25% of the fund.

117 [1945] Ch 123.

118 [1967] Ch 123.

119 [1954] Ch 252.

The status of independent schools as charities

One perennial problem in the law of charities has, for decades, been the status of independent, fee-paying schools (of which the best-known examples are referred to, for historical reasons,¹²⁰ as ‘public schools’) as charities. Such schools charge high fees for pupils to attend, they are consequently apparently available only to a narrow range of people who can afford those fees, and yet they are treated as charities (with all the attendant tax benefits attached to that status) in spite of the absence of any meaningful public benefit in their activities. The tax benefits which these schools receive mean that the fees which they charge are lower than they otherwise would be, and are vital to the solvency of many of them.¹²¹ As a result of the Charities Act 2006 these schools have put on a show of specious activities intended to demonstrate a public benefit, such as providing bursaries to some students (whether competitive scholarships, which would not in themselves suggest a charitable purpose because they are not based on relieving any need, or scholarships based solely on need, which would suggest a charitable purpose because they are based on relieving poverty or similar need), or allowing pupils from state schools to attend some classes or to use some facilities at the independent school.

In *Independent Schools Council v Charity Commission*¹²² the Upper Tribunal considered whether or not such independent schools were charities concerned with the advancement of education in the public benefit. In so doing, they took it as read that the law (including the authorities on the public benefit test) before the 2006 Act had been passed remained good law, as set out in that Act. It was held that a public benefit was required to be something which was both of benefit to the community and directed at a sufficiently large section of the community.¹²³ That a purpose was educational did not necessarily mean that it was of benefit to the community nor that it was directed at a sufficiently large section of it. So, in deciding whether or not a sufficient section of the community was benefiting, the Commission would have to consider the number of people who would be able to pay the fees charged by that school and then consider whether or not that suggested a charitable purpose. The core issue for the Upper Tribunal which heard this case was whether or not independent schools provided a benefit which was directed at a sufficiently wide section of the community so as to constitute a ‘public benefit’. It was considered that schools which charged fees for pupils to attend them could not be charities because they excluded poor people and their children 120 Before there was a school system in the UK, when the children of the nobility had private tutors, there were schools created nominally for ‘the public’ which over time became fee-paying private schools, although the counter-intuitive name ‘public school’ stuck with them.

121 Their critics suggest that if their charitable status was abolished and their fees increased as a result then that would mean the children of middle-class families moving into the state school system with a concomitant benefit to that state system of intelligent children and highly motivated parents. It would also have the political effect of creating greater equality in education and provide a rise in standards and resources for the state school system. Moreover, the taxes of people who cannot afford private school fees would no longer be used to subsidise the tax breaks enjoyed by public schools and the concomitant lowering of their fees for rich parents.

122 [2012] 2 WLR 100, [2012] 1 All ER 127, [2011] UKTT 421 (TCC).

123 Jones v Williams (1767) Amb 651, Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs v Pemsel [1891–4] All ER Rep 28, Re Hummeltenberg, Beatty v London Spiritualistic Alliance Ltd [1923] All ER Rep 49, Gilmour v Coats [1949] 1 All ER 848, Williams’ Trustees v IRC [1947] 1 All ER 513 and Oppenheim v Tobacco Securities Trust Co Ltd [1951] All ER 31.

from their educational services.¹²⁴ It was considered not to be essential that an educational charity must help the poor; but it was held that an organisation which excluded the poor could not be charitable. Moreover, a mere token provision of some services to some poor people would not make an organisation into a charitable organisation: the provision of services would need to be to an appreciable section of the public which did not exclude the poor. By contrast, a school which admitted students no matter what their ability to pay the fees (whether by making bursaries available to the families of pupils who required them or otherwise) could be a charity because it was available to the community in general. It would be permissible to take into account other benefits provided by the school; although the principal focus must be on the accessibility of the school to the public, and the provision of scholarships and so forth to enable people whose children could not afford the fees to attend.

Interestingly, the tribunal considered that any school established as a charity before the Charities Act 2006 would be taken to have been established for the public benefit. This point cannot be correct. It is possible that the assessment of its provision of a public benefit was incorrect, or that its operation of its activities after its registration as a charity did not comply with its public benefit obligations, or that the understanding of the meaning of ‘public benefit’ in the case law would develop so that the school no longer fell within that categorisation, or that the requirement of public benefit was considered to apply to independent schools literally for the first time with the establishment of a new regulator of charities, or that a charity could have its charitable status withdrawn.

The real objection to fee-paying schools being considered to be charities is that they are elitist and that their elitism is funded in large part by tax breaks. The level of fees at fee-paying schools which are charities are kept lower than is necessary to operate those schools because the schools have the benefit of the tax breaks which are available to charities. Therefore, taxes paid by people who cannot afford those fees (i.e. most of the adult population) are used to defray the taxes which should be charged on those schools’ incomes and other activities. Studies have found the entirely unsurprising fact that pupils from fee-paying schools are likely to find high-paying work more easily than pupils from other schools, and therefore the continued affluence of that social group is perpetuated by indirect assistance from the state in the form of tax breaks.

Concluding themes

Returning to the themes identified at the beginning of this chapter, it is clear that the approach taken by the authorities in the educational trusts cases is one of requiring the person contending that the trust is charitable to prove that the trust will operate for the benefit of the public. Therefore, the onus is, in reality, to disprove the existence of a personal nexus (such as ties of blood, or an employment contract) between the settlor and those who stand to benefit from the trust. This approach contrasts with that of the House of Lords in *Dingle v Turner*¹²⁵ where the court focused on seeking out a truly charitable intention, rather than 124 Jones v Williams (1767) Amb 651, Re Macduff, Macduff v Macduff [1895–9] All ER Rep 154 applied; Taylor v Taylor (1910) 10 CLR 218 and Le Cras v Perpetual Trustee Co Ltd, Far West Children’s Health Scheme v Perpetual Trustee Co Ltd [1967] 3 All ER 915 adopted.

125 [1972] AC 601.

proving or disproving any relationship between the parties. It is suggested that the context of tax avoidance is the distorting factor here. Generally, in genuinely seeking to relieve poverty, there is not such a problem of motive; by contrast the provision of free education would have been capable of being provided as a tax-free perk if the courts had not acted as they did.

The principle to be taken away from *Oppenheim v Tobacco Securities*¹²⁶ is that a trust will not be accorded charitable status where the purpose fails the ‘personal nexus’ test. The purpose of the trust must be to benefit a ‘section of the community’. Therefore, where there is a personal nexus between those who stand to benefit from the trust (for example, where they are employed by the same company) and the settlor, those ‘beneficiaries’ cannot constitute a requisite ‘section of the community’. By way of contrast with Dingle v Turner, where the court did not follow the personal nexus test, one should look to the substance of the trust and evaluate its effects (although this comment is possibly obiter). In Oppenheim, however, a majority of the House of Lords said that fiscal matters should not be taken into account as a determining factor in deciding whether or not a purpose is charitable.

The question then is as to the applicability of the Oppenheim decision across the law of charities. Lord Cross held in Dingle that no distinction ought to be drawn between different types of trusts for the relief of poverty. Deciding on whether or not a group forms a section of the public is a matter of degree in which ‘much must depend upon the purpose of the trust’. Whereas the issues in Oppenheim were decided very much on the basis that the trust would attract an undeserved fiscal advantage if it were found to be charitable.

25.6 TRUSTS FOR RELIGIOUS PURPOSES

Trusts for the advancement of religion are required to have a sufficient public benefit, such that the works done and the prayers said by a cloistered order of nuns (for example), though religious, would not be charitable in legal terms. Religion in the case law is concerned with ‘man’s relations with God’ and, therefore, excludes many modern New Age religions and cults. The Charities Act 2011 has changed this position. The definition of ‘religion’ for the purposes of allocating charitable status requires a public benefit and will not necessarily include all purposes which might be considered by a layperson to be ‘religious’.

25.6.1 Introduction

This section considers the third of Lord Macnaghten’s heads of charity: religion. The concept of religion has a very particular form in the cases – if not in the Charities Act 2011. In the case law, religion is considered to be concerned with the worship of a deity. Indeed, in these times of growing New Age cults, crystals and baubles, the attitude taken to charitable religious purposes in the cases has been limited to the presence of a public benefit from a deistic form of religion,¹²⁷ and has not embraced any of the so-called New Age belief systems. However, the effect of the Charities Act 2011 has been to expand the concept of religion beyond the case law focus on systems of belief which believe in a god and into any ‘religion which does not involve belief in a god'.¹²⁸ This significant change is considered below in section 25.6.2. It is also a requirement, as underlined by the 2011 Act, that there must be a public benefit from the religious purpose. Indeed, the requirement of public benefit has even caused bequests in favour of orders of contemplative nuns in *Gilmour v Coats*¹²⁹ to be held not charitable on the basis that contemplative religious communities cannot benefit the public because they are cloistered away from the public. Therefore, a lifetime's religious devotion will not necessarily be enough to convince an English court that a purported charitable trust created to further your observance ought properly to be considered a valid religious, charitable purpose, unless that purpose also confers a palpable public benefit.¹³⁰ The reason for the presence of this head of charity results from the historical administration of alms to the poor and of education in local parishes by the church – in consequence, the English conception of charity has long been bound up with religious devotion.

¹²⁶ [1951] AC 297.

¹²⁷ Re South Place Ethical Society [1980] 3 All ER 918, below.

25.6.2 What is a 'religion' in charities law?

The structure of this discussion

It is important to understand that the case law on the meaning of 'religion' was limited to belief in god, whereas the Charities Act 2006 explicitly seeks to extend that definition into religions which do not involve a belief in a god. It is unclear at the time of writing where the new legislation will take this area of the law. Therefore, this section will, first, consider the old case law in detail before, secondly, considering how the new legislation may impact on that case law. First, then, a consideration of the case law definition of 'religion'.

The old case law definition of 'religion'

In Re South Place Ethical Society,¹³¹ Dillon J gave a taste of the meaning of the concept of a 'religious purpose' in the law of charity: 'religion, as I see it, is concerned with man's relations with God.' Therefore, on the facts of South Place, the study and dissemination of ethical principles was held not to constitute religion. In the words of Dillon J, 'ethics are concerned with man's relations with man'. He continued: 'It seems to me that two of the essential attributes of religion are faith and worship: faith in a god and worship of that god.' The focus is therefore on a system of belief in a god or the promotion of spiritual teaching connected to such religious activity.¹³² The leading case of *Gilmour v Coats*¹³³ in the House of Lords took the view that mere religious observance was insufficient to constitute a charitable purpose unless there was some demonstrable public benefit. So, simply arguing that the prayers of a cloistered order of nuns would be for the benefit of mankind was not considered to be a valid charitable purpose for the advancement of religion. Other forms of spiritual observance are not included in this category by the case law. Therefore, beliefs in 128 Charities Act 2006, s 2(3)(a)(ii).

129 [1949] AC 426.

130 Gilmour v Coats [1949] AC 426; Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW [1959] AC 457.

131 [1980] 3 All ER 918.

132 Keren Kayemeth Le Jisroel Ltd v IRC [1931] 2 KB 465.

133 [1949] AC 426.

crystals or in the majesty of Sunderland Football Club would not constitute religion (no matter how fervent the devotion to the cause).

Similarly, the activities of the Scientologists have not been held to constitute religious purposes.¹³⁴ The approach of the courts to Scientology has been vitriolic. In *Hubbard v Vosper*¹³⁵ Lord Denning described Scientology as ‘dangerous material’. Whereas Goff J described it as ‘pernicious nonsense’ in Church of Scientology v Kaufman.¹³⁶ The beliefs of the Unification Church (popularly known as the ‘Moonies’) have been accepted as disclosing a valid charitable religious purpose in spite of their popular presentation in tabloid newspapers as a dangerous cult. The distinction is that the former does not involve an element of worship of a god or gods whereas the latter does. Freemasonry is not a religion for similar reasons.¹³⁷ The effect of the 2011 Act, however, will be that henceforth the presence of a ‘god’ will not necessarily be the definitive question.

The effect of the Charities Act 2011 on the meaning of ‘religion’ in charities law

The effect of s 3(2)(a) of the Charities Act 2011 will be significant in relation to trusts for the advancement of religion. Under s 3(2)(a)(i), the charities law practice of accepting major world religions, such as Hinduism, which include belief in more than one god, has been given statutory effect. That paragraph provides that a religion for the purposes of charities law will include ‘a religion which does not involve belief in a god’. Thus it is clear that religions such as Hinduism will constitute religions in the charity law sense where they involve belief in several gods (although that particular example was always accepted by the old Charity Commissioners as constituting a religion for charities law purposes in any event).¹³⁸

A more complex idea is contained in s 3(2)(a)(ii) of the Charities Act 2011. That paragraph further provides that the term ‘religion’ includes ‘a religion which does not involve belief in a god’.¹³⁹ This latter extension to the concept of religion will be more problematic. Previously, charities law had separated religions off from other forms of belief by reference to the existence of a belief in a god or gods. It is suggested that the principal purpose behind this provision was to confirm that Buddhism would be a religion for charitable purposes without needing to show belief in a god or gods. However, more generally, now that there is no need for the presence of a god, how will a religion be distinguished from, for example, a merely ethical system of belief, or a belief in the existence of hobbits, or a belief in Spider Man as the ultimate power for good in the universe? In the last census in the UK, over three hundred thousand people identified their religion as being ‘Jedi Knight’ (a character trait derived from the Star Wars films). The census results tended to ignore this as having been a joke perpetrated by those people, but it could also be considered to be a disrespectful denial of someone’s religious choice.

134 In essence, the Scientologists believe in the writings of L Ron Hubbard, a science fiction novelist, to the effect that human beings were placed on Earth by aliens millions of years ago and that, through a process of auditing themselves, they make themselves ready for the return of said aliens.

135 [1972] 2 QB 84, 96.

136 [1973] RPC 635, 658.

137 United Grand Lodge of Ancient Free and Accepted Masons of England v Holborn Borough Council [1957] 3 All ER 281.

138 Charities Act 2006, s 3(2)(a)(i).

139 Ibid, s 3(2)(a)(ii).

So, we need to consider what might constitute a 'religion' for the purposes of charities law in the wake of the 2011 Act. The Shorter Oxford English Dictionary defines 'religion', from the Middle English period onwards, as involving a:

belief in or sensing of some superhuman controlling power or powers, entitled to obedience, reverence, and worship, or in a system defining a code of living, esp. as a means to achieve spiritual or material improvement.

There are, it is suggested, two very different senses of 'religion' bound up in this definition. First, the requirement for some 'superhuman being' and, secondly, 'a code of living'. I shall deal with each in turn. The requirement that there be a 'superhuman being' clearly accords with the need for a god at one level. The Canadian authorities have identified a 'belief in the supernatural' as being one of the main indicia of a charitable purpose for the advancement of religion.¹⁴⁰ This was the approach in the old case law. Literally, of course, the reference to a 'superhuman being' could also include a belief in the powers of the comic book superhero Spider Man, but that would not necessarily include the notion of Spider Man having an entitlement to reverence or worship. It is not a requirement that one be able to prove the existence of one's god, but it would seem reasonable that one would genuinely have to believe that one's 'superhuman being' did have the powers which one revered. More interestingly perhaps, the comic books dealing with Thor are based on the actual Norse myths which considered Thor to be a god (the god of thunder, to be precise). Those ancient myths and the modern comic books both deal with the Norse concepts of the tree of life, Odin being blinded, and so forth. Does a re-telling of a religious myth in comic book and in cinema formats equate to an expression of religious ideas? Does it matter whether the film-maker considers them to be religious, or only if some audience members consider them to be religious?

The second sense of religion in this definition is interesting and potentially much broader. Of course being an exhaustively trained samurai warrior or an elite soldier on special operations or a dedicated swimmer who trains every morning at 5am is involved in a 'code of living . . . as a means to achieve . . . material improvement', but none of these activities necessarily involves any sort of belief in a higher power or a controlling energy in the universe. However, membership of an organisation which the tabloid newspapers might refer to as a 'cult' would involve a code of living seeking spiritual improvement if, for example, the adherents live in a commune, devote themselves to good works and contemplation, and seek spiritual enlightenment without believing there is a god in the universe. It is suggested that such a code of living would be easier to demonstrate in relation to groups of individuals, either living communally in the context of their shared beliefs or coming together in some form of religious activity, than it would be for individuals who adhered to entirely individual beliefs on their own. This would be so because charities law requires a public benefit which would be easier to achieve for groups of people reaching larger sections of the community, whereas a lone individual would find it more difficult to demonstrate a credible belief system. So, if I were to erect a religion on my personal belief in the holy nature of the 'stuff I keep under my bed', then it would be unlikely that charities law would accept that as being a religion and it would be difficult to prove that I genuinely believed in it as a religion. Of course, if I were able to gather many other adherents, then my claim to a religion relating to the ‘stuff under my bed’ would take on a new credence. However, taken literally, the presence of a ‘belief system’ of some sort ought to constitute a religion if it defines the manner in which the adherent or adherents live.

140 Church of the New Faith v Commissioner of Pay-roll Tax [1982–1983] 154 CLR 120, 174, per Wilson and Deane JJ.

On this basis, the activities of groups like the Scientologists may now become valid charitable purposes because they live communally and pursue a system of belief. The Scientologists’ system of belief (to the extent that I understand it) relates both to a belief that the aliens whom they believe put us here millions of years ago will return at some point in the future, and to a belief in personal development through a number of ‘courses’ of ‘auditing’ which resemble one-on-one counselling sessions.¹⁴¹ There is no god in which adherents believe – the aliens apparently constituting neither gods nor immortal beings. Nevertheless, it would be difficult for charities law to accept Scientology as being a charitable purpose given the opprobrium which has been heaped on it in previous, decided cases, as mentioned earlier in the preceding section. Scientology has been described judicially as ‘pernicious nonsense’: it would be interesting to see how the judges would explain such ‘pernicious nonsense’ as being a religion which is entitled to the state’s support in the form of relief from taxation and so forth.

In the Supreme Court decision in R (on the application of Hodkin) v Registrar General of Births, Marriages and Deaths,¹⁴² not relating directly to charities law, it has been held that Scientology does constitute a religion for the purposes of licensing its premises to be used as places of marriage under the Places of Worship Registration Act 1855. Lord Toulson was careful not to decide any questions about charities law, but nevertheless was accepting of a broad concept of religion which would not exclude genuinely held belief systems. The judgment considered the 1855 Act in the light of a range of different Acts which contained a concept of religion. In essence, the Scientologist applicants were seeking a reconsideration of the decision of the Court of Appeal in *R v Registrar General, Ex p Segerdal*¹⁴³ which had refused to register the Scientologists’ premises. In that case, Lord Denning focused on Scientology as being a philosophy rather than a religion which sought to express ‘reverence for God’ (with a capital ‘g’). What is interesting about Lord Denning’s judgment – and something which goes to the very heart of the problems with defining a ‘religion’ for charities law purposes – is that he accepted that Buddhism was a religion but, as Lord Toulson notes, provides no explanation as to why. No right-minded person would exclude Buddhism from their categories of religions, but it is difficult to explain why Buddhism equates to other world religions because it does not share a belief in a higher being or beings controlling the universe. Therefore, a desire to include Buddhism makes definition difficult, and therefore threatens to include a variety of other, questionable systems of thought within the charities law definition. The definition which Lord Toulson advanced was the following:¹⁴⁴

For the purposes of [Places of Worship Registration Act], I would describe religion in summary as a spiritual or non-secular belief system, held by a group of adherents, which 141 See the explanation given by Lord Toulson in Hodkin [2013] UKSC 77 which is discussed in the text to follow.

142 [2013] UKSC 77.

143 [1970] 2 QB 697.

144 [2013] UKSC 77, [57].

claims to explain mankind's place in the universe and relationship with the infinite, and to teach its adherents how they are to live their lives in conformity with the spiritual understanding associated with the belief system.

This definition clearly involves a number of problematic concepts. Why must the religion be shared by a group? Why must it explain mankind's place in the universe? Would that explanation of our place in the universe involve a belief in the correctness of astrophysics which is held by a group of adherents in the physics departments of our universities? Some yoga classes try to teach their groups of adherents how to live in accordance with a quasi-spiritual understanding of the world: is that a religion? Importantly, this definition is limited to the 1855 Act and therefore is not authority for the law of charities. What remains problematic within the law of charities is that any religion which qualifies attracts beneficial tax treatment for its publicly beneficial activities. Consequently, the costs to the public exchequer of extending the boundaries of religious purposes must be borne in mind.

The reason why the Charity Commissioners, before 2006, refused to accept the Scientologists as being a charitable purpose was that their activities were conducted in private and therefore did not constitute a public benefit. More 'New Age' religions which have a belief in spiritualism as opposed to a god might therefore constitute religious charitable purposes, if they involve a belief system and a code of living. However, the ethical, humanist society in Re South Place Ethical Society is unlikely still to be a religion because humanism generally constitutes a form of atheism, and is therefore almost the opposite of a religious purpose which may be considered to lack the presence of a code of belief or a code of living because it does not involve any single system of belief, but rather an 'unbelief'.

25.6.3 The requirement of public benefit

Drawing distinctions

All charities must be for the public benefit.¹⁴⁵ The requirement for a public benefit was always a part of charities law relating to the advancement of religion. It is provided in s 3(1)(m)(i) of the Charities Act 2011 that any purposes which are recognised as charitable purposes under the old case law will continue to be recognised as charitable purposes. Consequently it is supposed that the old case law will continue in effect for the application of the public benefit test to such purposes. In *Thornton v Howe*¹⁴⁶ the question at issue was the validity as a charitable purpose of a trust created to secure the publication of the writings of one Joanna Southcott, who had claimed to have been impregnated by the Holy Ghost and to have been pregnant with the new Messiah. It was held that the publication of such works would be for the public benefit. By definition, the root of the word 'publication' is 'public' – thus the former implied a benefit to the latter necessarily.

In contrast to publication of such spiritual works, the trust at issue in *Gilmour v Coats*¹⁴⁷ was a trust created for the benefit of an order of contemplative Carmelite nuns. The trust was held not to have been charitable on the basis that the order contemplated in private, thus failing to communicate any benefit to the public. The court dismissed an argument that the nuns' contemplation would have helped society in a spiritual sense, on the basis that it would not have been enough to constitute charitable help to society. Lord Simonds required tangible proof that the works of the trust would convey a benefit to the public, as opposed simply to the adherents' belief that the power of prayer would necessarily be of benefit to the public. This point has been accepted in a number of cases.¹⁴⁸ In *Dunne v Byrne*¹⁴⁹ the point is made that such activities of nuns in a convent would be accepted as being 'religious' in a general sense but not 'charitable' in the legal sense.

145 Charities Act 2011, s 2(1)(b).

146 (1862) 31 Beav 14.

147 [1949] AC 426.

Which types of activities constitute a 'public benefit'?

The courts are concerned with the advantages of charitable status being given to certain activities. Therefore, English law ought to state clearly that it is not awarding badges of honour to certain types of activity, nor judging their merits. Rather, it is concerned to accord the precise benefits attached to charitable status (principally tax relief and excusal from private trusts law formalities) to particular forms of approved activity like the relief of poverty and doing good works in the community. As has already been seen, a trust for the benefit of a contemplative order of nuns will not be valid because there is no public benefit resulting from that cloistered observance.¹⁵⁰ Religious observance or activity is generally not a public matter but to deny it charitable status is not to criticise it.

The courts have begun to adopt increasingly relaxed approaches to the interpretation of such charitable purposes. In *Neville Estates v Madden*¹⁵¹ the issue arose whether a trust to benefit members of the Catford Synagogue could be a charitable purpose. The central issue was whether the members of that synagogue could be considered to be a sufficient section of the population for 'public benefit'. It was held that, because the religious observance practised in the synagogue was (in theory) open to the public, the requirement of public benefit would be satisfied.¹⁵²

In *Re Hetherington*¹⁵³ there was a trust to provide income for the saying of masses in private. On the facts it was found that it was not susceptible of proof in these circumstances that there would be a tangible benefit to the public. Nevertheless, Browne-Wilkinson V-C was prepared to construe the gift as being a gift to say masses in public (and therefore as a charitable purpose) on the basis that to interpret the transfer as such a trust would be to render it valid and that it was open to the court to interpret a transfer as being an intention to create a charitable trust so as to make that trust valid. Therefore, Browne-Wilkinson V-C is underscoring a straightforwardly purposive approach to the treatment of charitable trusts by the courts. On those facts it was therefore possible that the masses be heard in public and a further benefit in that the funds provided by the trust would relieve church funds in paying for the stipends of more priests.

148 Cocks v Manners (1871) LR 12 Eq 574; Re White [1893] 2 Ch 41; and also Leahy v Attorney-General for NSW [1959] AC 457.

149 [1912] AC 407.

150 Gilmour v Coats [1949] AC 426.

151 [1962] Ch 832.

152 See also Attorney-General v Bunce (1868) LR 6 Eq 563; Bunting v Sargent (1879) 13 Ch D 330.

153 [1990] Ch 1.

This purposive approach indicates the attitude of the courts to validate charitable trusts wherever possible, in contradistinction to the stricter interpretation accorded generally to express private trusts. However, it worth noting that Browne-Wilkinson V-C in Hetherington was careful to rely on authorities like Gilmour v Coats,¹⁵⁴ *Yeap Cheah Neo v Ong*¹⁵⁵ and *Hoare v Hoare*¹⁵⁶ in relation to the need for a public benefit, and *Re Banfield*¹⁵⁷ in relation to the exclusion of non-charitable purposes. This decision also illustrates a generational approach by judges like Lords Wilberforce, Goff and Browne-Wilkinson (when in the High Court) to upholding the validity of trusts wherever possible, in contrast to the approaches of judges like Viscount Simonds and Harman J to invalidating trusts in circumstances in which there was some apparent incongruity in their creation.

Some conclusions on religion

This sub-heading does seem a little overly portentous as written (‘some conclusions on religion’) – it does not intend to draw theological conclusions on the meaning of religion. Rather, its aim is limited to an examination of the types of activity which English law will accept as being charitable, religious purposes. A charitable religious purpose requires some public action or benefit. The question then is what type of action. It does appear that the courts have in mind religious observance which involves classically English activities such as jumble sales and gymkhanas which will have a public benefit. As will be discussed below in Other purposes beneficial to the community, political action to improve the housing conditions of the impoverished by religious groups will not be charitable actions under the head of religious purpose. Their only possible salvation¹⁵⁸ in the law of charities for this type of purpose is as a trust for the relief of poverty or under one of the new statutory heads of charity.

Similarly, religious observance itself is insufficient – it must be available to the public. However, the notion of religion is that it has adherents (or members) and therefore excludes others. Necessarily, religions, and religious observance will exclude sections of the public as well as offering others spiritual succour. The point is that seeking a public benefit in relation to religious purposes appears to be, at some level, counter-intuitive.

Indeed the general approach to religion is a rather parochial Anglican approach to religion and spirituality. It might be asked, in these pluralistic times, why New Age spiritual awareness or druidism should not be allowed registration as religious charitable trusts. In a patch of purple prose in Re South Place Ethical Society,¹⁵⁹ Dillon J explained his requirements for qualification as a charitable religious purpose in the following terms:

If reason leads people not to accept Christianity or any known religion, but they do believe in the excellence of qualities, such as truth, beauty and love, or believe in the platonic concept of the ideal, their beliefs may seem to them to be the equivalent of a religion, but viewed objectively they are not a religion.

154 [1949] AC 426.

155 (1875) LR 6 PC 381.

156 (1886) 56 LT 147.

157 [1968] 2 All ER 276.

158 No pun intended.

159 [1980] 3 All ER 918.

In other words, if you do not believe in what I believe in (or in what established religions believe in) in the way that I believe in them, then you do not have a religion at all. That is far from the approach in Dingle v Turner,¹⁶⁰ whereby the court would look to whether or not there is an underlying charitable or altruistic purpose to the trust. Instead an ideological approach to religion emerges in relation to the availability of the fiscal and other advantages of charitable status.

25.7 OTHER PURPOSES BENEFICIAL TO THE COMMUNITY

Other purposes beneficial to the community require that there be a sufficient 'public benefit'. A 'community' in this sense must be something more than a mere fluctuating body of private individuals (such as employees of a small company). The term 'benefit' will be found to exist in relation to purposes providing for the maintenance of public buildings, the provision of facilities for the disabled within a community, but will not apply under the case law in relation to mere recreation or social events (subject to certain statutory exceptions). These principles will be subject to certain general exclusions from the category of charitable purposes. After the Charities Act 2011, the forms of charity which are accepted as being valid under this head will continue to be valid, although the fourth head itself as a means of categorisation is likely to be of no further use now that there are new statutory heads of charity.

25.7.1 Introduction

This fourth category of charitable purpose under the case law is clearly broader in scope than the other three heads of charity under the old case law, acting as a reservoir for a number of the miscellaneous trusts which had struggled to qualify as being charitable despite their seemingly benevolent aim. The category is culled from those parts of the 1601 preamble which do not fit into those already considered and the cases which have argued by analogy, or more generally, that they disclose purposes beneficial to the community. It appears that many of the new charitable purposes which were approved by the Charity Commissioners before the passage of the old 2006 Act have fallen under this head rather than under any of the three more specific purposes. In many of the decided cases, applicants have sought to argue that they fell within one of the three specific heads of charity and have then argued that, in the alternative, they fell within the fourth head. Therefore, the fourth head can often be seen as a catch-all or residuary category for purposes which could not otherwise be characterised as being charitable.

This category no longer exists intact as a result of the passage of the 2011 Act. Rather, a number of the categories of purpose which used to fall under this head are now listed in s 3(1) of the 2011 Act. However, any purposes which were formerly valid under the pre-2006 case law,¹⁶¹ whether or not they are now listed in that Act, will continue to be valid.¹⁶² Therefore, it is still important to know how the fourth head under Pemsel's Case operates because any case which would have been valid under it will still be valid in the future, whether or not it appears in the list in s 3(1) of the 2011 Act. Furthermore, a number of the issues considered in this section relating to the nature of a benefit or to the scope of the community which is to be benefited will continue to be important even after the enactment of the 2011 Act. For the purposes of this discussion, this category of other purposes beneficial to the community will still be referred to as ‘the fourth head’.

160 [1972] AC 601.

161 Charities Act 2006, s 2(8).

162 Ibid, s 2(4)(a), by dint of s 2(2)(m).

25.7.2 The nature of the fourth head: other purposes beneficial to the community

To fall under this head the trust has to show that its purpose is either analogous with the examples cited in the preamble to the statute of 1601 or with the principles deriving from its decided cases: as held by Lord Macnaghten in Pemsel's Case.¹⁶³ As considered above, while the 1601 preamble was repealed by the Charities Act 1960, the effect of the preamble on the common law was retained by the decision in Scottish Burial v Glasgow Corporation.¹⁶⁴ Importantly, in that same decision Lord Reid held that a trust ought not to be deprived of its charitable status simply because it charges fees or conducts a trade with the public;¹⁶⁵ provided that the profits derived from such fees or trade are applied for the purposes of the charity and not paid out to individuals. In this way, schools which charge fees have been accepted as being charitable provided that they are either non-profit making or that any profits are applied for the benefit of the school. It is of course questionable whether the fiscal advantages of charity ought to be accorded to charitable entities which trade. Any other person who makes a profit will be prima facie liable to some form of taxation.

25.7.3 The requirement of a public benefit

The fourth head includes a requirement that the purpose be ‘beneficial to the community’. It is therefore important to unpack this notion of ‘community’. In terms of education and religion, the requirement of public benefit has been adapted to cope with the particular types of trust which have generated litigation. With reference to educational purposes, the focus has been on the extent to which the fund has been applied for people outwith any personal nexus to the settlor, and in relation to religion the public benefit has come to include a notion of access to religious service. The conception of ‘beneficial to the community’ is slightly different. It can be best summarised as requiring that some identifiable section of the community can derive a real benefit from the purpose. The roots of the case law are established in the dicta of Sir Samuel Romilly in *Morice v Bishop of Durham*¹⁶⁶ making reference to a requirement of ‘general public utility’ to satisfy this fourth head.

The notion of ‘benefit’

The existence of some benefit is important. The people who are intended to take a benefit from the trust must actually be shown to benefit in some tangible fashion. Thus, for example, a trust of a small amount of money for the benefit of aged and blind millionaires would not

163 [1891] AC 531.

164 [1968] AC 138.

165 See the discussion of Joseph Rowntree Memorial Trust Housing Association Ltd v Attorney-General [1983] 1 All ER 288; ICLR v Attorney-General [1972] Ch 73, considered above.

166 (1805) 10 Ves 522.

qualify on the basis that such people would not derive any further benefit from such a trust, given their existing wealth.¹⁶⁷ However, a charitable purpose for the care of the blind which will provide real benefits to the blind people within a given area would be charitable because those people who were intended to benefit would actually be taking a tangible benefit.¹⁶⁸

As a general rule of thumb it was suggested in *ICLR v Attorney-General*¹⁶⁹ by Russell LJ that where a trust purpose removes the need for statutory or governmental action by providing a service voluntarily, the organisation providing that service should be deemed to be charitable. However, that permissive approach is not adopted in all cases. In *Re South Place Ethical Society*¹⁷⁰ Dillon J suggested that to say that a purpose is of benefit to the community and therefore charitable, is to put the cart before the horse – the two ideas are not mutually inclusive. Just because a purpose may be of benefit to the community does not necessarily mean that it is charitable. The only rational approach for the student of this subject is to consider each case in turn to decide whether or not there appears to be sufficient benefit provided by the particular trust purpose.

The notion of 'community'

There is a necessary requirement that there be sufficient benefit to the community. The term 'community' is a particularly vexed one for political scientists and sociologists as well as for lawyers. A community could be said to be defined by reference to a geographical area. The obvious question would be what size of geographic area would be necessary to constitute a community. To define that area as being 'people in my back garden' or 'the monsters under my bed' would clearly be too small a geographic area. But would the settlor be required to identify an area as populous as 'London' or as geographically large as 'Yorkshire'? In *Verge v Somerville*¹⁷¹ Lord Wrenbury held that:

The inhabitants of a parish or town or any particular class of such inhabitants, may, for instance, be the objects of such a gift, but private individuals, or a fluctuating body of private individuals cannot.

Therefore, the community must be more than a fluctuating body of private individuals – precisely the concept which was criticised in *Dingle v Turner*¹⁷² as being a reasonable definition of a group as large as the inhabitants of a London borough, as discussed above.

The further question with reference to charity would be whether a defined class of people (such as 'the elderly', or 'six-year-old footballers') within that geographic area would be sufficiently 'communal'. In some cases, the class may be a broad enough section of the community – such as 'the elderly'. Whereas others may appear to be too narrow and overly selective – such as 'six-year-old footballers'. There are arguments raised by the political 167 As considered in Rowntree Memorial Trust Housing Association v Attorney-General [1983] Ch 159, 171.

168 Re Lewis [1955] Ch 104.

169 [1972] Ch 73.

170 [1980] 3 All ER 918.

171 [1924] AC 496.

172 [1972] AC 601.

scientists that the millions of people who watch Big Brother on Channel 4 constitute a community, or that people who share a physical ailment or a religious or political belief should all be considered as examples of virtual (rather than tangible) communities.

The question is then as to the approach which English law does in fact take. Evidently, a purpose which provides a benefit to a private class sharing a personal nexus with the settlor will not be a valid charitable purpose.¹⁷³ The notion of limiting the class extends further than the personal nexus test used in *Oppenheim*¹⁷⁴ for educational purpose trusts. Thus in the leading case of *IRC v Baddeley*¹⁷⁵ the settlor purported to create a charitable trust to provide facilities for ‘religious services and instruction and for the social and physical training and recreation’ of Methodists in the West Ham and Leyton area of east London. It was held by Viscount Simonds that the charitable purpose would fail because the class of those who could benefit was too narrowly drawn. His Lordship held that ‘if the beneficiaries are a class of persons not only confined to a particular area but selected from within it by reference to a particular creed’ it cannot fall under the fourth head of charity. Therefore, to restrict the class of people who can benefit from the purpose too narrowly will fail the requirement of a benefit to the community. In the words of Viscount Simonds, those who are expressed as being entitled to benefit from the purpose must be an ‘appreciably important class of the community’.

Benefiting individuals within a community

The courts have accepted a variety of defined classes as being suitably charitable. Trusts for the relief of the aged have been held to be charitable. Thus, in *Re Dunlop*¹⁷⁶ a trust to provide a home for elderly Presbyterians was upheld as being a valid charitable purpose, as was sheltered accommodation providing for fee-paying patients in Rowntree Memorial Trust Housing Association v Attorney-General.¹⁷⁷ As considered above, despite the charging of fees, trusts will be upheld as being for valid charitable purposes when they are for the care of the elderly, or the sick, or the disabled. It appears that these cases are adopting the Dingle v Turner approach of seeking out an underlying charitable purpose, rather than relying simply on the applicant to prove that a sufficient constituency of the public will be benefited by the trust.

Benefiting the civic amenities of a community

Aside from demonstrating that charitable assistance will be given to people, it is sufficient that the trust fulfils a purpose not directed at specific individuals but providing for some civic amenity. Trusts for the maintenance of a town’s bridges, towers and walls have been upheld as valid charitable purposes¹⁷⁸ as has a trust for the support of a crematorium.¹⁷⁹ In these 173 Re Hobourn Aero Components Ltd’s Air Raids Disaster Fund [1946] Ch 194 – in which the mooted benefit was restricted to the employees of a particular company.

174 [1951] AC 297.

175 [1955] AC 572.

176 [1984] NI 408.

177 [1983] Ch 159; Re Resch’s WT [1969] 1 AC 514.

178 Attorney-General v Shrewsbury Corp (1843) 6 Beav 220.

179 Scottish Burial Reform and Cremation Society v Glasgow Corp [1968] AC 138.

cases there are no specific individuals who stand to benefit directly, rather the community in general receives some indirect benefit in the quality of their civic life.

The notion of community, and of municipal services, is greatly extended by some of the case law. Included within the idea of ‘benefit to the community’ is the resettlement of criminal offenders and the rehabilitation of drug users.¹⁸⁰ Similarly, trusts for the support of fire-fighting services¹⁸¹ and lifeboats¹⁸² have been upheld as charitable purposes. It is suggested that this development, and understanding of the civic context of the ‘community’ is a very welcome development for the law. The fiscal and other advantages of charitable status ought to be bestowed on socially useful activities. The way forward for the charitable sector is in the support of the welfare state and local government in the development of such amenities and in the support of local initiatives within which communities develop their own shared space.

As a slight development to one side of those issues of civic amenity, trusts for the moral improvement or instruction of the community have been upheld as being charitable purposes. Thus, a trust, inter alia, to ‘stimulate humane and generous sentiments in man towards lower animals’ has been upheld as a charitable purpose attached to the establishment of an animal refuge.¹⁸³ Even trusts for ‘the defence of the realm’ have been upheld as being charitable.¹⁸⁴

The question of the provision of recreation grounds and sporting or leisure amenities was covered by the Recreational Charities Act 1958, before the introduction of s 5 of the Charities Act 2011, in the wake of the Baddeley decision considered above. Decisions in which such amenities have been upheld as charitable have now been dismissed as being anomalous and outwith the operation of the statute.¹⁸⁵ In *Williams v IRC*¹⁸⁶ a trust was established for ‘the benefit of Welsh people resident in London’. In delivering the leading speech, Lord Simonds held that ‘a trust must be of a public character’ and not restricted to individuals. The trust failed as a charitable purpose trust on the basis that the trust’s purpose was solely social and recreational, and not strictly charitable. This particular decision, it is suggested, must now be considered to be have been overruled by s 3(1) in relation to the playing of amateur sport and potentially some of the other categories as well.

25.7.4 The remaining purposes beneficial to the community under the Charities Act 2011

The principal effect of the Charities Act 2011 in relation to the definition of ‘charitable purpose’ has been to break out a number of the key, contested categories of ‘other purposes beneficial to the community’ in an attempt to make clear that they should now be considered to be valid heads of charity in their own right. What is unclear at the time of writing is whether or not the courts will attempt to perpetuate their case law categorisations of 180 Attorney-General for Bahamas v Royal Trust Co [1986] 1 WLR 1001.

181 Re Wokingham Fire Brigade Trusts [1951] Ch 373.

182 Johnston v Swann (1818) 3 Madd 457.

183 Re Wedgwood [1915] 1 Ch 113.

184 Re Stratheden [1895] 3 Ch 265; Re Corbyn [1941] Ch 400.

185 Williams Trustees v IRC [1947] AC 447.

186 Ibid.

charitable and non-charitable purposes regardless of the statute on the basis that the statute is drafted in only the most general language. Significantly head (m) in s 3(1) of the Charities Act 2011 preserves all charitable purposes which were previously valid under the case law, as set out in s 3(1)(m)(i) of that Act. Also contained in that provision is a reference to the validity of recreational charities, given that under the old case law the courts effectively chose to ignore the Recreational Charities Act 1958 which had been passed to overturn a decision of the House of Lords which had sought to perpetuate long-standing principles of the case law disallowing charitable status to recreational activities. It is to be hoped that the courts will react to the spirit of the statute which is clearly to expand the categories of charitable purposes to include activities which the case law had previously refused to recognise as being charitable. Those purposes, and the old case law which previously dealt with them, are considered in turn in the following section of this chapter.

The decision of Lewison J in *Hanchett-Stamford v Attorney-General*¹⁸⁷ threatens to limit the effect of the Act quite remarkably by taking the position that (in relation specifically to animal welfare) if the charitable purpose was potentially valid under the old case law then the Act should not be taken as having any effect in broadening that category of charitable purpose. This would mean that the Parliamentary intention of modernising and expanding the categories of charitable purpose would be frustrated by the courts. This case is considered below at para 25.8.9.

25.8 THE NEW CATEGORIES OF CHARITABLE PURPOSE UNDER THE CHARITIES ACT 2011

25.8.1 An introduction to the Act

It is difficult to write much on the terms of this new Act immediately in the wake of it receiving the Royal Assent because there is no case law to explain the extent of the new heads of charity and because the manner in which those categories are expressed is very general indeed. Therefore, what follows is a discussion of each of the new statutory heads of charity in turn with a reference to previous problems in the case law where appropriate and otherwise with a suggestion as to their possible future applications. There is a division between these new statutory heads of charitable purpose: first, those heads which have been the subject of litigation and which the statute now seeks to resolve; and, secondly, those heads which are new governmental initiatives without any history in the old case law.

25.8.2 The advancement of health or the saving of lives

The reference to the advancement of health includes the ‘prevention or relief of sickness, disease or human suffering’.¹⁸⁸ Research into medical procedures would ordinarily have fallen under educational purposes under the research category in any event, in the manner considered earlier in this chapter in relation to the advancement of education. Therefore, it is to be supposed that this category is aimed at other purposes. The ‘advancement of health’ could encompass activities which promote healthy eating – such as celebrity chef Jamie

187 [2008] EWHC 330 (Ch), [2008] 4 All ER 323.

188 Charities Act 2011, s 3(2)(b).

Oliver's campaigning for the improvement of dinners in schools – or public information campaigns promoting sexual health. Campaigning for the advancement or improvement of public health would in itself be a charitable activity, although if that campaigning took to advocating a change in the law then it would fall foul of the principle in *National Anti-Vivisection v IRC*¹⁸⁹ that no charitable purpose may campaign for changes in the law. It may also include the advancement of alternative health therapies. The 'saving of lives' could encompass anything from medical care to lifeboat services which save lives at sea.¹⁹⁰

25.8.3 The advancement of citizenship or community development

Category (e) in s 3(1) deals with 'the advancement of citizenship or community development'. At first blush, this category is very much in line with the rhetoric of the current government and is fairly meaningless as drafted. The Act contains a gloss to the effect that it includes 'rural or urban regeneration' and 'the promotion of civic responsibility, volunteering, the voluntary sector or the effectiveness or efficiency of charities'.¹⁹¹ What is not clear is what is meant by 'citizenship'. It could be linked to whatever is taught in schools as part of the national curriculum under 'citizenship'. There are references elsewhere in s 3(1) to religious or racial harmony and equality,¹⁹² although the reference to 'community development' could include the organisation of youth groups, and other activities which are directed at harmony. What is difficult to see is how these intangible – but important – improvements in social life will tally with the judges' historical aversion to services or activities which do not lead to any tangible benefit to identifiable groups of people. For example, recreational charities were always avoided in the case law because mere social activities had no direct effect on the quality of people's lives. Therefore, the judges would need to expand their understanding of a charitable activity in this sense to incorporate a range of intangible activities, which must extend beyond those categories of purpose which have already been accepted under the old case law and which will continue to be effective in the future.¹⁹³

25.8.4 The advancement of the arts, culture, heritage or science

This category refers to 'the advancement of the arts, culture, heritage or science'. Each of these four elements should be considered separately. None of these terms is defined in the Act and therefore we must develop our own understandings of these provisions and guess as to the future. First, 'the arts'. It is suggested that the reference to 'the arts' in the plural is not a reference simply to 'art'. Thus, it is a reference to activities which ordinarily constitute a part of 'art' in the singular and so refers to painting, to sculpture and so forth; but it could also be said to refer to theatre performances, opera, classical music and so forth which all generally fall under the rubric of 'the arts' generally. The advancement of art, in the singular, could include not only the display of artworks¹⁹⁴ and the maintenance of museums,¹⁹⁵ but its

189 [1940] AC 31.

190 Thomas v Howell (1874) LR 18 Eq 198; Re David (1889) 43 Ch D 27.

191 Charities Act 2011, s 3(2)(c).

192 Ibid, s 3(1)(h).

193 Ibid, s 3(1)(m)(i).

194 Abbott v Fraser (1874) LR 6 PC.

195 Trustees of the British Museum v White (1826) 2 Sim & St 594; Re Holburne (1885) 53 LT 212.

advancement might also refer to the funding of future artworks provided The Charity Commission can accept that it is genuinely of sufficient artistic merit.¹⁹⁶ The general reference to ‘heritage’ suggests the maintenance of historic land, gardens and buildings, and also monuments and so forth beyond artworks. Heritage need not be purely physical: there are, for example, a large number of folk music societies whose work is concerned with the preservation and conservation of cultural heritage items like songs, poems and so forth. This last item might be said to merge into ‘culture’. The meaning of the term ‘culture’ is one which is hotly contested among social theorists and could encompass almost any aspect of human interaction.¹⁹⁷ In the context of these four categories, culture would certainly include literature, theatre, classical music and opera, in the sense, that is, of what is commonly referred to as ‘high culture’. However, ceremonies or festivals which are particular to specific geographic communities or ethnic communities – such as religious festivals, or the Durham Miners’ Gala, or festivals of popular music – could certainly fall within a broader definition of ‘culture’. The advancement of science need not be limited to scientific research because that is already included under ‘education’ – therefore it can be assumed that this purpose is supposed to stretch further than research. The advancement of science could include the establishment or support of institutes which bring scientists together or which popularise science among the population generally.

25.8.5 The advancement of amateur sport

This category refers to ‘the advancement of amateur sport’. Under the old case law the mere advancement of sport did not in itself constitute a charitable purpose: thus paying for a cup for a yachting competition and to promote yachting was not held to be a charitable purpose,¹⁹⁸ nor was the promotion of cricket.¹⁹⁹ Recreational charities have been held valid under the old case law as charitable purposes only if they improved the conditions of life of the people using them and either if they are available to all members of the population without discrimination or if they are made available by reason of their users’ ‘youth, age, infirmity, disability, poverty or social and economic circumstances’: all terms which were contained in the Recreational Charities Act 1958 and now s 5 of the Charities Act 2011, which is considered in detail below in section 25.8.12. Most of the key cases on recreational charities related to combined sports and social clubs. Thus the inclusion of this category in the list of charitable purposes will require the judges to accept the charitable nature of amateur sports clubs or the raising of money, for example, for the training of amateur athletes for future Olympic Games. What the judges will need to accept is that it is not necessary for the participation in sport to alleviate some lack in the sportsperson’s life. (It should be recalled that the chance to earn money from sport will not count in this instance because the category refers strictly to amateur sport.) The Charity Commission has, however, changed its view and decided that it will accord charitable status to ‘the promotion of community participation in healthy recreation by providing facilities for playing particular sports’.²⁰⁰ Consequently, in practice there are 196 See Charity Commission, RR10: Museums and Art Galleries, paras 7–12 and Annex A.

197 Taken literally, of course, ‘culture’ could refer to mould or fungus.

198 Re Nottage (1885) 2 Ch D 649.

199 Re Patten [1929] 2 Ch 276.

200 Charity Commission, RR 11: Charitable Status and Sport (2003).

unlikely to be any further cases on this topic because The Charity Commission will not challenge genuine trusts set up to achieve these goals. The terms of the new Act have only confirmed this approach, it is suggested. The remaining questions relating to recreational charities, discussed below, may similarly be disposed of by this regulatory development.

25.8.6 The advancement of human rights, conflict resolution or reconciliation or the promotion of religious or racial harmony or equality and diversity

This category deals with ‘the advancement of human rights, conflict resolution or reconciliation or the promotion of religious or racial harmony or equality and diversity’. Purposes of this kind would previously have run the risk of being held to be void purposes on the basis that they sought a change in the law or that they were more generally political purposes.²⁰¹ As considered above, political purposes will not be enforced by the courts. The pretext for refusing to enforce such purposes is that it might be considered to be tantamount to the courts expressing support for one political ideology over another and that it would be impossible for a court to weigh purely political arguments given that judges (purportedly) merely put the law into effect but do not make it.²⁰² The old case law had not recognised the pursuit of better relations between groups or nations – such as the British and the Boers after the Boer War – as being charitable.²⁰³ The Charity Commission, however, doubtless emboldened now by the new Act, has expressed its view that promoting good race relations ought to be considered to be a charitable purpose in the future and as being self-evidently for the public benefit.

25.8.7 The advancement of environmental protection or improvement

This category is concerned with ‘the advancement of environmental protection or improvement’. The environment can be taken to refer to particular items of flora and fauna, at one end of the spectrum, right the way through to combating climate change or global warming at the other end. Thus the protection of sites of special scientific interest or the maintenance of areas of outstanding natural beauty – particularly areas which have been classified as such under planning law – would constitute environmental protection at what we might consider the ‘micro’ end of the spectrum. Research into climate change or activities relating to global environmental threats might be considered to be the ‘macro’ end of this spectrum. Both, it is suggested, should constitute charitable purposes. It is suggested that such activities can be demonstrated to be for the public benefit if it is accepted, as the Act seems to suggest by the very inclusion of this category in s 3(1), that protection or improvement of the environment is necessarily in the public good.

25.8.8 The relief of those in need by reason of youth, age, ill-health, disability, financial hardship or other disadvantage

The contents of this category are ‘the relief of those in need by reason of youth, age, ill-health, disability, financial hardship or other disadvantage’, of which references to ‘the relief of aged 201 See National Anti-vivisection Society v IRC [1940] AC 31.

202 However, in a common law system where the bulk of the law has been made by a judge at some point this argument has always struck this writer as being facile in the extreme.

203 See Re Strakosch [1949] Ch 529.

impotent and poor people' were contained in the Preamble to the statute of 1601. At first blush, it is difficult to see how this category extends far beyond the category for the relief and prevention of poverty: the focus would need to be on the 'other disadvantage' which persons might suffer to extend it beyond mere poverty. It is easiest to see how suffering connected to ill-health or old age or disability could be assisted by charitable donation or services. These ideas were encapsulated in the Preamble to the Statute of 1601, as set out earlier in this chapter. What one needs to demonstrate is a 'need' which would be met by that charitable service. Need in relation to youth could involve after-school care if there is no parent or other adult able to care for a child before her parents finish work or recover from a medical condition. Activities involving the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children have been upheld as being charitable purposes,²⁰⁴ as has the provision of a children's home.²⁰⁵ Otherwise, this category seems to enact a part of the old fourth head under the case law and the Preamble.

25.8.9 The advancement of animal welfare

The advancement of animal welfare under statute

This category relates to 'the advancement of animal welfare'. This would encompass the good works of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals or the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, it is suggested, as organisations committed to the care of animals. Equally, the provision of hospices for animals or even the provision of veterinary services may be charitable purposes. What is significant is that under the old case law the thread which appeared to run through those cases (for the most part) was that there was a public benefit in animal welfare if, and only if, there could be shown to be some moral improvement to the human community by dint of treating animals better.²⁰⁶ It remains to be seen whether or not the courts will consider the express inclusion of this category in the legislation as signalling a need to accept that promoting or procuring better animal welfare was in itself for 'the public benefit' without any anthropomorphic or humanist concerns about showing some moral improvement in the human community. It is suggested that a civilised human society only truly achieves a higher level of civilisation when it is capable of treating all creatures humanely, just as it looks after human beings incapable of caring for themselves. Thus, it is suggested, the advancement of animal welfare should be considered to be a good in itself. However, it may be that a trust to provide for the welfare of the settlor's only dog would not constitute a public benefit because the only benefit would be felt within the settlor's own home. Therefore, the trust would need to achieve some advancement of animal welfare which had a broader effect, but without needing to show that human beings in particular were benefiting. The old – and frequently unsatisfactory – case law is considered in the next section.

The pre-2006 case law on benefiting animals

It is frequently said that the British are a nation of animal lovers and that they become more concerned about harm being caused to animals than to people (that is probably because 204 See D v NSPCC [1978] AC 171.

205 Re Sohal's WT [1958] 1 WLR 1243.

206 Re Wedgwood [1915] 1 Ch 113.

animals cannot tell you what they are thinking and that is clearly a cause to like anyone). There are frequently attempts to create trusts for the maintenance of animals. Typically this would not constitute a valid private trust if it were for the benefit of specific animals.²⁰⁷ The argument might be that a trust for the benefit of a broadly defined class of animals would constitute a charitable purpose. On the basis that such a purpose directed at the prevention of cruelty to animals would contribute to public morality, the Court of Appeal held that the trust would be a valid charitable trust.²⁰⁸ In Re Moss,²⁰⁹ a trust for a specified person to use ‘for her work for the welfare of cats and kittens needing care and attention’ was held to be a valid charitable purpose by Romer J.²¹⁰ Similarly, a trust, inter alia, to ‘stimulate humane and generous sentiments in man towards lower animals’ has been upheld as a charitable purpose attached to the establishment of an animal refuge.²¹¹

However, the Court of Appeal in *Re Grove-Grady*²¹² held that a will providing for a residuary estate to be used to provide ‘refuges for the preservation of all animals or birds’ was not a charitable purpose because there was no discernible benefit to the community. In that case, Russell LJ held that there was no general rule that trusts for the preservation and care of animals would necessarily be of benefit to the community: rather, each case should be considered on its own merits.

The protection of animals could also be expressed in terms of protection of the environment (and thereby of benefit to the community)²¹³ or as an educational purpose in some circumstances. Interestingly in *Re Lopes*²¹⁴ Farwell J held that ‘a ride on an elephant may be educational’. The trouble with that statement is that it would seem to make circuses potentially charitable, particularly if linked specifically to a research or straightforwardly educational activity.

Case law on the 2006 Act

In spite of the express inclusion of a category of animal welfare in the Charities Act 2006 (now consolidated into the Charities Act 2011) for the first time, Lewison J chose to limit the future possible development of charitable animal welfare purposes in Hanchett-Stamford v Attorney-General.²¹⁵ In that case a couple had long maintained an unincorporated association (‘The Performing and Captive Animals Defence League’) which sought to achieve a change in the law so as to ban the use of performing animals: the association had been denied charitable status on the basis that it sought to effect a change in the law. Lewison J held, correctly it is suggested, that the Charities Act 2006 had not effected any change in the law on preventing charities from seeking a change in the law. In relation specifically to animal welfare, however, 207 Re Lipinski [1976] Ch 235, infra; Re Endacott [1960] Ch 232.

208 Re Wedgwood [1915] 1 Ch 113.

209 [1949] 1 All ER 495.

210 An approach applied generally in University of London v Yarrow (1857) 21 JP 596; Tatham v Drummond (1864) 4 De GJ & Sm 484; Re Douglas (1887) 35 Ch D 472; and Re Murawski's WT [1971] 2 All ER 328.

211 Re Wedgwood [1915] 1 Ch 113.

212 [1929] 1 Ch 557.

213 Re Verrall [1916] 1 Ch 100.

214 [1931] 2 Ch 130.

215 [2008] EWHC 330 (Ch), [2008] 4 All ER 323.

the claimants argued that the inclusion of the category of animal welfare into the Charities Act 2006 when taken together with the provisions of the Animal Welfare Act 2006 (which created offences of causing distress to animals) had effected a significant change in the law. Lewison J held that animal welfare purposes had been valid under the case law prior to the 2006 Act and therefore that the Act should not be interpreted as having changed the scope of that position under charities law. This is a surprisingly narrow interpretation of the legislation. It is clear that the prior case law had taken a very equivocal attitude to animal welfare whereby many purposes linked to animals had been held invalid, whereas the 2011 Act explicitly includes 'animal welfare' within the list of valid charitable purposes without any qualification: therefore, it is suggested that the purpose of the 2011 Act should be interpreted to be an intention to permit all animal welfare purposes as being valid charitable purposes beyond the limited categories which were permitted previously. To take Lewison J's position further would be to suppose that if any of the other statutory categories had been validated even partially under the old case law then the Act would not be permitted to extend in any way the categories of charitable purpose and therefore the purpose of the Act would be straightforwardly frustrated.

25.8.10 The promotion of the efficiency of the armed forces of the Crown

This category was a late addition to the legislation and covers 'the promotion of the efficiency of the armed forces of the Crown'. It had previously been the case that trusts to promote national defence through the armed forces would be considered to be for the public benefit.²¹⁶ The armed forces refer clearly to the Army, the Royal Air Force and the Royal Navy, and all attendant services. The statute focuses on the 'efficiency' specifically of these forces. This could have two senses. The first sense might include an economic measure of efficiency. The second sense could be taken to mean the 'effectiveness' of the armed forces, perhaps including activities such as the physical fitness of soldiers, or the ability of armed services personnel to use modern technology. If this second sense were taken to its extremes then it could even include the acquisition of military equipment which would make the armed services more effective or efficient. It would, however, be an odd notion of charity which extended to the acquisition of weapons.

25.8.11 The promotion of the efficiency of the police, fire rescue and ambulance services

This category covers 'the promotion of the efficiency of the police, fire rescue and ambulance services'. It had previously been the case that trusts to promote the services provided by the three emergency services were considered to be charitable.²¹⁷ The statute focuses on the 'efficiency' specifically of these forces. As with the previous provision, this could have two senses. The first sense might include an economic measure of efficiency or the ability of those services directly to carry out their functions. The second sense could be taken to mean the 'effectiveness' of these services, perhaps including activities such as the physical fitness of police officers, the ability of ambulance personnel to use modern technology, and so forth.

²¹⁶ The 'setting out of soldiers' was included in the 1601 Preamble.

²¹⁷ Re Wokingham Fire Brigade Trusts [1951] Ch 373.

Importantly the old case law had held that a trust for the recreation of police officers was not a charitable purpose.²¹⁸ It is suggested, however, that a distinction should be drawn between circumstances in which police officers are merely being provided with social club facilities such as a pool table which cannot improve the discharge of their official duties, and circumstances in which the fitness or other equipment which is being provided would enable those officers to discharge their official duties more effectively. Thus, put at its crudest, a fitter policeman is more likely, one might say, to be able to cope with arresting fit young criminals if she has fitness equipment made available to her. In that sense all of the emergency services would become more ‘efficient’ if recreational and other equipment were put at their disposal. It is in this direction which the legislation ought, it is suggested, to develop in its application.

25.8.12 Recreational charities

Introduction

Recreational charities have long been contentious in the law of charities. Under the old case law charitable status was not given to social clubs or sports clubs which did not alleviate any material lack in the lives of a section of the public. That much was outlined in relation to the new purpose of the advancement of amateur sport above, and is considered in detail in the next section. Recreational charitable purposes under s 1 of the Recreational Charities Act 1958 remain effective further to s 5 of the Charities Act 2011. Section 5 of the Charities Act 2011 makes provision for the effectiveness of some recreational purposes as charities. This part of this chapter considers the case law and then the material terms of the 1958 Act.

The old case law

In the wake of the *IRC v Baddeley*²¹⁹ decision, which held that recreation for a restricted class of people in a specific geographic area would not be charitable, the Recreational Charities Act 1958 was introduced to bring such purposes within the heads of charity. It had long been a part of the common law that a generally expressed trust for recreation would not be a charitable trust.²²⁰ Similarly in *IRC v Glasgow City Police*²²¹ it had been held that the provision of facilities for the recreation of police officers would not be a charitable purpose and that in *Williams v IRC*²²² a trust established for ‘the benefit of Welsh people resident in London’ and the development of ‘Welshness’ would not be considered to be charitable.²²³ So it has been held that ‘general welfare trusts’ seeking to provide in general terms for the welfare of the community were not charitable trusts because their purposes would be too

218 IRC v Glasgow City Police [1953] AC 380.

219 [1955] AC 572.

220 Guild v IRC [1992] 2 All ER 10, [1992] 2 AC 310, [1992] 2 WLR 397; Re South Place Ethical Society [1980] 1 WLR 1565.

221 [1953] AC 380.

222 [1947] AC 447.

223 See generally: IRC v City of Glasgow Police Athletic Association [1953] AC 380 (police efficiency); Re Wokingham Fire Brigade Trusts [1951] Ch 373 (fire brigade); Re Resch's Will Trusts [1969] 1 AC 514 (hospitals); Joseph Rowntree Memorial Trust Housing Association Ltd v Attorney-General [1983] 1 All ER 288 (special housing for the elderly).

indistinct.²²⁴ This is particularly so where the community whose welfare the purposes sought to secure was either too narrow a class or related to too limited a geographic area.²²⁵

The Recreational Charities Act 1958 established a ‘public benefit test’ to legitimise recreational charities as charitable trusts.²²⁶ However, the facilities must be provided with the intention of improving the conditions of life of the person benefiting.²²⁷ There are two further, alternative requirements that either²²⁸ those persons must have a need of those facilities on grounds of their social and economic circumstances or that the facilities will be available to both men and women in the public at large.²²⁹ Section 5 of the 2011 Act, re-enacting in substantially similar language the provisions of the 1958 Act, provides that:

- (1) It is charitable (and is to be treated as always having been charitable) to provide, or assist in the provision of, facilities for
 - (a) recreation, or
 - (b) other leisure-time occupation,if the facilities are provided in the interests of social welfare.
- (2) The requirement that the facilities are provided in the interests of social welfare cannot be satisfied if the basic conditions are not met.
- (3) The basic conditions are –
 - (a) that the facilities are provided with the object of improving the conditions of life for the persons for whom the facilities are primarily intended, and
 - (b) that –
 - (i) those persons have need of the facilities because of their youth, age, infirmity or disability, poverty, or social and economic circumstances, or
 - (ii) the facilities are available to members of the public at large or to male, or to female, members of the public at large.

Thus it is a charitable purpose under the Act to provide recreational facilities provided that those facilities both improve the ‘conditions of life’ of those who will use them and that the facilities are generally available to the public or they are needed by certain people who will use them because of their youth or disability and so forth. On a lenient interpretation it could be said that improving the conditions of someone’s life might include simply providing recreational facilities which otherwise they did not have; or else one could take a restrictive view that one must be suffering from some lack or poverty and that the mere provision of recreational facilities will not necessarily be making good such lack or poverty and so should not be protected by the Act. In explaining the ambit of the 1958 Act, the majority of the House of Lords in *IRC v McMullen*²³⁰ held that it was only if the persons standing to benefit from the trust were in some way deprived at the outset that their conditions of life could be said to have been improved. Therefore, their Lordships took the more restrictive view of the Act. On the facts of that case the promotion of 224 Attorney-General Cayman Islands v Wahr-Hansen [2000] 3 All ER 642, HL.

225 Ibid.

226 Recreational Charities Act 1958, s 1(1).

227 Ibid., s 1(2)(a).

228 Ibid., s 1(2)(b)(i).

229 Ibid., s 1(2)(b)(ii).

230 [1981] AC 1.

the playing of organised football among young people by the Football Association, by providing facilities for the playing of football by people at school or university, could not be said to 'improve the conditions of life' of the persons who would benefit because it would not remedy any identifiable deprivation in those people.²³¹ The minority were of the view that the test ought to be relaxed so that a very broad interpretation could be given to social and economic circumstances requisite for the application of the 1958 Act: effectively the lenient view set out above. The minority would have allowed this promotional activity to be validated by the 1958 Act. If these activities were carried on in a school then they would be valid as an educational charity.

A more liberal interpretation was taken by a differently constituted House of Lords in *Guild v IRC*²³² in relation to a bequest 'to the town council of North Berwick for the use in connection with the sports centre in North Berwick or some similar purpose in connection with sport'. It was accepted that this sports centre would be available to the general public as required by s 1(2)(b) of the Act. The principal question was whether or not this sports centre could be said to be connected with 'social welfare' as required by s 1(1) of the Act (now s 5(2)). Lord Keith made it plain that he was prepared to adopt a 'benignant construction' of the bequest in this case. It was a bequest which demonstrated that the testator's intention was to benefit a sports centre the facilities of which were available to the public at large. Consequently, it was held that this constituted a valid charitable purpose under s 1(1) and (2) of the 1958 Act.

To reinforce the status of charities as welfare trusts, there is a specific provision in s 2 of the 1958 Act which provides for the validity as charitable trusts of trusts provided for the social welfare activities set out in the Miners' Welfare Act 1952, which relates to miners' welfare funds. Those trusts must have been declared before 17 December 1957. Otherwise, such a fund would not necessarily have been a charitable purpose given the nexus between the members and the possibility that the fund was a mutual fund organised on the basis of contract rather than as a charity.

The effect of s 5 of the Charities Act 2011

Section 5(2) of the Charities Act 2011 introduces two 'basic conditions' to the Recreational Charities Act 1958, namely that the recreational facilities must be provided on the same terms as under s 1(2) of the 1958 Act as previously in effect, except that the material in paragraphs (a) and (b) are now pre-conditions for the validity of the charitable purpose. What has not been dealt with in the 2011 Act is the restrictive interpretation which has been put on the 1958 Act by the House of Lords in IRC v McMullen, as considered in the previous section.

25.9 CY-PRÈS DOCTRINE

The cy-près doctrine gives the courts a power to re-constitute the settlor's charitable intentions so as to benefit charity if the original purposes cannot be achieved, for whatever reason. The Charities Act 1960 (as amended in 1993) provided for broader powers

231 By extrapolation from the London Welsh case, then, the establishment of a 'London Scottish' centre for the recreation of Scottish people living in London could not be said to 'improve the conditions of life' of the persons who would benefit because it would not remedy any identifiable deprivation in those people in spite of the passage of the Act.

232 [1992] 2 AC 310, [1992] 2 All ER 10.

to apply property cy-près than was available under the case law. Those principles are now consolidated in s 61 et seq of the Charities Act 2011. The case law itself drew a distinction between impossibility of achieving those objectives before the trust came into effect, and impossibility arising at a later date.

The central difference between public charitable trusts and express private trusts is exemplified by the cy-près doctrine. As considered in Chapter 3 the certainties requirements for express private trusts are extremely stringent. A failure to satisfy these requirements leads to the invalidity of the trust. Where the objects of an express private trust are uncertain, the trust will be void. In relation to a charitable trust, however, where the charitable objects do not exist or are uncertain, the court has the power to order an application of the trust fund for alternative charitable purposes which are in accordance with the settlor's underlying intentions. This alternative application is referred to as the cy-près doctrine.²³³

25.9.1 The case law position

Before the enactment of the Charities Act 1960 the case law provided that the cy-près doctrine could only be invoked if it was either impossible or impracticable to perform the purposes of the trust. The aim of the 1960 Act was to widen the powers of the court to reconstitute a charitable trust if its terms were merely inconvenient or unsuitable, as opposed to being genuinely impossible. Those principles now appear in Part 6 of the Charities Act 2011.

Impossibility at the commencement of trust

If the trust is impossible to perform from the outset, the property settled on trust passes on resulting trust back to the settlor's estate.²³⁴ In Re Rymer,²³⁵ a legacy to the rector of an identified seminary from time to time failed when the seminary ceased to exist. It was held that the bequest was so specific to that seminary that it did not disclose a general charitable intention. A further example is found in Re Good's Will Trusts,²³⁶ in which the settlor intended the erection of rest homes on identified land but that specific land could not be acquired: no general charitable intention could be found beyond the building of the specific rest homes on that site. Where the specified charity or object existed at the time of the creation of the trust, it is frequently held that the settlor did not intend there to be a general charitable intention.²³⁷

An exception to this general rule would apply where the trust disclosed a general charitable intention beyond an intention merely to benefit the identified charity. In *Biscoe v Jackson*²³⁸ the settlor sought to create a soup kitchen 'in the parish of Shoreditch . . . and a cottage hospital'. When the intended land could not be acquired, the Court of Appeal held that 233 Mulheron, 2005.

234 Re Rymer [1895] 1 Ch 19; Re Wilson [1913] 1 Ch 314; Re Packe [1918] 1 Ch 437. Cf Bath and Wells Diocesan Board of Finance v Jenkinson (2000) The Times, 6 September.

235 [1895] 1 Ch 19.

236 [1950] 2 All ER 653.

237 Re Davis [1902] 1 Ch 876.

238 (1887) 35 Ch D 460.

the settlor had disclosed a general charitable intention such that the fund could be applied cy-près. In such cases where no specific charity is identified or where there is a long list of potential charities, then the courts are more likely to find that there was a general charitable intention beyond the benefit of any one charity.²³⁹ So in *Re Harwood*²⁴⁰ it was considered by Farwell J that where there was a specific charity identified by the settlor that would mitigate against the finding of a general charitable intention, whereas the cy-près doctrine would be applied where the settlor had prepared a long list of possible charities without demonstrating a clear intention to benefit only particular charities.²⁴¹ A gift for an identified purpose (rather than for a particular existing, charitable institution) follows similar principles²⁴² – although, logically, it could be said a trust for a general purpose (for example, ‘the relief of poverty in the East End of London’) is more likely to disclose a general charitable intention than a trust provision for an identified charitable organisation (for example, ‘for the homelessness charity Shelter’).

Alternatively, the charity may have continued in another form and so the courts may apply the cy-près doctrine to benefit the successor entity.²⁴³ A distinction is drawn on the cases between unincorporated and incorporated charities. Transfers to unincorporated charities (such as unincorporated associations or purpose trusts) will generally constitute a purpose trust and be capable of being applied cy-près,²⁴⁴ whereas a transfer to an incorporated entity (such as a company) will not necessarily constitute a general charitable intention where that specific entity is identified by the settlor.²⁴⁵

Where the gift was intended for an organisation which was not a charity there will not usually be a cy-près application for charitable purposes. So in *Re Jenkin’s WT*²⁴⁶ a settlor sought to create a trust for the benefit of an anti-vivisection charity which was not a charitable purpose. A decision indicating the pragmatism of the courts on this basis was that in *Re Satterthwaite’s WT*²⁴⁷ in which an excitable testator declared that she hated the entire human race and so sought to benefit in her will only animal charities which she plucked at random from a telephone directory. Of the nine bequests made, none were to identified charities and one was to an anti-vivisection society (which was not a charitable purpose). The Court of Appeal held that eight-ninths of the testatrix’s estate could be applied cy-près to animal hospitals and to animal charities, and that only the ninth which had been intended to pass to the non-charitable purpose would lapse into residue.²⁴⁸

239 Re Davis [1902] 1 Ch 876.

240 [1936] Ch 285.

241 Re Stimson’s WT (1970).

242 Re Spence [1979] Ch 483.

243 Re Faraker [1912] 2 Ch 488; Re Finger’s WT [1972] 1 Ch 286.

244 Re Vernon WT [1972] Ch 300.

245 Re Harwood [1936] Ch 285; Re Meyers [1951] Ch 534; Re Finger’s WT [1972] 1 Ch 286.

246 [1966] Ch 249.

247 [1966] 1 WLR 277.

248 In Catholic Care v Charity Commission [2010] 4 All ER 1041 the Charity Commission refused to consent to a change of objects (ie the purposes for which the charity had been created) by a charity which acted as an adoption agency and which provided support to adoptive parents on the basis that the charity wanted only to offer support to heterosexual couples. This proposed change of objects was refused, inter alia, on the basis of the principle against discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation in the provision of services further to the Equality Act (Sexual Orientation) Regulations 2007 which were made further to the Equality Act 2006. Briggs J considered the role of reg 18 of those regulations in providing an exemption for charities from the requirements of the regulations, and ultimately remitted the matter to the Commission to decide on the appropriateness of this proposed amendment in this context.

Impossibility after the commencement of the trust

Different principles apply if the charitable purpose fails after the trust has come into operation – that is, from the date of its operation rather than the date of its declaration. There are two possibilities for cy-près distribution. First, on the basis that the settlor had a general charitable intention.²⁴⁹ In the event that the settlor intended to benefit a specific, existing charity this means of distribution will not be available to the court. This principle is in line with the discussion of these questions in the previous section.

Second, on the basis that property had passed to a charity before its ceasing to exist, whether or not it has been benefited as a specifically named institution without a general charitable intention as considered above, there may be grounds for cy-près distribution in any event. The question in relation to this latter example is whether the property has passed effectively to a named charity so as to have become the property of that charity requiring cy-près application. So, for example, where a testator left a specific pecuniary legacy to an orphanage which was in existence at the date of declaration of the trust, but which ceased to exist just after the testator's death but before the legacy could be paid to it, it was held that this legacy could be applied cy-près because it became on the testator's death the property of the orphanage and with the dissolution of the orphanage that property fell to be distributed by the Crown for some analogous purpose.²⁵⁰ The power of the Crown to divide such property for analogous purposes in relation to charities which have ceased to exist was contained in older cases such as *Attorney-General v Ironmongers' Co*²⁵¹ and Wilson v Barnes.²⁵² This thinking was applied in *Re Wright*²⁵³ where the application of funds to the construction of a convalescent home became impracticable but it was unclear whether the test for impracticability applied at the date of the testatrix's death or at the date at which the funds were available: it was held that the applicable date was the date of the testatrix's death.

25.9.2 Exclusivity of purpose

It is required that the underlying purpose of the settlor was exclusively charitable, as can be seen from cases like Chichester Diocesan Fund v Simpson.²⁵⁴ In relation to finding a charitable purpose this is a pre-requisite of deciding that a purpose is charitable – as considered above. That requirement of charitable purpose is equally important in relation to the operation of the cy-près doctrine. The courts will, in certain circumstances, give a permissive interpretation to trusts where the issue is as to the charitable status of that trust. In Simpson the testator left property for 'charitable or benevolent purposes'. The word 'benevolent' was held not to be a synonym for the technical term 'charitable' and therefore it was held that the testator had not evidenced an unequivocal intention to settle property on exclusively charitable purposes. However, in Guild v IRC the House of Lords held that the words 'some 249 Re Slevin [1891] 2 Ch 236, infra; Re King [1923] 1 Ch 243.

250 Re Slevin [1891] 2 Ch 236.

251 (1834) 2 My & K 526.

252 (1886) 38 Ch D 507.

253 [1954] Ch 347.

254 [1944] AC 341.

similar purpose in connection with sport' in a settlement could be interpreted as connoting a charitable intention on the part of the settlor.²⁵⁵

Alternatively, it is open to the court to apportion a trust fund between valid charitable purposes and other objects. It is possible that non-charitable objects will fail but that the charitable objects will be severed from those other provisions and validated separately, as was held in Re Clarke.²⁵⁶ This division may take place even if the settlor had not expressed a division of the property. The division between the potential beneficiaries in this context is affected on the basis that 'equality is equity' and that therefore each of those objects should take the property in equal amounts.²⁵⁷ However, where it is impossible to separate property between valid charitable trusts objects and other, invalid objects, then the whole trust must fail.²⁵⁸

25.9.3 The mechanics of the cy-près doctrine under statute

The provisions in outline

The Charities Act 1960 sought, inter alia, to expand the operation of the cy-près doctrine: the provisions of the 1960 Act have been re-enacted in the Charities Act 2011, Part 6. The principal change was to extend the operation of the doctrine beyond requirements of mere impossibility or impracticability into other situations in which the trustees may prefer to apply the funds for other (charitable) purposes than those identified by the settlor.

The key provision in this context is s 62 of the Charities Act 2011 which sets out the following situations in which a cy-près application can be made. They are as follows:

- (1) it must be demonstrated that there is a general charitable intention; and either
- (2) where the purposes have been 'as far as may be fulfilled';
- (3) where the purposes cannot be carried out as directed or within the spirit of the gift;
- (4) where the purpose provides a use for only part of the gift;
- (5) where the property can be more usefully applied along with other property applied for similar purposes;
- (6) where the area of the original purpose is no more; or
- (7) where the original purposes are adequately provided-for purposes such as statutory services, or are harmful to the community, or useless to the community, or are no longer an effective use of the property.

Attention must also be paid to the spirit of the gift and to the social and economic circumstances at the time of altering the purposes of the trust when making the decision about a cy-près application.²⁵⁹

255 Guild v IRC [1992] 2 AC 310.

256 [1923] 2 Ch 407.

257 Salisbury v Denton (1857) 3 K & J 529; Re Douglas (1887) 35 Ch D 472.

258 Re Coxen [1948] Ch 747.

259 Charities Act 2011, ss 61 and 62.

The detail of the provisions

To take each of these provisions in turn. First, it remains a requirement that the settlor's intention be generally charitable beyond an intention to benefit only a single, named institution as considered above.

Second, where the purposes have been 'as far as may be fulfilled'.²⁶⁰ This builds on case law dating before the 1960 legislation in which it was found that the purposes for which the charitable trust was created no longer continued in existence. For example, it was considered that there were no more 'infidels' in Virginia requiring conversion to Christianity in *Attorney-General v City of London*²⁶¹ and that there were no more slaves in Turkey requiring redemption in Ironmongers' Co v Attorney-General.²⁶² In both cases the funds were applied cy-près. More generally this will apply to circumstances in which the original charitable objectives have no further use of the funds to achieve the purposes set out in the trust.

Third, where the purposes cannot be carried out as directed or within the spirit of the gift.²⁶³ Considering older authorities, whether or not the spirit of the gift can be carried out will depend upon the context. So in *Re Robinson*²⁶⁴ it was held that a stipulation that a preacher wear a particular item of clothing (a black gown) while preaching would alienate the congregation and thus defeat the core objective of bringing people into the congregation. A slightly wider approach was taken in Re Dominion Students' Hall Trusts.²⁶⁵ In which a charitable company was established to create and maintain a hostel for students in London. It was a part of that company's objects that non-white students be excluded from the hostel. It was held by Evershed J that this provision should be deleted – a decision, again, on the case law requirement of impossibility which was more stringent even than the statutory code. *Re Lysaght*²⁶⁶ considered a similar point to *Re Dominion Students' Hall*²⁶⁷ when a testatrix provided for a bequest in favour of the Royal College of Surgeons which that College sought to repudiate on the basis that it contained a proviso that no funds be applied for the benefit of women, Jews or Catholics.²⁶⁸ Buckley J approved a deletion of that paragraph which both achieved the settlor's underlying objectives while also placating the College. It has been held that the court is entitled to alter the size of payments made under a trust.²⁶⁹

Fourth, where the purpose provides a use for only part of the gift.²⁷⁰ In this situation, where the purposes expressed by the settlor will only find a use for a part of the gift and leave a surplus, the court may choose to apply the surplus cy-près for similar charitable purposes (an idea accepted in the case law in Re North Devon and West Somerset Relief Fund).²⁷¹

260 Charities Act 2011, s 62(1)(a)(i).

261 (1790) 3 Bro CC 121.

262 (1844) 10 Cl & F 908.

263 Charities Act 2011, s 62(1)(a)(ii).

264 [1921] 2 Ch 332.

265 [1947] Ch 183.

266 [1966] 1 Ch 191.

267 [1947] Ch 183.

268 Remarkably, however, the court objected only on the basis that the purpose discriminated against Jews and Catholics but voiced no objection to the discrimination against women.

269 Re Lepton's Charity [1972] Ch 276.

270 Charities Act 2011, s 62(1)(b).

271 [1953] 1 WLR 1260.

Fifth, where the property can be more usefully applied together with ‘other property applicable similar purposes can be more effectively used in conjunction and to that end can suitably, regard being had to the spirit of the gift, be made applicable to common purposes’.²⁷² The question of amalgamation of one fund with another fund to achieve common charitable purposes was accepted in principle in Re Harvey.²⁷³ In general terms, this provision will permit such an amalgamation of funds where both the charitable objectives are sufficiently similar and the amalgamation of those funds will be more effective than the status quo.

Sixth, ‘where the original purposes were laid down by reference to an area which then was but has since ceased to be a unit for some other purpose, or by reference to a class of persons or to an area which has for any reason since ceased to be suitable, regard being had to the spirit of the gift, or to be practical in administering the gift’.²⁷⁴ In short, if the underlying rationale for the original purpose has ceased to exist, then this ground for the use of the cy-près doctrine may be applicable. It is sufficient that the area has ceased to be ‘suitable’ – which involves a potentially broader category of circumstances including a decision by the trustees that the continued application of the funds for the identified purpose is no longer in accordance with the spirit of the settlor’s intention. So in *Peggs v Lamb*²⁷⁵ it was held that there be an amendment of the class of persons entitled to benefit from the work of a charity in circumstances in which the potential class of persons benefiting had dwindled to 15 and their income from the charitable bequest had risen far in excess of the testator’s original intention.

Seventh, a more general provision justifying cy-près application on the following bases: where the original purposes are adequately provided for by other means, or where those purposes are adequately provided for by statutory or governmental services, or are harmful to the community, or useless to the community, or are no longer an effective use of the pro-perty.²⁷⁶ In relation to services already provided, there is an explicit understanding that the voluntary, third sector will often mimic the work of the welfare state and that such duplication would not be a useful application of charitable funds. Rather, it would be better to use those funds for purposes not provided for by the state. In all circumstances, the cy-près application is required to refer to the original spirit of the gift²⁷⁷ as applied by the trustees from time to time.²⁷⁸ For example, the ‘original purposes’ of a trust may be altered from the provision of specified playing fields to enable trustees to sell those playing fields to acquire better facilities for a similar charitable purpose.²⁷⁹ Such a cy-près application will more generally be denied where the proposed scheme is contrary to the ‘original purposes’ of the charitable trust.²⁸⁰

272 Charities Act 2011, s 62(1)(c).

273 [1941] 3 All ER 284.

274 Charities Act 2011, s 62(1)(d).

275 [1994] Ch 172.

276 Charities Act 2011, s 62(1)(e).

277 Ibid, s 62(1)(e)(iii).

278 Ibid, s 62(3).

279 Oldham Borough Council v Attorney-General [1993] Ch 210.

280 Re JW Laing Trust [1984] Ch 143.

Problems with the identification of the alternative charity

It can be a difficult question to know whether a cy-près application should be required to pursue the goals of the settlor or whether the court should simply seek to identify a similar charitable purpose in the abstract, regardless of the precise personal attitudes of the settlor. So, in *Kings v Bultitude*²⁸¹ a testatrix made a bequest in favour of a particular religious charity which was a splinter organisation from the Roman Catholic Church. She had devoted a large amount of her life to that organisation, even conducting its religious services after her husband's death (where he had previously served as its primate). After her death, however, the organisation disbanded. When that organisation ceased to exist the question arose as to whether or not the bequest could be applied cy-près to other religious charitable purposes. Proudman J found that the testatrix had not had a general charitable intention but rather only an intention to benefit that particular organisation, and therefore the bequest could not be applied cy-près. Clearly, Proudman J was motivated by the clear objectives of the testatrix in leaving money to that specific organisation to which she had devoted so much of her time and energy.

By contrast, in *White v Williams*²⁸² Briggs J considered an application to apply property (in the form of one of three buildings used for worship) from one moribund religious order, BT, cy-près for the purposes of another order (BC UK) from which BT had split previously. The trustees of BT considered that an application of the property for the purposes of BC UK would be an application for essentially the same religious purposes as BT (in the sense that their religious beliefs were in common) in spite of the earlier split between those organisations. Therefore, Briggs J allowed the cy-près application.²⁸³ At one level it could have been said that when these organisations (indeed, the people who made up the congregations for each church) had split one from another then that might have led to the same conclusion as in Kings v Bultitude. However, Briggs J looked more generally at the abstract charitable purposes of the congregations and saw a continuity of purpose in the second organisation which had previously been joined to the moribund organisation which had received the bequest and which served the same community in Lewisham in south London. Finding a continuity of purpose in White v Williams, where in Kings v Bultitude the congregation had simply dissolved away, appears to be the key difference on the facts, although there is also a difference of principle here.

Application cy-près where the objects fail

Under s 63 of the 2011 Act, where property is given for specific charitable purposes which fail, there may be a cy-près application where the settlement was made either by a donor who cannot be found or by a donor who executed a written disclaimer of his rights. This section therefore provides for a general power in the court to order cy-près applications of property if the trusts have straightforwardly failed. The spectre of the settlor's intention hangs heavily over this area – even though the role of the cy-près doctrine is to subvert that intention. What is important to note is that a specific doctrine is needed to carry out that subversion and also

281 [2010] EWHC 1795 (Ch).

282 [2010] EWHC 940 (Ch).

283 Cf Varsani v Jesani [1998] 3 All ER 273.

that the settlor must have had a charitable intention at the outset before this doctrine could apply: the words of the settlor ring on. Section 63 supplements the position in circumstances in which the settlor is effectively no longer in existence (either through death, absence, or repudiation of responsibility) and replaces the role of the settlor to some extent by precluding any notion of resulting trust. Once the money is in the charitable sector, the cy-près doctrine keeps it there.

Small charities

There were also statutory provisions in the Charities Act 1993 dealing with charities which had an annual turnover (that is, gross income) of less than £5,000 and which did not hold land as part of their assets. The trustees of such charities could resolve that the assets of their charity were transferred to another charity (or be divided between other charities) or that the purposes of the charity were altered to other charitable purposes.²⁸⁴ Similarly, in relation to charities which were organised as endowments (that is, funds whose capital is required to be kept intact and used solely to generate income) but whose capital generated less than £1,000 in any given financial year, the trustees were empowered to resolve that the restriction in the charity's constitutive documents dealing with the treatment of the capital be altered.²⁸⁵ Section 75 contained no provision as to the alternate purpose at which those capital assets must be directed; s 74 contained no requirement that the transferee charity be carrying on a similar charitable purpose – although it had to be carrying on a charitable purpose of some kind.

The future for the cy-près doctrine

In her book on this topic, Prof Mulheron suggests that the cy-près doctrine could have a more general application in relation to the validation of non-charitable purpose trusts than being restricted to the law of charities as it is at present.²⁸⁶ It is suggested that many void private trusts could usefully be maintained if the courts were able to order the application of the trust property for equivalent purposes so as to make them valid. Of course, as was considered in sections 4.2.3 and 4.2.4 in relation to cases such as Re Barlow,²⁸⁷ *Re Denley*²⁸⁸ and Re Lipinski,²⁸⁹ it often happens that judges seek to give effect to the settlor's true intentions by means of benignant constructions of the trust instrument. For example, in Re Barlow's WT Browne-Wilkinson J was prepared to permit the trustees to carry out a bequest (which might otherwise have been void for uncertainty of objects) partly on the basis of proposed scheme of distribution which his Lordship considered would give effect to the spirit of the testator's intentions.²⁹⁰ It could be said that this operates as a sort of distant cousin to the cy-près doctrine in private law terms in that the precise words used by the settlor are interpreted by the court so as to achieve an equivalent result which is valid under private 284 Charities Act 1993, s 74.

285 Ibid, s 75.

286 R Mulheron, The Modern Cy-près Doctrine, UCL Press, 2006, Chapter 6 and Chapter 10.

287 [1979] 1 WLR 278.

288 [1969] 1 Ch 373.

289 [1976] Ch 235.

290 Otherwise, his Lordship was also prepared to give effect to this bequest by interpreting it to be a gift as opposed to a trust.

trusts law. While the cy-près doctrine has always been limited to the law of charities in England and Wales there is no reason why an expansion of the doctrine, if thought desirable in the manner in which Prof Mulheron makes clear in Chapter 10 of her book,²⁹¹ should be considered impossible in perpetuity.

25.10 THE REGULATION OF CHARITIES

Charities are regulated by The Charity Commission,²⁹² which maintains the register of charities.²⁹³ Mindful of the intermittent concerns expressed about the abuse of charities, The Charity Commission has five key objectives:²⁹⁴

- (1) The public confidence objective is to increase public trust and confidence in charities.
- (2) The public benefit objective is to promote awareness and understanding of the operation of the public benefit requirement.
- (3) The compliance objective is to increase compliance by charity trustee with their legal obligations in exercising control and management of the administration of their charities.
- (4) The charitable resources objective is to promote the effective use of charitable resources.
- (5) The accountability objective is to enhance the accountability of charities to donors, beneficiaries and the general public.

These regulatory objectives do not create legal rights in the hands of the people who are mentioned in the text of the objectives, but rather anticipate that The Charity Commission will consider the interests of those people when exercising their regulatory function. The general functions of the Commission are then to decide whether or not purposes are charitable, to encourage better administration of charities, to investigate mismanagement in the administration of charities, to determine the suitability of public collections certificates, and to disseminate information about its activities and to advise government ministers.²⁹⁵ A Charity Appeal Tribunal has been created in relation to the activities and decisions of the Commission, with appeal to the High Court.²⁹⁶

There are detailed alterations made to the administration of charities. Changes are to be made to the cy-près doctrine to the effect that the Commission must bear in mind the spirit of the original gift, the desirability of applying the gift for purposes similar to the original purpose, and the need for the charity to be able to make a significant social or economic impact.²⁹⁷ Changes are also to be made to the removal of the trustees of charities²⁹⁸ and the power of the Commission to direct the application of the charities' property.²⁹⁹

291 R Mulheron, The Modern Cy-près Doctrine, UCL Press, 2006, 304 et seq.

292 Charities Act 2011, ss 13–16.

293 Ibid, s 29.

294 Ibid, s 14.

295 Charities Act 2011, s 14.

296 Ibid, s 315.

297 Ibid, s 61.

298 Ibid, s 76 et seq.

299 Ibid, ss 69 et seq.

25.11 A BRIEF SURVEY OF THE PUBLIC BENEFIT TEST IN THE LAW OF CHARITIES

This short section considers the extent of the notion of public benefit in the law of charities. It is suggested that, prior to the enactment of the Charities Act 2011, it was a rule honoured more in the breach than in the observance, unless the settlors were seeking to use their charity solely or primarily for the avoidance of tax. As was suggested in the final part of section 25.1 above, there are two lines of authority in relation to ‘public benefit’. On the one hand we have the Re Compton line of cases which require that there must be no personal nexus between the people who will benefit from the charitable trust and the settlor of that trust. Thus, the benefit must be available to a sufficiently large section of the public outwith any direct connection to the settlor. This, it is suggested, does not tell us much about the nature of the trust – it only tells us that the settlor must be acting selflessly in the provision of some communal benefit. This brings us neatly to the alternative line of authority, that propounded by Lord Cross in Dingle v Turner. His Lordship identified a number of shortcomings with the Compton approach. First, that approach is predicated on cases which were attempting to avoid tax by means of applying the benefit of the trust to a narrow group of people. This means that the approach of those courts was necessarily skewed towards seeking an open-ended public benefit. Secondly, the Compton approach requires that a large section of the public be able to take a benefit even if the funds which are to be raised by charity are likely to be small and so no general benefit of this sort can be attained. Suppose a charity for sufferers from a particularly rare disease. The people who will take a benefit may be small, even if the benefit stemming from the charity may be theoretically available to the entire population. Thirdly, Lord Cross identified a logical problem with the Compton test to the effect that there may be a nexus between the settlor and those who will take a benefit, but nevertheless the number of people who will take a benefit would be a sufficiently large section of the population. For example, the largest employer of non-skilled labour in the country is the Post Office: a trust for the benefit of the employees of the Post Office would be of benefit to a significant proportion of the population but a literal application of the Compton test would find that that trust was void. Similarly, the expression used in Oppenheim, that the class of people taking a benefit be ‘more than a mere fluctuating body of private individuals’, would itself be a description of the entire general public: the general public is a fluctuating body of private individuals. So the Compton test tells us nothing. The core point instead, as suggested by Lord Cross, is that there must be some genuine charitable intention on the part of the settlor. Thus trusts for the relief of poverty may be valid, even if there are only a few people who will take a benefit from the trust, provided that there is a genuine intention to relieve poverty. As the distinction between these two approaches was expressed above: Lord Cross’s approach requires that there is something intrinsically charitable in the creation of a trust, compared with the Compton approach which is concerned with a merely evidential question of demonstrating that there is a predominantly public rather than a private benefit in the purposes of that particular trust. The former approach considers the intrinsic merits of the trust purpose which is proposed; whereas the latter looks instead to see how the trustees are actually running the trust and whether or not the practical approach achieves suitably public, charitable effects.

There are two other doctrines which have an effect on the free operation of the Compton test as applied to all charities other than charities for the relief of poverty. First, the intention disclosed in Re Hetherington and in Guild v IRC to validate genuine charitable intentions wherever possible, even if that means effectively altering the purpose of the trust or requiring the trustees to undertake to manage the trust in accordance with the court's directions so as to make it compliant with charities law. Thus a trust need not be drafted so as to disclose a public benefit because the court may well order that the trust be performed in a compliant manner. Thus trusts such as that in Re Koettgen may be validated for tax purposes to the extent that they were operated in compliance with charities law. Secondly, the cy-près doctrine enables the court to give effect to otherwise invalid or impossible purposes and thus, again, validates a trust which is performed in accordance with charities law. On the one hand it could be said that these two doctrines enhance the public benefit requirement by interpreting trust powers so as to fit in with charities law; on the other hand they tend to show that a settlor need not have drafted a charitable purpose which was compliant with the public benefit because the court will find a way to render it valid wherever possible. What these two doctrines illustrate is that, for all the apparent rigidity of the Compton test, the law of charities operates on a far more flexible basis. The basis for this flexibility is the general understanding that charities are a good thing, and that in consequence a genuinely charitable intention should be supported wherever possible.

Part 9

Equitable remedies

This page intentionally left blank

Specific performance

26.1	THE NATURE OF SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE	1172
26.1.1	Introduction	1172
26.1.2	Specific performance acts in personam	1172
26.1.3	No requirement of breach	1173
26.2	CONTRACTS WHERE SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE IS AVAILABLE	1173
26.2.1	Specific performance in relation to land	1173
26.2.2	Specific performance in relation to chattels	1174
26.3	CONTRACTS WHERE SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE IS UNAVAILABLE	1175
26.3.1	Illegal or immoral contracts	1175
26.3.2	No consideration	1175
26.3.3	Contracts involving personal skill	1176
26.3.4	Specific performance in money transactions	1176
26.3.5	Contracts for insubstantial interests	1177
26.3.6	Contracts requiring supervision	1178
26.3.7	Contracts not mutually binding	1179
26.4	DEFENCES TO A CLAIM FOR SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE	1179
26.4.1	No enforceable contract	1179
26.4.2	Absence of writing	1179
26.4.3	Misrepresentation	1180
26.4.4	Undue influence and unconscionable bargains	1180
26.4.5	Mistake	1181
26.4.6	Lapse of time	1182
26.4.7	Damages in lieu of specific performance	1182

OVERVIEW

Specific performance operates in personam by imposing a personal obligation on the defendant to perform specific contractual obligations. It is not necessary for there to have been a pre-existing breach of contract for the award of an order for specific performance.

Specific performance will be available in relation to contracts where the particular subject matter of the contract has some significance. Therefore, a contract for the sale of particular parcel of land will be specifically enforceable. Such an order will be made in relation to chattels only where a particularly significant chattel, which is not reasonably capable of being substituted with another chattel, is concerned.

Specific performance will typically not be available in circumstances where the contract is illegal or immoral; where there is no consideration; where the contract involves the exercise of some particular skill by the defendant (on grounds that the court could not administer such performance); where the contract involves mere payment of money (on grounds that common law damages would be sufficient remedy); where the contract is for an insubstantial interest; where the contract requires supervision; or where the contract is not mutually binding.

Defences to specific performance include: lack of an enforceable contract; absence of some formality; misrepresentation; undue influence or unconscionable bargain; mistake; lapse of time; or sufficiency of damages as a remedy.

26.1 THE NATURE OF SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE

26.1.1 Introduction

Specific performance is an equitable remedy in relation to the enforcement of contracts. An award of specific performance compels the defendant to perform her contractual obligations. As with all equitable remedies, its award depends on common law remedies, such as an award of damages, being insufficient in the circumstances.¹ The role of specific performance as a residual, discretionary remedy applied where damages are inappropriate was explained by Lord Hoffmann in Cooperative Insurance v Argyll:²

Specific performance is traditionally regarded in English law as an exceptional remedy, as opposed to the common law remedy of damages to which a successful plaintiff is entitled as of right . . . specific performance was part of the discretionary jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery to do justice in cases in which the remedies available at common law were inadequate.

Specific performance relates to the performance of contracts. As considered below, the aim of the remedy is to require the parties to carry out their contractual obligations. The remedy is in the discretion of the court and may be displaced in situations in which such performance is impracticable, or in relation to specified categories of contract set out below.

26.1.2 Specific performance acts in personam

As considered in Chapter 1, equity acts in personam in the sense that an order made by a Court of Equity is made in respect of a particular person in relation to some factor which is said to affect that person's conscience. Therefore, an award of specific performance operates on that person as an order made, originally, by the Lord Chancellor requiring that person to act.

1 Wilson Northampton and Banbury Junction Railway Co (1874) 9 Ch App 279.

2 [1997] 3 All ER 297, [1998] AC 1.

Furthermore, the equitable remedy is discretionary. Equity operates in contradistinction to the common law, where the common law will enable a claimant to enforce her rights regardless of the justice of the situation. This also means, however, that a court of equity will not award specific performance in favour of those who have committed fraud or equitable wrongs (that is, those who have come to equity with unclean hands), or to those who have delayed before bringing a claim for specific performance, or to those whose consciences have been adversely affected. In this sense, specific performance falls into line with constructive trust, rescission and injunctions (considered elsewhere in this book) as a truly equitable remedy. To this extent, the defences considered in section 26.4 illustrate the contexts in which the courts will refuse to exercise their discretion to make an award for specific performance.

26.1.3 No requirement of breach

It is important to note that specific performance is an order which is made to require the performance of contractual obligations in certain circumstances. Consequently, the order requires only the performance of those obligations and does not rest on there having been some breach of contract, for example a transgression of an obligation not to perform some act.

26.2 CONTRACTS WHERE SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE IS AVAILABLE

Specific performance will be available in relation to contracts where the particular subject matter of the contract has some significance. Therefore, a contract for the sale of particular parcel of land will be specifically enforceable. Such an order will be made in relation to chattels only where a particularly significant chattel, which is not reasonably capable of being substituted with another chattel, is concerned.

For specific performance to be ordered, it is necessary that the circumstances of the contract require the performance of the particular contractual obligation as opposed to a mere payment of money damages. As will be seen below, the situations in which specific performance will not be ordered divide into two broad categories: cases in which payment of cash damages would be sufficient compensation for non-performance of the bargain; and cases in which the nature of the contract would make it impossible for the court to supervise performance of the obligation.

26.2.1 Specific performance in relation to land

The underlying principle in relation to real property is that each parcel of land is unique, so that an award of damages would be insufficient compensation for a failure to transfer a specified piece of land.³ Therefore, the buyer of land may be able to impose an award of specific performance on the seller to compel the transfer of land as required by the terms of the contract. However, for the seller of land, damages will generally be adequate compensation when all that the seller sought from the contract was a cash payment in any event.

3 Sudbrook Trading Estate Ltd v Eggleton [1983] 1 AC 444.

As Sir John Leach VC held in Adderley v Dixon:⁴

Courts of Equity decree the specific performance of contracts not upon any distinction between realty and personalty, but because damages at law may not in the particular case afford a complete remedy. Thus a Court of Equity decrees performance of a contract for land, not because of the real nature of the land, but because damages at law, which must be calculated upon the general money value of land, may not be a complete remedy to the purchaser to whom the land may have a peculiar and special value.

In accordance with this determination that specific performance will not depend on any difference between personalty and realty, the remedy will be available in respect of purely personal rights in land, such as a licence to occupy.⁵ Therefore, the focus is on land as the subject matter of a contract, rather than on the need for the acquisition of proprietary rights per se.

26.2.2 Specific performance in relation to chattels

The underlying principle in relation to contracts for the transfer of chattels is that specific performance will be ordered in circumstances in which the chattel has a particular intrinsic value such that it would not be readily possible to acquire a substitute chattel. The possibility of acquiring a substitute chattel would mean that an award of damages would be sufficient. Suppose that A, a person seeking to establish a Sunderland Football Club museum of memorabilia, entered into a contract with B to acquire the very football with which Ian Porterfield scored the winning goal for Sunderland in the 1973 FA Cup Final, for a consideration of £10,000. A would seek specific performance on the basis that it would not be sufficient remedy that B merely pay an amount of money to A by way of general compensation for failure to perform the contract, because the chattel involved was so intrinsically valuable that equity would require transfer of the particular chattel specified in the contract.

To continue the quotation from Sir John Leach VC in *Adderley v Dixon*⁶ (see above):

... a Court of Equity will not, generally, decree performance of a contract for the sale of stock or goods, not because of their personal nature, but because damages at law, calculated upon the market price of the stock or goods, are as complete a remedy to the purchaser as the delivery of the stock or goods contracted for; inasmuch as with the damages, he may purchase the same quantity of the like stock or goods.

The issue is therefore as to the ability to acquire substitute goods elsewhere. A distinction could be drawn between a contract for the sale of shares easily obtained on the Stock Exchange (in respect of which damages would be sufficient remedy) and shares in a private company which could not otherwise be acquired (in respect of which specific performance would be ordered).⁷ Similarly, where the chattel at issue is a particularly rare antique vase,

4 (1824) 1 Sim & St 607.

5 Verrall v Great Yarmouth BC [1981] QB 202.

6 (1824) 1 Sim & St 607.

7 Neville v Wilson [1997] Ch 144.

and therefore of particular value, specific performance will be awarded in respect of a contract of sale over that property.⁸

26.3 CONTRACTS WHERE SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE IS UNAVAILABLE

Specific performance will typically not be available in circumstances where the contract is illegal or immoral; where there is no consideration; where the contract involves the exercise of some particular skill by the defendant (on grounds that the court could not administer such performance); where the contract involves mere payment of money (on grounds that common law damages would be sufficient remedy); where the contract is for an insubstantial interest; where the contract requires supervision; or where the contract is not mutually binding.

Specific performance will be ordered, necessarily, in relation to contracts only where the context requires that the contracting parties carry out the particular obligations contained in the contract. There are two broad categories in which specific performance will not be awarded. First, as considered above, that common law damages would have been sufficient remedy will lead a Court of Equity to refuse to order specific performance. Secondly, specific performance will be refused on the basis that specific performance of the particular contract is inappropriate, perhaps because it would be contrary to public policy, that it could not be supervised properly by the court or that the circumstances in general make specific performance impracticable. The following categories rehearse, with some exceptions, the structure of this subject in Snell's Equity.⁹

26.3.1 Illegal or immoral contracts

Clearly it would be contrary to public policy to order specific performance of a contract which would be either illegal or immoral. For example, a contract for payment for prostitution would not be enforced by specific performance because equity will not act in favour of those who do not have 'clean hands'.

26.3.2 No consideration

For there to be specific performance, it is logical to pre-suppose that there must be an enforceable contract. It is a trite part of English contract law that there must be consideration before there can be a valid contract. Therefore, in situations in which there is no consideration, a Court of Equity will not enforce that contract by means of specific performance. More significantly, equity will not assist a volunteer, and therefore the court will not order specific performance to assist a person who has not provided consideration in relation to a contract.¹⁰

That rule has been extended, however, beyond cases of no general consideration to include those contracts which are effected by deed (and therefore do not require consideration to be valid contracts) to refuse specific performance on the basis that the claimant has nevertheless ⁸ Falcke v Gray (1859) 4 Drew 651.

⁹ McGhee, 2005.

¹⁰ Cannon v Hartley [1949] Ch 213.

failed to provide any consideration.¹¹ This rule is perhaps slightly more surprising than the principles considered hitherto, given that a contract under a deed is a valid contract. Perhaps the easiest way of understanding this principle is to see it as being in line with the core principle that equity will not assist a volunteer. Furthermore, it would appear to correlate with the roots of the English law contract as a principle founded on reciprocal bartering arrangements entered into between contractual parties which require consideration, rather than being based on the enforcement of mere promises as contracts.

26.3.3 Contracts involving personal skill

Contracts involving the personal skill of one of the parties are frequently the clearest example of contracts which will not be specifically enforced on the basis that an order of specific performance would be inappropriate in the circumstances.¹²

An example illustrating this principle was discussed by Megarry J in *CH Giles & Co Ltd v Morris*¹³ as follows. Suppose that the contract was for an opera singer to perform at the Royal Opera House. If the court were to order specific performance that would mean that the singer would be required to exercise her skill as provided in the contract. An order for specific performance carries with it the threat of holding the defendant in contempt of court (a criminal offence) if the defendant fails to heed the order. However, it would be impossible for the court to supervise the singing performance, because in such a circumstance it would be too complicated a matter to rule whether or not the singer had performed adequately when forced to sing at the opera house. Suppose that the singer sang flat or otherwise under par. It would not be possible to know whether this inadequate performance was a genuine personal shortcoming, or a refusal to perform under the contract in defiance of the court order. Therefore, the court will not make an order for specific performance in such circumstances where it would be impracticable for the court to supervise the proper performance of the contractual obligation.

Matters of skill are generally beyond the ability of the court to supervise them in this way. Consequently, the discretionary nature of the remedy of specific performance is reinforced by demonstrating that the court will refuse such an order where it is inconvenient to enforce the order. However, Megarry J did hold that it is possible that there are contracts involving personal skill which would not be equivocal in this way. For example, where a builder contracts to build a wall suitable to support a roof, if that wall does not support the roof, there has clearly been a failure to perform the contract.

26.3.4 Specific performance in money transactions

The importance of the equitable remedy of specific performance in the commercial context is its availability only in respect of circumstances in which damages are not an appropriate remedy.¹⁴ Therefore, specific performance will not usually be available for an executory

11 Jefferys v Jefferys (1841) Cr & Ph 138; Cannon v Hartley [1949] Ch 213.

12 CH Giles & Co Ltd v Morris [1972] 1 WLR 307.

13 Ibid.

14 Hutton v Watling [1948] Ch 26, [1948] Ch 398.

contract simply to pay an amount of money.¹⁵ This is because damages are invariably an adequate remedy for a cash-settled contract. The authorities with reference to a contract to pay a loan satisfy the proposition that courts will not exercise their discretion to grant specific performance where damages would be an adequate remedy. Therefore, specific performance will not be appropriate for cash-settled contracts. However, in respect of a transaction in which physical delivery of a chattel or security is required, specific performance will be available where damages would not be a sufficient remedy.¹⁶

The general rule in relation to contracts for the payment of money is that common law damages will typically be a sufficient remedy. Therefore, a stream of cases in relation to contracts for loan witnessed a denial of specific performance on the basis that an award of damages would be adequate compensation for the lender. However, in Beswick v Beswick,¹⁷ an uncle agreed to transfer his business as a coal merchant to his nephew, provided that his nephew would retain him as a consultant and pay an annuity to his uncle's widow. The nephew refused to make this payment to his aunt in the event. Therefore, his aunt sought an order for specific performance in her capacity as administratrix of her husband's estate. Even though the award was only an award for money, it was held that damages would be an insufficient remedy (being only nominal damages on the facts of that case) because it would have been impossible to predict the value of an annuity in the future and thus inappropriate to seek to reduce it to an award of damages. Therefore, we can see from this case that there are situations in which contracts for the payment of money will be specifically enforceable.

The issue may then turn on whether or not it would be a feasible remedy to make an order for cash damages, on the basis that the claimant could then obtain a substitute for the property forming the subject matter of the contract without too much difficulty. So, where it is relatively easy to acquire a replacement transaction in the market, specific performance will not be ordered,¹⁸ whereas the unavailability of a replacement transaction will make specific performance appropriate.¹⁹ A possible approach in circumstances where only a part of the property specified in the contract can be supplied by the defendant, might be for an order either for rescission or for specific performance of the contract to be coupled with damages.

26.3.5 Contracts for insubstantial interests

Where the right which the claimant wishes to enforce is insubstantial, the court will not seek to reinforce it by means of an order for specific performance. It should be emphasised that the court is not seeking to ascertain the value of the right in this context. Rather, it is attempting to ascertain its nature. One example of a right falling within this category would be a tenancy at will which occurs, typically, at the effluxion of a fixed-term lease at a time when the landlord permits the tenant to continue in occupation of the property.²⁰ The right exists only while the landlord continues to grant his permission to the tenant to occupy the property. In the event that the landlord activated the procedure for terminating the lease, the 15 South African Territories Ltd v Wallington [1898] AC 309; Beswick v Beswick [1968] AC 58.

16 Cohen v Roche [1927] 1 KB 169.

17 [1968] AC 58.

18 Cuddee v Rutter (1720) 5 Vin Abr 538.

19 Duncruft v Albrecht (1841) 12 Sim 189; Kenney v Wexham (1822) 6 Madd 355; Sullivan v Henderson [1973] 1 WLR 333.

20 Glasse v Woolgar and Roberts (No 2) (1897) 41 SJ 573.

rights under the tenancy at will would have no substance, and therefore it is said that there should be no specific performance of the contract.

This principle is to be doubted, however, in the light of the dicta of Roskill LJ in Verrall v Great Yarmouth BC,²¹ which granted specific performance of a contract for occupation of land which granted a mere licence. On the basis that courts of common law are reluctant to ensure that consideration is sufficiently valuable (or that it constitutes a market value) in the formation of a contract, it appears undesirable that courts of equity would retain the power to themselves to decide whether or not a right is of sufficient substance to be enforceable. It is suggested that if the right is a valid contractual right it should be enforced to the extent that that is possible on its own terms.

26.3.6 Contracts requiring supervision

In common with contracts requiring the personal skill of the parties to perform them, a contract which requires the supervision of one party by another will typically not be specifically enforced by a Court of Equity.²² In Ryan v Mutual Tontine Westminster Chambers Association,²³ the contractual provision at issue was an undertaking to provide a porter for a block of flats. It was held that the court would not order specific performance given that, if the court was to ensure that the order was being complied with, it would be necessary to check on a regular basis that a porter was present. Such a course of action would be impractical for the court, and therefore it was considered that no order for specific performance should be made in the circumstances. The rationale behind this principle is the difficulty for the court in overseeing proper performance of such a contract, given that such oversight would require constant monitoring by the court. It is accepted that oversight in such circumstances would be by means of a series of court rulings, rather than by hands-on supervision, but it would be so undesirable due to these practical difficulties in any event that specific performance would not be awarded.²⁴

There are situations, however, in which such contracts may be specifically enforceable. The situations in which the rule will be circumscribed are where the contractual obligation requires regular activities which can be monitored.²⁵ The rationale for this principle is that it is comparatively easy for the court to observe whether or not regular duties have been performed adequately. Therefore, in relation to a contractual obligation to provide portering services in relation to a block of flats, it was held that the obligations to maintain central heating and to remove refuse would be capable of specific performance.²⁶ The distinction from the decision in Ryan was that these particular activities could be ordered to be specifically performed and could be controlled without the need for unacceptable levels of superintendence by the court, unlike the obligation to have a porter posted permanently on the premises.

Within this principle, there is an exceptional category in relation to construction contracts. Construction contracts will typically require supervision of sub-contract workers. Given that

21 [1981] QB 202.

22 Ryan v Mutual Tontine Westminster Chambers Association [1893] 1 Ch 116.

23 Ibid.

24 Co-operative Insurance v Argyll Stores (Holdings) Ltd [1997] 3 All ER 297, [1998] AC 1.

25 Tito v Waddell (No 2) [1977] Ch 106.

26 Posner v Scott-Lewis [1987] Ch 25.

element of supervision, it would appear likely that specific performance would not be ordered. However, given the specificity of construction work, it would be possible for the court to consider the completed work, with the aid of expert evidence. Consequently, it is possible for the court to consider the condition of the completed work and therefore to make an order for specific performance of those obligations without the need for unacceptable levels of superintendence.²⁷

26.3.7 Contracts not mutually binding

It is important that the contract be binding on all parties to the contract. It must not be the case that only one party is unilaterally obliged to perform under the contract. The logic of this principle is that there must have been a contract which imposes equivalent obligations on all parties. However, a modern view has not sought to apply this principle rigidly on the basis that there may be contracts imposing unequal obligations on the parties in respect of which justice nevertheless requires that specific performance be ordered. Therefore, in relation to an obligation on a landlord to repair demised premises, it was held that specific performance could be ordered on the basis that no hardship would be caused to the landlord by the order.²⁸

26.4 DEFENCES TO A CLAIM FOR SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE

Defences to specific performance include: lack of an enforceable contract; absence of some formality; misrepresentation; undue influence or unconscionable bargain; mistake; lapse of time; or sufficiency of damages as a remedy.

There are a number of circumstances in which a defendant will be able to rebut a claim for specific performance.

26.4.1 No enforceable contract

Before ordering specific performance of a contract, it is a logical pre-requisite that the contract be valid in the first place. Therefore, the requirements of offer, acceptance, consideration and an intention to affect legal relations must all be shown to have been in existence, or else that the contract has been created by deed. Similarly, the contract must not have become void, for example, on grounds of fraud or ultra vires.²⁹

26.4.2 Absence of writing

There are contracts which have formal requirements for their creation. As considered above, it is necessary that the contract be enforceable, and therefore those formalities must have been complied with. An example of perhaps the most common formality arises under s 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989. That section provides that:

27 Wolverhampton Corp v Emmons [1901] 1 KB 515.

28 Price v Strange [1978] Ch 337.

29 Cannon v Hartley [1949] Ch 213.

- (1) A contract for the sale or other disposition of an interest in land can only be made in writing and only by incorporating all the terms which the parties have expressly agreed in one document or, where contracts are exchanged, in each.

The 1989 statute repealed the doctrine of part performance (previously contained in s 40 of the Law of Property Act 1925) whereby beginning performance of the contract would itself have created an equitable right in the performing party to enforce the contract against its counterparty.

26.4.3 Misrepresentation

In cases where the claimant has exerted a misrepresentation over the defendant which has induced the defendant to enter into the transaction, the court will not make an order for specific performance in favour of the claimant. The reason for this approach is that, in line with the principle that she who comes to equity must come with clean hands, a person who makes a misrepresentation to induce another into a contract should not be entitled to rely on her own wrongdoing to force the defendant to perform the contract.

In circumstances of misrepresentation inducing a claimant to enter into a contract, that claimant will be entitled to rescind that contract, as considered in Chapter 28. This right to rescission will therefore constitute a defence to a claim for specific performance.

For the purposes of rescission based on misrepresentation, there is an important distinction to be made between fraudulent misrepresentation and innocent misrepresentation. A fraudulent misrepresentation will render a contract void where that misrepresentation was made with an intention that it should be acted upon by the person to whom it was made.³⁰ The type of fraud required is that sufficient to found a claim in the tort of deceit, that is a misrepresentation made knowingly, or without belief in its truth, or with recklessness as to whether or not it was true.³¹ At common law, an innocent misrepresentation will found a claim provided that it has become a term of the contract. Section 1 of the Misrepresentation Act 1967 provides further that rescission will be available in cases of innocent misrepresentation in a situation in which that misrepresentation has induced the other party to enter into the contract. Therefore, a party to a contract who had made an innocent misrepresentation would give the other party to the contract a good defence to a claim for specific performance of that contract.

26.4.4 Undue influence and unconscionable bargains

The problem of undue influence is considered in Chapter 29, particularly in relation to setting aside mortgage contracts in situations in which the mortgagee had constructive notice of some undue influence or misrepresentation having been exercised over a co-signatory by a mortgagor to such a mortgage transaction. Furthermore, it was also considered that where one party to a transaction exerts undue influence over the other party to that contract, the victim of the undue influence will be entitled to have that contract rescinded.³² Alongside ³⁰ Peek v Gurney (1873) LR 6 HL 377.

³¹ Derry v Peek (1889) 14 App Cas 337.

³² Barclays Bank v O'Brien [1993] 3 WLR 786.

undue influence are the other categories of equitable wrongs and those issues which will be categorised as unconscionable bargains. Any such wrong would constitute a good defence to a claim for specific performance of that contract.

26.4.5 Mistake

In line with cases of misrepresentation, where there has been a mistake which has operated to induce a defendant to enter into a contract, it would be inequitable in many circumstances to entitle the claimant to enforce that contract against the defendant.

Aside from the instances considered above of actual fraud, misrepresentation and constructive fraud, it is possible that contracts will be rescinded in situations in which there is an operative mistake between both parties to a contract. Such rescission, again, will constitute a good defence to a claim for specific performance. The rule in relation to mistake is, strictly, that a mistake made by both parties (common mistake) in entering into a transaction will enable that contract to be rescinded.

However, where only one party to a contract is acting under a mistake (unilateral mistake), the contract, typically, will not be rescinded.³³ Where only one party is acting under a mistake it is not the case that the entire contract has been founded on a misconceived basis. Indeed, the limits of a rule which permitted unilateral mistake would be difficult to apply in all circumstances. There is a conceptual problem, however, as to what will constitute a mistake and what will constitute merely a lack of knowledge. Suppose a contract between two traders. Where one party to the investment contract knows that its approach will generate a greater income for it as a result of its superior research into the market, it could be argued that if the other party were acting under a mistake as to the profitability for it of the investment it is making, then the more knowledgeable party could be said to be exploiting the other party. It would be difficult to say that the party which loses money on its investment due to its failure to understand the market properly was acting under a legally actionable mistake. Consequently, it would be difficult to suggest that it should be entitled to rescission, whereas the other party ought to be entitled to specific performance of the contract to realise the profit which arose from its superior research and market knowledge. There would be, however, a fine line to be drawn between a situation in which the party making a profit is simply better informed and circumstances in which it takes advantage both of its own knowledge of the market and of its counterparty's comparative lack of knowledge. A little like the conjuror on the street corner who knows that the Queen of Spades playing card is concealed up his sleeve rather than on the table in front of his customer, the winning trader might be thought to be exploiting his counterparty. In the banking context specifically there is a regime of financial regulation which requires each financial institution to categorise its counterparties' expertise and to deal with them accordingly. This would mean that dealings at arm's length with another expert trader would prevent the losing trader from claiming it was operating under a mistake when it was suffering instead from a lack of market knowledge or experience. The situation would be different, however, if the trader had sold an inappropriate financial instrument to an elderly widow who had no knowledge of financial markets at all.

One significant development in this context is that which provides that parties are entitled to rely on a mistake of law in seeking to rescind their contracts, upheld by the House of 33 Riverlate Properties Ltd v Paul [1975] Ch 133.

Lords in Kleinwort Benson v Lincoln CC.³⁴ Whereas previously it was only possible to rely on a mistake of fact, as considered in the foregoing discussion, it is now possible to contend that one's mistake was a mistake as to the substance of the law at any particular time. This case considered the contention led by investment banks that the derivatives market had had a settled understanding that UK local authorities were capable of entering into interest rate swap contracts when it transpired subsequently that they were not. This mistake was one which could be used as a ground for restitution of moneys paid under such a void swap contract. The difficult issue, however, is whether or not, at a time before a court declares the law in any particular area (such as the capacities of local authorities), it is possible to say that there was a mistake at all, because arguably there is no law before a court delivers its opinion on a novel question.

Questions of equity and of restitution

Thus the issue of mistake feeds directly into questions of restitution, as well as into questions of specific performance. The question is as to the role of equity in this context. On the one hand, equity is applying age-old principles concerned with the rights of parties to enforce the full effect of their bargains. On the other hand, equity appears to be operating to prevent the unjust enrichment of one contracting party at the expense of the other party where there is some unjust factor (such as mistake or misrepresentation) involved in the generation of that enrichment.

26.4.6 Lapse of time

In common with other equitable remedies, a court of equity will require that the claimant seek to protect her rights with sufficient speed. The proper approach is to consider the subject matter of the contract and to decide on that basis whether or not specific enforcement of the contract has justly to be denied as a result of the parties' delay.³⁵ Thus, where a party fails to act under its rights under a rent review clause within reasonable time, it will be unable to require its landlord to carry out its obligations to demand only a lesser rent in the meantime.³⁶

26.4.7 Damages in lieu of specific performance

Specific performance operates as an equitable remedy supporting the common law of contract. The interaction between those two systems of law is important in the understanding of specific performance. The context of the equitable remedy of injunctions is considered in Chapter 27, where the point is made that an injunction will not be awarded where a common law remedy would dispose adequately of the issues between the parties. This is a feature common to a number of the equitable remedies discussed in Part 9. It has already been considered that an equitable remedy will be made if no common law remedy would provide a suitable resolution to the dispute.

34 [1998] 4 All ER 513.

35 Lazard Bros & Co Ltd v Fairfield Properties Co (Mayfair) Ltd (1977) 121 SJ 793; United Scientific Holdings Ltd v Burnley BC [1978] AC 904.

36 United Scientific Holdings Ltd v Burnley BC [1978] AC 904.

However, there is also a long-standing power in the court to award damages either in tandem with, or in place of, the equitable remedies of injunction and specific performance. Section 50 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 provides that: 'Where the Court of Appeal or the High Court has jurisdiction to entertain an application for an injunction or specific performance, it may award damages in addition to, or in substitution for, an injunction or specific performance.' Therefore, the court has a statutory discretion to decide that on the facts in front of it, while specific performance might ordinarily be available, an award of cash damages would be a sufficient and suitable remedy for the harm which the applicant would suffer by reason of the respondent's failure to perform its specific obligations under the contract.

Injunctions and confidences

27.1	NATURE OF INJUNCTIONS	1186
27.1.1	Introduction	1186
27.1.2	The breadth of the power of the courts to grant injunctions	1186
27.1.3	Distinguishing injunctions from common law remedies	1187
27.1.4	General equitable principles governing injunctions	1189
27.2	CLASSIFICATION OF INJUNCTIONS	1191
27.2.1	Mandatory injunctions	1191
27.2.2	Prohibitory injunctions	1191
27.2.3	Injunctions quia timet	1191
27.3	INTERIM INJUNCTIONS	1192
27.3.1	Introduction	1192
27.3.2	The core test – ‘balance of convenience’	1193
27.3.3	Relationship with common law remedies	1194
27.4	FREEZING INJUNCTIONS	1195
27.4.1	Introduction	1195
27.4.2	The nature of the freezing injunction	1195
27.4.3	The core test	1196
27.4.4	The requirement of commencement of substantive proceedings	1197
27.4.5	The worldwide freezing injunction	1198
27.5	SEARCH ORDERS	1198
27.5.1	Introduction	1199
27.5.2	The requirements for grant of a search order	1199
27.6	INTERACTION WITH THE COMMON LAW	1200
27.6.1	Damages in lieu of injunction	1200
27.6.2	The measure of damages	1201
27.7	THE EQUITABLE DOCTRINE OF CONFIDENCE	1201
27.7.1	Introduction	1201
27.7.2	The traditional equitable doctrine of breach of confidence	1202
27.7.3	The modern equitable doctrine of confidence	1209
27.7.4	Contexts in which confidential information has already been considered in this book	1211
27.7.5	Equity, confidence and the development of a law of privacy	1212

- 27.7.6 The modern principle of breach of confidence giving way to the tort of misuse of private information 1214

27.8 SUPER-INJUNCTIONS AND THE TORT OF MISUSE OF PRIVATE INFORMATION

1215

- 27.8.1 Introduction 1215
 27.8.2 The law on super-injunctions 1222
 27.8.3 The Report of the Committee on Super-Injunctions 1229

OVERVIEW

The courts have a broad inherent jurisdiction to award injunctions in any circumstances, and the ability of the courts to award new forms of injunction continues to manifest itself in relation to freezing orders, search orders and super-injunctions. The power to award injunctions may also be granted by statute in particular circumstances but those statutory powers are beyond the scope of this chapter.

An injunction will be awarded either on an interim or a permanent basis, either in a mandatory or prohibitory form. It is necessary that no common law remedy would be sufficient in the circumstances; the applicant must come with clean hands; there must not have been delay on the applicant's part; some right of the applicant must be affected; and the respondent must not suffer undue harm as a result of the injunction.

Injunctions divide between those which require some action from the respondent (mandatory injunctions), those which require the respondent to refrain from some action (prohibitory injunctions), and those which seek to prevent some action which it is feared may be performed in the future.

Interim (formerly interlocutory) injunctions are awarded on an interim basis during litigation. Their award is based on a balance of convenience between the potential harm suffered by the applicant if no injunction were awarded, and the potential inconvenience caused to the respondent if the injunction were to be awarded. The universal application of this approach has been doubted in some more recent cases. The applicant must therefore demonstrate a strong, prima facie case.

Freezing injunctions are awarded to prevent the respondent from removing assets from the English jurisdiction before the completion of litigation to avoid settlement of a final judgment. The applicant is required to demonstrate three things: a good arguable case; that there are assets within the jurisdiction; and that there is a real risk of the dissipation of those assets which would otherwise make final judgment nugatory.

The search order is a form of injunction which entitles the applicant to seize the defendant's property to protect evidence in relation to any future litigation. The order will be made on the satisfaction of three criteria: there must be an extremely strong prima facie case; the potential or actual damage must be very serious for the applicant; and there must be clear evidence that the defendants have in their possession incriminating documents or things with a real possibility that they may destroy such material before an application could be made to the court.

An injunction will not be ordered in circumstances in which damages would be sufficient remedy.

The equitable doctrine of confidence has an ancient pedigree. Since at least the 17th century English courts have had the power to award injunctions to prevent 'breaches of trust, confidences and contract'. While this appears to be a general jurisdiction to award injunctions on an interim or permanent basis, there are particular contexts in which such injunctions have been awarded: to protect property rights, including the protection of intellectual property rights; in cases of husband and wife; to protect private, confidential information; to protect breaches of contract; and generally to protect 'secrets' in the old language. In recent years, this equitable doctrine has been superseded by the tort of misuse of private information and the freedom of speech and protection of privacy provisions of the Human Rights Act, but the equitable doctrine still subsists in rude health in the other contexts.

The power of the court to award super-injunctions has been particularly newsworthy in recent years. A 'super-injunction' is an injunction which prevents the reporting of legal proceedings and also the reporting of the existence of such an injunction; whereas an 'anonymised injunction' prevents the reporting of the identity of any of the parties or any information which would enable their identities to become known. Anonymised injunctions are used broadly in family law and criminal law cases, and latterly their use in privacy cases has increased. A super-injunction is ordinarily ordered on the basis of a balancing act between the need for open justice and freedom of speech on the one hand, and the need to respect the privacy of litigants on the other.

27.1 NATURE OF INJUNCTIONS

An injunction will be awarded either on an interim (formerly interlocutory) or a permanent basis, either in a mandatory or prohibitory form. It is necessary that no common law remedy would be sufficient in the circumstances; the applicant must come with clean hands; there must not have been delay on the applicant's part; some right of the applicant must be affected; and the respondent must not suffer undue harm as a result of the injunction.

27.1.1 Introduction

This chapter considers the equitable remedy of injunctions. The first half of this chapter is concerned with the general principles governing the award of various types of injunction before trial (so-called 'interim injunctions') and injunctions awarded after trial (so-called 'permanent injunctions'). The second half of this chapter then focuses in detail on the equitable doctrine of confidence (which is ordinarily supported by the award of an injunction) and its role in the particular context of 'super-injunctions', which are a form of interim injunction which have become particularly important and been particularly newsworthy in the period running from 2010 through 2012.

27.1.2 The breadth of the power of the courts to grant injunctions

The injunction is an equitable remedy. It is at the discretion of the court to make an order to either party to litigation, or by way of a final judgment, to take some action or to refrain from some action. The broadest discretion of the court is required at this point. Injunctions can be used in a broad range of factual situations, from family law disputes to commercial litigation. Sometimes the injunction forms a part of the relief sought by one or other of the parties in parallel to claims for damages and other remedies, whereas at other times the injunction is the sole remedy required by the claimant. Section 37(1) of the Supreme Court Act 1981 provides that:

The High Court may by order (whether interlocutory or final) grant an injunction . . . in all cases in which it appears to the court to be just and convenient to do so.

As Spry has pointed out,¹ the court's jurisdiction towards injunctions operates 'without limits, and can be exercised either in support of any legal right, or in the creation of a new equitable right, as the court thinks fits in the application of equitable principles'.² Lord Nicholls set out the breadth of the power of the courts to grant injunctions in the following terms in the House of Lords in Mercedes Benz AG v Leiduck to the effect that:

the jurisdiction to grant an injunction, unfettered by statute, should not be rigidly confined to exclusive categories by judicial decision. The court may grant an injunction against a party properly before it where this is required to avoid injustice . . . The court habitually grants injunctions in respect of certain types of conduct. But that does not mean that the situations in which injunctions may be granted are now set in stone for all time. . . . The exercise of the jurisdiction must be principled, but the criterion is injustice. Injustice is to be viewed and decided in the light of today's conditions and standards, not those of yester-year.³

Therefore, under statute and further to that decision of the House of Lords, the courts have a very broad, inherent power to grant injunctions in any sort of case in the interests of avoiding injustice. Nevertheless, as will emerge from the discussion in this chapter, the courts have tended to develop strict principles governing the situations in which injunctions will be awarded in certain types of case (for example, interim injunctions granted before a full trial is held). Rather than strict rules governing the grant of injunctions, these will tend to be broad principles to which the court will ordinarily be expected to have regard when awarding injunctions in particular types of case. Therefore, in practice it will be important to bear in mind the criteria which the courts are required to take into account when deciding whether or not to grant an injunction, and the precise terms of the injunction. The court will be required to take into account specified types of factors before addressing the precise circumstances of the parties and the most suitable means for resolving the issues between them. The verb which runs with the expression 'the grant of an injunction' is 'to enjoin': thus a court enjoins a person from continuing with an action.

27.1.3 Distinguishing injunctions from common law remedies

It is important to underline the role of the equitable remedy of injunction as a remedy which will be applied only where the common law will not achieve justice between the parties. Frequently there will be a fine line between granting a common law remedy and providing an injunction.

1 Spry, Principles of Equitable Remedies, 8th edn, Sweet & Maxwell, 2010, 331.

2 Ibid.

3 [1996] AC 284, at 308.

A most useful case on final injunctions generally is the decision of the Court of Appeal in Jaggard v Sawyer.⁴ The facts revolved around restrictive covenants effected between freeholders of land in a residential, cul-de-sac development. The covenants prevented the freeholders from using any undeveloped land adjoining their plots, or made part of their plots, for any purpose other than as domestic gardens. The respondent acquired a plot neighbouring his land and, operating under some misapprehension as to the status of the land, built an access road across it to his house. A neighbour, the applicant, sought an injunction to prevent the respondent from maintaining this road, on the basis that it was in breach of covenant and that it required the respondent to trespass on the applicant's land. The applicant had commenced, but not pursued, proceedings when the development started but had sought injunctive relief once the development had been completed. The issues arose, inter alia, as to whether the applicant ought to be entitled to the injunctive relief sought and whether in fact damages would have been a sufficient remedy.

In giving his judgment, Sir Thomas Bingham MR considered the four probanda relevant for the grant of an injunction as set out in Shelfer v City of London Electric Lighting Co.⁵ There are four requirements which must be satisfied before a court will award damages instead of an injunction in circumstances where an injunction might otherwise be awarded:

- (a) the harm suffered by the applicant must have been comparatively slight;
- (b) the harm suffered must be capable of being quantified in financial terms;
- (c) the harm suffered must be such that it can be compensated adequately by payment of damages; and
- (d) it must have been oppressive to the respondent to have granted the injunction sought.⁶

Millet LJ considered the question whether damages for the tort of trespass (common law) ought to be held sufficient such that there would be no requirement for an award of an injunction. He held that 'the common law remedy of damages in cases of continuing trespass is inadequate not because the damages are likely to be small or nominal but because they cover the past only and not the future'. Therefore, it is possible to contend that, where there is the likelihood of future harm if the respondent is not enjoined from continuing past behaviour, an injunction will necessarily be a valid adjunct to common law damages. This argument proceeds on the basis that common law damages will remedy the applicant's loss for the past, whereas an injunction will provide a remedy for what would otherwise be future loss. The two can validly run together without doing violence to the underlying rationale of either remedy.

In the alternative, his Lordship did recognise that this principle would not apply in all cases. While the main rule is that equity and the common law should seek to provide remedies in parallel, Millet LJ did acknowledge the utility of an award of damages to guard against potential future loss when he held that a court 'can in my judgment properly award damages "once and for all" in respect of future wrongs because it awards them in substitution for an injunction and to compensate for those future wrongs which an injunction would have prevented'.

4 [1995] 1 WLR 269, [1995] 2 All ER 189.

5 [1895] 1 Ch 287.

6 Ibid, per AL Smith LJ.

There is also a further issue which arises from Millett LJ's judgment in *Jaggard v Sawyer*⁷ which refers to the nature of an injunction and damages as being either compensatory or restitutionary. If these remedies are to be compensatory, that would require measuring the loss suffered by the applicant and providing for a remedy which adequately compensates the applicant for her loss. Alternatively, a restitutionary remedy is concerned to take from the respondent the gain which the respondent has made by passing that gain to the applicant. Therefore, the restitutionary remedy would not necessarily require a calculation of the loss suffered by the applicant, but would instead be concerned to take from the respondent the gain made at the applicant's expense.⁸

27.1.4 General equitable principles governing injunctions

Injunctions are important for two reasons in the general argument of this book. First, injunctions are a particularly significant remedy in almost all areas of law and therefore require special attention. Secondly, injunctions demonstrate the application of some central equitable principles, as discussed in Chapter 1.

Damages, or other common law remedies, must not be an adequate remedy

One of the core equitable principles appropriate to awards of injunctions is that it must not be sufficient to provide a remedy for the applicant that the respondent make a payment of cash damages, or settle the matter satisfactorily by application of some other common law remedy.⁹ This harks back to the role of equity as a code of principle which existed to shore up shortcomings in the common law in achieving justice between the parties. Therefore, while equity will take priority over common law, it is important to establish first that common law will not adequately dispose of the matter. However, where the court feels that, while damages are available, they would not be an adequate remedy, an equitable remedy (such as an injunction) will be awarded.¹⁰

The applicant must come to equity with clean hands

This venerable equitable principle finds its echo in Lord Browne-Wilkinson's explanation of the trust relationship as being built on the conscience of the trustee in dealing with the trust property.¹¹ It is a key part of any equitable remedy that the applicant is not seeking that remedy to advance some inequitable purpose.¹²

The applicant must not delay in seeking the remedy

The injunction is generally a remedy which seeks to remove immediate risk of harm from the applicant. Therefore, it is said that the applicant ought to lose that right where the

7 [1995] 1 WLR 269, [1995] 2 All ER 189.

8 This issue is considered in section 31.3.

9 London and Blackwall Railway Co v Cross (1886) 31 Ch D 354.

10 Beswick v Beswick [1968] AC 58.

11 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

12 Tinsley v Milligan [1994] 1 AC 340, per Lord Goff.

applicant has delayed unreasonably in seeking the remedy. As Millett LJ held in Jaggard v Sawyer: ‘If the applicant delays proceedings until it is no longer possible for him to obtain an injunction, he destroys his own bargaining position and devalues his right.’¹³ As considered in Chapter 1, avoiding delay is one of the core equitable principles.¹⁴ Delay will typically be taken as a sign of acquiescence in the actions of the defendant and thus disqualify the claimant from obtaining an injunction¹⁵ and from damages in connection with any such injunction.¹⁶

Equity will not act in vain

Where it is impossible to undo the harm done to the applicant by the respondent, the court will not make an order for an injunction, on the basis that such an order would achieve nothing. Therefore, the applicant will be required to demonstrate that he stands to suffer some substantial harm which outweighs the harm which would be caused to the respondent by the award of the injunction. However, as a corollary to that, the injunction must contribute to the avoidance of some measure of harm to the applicant and will not be awarded simply because harm may be suffered, as considered below.

Some right of the applicant must be affected

This principle harks back to the notion of locus standi: that an applicant cannot sue on an issue unless that applicant has some right which is affected by the suit. While the point is made above that s 37(1) of the Supreme Court Act 1981 provides that the courts have the power to ‘grant an injunction . . . in all cases in which it appears to the court to be just and convenient to do so’, there is nevertheless a restriction placed on the seeming generality of that principle by the common law to the effect that the applicant for the injunction must show some effect on a right which it holds. Therefore, in Paton v British Pregnancy Advisory Service Trustees,¹⁷ it was held by Sir George Baker P that ‘the first and basic principle is that there must be a legal right enforceable in law or in equity before the applicant can obtain an injunction from the court to restrain an infringement of that right’. In line with the principle that equity will not act in vain, considered immediately above, is an extension that the applicant must not only suffer harm but similarly must have some legal right affected. Therefore, the injunction is required, at root, to support some existing right of the applicant and will not be awarded generally to prevent harm in the abstract.

The injunction must not cause undue hardship to the respondent

As will be seen in relation to the specific forms of injunction considered below, it is important that the court be convinced that the grant of the injunction will not cause disproportionate hardship to the respondent. The issue for the court will typically be resolved in a comparison of the comparative hardship to the applicant if the injunction is not granted, and

13 [1995] 1 WLR 269, [1995] 2 All ER 189.

14 Gafford v Graham [1999] 41 EG 157.

15 Ibid.

16 Ibid.

17 [1979] QB 276.

the likely hardship to the respondent if the injunction is granted. In Jaggard v Sawyer,¹⁸ Sir Thomas Bingham MR pointed out that ‘the test is one of oppression, and the court should not slide into the application of a general balance of convenience test’. Furthermore, the material time which the court must consider in deciding whether or not that oppression exists is at the time the court is asked to consider whether or not to grant an injunction.

27.2 CLASSIFICATION OF INJUNCTIONS

Injunctions divide between those which require some action from the respondent (mandatory injunctions), those which require the respondent to refrain from some action (prohibitory injunctions), and those which seek to prevent some action which it is feared may be performed in the future.

There is a need to distinguish between the various types of injunctions. As mentioned above, the power of the court to grant an injunction is broad-ranging, and therefore it is important to be able to classify how different types of injunction might operate.

27.2.1 Mandatory injunctions

The mandatory injunction requires that the defendant take some action. For example, where a defendant’s negligence has caused water to leak onto another person’s property, the court may seek to order that defendant to take some action which will stop the water leakage. One means of doing this would be by way of mandatory injunction to require the defendant to take action to mend the leak, as well as other actions in respect of damages and so forth. There is a degree of overlap between the mandatory injunction and specific performance (considered in the previous chapter), in that both obligations may seek to force the defendant to perform an action. Specific performance refers specifically to contractual obligations, whereas a mandatory injunction has broader application outside specific performance and gives the court greater leeway to impose conditions on its performance.

27.2.2 Prohibitory injunctions

The prohibitory injunction requires the defendant to refrain from an action. For example, injunctions may be issued in the family law context to prevent person A from passing within a given radius of person B’s home. Alternatively, where the defendant’s negligent use of land is causing water to leak onto another person’s land, the court may make an order by way of prohibitory injunction to require the defendant to stop the activity which is causing water to escape onto the other person’s land.

27.2.3 Injunctions quia timet

A quia timet injunction is one which is ordered to protect the applicant from an action which it is feared may be committed in the future, on the basis that some right of the applicant will otherwise be infringed.¹⁹ Literally, the term ‘quia timet’ means ‘he who fears’, that is, he

18 [1995] 1 WLR 269, [1995] 2 All ER 189.

19 Redland Bricks Ltd v Morris [1970] AC 652.

who fears that he will suffer some harm. Clearly, this category of injunction stands out from the general principles of equity above which required that there be some right of the applicant affected. The quia timet injunction does not require that some right of the applicant has been affected, only that there is a risk of its being affected. Therefore, the grant of this type of injunction is typically limited to situations in which there is a real risk of detriment to the applicant. As Lord Buckmaster held in Graigola Merthyr Co Ltd v Swansea Corp,²⁰ ‘a mere vague apprehension is not sufficient to support an action for a quia timet injunction. There must be an immediate threat to do something’.

It must be demonstrated that the respondent intends to, or is likely to, participate in the act complained of. Where the respondent demonstrates a disinclination to participate in the action then the injunction will not be granted.²¹

27.3 INTERIM INJUNCTIONS

Interim injunctions (formerly interlocutory injunctions) are awarded on an interim basis during litigation. Their award is based on a balance of convenience between the potential harm suffered by the applicant if no injunction were awarded, and the potential inconvenience caused to the respondent if the injunction were to be awarded. The universal application of this approach has been doubted in some more recent cases. The applicant must therefore demonstrate a strong, prima facie case.

27.3.1 Introduction

The interim injunction is an injunction made during litigation, which is binding on the parties only up to the date of final judgment. This is opposed to the permanent injunctions considered immediately above, which are binding on the parties from the date of judgment in perpetuity (or until the judge expresses them to expire, or until a successful appeal against the injunction).

Consider the following example:

Suppose that Ben, a member of a class of beneficiaries under a discretionary trust, has commenced litigation against T, the trustee of that trust, claiming that T had breached the terms of the trust by deciding to pay trust income to other beneficiaries and wind up the trust. Ben will therefore be seeking a declaration that the payments would be in breach of trust. However, in the meantime, Ben will want to ensure that T does not make those payments before the completion of the litigation. Therefore, Ben will seek an injunction against T which will prevent T making any such payments before the litigation is completed. Such an injunction, binding only up to the date of judgment, would be an interim injunction.

Clearly, the court has subtly different issues at stake here from the final injunctions considered above. In relation to a final injunction, the court will have heard full evidence from all relevant parties and will have conducted a full trial of all relevant issues. In that context, the court is able to reach an informed decision on the most suitable means for disposing of the differences between the parties. In the case of an interim injunction, there will not have been a trial of the issues between the parties. Therefore, the court will not have had the opportunity to form an opinion on the merits of the case. To award an injunction in favour of one party (the applicant) will prevent the other party (the respondent) from acting as they otherwise would. It is possible that the respondent would win the trial and therefore would have suffered detriment for the period of the injunction. However, if the respondent were permitted to continue to act freely, and then lost at trial, this might cause even greater loss to the applicant.

20 [1929] AC 344, 353.

21 Celsteel Ltd v Alton House Holdings Ltd [1986] 1 WLR 512.

Therefore, in the example given above, if the court ultimately held that Ben was correct in his interpretation of the trust, it would have been unjust to deny an injunction to prevent the trustee from paying the money away. However, in the opposite scenario, if T was held to have been correct, then it would have been to the detriment of the other beneficiaries if the injunction had been granted in favour of Ben such that no money was paid out until final judgment.

27.3.2 The core test – ‘balance of convenience’

The classic test for the availability of an interim injunction was contained in *American Cyanamid v Ethicon Ltd.*²² In the words of Lord Diplock, ‘The court must weigh one need against another and determine where “the balance of convenience” lies.’ Therefore, in considering the mutual benefits and burdens that may result from the award of an interim injunction, the court is required to consider, in all the circumstances, whether it would be more convenient on balance to award or deny the award.

There are four elements to the test:

- (a) that the balance of convenience indicates the grant of an award;
- (b) semble, that the applicant can demonstrate a good prima facie case;
- (c) that there is a serious question to be resolved at trial; and
- (c) that there is an undertaking for damages in the event that the applicant does not succeed at trial.

The need for a strong, prima facie case

Lord Diplock also indicated the importance of the applicant showing not only a likelihood of suffering loss if the injunction is not granted, but also a likelihood that the applicant would succeed at full trial:

To justify the grant of such [an interim injunction] the applicant must satisfy the court first that there is a strong prima facie case that he will be entitled to a final order restraining the defendant from doing what he is threatening to do, and secondly that he will suffer irreparable injury which cannot be compensated by a subsequent award of damages in the action if the defendant is not prevented from doing it between the date of the application for the [interim] injunction and the date of the final order made on trial of the action.²³

²² [1975] AC 396, [1975] 1 All ER 504.

²³ [1975] AC 295, 360.

However, his Lordship also pointed out that it is impossible for the court at an interim stage to reach a firm conclusion as to the merits of the case.²⁴ Therefore, the requirement to show a prima facie case will always stop short of requiring the applicant to go as far as proving the entire case. The court will, however, consider the relative strength of each party's case as it appears from affidavits deposed by each party's witnesses.²⁵ These approaches appear to be difficult to reconcile. The explanation proffered by Laddie J²⁶ is that Lord Diplock must have required the court to consider the comparative strengths of the parties' cases but without needing to resolve any difficult issues of fact or law. His Lordship's conviction is that, in most cases, it will be apparent which party is more likely to win at trial.

Is the balance of convenience test applicable in all circumstances?

However, subsequent cases have cast doubt on the breadth of the applicability of American Cyanamid.²⁷ In Cambridge Nutrition Ltd v British Broadcasting Association,²⁸ in a dissenting judgment, Kerr LJ held that the American Cyanamid principle is not a principle of universal application. This is in spite of the approach which was adopted by Lord Diplock which suggested that American Cyanamid was proposing a principle of universal application. The reason why Cambridge Nutrition was considered to operate on a different footing was that the interlocutory injunction sought, to prevent the transmission of a current affairs television programme, would have been equivalent to the award of a final injunction, not an interim injunction, in those circumstances. It was in the nature of this particular programme that to prevent its transmission at that time would effectively mean that the programme could never have been shown. Therefore, Kerr LJ held that this application for interlocutory relief was different in character to American Cyanamid because it would dispose of the matter without the need for a full trial. The majority of the Court of Appeal continued to follow American Cyanamid.

27.3.3 Relationship with common law remedies

As with final injunctions, where the applicant would be adequately compensated by an award of damages the injunction will not be granted. So, if the applicant would suffer only financial loss up to the date of trial, the court will typically not award an interim injunction. The issue which arises, then, is as to the solvency of the respondent. It is all very well to say, 'let's not award an interim injunction because damages would be a sufficient remedy' if the respondent would not be able to pay the damages owed to the applicant. It is thus common practice to require an undertaking as to the ability to pay damages. Alternatively, if the applicant is granted an interim injunction but does not subsequently win at trial, the respondent may well be entitled to damages. In such circumstances, the respondent will also require an undertaking as to ability to pay damages from the applicant. The court will typically require that such undertakings are made, and that an ability to pay damages is demonstrated.

24 Cf Hoffmann La Roche & Co v Secretary of State for Trade and Industry [1973] AC 295; Evans Marshall & Co Ltd v Bertola SA [1973] 1 WLR 349.

25 Series 5 Software v Clarke [1996] 1 All ER 853, per Laddie J.

26 Ibid.

27 [1975] AC 396, [1975] 1 All ER 504.

28 [1990] 3 All ER 523.

27.4 FREEZING INJUNCTIONS

Freezing injunctions are awarded to prevent the respondent from removing assets from the English jurisdiction before the completion of litigation to avoid settlement of a final judgment. The applicant is required to demonstrate three things: a good arguable case; that there are assets within the jurisdiction; and that there is a real risk of the dissipation of those assets which would otherwise make final judgment nugatory.

27.4.1 Introduction

The freezing injunction was formerly known as the ‘Mareva injunction’ on account of the case in which it first appeared.²⁹ This form of equitable relief has developed into one of the most powerful tools in the armoury of private international litigation. The risk addressed specifically by the freezing injunction is that a defendant in litigation will remove all of its assets from England and Wales, so that it will be impossible for the applicant to find any assets within the jurisdiction against which it could enforce the final judgment.

See the following example:

Suppose that A, a Venezuelan art dealer, had sold a painting, which A represented was an original version of Dali’s ‘Girl at a Window’, to B, an English company, for £3 million. In the event it turns out that the painting is a fraud and was painted by an art student from Bermondsey. Although a good likeness, it is worth only £5,000. Assuming the art student to have no money, B would sue A for repayment of the £3 million on grounds of breach of warranty and fraud. The risk is that A will remove all of her assets from the jurisdiction by emptying her English bank accounts and selling all other property held in England. The remedy which B will want up to the date of judgment, and until judgment is satisfied, is an injunction preventing A from removing any assets from the jurisdiction. In effect, all A’s assets would be frozen. This would be a freezing injunction.

The dilemma for the court is the same as in relation to any interim injunction. There is a risk of prejudice to A if it transpires that A was not guilty of fraud or misrepresentation. Alternatively, B’s judgment will be useless where A has no assets against which the judgment for £3 million could be enforced.

Given the risk of the defendant removing property from the jurisdiction before the court order is made, the hearing is usually held ex parte (that is, without the defendant being present). This enables the applicant to bind the defendant before the defendant can spirit assets out of the reach of the courts: a jurisdiction which may be used by the police or the Serious Fraud Office as well as by private parties to litigation.³⁰

27.4.2 The nature of the freezing injunction

The potentially very broad ambit of the freezing injunction has been limited by the courts. As Kerr LJ held in Z Ltd v A-Z:³¹

²⁹ Mareva Compania Naviera SA v International Bulk Carriers SA [1975] 2 Lloyd’s Rep 509. It is now referred to as an ‘asset freezing order’ in the reforms to the Rules of the Supreme Court.

³⁰ Bank of Scotland v A Ltd [2001] All ER (D) 81.

³¹ [1982] QB 558, 585.

Mareva injunctions should be granted . . . when it appears to the court that there is a combination of two circumstances. First, when it appears likely that the applicant will recover judgment against the defendant for a certain or approximate sum. Secondly, when there are also reasons to believe that the defendant has assets within the jurisdiction to meet the judgment, in whole or in part, but may well take steps designed to ensure that these are no longer available or traceable when judgment is given against him.

Therefore the applicant must prove a combination of a likelihood of success at trial, akin to search (or Anton Piller) orders,³² and that the defendant has some assets within the jurisdiction of the court to meet that judgment. However, a freezing injunction will not be awarded where such an injunction would displace remedies which might be ordered at full trial of the issue.³³ There is consequently a ‘high duty’ to be borne by the lawyers for the applicant on the basis that these injunctions are being sought on an ex parte basis without the other side being notified.³⁴ The lawyers are required to ensure that any unusual features are brought to the court’s attention and to ensure that there is a ‘full, fair and accurate disclosure of material information to the court’.³⁵

27.4.3 The core test

There are three requirements for the grant of a freezing injunction:

- (a) that the applicant has a good case;
- (b) that the applicant has satisfied the court that there are assets within the jurisdiction; and
- (c) that there is a real risk of dissipation or secretion of those assets which would make a judgment nugatory.³⁶

The freezing injunction requires that there is ‘a good arguable case’. This requires the applicant to declare all matters relevant to the applicant’s claim to the court, so that a rational decision can be made by the court.³⁷ The test differs from the standard test for interim injunctions precisely because of the effect which a freezing injunction will have on the defendant in circumstances in which the defendant is typically not present in court at the original application. A ‘good, arguable case’ connotes a higher standard than merely a ‘prima facie case’. This is a particularly important element of the application process given that the hearing is usually ex parte, and the court requires some evidence that the applicant is likely to succeed at trial. If the applicant is subsequently shown to have withheld important information from the court, the freezing injunction will generally be discharged.³⁸

32 Considered below at section 27.5.

33 Derby & Co v Weldon (Nos 3 and 4) [1990] Ch 65, 76.

34 Memory Corporation Plc v Sidhu (No 2) [2000] 1 WLR 1443, 1460, per Mummery LJ.

35 Ibid.

36 Re BCCI SA (No 9) [1994] 3 All ER 764; Derby & Co v Weldon (Nos 3 and 4) [1990] Ch 65. See now JSC BTA Bank v Solodchenko [2010] EWCA Civ 1436, [2011] 1 WLR 888.

37 Third Chandris Shipping Corp v Unimarine SA [1979] QB 645; Memory Corporation Plc v Sidhu (No 2) [2000] 1 WLR 1443.

38 Ali & Fahd v Moneim [1989] 2 All ER 404; Dubai Bank Ltd v Galadari [1990] 1 Lloyd’s Rep 120.

The applicant is also required to give an undertaking in damages to the effect that, if the applicant is unsuccessful at trial, the applicant will be able to compensate the defendant adequately.³⁹ This is an undertaking made to the court, rather than to the defendant (given the ex parte nature of the procedure).⁴⁰

27.4.4 The requirement of commencement of substantive proceedings

A freezing injunction will be ordered whether or not substantive proceedings to which it relates have already been instituted.⁴¹ The traditional view was that a Mareva injunction was an interlocutory order which is awarded only to keep assets which are the subject of main proceedings within the reach of the claimant, assuming the test set out in the preceding section is satisfied. Therefore, an applicant could not be awarded a freezing order in the abstract without bringing substantive proceedings at the same time. By contrast, cases involving anti-suit injunctions had suggested that injunctions might nevertheless be awarded in general terms in situations in which ‘it is appropriate to avoid injustice’, on the basis more generally that ‘the width and flexibility of equity are not to be undermined by categorization’.⁴² This broader basis for injunctions was predicated on the applicant demonstrating either that the respondent has invaded or threatens to invade a legal or equitable right of the applicant, or that the respondent has behaved or threatened to behave unconscionably.⁴³ Therefore, a freezing order may be made either once proceedings have been served or before substantive proceedings have been instituted.⁴⁴ Nevertheless, the court will not make an order for a freezing injunction if it would place a greater burden on the respondent than would be just and convenient.⁴⁵ The present position is set out by the House of Lords in Fourie v Le Roux.⁴⁶

The applicant before the House of Lords in *Fourie v Le Roux*⁴⁷ was involved in litigation concerning the respondent individuals and companies in South Africa. Through various forms of deception, assets against which the applicant might have brought a claim had been moved to England. The applicant therefore sought a freezing order over those assets in England. The basis on which the order was resisted was that the applicant had not yet brought any substantive proceedings against the respondents and therefore that the court had no jurisdiction to make a freezing order. Lord Scott held that the trial judge had had jurisdiction to make an order in the strict sense that the assets and the parties were properly parties before an English court. The issue remained whether or not the jurisdiction of the court specifically to make freezing orders was dependent upon the issue of substantive proceedings which were being protected by the freezing order.

39 Third Chandris Shipping Corp v Unimarine SA [1979] QB 645.

40 Balkanbank v Taher [1994] 4 All ER 239.

41 The Siskina [1979] AC 210; Channel Tunnel Group Ltd v Balfour Beatty Construction Ltd [1993] AC 334.

42 Castanho v Brown & Root (UK) Ltd [1981] AC 557, 573, per Lord Scarman.

43 South Carolina Insurance Co v Assurantie NV [1987] 1 AC 24, 40, per Lord Brandon.

44 Fourie v Le Roux [2007] UKHL 1, [32], per Lord Scott.

45 Ibid.

46 [2007] UKHL 1.

47 Ibid.

27.4.5 The worldwide freezing injunction

Extraordinarily, the English courts have decided that, in some circumstances, they have the jurisdiction to grant freezing injunctions over assets held outside England and Wales: the so-called worldwide freezing injunction. The power is said to arise further to s 37(1) of the Supreme Court Act 1981 and to obtain in the event that the defendant is properly before the court.⁴⁸ In Derby v Weldon,⁴⁹ the Court of Appeal was of the view that the defendants were a corporation with sufficient know-how to put assets beyond the reach of the applicant even if the applicant was successful at trial. Therefore, the Court of Appeal held, exceptionally, that the freeze on the defendants' assets would be required to be global in scope for the applicant to be certain of receiving adequate compensation in the event of success at trial.

In one of the cases arising out of the BCCI collapse, Rattee J awarded a worldwide freezing injunction on the basis that, in the context of 'the complex international nature of the financial dealings' concerned in a case in which neither respondent was resident in England and Wales, it was necessary to make the injunction similarly international.⁵⁰ In a comparative relaxation of the principle, the Court of Appeal in *Credit Suisse Fides Trust v Cuoghi*⁵¹ held that the worldwide freezing injunction can be granted in circumstances in which 'it would be expedient', rather than being limited to a situation in which exceptional circumstances justify the order. However, it remains the case that the applicant is required to demonstrate a likelihood of assets being put beyond its reach in circumstances in which the respondent is both able and likely to act in that way. Many of the cases in which the injunction has been granted with worldwide effect have therefore involved financial institutions for which movements of assets around the world are logistically comparatively straightforward.

Evidently, this extension of the principle constitutes a large expansion of the accepted jurisdiction of the English courts, with the possibility of particularly onerous results for the respondents. One of the particular features of this form of litigation is the risk of a proliferation of proceedings in a number of jurisdictions where assets are held. Clearly, the respondent will wish to be able to continue to dispose of and to use assets held in jurisdictions outside England and Wales. While this raises questions of conflict of laws outside the scope of this book, there are consequences for the conduct of litigation under the freezing injunction. For example, the undertaking required from the applicant will be comparatively onerous, and may extend to an undertaking not to commence parallel proceedings in other jurisdictions.⁵²

27.5 SEARCH ORDERS

The search (formerly Anton Piller) order is a form of injunction which entitles the applicant to seize the defendant's property to protect evidence in relation to any future litigation. The order will be made on the satisfaction of three criteria: there must be an extremely strong prima facie case; the potential or actual damage must be very serious for the applicant; and there must be clear evidence that the defendants have in their 48 Derby & Co Ltd v Weldon (Nos 3 and 4) [1990] Ch 65, 93, per Neill LJ.

49 Ibid.

50 Re Bank of Credit and Commerce International SA (No 9) [1994] 3 All ER 764.

51 [1997] 3 All ER 724.

52 Practice Direction [1994] 4 All ER 52.

possession incriminating documents or things with a real possibility that they may destroy such material before an application could be made to the court.

27.5.1 Introduction

A further weapon in the litigator's arsenal is the search order, which entitles the successful applicant to seize property belonging to the defendant to protect evidence for any future trial. It is this legal procedure which most resembles an episode of the 1970s television programme The Sweeney, in which lawyers and hired hands appear at the defendant's premises in the early morning, brandishing copies of the court order, and proceed to impound property or, more likely, to load it onto vans to take it away to secure storage.

Typically the order will be obtained ex parte (without the defendant being aware of the hearing) to enable the applicant to exercise it before the defendant realises the risk of having property seized.⁵³ In many cases, a freezing injunction and a search order are obtained at once in respect of the same defendant and over the same property: a case of 'freeze' and 'seize'. See the following example:

Suppose that Supplier has sold electronic components to Techno Ltd under contract, taking proprietary rights in specified computers manufactured by Techno Ltd. At the relevant time, Supplier is owed £100,000. Supplier will sue Techno Ltd for payment under specific performance or breach of contract. However, Supplier may have a genuine concern that Techno Ltd is about to destroy evidence of their contract or deny that the identifiable electronic components were ever delivered to Techno Ltd by destroying them. Supplier may then seek a court order permitting it to seize electronic components used by Techno Ltd to manufacture computers to ensure that it will be able to enforce its proprietary rights over the computers. Such an order would be a search order.

The courts became worried that search orders were being granted too readily. Recent decisions have emphasised that such an order ought to be a remedy of last resort given that the impact on the respondent is potentially enormous. In Anton Piller KG v Manufacturing Processes Ltd,⁵⁴ Lord Denning MR held that such an order should be made 'only in an extreme case where there is grave danger of property being smuggled away or of vital evidence being destroyed'.

27.5.2 The requirements for grant of a search order

The core test is set out most clearly in the original case of Anton Piller KG v Manufacturing Processes Ltd by Ormrod LJ:

There are three essential pre-conditions for the making of such an order . . . First, there must be an extremely strong prima facie case. Secondly, the damage, potential or actual, must be very serious for the applicant. Thirdly, there must be clear evidence that the defendants have in their possession incriminating documents or things, and that there is 53 Universal Thermosensors Ltd v Hibben [1992] 3 All ER 257. See also Emmanuel v Emmanuel [1982] 1 WLR 669; Burgess v Burgess [1996] 2 FLR 34: injunction awarded to prevent destruction of evidence.

54 [1976] Ch 55, 61.

a real possibility that they may destroy such material before any application inter partes can be made.⁵⁵

A decision of Hoffmann J in *Lock plc v Beswick*⁵⁶ emphasised that this three-point test must still be applied but that it is not to be assumed to be the case that a person in possession of evidence will necessarily seek to destroy that evidence. In many circumstances it may be appropriate to make an interim order in the usual way, requiring delivery of that evidence to the other side's solicitors in the usual way. The search order should not be made where there is insufficient evidence to constitute a strong prima facie case.⁵⁷

27.6 INTERACTION WITH THE COMMON LAW

An injunction will not be ordered in circumstances in which damages would be sufficient remedy.

Some other issues arise peripherally to the question of obtaining an injunction. First, in what circumstances will a court decide that it would be preferable to award damages rather than an injunction; and, secondly, in what circumstances will there be difficulties in enforcing the injunction?

27.6.1 Damages in lieu of injunction

It has been considered already that an injunction will not be awarded where a common law remedy would dispose adequately of the issues between the parties. However, there is also a long-standing power in the court to award damages either in tandem with, or in place of, the equitable remedies of injunction and specific performance. Section 50 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 provides that: 'Where the Court of Appeal or the High Court has jurisdiction to entertain an application for an injunction or specific performance, it may award damages in addition to, or in substitution for, an injunction or specific performance.' Jaggard v Sawyer,⁵⁸ considered above, discussed the common law relating to this principle, which had formerly been contained in Lord Cairns' Act.⁵⁹

The common law permits awards of damages in two contexts, in the application of the statutory discretion. The first category of awarding damages is as a means of providing compensation to the applicant for the respondent's previous actions, while also granting an injunction to restrain future behaviour. The underlying concern here is that if damages were not awarded at the same time as the injunction, the applicant might be precluded from suing for damages in relation to a set of facts on which a court has already reached a conclusion. This rule against suing a second time on identical facts and issues is the res judicata rule.⁶⁰

The second category of awarding damages is in place of the grant of an injunction. As considered at para 27.1.1 above, there are four requirements which must be satisfied before

⁵⁵ Ibid, 62

⁵⁶ [1989] 1 WLR 1268.

⁵⁷ Ibid.

⁵⁸ [1995] 1 WLR 269, [1995] 2 All ER 189.

⁵⁹ Chancery Amendment Act 1858, s 2.

⁶⁰ Jaggard v Sawyer [1995] 1 WLR 269, 286, per Millett LJ.

a court will award damages instead of an injunction in circumstances where an injunction might otherwise be awarded:

- (a) the harm suffered by the applicant must have been small;
- (b) the harm suffered must be capable of being quantified in financial terms;
- (c) the harm suffered must be capable of adequate compensation by damages; and
- (d) it must have been oppressive to the respondent to have granted the injunction sought.⁶¹

Furthermore, the award of an injunction may be denied on the basis of delay or acquiescence, as considered above.

27.6.2 The measure of damages

The measure of damages is held not to be the same as under common law but rather on the basis of compensation.⁶² Therefore, in circumstances where no loss can be demonstrated by the applicant, it is possible for the applicant to recover substantial damages nevertheless on the basis of an amount necessary to compensate that applicant for loss of rights not calculable in financial terms. Clearly, the line between common law damages (based on calculable financial loss) and compensation (based on the broader context of harm caused to the applicant) is a narrow one. However, as with personal injury general damages in tort, there may be elements of harm (pain and suffering) which are recoverable as well as financial loss (such as lost earnings).

It appears that it is not necessary for a claim for damages to be pleaded by the applicant – rather, the court can make an award without such a claim being included in the statement of claim.⁶³

27.7 THE EQUITABLE DOCTRINE OF CONFIDENCE

27.7.1 Introduction

This section and the section to follow consider the legal background to a particularly significant debate in the Press at the start of the 21st century: namely, the ability of the Press to publish private details about the lives of celebrities, politicians and ordinary members of the public, and the ability of those celebrities, politicians and ordinary members of the public to use injunctions to prevent the publication of those things. The reason that this discussion is contained in the chapter on injunctions is that ultimately the equitable remedy which is most important in relation to breach of confidence is the injunction, and furthermore (for the purposes of this book on equity more generally) the law on confidence and confidential information is rooted in equitable principles. Consequently, in legal terms, what we shall be considering is the ancient equitable doctrine of confidence. It was a general equitable doctrine relating to breach of confidence which always provided a right to an injunction or to compensation in identified types of case, principally those relating to confidential commercial information, contracts restraining the use of information, and secrets between husband and wife. Indeed, much of the 19th-century case law in this area was concerned with what the judges referred to as ‘secrets’ and ‘confidences’.⁶⁴ The development of mass literacy and the Press as we know it today (let alone the internet) moved this area of the law into a new context beyond the sort of ‘secrets’ which might be overheard by servants in the grand houses of the aristocracy. The next section of this chapter will consider the comparatively recent development of the tort of misuse of private information using concepts taken from human rights law and the use of ‘super-injunctions’ by celebrities and others to protect their private lives from public scrutiny; however, this section is concerned with the general equitable doctrine, which still continues in existence in even the most recent case law.

61 Shelfer v City of London Electric Lighting Co [1895] 1 Ch 287, per AL Smith LJ.

62 Jaggard v Sawyer [1995] 1 WLR 269, [1995] 2 All ER 189; Wrotham Park v Parkside Homes [1974] 1 WLR 798.

63 Jaggard v Sawyer [1995] 1 WLR 269, [1995] 2 All ER 189, per Millett LJ.

27.7.2 The traditional equitable doctrine of breach of confidence

The ancient roots of the principle

The precise source of the equitable principles relating to the maintenance of ‘confidences’ is lost in the mists of equitable time. However, a judgment of the Lord Chancellor Sir Thomas More in the 16th century is often cited as the foundation of our understanding of the doctrine, and in particular the following idea:

Three things are apt to be helpt in Conscience: Fraud, Accident and things of confidence.⁶⁵

Therefore, even in the 16th century the protection of ‘confidences’ was a key part of equity. The reference to ‘Conscience’ here is a reference to the Courts of Equity and these dicta identify the three things which equity was particularly astute to address. The most obvious examples of confidence in equity relate to particular categories of relationship of ‘trust and confidence’. The clearest examples of relationships of trust and confidence relate to fiduciaries duties such as trusteeship. The ancient rules against trustees permitting conflicts of interest (as considered in Chapter 12, for example in *Boardman v Phipps*⁶⁶) are a clear example of the confidences which trustees were obliged to observe.⁶⁷

A neat encapsulation of how this seemingly discretionary doctrine operates in a principled way can be derived from Story’s Equity Jurisprudence, in which Judge Story suggested that while a doctrine might revolve around the discretion of the court, it is nevertheless ‘not of arbitrary or capricious discretion, dependent upon the mere pleasure of the Judge, but of that sound, and reasonable discretion, which governs itself, as far as it may, by general rules and principles’.⁶⁸ So, the seemingly open-ended idea of protecting confidences is actually circumscribed by more detailed equitable principles. One of the key cases to identify those principles is the remarkable case of Prince Albert v Strange,⁶⁹ which is considered next.

64 The word ‘confidence’ itself is derived from the Latin ‘fides’ meaning faith, and literally means having faith with another person (as suggested by the prefix ‘con-’). Similarly, the word ‘fiduciary’ is also derived from the Latin ‘fides’.

65 Quoted by Megarry J in Coco v AN Clark (Engineers) Ltd [1969] RPC 41, 46.

66 [1967] 2 AC 46.

67 See generally the discussion in section 12.5.

68 Story, Equity Jurisprudence, Vol 2, 25–6.

69 (1849) 41 ER 1171, per Lord Cottenham LC.

The roots of the equitable treatment of confidences: the principle in Prince Albert v Strange

Queen Victoria, her husband Prince Albert, her family and her intimate circle made paintings and sketches of each other, their pets and so forth, going about their private lives.⁷⁰ Those artworks were transformed into etchings and those etchings were passed to a printer for the printer to create prints from them which would be passed between members of that intimate family circle.⁷¹ Someone created copies of those prints, contrary to the wishes of the Queen and her husband, Prince Albert. It was not clear how this had been done. It seems most likely that the prints were obtained either by a member of the royal household or somehow by means of the printer who was engaged to prepare a limited number of prints from the etchings, although that question was never answered entirely satisfactorily. Significantly, it was never demonstrated nor argued conclusively that they had been taken in breach of contract.⁷² In any event, those prints were passed to the defendant, Strange, who decided to mount an exhibition of them and to charge the public to see these representations of their monarch and her family relaxing at home. Strange also produced a catalogue of the prints, which he proposed to sell: this is important because it is the catalogue which becomes the centre of the case. In essence, Prince Albert wanted to stop all of this. So, a claim was brought by Prince Albert seeking an injunction against the publication of the catalogue which reproduced the etchings; it was not even an issue before the court that the exhibition could not go ahead as planned. The basis on which the injunction was sought was that this would be a publication of confidential information. As Lord Cottenham noted, this case turned on a question of privacy: and that is how his Lordship's decision has been interpreted in many cases latterly.⁷³

It was accepted by the defendant before the hearing of the action before the House of Lords that he could not exhibit the etchings, and therefore the injunction imposed at first instance was not objected to on those grounds. Instead, the issue before the House of Lords focused more specifically on the defendant's right to publish and sell the catalogue which described those etchings.⁷⁴ The subject matter of the decision of the House of Lords was therefore not about the treatment of etchings which were stolen physically from the Royal household and then exploited commercially; instead, the subject matter of that decision was whether or not the dissemination of a catalogue which merely described those etchings could have been enjoined by the court. Ironically, of course, by describing the etchings (albeit 70 No information is given as to the intrinsic artistic merits of these items, of course, but I shall refer to them as 'the artworks' in the text for ease of reference. If I were to produce pictures of my family at home then my principal concern would be embarrassment as the quality of my draughtsmanship. In the modern world, I suppose, we would be more likely to take digital photographs and 'put them' on Facebook; or, in the case of the modern Royal family, appoint an official photographer to distribute them to the Press. How times have changed.

71 Prince Albert was well-known for having brought this Gemächlichkeit culture to the British Royal family from Germany, with its emphasis on Romantic music, literature and art.

72 That is, if the printer had taken them then that might have been a breach of contract; or it might similarly have been a breach of contract if it had been someone in the Royal household. However, these etchings might have been purloined by a third party without any contractual link to the esteemed creators of these etchings. Significantly, as becomes clear in the text, this case was decided on the basis of privacy in any event by Lord Cottenham.

73 Argyll v Argyll [1967] Ch 302; Stephens v Avery [1988] Ch 449.

74 As Lord Cottenham held: 'The only question I have to decide is, whether, this right being so established and admitted, the defendant is to be permitted to publish the catalogue in question.'

briefly) in the report of the case, much of the same material is being made publicly available through the good offices of the law reporters.⁷⁵

The House of Lords found unanimously, as expressed in the speech of Lord Cottenham, the Lord Chancellor, that an injunction should be granted so as to prevent publication of the catalogue. However, the precise ratio of the judgment is more difficult to identify. In truth, one will search in vain for a clear encapsulation of Lord Chancellor Cottenham's point in the judgment itself.⁷⁶ Lord Cottenham saw the question as to the propriety of awarding an injunction to restrain publication and circulation of the catalogue in the interests of privacy as falling into two parts: first, on the basis of a property right to the etchings which were described in the catalogue (but without identifying their owners on the facts of this case); and then, secondly, on a more general basis that an injunction should be available in equity to enjoin dealings with confidential information where that was done in 'breach of trust, confidence, or contract'. It is this second branch of the judgment which is most commonly cited in subsequent cases as constituting three grounds for the award of an injunction in this context, although the idea appears in Lord Cottenham's judgment without careful analysis or explanation. In truth, the inevitability of the claimant being successful is suggested by the opening words of Lord Cottenham's judgment where his Lordship held that:

The importance which has been attached to this case arises entirely from the exalted station of the Plaintiff, and cannot be referred to any difficulty in the case itself.⁷⁷

In other words, the niceties of the jurisprudence rank second behind the need to find for this very important individual.

It has been held in the Court of Appeal in *Imerman v Tchenguiz*⁷⁸ by Lord Neuberger latterly that this decision was predicated on Prince Albert being the owner of the materials (both at common law and in relation to their intellectual property rights which include the right to make copies of them) which were transformed into the etchings, and in consequence that this right to confidentiality therefore turned on a property right. Importantly, however, when one looks closely at the facts of Prince Albert v Strange, the creators of the artworks are the Queen and other members of the family: therefore, Prince Albert was not the owner

75 This difficulty of reporting cases without giving away too much private information remains an issue today in relation to super-injunctions, as considered below. Presumably in 1849 it was not thought likely that many people would have access to the report of this decision. Interestingly, though, there do not appear to have been any reporting restrictions imposed in this case, other than Lord Cottenham's own delicacy in relation to the information which he was prepared to relate in his judgment. Indeed, it is from the arguments of counsel that most of the facts emerge in this report.

76 Much of the discussion is couched in terms of property rights in the etchings themselves, even though his Lordship never took the point that the particular plaintiff here (in the person of Prince Albert) had no property rights in some at least of the etchings. Nor did Lord Cottenham distinguish between different creators of different etchings. Nor did Lord Cottenham take the point (except possibly obliquely in argument, according to the elliptical report of the argument) that the catalogue would have described some etchings belonging to the plaintiff personally and therefore that the catalogue would necessarily have described his own etchings as well as those belonging to his wife.

77 In truth, it is a poorly constructed judgment in many ways and is clearly influenced by the fact that the House of Lords would always have found for the Royal family in any event. The case revolves around an enraged husband, Prince Albert, seeking to protect his family. In consequence, the rationale for the judgment would have been less important in 1849 than the inevitability of the claimant's success.

78 [2011] 2 WLR 592.

of the intellectual property rights in all of the artworks. Rather, this principle should be understood as resting on a traditional equitable concept of preventing an unconscionable breach of another's confidence. Here, the idea of a confidence is not limited to its colloquial meaning of a secret which is told to you confidentially by the person who would be harmed by its misuse, but rather an interference with the confidential or private information relating to any person whether they know you have access to it or not. If this were not the appropriate meaning of the term 'confidence' in this context then thieves would not be prevented from stealing secrets without the claimant's knowledge. The sort of information which is covered by this idea of confidential information includes commercial secrets⁷⁹ and intellectual property as well as personal or intimate information relating to an individual.

If we pause for a moment, in the Victorian era, long before British royalty decided to become 'the Royal Family' and thus to open themselves up to publicity and press coverage of their every movement,⁸⁰ it would have been completely unacceptable for the general populace to be allowed to gawp at pictures of their betters sitting at home. Consequently, the outcome of Prince Albert v Strange was never in doubt. What is of interest is the way in which those principles were explained. Two points of fact are important to isolate at the start. First, it was not proved that Prince Albert, who was the plaintiff, had been the creator of all of these etchings. Indeed, it was contended by the defence (and not disproved or even contested in argument) that many of the etchings had been produced by other people, including the Queen herself. Therefore, Prince Albert was not the owner of those etchings. Second, it is not suggested that there was anything sexual, obscene or similarly embarrassing about these etchings. Far from it. They seem (although the judges are, of course, far too delicate to describe any of the etchings in detail) to be entirely innocent representations of royalty at home. The issue relates to the essentially private nature of this material, which is possibly mixed with the idea that even to consider the idea of royalty playing the piano or sitting reading a book or playing with a pet dog would be remarkable. While to a modern ear all of this talk of the private lives of royalty hints at something salacious, undoubtedly the mundane truth is that those etchings will have presented the blameless domesticity of the monarch, her consort, her family circle and her pets relaxing in their private apartments. And that was precisely what was considered to have been private about them. To a modern ear, it could not have been remarkable to learn that the monarch had pets – indeed our Queen is well known for keeping corgis – but at the time even the publication of that tit-bit of information, seemingly the subject of one of the artworks, would have been an invasion of privacy.

While Prince Albert v Strange is often taken as being the source of the law on confidence, Lord Cottenham cited many of the earlier authorities which also dealt with the concept, not least the judgment of Lord Eldon and decisions such as the Duke of Queensbury v Shebbeare.⁸¹ Relying on Tipping v Clarke,⁸² Lord Cottenham drew an analogy with clerks in a counting house being under an implied contract not to make public any information 79 This can include logistical information held by a supermarket as to how it manages to distribute its stock efficiently, something which is at the very heart of a supermarket's profitability by controlling its cost base and maximising its ability to meet customer demand quickly: Marks & Spencer v Freshfield Bruckhaus Deringer [2004] EWHC 1135 (Comm), [2004] 3 All ER 773.

80 Some would say this began an inevitable decline in the way in which royalty in Britain would be perceived by the public.

81 (1758) 2 Eden 329.

82 4 Burr 2379.

which they obtain during the performance of their duties. It is left to us to assume that what this survey of the cases means is that somebody somewhere (either in the Royal household or at the printers or somewhere in-between) breached an express or implied contractual duty or breached their confidential obligations to the Royal family. The niceties of demonstrating exactly what sort of obligation was breached, by whom, how and when are overlooked.

If this area of law were based on property rights, then that would mean that photographs taken by third parties at a distance of somebody engaging in a private act would constitute a criminal offence but would not give a right to an injunction or damages for someone who was not the owner of the photograph. That the law on confidence is drawn more broadly so as to relate to ‘breach of trust, confidence and contract’ makes it better suited to dealing with the modern age. When property rights are interfered with, then that should constitute a right to a proprietary remedy and/or to an injunction and/or to compensation or damages. That it is a general equitable principle based on conscience makes it more adaptable to modern circumstances. The maturity of that equitable principle, and its roots in ideas of conscience, are considered in the next section.

The development of the equity of confidence: a single doctrine or a number of doctrines?

The obsession with privacy and with confidentiality is a modern one. The old textbooks on equity devoted little time to ‘confidence’ among all of the other equitable doctrines and remedies which abounded at the time. The principles did exist, but they were not as important as they appear today in our media age, where everyone with a computer and a broadband connection can become a ‘citizen journalist’. So, for example, Judge Story in his excellent Equity Jurisprudence, published originally in 1839, gave only one paragraph to injunctions which are used to ‘restrain the party from making a disclosure of secrets communicated to him in the course of a confidential employment’.⁸³ Ashburner in his Principles of Equity, which was published originally in 1903, devoted a mere two pages⁸⁴ to the prevention of breaches of confidence under the headings of: ‘protection of unpublished manuscripts’, which are described as the earliest forms of action in equity to restrain breaches of confidence;⁸⁵ ‘private letters’;⁸⁶ and ‘lectures delivered without notes’.⁸⁷ Ashburner was very clear that this doctrine was not a proprietary doctrine, such that there was no requirement that the confidential information in question be shown to have been the property of the plaintiff.⁸⁸

It is misleading to base the jurisdiction, as is often done even now, upon the protection of a common law rights of property in the author of an unpublished manuscript. The 83 Story, 1839, 621.

84 In all honesty, it was only in the seventh edition of this book that an extended discussion of this doctrine was presented, having previously been limited to the approach of the cases on constructive trusts to confidential information (in Chapter 12) and the trustees’ obligations in relation to information (in Chapter 8).

85 Webb v Rose (1732), cited in 4 Burr 2330; Duke of Queensbury v Shebbeare (1758) 2 Eden 329.

86 A staple of Sherlock Holmes stories (for example, ‘The Adventure of Charles Augustus Milverton’ in A Conan Doyle, The Return of Sherlock Holmes, first published in 1904) and much Victorian fiction, where these purloined letters were used for purposes of blackmail. Even youthful expressions of love in a letter could be used at the time to blackmail a woman when she was about to marry. See for example Gee v Prichard (1818) 2 Sw 402, per Lord Eldon.

87 Abernethy v Hutchinson (1825) 3 LJ Ch 209.

88 Browne, Ashburner’s Principles of Equity, 2nd edn, Butterworth & Co, 1933, 373.

right has never been recognised or protected but by proceedings in equity. . . . And it is obvious that property in these cases is something quite different from property in tangible things. An injunction may be granted although the manuscript wrongfully reproduced is safe in the author's desk, or although it belongs (as in the case of a letter) to the person restrained, or although there is no manuscript in existence.

Therefore, this is an equitable doctrine which exists 'at large' rather than in support of a specific property right. Much more recently, the judgment of Lord Neuberger MR in the Court of Appeal in *Imerman v Tchenguiz*⁸⁹ has re-emphasised the distinction between equity and the common law in cases of confidence. The development of a tort of misuse of private information, based both on Art 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) and on principles of tort law (considered in the next section of this chapter), are distinct from the equitable doctrine of confidence. Lord Neuberger was very clear that that distinction remains in effect.⁹⁰ In Imerman v Tchenguiz, prior to divorce proceedings beginning in earnest, a wife's brothers accessed her husband's confidential computer files held on a computer server which her husband used as part of a business in common with her brothers. The information held on the files which the brothers accessed may well have been information which would have been disclosed at the discovery stage in divorce proceedings, but nevertheless those files were held to constitute the husband's confidential information. Moreover, he was not required to identify documents which would be considered confidential to him: instead, his rights of confidence simply existed at large. Importantly, while the case could have proceeded on the basis that those files were in some way the property of the husband and that it was his property which had been interfered with, the Court of Appeal nevertheless focused on the general jurisdiction of equity to grant injunctions in cases in which a person's confidential information was at risk.

It is difficult to know whether the law on confidence should be understood as proceeding in relation to a general principle or whether it should be understood as proceeding on the basis of analogies with the distinct categories already established in the cases. One example of a clear category which has arisen in the cases is that of confidences between husband and wife.⁹¹ So, perhaps most famously, the decision of Ungood-Thomas J in *Duchess of Argyll v Duke of Argyll*⁹² dealt with newspaper stories which had been fed by the Duke of Argyll to The People newspaper which disclosed confidential information about his own wife. Indeed, these tabloid revelations – to the limited extent they are explained in the law reports – related to confidences which had passed between husband and wife. (By modern standards these particular allegations appear to be thin gruel: he made allegations about her attitudes to sexual fidelity in marriage, and she made counter-allegations about his drug use and his financial situation.)⁹³ His Lordship held that it was a part of the equitable jurisdiction to

89 [2011] 2 WLR 592.

90 Applying dicta of Lord Phillips MR in Douglas v Hello! Ltd (No 3) [2006] QB 125, [96]. See also White v Withers LLP [2009] 1 FLR 383, Eady J.

91 See more recently Hirschfield v McGrath [2011] EWHC 249 (QB), Tugendhat J.

92 [1967] Ch 302.

93 The truth is that the Duchess is reputed to have led a particularly salacious lifestyle, even by modern standards. She was the subject of a flattering line in the libretto of a popular musical comedy of her day, written by a very famous novelist whose work is still in print; and was reputedly the woman involved in a particularly infamous sex scandal in the 1960s (which became a staple of the Sunday newspapers for a while) for which a very award injunctions in these categories of case, and thus it was not any part of a common law doctrine of tort.⁹⁴

Interestingly, then, one specific context in which confidences were considered to be particularly important were in relation to marriage. The principle in cases of husband and wife is one of ‘preserving the confidence of the conjugal relation’. It is clear that this is an equitable doctrine, which is necessarily subject to all of the usual doctrines of equity. So, it was held that:

A person coming to Equity for relief – and this is equitable relief which the plaintiff seeks – must come with clean hands; but the cleanliness required is to be judged in relation to the relief that is sought.⁹⁵

As to the distinction between a proprietary basis for law on confidence and a truly personal basis of that law, his Lordship held as follows:

Injury to property can be far less serious than other forms of injury such as, for example, injury to reputation, and I see no rational ground whatsoever in distinguishing between injury to property and other forms of injury, nor was any suggested.⁹⁶

Therefore, the basis of equitable relief in relation to cases of confidence is not necessarily proprietary. Instead the relief may be based on protecting a person’s reputation.

The open-textured nature of the equitable doctrine of confidence

As will have become apparent through the course of this book, there are two types of lawyer in the world: those who demand certainty, order and taxonomy from their law, and those who prefer to apply general, high-level principles to each particular factual circumstance. A ‘taxonomy’ is a way of ordering material which is common among scientists, particularly biologists, who organise all living things into species, genus, families and so forth so as to identify common or distinct characteristics of various animals, plants and so on. There is a certain type of lawyer who demands that law should be organised by reference to this sort of order.⁹⁷ However, as is well known, there is another species of scientist, in particular the theoretical physicist, who recognises that in many instances it is impossible to produce tidy taxonomies because too many phenomena are inexplicable or unpredictable. As the theoretical physicists’ theory of Schrödinger’s cat demonstrates, it is not even possible to know well-known judge was deputed to organise an inquiry to find out the identities of the people involved. Rather than tell you all of this information, I will give you the pleasure of an internet-based quiz to identify: (a) the author of the libretto; (b) the musical comedy in which the line appears; (c) the nickname given to the unknown man participating in that scandal; and (d) the identity of the judge who led the inquiry. All of the information you need to begin the search is contained in the law report of the case.

94 Interestingly, the authors of Meagher, Gummow and Lehane’s Equity: Doctrines and Remedies consider that the first two decisions of the English Court of Appeal which deal plainly and exclusively with an equitable duty of confidence are as recent as the 1960s: Saltman Engineering Co Ltd v Campbell Engineering Co Ltd (1948) 65 RPC 203 and Seager v Copydex Ltd (1967) RPC 349, [1967] 2 All ER 415.

95 [1967] Ch 302, 332.

96 [1967] Ch 302, 344.

97 See Birks and Chambers, 1997 for an example.

whether a cat is alive or dead or both at any given moment, let alone how black holes operate. Therefore, there will be situations in which all one can do is to understand the ‘high-level principles’ by which one operates – such as: one must act in good conscience, one must not cause harm to others, and so forth – and then (legally speaking) develop a jurisprudence which makes clear how those principles operate in some circumstances.

That the equitable doctrine of confidence is still understood as operating by reference to a high-level principle of good conscience is demonstrated by Brooke LJ, who held the following in Douglas v Hello! Ltd:⁹⁸

For a very long time the judges of the Court of Chancery exercised an equitable jurisdiction to restrain freedom of speech in circumstances in which it would be unconscionable to publish private material. If information is accepted on the basis that it will be kept secret, the recipient’s conscience is bound by that confidence, and it will be unconscionable for him to break his duty of confidence by publishing the information to others.

Here, the doctrine is clearly based on the idea that it is the confidentiality and the secrecy of the information, and the defendant’s awareness of that, which bind that person’s conscience so as to invoke the equitable doctrine of confidence and an injunction to prevent publication. Similarly, it is suggested, any profits taken in such a situation should be held on constructive trust due to this combination of a breach of conscience and knowledge of that fact in the circumstances.

27.7.3 The modern equitable doctrine of confidence

The central principles

The core of the equitable doctrine of confidence is, in reality, a concern to seek injunctions to prevent the disclosure of confidential information in the majority of cases. In other cases, the injured party may seek compensation for a confidence which has been broken. Most of the cases in this area relate to confidential information. The clearest exposition of those principles arose in *Coco v AN Clark (Engineering) Ltd*⁹⁹ in which Megarry J held as follows:

In my judgment, three elements are normally required if, apart from contract, a case of breach of confidence is to succeed. First, the information itself, in the words of Lord Greene, MR in the Saltman case on page 215,¹⁰⁰ must ‘have the necessary quality of confidence about it’. Secondly, that information must have been imparted in circumstances importing an obligation of confidence. Thirdly, there must be an unauthorised use of that information to the detriment of the party communicating it.

Therefore, there are three requirements: that the information must be confidential information; that the circumstances in which that information was passed to the defendant should ⁹⁸ [2001] QB 967, at [65].

⁹⁹ [1969] RPC 41, at 47.

¹⁰⁰ Saltman Engineering Co Ltd v Campbell Engineering Co Ltd (1948) 65 RPC 203. His Lordship also relied on Terrapin Ltd v Builders’ Supply Co (Hayes) Ltd [1960] RPC 128 and Seager v Copydex Ltd [1967] 1 WLR 923, [1967] RPC 349.

have suggested that it was confidential; and that the use of the information must have been unauthorised. This demonstrates Megarry J in his common role of identifying with as much clarity as possible the principles on which an equitable doctrine should operate, as opposed to leaving a doctrine like that of confidence in its open-textured state¹⁰¹ operating by reference to a general principle of good conscience and of preventing confidences being breached in general terms.

However, Megarry J also made further delineations in the topic. He divided between marital and commercial situations, and between contractual and non-contractual cases.¹⁰² Where there is a contract between the parties which requires that a confidence be maintained then the terms of that confidence are as set out by the contract; whereas if there is no contract then the parties are thrown back on the general law to define their relationship. What is special about marital situations is that a special relationship of trust and confidence is thought to exist between husband and wife. This has a lot to do with the essentially private nature of what goes on within a marriage that is not open to the public gaze, although there is no reason (it is suggested) for that to be limited only to married couples.¹⁰³

When is information 'confidential'?

As will be apparent from the discussion so far, for a pragmatic equity specialist like Megarry J – that is, one who needs to see principle and not simply open-ended discretion before giving effect to an equitable doctrine – the doctrine of confidence was a little open-ended about its detail. As Megarry J put it: ‘From the authorities cited to me, I have not been able to derive any very precise idea of what test is to be applied in determining whether the circumstances import an obligation of confidence.’¹⁰⁴ Indeed, the judgment of Megarry J is generally taken by intellectual property law specialists as the starting point for identifying when confidential information is to be treated as intellectual property deserving of protection precisely because his Lordship sought to introduce some more rigid principles here.

So, in the opinion of Megarry J, when considering confidential information, there needs to be something about it which transforms it from being mere tittle-tattle into having that quality of being unknown to the outside world and thus intrinsically valuable in commercial terms to become an item of property. Clearly, this is only a commercial understanding of what will constitute information as property, whereas the equitable doctrine of confidentiality applies to non-commercial information too. Megarry J conceived of the line between confidential and non-confidential information in the following terms:

... the information must be of a confidential nature. As Lord Greene said in the Saltman case at page 215, ‘something which is public property and public knowledge’ cannot per se provide any foundation for proceedings for breach of confidence. However confidential the circumstances of communication, there can be no breach of confidence in revealing to others something which is already common knowledge. But this must not be taken too far. Something that has been constructed solely from materials in the public 101 That is to say, not bound by rigid rules but rather operating by reference only to general, high-level principles such as good conscience.

102 All on [1969] RPC 41, at 46 and 47.

103 See, for example, the discussion of Argyll v Argyll [1967] Ch 302 immediately above.

104 [1969] RPC 41, at 48.

domain may possess the necessary quality of confidentiality: for something new and confidential may have been brought into being by the application of the skill and ingenuity of the human brain.

These general principles, of course, give us little practical guidance; although the concept behind equitable doctrines of this sort is that the court has great latitude to act in applying general principles to the facts in front of it. In Coco v Clark, the case concerned a design for an engine for a moped which the claimants sought to protect by means of an interim injunction against the defendants. The question was whether or not there was confidential information in relation to this engine which was at risk without an interim injunction being awarded. His Lordship used the ‘officious bystander’ test as a yardstick here to the effect that, when considering whether or not the context in which the information was passed to the defendant was confidential, one should consider whether or not the parties would have responded to the officious bystander’s question ‘Is this confidential?’ with a testy ‘Of course’.¹⁰⁵ Thus, in commercial situations, the context in which the parties are interacting will be considered to be important in deciding whether or not the information is confidential, and not simply the nature of the information itself. On the facts, it was held that the information was not of a sufficiently confidential nature.

27.7.4 Contexts in which confidential information has already been considered in this book

There are two contexts in which confidential information has already been considered in this book: in relation to constructive trusts over unauthorised profits and in relation to Chinese walls.

Constructive trusts and confidential information

When confidential information is taken to constitute a trust fund, for example, then misuse of that confidential information will lead to any unauthorised profits being taken from the use of that information by a fiduciary being held on constructive trust by that fiduciary.¹⁰⁶ This idea was considered in detail in Chapter 12.

Chinese walls and confidential information

The other principal context in which confidential information has been considered to give rise to rights in equity is in relation to Chinese walls. The most significant context in which Chinese walls have arisen in the cases is in relation to a single firm of solicitors or accountants representing both sides to a dispute and mismanaging confidential information so that it passed internally, to the detriment of one of their clients. The Chinese wall refers to the arrangement which that firm would put in place to attempt to maintain the confidentiality of all information held during the dispute. As Lord Millett held in Bolkiah v KPMG,¹⁰⁷ the duty on the firm to maintain that confidentiality is an absolute duty – such that any breach of ¹⁰⁵ Ibid, at 50.

¹⁰⁶ Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46.

¹⁰⁷ [1999] 2 AC 222.

confidentiality is actionable in equity, no matter what the circumstances – and not merely a duty to do their best to maintain it.

The trustees' obligation in relation to confidential information

In Chapter 8, the case law on the trustees' general lack of obligation to disclose confidential information about the operation of the trust even to the beneficiaries was considered. Information which is considered to relate to only one part of the trust, and not to others, need not be disclosed to beneficiaries with an interest only in that other part of the fund.¹⁰⁸ In general terms, where the confidential information in question is itself the property of the trust, then the trustee is obliged to maintain and safeguard it just as she would be obliged to maintain any other part of the trust fund, on pain of liability for breach of trust.

27.7.5 Equity, confidence and the development of a law of privacy

The remainder of this chapter is concerned with the development of a law of privacy from a combination of these equitable principles and the new human rights law which was created by the Human Rights Act 1998 in the UK. This section considers how the roots of the law of privacy have been identified by the highest courts in the equitable principle of confidence and good conscience, and how human rights law has come to displace those concepts in the separate branch of law that relates to the 'tort of misuse of private information' which is the most visible part of privacy law today. Nevertheless, the equitable principle of confidence continues in existence, and the equitable principles relating to injunctions are considered below too.

The modern equitable principle of confidence is based on conscience

Much of the debate relating to the law of privacy has been concerned with the development of a tort of 'misuse of private information',¹⁰⁹ but as this chapter has made clear there has always been a part of equity which has been concerned with the protection of 'confidences'. This equitable principle is applied by the law of injunctions as everything from private family photographs to secret commercial processes have been protected against the effects of publication. The doctrine of breach of confidence has a long pedigree in equity. As it was summarised by Lord Hoffmann in Campbell v MGN Ltd:¹¹⁰

Breach of confidence was an equitable remedy and equity traditionally fastens on the conscience of one party to enforce equitable duties which arise out of his relationship with the other.

The precise juristic nature of this area of the law has always been difficult to identify, it is suggested, because it was predicated ultimately on a general equitable principle of conscientiousness, as Lord Hoffmann identified, but earlier judges such as Megarry J in Coco v A N

108 Re Londonderry [1965] Ch 918. See also the important judgment of Briggs J in Breakspear v Ackland [2008] 3 WLR 698.

109 As it was described by Lord Nicholls in Campbell v MGN [2004] 2 AC 457, at [13]–[14].

110 [2004] 2 AC 457, 471, at [44].

*Clark (Engineers) Ltd*¹¹¹ were determined to generate more concrete principles. In truth, the equitable doctrine of confidence was necessarily a fluid one, just like the equitable principles on injunctions more generally. The different strains of authority and the different shades of principle which gave rise to this area of equity were identified by Sir George Turner VC in *Morison v Moat*¹¹² in the following terms:

That the court has exercised jurisdiction in cases of this nature does not, I think, admit of any question. Different grounds have indeed been assigned for the exercise of that jurisdiction. In some cases it has been referred to as property, and others to contract, and in others, again, as founded upon trust or confidence, meaning, as I conceive, that the court fastens the obligation upon the conscience of the party, and enforces it against him in the same manner as it enforces against a party to whom a benefit is given the obligation of performing a promise on the face of which the benefit has been conferred; but, upon what other grounds this jurisdiction is founded, the authorities have no doubt as to the exercise of it.

On that basis, the jurisdiction should be understood as being founded on a general equitable principle. In consequence, confidential information in the circumstances may be property or it may not, but that will not affect the power of the court to award an injunction or not as the circumstances require. As Lord Neuberger held in Imerman v Tchenguiz:¹¹³

A claim based on confidentiality is an equitable claim. Accordingly, the normal equitable rules apply. Thus, while one would normally expect a court to grant the types of relief we have been discussing, it would have a discretion whether to refuse some or all such relief on familiar equitable principles. Equally, the precise nature of the relief which would be granted must depend on all aspects of the particular case: equity fashions the appropriate relief to fit the rights of the parties, the facts of the case, and, at least sometimes, the wider merits. But, as we have noted, whether confidential information has been passed by the defendants to a third party, the claimant's rights will prevail as against the third party, unless he was a bona fide purchaser of the information without notice of its confidential nature.

In summary then, the law on confidence is subject to general equitable principles (meaning discretion as to whether to award an injunction where there has been delay, or where the claimants has come with clean hands, and so forth). What the courts have done ever since the decision of the House of Lords in *Prince Albert v Strange*¹¹⁴ is to recognise that injunctions and other equitable relief may be awarded without the need to identify that the confidential information in question is property. As Lord Cottenham held, it is sufficient that there has been some breach of trust, breach of confidence, or breach of contract to find a claim based on confidence. Therefore, the question remains at large in what circumstances confidential information should be treated as being property as opposed to simply entitling the claimants to equitable relief or to claim damages at common law.

111 [1969] RPC 41, 47–8.

112 (1851) 9 Hare 241, 255.

113 [2011] 2 WLR 592, [74].

114 (1849) 41 ER 1171.

27.7.6 The modern principle of breach of confidence giving way to the tort of misuse of private information

The traditional equitable doctrine of confidence has given way, in many contexts, to a newly developing ‘tort of misuse of private information’¹¹⁵ (which is often referred to simply as a ‘tort of privacy’) which is based on principles of human rights law more than on principles of confidence. The clearest explanation of the development of this area of the law is that set out by Lord Nicholls in typically clear fashion in the House of Lords in Campbell v MGN Ltd in the following terms:

The common law or, more precisely, courts of equity have long afforded protection to the wrongful use of private information by means of the cause of action which became known as breach of confidence. A breach of confidence was restrained as a form of unconscionable conduct, akin to a breach of trust. Today this nomenclature is misleading. The breach of confidence label harks back to the time when the cause of action was based on improper use of information disclosed by one person to another in confidence. To attract protection the information had to be of a confidential nature. But the gist of the cause of action was that information of this character had been disclosed by one person to another in circumstances ‘importing an obligation of confidence’ even though no contract of non-disclosure existed: see the classic exposition by Megarry J in Coco v A N Clark (Engineers) Ltd.¹¹⁶ The confidence referred to in the phrase ‘breach of confidence’ was the confidence arising out of a confidential relationship.

This cause of action has now firmly shaken off the limiting constraint of the need for an initial confidential relationship. In doing so it has changed its nature. In this country this development was recognised clearly in the judgment of Lord Goff of Chieveley in Attorney General v Guardian Newspapers Ltd (No 2).¹¹⁷ Now the law imposes a ‘duty of confidence’ whenever a person receives information he knows or ought to know is fairly and reasonably to be regarded as confidential. Even this formulation is awkward. The continuing use of the phrase ‘duty of confidence’ and the description of the information as ‘confidential’ is not altogether comfortable. Information about an individual’s private life would not, in ordinary usage, be called ‘confidential’. The more natural description today is that such information is private. The essence of the tort is better encapsulated now as misuse of private information.¹¹⁸

However, it is suggested that this does not dispose of the equitable doctrine of confidence. Rather, the tort of privacy relates only to actions for injunctions and for damages in relation to private information of this sort. The traditional equitable doctrine will continue to operate outside the scope of that tort. So, in the judgment of Lord Neuberger MR in the Court of Appeal in *Imerman v Tchenguiz*¹¹⁹ his Lordship underlined the continuing distinction between equity and the common law in cases of confidence. The development of a right to privacy based both on Art 8 of the ECHR and on a tort of privacy are historically distinct

115 As it was described by Lord Nicholls in Campbell v MGN [2004] 2 AC 457, at [13]–[14].

116 [1969] RPC 41, 47–8.

117 [1990] 1 AC 109, 281.

118 Campbell v MGN [2004] 2 AC 457, at [13]–[14].

119 [2011] 2 WLR 592.

from the equitable jurisdiction in relation to claims predicated on confidence, and Lord Neuberger was very clear that that distinction remains in effect.¹²⁰ (This case was considered above.) Equally important, as considered above, the equitable doctrine of confidence relates to non-proprietary claims as well as to proprietary claims. What is clear, however, is that in recent litigation concerning super-injunctions (as considered below in detail) it is the tort of privacy in alliance with human rights law which has become the focus for the protection of confidences at the beginning of the 21st century.

27.8 SUPER-INJUNCTIONS AND THE TORT OF MISUSE OF PRIVATE INFORMATION

27.8.1 Introduction¹²¹

This section is a sequel to the previous section on the ‘Equitable Doctrine of Confidence’. This section traces the development of the ‘tort of misuse of private information’ and the concomitant development of so-called ‘super-injunctions’ to prevent misuse of private information. (The emergence of the tort from the equitable doctrine was explained, in a passage quoted from Lord Nicholls in *Campbell v MGN Ltd*¹²² set out immediately above.) The tort has developed from the equitable principle of confidence and from the general principles relating to interim injunctions (considered earlier in this chapter), which have been adapted for use as ‘super-injunctions’. This section considers those principles, and thus returns our discussion to the principles governing the award of interim injunctions which were considered earlier in this chapter, albeit principally in the context of the prevention of the publication of information (primarily by the newspapers and other media). This section relates to equity in that the law considered here builds on the equitable principles relating to interim injunctions and demonstrates a development of the law of privacy which began with the equitable principle of confidence.

However, because this topic is likely to generate lively debate in the seminar room, and because so much of the public debate around so-called super-injunctions has been carried on in (possibly wilful) ignorance of the true, legal position surrounding super-injunctions, we shall begin with an overview of the public debate about ‘super-injunctions’, ‘hyper-injunctions’ and ‘anonymised injunctions’, before turning to consider the legal principles in detail. The internet abounds with commentary and argument about press freedom, freedom of speech, the super-injunctions issue specifically, and of course the lives of celebrities. This introduction to the public debate is not intended to be anything more than a taster plate of some of the issues, before we turn to the legal principles for the award of injunctions in this context.

120 Applying dicta of Lord Phillips MR in Douglas v Hello! Ltd (No 3)[2006] QB 125, [96]. See also White v Withers LLP [2009] 1 FLR 383, Eady J.

121 This new section has been added to this book because it became clear to me than many university courses were exploring newsworthy aspects of the law on interim injunctions – in particular ‘super-injunctions’ – even though these issues are more closely related to the law of tort and the law of human rights than traditional equitable concepts, as is explained in the text by reference to the speech of Lord Nicholls in Campbell v MGN set out immediately above in the text.

122 [2004] 2 AC 457, at [13]–[14].

Definition of terms: 'super-injunction' and 'anonymised injunction'

The term 'super-injunction' has been bandied around in the Press so as to cover a number of different legal devices. From a lawyer's perspective, it is important to distinguish between a 'super-injunction' and an 'anonymised injunction', and other forms of injunction. The Report of the Committee on Super-Injunctions defines a super-injunction as being:

an interim injunction which restrains a person from:

- (i) publishing information which concerns the applicant and is said to be confidential or private; and,
- (ii) publicising or informing others of the existence of the order and the proceedings (the 'super' element of the order).

By contrast, an anonymised injunction is defined as being:

an interim injunction which restrains a person from publishing information which concerns the applicant and is said to be confidential or private where the names of either or both of the parties to the proceedings are not stated.

As is considered in the text to follow, it is not unusual to have anonymised proceedings in criminal and in family law matters. Similarly, the principles governing interim injunctions generally apply to super-injunctions with the addition of certain principles considered below. It is in relation to the area of privacy in particular that super-injunctions have acquired their own peculiar lustre.

The public debate about 'super-injunctions'

The law on injunctions became front-page news in 2010 and 2011 as part of a media storm about the media's own treatment of the privacy of celebrities and ordinary civilians.¹²³ This furore gave rise to the 'Leveson Inquiry into the Culture, Practice and Ethics of the Press', chaired by Leveson LJ,¹²⁴ which was created in large part as a response to invasions into the private lives of celebrities and civilians by the tabloid press and others. Nevertheless, a legal technique which began to attract particular importance in this debate was the so-called 'super-injunction'. In essence, a 'super-injunction' is an injunction which not only prevents 123 I use the word 'civilians' to refer to non-celebrities who have been unwittingly caught up in the war between the media (in particular the tabloid press) and the celebrities on whose misery they feed. A short documentary film by Adam Curtis (shown as part of BBC4's Charlie Brooker's 2011 Wipe, transmitted on 30 December 2011) is very interesting about the way in which the tabloid press sought to undercut the Establishment in Britain both by writing about the Royal Family as an ordinary family (and not the sort of revered royalty whose private pastimes were at issue in Prince Albert v Strange, considered above) and also by elevating celebrities to a remarkable status. The treatment of celebrities as being flawed individuals is then fed back to the readership as a pabulum of 'current affairs' (pun intended) in the 'public interest'.

124 The inquiry website can be found at www.levesoninquiry.org.uk. This inquiry in itself generated litigation as to the ability of witnesses to give evidence to it, to the effect that journalists would be permitted to give evidence to the inquiry anonymously so as to avoid suffering 'career blight' (on the grounds that it was an inquiry and not a criminal trial so that different questions of natural justice arose): R (ex p Associated Newspapers Ltd) v The Rt Hon Lord Justice Leveson [2012] EWHC 57 (Admin).

the media from reporting the detail of any legal proceedings but also prevents the media from reporting the very existence of the injunction itself. Furthermore, these injunctions are often reinforced by an order that the parties are only allowed to be referred to in the court lists by anonymous names (usually in the form of three entirely random initials). As the media presented these injunctions, they were straightforwardly an infringement of the freedom of the press to print news, and therefore they were presented as infringements of freedom of speech contrary to Art 10 of the ECHR. In truth, these sorts of injunctions are common in family law and criminal law proceedings; but in relation to the debate about the privacy of celebrities and of civilians whose lives had become a short-term enthusiasm for the Press, they were treated as though they were a novel incursion into the right of Press to write about (and publish photographs of) whatever it chooses. The subjects of this new coverage argued that their right to privacy under Art 8 of the ECHR would be infringed without injunctions to protect both their privacy and thus private, confidential information about them.

The ways in which super-injunctions have been circumvented in practice (although not in law) have involved the disclosure of the identity of the parties involved in such injunctions on websites, via Twitter, or in Parliament in reliance on the principle of Parliamentary privilege. It was said, as discussed below, that there were even attempts to bring ‘hyper-injunctions’ to prevent discussion in Parliament of matters which were before the courts. At this point, the law on injunctions threatened to turn into a very difficult constitutional question concerned with the relationship between the House of Commons and the courts. Sedley LJ, writing an excellent article in The London Review of Books, argued (against the tide of journalistic and political opinion) that it was Parliamentarians who should stop publishing information which was subject to court injunctions by debating it in Parliament under cover of Parliamentary privilege. Sedley LJ argued that this was harmful to justice and harmful to the independence of the judiciary.¹²⁵ It was said that justice dictates that when judges have undertaken a careful analysis of the facts of a case and ordered that certain information be kept secret until trial then Parliament should not interfere with that operation of the law. Contrariwise, it was argued in general terms that this would make it possible for the judges to maintain secrecy in relation to very serious matters which ought to be made public, such as the dumping of toxic waste¹²⁶ or political skulduggery.

Clearly there are very important political and constitutional arguments behind these legal principles: whether individuals should have their privacy, or whether the Press should benefit from freedom of speech to maintain our democracy; and whether or not orders of the courts to preserve confidentiality should be allowed to be circumvented by Parliamentary debate. This section of this chapter considers the law on injunctions as it applies to super-injunctions, which will deflate some of the rhetoric which has tended to be attached to this issue in the media’s treatment of it, but first it considers some of the public debate which is likely to enliven discussion in the seminar room.

125 Stephen Sedley, ‘The Goodwin and Gigg’s Show’, (2011) 33 London Review of Books, 16 June 2011, p 3. Accessible at www.lrb.co.uk [accessed 8 February 2012].

126 See, for example, the Trafigura case (RJW & SJW v The Guardian newspaper & Person or Persons Unknown (Claim no HQ09)) in relation to which Paul Farrelly MP asked a question in Parliament about allegations of the dumping of toxic waste by a company – an issue which was subject to an anonymised injunction at the time. This case is considered below.

The media furore over super-injunctions and phone-hacking

The media is never more excited than when talking about the media, and about media freedom of speech. In consequence in 2010 and in 2011 in particular there was a media storm about two issues: first, super-injunctions used by celebrities to keep their private lives out of the newspapers; and, second, allegations that tabloid newspaper journalists had hacked into the voicemails of celebrities, politicians and others. These two issues tended to become fused together in debates about the state of the Press. However, it was only when it became clear that journalists and/or private investigators hired by tabloid newspapers had hacked into the voicemail¹²⁷ on young murder victim Milly Dowler's mobile telephone that the debate changed gear because it became clear that ordinary citizens were at risk here and not simply the sort of celebrities who might be thought to pander to those same media organisations whom they were now seeking to sue.¹²⁸ This furore led to the closure of the Sunday tabloid newspaper the News of the World in 2011, for decades a part of the sewer in newsprint form which runs under the edifice of British culture, because that was the newspaper which was first proved to have engaged in 'phone-hacking'. Against that background, celebrities such as Steve Coogan and Hugh Grant took to the television studios to argue against press intrusion and in favour of super-injunctions to protect their privacy.¹²⁹ It was precisely this furore which gave rise to the 'Leveson Inquiry into the Culture, Practice and Ethics of the Press', which is still hearing evidence at the time of writing.

Another step-change in this story came with the outing of footballer Ryan Giggs via the online instant messaging site Twitter¹³⁰ as a seeker of super-injunctions¹³¹ to maintain the privacy of an adulterous relationship with a reality TV personality.¹³² In spite of the existence of an injunction maintaining the confidentiality of those proceedings, several tens of thousands of 'tweets' purportedly revealed that it was Giggs who was the famous footballer 127 This practice was known as 'phone-hacking', in which journalists would call the mobile phone number of their victim and, assuming that the owner would not have set a password, they would be able to open the victim's voicemail. This is a criminal offence and was, for a while at least, a common feature of tabloid journalism practice.

128 In a particularly cruel development for Milly Dowler's parents at a time when her whereabouts were unknown, her mobile phone was hacked and her voicemails deleted – this led her parents to believe that she was still alive and had accessed her voicemail.

129 You will be able to find their interviews on BBC 2's Newsnight and other forums online. See, for example, <http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/programmes/newsnight/9487491.stm> [accessed 8 February 2012].

130 I feel the need to explain what Twitter is because there is always a chance that it will have been superseded by some other online service before the next edition of this book is published.

131 Other seekers of super-injunctions had been outed before then: including footballer John Terry (see Terry v Persons Unknown [2010] 1 FCR 659), and former journalist and now TV presenter Andrew Marr. The latter case attracted opprobrium because as a former left-of-centre newspaper journalist Andrew Marr would previously have argued strenuously for freedom of the press instead of hypocritically seeking to silence them by means of an injunction. He argued that he had sought the injunction, not unreasonably perhaps, to give his family time to adapt to the news that he had had an adulterous affair.

132 Reported ad nauseam in the British Press: see for example: www.telegraph.co.uk/technology/twitter/8532001/Ryan-Giggs-unmasked-as-gagging-order-footballer.html [accessed 8 February 2011] or through any search engine. In all these sorts of revelations about celebrity infidelities, one is reminded of the ironic question addressed to anyone – one thinks of the short-sighted actions of Michael Douglas's character in the film Fatal Attraction – who is unfaithful, in spite of having a perfectly lovely partner at home, in terms such as: 'Why eat hamburger when you've got steak at home?' and answering: 'Well, sometimes I just really fancy a hamburger.' It is precisely because of this sort of irrational human response to life that equity is required in the first place.

legendarily (according to long-standing internet rumour¹³³) at the heart of the super-injunction furore. While each of these tweets was technically in contempt of court (and therefore each was a criminal offence) their sheer volume prevented any action being taken against their publishers.¹³⁴ The publication of this information was supported on the basis that it was in the public interest. This cuts to the heart of that debate: it is commonly said to be ‘in the public interest’ if something is sufficiently prurient to interest the public. Indeed, even the courts tend to accept that tittle-tattle about celebrities is notionally in the public interest, even on the slightest suggestion that contradictions in their real lives with things said in interviews constitute hypocrisy which should be exposed by newspaper stories to that effect.¹³⁵ The story at issue in *JIH v Newsgroup Newspapers Ltd*¹³⁶ was about a footballer who was alleged to have had an extra-marital affair. From Giggs’s perspective it was about protecting his family life. In JIH v Newsgroup Newspapers and *CTB v News Group Newspapers Ltd*¹³⁷ allegations that the famous footballer in that case had been blackmailed were also made. From the young woman’s perspective this prevented her both from protecting herself by launching a public relations offensive¹³⁸ of her own and from monetising her experiences by selling her story.¹³⁹

If any of the detail of this sort of gossip interests you then, I would respectfully suggest, you need to look to yourself. If you do not like football, then this can be of little interest to you; if you do like football then, unless you are personally acquainted with the Giggs family, what Ryan Giggs does off the pitch or outside the training ground can be of little genuine interest to you either. By contrast, it is worth remembering that in France, the French President François Mitterand conducted an extra-marital affair with a woman (with whom he had a child) for many years in a context in which the affair was well known in political and journalistic circles but was never made public knowledge: this is always taken to demonstrate an entirely different cultural appreciation in France of what constitutes newsworthy information about someone’s private life, as opposed to private information which should be published so as to expose any differences between a person’s private life and their public pronouncements. Allegations of hypocrisy are commonly used to justify publication of private information, such as covert photographs of a supermodel leaving a Narcotics Anonymous meeting after she had given interviews denying that she had used drugs.¹⁴⁰ Nevertheless, the argument has been made that super-injunctions were mainly sought by powerful, rich men to silence women from talking about their interaction with those men, 133 In truth, internet rumour had identified dozens of sports personalities as the person involved. As Andy Hamilton put it in his Radio 4 sitcom Old Harry’s Game: internet rumour spreads by word of mouse.

134 It has been estimated that there were as many as 75,000 tweets and blogs exposing Giggs as the person who had obtained a super-injunction. (It is unclear whether someone who publishes a tweet is to be referred to as a tweeter, a twitterer or a twit.)

135 See eg, Campbell v MGN Ltd [2004] UKHL 22 where it could simply have been held that it is no one’s business what a supermodel gets up to when she is not on the catwalk or in front of a fashion photographer’s lens. Instead, that someone makes their living from their public profile seems to make press reporting of their lives an inevitability, as opposed to a contested right.

136 JIH v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2011] EWCA Civ 42, [2011] 2 FCR 95.

137 [2011] EWCA Civ 42, [2011] 2 FCR 95.

138 Never was the term ‘offensive’ better used than in relation to public relations.

139 See JIH v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2011] EWCA Civ 42, [2011] 2 FCR 95 for a case involving just such a famous sports personality. Even if the identity of the personality involved was now considered to be common knowledge, it is not clear that the injunction has been lifted, even if it is no longer of any effect.

140 Campbell v MGN Ltd [2004] UKHL 22.

and therefore that that is an argument against permitting them.¹⁴¹ However, there have been several cases in which it has been women who have been seeking to protect themselves against disclosure of information about their private lives, including the supermodel Naomi Campbell and the author JK Rowling. The cases in which it has been argued that the ability of women to speak out is being denied by these sorts of injunctions have tended to involve kiss-and-tell stories about footballers and pop stars in many cases, and in cases such as JIH v News Group Newspapers Ltd,¹⁴² *CTB v News Group Newspapers Ltd*¹⁴³ and *TSE v News Group Newspapers Ltd*¹⁴⁴ (all relating to an unfaithful footballer or footballers) there have been allegations of blackmail exerted by these women as well.¹⁴⁵ The argument that this area of the law is necessarily stacked against women does not necessarily hold water; instead, this area of the law is necessarily stacked against those who do not have sufficient money to afford the sort of expensive legal advice which is necessary either to obtain or to resist these sorts of injunctions, which may of course involve women in many circumstances.

The editor of the satirical bi-weekly magazine Private Eye, Ian Hislop, gave his own perspective on super-injunctions in a number of media forums with words to the effect that this is all really just about ‘footballers and slappers’, but one day it might actually be about something important.¹⁴⁶ Now, that language is more than a little distasteful¹⁴⁷ but nevertheless Hislop put his finger on an important point: this particular furore about celebrity gossip was unimportant, but the legal principles which it engendered were potentially very worrying for our democracy when those principles are employed in relation to important news stories such as misdeeds in government or the dumping of toxic waste. For example, consider the effect of the use of super-injunctions if they had been used by MPs to prevent The Daily Telegraph from publishing details of their abuses of the Parliamentary expenses system (for which three of them were later jailed).¹⁴⁸ The MPs’ expenses scandal went to the heart of our democratic system and the probity of our representative politicians in their offices.¹⁴⁹ If super-injunctions could be used more broadly, then possibly it is this sort of genuinely important news story which could be hidden from public scrutiny.

The principal shortcoming in Hislop’s point, from the perspective of an equity specialist, is that there have been much more important issues addressed in the decided cases than mere celebrity gossip. There is a tendency in the media to assume that only the issues which have 141 See, for example, www.guardian.co.uk/lifeandstyle/the-womens-blog-with-jane-martinson/2011/apr/26/superinjunction-andrew-marr-women [accessed 8 February 2012].

142 [2011] EWCA Civ 42, [2011] 2 FCR 95.

143 [2011] EWHC 1232 (QB).

144 [2011] EWHC 1308 (QB).

145 This is made explicit in CTB v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2011] EWHC 1232 (QB).

146 This second formulation was used on the BBC2 satirical, current affairs television programme Have I Got News for You, although the first half of the remark was also used on BBC Radio 4’s Today programme.

147 For example, Have I Got News For You, broadcast on 22 April 2011 on BBC1. The distasteful element, as ventilated online, is of course the reference to the women involved as being ‘slappers’. Why a woman attracts this derogatory reference, when the man involved is referred to by reference to his job as opposed to his status in relation to his wife, is both appalling and commonplace. What Hislop meant at root was that this sort of story was unimportant gossip. Possibly, for him, ‘footballer’ is also a mild insult. If so, it is still a less unpleasant and less gendered term than ‘slapper’.

148 The story was broken by The Daily Telegraph, and the information is available at: www.telegraph.co.uk/news/newstoppers/mps-expenses/ [accessed 8 February 2012].

149 Much more information is now publicly available. See, for example: www.parliament.uk/mps-lords-and-offices/members-allowances/ [accessed 8 February 2012].

appeared in front of their noses have been discussed in court in the real world. In the real world there have been important cases relating to the issues revolving around super-injunctions (in particular bans on reporting details of a case and the anonymity of the participants) which have not concerned footballers or their sexual imbroglios: notably the decision of the House of Lords in *In re S*¹⁵⁰ which concerned the very sensitive issue as to whether or not the identity of the very young brother of an infant murder victim could be reported and whether or not the identity of the woman who was to stand trial for the murder of that infant could be reported: the woman in question was the mother of both children. As Lady Hale pointed out in *Campbell v MGN*¹⁵¹ the issue in S was clearly of greater significance than the publication of stories relating to supermodel Naomi Campbell.¹⁵² Of course, such injunctions are commonplace in criminal trials to protect the identity of victims or innocent third parties caught up in criminal acts. Equally, any student of family law will know that a very large number of cases relating to families and most cases relating to children are referred to by initials and not by the names of the parties – in that sense, anonymised injunctions are normal in child law. The courts have great discretion in these areas to decide which facts can and cannot be reported in the interests of justice. So, in our consideration of the law relating to ‘super-injunctions’ it is important to recall that many of the principles at issue are already dealt with frequently in our courts. Indeed the things which are referred to in the Press as ‘super-injunctions’ and the things which are referred to in law as interim injunctions, anonymised injunctions and so forth are very different things. (The detail of the law, as opposed to media speculation about the law, on super-injunctions is considered below.)

What is considered to be particularly significant about the super-injunction cases which revolve around privacy and around celebrities is that the media is being prevented from performing a vital role in a democratic society of exposing hypocrisy and uncovering scandal,¹⁵³ and that the interests of justice require that trials themselves are held in public so that justice can be seen to be done and so that the courts are not able to make decisions in secret. However, in *Campbell v MGN*¹⁵⁴ the hypocrisy which was said to be at issue was a supermodel’s use of drugs after she had said in interviews that she did not take drugs: this was used to justify publishing photographs of her leaving a Narcotics Anonymous meeting. This is hardly hypocrisy of the same order as going to war without a genuine reason to do so, or MPs misusing their expenses as part of dishonest property dealings, or the dumping of large quantities of toxic waste.

Another issue which emerges from the case law on super-injunctions, however, is that these cases have been made available in the form of law reports in the ordinary way, and (with the exception of the identity of the parties and information which might reveal their identities being withheld by court order) the thought processes, the objectives and the

150 [2004] 4 All ER 683.

151 [2004] 2 All ER 995.

152 See also W v M [2011] EWHC 1197 (COP), [2011] 4 All ER 1295, CA, concerning a right to privacy in relation to mental health applications in the Court of Protection on the basis that the first respondent was no longer competent to make decisions about her continued medical treatment and that her family considered that she would not wish to continue living in a ‘minimally conscious state’. The court awarded the order as to her right to privacy and to her family life, inter alia, against an application from Times Newspapers to be allowed to report the story.

153 It is perhaps unfortunate that a large amount of what is ‘exposed’ is naked, celebrity flesh and what is ‘uncovered’ is similarly salacious. The MPs’ expenses scandal is an important exception to this pattern.

154 [2004] 2 All ER 995.

decisions of the judges have been made public in the ordinary way. Indeed, Eady J and Tugendhat J¹⁵⁵ have taken the unusual step of using their judgments to correct some common Press misapprehensions about the way in which they have reached their decisions. As will emerge in the discussion of the law to follow, the truth may be very different from the hype.

The legal issues considered here

It is important to distinguish between four different legal issues in this context. First, the issue in human rights law of balancing freedom of speech on the one hand (which would allow the media to write and talk about whatever they like) and a right to privacy and to a family life on the other (which would prevent the media from writing and talking about whatever they like). Second, the development of a tort of misuse of private information (a ‘tort of privacy’ in effect) at common law which would sound in damages for any harm caused by a breach of that right. Third, the effect on the law relating to injunctions of the use of court orders to prevent the reporting of the existence of legal proceedings and to preserve the anonymity of the parties. Fourth, the impact on the ancient equitable principle of confidence of these issues, which is most commonly used to claim injunctions to prevent publication of confidential information. The first and second issues are beyond the scope of this book; the third and fourth issues are considered here. As will emerge, the use of super-injunctions has been quite narrow (even if the media reporting of the issue has been expansive). The principles which apply to super-injunctions, and which apply to all forms of interim injunction, will prevent many of the concerns which are commonly voiced in the public debate from becoming real.

27.8.2 The law on super-injunctions

Introduction

Now that we have sketched in the public debate, it is important to close the door on all that excitement and consider the legal principles which govern the award of injunctions. One point is particularly important: super-injunctions are interim injunctions, which means that they are only temporary. Newspapers argue that an item may only be newsworthy for a short period of time and that in consequence a temporary injunction can have the same effect as a permanent injunction on that basis; however, this is no different from the same issue in relation to general interim injunctions as considered above. It is important to look beneath the hype in this area. So-called ‘super-injunctions’ are in fact just interim injunctions, and so they are governed by the same principles as other interim injunctions, as considered immediately above, with the following principles specific to this context.

The core principle relating to the award of super-injunctions

The core test was set out in *In re S (A Child) (Identification: Restrictions on Publication)*¹⁵⁶ by Lord Steyn in the following terms:

155 TSE v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2011] EWHC 1308 (QB).

156 [2005] 1 AC, 603, per Lord Steyn.

The interplay between articles 8 and 10 has been illuminated by the opinions in the House of Lords in *Campbell v MGN Ltd.*¹⁵⁷ . . . What does, however, emerge clearly from the opinions are four propositions. First, neither article has as such precedence over the other. Secondly, where the values under the two articles are in conflict, an intense focus on the comparative importance of the specific rights being claimed in the individual case is necessary. Thirdly, the justifications for interfering with or restricting each right must be taken into account. Finally, the proportionality test must be applied to each. For convenience I will call this the ultimate balancing test. This is how I will approach the present case.

Therefore, there are four core principles. The first principle is that Art 8 and Art 10 of the ECHR have equal weight, and therefore both must be applied to facts. As will emerge below, in relation to the other principles, the way in which the courts have approached these questions is to consider whether the right to privacy under Art 8 applies at all on the facts of any given case (because if it does not apply then there is no case to answer), before then considering whether or not Art 10 shall be taken to supersede the right to privacy in the circumstances.¹⁵⁸

As identified above, the new tort on misusing private information has emerged in tandem with Art 8 of the ECHR relating to a private and family life. Article 8 provides that:

- (1) Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.
- (2) There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.

The countervailing right in this context is that set out in Art 10. Article 10 provides that:

- (1) Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers. This article shall not prevent States from requiring the licensing of broadcasting, television or cinema enterprises.
- (2) The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or the rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary.

As is made clear by the Court of Appeal in Donald v Ntuli,¹⁵⁹ one of the key effects of Art 10 is that it modifies the general principles which cover the award of interim injunctions because of the importance which it accords to freedom of expression for the first time and

157 [2004] 2 All ER 995.

158 Murray v Express Newspapers [2009] Ch 481.

159 [2010] EWCA Civ 1276.

the need for it to be balanced with the other elements relating to the award of such an interim injunction under the general law.¹⁶⁰

The two-step process in considering an application for an injunction relating to private information: the balancing act

The law on privacy in United Kingdom is shaped by Art 8 of the ECHR, which provides that a person has a right to privacy and to a family life, and also by Art 10 of the Convention, which provides for freedom of expression for the Press amongst others. The approach taken by the courts is to recognise that a balancing act must be conducted between these two articles once the court has been convinced that a question of privacy has arisen in the first place. As Lord Hope held in Campbell v MGN Ltd,¹⁶¹ exactly that sort of balancing act had been a part of English law at least since the decision in Attorney General v Guardian Newspapers Limited (No 2).¹⁶²

The case of *Murray v Express Newspapers plc*¹⁶³ concerned covert photographs which were taken off the author JK Rowling and her child. Sir Anthony Clarke MR established a two-stage process for deciding whether or not an injunction relating to private information should be awarded, which drew in turn on the Campbell case. Sir Anthony Clarke held the following:

The first question is whether there is a reasonable expectation of privacy. This is of course an objective question. The nature of the question was discussed in Campbell v MGN Ltd. Lord Hope emphasised that the reasonable expectation was that of a person who was affected by the publicity.¹⁶⁴

If there is a reasonable expectation of privacy, then it is said that ‘Article 8 is engaged’.¹⁶⁵ In *Hutcheson v News Group Newspapers Ltd*¹⁶⁶ it was held that, because the applicant would be unlikely to conceal the existence of his second family in any event, that his reasonable expectation of privacy had gone. Therefore, the first question had not been answered in the affirmative, and the Court of Appeal considered that there was no further question to answer in effect. However, in cases in which the Art 8 right to privacy is considered to be relevant, then the court will proceed to consider whether or not the Art 10 right should supersede it. This is referred to as a balancing act between those two articles. What makes it difficult in understanding this as an objective test is that the reasonable expectation is to be assessed from the perspective of the person who was affected by the publicity, which adds at the very least a large amount of subjectivity to this test. It seems as though the test is actually one of deciding whether or not we think it is reasonable for that person in those circumstances to expect her privacy to be protected.

Only if the first question is answered in the affirmative does the court move on to the second question. The second question is ‘whether in all the circumstances the interest of the

160 Ibid, at [33].

161 [2004] UKHL 22, [2004] 2 AC 457, at [106].

162 [1990] 1 AC 109, per Lord Goff.

163 [2009] Ch 481.

164 Ibid, at [35].

165 Ibid, at [37].

166 [2011] EWCA Civ 808.

owner of the information must yield to the right to freedom of expression conferred on the publisher by article 10'.¹⁶⁷

Another illustration of the balancing act which must be conducted in relation to an application for a super-injunction arose in *CTB v News Group Newspapers Ltd*¹⁶⁸ in which a famous footballer had had an adulterous relationship with Imogen Thomas, a reality television star, in which the footballer contended that he had been blackmailed in effect, and that he therefore offered the woman money. She contended that anonymity should be lifted in relation to him because no anonymity had been ordered to cover her: however, this somewhat disingenuous argument failed to recognise that she was the one attempting to sell her story to the newspapers. Eady J observed the two-stage process. His Lordship held that the claimant would be likely to obtain a permanent injunction to maintain the confidentiality of this information, as a married man with children, although subsequently the claimant was in fact outed on the internet.

The leading case in general terms is that of *Campbell v MGN Ltd*¹⁶⁹ before the House of Lords. In that case the internationally famous fashion model Naomi Campbell had denied in interviews that she took drugs and yet someone tipped off the newspapers that she was attending Narcotics Anonymous meetings: consequently, she was photographed outside one of them and a story about her addiction was published. The House of Lords was divided on this issue with Lord Nicholls and Lord Hoffmann dissenting on the basis that they considered, with great misgivings, that publication should be permitted. Lord Hope held that the information was confidential. The five elements that constituted the information were the fact that she was a drug addict, the fact she was receiving treatment, the identity of the organisation providing that treatment, details of her treatment, and a photograph of her leaving the place where that treatment was provided. Lord Hope considered that this was confidential in the sense that it was analogous to information about a medical condition.¹⁷⁰ His Lordship held further that there must be some interest of a private nature which the claimant wished to protect: something he was prepared to find in this context.¹⁷¹ Similarly, her very attendance at these meetings was held to constitute private information which imported the duty of confidence in itself.¹⁷² In considering the Art 10 right, his Lordship balanced the interest in publication with the serious harm that it could cause to Miss Campbell. The combination of text and photographs in this instance caused his Lordship to find that the balance weighed in favour of Miss Campbell's rights to privacy.

In a lively judgment, in which she described this case as involving 'a prima donna celebrity against a celebrity-exploiting tabloid newspaper' which intended to show that she had feet of clay,¹⁷³ Baroness Hale came to the same conclusion. As Baroness Hale pointed out, it has been accepted that the Mirror newspaper was entitled to publish the fact that Miss Campbell was taking drugs and was having therapy, but it was argued that what could not be disclosed was that it was with Narcotics Anonymous that she was having treatment. Her ladyship pointed out that while these were clearly private issues relating to Miss Campbell, 167 [2009] Ch 481, at [27].

168 [2011] EWHC 1232 (QB).

169 [2004] UKHL 22, [2004] 2 AC 457.

170 Ibid., at [91].

171 Ibid., at [92].

172 Ibid., at [95].

173 Ibid., at [143].

at the same time she earned her living from her participation in public life and by maintaining her public profile in the newspapers. Again the balance was found to lie in favour of Miss Campbell. Lord Carswell agreed. Naomi Campbell was therefore awarded damages, as opposed to an injunction on those facts, because the article had already been published.

The potentially harmful effect on children

The potentially harmful effect on children, as in the case of Murray, is often important in these cases. However, those children do not need to be directly involved with the circumstances. For example, Eady J was concerned in CDE v MGN Ltd,¹⁷⁴ in relation to a relationship between a television personality and ‘a single mother in receipt of disability benefits’ which took place primarily by electronic messages between them, involving ‘a good deal of flirtation and sexual innuendo’, that publication of these facts would be likely to prove distressing to the claimant’s children.

The likelihood of success at trial

An issue clearly exists, as with all interim injunctions, as to the extent to which the applicant seeking an injunction must be able to demonstrate that she would be likely to be successful at trial. Lord Nicholls held in *Cream Holdings Ltd v Banerjee*¹⁷⁵ that the court must consider ‘what degree of likelihood makes the prospect of success “sufficiently favourable”. The general approach should be that courts will be exceedingly slow to make interim restraint orders where the applicant is not satisfied the court that he will probably (“more likely than not”) succeed at trial.’

The question as to what sorts of speech are appropriate here under Article 10

There is clearly a question as to the sorts of information which ought to engage the right under Art 10. The courts have been very broad-minded in accepting that what may be in the public interest is an elastic concept. Indeed there are many things which they are prepared to accept as being in the public interest which one might rightly think are of no genuine interest to public debate at all. Baroness Hale set out the following conceptualisation in Campbell v MGN Ltd:¹⁷⁶

There are undoubtedly different types of speech, just as there are different types of private information, some of which are more deserving of protection in a democratic society than others. Top of the list is political speech. The free exchange of information and ideas on matters relevant to the organisation of the economic, social and political life of the country is crucial to any democracy. Without this, it can scarcely be called a democracy at all. This includes revealing information about public figures, especially those in elective office, which would otherwise be private but is relevant to their participation in public life. Intellectual and educational speech and expression are also important in a democracy, not least because they enable the development of an individual’s potential to play a full part in society and in our democratic life. Artistic speech and expression is important for similar reasons . . .

174 [2010] EWHC 3308 (QB).

175 [2005] 1 AC 253, [2004] UKHL 44, at [22].

176 [2004] AC 457, at [158].

In the same case, Lord Hoffmann held that in general terms ‘the press is free to publish anything it likes’, subject to the laws on defamation, no matter ‘how trivial, spiteful or offensive the publication may be’.¹⁷⁷ His Lordship recognised that this is only problematic when that right to freedom of expression comes into contact with a right to privacy. Nevertheless, the House of Lords was prepared to accept that in principle the supposed hypocrisy of a supermodel claiming in an interview that she had not taken drugs while in fact she was attending Narcotics Anonymous meetings was something which was in the public interest. It might be thought, of course, that this is merely gossip of interest to the public as opposed to important information which genuinely serves the public interest.

In *CTB v News Group Newspapers Ltd*¹⁷⁸ in which a famous footballer had had an adulterous relationship with Imogen Thomas, a reality television star, Eady J observed that ‘as in so many “kiss and tell” cases, it seems to me that the answer, in stage two, is not far to seek. Indeed, it was not even argued [in that case] that publication would serve the public interest’.¹⁷⁹ Indeed mere gossip of this sort cannot be said to serve the public interest in the same way that the exposure of corruption by politicians would necessarily serve the public interest; as opposed to being of merely titillating interest to the public.

An application to set a super-injunction aside

It will frequently happen that an applicant will seek to beef up an injunction which she has been awarded, or that a respondent will seek to have an injunction set aside. The question then is as to the basis on which an appellate court should set aside such an injunction. Sir Anthony Clarke MR has held that the test for setting aside an injunction of this sort would depend upon the applicant seeking to have the injunction set aside demonstrating that the judge at first instance had ‘erred in principle or reached a conclusion that was plainly wrong’.¹⁸⁰

The Court of Appeal in the case of *Donald v Ntuli*¹⁸¹ considered just such an appeal from a judgment of Eady J which had granted an anonymised injunction to a member of the ‘boy band’ Take That in relation to another musician with whom he had had a relationship. She had sent him a text message which, in terms, suggested that she was about to sell her story to the newspapers. The claimant sought an interim injunction to restrain publication. He did so on the basis that publication would have made public knowledge private and confidential information about his life. The respondent argued that the injunction was too vague in its reference to any intimate or sexual activity between the parties amongst other things. The claimant sought to rely on Art 8 and the respondent sought to rely on a right to freedom of expression under Art 10. The Court of Appeal relied on Campbell v MGN and on the case of

177 Ibid, at [56].

178 [2011] EWHC 1232 (QB).

179 Ibid, at [26].

180 Lord Browne of Madingly v Associated Newspapers Ltd [2008] QB 103, [2007] EWCA Civ 295, at [45].

181 [2010] EWCA Civ 1276. Followed in MNB v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2011] EWHC 528 (QB), per Sharp J in XJA v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2010] EWHC 3174 (QB), per Sharp J, and in KJH v HGF [2010] EWHC 3064 (QB), per Sharp J.

In re S, and the four-stage test set out by Lord Steyn. The respondent argued that she did not intend to publish any sexually explicit details of her relationship with the claimant, given that sexual information was something which Lord Hoffmann had identified in Campbell v MGN as being the sort of information which would ordinarily be considered to be private. The claimant contended that the court of first instance should have gone further and prohibited any mention of the relationship at all. The question therefore was whether in Donald there were any substantial arguments for publication of this information in the public interest. It was held that on these facts ‘the mere fact of this past relationship which, on any view, was not entirely secret, does not carry with it a particularly grave adverse consequences’. Therefore, it was held that the judge had not erred in principle. Nor had the threshold in the case of Browne been reached in that it could not be demonstrated that the judge had reached a conclusion which was plainly wrong.

In the case of Goodwin v NGN Ltd,¹⁸² an application was made to vary an injunction so as to permit more information about a story involving the former chief executive of the Royal Bank of Scotland and a female employee of that bank to be published by the Sun newspaper. The newspaper contended that it did not intend to publish any sexual or salacious information, nor to publish any photographs of the woman involved nor any members of her family. The respondent sought to resist these variations to the order. The woman contended that publication of her name by the Sun newspaper would be a very serious intrusion into private and family life further to Art 8. The court used the familiar two-step process, the first step being whether or not it was a reasonable expectation of privacy in the context, and the second step only being relevant if the answer to the first is in the affirmative. It was held that while the details of a sexual relationship are confidential and private, that does not necessarily mean that the ‘bare fact [i.e. the existence] of a sexual relationship is private’. On the facts of the case, the parties had put forward very little evidence indeed about the nature of their relationship, and as such they failed to convince the court that there was anything about it which was specifically confidential and private. Indeed, Tugendhat J accepted a distinction between confidentiality on the one hand and press intrusion on the other, where the mere fact of intrusion by the tabloid press does not necessarily mean that the information which they uncover is confidential. Similarly, criticism in the press, no matter how robust it is, does not necessarily constitute unreasonable conduct nor harassment. In relation to the woman it was held that her name should not be published because that would be likely to precipitate a significant intrusion into their private and family life from which she was considered to be entitled to be protected. In making that award, his Lordship was concerned not to make an award which would be futile, and in this regard he recognised expressly that the woman’s name might be published on the internet and in consequence that the injunction would be of no worth. Nevertheless, it was ordered that the woman’s name could not be published but that her job description could be published.

The terms of a super-injunction

The report sets out a model format for a super-injunction. The central principle on the decided case law is that an injunction should be ‘to the highest degree clear and precise so that no publisher would be in any doubt whether he was infringing it or not’.¹⁸³

182 [2011] EWHC 1437 (QB).

183 Times Newspapers Ltd v MGN Ltd [1993] EMLR 443 at 447, per Sir Thomas Bingham MR.

27.8.3 The Report of the Committee on Super-Injunctions

The principal contribution to this debate, which is so thorough that it almost makes a text-book treatment of this topic unnecessary, is the Report of the Committee on Super-Injunctions ('the Report') which was prepared under the leadership of the Master of the Rolls, Lord Neuberger, and which is available online.¹⁸⁴ The Report is divided between the following six issues:

- (1) The principle of 'open justice';
- (2) The law relating to super-injunctions and anonymised injunctions (and, in essence a defence of the current position in the light of extensive media criticism of it;
- (3) Procedural issues (considered here only in outline);
- (4) Issues concerning data collection (considered here only in outline);
- (5) Communication between the courts and Parliament (considered here only in outline);
- (6) The problem of Parliamentary privilege and hyper-injunctions.

That structure will be used in the discussion to follow.

(1) The principle of 'open justice'

The Report extols the virtues of the principle of 'open justice'. This is expressed as being 'an essential aspect of our constitutional settlement'.¹⁸⁵ So far as the Report is concerned, the principal objections to super-injunctions relate to those injunctions being an obstacle to open justice. The Report observes that ever since the case of Prince Albert v Strange in 1849, and indeed much earlier than that (as considered in the preceding section of this chapter), English law has dealt with questions of confidence by means of equitable principles, both in relation to commercial secrets and private, confidential information. When the Human Rights Act 1998 passed through Parliament, Parliamentarians were at great pains to point out that they hoped that the freedom of the press would be strengthened by that legislation and that it would not be subordinated behind a right to privacy. As Spry has pointed out in his book Principles of Equitable Remedies,¹⁸⁶ the court's jurisdiction towards injunctions operates 'without limits, and can be exercised either in support of any legal right, or in the creation of a new equitable rights, as the court thinks fits in the application of equitable principles'.¹⁸⁷ The principle of open justice as it is deployed in the Report is based on cases such as *Scott v Scott*¹⁸⁸ where it was described by Lord Shaw as being 'a sound and very sacred part of the constitution of the country and the administration of justice' and that open justice is of great constitutional importance because it is 'on the whole, the best security for the pure, impartial, and efficient administration of justice, the best means for winning its public confidence and respect'.¹⁸⁹ Scott v Scott itself was a somewhat earthy proceeding in relation to a petition for divorce on grounds of a husband's impotence (in relation to which by 184 The Report of the Committee on Super-Injunctions is accessible at the following address: www.judiciary.gov.uk/Resources/JCO/Documents/Reports/super-injunction-report-20052011.pdf [accessed 8 February 2012].

185 Report of the Committee on Super-Injunctions, para 1.36.

186 Spry, Principles of Equitable Remedies, 8th edn, Sweet & Maxwell, 2010, 331.

187 The slight amendments to this quotation are taken from the Report at p 4.

188 [1913] AC 417.

189 Report of the Committee on Super-Injunctions, para 1.17.

medical examination it was confirmed that the wife remained a virgin). An order had been granted that the proceedings were to remain confidential but the wife had three copies of the official shorthand writer's¹⁹⁰ note of the proceedings made and circulated to members of the husband's family. The issue arose whether or not this was in contempt of court. It was held that these proceedings (which did not include the medical examination) did not need to be held in camera (that is, in secret) and that the evidence at issue could have been given in open court on the basis, as emphasised by the Earl of Halsbury, that the principle of open justice was significant.

While this principle of open justice is undoubtedly important, it is interesting that it is thought to apply to the most mundane of matters, whereas it might be thought that calls for open justice were more redolent of preventing pogroms and anti-democratic revolutions with courts operating in secret. To prevent such a situation ever developing – in the manner of the old Court of Star Chamber (discussed in Chapter 1) – then open justice is to be understood as an absolute principle. It opens justice up, to coin an old phrase, to the disinfectant properties of daylight. In general terms, it is hoped in the Report that litigants will seek less drastic remedies than super-injunctions. The Report considers that the award of a super-injunction will be appropriate when it is a 'necessity'.¹⁹¹ In relation to the Civil Procedure Rules, r39.2, the Report takes the view that it is not a question of a court having a discretion to award a super-injunction, but rather a court has to award such an injunction as a 'matter of obligation' if it is justified.¹⁹² This is interesting: the court is obliged to make such an order in appropriate circumstances; although appropriate circumstances will generally be exceptional circumstances. That makes the question as to whether or not the circumstances are appropriate for a super-injunction all the more critical because, as the Report makes clear, the award of a super-injunction is anything but a routine matter.

(2) The legal context of super-injunctions

One of the principal issues in the press coverage of the super-injunctions question was the frequency with which the courts seemed to award such super-injunctions. However, the Report lists all of the super-injunctions of which its authors were aware and thus compiles a list of only 18 cases in which the award of a super-injunction had even been considered by the courts. In each of these 18 cases, there had been a 'reasoned judgment' published, inter alia, over the internet. In very few of these cases had it been deemed appropriate to award a super-injunction. This survey of the decided cases does tend to undermine the press speculation that super-injunctions were common in practice. The legal principles governing the award of super-injunctions were set out above.

(3) Procedural issues

The Report sets out guidance for the procedural elements of an application for a super-injunction and the form which an order should take. As with all injunctions, there are 190 Those remarkable individuals would sit in court, typically with head bowed, making remarkably fast notes of the proceedings which constituted an official record of all court proceedings.

191 Report of the Committee on Super-Injunctions, p 11. Pink Floyd Music Ltd v EMI Records Ltd [2010] EWCA Civ 794; Ntuli v Donald [2010] EWCA Civ 1276.

192 Report of the Committee on Super-Injunctions, para 1.33.

questions as to whether the injunction should be awarded *ex parte*¹⁹³ so as to facilitate speed, or whether other people involved should be permitted to make representations from the outset.¹⁹⁴ Super-injunctions are primarily a procedural device and so their correlation with the Civil Procedure Rules (which govern civil applications in the higher courts) is necessary.

(4) Data collection

The purpose of the report in large part was to refute Press speculation about the nature and content of super-injunctions, as well as to regularise the position. To this end, the report recommended a new effort to collate and maintain data on these forms of injunction.

(5) Communication between the courts and Parliament

The difficulty of MPs and the courts coming to cross-purposes – where the former wishes to discuss or publicise an issue, and where the latter has ordered that some part of that information remain confidential – is partly one of communication. In theory, the office of the Speaker of the House of Commons and those maintaining the court lists would be able to identify matters which were sub judice and so prevent confidential material being debated in Parliament as a matter of comity between those two branches of the constitution. However, the fact that some parties are anonymised in litigation has meant that there have been questions raised inadvertently in Parliament about matters which had been kept confidential by court order but the Speaker's Office had not been able to find out about that litigation because the parties' identities had been anonymised.¹⁹⁵ The Report therefore recommends that new mechanisms for ensuring appropriate communication between officials in Parliament and in the courts are identified.

(6) The problem of Parliamentary privilege and hyper-injunctions

The difficulties of correlating the freedom of Parliament in a democratic society to debate any issue it pleases with the independence of the judiciary to make any lawful order it sees fit were considered above. This issue has become particularly acute in circumstances in which a judge has ordered that a matter be kept confidential when a Parliamentarian wants to discuss it openly in Parliament. There is also the matter of debates in Parliament being freely reported in a democratic society, which is really at the heart of the publication of such material. In the bulk of the cases which are in the public domain, the issues have revolved around information relating to private individuals being capable or being incapable of being reported by journalists.

¹⁹³ That is, without the other parties being present.

¹⁹⁴ Typically, even if an order is made from the outset ex parte, the other people involved will be able to petition the court for an alteration of the order or for its removal. There is always a judge nominated to hear applications out of hours simply because such urgent injunction requests arise in all sorts of contexts.

¹⁹⁵ See in particular the Trafigura case (RJW & SJW v The Guardian Newspaper & Person or Persons Unknown (Claim no HQ09)) in relation to which Paul Farrelly MP asked a question on 19 October 2009 which was allowed to be tabled by the Table Clerks Office. Farrelly had known of the injunction but not the full anonymous title accorded to it, and so it had eluded the clerks and had been tabled. His asking of his question in relation to allegations of dumping toxic waste became a cause célèbre among those who extolled the virtues of freedom of speech in this context and suggested that Parliament offered a means of eluding such injunctions.

In response to this problem, judges have been asked to consider the award of so-called ‘hyper-injunctions’, which are injunctions which purport to enjoin specific MPs from discussing particular issues relating to a specific case in Parliament so as to preserve the confidentiality of information bound up in those proceedings. Similarly, there have been applications for injunctions ‘contra mundum’ (that is, ‘against the world’) which are intended to bind everyone in the world to preserve the confidentiality of any given proceedings.

The Report is clear that the courts should not interfere with the freedom of Parliamentarians to discuss whatever they please, except that there should be some communication between the officers of Parliament and those running the court lists to identify sensitive litigation. This is clearly a difficult issue to resolve in the abstract. The right of the courts to order confidentiality on an interim basis is an unstoppable object, whereas the rights of Parliamentarians to discuss any issue they consider appropriate is an immovable post: and those two things cannot logically co-exist in the same universe – either the unstoppable object is stopped when it hits the immovable post, or the immovable post will move.

Rescission and rectification

28.1	INTRODUCTION	1233
28.2	RESCISSION	1234
28.2.1	The scope of equity	1234
28.2.2	Misrepresentation	1235
28.2.3	Undue influence and unconscionable bargains	1236
28.2.4	Mistake	1237
28.2.5	Loss of the right to rescind	1240
28.3	RECTIFICATION	1241
28.3.1	The nature of the remedy of rectification	1242
28.3.2	Common mistake between parties	1242
28.3.3	Unilateral mistake	1242
28.3.4	Rectification of voluntary settlements	1243
28.3.5	Delivery up and cancellation of documents	1244
28.3.6	Ne exeat regno	1245

28.1 INTRODUCTION

This chapter considers two separate equitable remedies: rescission and rectification. The two remedies have been grouped together because they are concerned with issues surrounding the termination of contracts or the alteration of their terms. Rescission constitutes complete termination (or avoidance) of a contract, whereas rectification entails the alteration of its terms and possibly the termination of a given aspect of a contract as a result.

In terms of our understanding of the principles of equity, these subjects indicate the means by which equity has come to interfere with the exclusive competence of the common law in relation to contracts. Whereas a contract might be validly formed under common law, and whereas common law provides for payment of damages in situations in which there has been some misrepresentation by one party which induces the other party to enter into the contract, equity provides a means of terminating or altering contracts where to do otherwise would be against conscience.

The concept of ‘conscience’ is used here, again, as a summary of what the courts appear to be doing, rather than as an accurate description of the principles at work. However, it is plain that it is only in relation to the usual array of fraud, misrepresentation, mistake and equitable wrongs (such as undue influence, considered in Chapter 29) that the doctrines of rescission and rectification will be available. That is, in situations in which it would be inequitable to permit the common law to enforce the precise terms of those agreements.

28.2 RESCISSION

Rescission is an equitable remedy used to set aside contracts and to restore the parties to the positions which they had occupied previously.

In cases of fraudulent misrepresentation, the claimant will be entitled to rescind the contract to prevent the wrongdoer from benefiting from its wrongdoing. The position in relation to innocent misrepresentations is more equivocal (as considered below). Contracts requiring utmost good faith will necessarily imply a misrepresentation where such disclosure is not made.

Rescission will be generally available in cases of unconscionable bargains, or in cases of some undue influence which induces one party to enter into the contract.

A material mistake made by both parties to a contract will enable that contract to be rescinded. Unilateral mistake may lead to rescission only where there has been some unconscionability in the formation of the contract. Mistakes of law and of fact may both give good grounds for rescission.

The right to rescind will be lost where it is impossible to return the parties to the positions they occupied previously, where the contract has been affirmed, or where there has been delay.

The form of rescission that is considered in this chapter is the general equitable power to achieve a restitutio in integrum; that is, to restore parties to the position which they had occupied originally. The most common form of rescission is observable in the law of contract, in which parties to a purported contract are returned to their original positions by having their contract set aside. In short, rescission will be awarded in cases of mistake, misrepresentation, or to set aside an unconscionable bargain.¹

The important point to make about rescission is that it is an equitable remedy available on application to a court of equity at the discretion of such court. The parameters of that remedy are considered below. It is, however, clear that rescission applies only to contracts which are voidable. Where a contract is void ab initio, there is no question of rescission on the basis that such a contract is taken never to have existed.² There is only a question as to the rescission of a contract if that contract is capable of being affirmed by either party. This chapter will consider rescission in its strict sense of setting aside contracts which are merely voidable, that is, capable of being declared void but not void ab initio.

28.2.1 The scope of equity

It is important to note that equity will not interfere with the general rule of contract that the parties should be entitled to freedom of contract. The only exception to that principle is that equity will act to prevent unconscionable behaviour in cases of bargains formed through misrepresentation, mistake, fraud or constructive fraud. Therefore, there is no claim in equity

1 TSB v Camfield [1995] 1 WLR 430.

2 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1994] 4 All ER 890, per Leggatt LJ, CA.

to set aside a bargain in which one party is aware that the contract will be more profitable to it than to its counterparty. English law is not based on morality but rather on trade. The growth of common law and equitable principles is centred on facilitating freedom of commercial dealings. It is only in cases of the most flagrant breaches of commercial ethics (such as fraud or misrepresentation) that the courts will intervene to ensure fair play.

28.2.2 Misrepresentation

In cases of fraudulent misrepresentation, the claimant will be entitled to rescind the contract to prevent the wrongdoer from benefiting from its wrongdoing. The position in relation to innocent misrepresentations is more equivocal (as considered below). Contracts requiring utmost good faith will necessarily imply a misrepresentation where such disclosure is not made.

In circumstances where there has been a misrepresentation inducing a claimant to enter into a contract, that claimant will be entitled to rescind that contract, as considered below. There is, however, an important distinction to be made between fraudulent misrepresentation and innocent misrepresentation from the outset.

Fraudulent misrepresentation

A fraudulent misrepresentation will render a contract voidable where that misrepresentation was made with an intention that it should be acted upon by the person to whom it was made.³ The type of fraud required is that sufficient to found a claim in the tort of deceit, that is, a misrepresentation made knowingly, or without belief in its truth, or with recklessness as to whether or not it was true.⁴ The rationale for permitting rescission of contracts made on the basis of fraudulent misrepresentation is that it would be inequitable to permit a person with such a fraudulent motive to profit from their common law rights.⁵ As such, it is a principle which is easy to reconcile with the underlying tenets of equity.

Innocent misrepresentation

Aside from fraudulent misrepresentations, there is then the issue as to which forms of misrepresentations made without a fraudulent motive will also entitle a claimant to claim rescission of a contract created in reliance on such a representation. Absent the motive of fraud, which will clearly act to prevent a fraudster from benefiting from her own wrongdoings, there is the further question whether mere negligence or innocent misstatements ought, in equity, to permit a contract to be set aside.

At common law, an innocent misrepresentation will found a claim for rescission of the contract provided that the matter which made up the representation has become a term of the contract.⁶ Section 1 of the Misrepresentation Act 1967 provides further that rescission will ³ Peek v Gurney (1873) LR 6 HL 377; County NatWest Bank Ltd v Barton (1999) The Times, 29 July.

⁴ Redgrave v Hurd (1881) 20 Ch D 1; Derry v Peek (1889) 14 App Cas 337.

⁵ Redgrave v Hurd (1881) 20 Ch D 1, per Lord Jessel MR.

⁶ Derry v Peek (1889) 14 App Cas 337; Low v Bouverie [1891] 3 Ch 82. Cf William Sindall v Cambridgeshire CC [1994] 1 WLR 1016, 1035, per Hoffmann LJ.

be available in cases of innocent misrepresentation in a situation in which that misrepresentation has induced the other party to enter into the contract.⁷ Furthermore, in equity, that a person had made an innocent misrepresentation would give the other party to the contract a good defence to a claim, for specific performance of that contract.⁸ The court has power to order that a contract continue to subsist in spite of the innocent misrepresentation where it would be equitable to do so.⁹ In general terms, any term¹⁰ in the contract which purports to exclude the right to rescind on the basis of misrepresentation will be of no effect unless it is considered equitable to give effect to that term.¹¹

Contracts uberrimae fidei

Aside from the two categories of misrepresentation considered above, there is a further important category of contracts which have a standard of utmost good faith (or uberrimae fidei) read into them by law. The most common example of this type of contract is the contract of insurance. Utmost good faith connotes an obligation on parties to such contracts to make full disclosure of all material facts. Therefore, there is an obligation not to conceal any matter which might be of importance. For insurance contracts, this means that the insured is required to make full disclosure to the insurer so that there is no matter of which the insurer is ignorant.

The significance of such contracts in the context of misrepresentation is that it is not possible for a defendant to fail to disclose information and then seek to claim that there was no misrepresentation on the basis that silence ought not to be considered a representation at all.¹² In situations in which there is a requirement of utmost good faith, silence as to a material factor which ought to have been disclosed will be considered to be tantamount to a misrepresentation.

There may also be factual situations in which concealing facts, perhaps in response to a direct question, might amount to a misrepresentation even though based on silence. Suppose an investor was seeking to buy shares in Sunderland AFC plc and asked the board of directors ‘tell me now if you are intending to release world-class manager Roy Keane; if not I will invest in the club’s shares’. If the board of directors were to sit in silence and let him purchase a shareholding as a result, knowing that they had already accepted Roy Keane’s resignation and retirement from football, that silence would be a misrepresentation in the same way that a verbal denial would have been a misrepresentation.¹³

28.2.3 Undue influence and unconscionable bargains

Rescission will be generally available in cases of unconscionable bargains, or in cases of some undue influence which induces one party to enter into the contract.

7 See also Bannerman v White (1861) 10 CB 844; Heilbut Symons & Co v Buckleton [1913] AC 30.

8 Walker v Boyle [1982] 1 WLR 495; Smelter Corporation of Ireland Ltd v O’Driscoll [1977] IR 305.

9 Misrepresentation Act 1967, s 2(2).

10 Walker v Boyle [1982] 1 WLR 495; South Western General Property Co v Marton (1982) 263 EG 1090.

11 Misrepresentation Act 1967, s 3.

12 Gordon v Gordon (1821) 3 Swans 400; Harvey v Cooke (1827) 4 Russ 34; Roberts v Roberts [1905] 1 Ch 704.

13 Roy Keane has since left. (This footnote, and indeed this example, is the legacy of earlier editions and I have not the heart to change it. The arrival of Gus Poyet is a new cause for optimism, however.)

The problem of undue influence is considered in Chapter 29, particularly in relation to setting aside mortgage contracts in situations in which the mortgagee had constructive notice of some undue influence or misrepresentation having been exercised over a co-signatory by a mortgagor to such a mortgage transaction. Furthermore, it was also considered that where one party to a transaction exerts undue influence over the other party to that contract, the victim of the undue influence will be entitled to have that contract rescinded.¹⁴ Alongside undue influence are the other categories of equitable wrongs and those issues which will be categorised as unconscionable bargains.

28.2.4 Mistake

A material mistake made by both parties to a contract will enable that contract to be rescinded. Unilateral mistake may lead to rescission only where there has been some unconscionability in the formation of the contract. Mistakes of law and of fact may both give good grounds for rescission.

Unilateral and common mistake

The rule in relation to mistake is, strictly, that a mistake made by both parties (common mistake) in entering into a transaction will enable that contract to be rescinded.¹⁵ However, where only one party to a contract is acting under a mistake (unilateral mistake), the contract, typically, will not be rescinded¹⁶ unless the party who was not operating under a mistake was aware that the other party was so operating.¹⁷

Thus, in Cooper v Phibbs,¹⁸ parties to a lease had created the lease agreement on the mistaken assumption that the purported lessee did not already have an equitable interest in the demised property. On discovering the existence of this equitable interest, the lessee sought to rescind the lease contract on the ground that both parties to it had been operating under a common mistake as to the lessee's property rights. The House of Lords held that the contract could be rescinded on the basis of the parties' common mistake.

Furthermore, it does appear that the mistake must have been operative on the minds of the contracting parties and must have induced them to enter into the contract.¹⁹ Thus, in Oscar Chess v Williams,²⁰ where two parties contracting for the sale of a car in circumstances in which some unknown third party had altered the log book's entry as to the date the car was manufactured, the contract was not rescinded for mistake because neither party had sought to rely on that date in the creation of the contract.

14 Barclays Bank v O'Brien [1993] 3 WLR 786. Aside from the examples, considered above, of actual fraud, misrepresentation and constructive fraud, it is possible that contracts will be rescinded in situations in which there is an operative mistake between both parties.

15 Cundy v Lindsay (1878) 3 App Cas 459.

16 Riverlate Properties Ltd v Paul [1975] Ch 133.

17 Webster v Cecil (1861) 30 Beav 62; Hartog v Colin & Shields [1939] 2 All ER 566. See also Clarion Ltd v National Provident Institution [2000] 1 WLR 1888.

18 (1867) LR 2 HL 149.

19 Bell v Lever Bros [1932] AC 161.

20 [1957] 1 WLR 370.

The scope of equity in relation to mistake

Lord Denning had argued for a broader equitable discretion to permit rescission of contracts where there was a fundamental mistake which led to the creation of the contract, even in circumstances in which the common law would not permit such an action based on mistake.²¹ This approach has been followed in subsequent decisions. However, it is difficult to reconcile with the House of Lords decision in *Bell v Lever Bros.*²² What is at issue is the extent to which equity can, and should, operate to set aside contracts on the basis that the mistake is so fundamental to the contract that the contract cannot be said to reflect the real intentions of the parties at the time of its creation.

This book is not able to consider the detailed ramifications of this dilemma for the law of contract. In applying general principles of equity, the correct approach to a case of unilateral mistake appears to be to measure the extent to which the defendant is acting unconscionably in seeking to rely on a mistake to the detriment of the claimant. Where neither party was aware of the mistake at the time that the contract was created, neither party's conscience can be said to be affected. Therefore, there ought properly to be no equity to rescind such a transaction. The loss must lie where it falls, with the party who was in error.

There is also the position in relation to a common mistake between both contracting parties. On the one hand, it is difficult to assert that there is an unjust factor at work in a situation in which both parties are innocent in the mistake that they have made in the formation of their contract. However, there would be no common intention to effect the transaction in the manner it turns out, where there was a mistake in the minds of both parties about something fundamental to the contract.

It is suggested that this latter argument cuts to the heart of the nature of a contract, being a bargain between two or more people that they will transact on agreed terms in the expectation that certain matters are the case and will enable their agreement to proceed in the manner expected. Matters extraneous to the contract, such as market movements or war, which make the anticipated performance of the contract impossible (or the situation so different from the parties' original expectations as to be virtually impossible) would appear to fall within the doctrine of frustration where they can be shown to be so fundamental to the proper functioning of the agreement. Common mistake as to a fact or as to law, on the other hand, will mean that there is no agreement between those parties at all.

That is different, it is suggested, from the situation in which there is unilateral mistake because the world-view which created the common intention of the contracting parties is not affected; rather, one party is insufficiently informed as to the true state of affairs. In such situations, the conscience of the party who gains will be affected, in terms of equity, only if that party has unduly influenced the losing party or made a misrepresentation to the loser, or exerted some fraud over the loser. In the former case, however, no one's conscience is affected; only the commercial acumen of the party acting under a mistake. While there is no apparent morality in this approach (maybe where one party exploits another's ineptitude), that is the business of capitalism. The approach of English law is to intercede only to prevent unconscionability, but never to interfere with the profit motive of commercial people in the absence of such unconscionability.

21 Solle v Butcher [1950] 2 QB 507.

22 [1932] AC 161; Hartog v Colin & Shields [1939] 2 All ER 566.

Mistakes of fact and mistakes of law

Where the parties have made a mistake as to some material fact in the creation of their contract, that contract will be capable of being rescinded. That parties are entitled to rely on a mistake of law in seeking to rescind their contracts has been upheld by the House of Lords in Kleinwort Benson v Lincoln CC.²³ The facts of Kleinwort Benson v Lincoln CC are those common to the local authority swaps, as in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC,²⁴ in which a bank was seeking to recover moneys paid to the respondent local authority under interest rate swap agreements which the House of Lords in *Hazell v Hammersmith & Fulham*²⁵ had held to be beyond the powers of the local authority and therefore void ab initio. The claim for recovery of payments was based on a contention that those payments had been made under a mistake of law: that is, the assumption that local authorities could enter into interest rate swaps.

Lord Goff held that there could be restitution of money paid under a mistake of law (thus repealing the long-established common law rule to the contrary). One interesting argument raised by the appeal was whether a mistake of law must be a mistake as to decided case law or legislation, or whether it was sufficient that there was a mistaken belief embodied in a common perception in a marketplace that the law would give effect to a particular rule if such a matter was ever brought before a court. Thus, it was argued that the swaps market had generally believed that local authorities could enter into swaps agreements even though a subsequent decision of the House of Lords established that they could not. The House of Lords held that payments made under a settled understanding of the law among market participants, which is subsequently departed from by judicial decision, are irrecoverable on grounds of mistake of law.

There remains a large amount of uncertainty as to precisely those factors which will constitute a mistake of law. The very fact that common law and equity develop on a case-by-case basis means that it is impossible to be certain as to the law in any given case. Consequently, it is important to know precisely what types of mistake of law will be permissible in the future, but there is no definitive, detailed judicial guidance at the time of writing.

Questions of equity and of restitution

Thus the issue of mistake feeds directly into questions of restitution as well as into questions of rescission. The question is, again, as to the role of equity in this context. On the one hand, equity is applying age-old principles concerned with the rights of parties to escape their bargains. On the other hand, equity appears to be operating to prevent the unjust enrichment of one contracting party at the expense of the other party where there is some unjust factor (such as mistake or misrepresentation) involved in the generation of that enrichment. Aside from the entitlement to rescission, it is also open to the claimant to seek common law damages for breach of contract²⁶ and keep any deposit in lieu of damages.²⁷

23 [1998] 4 All ER 513.

24 [1996] AC 669.

25 [1992] 2 AC 1, [1991] 2 WLR 372, [1991] 1 All ER 545.

26 Johnson v Agnew [1980] AC 367.

27 Dewar v Mintoft [1912] 2 KB 373; Damon Compania Naviera SA v Hapag-Lloyd International SA [1985] 1 WLR 435.

28.2.5 Loss of the right to rescind

The right to rescind will be lost where it is impossible to return the parties to the positions they occupied previously, where the contract has been affirmed, or where there has been delay.

While the preceding sections have considered those situations in which rescission will be available, it must be remembered that rescission is a discretionary, equitable remedy. Therefore, it is possible that a court may hold that any given set of circumstances may appear to fall within entitlement to rescission but that the applicant will not be entitled to rescind a contract where it would be inequitable to do so, perhaps in circumstances in which the applicant has begun to perform the contract in full knowledge of the factor which is relied on to support the claim for rescission. In such circumstances, it is said to be inequitable to allow the applicant to set aside a contract which its conduct has indicated that it intends to honour.

Possibility of restitutio in integrum

It is necessary for an award of rescission that it is possible to return the parties to the position which they occupied before the creation or performance of the contract: an inability to do so would negate the possibility of rescission.²⁸ The process of restitution may be resorted to such that it is not necessary to restore any specific property passed under the agreement, provided that the value of that property can be restored by means of equitable compensation.²⁹ It may be the case that in some instances it will be impossible to restore the parties to the position which they had occupied originally because the property which was passed (perhaps sensitive information or know-how) is not capable of being compensated by financial restitution. However, the general proposition remains true that rescission will be effected if appropriate value can be restored.³⁰ Furthermore, it is possible for the court to award damages rather than rescission in cases of misrepresentation under s 2(2) of the Misrepresentation Act 1967, which provides that:

Where a person entered into a contract after a misrepresentation has been made to him otherwise than fraudulently, and he would be entitled, by reason of the misrepresentation, to rescind the contract . . . the court . . . may declare the contract subsisting and award damages in lieu of rescission.

Therefore, a contract can be affirmed by a court where it appears that damages would provide adequate remedy and make rescission unnecessary.

Affirmation

In a situation in which the claimant has affirmed the transaction in full knowledge of the factor which is subsequently relied upon to make out a claim for rescission, that claimant

28 Erlanger v New Sombrero Phosphate Co (1873) 3 App Cas 1218; Clarke v Dickson (1859) EB & E 148; Lagunas Nitrate Co v Lagunas Syndicate [1899] 2 Ch 392; Steedman v Frigidaire Corp [1932] WN 248; Thorpe v Fasey [1949] Ch 649; Butler v Croft (1973) 27 P & CR 1. Cf Urquhart v Macpherson (1878) 3 App Cas 831.

29 Mahoney v Purnell [1996] 3 All ER 61.

30 Newbigging v Adam (1886) 34 Ch D 582; Spence v Crawford [1939] 3 All ER 271.

will not be entitled to claim rescission of the contract.³¹ In Peyman v Lanjani,³² the defendant had carried out a fraudulent impersonation of someone else to obtain a leasehold interest in a restaurant. The claimant knew of the fraud, but did not know that it gave him a right to rescission, when he agreed to become the defendant's manager. It was held that the claimant could not rely on rescission in these circumstances where he had known of the fraud but nevertheless entered knowingly into the transaction. In such circumstances, the claimant is deemed to have waived his rights in respect of the claim for rescission.³³

Suppose a situation in which Sunderland AFC contracted to acquire a footballer on the basis of an innocent representation that the footballer was predominantly left-footed and therefore capable of playing on the left wing. Sunderland AFC would be entitled to rescind that contract on the basis of a fundamental misrepresentation if it transpired that the player was, in fact, only capable of playing effectively on the right wing. However, if Sunderland AFC, in full knowledge of their right to rescind, agreed to buy the player and to play him anyway, they would be deemed to have affirmed the contract and therefore lost their right to rescind.

Delay and acquiescence

In a number of circumstances, affirmation can take the form of implied affirmation. Therefore, affirmation can take the form of an express agreement to waive the right of rescission, or it can be merely implied from the circumstances.³⁴ It is possible for a sufficient delay in activating the right of rescission to raise the inference of affirmation of the contract. Alternatively, that delay, or some action performed in furtherance of the contract, might be deemed to constitute acquiescence in the continued validity of the transaction. As above, it would be important that the claimant had knowledge both of the factor giving rise to the claim for rescission and of the right to rescind at the time of affirmation.

There is a further possibility for loss of the right to rescind in the situation in which a third party acquires rights in the subject matter of the transaction.³⁵ However, the third party must acquire those rights for valuable consideration and not be merely a volunteer.³⁶

28.3 RECTIFICATION

Rectification is available to amend the terms of a contract better to reflect the true intentions of the contracting parties. Rectification will be available in circumstances of common mistake. Rectification will be available in relation to a unilateral mistake only in cases of fraud or similar unconscionable behaviour. Rectification may also be available in respect of voluntary settlements to reflect the settlor's evident intention. Alternatively, the court may order the delivery and cancellation of documents, or in relation to 'ne exeat regno'.

31 Peyman v Lanjani [1985] Ch 457.

32 Ibid.

33 Clough v London & North Western Railway Co (1871) LR 7 Ex Ch 26.

34 Lapse of time will not necessarily preclude this application: Life Association of Scotland v Siddal (1861) 3 De GF & J 58; Charter v Trevelyan (1844) 11 Cl & F 714; Leaf v International Galleries [1950] 2 KB 86.

35 Oakes v Turquand (1867) LR 2 HL 325.

36 Re Eastgate [1905] 1 KB 465.

28.3.1 The nature of the remedy of rectification

The purpose of rectification is not to set a contract aside, but rather to amend its terms to reflect the real intention of the parties.³⁷ It is restricted to situations in which there is a written document which fails to reflect the true intention of the parties.³⁸ The order effects an alteration in the written document itself.³⁹ However, what rectification does not do is alter the agreement itself, on the basis that equity will not intervene in the contractual freedom of the parties.⁴⁰ Rather, rectification recognises that the parties have made a mistake in a written document which requires alteration to reflect their true contractual intention. Rectification is a discretionary remedy,⁴¹ but will generally be ordered provided that some substantive right of the parties is at issue rather than a mere fiscal advantage which is sought by means of the rectification.⁴² Rectification will not be ordered where there is some sufficient, alternative remedy available, such as common law damages,⁴³ or where the matter forming the subject matter of the application could be dealt with by a simple correction of, for example, a clerical error.⁴⁴ As considered above in relation to rescission, there is a need to distinguish between cases of common mistake and cases of unilateral mistake.

28.3.2 Common mistake between parties

Rectification will be available in circumstances of common mistake.

Where there is a common mistake between two parties to a contract, and it is possible to ascertain their true contractual intention, the court is able to order rectification of the written document.⁴⁵ The common intention of the parties to the contract must be demonstrable so as to support the claim for rectification.⁴⁶ Therefore, it is necessary to demonstrate that an agreement was formed before the document was created, and that the document mistakenly contradicted the common intention set out in that agreement.⁴⁷

28.3.3 Unilateral mistake

Rectification will be available in relation to a unilateral mistake only in cases of fraud or similar unconscionable behaviour.

Despite the general principle of contract law that mistake must be a common mistake of contracting parties, there may be situations in which unilateral mistake will found a successful

37 M'Cormack v M'Cormack (1877) 1 LR Ir 119; Frederick E Rose (London) Ltd v William H Pim Jr & Co Ltd [1953] 2 QB 450.

38 Racal Group Services v Ashmore [1995] STC 1151 – requiring that the mistake must have been made in the writing.

39 Craddock Bros Ltd v Hunt [1923] 2 Ch 136.

40 Mackenzie v Coulson (1869) LR 8 Eq 368.

41 Whiteside v Whiteside [1950] Ch 65, 71, per Lord Evershed MR.

42 Ibid.

43 Ibid.; Walker Property Investments (Brighton) Ltd v Walker (1947) 177 LT 204.

44 Wilson v Wilson (1854) 5 HLC 40.

45 Murray v Parker (1854) 19 Beav 305; Mackenzie v Coulson (1869) LR 8 Eq 368.

46 Frederick E Rose (London) Ltd v William-Pim Jr & Co Ltd [1953] 2 QB 450. See also Crane v Hegeman-Harris Co Inc [1939] 1 All ER 662; Joscelyne v Nissen [1970] 2 QB 86.

47 Gilhespie v Burdis (1943) 169 LT 91.

claim for rectification.⁴⁸ The first situation in which such rectification may be awarded is where the defendant was guilty of fraud in permitting the claimant to enter into the contract under a mistake.⁴⁹ The second is where the defendant knew that the claimant considered the mistaken element to be a term of the contract.⁵⁰ Both of these scenarios are clearly proximate to the general equitable principle that a party will not be permitted to rely on its common law rights in the context of fraud or unconscionable behaviour. In both of these cases, the defendant would be knowingly allowing the claimant to suffer a loss or detriment as a result of some mistake of law or mistake of fact. Buckley LJ considered this principle to turn on the issue whether or not the conscience of the defendant was affected by failing to draw the mistake to the claimant's attention in circumstances in which the defendant knew that it would benefit from the claimant entering into the contract under the influence of that mistake.⁵¹

Alternatively, where one party to the transaction knows of the mistake and nevertheless allows the other party to enter into the transactions, a form of equitable estoppel will prevent that person from resisting a claim for rectification.⁵² It is sufficient for the operation of this form of estoppel that the defendant recklessly shut his eyes to the fact that a mistake had been made – it is not necessary that actual knowledge of the mistake be demonstrated.⁵³ This latter principle accords with equity's general purpose to avoid unconscionable behaviour⁵⁴ and dishonesty in a broad sense.⁵⁵

28.3.4 Rectification of voluntary settlements

Rectification may also be available in respect of voluntary settlements to reflect the settlor's evident intention.

The last situation in which rectification may be important, particularly in relation to the law of trusts, is in relation to settlements. It is possible to effect rectification of a will where it can be demonstrated that the will as drafted did not express the clear intention of the testator (for example, where names are mistakenly transposed).⁵⁶ With reference to inter vivos settlements, it is possible to achieve rectification also at the instance of the settlor,⁵⁷ or potentially at the instance of a beneficiary.⁵⁸ However, cases in which such rectifications have been made are rare and turn on very specific evidence of an intention to provide something 48 The doctrine of unjust enrichment may provide a useful analysis of this area as being concerned to preclude enrichment being derived from an unjust factor: that is, knowledge of the other person's mistake. Clearly, however, there is a narrow line between knowing that someone is making a mistake of fact or law in entering into a contract and knowing that the other person is unlikely to make a profit from a transaction, where the latter is permitted under more general law of contract.

49 Ball v Storie (1823) 1 Sim & St 210; Hoblyn v Hoblyn (1889) 41 Ch D 200.

50 A Roberts & Co Ltd v Leicestershire CC [1961] Ch 555.

51 Thomas Bates & Son Ltd v Wyndham's (Lingerie) Ltd [1981] 1 All ER 1077.

52 Whitley v Delaney [1914] AC 132; Monaghan CC v Vaughan [1948] IR 306; A Roberts & Co Ltd v Leicestershire CC [1961] Ch 555; Thomas Bates & Son Ltd v Wyndham's (Lingerie) Ltd [1981] 1 WLR 505.

53 Commission for New Towns v Cooper [1995] Ch 259; Templiss Properties v Hyams [1999] EGCS 60.

54 Riverlate Properties Ltd v Paul [1975] (Ch) 133.

55 Cf Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378; Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley [1999] Lloyd's Rep Bank 438.

56 Administration of Justice Act 1982, s 20.

57 Re Butlin's ST [1976] Ch 251.

58 Thompson v Whitmore (1860) 1 John & H 268.

different in the settlement, such as by means of a letter of instructions to a trustee.⁵⁹ The unilateral mistake of the settlor is sufficient to ground a claim for rectification of the settlement, provided that the settlement is not part of a bargain between the settlor and the trustees (in which case common mistake must be proved).⁶⁰

28.3.5 Delivery up and cancellation of documents

A separate, but similar, remedy in relation to documents is that of delivery up and cancellation. Rather than rectify a document to reflect the true intentions of the parties, the court will order the cancellation of that document in circumstances in which a document has been declared void and where it is considered by the court that it would be inequitable for one party to remain in possession of a document which appears, on its face, to be valid.⁶¹ The remedy is available even if the document is void at common law,⁶² although there must be some ground of inequity to invoke the equitable jurisdiction.⁶³ Similarly, where a contract is voidable and has been declared void, the remedy of delivery up may be ordered.⁶⁴ The remedy will not obtain where the contract is not wholly avoided, however.⁶⁵

The purpose behind this remedy is to prevent the inequity of allowing one party to a purported transaction to retain an apparently valid document when the transaction has been declared void.⁶⁶ Clearly, there would be a risk to the other party that the document could be used purportedly to grant rights to third parties acting in good faith, despite the invalidity of the underlying transaction creating the document. Therefore, in relation to a deed of conveyance, for example, which had been procured by fraudulent misrepresentation (and therefore held to have been void ab initio), the risk would be that the fraudster would seek to transfer the benefit of the deed to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice.⁶⁷ The innocent party to the void transaction would therefore face the difficulty of establishing rights in the subject matter of the deed against the purchaser. The remedy of delivery up and cancellation requires that the fraudster, in this example, deliver the document to the innocent party and that the document then be cancelled.

As with many of the equitable principles which have been considered, the remedy will not be available where a remedy at common law would be sufficient.⁶⁸

Similarly, the court may order the remedy on terms to achieve justice between the parties.⁶⁹ For example, a borrower under a loan agreement effected by means of a document which was held void may be entitled to cancel the document subject to a requirement to repay the moneys borrowed so that the borrower would not be unjustly enriched.⁷⁰

59 Weir v Van Tromp (1900) 16 TLR 531.

60 Re Butlin's ST [1976] Ch 251.

61 Davis v Duke of Marlborough (1819) 2 Swan 108.

62 Ryan v Macmath (1789) 3 Bro CC 15.

63 Simpson v Lord Howden (1837) 3 My & Cr 97.

64 Duncan v Worrall (1822) 10 Price 31.

65 Onions v Cohen (1865) 2 H & M 354; Ideal Bedding Co Ltd v Holland [1907] 2 Ch 157.

66 Jervis v White (1802) 7 Ves 413; Wynne v Callender (1826) 1 Russ 293; Earl of Milltown v Stewart (1837) 3 My & Cr 18.

67 Peake v Highfield (1826) 1 Russ 559; Burton v Gray (1873) 8 Ch App 932.

68 Brooking v Maudslay, Son and Field (1888) 38 Ch D 636.

69 Kasumu v Baba-Egbe [1956] AC 539.

70 Lodge v National Union Investment Co Ltd [1907] 1 Ch 300.

28.3.6 Ne exeat regno

The writ of ne exeat regno is rarely deployed in modern litigation. Literally, it is an order that the defendant should not leave the kingdom. It entitles the successful applicant to arrest a debtor such that the debtor is required to provide security for a debt. The writ is available only in circumstances in which there is a good cause action for at least £50, where there is a ‘probable cause’ to believe that the debtor would leave the jurisdiction unless arrested, and that it would be to the material prejudice of the applicant if the debtor were outside the jurisdiction.⁷¹ This remedy is typically sought in support of an application for a freezing injunction to prevent a debtor from leaving the jurisdiction.

71 Felton v Callis [1969] 1 QB 200, per Megarry J.

Doctrine of notice and undue influence

29.1	THE DOCTRINE OF NOTICE	1247
29.2	UNDUE INFLUENCE	1249
29.2.1	A species of constructive fraud	1249
29.2.2	Two classes of undue influence	1250
29.3	MISREPRESENTATION AND EQUITABLE WRONGS	1255
29.3.1	Misrepresentation in equity	1255
29.3.2	Equitable wrongs	1255
29.4	SETTING MORTGAGES ASIDE – THE PRINCIPLE IN BARCLAYS BANK v O'BRIEN	1256
29.4.1	Context	1257
29.4.2	Barclays Bank v O'Brien	1257
29.4.3	Comparison with CIBC v Pitt	1260
29.4.4	Some factor sufficient to call the arrangement to the mortgagee's attention	1261
29.4.5	The burden of proof	1264
29.4.6	Mortgagee's means of discharging this duty	1265
29.4.7	The liability of the solicitor	1269
29.4.8	Setting aside in part or in whole	1271

OVERVIEW

Where there has been undue influence or a misrepresentation exercised by a mortgagor over a signatory to a mortgage contract, or over a surety of a mortgage transaction, and if the mortgagee has not taken reasonable steps to ensure that that signatory or surety has received independent legal advice as to the nature of the transaction, the mortgagee will be taken to have had constructive notice of the undue influence or misrepresentation. In such a situation, the signatory/surety can set the mortgage aside against the mortgagee.¹ Whereas previously it was necessary to demonstrate that there was some manifest disadvantage to the signatory/surety in the transaction, such that the mortgagee would be fixed with notice of the undue influence or misrepresentation, that is no longer a requirement.² However, there must be something about the transaction which would cause the mortgagee to be put on notice.³ An example of a situation in which there will generally be something about the transaction which ought to put the mortgagee on notice is where the claimant was acting as a surety.⁴

¹ Barclays Bank v O'Brien [1994] 1 AC 180; Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge [1998] 4 All ER 705, CA.

There are two categories of undue influence: actual undue influence and presumed undue influence. Actual undue influence requires evidence of some influence exercised over the claimant. Notice of presumed undue influence will arise (seemingly) in situations in which there is a manifest disadvantage to the claimant, or where there is a special relationship between the claimant and the mortgagor which ought to put the mortgagee on notice.⁵ In circumstances in which the transaction is ostensibly unremarkable and to the financial advantage of the claimant, no claim would stand against the defendant third party.⁶

The mortgagee will not be bound by any undue influence or misrepresentation where the mortgagee has taken 'reasonable steps' to find out the signatory's rights.⁷ 'Reasonable steps' will be said to exist in circumstances in which the claimant has received, or even just signed a certificate asserting that she has received, independent legal advice as to the effect of the mortgage or surety she is signing.⁸

In circumstances in which the claimant had knowledge of a part of the mortgage or surety but did not know the full amount of the liability, the claimant will nevertheless be entitled to have the mortgage set aside in toto.⁹ The only exception to that principle will be where the claimant has nevertheless taken some benefit from the transaction – in which case, the claimant will be required to account to the defendant for that benefit.¹⁰

The doctrines of undue influence and misrepresentation have long formed part of the equitable doctrine of constructive fraud. The scope of these doctrines has been enlarged by recent decisions relating to the creation of mortgages, in which some person is forced into signing a mortgage contract or agreeing to act as a surety for a mortgage contract as a result of undue influence or misrepresentation as to its terms. In this chapter the discussion will focus on the application of the general doctrines of constructive fraud and the doctrine of notice to the particular context of the law of mortgages: the lesser here stands for the greater.

29.1 THE DOCTRINE OF NOTICE

The doctrine of notice has seen something of a resurgence in recent years, after it had been consigned to the footnotes of many land law courses. The reason for this resurgence was a series of decisions of the House of Lords in which Lord Browne-Wilkinson placed the 2 Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No 2) [2002] AC 773, HL.

3 Ibid.

4 Perry v National Provincial Bank [1910] 1 Ch 464; Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No 2) [2002] AC 773, HL; Greene King plc v Stanley [2002] BPIR 491.

5 Barclays Bank v O'Brien [1994] 1 AC 180; CIBC v Pitt [1993] 3 WLR 802 – in the manner considered below.

6 CIBC v Pitt [1993] 3 WLR 802; Leggatt v National Westminster Bank [2000] All ER (D) 1458, CA.

7 Barclays Bank v O'Brien [1994] 1 AC 180.

8 Midland Bank v Massey [1995] 1 All ER 929; Banco Exterior Internacional v Mann [1995] 1 All ER 936; Halifax Mortgage Services Ltd v Stepsky [1996] Ch 1; Barclays Bank v Coleman [2000] 1 All ER 385.

9 TSB Bank v Camfield [1995] 1 All ER 951; Castle Phillips Finance v Piddington (1995) 70 P & CR 592.

10 Midland Bank v Greene [1994] 2 FLR 827; Dunbar Bank plc v Nadeem [1997] 2 All ER 253.

doctrine of notice ‘at the heart of equity’.¹¹ As considered already in this book, the core decision in *Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC*¹² reaffirmed the core principles on which a constructive trust will be imposed – placing knowledge of the unconscionability of the action at its centre: as considered in Chapter 12. This approach has demonstrated a theme in the case law of retreating to the core principles on which equitable institutions work. As part of this notion of conscience, Lord Browne-Wilkinson also turned to the importance of the role of the doctrine of notice in his leading speech in Barclays Bank v O’Brien,¹³ a case concerning the rights of co-owners to set aside mortgages, examined later in this chapter. In that decision, Lord Browne-Wilkinson asserted that the doctrine of notice is at the heart of equity, in that notice of (or, in terms of constructive trusts, knowledge of) another’s rights will preclude a defendant from seeking to defeat that person’s rights.

The role of the doctrine of notice in most land law courses is limited to the issue of protecting equitable interests in unregistered land as centred on a number of cases on the rights of persons in actual occupation.¹⁴ The purpose of the doctrine is to make persons bound by the rights of others in circumstances in which they have notice of those same rights. It is important to note that this doctrine refers to ‘notice’ of those rights, rather than to ‘knowledge’ of them. It is not required, in all cases, that the defendant actually know of the rights in question; instead, it is sufficient if there has been some series of events by which the defendant is deemed to have had those rights brought sufficiently to her attention such that she ought to be bound by them.

The ambit of the doctrine of notice is set out most clearly in the case of Hunt v Luck.¹⁵ There are three strands to the doctrine: actual notice, imputed notice, and constructive notice. The defendant will be said to have notice of the claimant’s rights in any of these three situations. The first, actual notice, refers to the situation in which the rights have been brought directly to the attention of the defendant such that she does know of the existence and nature of those rights.

The second, imputed notice is the strand which arises most often in the case law. Imputed notice arises when some person has notice of the claimant’s rights in circumstances in which the defendant ought to be bound by the notice of that third person; for example, the third person may be the defendant’s agent, as in Kingsnorth Finance v Tizard.¹⁶ In Tizard, the finance company employed a surveyor (therefore, the finance company’s agent) to inspect a property before entering into a mortgage agreement with the legal owner of that property. It was held that the surveyor had notice of the rights of the legal owner’s wife due to his failure to inspect the property sufficiently closely and because of the finance company’s failure to spot discrepancies in the information provided to it by the legal owner. The court held that, because the agent/surveyor had notice of these rights, the principal/finance company ought similarly to have constructive notice of everything of which the agent had notice.

The third category, constructive notice, arises when a person knows of certain facts which put him on inquiry as to the possible existence of the rights of another person, and that 11 Barclays Bank v O’Brien [1994] 1 AC 180, [1993] 3 WLR 786.

12 [1996] AC 669.

13 [1994] 1 AC 180.

14 Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd v Green [1981] 2 WLR 28; Kingsnorth Finance v Tizard [1986] 2 All ER 54; Bristol & West Building Society v Henning [1985] 1 WLR 778; Abbey National v Cann [1991] 1 AC 56.

15 [1902] 1 Ch 428.

16 [1986] 2 All ER 54.

person fails to make such inquiry or take such other steps as are reasonable in the circumstances. Failure to make such inquiries will lead to a finding that such a person has constructive notice of the other person's right and therefore takes subject to it. Thus, constructive notice operates to bring within its ambit situations in which the defendant does not have actual notice but is deemed to have notice, potentially, through the failure of another person to identify reasonably ascertainable information.

The doctrine of notice had become of peripheral importance in situations concerning land as a result of the introduction of the registered land system and land charges. Similarly, the growth of tests of knowledge in the area of constructive trusts and equitable claims, such as *Barlow Clowes*¹⁷ and *Re Montagu*¹⁸ (considered in Chapters 20 and 19) have meant that the long-standing doctrine of notice had become of less importance. In many cases, such as Tizard, the test of notice had transformed from an issue surrounding factors of which the agent could be said to have notice, into a test asserting those things which the agent ought to have looked for. This is to be contrasted with cases like Henning v Bristol and West Building Society,¹⁹ in which the court looked for matters of which the defendant (or its agent) actually had notice, rather than prescribing issues which they ought to have investigated. Thus, the doctrine of notice had become uneven in its application.

Indeed, in the more recent case of O'Brien, it is questionable whether Lord Browne-Wilkinson was seeking to measure matters of which the defendant could be said to have notice, or was in fact creating a menu of issues which are to be investigated to prevent a finding that there is constructive notice arising from a failure to ask certain prescribed questions.

29.2 UNDUE INFLUENCE

There are two categories of undue influence: actual undue influence and presumed undue influence. Actual undue influence requires evidence of some influence exercised over the claimant. Notice of presumed undue influence will arise (seemingly) in situations in which there is a manifest disadvantage to the claimant, or where there is a special relationship between the claimant and the mortgagor which ought to put the mortgagee on notice.

The doctrine of undue influence is a long-established equitable principle which prevents a person from relying on her common law rights where those rights were created as a result of some undue influence being exercised over another person. Before coming to the modern law on undue influence in relation to the law of trusts and of property, it is as well to consider the doctrine of undue influence as it has been classically applied, and its particular relationship with the law of contract.

29.2.1 A species of constructive fraud

The legal textbooks, before the decision of the House of Lords in Barclays Bank v O'Brien, considered undue influence to be one part of the equitable rules against 'constructive

17 Barlow Clowes International Ltd (In Liquidation) and Others v Vaughan and Others [1992] 4 All ER 22.

18 Re Montagu [1987] Ch 264.

19 Henning v Bristol & West Building Society [1985] 1 WLR 778.

fraud'.²⁰ To that extent, the doctrine was considered to be of only restricted importance alongside three other equitable wrongs making up constructive fraud. Given the proximity of undue influence to notions of fraud, there are shades of the doctrine in *Rochefoucauld v Boustead*²¹ in this area to the effect that equity will not permit a person to use her common law rights to perpetrate a fraud. The place of misrepresentation and other equitable wrongs in this area is considered below.

The doctrine of notice is found by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in O'Brien to lie at the heart of undue influence and this form of equity as a means of resisting constructive fraud on the following basis:

if the party asserting that he takes free of the earlier rights of another knows of certain facts which put him on inquiry as to the possible existence of the rights of that other and he fails to make such inquiry or take such other steps as are reasonable . . . he will have constructive notice of such other right and take subject to it.

Therefore, the issue arises as to the notice on the part of a third party of undue influence between two other people. As Lord Browne-Wilkinson extended the point:

if the creditor bank has notice, actual or constructive, of the undue influence exercised by the husband (and consequentially of the wife's equity to set aside the transaction) the creditor will take subject to that equity and the wife can set aside the transaction against the creditor (albeit a purchaser for value) as well as against the husband.

29.2.2 Two classes of undue influence

The following test for the application of the doctrine of undue influence was derived from *Bank of Credit and Commerce International SA v Aboody*²² and is that applied in the House of Lords in O'Brien:

Class 1: actual undue influence . . . Class 2: presumed undue influence . . . the complainant only has to show, in the first instance, that there was a relationship of trust and confidence between the complainant and the wrongdoer of such a nature that it is fair to presume that the wrongdoer abused that relationship.

Therefore, the doctrine of undue influence divides into two: first, situations in which there has been de facto undue influence; and, secondly, circumstances in which undue influence is presumed. These two classes are considered in turn below.

Actual undue influence

Actual undue influence requires that there is some influence exerted on another person to make a gift or to enter into a transaction. It has been equated with common law duress.²³

20 See McGhee, 2005.

21 [1897] 1 Ch 196.

22 [1992] 4 All ER 955.

23 Beatson, 1989, 278.

Clearly, the line between permissible pressure and undue influence will be a difficult one to draw in many circumstances. For example, it is clear that where a person is induced to enter into a mortgage to avert the prosecution of his son in relation to the forgery of bills held by the mortgagee, that mortgage will be set aside on grounds of undue influence.²⁴ Other cases have involved a demonstration of de facto control of one person by another in circumstances of religious observance,²⁵ or simply where an older man has control over a younger man.²⁶

Therefore, influence need not be physical, but it must be unjustified in that it seeks a benefit for the person exercising the influence which would not otherwise have been agreed to. The purpose behind the application of the principle is to prevent a person from relying on his common law rights where those rights have arisen as a result of some fraud or wrongful act on the part of that person. In the old cases it was necessary to demonstrate both that there was some benefit to the defendant²⁷ and some manifest disadvantage to the plaintiff.²⁸ The removal of these elements as being pre-requisites of the claim is considered at para 29.4.4 below.²⁹

Presumed undue influence

The second category of undue influence is more difficult to pin down. The first category of actual undue influence turns on a question of fact – whether or not there has been any express influence which is considered to be ‘undue’. The presumed undue influence category advances a more difficult proposition – that there are certain relationships which ought to warn third parties that some undue influence might be possible, such that those persons are deemed to have constructive notice of the undue influence. The aim of equity in this context is to provide particular protection for parties in one of the prescribed relationships. The problem then is to identify those relationships which ought to put the other party on notice, because ‘[a]t least since the time of Lord Eldon, equity has steadfastly and wisely refused to put limits on the relationships to which the presumption can apply’.³⁰

Typically it is required that there is a suitable degree of trust and confidence between the parties such that it could be presumed that one party would tend to rely on the other. It is not sufficient to demonstrate that one party is in a fiduciary relationship with that other.³¹ This is because fiduciary relationships arise in a variety of situations, some of which would not necessarily include the possibility of undue influence. For example, a doctor would not necessarily be in a position to exert undue influence to force a patient to sign a mortgage, but might be able to exert some undue influence over them to buy private healthcare services. It is important to look at the facts to decide whether or not there ought to be a presumption of undue influence in any particular case.³²

Thus, in the case of Lloyds Bank v Bundy,³³ Lord Denning held that an elderly bank customer who was cajoled into incurring injurious debts to the bank on the advice of the 24 Williams v Bayley (1866) LR 1 HL 200.

25 Morley v Loughman [1893] 1 Ch 736.

26 Smith v Kay (1859) 7 HLC 750.

27 Allcard v Skinner (1887) 36 Ch D 145.

28 Bank of Credit and Commerce International SA v Aboody [1990] QB 923.

29 Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No 2) [2002] AC 773.

30 Goldsworthy v Brickell [1987] Ch 378, 401, per Nourse LJ.

31 Re Coomber [1911] 1 Ch 723; Goldsworthy v Brickell [1987] Ch 378.

32 National Westminster Bank v Morgan [1985] AC 686.

33 [1975] QB 326.

bank manager was entitled to rely on a presumption of undue influence between banker and a customer in the position of that particular customer. Lord Denning was concerned to protect the interests of a person who was vulnerable and who was in a situation in which he would tend to rely on the advice given to him by the bank. However, Lord Denning's formulation of the appropriate principles has been much criticised, as will emerge below. Instead, the tighter formulation of the O'Brien principle has been favoured over Lord Denning's concern to achieve the right result first and then to explain the intellectual arguments justifying it second.

On the older authorities pre-O'Brien there was no presumption of undue influence in cases between husband and wife simply as a result of that relationship.³⁴ The reason for this principle was that such a presumption being made in every case would render married life intolerable because husband and wife would not be able to deal together with any other person without such a presumption operating. However, the progress that O'Brien makes is to presume such a conflict in every situation about which there is some evidently unfavourable aspect (formerly expressed in the legal requirement of manifest disadvantage) from the perspective of the spouse, cohabitee or surety in a sufficiently close relationship. What this achieves is a slightly back-to-front means of imposing an obligation on mortgagees to inquire into the information which has been given to the surety before consenting to the arrangement which is said to have resulted from some undue influence.

In a more recent case, the Court of Appeal upheld the finding of a county court judge that in a situation in which a man in his mid-forties convinced his parents, then in their seventies, to put their house up as security for a loan the son was taking out to acquire an interest in a public house, there would be a relationship of trust and confidence between the son and the parents.³⁵ The most significant factor in that context was the comparative business experience and acumen of the son and the naivety of his parents, such that the transaction ought to have been evidently unfavourable to the parents who ran this risk of losing their home if their son's business failed.

More recently still in the Privy Council, a member of the elite military unit the Special Air Service (SAS) contended that he had been put under undue influence by the regiment to sign a confidentiality agreement to the effect that he would not publish any memoirs relating to his service in the SAS.³⁶ The soldiers were offered an ultimatum to the effect that either they signed the agreement, or they would be required to leave the regiment and return to their previous regiment – something which for such soldiers would be considered equivalent to an humiliating demotion. The claimant pointed to the hierarchy found in the regiment and the fact that the officer who required the soldiers to sign the agreements was the claimant's commanding officer and someone for whom the claimant had formed soldierly respect. Lord Hoffmann in the Privy Council held that:³⁷

Certain relationships – parent and child, trustee and beneficiary, etc – give rise to a presumption that one party had influence over the other. . . . if the transaction is one which cannot reasonably be explained by the relationship, that will be prima facie evidence of undue influence. Even if the relationship does not fall into one of the 34 Howes v Bishop [1909] 2 KB 390.

35 Greene King plc v Stanley [2002] BPIR 491.

36 R v Attorney-General (2003) unreported, 17 March (Privy Council Appeal No 61 of 2002).

37 Ibid, para 21 et seq.

established categories, the evidence may show that one party did in fact have influence over the other.

In this case the soldiers had been required to sign confidentiality agreements specifically without seeking independent legal advice but with the benefit of a brief, written explanation of the terms of the agreement: the claimant contended that this means of procuring his signature constituted undue influence. Lord Hoffmann went on to say that the presence or absence of independent legal advice ‘may or may not be a relevant matter according to the circumstances’ and that there will be circumstances in which denying a person independent legal advice will not necessarily connote undue influence. On these facts, the Privy Council formed the view that the soldier would have realised ‘with a moment’s thought’³⁸ that he would be precluded from publishing his memoirs; therefore the taking of legal advice would have made no difference to his decision. It was held that the soldier had not been subject to undue influence in procuring his signature to the agreement, but rather that he had agreed to sign the agreement because he wished to remain in the regiment.³⁹

The issue therefore is in what circumstances a presumption will arise that there could be undue influence and thus place liability on a third party to the undue influence itself. As will be seen below, the onus of proof falls on the defendant to disprove that there was any undue influence in line with the presumption. The result is that the defendant is bound by any undue influence which arises in such a situation.⁴⁰ The relationships in which presumed undue influence arises most frequently in the recent cases are that of parent and child,⁴¹ trustee and beneficiary,⁴² doctor and patient,⁴³ and even between religious advisor and devotee.⁴⁴ It was held in *Curtis v Curtis*⁴⁵ that where a man had begun to attend a spiritual healing centre, he had been unduly influenced by people at the centre to settle property on trust for the benefit of the centre. The trust could be set aside on the basis that it had been created as a result of undue influence.

There have also been cases where a presumption of undue influence has been held possible depending on the circumstances of the particular situation. Two such situations are those of husband and wife⁴⁶ and employer and employee,⁴⁷ provided that there is something about the transaction itself which ought to raise that presumption in the mind of the other party.⁴⁸ In relation to husband and wife, Lord Browne-Wilkinson in O’Brien made reference to the relationship of special tenderness which makes it possible to manipulate emotional and sexual ties to exert undue influence in many cases. Similarly, it would be possible in some

38 Ibid, para 27.

39 Alternatively it could be argued that this was in itself a threat which constituted undue influence: either you give up some right you currently hold (to publish memoirs of your time with the regiment), or else you will be humiliated by being forced to leave the regiment.

40 Barclays Bank v O’Brien [1994] 1 AC 180.

41 Bainbrigge v Browne (1881) 18 Ch D 188. There may be undue influence exerted by an adult child on a vulnerable parent: Abbey National v Stringer [2006] EWCA Civ 338.

42 Beningfield v Baxter (1886) 12 App Cas 167.

43 Mitchell v Homfray (1881) 8 QBD 587.

44 Huguenin v Baseley (1807) 14 Ves Jun 273; Allcard v Skinner (1887) 36 Ch D 145; cf Nel v Kean [2003] WTLR 501.

45 [2011] EWCA Civ 1602.

46 Barclays Bank v O’Brien [1994] 1 AC 180; CIBC v Pitt [1993] 3 WLR 802.

47 Credit Lyonnais Nederland NV v Burch [1996] NPC 99.

48 CIBC v Pitt [1993] 3 WLR 802.

cases for employers to exert pressure on employees through the bond of the contract of employment. These issues are considered more closely below.

Understanding this division within undue influence

Lord Hobhouse in *Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No 2)*⁴⁹ identified the source of this division in the following manner:

The division between presumed and actual undue influence derives from the judgments in Allcard v Skinner. Actual undue influence presents no relevant problem. It is an equitable wrong committed by the dominant party against the other which makes it unconscionable for the dominant party to enforce his legal rights against the other. It is typically some express conduct overbearing the other party's will. It is capable of including conduct which might give a defence at law, for example, misrepresentation.

Interestingly, here his Lordship sees undue influence as forming part of the long equitable tradition to do with the treatment of unconscionable behaviour, and also identifies undue influence as being 'an equitable wrong' whereby the reason for the setting aside of the contract is the wrongful action of the defendant. In consequence, it is not founded on any notion of restitution of unjust enrichment, a doctrine which has application without any need to find fault on the part of the defendant.⁵⁰

Undue influence and wills

Claims of undue influence arise most commonly in relation to wills, whereby it is often alleged that a person unduly influenced a testator to change their will so as to benefit that person. The bulk of this chapter is concerned with the large amount of litigation concerning undue influence in relation to mortgages in recent years: however, undue influence in relation to wills is a serious problem in practice too. Where there has been 'a form of coercion, or pressure exerted so as to overpower the will without convincing the judgment of the testator',⁵¹ then the bequest in question may be set aside.⁵² It must be proved that the pressure was both 'improper pressure' and that the bequest must have resulted from that pressure.⁵³ The burden of proving these factors falls on the party alleging that there has been undue influence.⁵⁴ What has to be proved, precisely, is that 'the circumstances of the will are consistent with the hypothesis that it was obtained by undue influence, and inconsistent with a contrary hypothesis'.⁵⁵ This latter element is troublesome: what has to be proved is not that there definitely was undue influence – presumably because once the testator has died there may only have been two people present at the time of the undue influence and therefore that 49 [2002] AC 773, para 103.

50 See Smith v Cooper [2010] EWCA Civ 722.

51 This form of words was used in Abbott v Richardson [2006] EWHC 1291 (Ch), [197], per Strauss QC, adapting expressions from earlier cases.

52 Hall v Hall (1868) LR 1 P&D 481; Wingrove v Wingrove (1885) 11 PD 81; 50 JP 56.

53 Ibid; Abbott v Richardson [2006] EWHC 1291 (Ch), [197].

54 Ibid.

55 Re Cooper [2005] EWHC 2389, [53]; applied in Abbott v Richardson [2006] EWHC 1291 (Ch), [197].

proof may be impossible in most cases – but rather it must simply be proved, in effect, that the only reasonable explanation for the bequest was that there must have been undue influence exerted over the testator.

29.3 MISREPRESENTATION AND EQUITABLE WRONGS

29.3.1 Misrepresentation in equity

Misrepresentation is included in this chapter as a principle which might lead to a transaction being set aside as a result of the decision in O'Brien. In that case, it was held by Lord Browne-Wilkinson that notice of a misrepresentation made to the claimant appears to be capable of founding an equitable right in the claimant to prevent the defendant from relying on his equitable rights.

This strand of analysis is separate from the issue of undue influence. As considered above, in relation to undue influence, there is a question as to whether or not the pressure imposed on B by A was tantamount to undue influence. In relation to misrepresentation, it is sufficient for B to set aside the transaction if B can demonstrate that a material misrepresentation perpetrated on B by A induced B to enter into the transaction.

A number of problems arise with the development of this principle, as arose with undue influence. The primary issue is that of imputing constructive notice of a misrepresentation to a person who had no part to play in that misrepresentation. It is suggested that the problems in relation to undue influence and misrepresentation are similar. More exactly, the problem is in setting aside a transaction between A and C on grounds of misrepresentation, when the misrepresentation was perpetrated by A on B to make B consent to the transaction or to stand as surety for it.⁵⁶ C may have had no knowledge or notice of that misrepresentation.

29.3.2 Equitable wrongs

Having understood misrepresentation as being an addition to the development of undue influence, there is also a need to explore what is meant by the expression ‘equitable wrongs’ as used by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in O'Brien. In seeing undue influence as one of the traditional categories of constructive fraud, it is to be supposed that by the term ‘equitable wrong’ Lord Browne-Wilkinson intended to refer to the other three recognised categories of equitable wrongs: abuse of conscience, unconscionable bargains, and frauds on a power.

The category of misrepresentation added by O'Brien is probably best understood as fitting into the pattern of these wrongs. If their common link is taken to be their proximity to fraud, then misrepresentation (in its narrow sense of ‘an intention to deceive’) clearly fits this pattern in relation to civil wrongs such as fraudulent misrepresentation. Where the problem becomes more complex is in relation to the other potential forms of misrepresentation. Innocent misrepresentation would not seem to import any notion of fraud, unless it arose in relation to a defendant who occupied a position in which any assurances or statements would necessarily be relied upon by the recipient. That comes closer to the form of negligent misstatement in Hedley Byrne v Heller.⁵⁷ Indeed, it brings the matter closer to negligent misrepresentation, under which the defendant exhibits negligence as to the misleading nature of an assurance or statement. It is not clear that negligence necessarily imports an impact on the conscience such that equitable relief would necessarily be required.

⁵⁶ Barclays Bank v O'Brien [1994] 1 AC 180.

⁵⁷ [1964] AC 465.

Equity will operate, therefore, to protect a party to a transaction from suffering the effects of some wrong committed by the other party. However, equity will not operate to rescue a person from a bad bargain which she has entered into in full cognisance of the facts.⁵⁸ Therefore, where a person agreed to invest in a particular pension mistakenly believing that that pension would be more profitable than ultimately it proved to be, it was not open to that person to have the agreement set aside because the seller of the pension had not acted unconscionably so as to induce him to enter into the contract.⁵⁹

29.4 SETTING MORTGAGES ASIDE – THE PRINCIPLE IN BARCLAYS BANK v O'BRIEN

The stream of cases following O'Brien has permitted individuals, who were not necessarily parties to mortgages, to prevent the mortgagee from relying on a statutory right to repossession or sale of the property on the basis that those individuals had been the victim of a misrepresentation or some undue influence by the mortgagor. The essence of this power to set aside the mortgage against the mortgagee is that the mortgage created is in circumstances in which the mortgagee is taken to have notice of the misrepresentation or undue influence. The most significant case now is the decision of the House of Lords in Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge.

There are two categories of undue influence: actual undue influence and presumed undue influence. Actual undue influence requires evidence of some influence exercised over the claimant. Notice of presumed undue influence will arise (seemingly) in situations in which there is a manifest disadvantage to the claimant, or where there is a special relationship between the claimant and the mortgagor which ought to put the mortgagee on notice.⁶⁰

The mortgagee will not be bound by any undue influence or misrepresentation where the mortgagee has taken 'reasonable steps' to find out the signatory's rights.⁶¹ 'Reasonable steps' will be said to exist in circumstances in which the claimant has received, or even just signed a certificate asserting that she has received, independent legal advice as to the effect of the mortgage or surety she is signing.⁶²

In circumstances in which the claimant had knowledge of a part of the mortgage or surety but did not know the full amount of the liability, the claimant will nevertheless be entitled to have the mortgage set aside in toto.⁶³ The only exception to that principle will be where the claimant has nevertheless taken some benefit from the transaction – in which case the claimant will be required to account to the defendant for that benefit.⁶⁴

58 Clarion Ltd v National Provident Institution [2000] 2 All ER 265.

59 Ibid. Cf Torrance v Bolton (1872) LR 8 Ch App 118; Solle v Butcher [1949] 2 All ER 1107.

60 Barclays Bank v O'Brien [1994] 1 AC 180; CIBC v Pitt [1993] 3 WLR 802 – in the manner considered below.

61 Barclays Bank v O'Brien [1994] 1 AC 180.

62 Midland Bank v Massey [1995] 1 All ER 929; Banco Exterior Internacional v Mann [1995] 1 All ER 936; Halifax Mortgage Services Ltd v Stepsky [1996] Ch 1; Barclays Bank v Coleman [2000] 1 All ER 385.

63 TSB Bank v Camfield [1995] 1 All ER 951; Castle Phillips Finance v Piddington (1995) 70 P & CR 592.

64 Midland Bank v Greene [1994] 2 FLR 827; Dunbar Bank plc v Nadeem [1997] 2 All ER 253.

29.4.1 Context

One particularly important area in which the doctrine of notice has come into recent prominence has been that of undue influence in the law of mortgages.⁶⁵ A difficult issue which is being faced by more and more solicitors is the ability of, typically, a spouse to claim priority to a mortgagee bank or building society to the matrimonial home in the event of failure to make repayments under the charge. It is as well to understand the context behind this development in the case law as expressed in the leading case *Barclays Bank v O'Brien*⁶⁶ before the House of Lords, in which the leading speech was delivered by Lord Browne-Wilkinson. The problem was stated to be:

whether a bank is entitled to enforce against a wife an obligation to secure a debt owed by her husband to the bank where the wife has been induced to stand as surety for her husband's debt by the undue influence or misrepresentation of the husband . . . The large number of cases of this type coming before the courts in recent years reflects the rapid changes in social attitudes and the distribution of wealth which have recently occurred. Wealth is now more widely spread. Moreover a high proportion of privately owned wealth is invested in the matrimonial home.

Bound up with this desire to develop the principle of undue influence is a modern understanding of the way in which properties acquired under mortgage are to be held. His Lordship continued:

In parallel with these financial developments, society's recognition of the equality of the sexes has led to a rejection of the concept that the wife is subservient to the husband in the management of the family's finances. A number of the authorities reflect an unwillingness in the court to perpetuate law based on this outmoded concept.

The nature of the decision is therefore set out as being policy-based, with a specific aim of providing a defence to wronged spouses and others in relation to the mortgage over their homes.

The law of mortgages provides straightforwardly that the mortgagor is liable to make good periodical amounts due under the mortgage agreement. Failure to make good the periodical payments results in the mortgagee's ability to take possession of the property provided as security for the mortgage. That much is trite law. The complexity relates to the rights of the mortgagor and others to resist repossession and sale, as introduced by the important House of Lords decisions in *Barclays Bank v O'Brien*⁶⁷ and in *CIBC v Pitt*⁶⁸ (the latter appeal having been heard by the same House of Lords and in which judgment was delivered on the same day).

29.4.2 Barclays Bank v O'Brien

The facts revolved around a misrepresentation and alleged undue influence exercised by a husband over his wife. The husband was a shareholder in a manufacturing company which ⁶⁵ These principles apply to re-mortgages just as they apply to the original mortgage: Yorkshire Bank v Tinsley [2004] 3 All ER 463.

⁶⁶ [1993] 3 WLR 786.

⁶⁷ Ibid.

⁶⁸ [1994] 1 AC 200.

had a substantial, unsecured overdraft. The husband arranged with the manager of the respondent bank for an overdraft facility for which the husband agreed to secure the company's indebtedness. The husband provided security by means of a second charge over the matrimonial home owned jointly by the husband and the appellant, his wife.

The bank prepared the necessary documentation, which included a guarantee to be provided by the husband and a charge to be signed by both the husband and the wife. Although the respondent's manager had instructed that the couple should take independent legal advice and that the couple should be advised on any aspect of the transaction which they did not understand, the respondent's staff responsible for effecting the transaction did not ensure that such advice had been obtained by the couple prior to signing the documents. Indeed, Lord Browne-Wilkinson found that the respondent's manager had made a note that the appellant, Mrs O'Brien, might pose a problem and also that 'if [the couple] are in any doubt they should contact their solicitors before signing'. The husband signed the documentation without reading it, and the appellant was taken to the bank by her husband to sign the documents which made her a surety for the overdraft.

It is important to note that Mrs O'Brien was a guarantor of the overdraft provided for her husband's business. She took no direct benefit from the guarantee which she signed (although it might be said that she benefited indirectly from the continued solvency of her husband's business). Significantly, Mrs O'Brien was not advised as to her own, personal liabilities if the overdraft was not maintained and the guarantee called in. Furthermore, her husband had lied to her about the size of the overdraft and, therefore, about the size of the guarantee she was signing. While Mrs O'Brien knew that she was creating a charge over the matrimonial home in favour of the respondent bank, she believed that it was for £60,000 rather than £135,000 and that it would last for only three weeks.

In time, the company's indebtedness increased above the agreed overdraft limit and the respondent bank sought to take its security by forcing a sale of the O'Briens' house. The appellant, Mrs O'Brien, argued that her husband had exercised undue influence over her and that he had misrepresented the effect of the charge which she had signed. The problem was stated to be: '... whether a bank is entitled to enforce against a wife an obligation to secure a debt owed by her husband to the bank where the wife has been induced to stand as surety for her husband's debt by the undue influence or misrepresentation of the husband.'

It is important to note that, while Lord Browne-Wilkinson undertook a general survey of the law in this area, Mrs O'Brien's successful appeal turned ultimately on the argument that she had been the victim of misrepresentation. The question of undue influence on the facts of O'Brien was unproven.

The nature of undue influence

The definition of undue influence divided into two parts, as set out at para 29.2.2 above, and was derived from Bank of Credit and Commerce International SA v Aboody:⁶⁹

Class 1: actual undue influence ... Class 2: presumed undue influence ... the complainant only has to show, in the first instance, that there was a relationship of trust and confidence between the complainant and the wrongdoer of such a nature that it is fair to presume that the wrongdoer abused that relationship.

69 [1992] 4 All ER 955.

Therefore, Lord Browne-Wilkinson held that in cases involving husband and wife, the wife can demonstrate that there was a relationship of ‘trust and confidence’ between them such that there is a presumption of undue influence. Importantly, in CIBC v Pitt, Lord Browne-Wilkinson held that this presumption will arise only in circumstances in which there is some manifest disadvantage to that cohabitee. On the facts of O’Brien, it was held that because Mrs O’Brien was acting as surety in a transaction under which she took no direct, personal benefit, it must be presumed that she might have been the subject of some undue influence. It is suggested that this must be correct, or else all mortgagees would be required to enquire into the detail of the relationship between each married couple seeking to take out mortgages with them.

The foundation for this constructive notice is the most difficult aspect of the decision in O’Brien, because it is said by Lord Browne-Wilkinson to arise as a result of some ‘agency’ between the person effecting the undue influence and the mortgagee, as considered next.

Agency

The difficulty in setting aside a mortgage against a mortgagee in a case of undue influence between a married couple is the logical problem of establishing that the mortgagee ought to be bound by something which occurs entirely between that couple. There is a possibility not only that there has been undue influence, but also that the husband was acting as the creditor’s agent, or that the creditor had actual or constructive notice. Suppose that the bank had suggested a particular course of action to one of the parties and had instructed that person to convince the cohabitee to consent to that transaction: in such a situation, any undue influence exerted by the mortgagor on the cohabitee might lead to the mortgagor being considered to be the bank’s agent in exerting that undue influence. Such a relationship of agency would, prima facie, fix the bank with notice of everything of which their agent had notice.⁷⁰

The importance of the agency principle underpinning undue influence was applied to the facts of O’Brien in the following way:

If the wrongdoing husband is acting as agent for the creditor bank in obtaining the surety from the wife, the creditor will be fixed with the wrongdoing of its own agent and the surety contract can be set aside as against the creditor . . . Similarly, in cases such as the present where the wife has been induced to enter into the transaction by the husband’s misrepresentation, her equity to set aside the transaction will be enforceable against the creditor if either the husband was acting as the creditor’s agent or the creditor had actual or constructive notice.

On the facts in O’Brien, the creditor was held to have been put on inquiry in that the transaction was to the financial disadvantage of Mrs O’Brien and that there is a substantial risk in transactions of that kind that the husband has committed a legal or equitable wrong in procuring the wife’s agreement to act as surety. Alternatively, where the mortgagor is found to have been acting as the agent of the bank in procuring the agreement of another person to the transaction, the bank will be fixed with notice of any undue influence which that person had perpetrated. The suspicion of agency in O’Brien arose from the fact that it was the bank which had proposed the surety arrangement to support the problem of an overdraft for Mr O'Brien's company.

⁷⁰ Kingsnorth Finance v Tizard [1986] 2 All ER 54.

It is to be noted that the agency here is a deemed agency between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, as opposed to the form of agency which will be attached to the advising solicitor, as discussed at para 29.4.7 below.

The argument based on misrepresentation

The argument based on misrepresentation is far more straightforward. It is sufficient to show that there has been a misrepresentation effected by the mortgagor against the co-signatory which induced that person to sign the agreement. Again, where the mortgagee has failed to ensure that the co-signatory has received independent advice as to the effect of the transaction, the mortgagee will be fixed with constructive notice of that misrepresentation. Consequently, the co-signatory will be entitled to set aside the mortgage against the mortgagee.⁷¹

29.4.3 Comparison with CIBC v Pitt

Concentration in the profession in practice has focused on O'Brien, which is unsurprising given the power shift it suggests in favour of the mortgagor – allowing cohabitees generally to set aside the mortgage. However, *CIBC v Pitt*⁷² makes for sobering reading in the majority of circumstances. Whereas O'Brien was a surety case, in which it was held that there was evidence to establish an agency relationship between the misrepresenter and the financial institution, CIBC v Pitt concerned a straightforward mortgage over property rather than the provision of a guarantee by a cohabitee.

The essential difference

The case of O'Brien is explicitly distinguished by Lord Browne-Wilkinson on the basis that there is a difference between a case of a joint advance under a mortgage and a case of a surety. In the case of a surety:

there is not only the possibility of undue influence having been exercised but also the increased risk of it having been exercised because . . . the guarantee by a wife of her husband's debts is not for her financial benefit. It is the combination of the two factors that puts the creditor on enquiry.

Mr Pitt had told the appellant that he wished to borrow money on the security of the house to finance speculation on the stock market. The appellant, Mrs Pitt, was unhappy with this suggestion and expressed these reservations to her husband. Mr Pitt imposed undue influence on Mrs Pitt to agree to the loan. Mrs Pitt did not read any of the documentation and saw only the first and last pages of it. The solicitors who acted for the couple were also solicitors for the bank. The appellant did not receive any independent advice as to the transaction. The 71 Subject to the extent of that person's reliance on the representations: Barclays Bank v Rivett [1999] 1 FLR 730. See also Habib Bank Ltd v Tufail [2006] EWCA Civ 374.

72 [1993] 4 All ER 433.

appellant alleged that she had entered into the transaction as a result of her husband's undue influence and by her husband's false representation. The trial judge found that there had been undue influence but no misrepresentation.

What the appellant could not demonstrate on the facts was that the financial institution was affected by the undue influence of the husband. There is no causal link necessarily between there being undue influence and an ability on the part of the wronged spouse to resist the chargee's claim for possession. Therefore, the pleadings setting out the parties' arguments in the litigation must explore the link between the undue influence and agency between the wrongdoing spouse and the financial institution. On the facts in Pitt, there was nothing to indicate that there was anything other than a normal loan secured by a charge between husband and wife.⁷³ It was held that, unlike the facts in O'Brien where Mrs O'Brien was acting to her manifest disadvantage as a surety, there was no factor which ought necessarily to raise a presumption of undue influence in Pitt given that the bank was found to have been extending money on an ordinary secured loan transaction which indicated no necessary disadvantage to Mrs Pitt. This approach received the approbation of a differently constituted House of Lords in Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No 2), considered next.

29.4.4 Some factor sufficient to call the arrangement to the mortgagee's attention

The issue

Following on from the above, it is clear that there is a need for there to be some factor which will call the transaction to the mortgagee's attention: that is, there must be something which would indicate to the mortgagee that the signatory in this case was more likely to have been placed under undue influence. What emerges most clearly from the decision of the House of Lords in *Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No 2)*⁷⁴ is that transactions where some person is required to act as a surety will be an example of a situation in which such a person might have been the victim of some undue influence or misrepresentation, because she is guaranteeing another person's performance of the transaction without taking any direct benefit herself qua surety.

The old approach – manifest disadvantage

Before the decision in Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No 2), it was unclear whether or not it was necessary for the claimant to have established that the transaction necessitated 'manifest disadvantage' to her, such that the defendant must necessarily have been put on notice.⁷⁵ In CIBC v Pitt, Lord Browne-Wilkinson held that if a plaintiff could prove actual undue influence there was no requirement to demonstrate that the transaction was manifestly disadvantageous to the plaintiff. Rather, there would be an entitlement to have the transaction set aside as of right. That is the rule to be divined from Pitt. There is, however, some potential confusion, in that the reason why the House of Lords did not permit Mrs Pitt to set aside the mortgage transaction against the mortgagee was that there was no manifest ⁷³ Leggatt v National Westminster Bank [2000] All ER (D) 1458.

⁷⁴ [2002] AC 773.

⁷⁵ National Westminster Bank v Morgan [1985] AC 686; Goldsworthy v Brickell [1987] Ch 378, 401, per Nourse LJ.

disadvantage which ought to have put the bank on notice as to her predicament. Therefore, in CIBC v Pitt, even though there was found to have been actual undue influence, his Lordship suggested that proof of manifest disadvantage was not required, whereas in Barclays Bank v O'Brien, he had suggested that it was. However, it is important to bear in mind that the deciding factor in CIBC v Pitt was the lack of any obvious manifest disadvantage in the transaction which led to Mrs Pitt failing to set the mortgage aside.

In other cases, such as Cheese v Thomas,⁷⁶ a finding of manifest disadvantage was made where an elderly man parted with all of his savings to enter into a purchase of a property with his great-nephew. In the alternative, there will be no manifest disadvantage where the contracting party has an interest in the subject matter of the transaction such as shares in a company repackaging a loan.⁷⁷ In such cases of manifest disadvantage, the courts have considered the mortgagee to be on notice of any presumed undue influence. An absence of any such evident disadvantage to the claimant, on the other hand, has caused the courts to deny a remedy setting aside the transaction. While the dicta have proved equivocal on this issue, it is clear that the presence of such demonstrable disadvantage in the transaction will lead the courts to order setting aside, whereas they have tended not to do so if it is absent.

The requirement of manifest disadvantage has been criticised on a number of grounds. The first is that, in line with the more general development of a principle of restitution of unjust enrichment in English law, manifest disadvantage is a requirement which perverts the doctrine from requiring simply the proof that undue influence has been exercised into a further evidential requirement that the disadvantage which it will cause the cohabitee is manifest. However, it is difficult to see why the doctrine of undue influence should necessarily be required to fall into line with doctrines such as mistake and misrepresentation in that sense.

A further point is that the modern use of the term 'manifest disadvantage' (as used initially by the House of Lords in National Westminster Bank v Morgan)⁷⁸ is a development of the principle set out by Lindley LJ in Allcard v Skinner,⁷⁹ that the principle was satisfied by 'a gift so large as not to be reasonably accounted for on the ground of friendship, relationship, charity or other motives on which ordinary men act'.⁸⁰ The test adopted in Morgan is a more brutal rendition of the Allcard principle, which proceeded on the basis of transactions which were out of the ordinary course of transactions between such persons. That something is required to be 'manifest' connotes something which would be 'obvious to any independent and reasonable persons who considered the transaction at the time with knowledge of all relevant facts'.⁸¹ There is an important change of emphasis here between an objective understanding of something being out of the ordinary, and a more subjective assessment of whether or not someone involved in the transaction would have found the facts to be demonstrably obvious.

In fact the courts have tended to consider each case on its own merits. In some cases, such as Burch where a junior employee was required to provide her small flat as security for her employer's debt, the disadvantage would indeed be obvious. However, in cases such as Bank

76 [1994] 1 WLR 129.

77 Bank of Scotland v Bennett [1997] 1 FLR 801; Goode Durrant Administration v Bidulph [1994] 2 FLR 551; Britannia Building Society v Pugh [1997] 2 FLR 7.

78 [1985] AC 686.

79 (1887) 36 Ch D 145.

80 O'Sullivan, 1998, 50.

81 Bank of Credit and Commerce International SA v Aboody [1990] QB 923, 964, per Slade LJ.

of *Scotland v Bennett*⁸² and Mahoney v Purnell,⁸³ the courts have tended to look closely at the precise structure of the transaction, rather than relying on matters to be obvious from afar.⁸⁴

The new approach – Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No 2)

Lord Nicholls suggested in *Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No 2)*⁸⁵ that the test of manifest disadvantage was no longer required but that the suggestion made in Barclays Bank v O'Brien that there be some notion of fixing mortgagees with notice in circumstances in which a cohabitee stands to suffer some financial disadvantage would remain an important factor. The approach in CIBC v Pitt, long championed in earlier editions of this textbook, was therefore approved. The question remains somewhat at large, however, as to what it is exactly that will put the mortgagee on notice as to the cohabitee's position.⁸⁶ Whereas the House of Lords is concerned to make the test clearer than it was previously,⁸⁷ there is an implicit admission in the speech of Lord Nicholls that it is not possible to define in advance all of the circumstances in which such a right to set aside a contract will arise, particularly when his Lordship suggests in practice that the mortgagee insist that the cohabitee is separately advised 'to be safe'.⁸⁸ What emerges also is that the principal focus of Lord Nicholls' speech is on the position of sureties in particular, and not signatories to mortgages in general.

Lord Hobhouse was generally supportive of the approach taken by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Barclays Bank v O'Brien, but was critical of the use of the constructive notice test on the basis that it would be necessary to apply this test differently in different situations.⁸⁹ For example, a case involving a wife acting as surety would require very little to fix the mortgagee with notice, whereas situations in which there appeared to be nothing out of the ordinary with the transaction would make it much more difficult to fix the mortgagee with notice of the undue influence. Lord Hobhouse does suggest that it might be better to set aside unconscionable bargains in the manner that the Australians do, rather than to fix the mortgagee with notice. The Australian approach would mean that it would be possible for the court simply to identify there being some unconscionability in binding a claimant to a contract to which she had given her consent only under undue influence, and to set that contract aside due to the presence of the unconscionability, without needing to ascertain whether or not the mortgagee could be said to have had notice of that unconscionability.

Lord Scott's approach was somewhat different again. He focuses more clearly on the cohabitee failing to give free consent to a contract if she has acted under undue influence or some misrepresentation. The approach taken here is more akin to a contract lawyer's approach to the possibility of setting aside a contract between two people where one has unduly influenced the other. The injustice of enforcing such a contract between those two people is self-evident. However, the property lawyer faces a more complex job when seeking to set aside a right to repossess the cohabitee's home because of some undue influence exercised over her

82 [1997] 1 FLR 801.

83 [1996] 3 All ER 61.

84 Barclays Bank v Coleman [2000] 1 All ER 385, [2001] 1 QB 20.

85 [2002] AC 773, [2001] 4 All ER 449.

86 Ibid, 466.

87 Ibid, 475.

88 Ibid, 467.

89 Ibid, 484.

by a third party, such that the contract between the mortgagee and the third party should be set aside in toto. The addition of the third person to the matrix complicates the neat contractual theory of free consent. The further question asked by Lord Scott to deal with this question of fixing the mortgagee with responsibility (in the form of losing its proprietary rights to repossession) for a private wrong committed between the mortgagor and his cohabitee is that of asking whether or not the mortgagee had knowledge of that wrong. The test of knowledge requires the mortgagee to have been fixed with direct knowledge itself – although it is not made clear whether or not that includes constructive knowledge, where the bank is taken to have known of any factors which it would have discovered but for wilfully and recklessly failing to make the enquiries which a reasonable bank would have made, or but for wilfully closing its eyes to the obvious – and not simply that it has constructive notice or imputed notice of the undue influence via some agent.⁹⁰ Lord Scott does, however, agree with Lord Nicholls’ core assumption that if there is some special feature in the transaction which ought to bring the risk that there has been some undue influence to the mortgagee’s attention then that will fix the mortgagee bank with knowledge of any undue influence.⁹¹

Briefly put, that three of their Lordships weigh in with lengthy speeches, each of which sets out lengthy summaries of the applicable tests in slightly different terms, does not help to introduce the certainty which they had desired.⁹² In effect, the law stays much the same as it was under the O’Brien principle, except that the requirement of manifest disadvantage has been removed. There is, however, a reinforcement of the principles, considered below, that independent legal advice ought to be addressed to ensuring that the cohabitee understands the agreement before agreeing to become a co-signatory to it, or before agreeing to act as a surety.

29.4.5 The burden of proof

The mortgage cases still require a high level of proof and expertly prepared pleadings to sustain successful claims. Following on from the preceding discussion, there are a number of issues surrounding the question of the burden and standard of proof. This is particularly so in relation to questions of proving manifest disadvantage in relation to presumed undue influence. The onus of proving the undue influence lies with the claimant alleging such behaviour to support setting aside the mortgage.⁹³ This authority appears to contradict dicta of Lord Browne-Wilkinson in CIBC v Pitt, although that case was not strictly concerned with the onus of proof. As Lord Nicholls put the question of proof:⁹⁴

Whether a transaction was brought about by the exercise of undue influence is a question of fact. Here, as elsewhere, the general principle is that he who asserts a wrong has been committed must prove it. The burden of proving an allegation of undue influence rests upon the person who claims to have been wronged. This is the general rule. The evidence required to discharge the burden of proof depends on the nature of the alleged undue influence, the personality of the parties, their relationship, the extent to which the

90 Ibid, 509.

91 Ibid.

92 This case has been followed in all subsequent cases: eg, Sanders v Buckley [2006] All ER (D) 307 (Dec) where the claimant was unable to prove that undue influence had actually been exerted.

93 Barclays Bank v Boulter [1999] 1 WLR 1919, HL. See also Sanders v Buckley [2006] All ER (D) 307 (Dec).

94 Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No 2) [2002] 2 AC 773, 775.

transaction cannot readily be accounted for by the ordinary motives of ordinary persons in that relationship, and all the circumstances of the case.

Whether or not undue influence has been proved by the claimant is therefore a question dependent on the circumstances of the case. While there is a presumption of undue influence in some cases, as considered above, this is a presumption which may be rebutted on the circumstances of any particular case.⁹⁵ So in *Wadlow v Samuel (No 1)*⁹⁶ it was held that the court should first consider whether or not there was a relationship of trust and confidence; secondly, it must be proved that the transaction in question was one that called for an explanation; and then, if the presumption of undue influence arose, whether or not it could be rebutted on the facts of the particular case. Thus, in Wadlow v Samuel, the claimant (a singer) had been persuaded to enter into transactions at the behest of the defendant (his first manager) in circumstances in which the claimant took his advice from the defendant. Even though the defendant had ensured that the claimant took independent advice, nevertheless after that advice had been taken the defendant cajoled the claimant into the transaction by reminding him of all that he owed the defendant for his help and support in the past. This cajoling was held to trump the procuring of independent advice and it was therefore held that the defendant had failed to rebut the presumption of undue influence which was found to have arisen from the outset in this case. These facts in this case are considered again below⁹⁷ where the claimant claimed that this undue influence had also infected a further agreement they entered into five years later: but it was held by the Court of Appeal in that second case that their relationship had changed sufficiently by that time for there to have been no undue influence still in existence between the parties: this was demonstrated by the very fact that the singer had terminated their business relationship and acquired a new manager demonstrating that he was clearly no longer in the thrall of his first manager. Thus the court will need to be convinced on the facts of each case that there has genuinely been undue influence in commercial transactions. So, in Ellse v Hill-Pickford,⁹⁸ for example, the trial judge watched all of the parties in the witness box and expressed himself unconvinced that the claimant was the sort of person who could have been unduly influenced by the defendants in the circumstances.

29.4.6 Mortgagee's means of discharging this duty

As Lord Browne-Wilkinson held in Barclays Bank v O'Brien, the mortgagee can be discharged from constructive notice where the mortgagee had taken 'reasonable steps' and not acquired actual notice of the matters complained of. The most important question on the cases has therefore become that of delineating the circumstances in which the mortgagee is able to restrict its own liability by means of taking 'reasonable steps'. In general terms, this has been approved by the House of Lords in Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No 2).⁹⁹

95 Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No 2) [2002] 2 AC 773, paras [219–221], per Lord Scott. Applied in Wadlow v Samuel [2006] EWHC 1492 (QB).

96 [2006] EWHC 1492 (QB).

97 Wadlow v Samuel (No 2) [2007] EWCA Civ 155, under the sub-heading 'Whether undue influence in relation to one document can be transmitted to another document'.

98 [2006] EWHC 3293 (Ch).

99 [2002] AC 773.

In Massey v Midland Bank,¹⁰⁰ Miss Massey had been persuaded by her partner to charge her property as security for his overdraft with the mortgagee. The bank interviewed them together, but Miss Massey was advised by the mortgagee to seek independent advice. This advice was given to Miss Massey in her partner's presence. The Court of Appeal held that the mortgagee was required only to see that advice was sought by the spouse, not to ensure that the advice was properly given. As Steyn LJ held: 'In these circumstances nothing more was required of the bank than to urge or insist that Miss Massey should take independent advice [emphasis added].'

This is an incredibly significant restriction on the underlying principle set out by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in O'Brien. In that case it was held that there will be presumed undue influence where the transaction is to the manifest disadvantage of the cohabitee, and that the mortgagee will have constructive notice of any misrepresentation or undue influence exercised over that person unless it has advised that person to seek independent advice. In Massey, the Court of Appeal reduces the obligation on the mortgagee markedly. Now the mortgagee is required only to 'urge or insist' that independent advice is taken – the corollary appears to be that there is no comeback for the bank if that advice is not actually taken.

From the judgment of Steyn LJ, the two questions which must be considered are:

- (a) was the mortgagee put on inquiry as to the circumstances in which the cohabitee agreed to provide the security; and
- (b) if so, did the mortgagee take reasonable steps to ensure that the agreement of the cohabitee to the charge was properly obtained?

This test was followed by a differently constituted Court of Appeal in *Banco Exterior Internacional v Mann*¹⁰¹ and was the approach taken in Bank of Boroda v Rayarel.¹⁰²

Providing a certificate that advice has been taken

Banking practice has developed to require the co-signatory, cohabitee, or surety to sign a certificate attesting to the fact that she has taken independent advice. In Banco Exterior Internacional v Mann, the issue arose where the solicitor appeared both for the borrower and for the company for which the loan was sought, and it was unclear whether or not the cohabitee had received separate advice. Morritt LJ held that the position must be considered from the point of view of the mortgagee at the time. On the facts of Mann, the mortgagee had been shown a certificate that the cohabitee had received legal advice, and therefore regarded this to be sufficient demonstration of the cohabitee's agreement to the charge. It was held irrelevant to take into account a relationship between the cohabitee and a person who could not have exercised undue influence over her: or, in other words, the only relationships which ought to be taken into account are those in which undue influence would be possible.

Therefore, the cohabitee need not have actually received any such advice. Rather, it is enough for the mortgagee to demonstrate that the cohabitee has attested that such advice has been taken. It is suggested that this rule must be subject to the principle that the mortgagee has no actual notice of the cohabitee not having received such advice, nor notice via an agent that the cohabitee has been influenced into signing the certificate itself. Indeed, the rule in Mann, if followed to its logical conclusion, would seem to circumvent the initial thrust of O'Brien that the mortgagee is required to look into certain matters where there is presumed undue influence.

100 [1995] 1 All ER 929.

101 [1995] 1 All ER 936.

102 [1995] 2 FLR 376.

Lord Scott agreed in his summary of the law in this area in *Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No 2)*¹⁰³ that a solicitor should give advice to the cohabitee together with written confirmation that such advice has been given to enable the mortgagee to form a reasonable belief that the signatory or surety understands the effect of the transaction. Lord Hobhouse similarly placed much reliance on there being ‘true independent advice’ given by a solicitor which would lead to ‘real consent’ to the contract.¹⁰⁴ Lord Nicholls suggested that the bank should obtain in every case a written confirmation from the solicitor that the solicitor had explained the transaction to the cohabitee armed with the ‘necessary financial information’ supplied to it by the mortgagee.¹⁰⁵

Cases involving vulnerable people

In cases of undue influence it is clearly the case that the more vulnerable the mortgagor happens to be, the easier it will be for someone to exert undue influence over them. Therefore, the courts have developed a line of cases in which the mortgagor’s vulnerability has been a factor in suggesting that the mortgagee should have realised that there was some remarkable feature of this transaction which ought to have put them on notice as to the possibility of undue influence. The vulnerability in these cases has frequently revolved around the mortgagor being unable to understand English, and so being unable to appreciate the effect of the transaction; or the vulnerability has occasionally revolved around some frailty of the mortgagor, such as extreme old age or serious illness. So, in National Westminster Bank v Amin,¹⁰⁶ the House of Lords created an exception to the Mann principle in relation to a couple who spoke no English and who were given advice by a solicitor who was also advising the mortgagee. The court remitted the matter for trial to ascertain more clearly than had been done whether or not the nature of the transaction had been explained sufficiently to the wife who was seeking to have the mortgage set aside. The court would not accept that just because a certificate had been signed, the mortgagee should be entitled to automatic protection against having the transaction set aside. On these facts, the court was particularly concerned that the bank knew the couple spoke no English and were therefore especially vulnerable to exploitation. This case could possibly be confined to its facts but it does also appear to correlate with Lord Nicholls’ requirement in Etridge that the claimant has been properly advised by the solicitor. A similar approach was taken by the Court of Appeal in *Abbey National v Stringer*¹⁰⁷ where a widowed mother in her mid-fifties took out a mortgage over her own home to secure business loans in favour of her son’s new business venture. The mother spoke very little English and so did not understand the effect of the transaction – having been born in Italy and despite having lived in England for some time – and therefore, relying on Etridge,¹⁰⁸ it was 103 Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No 2) [2001] 4 All ER 449, 509 et seq.

104 Ibid, 489.

105 Ibid, 473.

106 [2002] 1 FLR 735.

107 [2006] EWCA Civ 338.

108 Oddly, Amin was not referred to by the court.

held that the woman was in a vulnerable position and that the mortgagee should have been put on notice that there was something different about this transaction because the mortgage was being used as collateral for loans to a business in which the mortgagor had no personal interest. Consequently the mortgage was set aside on grounds of undue influence.

Where a person is physically vulnerable in some way, this may make it more likely that there will be a finding of undue influence. So, in *Goodchild (by his litigation friend) v Bradbury*¹⁰⁹ an elderly man was reliant on his great-nephew with whom he lived on a farm. The old man wanted to grant a piece of land of one acre to his great-nephew as a wedding present, with permission to build six dwelling houses on it. A solicitor attended the house to organise the transaction and the solicitor took the old man into a room on his own to explain the transaction to him. The solicitor gave evidence that he had had to compete with the noise of the television for the old man's attention but that nevertheless the solicitor was reassured that the old man knew what he was doing. Latterly, the old man had a stroke before the completion of the transfer. By the time of trial the old man was too ill to attend court and had had to move out of his house. The old man's 'litigation friend' interceded on behalf of the old man to complain that the transfer had been procured by means of undue influence. It was held by the Court of Appeal that in these circumstances there was a relationship of dependence in which undue influence was a possibility and that the transfer of the property was not of the sort that would be expected between a great-uncle and great-nephew: therefore the transaction was set aside. This decision does strike one as being a little unfortunate. The old man had agreed to the transaction and had received a separate interview with a solicitor, even though the judge at first instance had held that the old man had not received 'independent advice': therefore it could be said that the old man had formed informed consent before the transaction was commenced. While this transaction was not ordinary for a great-uncle and great-nephew, it was nevertheless not entirely unexceptional for people who live together as a family.¹¹⁰ Consequently, it could have been said that the old man had formed his intention with some legal advice before his incapacity.

The most celebrated case on undue influence involving an elderly man was a decision of Lord Denning in *Lloyds Bank v Bundy*¹¹¹ in which Mr Bundy had been induced by employees of the bank to invest his life savings in a transaction suggested to him by the bank. It was held that the bank had therefore unduly influenced this elderly man into a transaction which stood to lose him everything and therefore that the transaction would be set aside. The undue influence here appeared to be more direct. Significantly, also, in relation to the principles of banking law, it was the officers of the bank themselves who were responsible for the unjust enrichment, as opposed to being fixed with notice of some undue influence exerted by some third party.

Whether undue influence in relation to one document can be transmitted to another document

It is possible that undue influence exerted over a person in relation to one document can be transmitted to the execution of another document if the court is convinced that the execution of that second document was predicated on a continuance of the undue influence. So, if Agnes agrees to sign a second document because she is still in fear of Arthur after the threats

109 [2006] All ER (D) 247.

110 See, for example, Gillett v Holt [2001] Ch 210.

111 [1975] QB 326.

which Arthur made to her before forcing her to sign the first document, then Agnes may still rely on that undue influence in relation to that second document. So in *Yorkshire Bank v Tinsley*¹¹² it was held that a wife was still entitled to rely on the undue influence exerted over her by her former husband when the bank required her to sign a second mortgage agreement over a new home after her separation from her husband. Sir Peter Gibson expressed the view that the ‘conscience of the bank’ had been effected in a manner which infected the discharge of the first mortgage and the creation of this second mortgage. It was held by Longmore LJ in that case that:

A substitute contract will often come into existence in a different factual context from an earlier contract, and that factual context may show that the second contract is not a true substitute for the first. But if the factual situations are materially similar, and if it is a condition of the rescission or release of the original void or voidable bargain that the parties enter into a new bargain, that new bargain must be as open to attack as the old one.

So, in *Wadlow v Samuel (No 2)*¹¹³ a singer entered into a management agreement with his first manager, which it was accepted had been created under undue influence. A later settlement agreement was effected between those same parties when the singer sought to end his relationship with the first manager and to enter into an agreement with a new manager. The question was whether or not these two agreements, which were entered into about five years apart, were infected by the same undue influence which had affected the first agreement. It was held that on these facts the first undue influence had not effected the second (settlement) agreement, even though the settlement agreement had imported language from the management agreement. On these facts it was held that a sufficient amount of time had passed for the relationship between the parties to have altered such that the claimant had been exercising his own free will in entering into the settlement agreement. The fact that the parties’ relationship was terminated by the settlement agreement was an indication of this fact. Indeed, the settlement agreement had greatly reduced the defendant’s entitlement to payments from the singer’s albums.

29.4.7 The liability of the solicitor

Shifting liability from the home towards the solicitor

All that is required for the mortgagee to do in the wake of Massey is to ‘urge’ the proposed surety to seek independent advice. What is not clear is the role of the mortgagee if that advice is not taken as urged. Where advice is taken, the mortgagee is not responsible for the advice that is given. That ‘is a matter for the solicitor’s professional judgment and a matter between him and his client’. As was said in Midland Bank v Serter, any deficiencies in this advice are the responsibility of the solicitor on general tortious principles. The effect of the decision of the House of Lords in *Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No 2)*¹¹⁴ is that their Lordships have thrown their weight behind a procedure whereby it is the responsibility of a solicitor to give independent advice to the cohabitee. The ramification of this drift in the law, 112 [2004] EWCA Civ 816, [2004] 1 WLR 2380.

113 [2007] EWCA Civ 155, [2007] All ER (D) 370 (Feb).

114 [2002] AC 773.

as considered below, is that the cohabitee's principal claim in the event of any undue influence or misrepresentation will be to sue the solicitor for failing to give proper advice, rather than to resist any claim to repossession brought by the mortgagee by means of setting aside the mortgage contract: the effect of that change is that the cohabitee's rights are predicated in the tort of negligence and not in the law of property.

The solicitor's role – advising more than one party

In Midland Bank v Serter,¹¹⁵ the Court of Appeal held that where the solicitor had represented the mortgagee, mortgagor and the cohabitee, the mortgagee was not bound by constructive notice of any undue influence where the cohabitee had signed a certificate acknowledging receipt of legal advice. Even in circumstances in which it is the mortgagee which directs the solicitor to advise the cohabitee, the solicitor acts as solicitor to the cohabitee, owing that person all of the duties of a solicitor.¹¹⁶

The bank is then entitled to rely on the advice which the solicitor gives to the cohabitee, even if the solicitor in fact breaches the obligation to the cohabitee and favours the mortgagee or the mortgagor instead by not passing information as to the nature of the transaction to the cohabitee.¹¹⁷ Where the solicitor undertakes the task of advising the cohabitee, the solicitor is deemed to be independent and the mortgagee is entitled to rely on the appropriate advice having been given by the solicitor.¹¹⁸ In fact, what has happened is that the obligation on the mortgagee to ensure that there is no constructive notice of any misrepresentation or undue influence has transferred to a liability in negligence on the solicitor in providing advice to the cohabitee, as considered below.

In the Court of Appeal decision in Barclays Bank v Thomson,¹¹⁹ the bank obtained a mortgage over T's family home, lending the money to T's husband. The bank instructed a solicitor to act on its behalf in the mortgage transaction, including giving advice to T. The solicitors had explained to T the effect of the mortgage on the family home in the husband's absence. It was held that the bank was entitled to rely upon the solicitor's assurance that T had been properly advised. As a result, the bank was not to be imputed with any notice of any undue influence or misrepresentation which was active on T. Therefore, it was found that the bank was able to remove constructive notice by receiving a representation that T had received legal advice. The onus has therefore shifted from the mortgagee making enquiries as to whether or not there are rights in some cohabitee, to ensuring that a cohabitee certifies that some independent legal advice has been given.¹²⁰

It is only Hobhouse LJ, in Banco Exterior v Mann,¹²¹ who, in delivering a dissenting judgment, pointed out that a solicitor can only be truly independent if, in a case of undue influence or misrepresentation, that solicitor straightforwardly advises the cohabitee not to co-sign the mortgage agreement if that agreement would be potentially disadvantageous. In reality, it is said that a solicitor will not act with such impunity in a situation in which

115 [1995] 1 FLR 367.

116 Ibid; Banco Exterior v Mann [1995] 1 All ER 936.

117 Halifax Mortgage Services Ltd v Stepsky [1996] 2 All ER 277.

118 Banco Exterior v Mann [1995] 1 All ER 936.

119 [1997] 4 All ER 816.

120 Cf Halifax Mortgage Services Ltd v Stepsky [1996] 2 All ER 277.

121 [1995] 1 All ER 936.

she is acting as solicitor for the mortgagee and the mortgagor simultaneously. And yet the court in *Halifax BS v Stepsky*¹²² was prepared to absolve the mortgagee from any responsibility to procure truly independent advice in such circumstances. This tortious remedy of suing the solicitor in negligence for damages will only generate a right to cash from the solicitor (assuming the solicitor is solvent or suitably insured); it will not protect the claimant's right to remain in occupation of the home which was put up as security for the mortgage loan.

Clearly, though, where the solicitor is obviously involved in a conflict of interest in acting for the bank, for the mortgagor and for the cohabitee, then the solicitor will not be able to give independent advice on which the mortgagee can rely to discharge its liability.¹²³ Therefore, where the solicitor is advising the bank as to a complex financial transaction and is found to have placed improper pressure on the mortgagor to agree to that transaction, it was held that that cannot be suitable to discharge the bank's obligation to take reasonable steps.¹²⁴

What this development in the law has done is to shift responsibility from the bank to make inquiries onto the solicitor giving advice. As such the claimant acquires rights to sue the solicitor in the event that advice is negligently given under the tort of negligence. From the perspective of the cohabitee that will be an inferior form of remedy compared to the possibility of a quasi-proprietary remedy¹²⁵ which sets aside the entirety of the mortgage.¹²⁶ The claim in negligence is a purely personal claim to receive common law damages which will not in itself protect the claimant's rights in her home.

29.4.8 Setting aside in part or in whole

Understanding the problem

One important issue which remains outstanding is whether or not a mortgage obtained by means of some undue influence (for which the lending institution is found to be liable in part) should be set aside in toto, or whether that mortgage should be partially enforced.

Suppose the following set of facts:

A cohabitee consents to a mortgage up to a value of £15,000, and the mortgagor secures the family home in return for loan moneys of £30,000. Should the cohabitee's interests be subject to the mortgage to the extent of £15,000, or is the cohabitee to elude liability altogether by having the mortgage set aside in toto?

The position under the case law

In TSB v Camfield,¹²⁷ a husband and his business partner requested a £30,000 overdraft from the plaintiff bank. The overdraft was agreed to, provided that the plaintiff bank was

122 [1996] 2 All ER 277.

123 National Westminster Bank plc v Breeds [2001] All ER (D) 5.

124 Ibid.

125 The nature of which is considered immediately below.

126 See para 29.4.8 below.

127 [1995] 1 WLR 430.

able to take a charge over each of their houses. The bank manager responsible stipulated that the mortgagors' wives should receive independent, separate legal advice. Contrary to the assurance given by the solicitors involved, neither wife was advised separately from her husband. It was found that, owing to the husband's innocent misrepresentation, the wife was induced to stand as surety for double the amount that she believed she was securing. She had consented to an obligation of £15,000, whereas the charge was secured as to £30,000.

The dispute concerned the extent of the wife's remedy. At first instance it was held that the mortgage should be set aside only to the extent that the cohabitee had not consented to it. Therefore, the charge would be enforceable as to £15,000. However, Nourse LJ in the Court of Appeal followed Ferris J in *Allied Irish Bank v Byrne*¹²⁸ and set the mortgage aside in toto. He concurred with the dicta of Ferris J that 'to set aside a transaction is an all or nothing process'.

Eight days later, Robert Walker QC in *Bank Melli Iran v Samadi-rad*¹²⁹ decided on similar facts without the benefit of Ferris J's judgment in Byrne. Again that case dealt with the question of total or partial enforcement of a charge which had been obtained as a result of some undue influence. The mortgage was partially enforced on the basis that the cohabitee had been induced to enter into a transaction to the extent of £60,000. Robert Walker QC held that equity could force her, as a condition of relief, to recognise the security as good for that limited sum to which she had consented.

While acknowledging the force of Robert Walker QC's argument, Nourse LJ followed Byrne. Nourse LJ held:

If this claim is upheld, the court seeks to put that party into the position in which he would have been if the representation had not been made. This involves ascertaining what the position would have been if the transaction had not taken place. *It does not involve reforming the transaction to accord with the representation.*¹³⁰

Accordingly the mortgage was set aside in toto. As his Lordship continued: 'The wife's right to have the transaction set aside in toto as against the husband is no less enforceable against the mortgagee.' Therefore, a mortgagee in this type of case cannot be in a better position than any other third party who has notice of the cohabitee's equitable rights.

The TSB v Camfield approach has been followed in *Castle Phillips Finance v Piddington*¹³¹ in the Court of Appeal. In that case a husband used money lent on security against the matrimonial home to secure an overdraft. The cohabitee had been informed that the money was being used for roof repairs. It was found that there had been undue influence exerted over the cohabitee to consent to the charge. Further, it was found that the mortgagee had not established whether or not the cohabitee had taken independent legal advice. The judge at first instance set aside the mortgagee's charge in part only. Peter Gibson LJ, giving the leading judgment in the Court of Appeal, held that the mortgage must be set aside in toto.

128 [1995] 1 FCR 430.

129 [1993] 2 FLR 367.

130 Emphasis added. See also Redgrave v Hurd (1881) 20 Ch D 1.

131 (1995) 70 P & CR 592. See also Goode Durrant v Biddulph (1994) 26 HLR 625; Bank of Cyprus v Markou [1999] 2 All ER 707.

Other approaches

There have been cases in which the court has refused to set aside the transaction where that would have been inequitable to the mortgagee. Thus, in Midland Bank v Greene,¹³² loan moneys had been extended in the context of undue influence exercised by a husband on his wife, but the wife had subsequently benefited from improvements to the property and the enlargement of her equitable interests from rights in a lease to rights in the freehold. The court ordered that accounts be taken of the comparative value of the interests of the parties, such that the mortgagor and plaintiff wife be required to account to the mortgagee for the benefits received by use of the loan moneys. The court explained that it was giving equitable relief on terms rather than setting aside the transaction or rewriting the agreement between the parties. In Dunbar Bank v Nadeem,¹³³ it was held that a wife's rights to rescission of the mortgage agreement under the O'Brien principle were contingent on the wife accounting to the bank for the amount of money lent by the mortgagee and used to acquire her half share in the leasehold interest in property. The creditor may acquire a charge against the husband's interest in any event, and thus seek a sale of the property, as considered in section 16.2.¹³⁴

Some problems with the Camfield approach

The approach of the Court of Appeal in TSB v Camfield and of the High Court in Castle Phillips Finance v Piddington is in marked contrast to that of the Court of Appeal in Equity Home Loans v Prestidge.¹³⁵ In the former cases, the cohabitee's equitable rights in the property are enforced against the mortgagee such that the mortgage is discharged completely. In Prestidge, the mortgagor gained the agreement of the cohabitee to the original mortgage for the purchase of property. The mortgagor then sought a remortgage on more onerous terms. This remortgage was completed without the consent of the cohabitee. The issue arose whether the remortgage was binding against the cohabitee.

It was held by the Court of Appeal that the remortgage was made against the background of the cohabitee's consent to the original mortgage for the purchase of the house. She had consented to the original mortgage and therefore she was taken to have given imputed consent to the remortgage being replaced only on the terms of the original mortgage. The Court of Appeal held that her imputed consent to the remortgage applied whether or not she knew of the creation of the remortgage, provided it did not prejudice her equitable interest further than she had already agreed. To do justice to the mortgagee and the cohabitee, it was held that the substitute mortgage ranked ahead of the cohabitee's beneficial interest to the extent of (but no further than) the consent which was to be imputed to her.

In TSB v Camfield, the cohabitee had knowledge of the further mortgage. Therefore, she had an opportunity to seek advice on the full extent of her obligations which had not been available in Prestidge. Similarly, in TSB v Camfield, the cohabitee had an opportunity to take legal advice on the effect of the charge. The Court of Appeal held that the cohabitee was not bound by the mortgage at all – as a result of the undue influence – even to the extent to which she had agreed to the borrowing. However, in Prestidge, the cohabitee had no knowledge of 133 [1997] 2 All ER 253, [1998] 3 All ER 876, CA.

132 [1994] 2 FLR 827.

134 Zandfavid v BCCI [1996] 1 WLR 1420; Alliance & Leicester plc v Slayford (2000) The Times, 19 December.

135 [1992] 1 All ER 909.

the remortgage but was, nevertheless, held to have agreed to it to the extent of her consent to the original mortgage.

The conceptual difference between these two cases appears to be that there was undue influence in the former but not in the latter. However, the practical difference between the two is more difficult to fathom. In both instances, the cohabitee has been the victim of some wrong on the part of the mortgagor seeking to raise unauthorised capital on the matrimonial home. It is contended, therefore, that the Prestidge decision cannot be supported in the light of the cases following O'Brien.

Miscellaneous equitable remedies

30.1	INTRODUCTION	1275
30.2	ACCOUNT	1276
30.2.1	The various senses of account	1276
30.2.2	The categories of equitable liability to account	1277
30.3	SPECIFIC RESTITUTION	1278
30.4	EQUITABLE COMPENSATION	1279
30.5	EQUITABLE DAMAGES	1279
30.5.1	The inherent jurisdiction to award equitable damages after the Judicature Act 1873	1279
30.5.2	Equitable damages under statute	1280
30.6	COMPOUND INTEREST	1280
30.7	SUBROGATION	1281
30.7.1	The nature of subrogation	1281
30.7.2	Forms of subrogation	1283
30.7.3	Subrogation and tracing	1284
30.8	RECEIVERS	1285
30.9	DELIVERY AND CANCELLATION OF DOCUMENTS	1286
30.10	EQUITABLE DOCTRINES MODIFYING EXISTING RIGHTS	1286
30.10.1	Conversion	1286
30.10.2	Election	1286
30.10.3	Performance	1287
30.10.4	Satisfaction	1287
30.11	MERE EQUITIES	1287
30.12	MUTUAL BENEFIT AND BURDEN	1288

30.1 INTRODUCTION

The equitable jurisdiction has been considered in this book, thus far, as being concerned with a philosophical notion of achieving fair results in the circumstances of individual cases, with substantive principles (such as the trust), and now with procedural principles.¹ Equity has developed, significantly, ever since the medieval period by means of a series of different forms of writ developed by the Lords Chancellor. We have already considered injunctions, specific performance, rescission and rectification as examples of equitable remedy. In this chapter, we shall consider a collection of lesser equitable remedies, some of which have already been considered in earlier chapters (such as account and subrogation). This chapter is not an exhaustive list of all of the available remedies to which equity will give effect, but rather it is a compilation of the most common general remedies.

30.2 ACCOUNT

30.2.1 The various senses of account

The principal remedy available to beneficiaries against trustees is the right to demand an account from those trustees.² It is in that context that we have considered ‘account’ thus far. ‘Account’ has two senses which are of importance here. The first sense of ‘account’ is that the fiduciary is obliged to provide accounts to the beneficiary as to the value and condition of property held on trust. Where the documentary accounts are inadequate or incorrect in some way, the beneficiaries are entitled to ‘falsify’ those accounts and demand a proper reckoning from the fiduciary. By contrast, the second sense of ‘account’ is an obligation to make good any losses disclosed by those accounts. This is more akin to one of the alternative, vernacular meanings of the verb ‘account’, meaning to explain or justify oneself.

In essence, the equitable remedy of account is then a factual matter of identifying a loss caused by a breach of duty and requiring the fiduciary to make good that loss.³ In truth, however, ‘account’ does not tell us the nature of the remedy which will be imposed on the defendant. So, in relation to breach of trust by a trustee (considered in Chapter 18 in detail), the trustee may be liable to make specific restitution of the original trust property where that is appropriate, or else to compensate the beneficiaries in financial terms if that property cannot be recovered. The making of awards by way of monetary compensation is referred to as ‘equitable compensation’.

However, we encountered the notion of ‘account’ in other contexts in this book. For example, when a fiduciary (whether a trustee or not) earns an unauthorised profit from her fiduciary office, she will be liable to account to beneficiaries for those profits by way of a constructive trust being imposed over the profits⁴ or their traceable proceeds.⁵ By contrast, a person who dishonestly assists in a breach of trust or who receives property with knowledge that that property has been sourced from a breach of trust will be liable to account to the beneficiaries for any loss caused by the breach of trust.⁶ The liability as a dishonest assistant⁷ or as a knowing recipient⁸ is a personal liability to account, as opposed to the proprietary constructive

1 As ‘equity’ was defined in section 1.1 of this book.

2 Millett, 1998.

3 Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421.

4 Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 4.

5 Attorney-General for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324.

6 See Chapter 20 for a full discussion of these claims.

7 Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378.

8 Re Montagu [1987] Ch 264

trust awarded in relation to fiduciaries earning unauthorised profits;⁹ hence the suggestion that ‘account’ covers both giving an explanation (requiring a proprietary remedy in some contexts) and making good any loss (generally by monetary compensation in the alternative).

30.2.2 The categories of equitable liability to account

Few of the books on equity have a consideration of ‘account’ as a separate topic for two reasons: first, it has become subsumed into other doctrines so that it is difficult to identify distinct principles underpinning this area as a field in its own right and, secondly, it is a practical matter on a case-by-case basis to identify what has been lost and therefore equity has not developed detailed principles to cover ‘account’ as a distinct field. Only Meagher, Gummow and Lehane’s Equity: Doctrines and Remedies give this topic a separate discussion.¹⁰ The authors of the current edition of that book explain how the equitable doctrine of account was more straightforward than that at common law and that it had consequently assumed primacy by 1760.¹¹ The equitable doctrine of account is described there as arising in eight contexts, and that division of the material is adopted here together with two additional categories considered in this book already.

The eight circumstances are as follows. First, where the parties have mutual, agreed accounts such that the court is really concerned only to effect an equitable set-off between the parties of the amounts owed between them.¹² Secondly, where the parties are in a fiduciary relationship with one another – such as where one is trustee for the other.¹³ Thirdly, on dissolution of a partnership (in which context the partners will stand in a fiduciary relationship to one another) such that joint debts of the partnership will be paid out of jointly held accounts in accordance with the partnership agreement;¹⁴ by contrast, separate creditors of separate partners will not be entitled to an account from all of the partners, particularly if they are insolvency creditors of a bankrupt partner with no claim against the partnership.¹⁵ Fourthly, in circumstances in which common law accounting could not provide an account, to identify the obligation to account in entangled accounts.¹⁶ In this way, equity had greater flexibility to allocate claims between the partner’s severally in their personal contexts and jointly in their partnership contexts.¹⁷ Fifthly, to prevent waste, a claimant can seek an account in equity together with an injunction to prevent the waste taking effect.¹⁸ Sixthly, in passing off and patent infringement cases.¹⁹ Seventhly, accounts ordered to ensure that the claimant received payment of amounts which the defendant had prevented accruing to the claimant.²⁰ Eighthly, as considered above, to prevent the earning of unauthorised profits in a 9 Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 4; see para 12.5.2 above.

10 Meagher, Heydon and Leeming, 2002, 869 et seq. See also Pettit, 2001, 669.

11 Ibid, 869; Ex p Bax (1751) 2 Ves Sen 388.

12 Phillips v Phillips (1852) 9 Hare 471, 68 ER 596; Anglo-American Asphalt Co v Crowley Russell & Co [1945] 2 All ER 324, 331, per Romer J.

13 Eg, Target Holdings v Redfern [1996] 1 AC 421; Warman International Ltd v Dwyer (1995) 182 CLR 544.

14 Re Budgett [1894] 2 Ch 557.

15 See Lacey v Hill (1872) LR 8 Ch App 441, 444, per James LJ.

16 Eg, O’Connor v Spaight (1804) 1 Sch & Lef 305.

17 Ibid, 309, per Lord Redesdale.

18 Duke of Leeds v Lord Amherst (1843) 12 Sim 459, 60 ER 178.

19 See Colbeam Palmer v Stock Affiliates Pty Ltd (1968) 122 CLR 25.

20 McIntosh v Great Western Railway Co (1850) 2 Mac & G 74, 42 ER 29.

fiduciary capacity.²¹ Where those profits were not earned in a fiduciary capacity, then a full account of profits will not be ordered.²² Equitable accounting will also be available to compensate a fiduciary for the effort or cost involved in earning unauthorised profits (provided that there has been no breach of any other equitable obligation).²³ To this eighth category should be added a ninth, referred to above, relating to personal liability to account for dishonest assistance in a breach of trust or knowing receipt of property derived from a breach of trust. And to this list should be added a tenth category relating to the obligation of express trustees to account to their beneficiaries, which was considered in detail in section 8.4 above.²⁴ These liabilities of trustees are considered, inter alia, in the next two sections in the context of general equitable remedies.

30.3 SPECIFIC RESTITUTION

The remedy of specific restitution,²⁵ as we have considered it thus far in this book, relates to the obligation of an express trustee who commits a breach of trust involving the transfer of trust property out of the trust fund. It is a proprietary remedy. That trustee is obliged to restore the original trust property to the trust fund.²⁶ Where that property has been sold to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the beneficiaries' rights, the trustee will generally not be able to recover that property,²⁷ nor will it be possible to recover that property from a recipient who has changed her position substantively in reliance on the receipt of the property.²⁸ It is suggested that this remedy is based on the same principles as following or common law tracing²⁹ whereby a person recovers property in which the recipient has no better proprietary right.³⁰ In the event that specific restitution is not possible – for example, because the original property has been inextricably mixed with other property or has been passed to a person who has a good defence to the restitution claim – then the beneficiaries would have either to seek a personal claim against the trustee or some third party culpable in that breach of trust³¹ or an equitable tracing claim into the mixture.³²

Specific restitution is also available to restore property which belongs in equity to a person to that person.³³ So, where a valuable heirloom held on the terms of a strict settlement was 21 Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46 (trustee de son tort earning unauthorised personal profit in conflict of interest); Attorney-General v Blake [2001] AC 268 (in relation to treasonable profits from an office in the secret service).

22 Experience Hendrix LLC v PPX Enterprises Inc [2003] EWCA Civ 323, [2003] 1 All ER (Comm) 830, [2003] EMLR 515, where royalties had not been paid to a musician further to a contract, but in circumstances in which the defendant was not in a fiduciary relationship to the claimant, there was a right to contractual recovery of money but no equitable accounting.

23 Boardman v Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46.

24 See section 8.4 above, where this head of liability to account is considered in detail.

25 A term used in Swindle v Harrison [1997] 4 All ER 705.

26 Target Holdings v Redfern [1996] 1 AC 421; see section 18.3 above.

27 Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

28 Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale [1991] 2 AC 548; see para 19.6.1 above.

29 Considered in section 19.1 above.

30 See Foskett v McKeown [2000] 3 All ER 97.

31 In the form of dishonest assistance or knowing receipt considered in Chapter 20.

32 Section 19.4 of this book.

33 See generally Meagher, Gummow and Lehane, 2002, 823 et seq.

taken from the fund, the court may order the restoration of that property.³⁴ This power relates to property which has intrinsic (rather than resale) value to the claimant. As before, defences of change of position and of bona fide purchase for value would be available to the defendant. Specific delivery of chattels is also available in equity further to an award of specific performance whereby a court which has ordered specific performance of a contract for the transfer of property will order that that property be transferred as required by the contract.³⁵

30.4 EQUITABLE COMPENSATION

This book gives over this short section to a consideration of equitable compensation as a distinct remedy in the light of its growing importance in the equitable canon after Target Holdings v Redferns.³⁶ Equitable compensation, as it relates to breach of trust, was considered in detail at para 18.3.4 above. The aim of this section is to explore the underpinnings of compensation as a general equitable remedy in line with other remedies such as subrogation, specific performance, rescission, rectification and injunction. More controversially, it should also be ranged among equitable institutions such as proprietary estoppel, constructive trust and resulting trust as a means of preventing detriment being suffered by the claimant.³⁷

The central importance of equitable compensation is that it stands as a parallel to the common law remedy of damages. Equitable compensation is not dependent, however, upon common law standards of causation nor of foreseeability,³⁸ particularly in relation to breach of fiduciary duty.

30.5 EQUITABLE DAMAGES

30.5.1 The inherent jurisdiction to award equitable damages after the Judicature Act 1873

The principal monetary award which is made by equity is in the form of equitable compensation, as considered in the previous section.³⁹ However, ever since the Judicature Act 1873, the courts of equity have also had the power to make awards of damages,⁴⁰ although this power is rarely used.⁴¹ It is usual, of course, to consider the common law as awarding damages and therefore to consider that equity makes an award of compensation or some other form of monetary award. Indeed, the current edition of *Snell's Equity*⁴² subsumes much of this material within a discussion of 'personal monetary claims', whereas Spry's *Equitable Remedies*⁴³ uses the expression 'equitable damages' throughout: the latter is used here, to 34 Duke of Somerset v Cookson (1735) 3 P Wms 390, 24 ER 1114. Cf Pusey v Pusey (1684) 1 Vern 273, 23 ER 465.

35 Neville v Wilson [1997] Ch 144: see section 12.6 above.

36 [1996] 1 AC 421, [1995] 3 WLR 352, [1995] 3 All ER 785.

37 See, eg, Baker v Baker (1993) 25 HLR 408.

38 Target Holdings v Redferns [1996] 1 AC 421, considered at para 18.3.4 above. See suggestions to the contrary in McGhee, 2005, para 18–14.

39 This general sense of the doctrine is not considered by McGhee, 2005.

40 See Spry, 2001, Chapter 7.

41 Sefton v Tophams Ltd [1965] Ch 1140, 1169, which suggests that this jurisdiction should only be exercised in a 'special case'.

42 McGhee, 2005, Chapter 18.

43 Spry, 2001, Chapter 7.

distinguish this remedy from the other forms of personal monetary claim already considered in this chapter, such as equitable compensation, personal liability to account as a dishonest assistant or as a knowing recipient of property in a breach of trust, and so forth.

On the decided cases, equity has the power to make an award of damages in circumstances in which the common law would not do so (for example, due to a deficiency in the pleadings),⁴⁴ or in which it is more convenient to seek damages from a court of equity in which the same proceedings have already been commenced (for example, where the damage suffered will result from an equitable concept such as breach of trust or in connection with specific performance)⁴⁵ rather than sending the claimant to seek her damages in fresh proceedings at common law before a common law court.⁴⁶ So, where a claimant sued in equity for specific performance of a contract, the claimant would be required to pursue her claim for damages in the equitable court where the claim for damages was linked to the claim for specific performance.⁴⁷ If the harm or loss suffered is small, if it can be valued in monetary terms, and if any other equitable remedy would be oppressive of the defendant, then an award of equitable damages can be made.⁴⁸ Alternatively, there is an equitable discretion to award equitable damages as opposed to specific equitable relief, if awarding other equitable relief would be unreasonable in the circumstances.⁴⁹

30.5.2 Equitable damages under statute

Damages may be awarded under s 50 of the Supreme Court Act 1981, as considered already in this book in relation to injunctions⁵⁰ and to specific performance,⁵¹ in ‘addition to or in substitution for such injunction or specific performance’.⁵² This jurisdiction to award damages was originally contained in s 2 of the Chancery Amendment Act 1858 (commonly referred to as ‘Lord Cairns’s Act’). Thus, in any case in which there is a power to award an injunction or to award specific performance, the court may order damages instead, as considered in the preceding section in relation to the court’s inherent jurisdiction, provided that specific performance would otherwise have been available (and not precluded by any of the matters considered in Chapter 27).⁵³ Similarly, under s 2 of the Misrepresentation Act 1967, the court may displace its power to award rescission with an award of damages.

30.6 COMPOUND INTEREST

The issue considered in this section is whether or not courts of equity have an inherent power to award compound interest on awards of damages at common law.⁵⁴ Compound interest

44 Phelps v Prothero (1855) 7 De GM & G 722; 44 ER 280; Eastwood v Lever (1863) 4 De GJ & S 114, 128, per Turner LJ.

45 See the explanation in Spry, 2001, 623.

46 Ferguson v Wilson (1866) LR 2 Ch App 77, at 88, per Turner LJ.

47 Phelps v Prothero (1855) 7 De GM & G 722, at 734, 44 ER 280, at 285, per Turner LJ.

48 Shelfer v City of London Electric Lighting Co [1895] 1 Ch 287, 322, per Smith LJ.

49 Wedgwood v Adams (1843) 6 Beav 600, at 605, per Lord Langdale. Also Keenaway v Thompson [1981] QB 88.

50 See Chapter 27 above.

51 See para 26.4.7 above.

52 Supreme Court Act 1981, s 50. See Jaggard v Sawyer [1995] 1 WLR 269.

53 Lavery v Pursell (1888) 39 Ch D 508, 519, per Chitty J.

54 Compound interest is interest calculated on awards of interest as well as on capital.

will be awarded in one of four situations.⁵⁵ First, where a contract or common commercial practice provides for compound interest. Secondly, where the claimant has a proprietary right under trust in the property which is the subject matter of the claim for loss. Thirdly, by way of special damages relating to compound interest as a result of a defendant's wrongful act or omission. Fourthly, in arbitration cases. Only the second and third categories are of significance here. In general terms, it has been accepted that courts of equity have the power to make awards of simple interest as ancillary relief in relation to equitable remedies.⁵⁶

There is an issue as to whether compound interest will only be awarded when there are fiduciary duties owed such that the fiduciary owes obligations to account,⁵⁷ or whether compound interest can only be awarded (other than in relation to an express contractual provision) in cases where there has been fraud.⁵⁸ The basis of this jurisdiction to award compound interest is to prevent a fiduciary from taking any profit from any breach of fiduciary duty.⁵⁹ In Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC,⁶⁰ it was held by the majority of the House of Lords that compound interest would not be available where a bank acquired damages at common law further to a claim for money had and received because the bank had no proprietary rights under a trust in the property which formed the source of the common law claim. Compound interest would have been available had the bank had a proprietary interest under trust in the property. This position was changed by the House of Lords in *Sempre Metals v IRC*⁶¹ to the effect that compound interest could be awarded whenever the court thinks it appropriate in cases of money had and received at common law, whether the claimant has a proprietary interest or not.

It had been thought that equity had a power to award compound interest on damages awarded at common law where those damages are awarded for fraud.⁶² However, a closer examination of the authorities has led courts more recently to suggest that there was no such general jurisdiction expressly accepted on the older authorities.⁶³

30.7 SUBROGATION

30.7.1 The nature of subrogation

Subrogation is an equitable remedy which arises when a defendant has received a benefit at the claimant's expense and which also enables one claimant to be replaced with another so as to prevent one person taking a benefit at the expense of another person.⁶⁴ The claimant

55 See the Law Commission's Consultation Paper No 167, 31 July 2002.

56 President of India v La Pintada Compania Navigacion SA [1985] AC 104, 115, per Lord Brandon; [1984] 2 All ER 733.

57 Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669, 701, per Lord Browne-Wilkinson.

58 Clef Aquitaine SARL v Laporte Minerals (Barrow) Ltd [2002] QB 488, 506, per Simon Brown LJ. This issue is raised in Black v Davies [2004] EWHC 1464 (QB).

59 Wallersteiner v Moir (No 2) [1975] QB 373, [1975] 1 All ER 849.

60 [1996] AC 669, 701, per Lord Browne-Wilkinson. See now also Sempre v IRC [2005] EWCA Civ 389.

61 [2007] 3 WLR 354.

62 See, eg, suggestions to this effect in Armory v Delamire (1723) 1 Str 505; Johnson v R [1904] AC 817.

63 Black v Davies [2004] EWHC 1464 (QB), [13]; relying on Burdick v Garrick (1870) LR 5 Ch App 233, 241, per Lord Hatherly; Attorney-General v Alford (1885) 4 D & GM 843 and Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669. Cf Hungerfords v Walker (1989) 171 CLR 125, considering Hadley v Baxendale (1854) 9 Ex 341.

64 Banque Financière de la Cité v Parc (Battersea) Ltd [1999] 1 AC 221; Liberty Mutual Insurance Co (UK) Ltd v HSBC Bank plc [2001] All ER (D) 72.

who is entitled to the remedy of subrogation is put ‘in the shoes’ of the defendant so that the claimant acquires whatever rights the defendant previously had.⁶⁵ Subrogation arises in a number of contexts, as will be considered in this section. Two examples will illustrate the simple and reviving forms of subrogation.⁶⁶ So, if Insure Ltd had insured Betty against the costs of any motoring accident and Charlie had driven into Betty, then Insure Ltd would be obliged to pay Betty the amount of her loss, but would also be entitled to be subrogated to Betty’s rights to sue Charlie in the tort of negligence: that is, Insure Ltd sues Charlie as though Insure Ltd were Betty to recover the amount it paid to Betty.⁶⁷ Alternatively, if Alex involuntarily confers a benefit on Betty (for example, by paying her money), Alex may be entitled to a remedy against Betty where it would be inequitable for Betty to retain that benefit. So, where Alex’s money was used by Betty to pay off a debt which Betty owed to Charlie, then, assuming that Betty had no conscientious excuse for using that money for that purpose, then Betty would owe that debt to Alex instead.⁶⁸ In either case, one person is subrogated to the rights of another.

Subrogation is an equitable remedy.⁶⁹ As has been considered in this book, there is a tension between the traditional doctrines of equity and the principle of restitution of unjust enrichment.⁷⁰ A number of cases in the 1990s held that subrogation is used to reverse the unjust enrichment of the defendant.⁷¹ So, the remedy of subrogation will be available in circumstances in which it can be shown that the defendant has been enriched at the claimant’s expense in circumstances in which that enrichment was unjust. Recent cases have suggested that there is no practical difference, however, between doctrines which are concerned with avoiding unconscionability (such as equity) and doctrines which are concerned with avoiding injustice (such as restitution of unjust enrichment).⁷² In one case which proposed the restitution of unjust enrichment understanding of subrogation, Boscawen v Bajwa,⁷³ it was nevertheless held that:

The equity arises from the conduct of the parties on well-settled principles and in defined circumstances which made it unconscionable for the defendant to deny the proprietary interest claimed by the plaintiff. A constructive trust arises in the same way.

65 See, eg, Re National Permanent Benefit Building Society ex p Williamson (1869) 5 Ch App 309, 311, per Giffard LJ; Boscawen v Bajwa [1996] 1 WLR 328.

66 To use Mitchell’s vocabulary: Mitchell, 1994.

67 Burnand v Rodocanachi (1882) 7 App Cas 333.

68 Boscawen v Bajwa [1996] 1 WLR 328.

69 Traditionally considered to be a ‘right’: Castellain v Preston (1883) 11 QBD 380, 390, per Brett LJ; although this doctrine is now properly understood to be a ‘remedy’: Boscawen v Bajwa [1996] 1 WLR 328, 335, per Millett LJ; James (1971) 31 MLR 149, 154; Mitchell, 1995, 71–74; Goff and Jones, 2002, 121.

70 See the essay taken from the third edition of this book on ‘restitution of unjust enrichment’ at www.alastairhudson.com/trustslaw/trustslawindex.htm

71 Boscawen v Bajwa [1996] 1 WLR 328, [1995] 4 All ER 769, 777, per Millett LJ; Banque Financière de la Cité v Parc (Battersea) Ltd [1999] 1 AC 221, [1998] 1 All ER 737, 749, per Lord Hoffmann. See now Anfield (UK) Ltd v Bank of Scotland plc [2010] EWHC 2374, [2011] 1 WLR 2414.

72 See, eg, Cheltenham & Gloucester plc v Appleyard [2004] EWCA Civ 291, para [49], per Neuberger LJ; Filby v Mortgage Express (No 2) Ltd [2004] EWCA Civ 759, para [56], per May LJ: where both Courts of Appeal suggested that the decision of the House of Lords in Banque Financière de la Cité v Parc (Battersea) Ltd arose in relation to such a unique set of circumstances that it should not be considered to require the court to ‘apply that decision like a straitjacket’ in future cases.

73 [1996] 1 WLR 328, [1995] 4 All ER 769, 777, per Millett LJ.

From these dicta, it is clear that the basis of subrogation remains equity, which seeks to identify whether or not activity is unconscionable, and which arises in a manner similar to a constructive trust. Therefore, it is suggested that the basis of subrogation is an equitable notion of good conscience.⁷⁴ The earliest understandings of this equity in English law were that it was ‘the plainest equity that could be’⁷⁵ and based on a ‘principle of natural justice’.⁷⁶ Thus, to consider subrogation as being a part of general equity is entirely justifiable on the established authorities, whereas the suggestion that it is based on unjust enrichment is a comparatively recent one.⁷⁷

30.7.2 Forms of subrogation

The neatest example of subrogation arises when Betty takes Alex’s money to discharge a debt which Betty owes to Charlie, with the result that Alex is subrogated to Charlie’s rights so that Betty owes that debt to Alex instead.⁷⁸ However, while that is an example of subrogation, it is not a description of the whole of subrogation. Here are some other examples in which subrogation has been permitted. Where Alex is a surety for Betty’s debts and pays off Betty’s debts owed to Charlie, Alex is entitled to any securities which Betty has deposited with Charlie to secure that debt by way of subrogation.⁷⁹ Where Betty borrowed money from Alex to acquire property from Charlie, Alex should be entitled to a charge by way of subrogation against the purchased property.⁸⁰

The established categories of people entitled to the remedy of subrogation are:⁸¹ sureties discharging the debts of their principals⁸² have a right of subrogation against the principal,⁸³ people who endorse bills of exchange and who then pay the bill in full have a right of subrogation against the acceptor;⁸⁴ insurers suing to recover amounts paid out under a contract of insurance;⁸⁵ creditors of a business carried on by a trustee such that the creditor is subrogated to the right of indemnity which the trustee has against the trust fund;⁸⁶ mortgagors who use a third person’s property to discharge their mortgage (or other secured) debt with the 74 Lord Napier and Etrick v RF Kershaw Ltd [1993] AC 713, 738, per Lord Templeman.

75 Randal v Cochran (1748) 1 Ves Sen 98; Burnand v Rodocanachi (1882) 7 App Cas 333, 339, per Lord Blackburn.

76 Craythorne v Swinburne (1807) 14 Ves 160, 162, per Sir Samuel Romilly.

77 Beginning with Professor Mitchell, 1995 and then being picked up in subsequent cases, eg, Banque Financière de la Cité v Parc (Battersea) Ltd [1999] 1 AC 221, [1998] 1 All ER 737, 749, per Lord Hoffmann; Crantrave Ltd v Lloyds Bank plc [2000] QB 917, [2000] 4 All ER 473.

78 Boscawen v Bajwa [1995] 4 All ER 769, [1996] 1 WLR 328.

79 Aldrich v Cooper (1803) 8 Ves 382, 389, per Lord Eldon.

80 Orakpo v Manson Investments Ltd [1977] 1 WLR 347, 357, per Buckley LJ.

81 For a fuller discussion of these categories, see Goff and Jones, 2002, 139 et seq.

82 Provided that the agent has the authority to discharge that debt: In Re Cleadon [1939] Ch 286; Crantrave Ltd v Lloyds Bank plc [2000] QB 917, [2000] 4 All ER 473. Cf B Liggett (Liverpool) Ltd v Barclays Bank Ltd [1928] 1 KB 48.

83 Aldrich v Cooper (1803) 8 Ves 382; Craythorne v Swinburne (1807) 14 Ves 160. Cf Banque Financière de la Cité v Parc (Battersea) Ltd [1999] 1 AC 221; Cheltenham & Gloucester plc v Appleyard [2004] EWCA Civ 291.

84 Ex p Bishop, re Fox, Walker & Co (1880) 15 Ch D 400, 411, per James LJ.

85 Lord Napier and Etrick v RF Kershaw Ltd [1993] AC 713, where the appropriate remedy may be a lien over a defined fund.

86 Dowse v Gorton [1891] AC 190, 203, per Lord Macnaghten.

mortgagee such that the third party is subrogated to the rights which were previously owed to the mortgagee;⁸⁷ lenders may be subrogated to an unpaid vendor's lien which the borrower acquires over another's property if acquired by means of the borrowed money.⁸⁸ In each case, the remedy entitles the claimant to assume the rights of the defendant in circumstances in which it would be unconscionable for the defendant to deny the claimant those rights.

30.7.3 Subrogation and tracing

Tracing is a process which offers both some striking similarities with, and differences from, the remedy of subrogation. Equitable tracing claims are based on a breach of trust which results in the original property rights of the claimant being pursued into substitutes for that property or into mixtures of that property with other property. Equitable tracing constitutes the substitution of one piece of property for another, whereas subrogation constitutes the substitution of one claimant for another.⁸⁹ Subrogation may operate as a remedy to a tracing claim. For example, in Boscawen v Bajwa,⁹⁰ Bajwa (B) had charged land to a building society (the Halifax) before then exchanging contracts for the sale of the property with purchasers. In turn, the purchasers had sought a mortgage with Abbey National. The loan moneys provided by Abbey National were used to pay off the Halifax, thus redeeming that mortgage. In turn, however, the solicitors who were holding the purchase moneys went into insolvency and therefore the sale could not be completed. The issue arose how Abbey National was to recover its money, which had been held for it by the solicitors, and then used to pay off B's debt with the building society. The more precise legal question was whether or not the bank was entitled to trace into the debt with the building society and claim a right in subrogation to the debt previously owed to the Halifax before it had been redeemed. It was held that there must be a fiduciary relationship which calls the equitable jurisdiction into being. It was accepted that the money had been held on trust from the outset. The money could therefore be followed into the solicitors' client account. The issue was whether it could be traced further into the payment to the building society. It is not clear on the facts whether the money was held in a separate, designated account or whether it was paid into a general, mixed bank account.

In explaining the ability to claim into a mixed fund, Millett LJ held that:

Equity's power to charge a mixed fund with the repayment of trust moneys enables the claimant to follow the money, not because it is his, but because it is derived from a fund which is treated as if it were subject to a charge in his favour.

Here, B and the solicitors were not dishonest in a mixture of bank's money and B's money. Therefore, B and the bank could be treated as ranking pari passu in the making of payments.

87 Boscawen v Bajwa [1995] 4 All ER 769, [1996] 1 WLR 328. See also the survey of this area of the law conducted by May LJ in Filby v Mortgage Express (No 2) Ltd [2004] EWCA Civ 759, para [31] et seq, where the approach in Boscawen was followed.

88 Thurstan v Nottingham Permanent Benefit Building Society [1902] 1 Ch 1, [1903] AC 6; Burston Finance Ltd v Speirway Ltd [1974] 3 All ER 735, [1974] 1 WLR 1648; Boodle Hatfield & Co v British Films Ltd [1986] PCC 176.

89 The best case considering the two areas is Boscawen v Bajwa [1996] 1 WLR 328.

90 [1995] 4 All ER 769, [1996] 1 WLR 328.

The solicitors were clearly fiduciaries. B must have known that he was not entitled to that money until contracts were completed. B could not keep the sale proceeds and title to the property. B could not therefore rely on the favourable tracing rules set out in *Re Diplock*⁹¹ for innocent volunteers.

On a similar note, in Wenlock v River Dee Co,⁹² the issue arose as to whether or not the plaintiff's property had been used to pay creditors of the defendant, which would entitle the plaintiff to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors. Some creditors had been paid by the defendant's bank, which thereby acquired a debt owing from the defendant; then, the money being traced was paid to the bank in discharge of this debt. It was held⁹³ that there was no difficulty in tracing this money to the payments received by the creditors.

30.8 RECEIVERS

The power to appoint receivers is the power to appoint a person to take control of property and then to administer and distribute that property appropriately. The principal purpose of a receiver is to preserve property while litigation as to the ownership or use of that property is settled, although receivers may be appointed to preserve property even in the absence of pending litigation.⁹⁴ Thus, the receiver's goal is to preserve the property 'in a state of security pending litigation'.⁹⁵ So, a receiver may be appointed to take control of property where otherwise there is no owner who will take such control.⁹⁶ Alternatively, a receiver may be appointed to prevent a party who is in possession of the property from misusing the property, but this power will only be used if the circumstances dictate that this is desirable.⁹⁷ Otherwise, the courts would be slow to interfere with pre-existing property rights. However, in circumstances in which one object under a discretionary trust was in possession of the trust property and it was feared that that person would dissipate that property before the trustees could deal with it, it would then be reasonable to appoint a receiver to prevent that person from misusing the trust property.

There are three contexts in which receivers are appointed regularly.⁹⁸ First, mortgagees may appoint receivers over mortgaged property under their statutory power of sale.⁹⁹ Secondly, the power to appoint receivers may be exercised in favour of a person's creditors,¹⁰⁰ although freezing injunctions are more commonly used to prevent assets being removed.¹⁰¹ Thirdly, a receiver will be appointed when a partnership is close to termination so that the assets of the partnership can be sold as a going concern and so forth.¹⁰²

91 [1948] Ch 465.

92 (1887) 19 QBD 155. Cf Cantrave Ltd v Lloyds Bank [2000] 4 All ER 473 – no subrogation where the money lent by a bank to a customer did not discharge any debt of that customer.

93 Ibid., 166.

94 Re Oakes [1917] 1 Ch 230.

95 Free v Hindle (1827) 2 Sim 7 at 11, per Hart VC.

96 Owen v Homan (1853) 4 HLC 997, 1032, per Lord Cranworth.

97 John v John [1898] 2 Ch 573.

98 There are other contexts, on which see McGhee, 2005, 431 et seq.

99 Law of Property Act 1925, ss 101, 109. This power applies to equitable mortgages: Re Crompton & Co Ltd [1914] 1 Ch 954.

100 Cummins v Perkins [1899] 1 Ch 16.

101 Section 27.4 above.

102 Smith v Jeyes (1841) 4 Beav 503; Pini v Roncoroni [1892] 1 Ch 633; Taylor v Neate (1888) 39 Ch D 538.

30.9 DELIVERY AND CANCELLATION OF DOCUMENTS

A court of equity may order that documents be delivered and cancelled in a number of circumstances. Broadly, those circumstances relate to situations in which: an ostensibly valid document is void or voidable,¹⁰³ where an ostensibly valid document may cause a false claim to be made,¹⁰⁴ where an ostensibly valid document may cause some party to rely on it thinking its contents to be true,¹⁰⁵ or where it would otherwise be contrary to public policy.¹⁰⁶ The documents will not be cancelled entirely in the abstract, but rather the court may require equitable relief to be provided on the part of any other person involved. So, if a loan were cancelled by cancellation of the loan document, then the borrower would be required to repay the capital borrowed under the loan and may not simply rely on the cancellation of the loan to vest her with title in the loan moneys.¹⁰⁷ Evidently, not to provide for reciprocal equitable relief may contravene the equitable principle that she who seeks equity (in the form of the cancellation of documents) must also do equity (in the form of providing reciprocal relief) in given circumstances.

30.10 EQUITABLE DOCTRINES MODIFYING EXISTING RIGHTS

The doctrines considered in this section function as part of the general equitable motivation to interfere with legal rights so as to ensure justice between the parties.

30.10.1 Conversion

The equitable doctrine of conversion deems, in any circumstances in which there is a binding obligation to sell property, that rights in that property are converted into rights in the proceeds of sale.¹⁰⁸ This doctrine is an extension of the equitable principle that equity looks upon as done that which ought to have been done. This doctrine has been abolished in so far as it relates to trustees of land holding that land for the purpose of sale.¹⁰⁹ The significance of the doctrine before 1925 related to property which passed to the next-of-kin on death, but those technicalities were abolished by the 1925 reforms of land law.¹¹⁰

30.10.2 Election

If a person takes a transfer of property, made by will or by deed, and is bound by the terms of that transfer to perform some other act in consideration for that receipt, then she is not entitled in good conscience to the former without electing to be bound by the latter.¹¹¹

103 Davis v Duke of Marlborough (1819) 2 Swans 108.

104 Wynne v Callender (1826) 1 Russ 293 (where a negotiable instrument might have been used for an improper purpose).

105 Cooper v Joel (1859) 1 De GF & J 240 (where a guarantee was procured by misrepresentation); Peake v Highfield (1826) 1 Russ 559 (where a false conveyance may have induced a third party to seek to acquire the property).

106 W v B (1863) 32 Beav 574 (where a contract was formed for an immoral purpose).

107 Earl of Aylesford v Morris (1873) 8 Ch App 484.

108 Fletcher v Ashburner (1779) 1 Bro CC 497, 499, per Sir Thomas Sewell MR; Re Richerson [1892] 1 Ch 379, 383.

109 Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, s 3.

110 Administration of Estates Act 1925, ss 33, 45.

111 Re Mengel's WT [1962] Ch 791, 797, per Buckley J.

30.10.3 Performance

Equity imputes an intention to fulfil an obligation.¹¹² Therefore, when a person is obliged (principally under covenant on the decided cases) to perform a duty, any act which is taken is deemed to be in partial performance of that duty.¹¹³ So, if one contracts to buy a large area of land as agent for another person, and then one buys a parcel of that land, it is assumed that one has performed that contract in part.¹¹⁴ Alternatively, if a person covenanted to leave property to identified people by will after her death, if she then died intestate, anything which passes to those identified people would be deemed to have passed in partial performance of that covenant.¹¹⁵ Thus, performance deems actions to be done in performance of one's obligations, thus reducing them pro tanto, provided that they can reasonably be construed as being performance of the same. The importance of this doctrine is that if the action can be deemed to be performance of the obligation, then the defendant's obligation will be reduced by the amount of the performance.

30.10.4 Satisfaction

Satisfaction will be available if a person was obliged to do act x and instead does act y and if y can be considered to be a replacement for the performance of x which satisfies the defendant's obligation to perform x. So, if the defendant leaves a legacy to the claimant, then any action for debt which the claimant has against the defendant's estate may be reduced by the amount of the legacy if the legacy can be deemed to have been in satisfaction of the debt.¹¹⁶ The legacy will be deemed to be in satisfaction of the debt if there is no intention to the contrary, if the legacy is equal to or greater than the debt, and if the legacy is equally beneficial as repayment of the debt.¹¹⁷

30.11 MERE EQUITIES

Mere equities are a difficult category to describe in the abstract precisely because they arise on a case-by-case basis, usually as a procedural device, in circumstances in which the courts think it necessary to do justice between the parties.¹¹⁸ Mere equities will run with land or other property, rather than being simply of a personal nature. So, an equity to have a transaction set aside for fraud¹¹⁹ or to have an instrument rectified for mistake¹²⁰ may be ancillary to property and may pass with the property to a successor in title.¹²¹ The only category of person who will escape a mere equity will be a bona fide purchaser of the relevant property

112 Sowden v Sowden (1785) 1 Bro CC 582.

113 Lechmere v Lady Lechmere (1735) Cas t Talb 80.

114 Ibid.

115 Garthshore v Chalie (1804) 10 Ves 1.

116 Talbott v Duke of Shrewsbury (1714) Prec Ch 394, 395, per Trevor MR.

117 Re Stibbe (1946) 175 LT 198; Snell, 2005, 132 et seq.

118 See, for example, Shiloh Spinners v Harding [1973] AC 691, 721, referring to Snell, currently 2005, para 2–05.

119 Ernest v Vivian (1863) 33 LJ Ch 513.

120 Smith v Jones [1954] 2 All ER 823; Re Colebrook's Conveyance [1972] 1 WLR 1397.

121 Law of Property Act 1925, s 63; Boots the Chemist Ltd v Street [1983] EGD 251.

for value without notice of the claimant's rights.¹²² With the enactment of the Land Registration Act 2002, mere equities take effect over successors in title from the moment at which the equity comes into existence.¹²³ A mere equity may take effect in relation to land as an overriding interest¹²⁴ if the rightholder is in actual occupation of the property or by the entry of a notice on the Land Register.¹²⁵

30.12 MUTUAL BENEFIT AND BURDEN

An equitable doctrine of mutual benefit and burden has been used in the law relating to easements where it would be unconscionable for someone who takes the benefit of a right to refuse to accept a correlative burden.¹²⁶ An extreme example of this doctrine arose in the case of Ives (ER) Investment Ltd v High,¹²⁷ in which the original covenanting parties had agreed that in consideration for developers being allowed to have the foundations for their building encroaching on the other party's land, that other party was permitted access across the developer's land. Successors in title from the developers sought to deny access to the other party's successors in title. It was held by Lord Denning, inter alia, that the doctrine of mutual benefit and burden precluded the defendants from continuing to take the benefit of having their foundations encroaching on the claimant's land while seeking to deny themselves the burden of suffering the claimant's access across their land. The breadth of the principle is uncertain, perhaps arising in circumstances of unconscionable denial of another's rights rather than as a general rule of law.¹²⁸

122 National Provincial Bank Ltd v Ainsworth [1965] AC 1175, 1238; Westminster Bank Ltd v Lee [1956] Ch 7; Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669; Malory Enterprises Ltd v Cheshire Homes Ltd [2002] Ch 216.

123 Land Registration Act 2002, s 116. See Blacklocks v JB Developments (Godalming) Ltd [1982] Ch 183.

124 Land Registration Act 2002, Sched 3, para 2(c).

125 In relation to a mortgage, the mere equity may be overreached: Birmingham Midshires Mortgage Services Ltd v Sabherwal (2000) 80 P & CR 256, noted at (2000) Conv 256, (2000) 116 LQR 341.

126 Halsall v Brizell [1957] Ch 169, 182; Tito v Waddell (No 2) [1977] Ch 106, 292C, 305H, per Megarry VC.

127 [1967] 2 QB 379.

128 Government Insurance Office (NSW) v KA Reed Services Pty Ltd [1988] VR 829, 840, per Brooking J; Rhone v Stephens (1993) 67 P & CR 9, 15, per Nourse LJ. Cf Green v Lord Somerleyton [2004] 1 P & CR 520 at para 103, suggesting a modern breadth to this principle beyond the old law on deeds.

Theoretical questions relating to equity and trusts

This page intentionally left blank

The nature of property in equity and trusts

31.1	QUESTIONS OF PROPERTY AS THEY APPLY TO TRUSTS	1291
31.1.1	The component legal aspects of a trust	1291
31.1.2	Problems with the logic of express trusts	1293
31.1.3	Rights having value – not identity	1294
31.2	THEORIES OF PROPERTY IN LAW	1295
31.2.1	The ordering of property theory	1295
31.2.2	Four forms of property rights	1296
31.2.3	The modern forms of property	1301
31.3	THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN EQUITY AND RESTITUTION OF UNJUST ENRICHMENT	1304

31.1 QUESTIONS OF PROPERTY AS THEY APPLY TO TRUSTS

31.1.1 The component legal aspects of a trust

There is much in this book which has had to do with commerce and much which has had to do with property. The development of the principles of equity in England and Wales has interacted closely with commercial developments – the company, the floating charge, the trust itself – and also with the law of property – the trust of land, family settlements, and so forth. The historical competition between the courts of common law and the courts of equity saw responsibility for much of these areas move between the two jurisdictions. The courts of equity became amenable to commercial goals such as the control of contractual obligations through specific performance,¹ rectification and rescission,² as well as to disputes over the use of land through equitable easements,³ the enforceability of the burden of negative covenants,⁴ and the equity of redemption in mortgages.⁵ There is no reason in the abstract why the courts of common law could not have developed means of achieving the same goals. After all, common law developed its own notion of fraud and could therefore have made the

1 See chapter 26.

2 See chapter 28.

3 ER Ives Investment Ltd v High [1967] 2 QB 379.

4 Tulk v Moxhay (1848) 18 LJ CL 88.

5 See chapter 23 above.

small leap to a notion of unconscionability too. Throughout its complex history, however, the common law failed to develop procedural rules to allow such concepts to be developed in its own courts once they had been manufactured in equity. Amongst all of these developments it is the trust which has demonstrated itself to be the most versatile and wide-ranging technique in equity's armoury. The modern equity which is visible to us today is the product of this history by means of which equity has both developed and discarded many forms of action, many procedural rules and many substantive concepts. But it is not just equity which has changed; the world with which equity is confronted has changed radically too over time. This chapter considers the change in the nature of the property with which equity has had to deal. Most of the discussion will focus on the trust institution, being equity's most important tool in property disputes.

We might think of the law of trusts as being a mixture of concepts derived from the law of property (as to ownership of the trust fund, as to tracing property rights, and so forth) and also from the law of obligations, loosely defined (as to the liability of the trustee for breach of trust, the potential liability of third parties for losses suffered by the trust, and so forth). Between express trusts and trusts implied by law, the nature of those property rights and those obligations may differ markedly from context to context. The trust has also been presented in this book as an offshoot from equity which developed from the powers of the Courts of Chancery as a means of regulating the conscience of the common law owner of property by recognising that the beneficiary also has rights in that property. Nevertheless, the modern express trust has hardened into an institution which is built on certainty⁶ and formal rules,⁷ and so has appeared to move away from its general, equitable roots as a means of controlling the conscience of the trustee.⁸ In tandem with the growing debate about the nature of trusts implied by law, it is suggested that the time has come to recapture those equitable roots and to understand trusts as being the kith and kin of equitable remedies like specific performance, injunctions and so forth. Only then will the potentially broad social application of equitable concepts become apparent.

Bound up with this reclaiming of the trust's roots is a need to understand some of the logical problems which trusts law faces, primarily because its ancient methods of understanding property as being necessarily something tangible and readily identifiable do not mesh easily with the sorts of disputes which have come before it in recent years concerning intangible property of a very different sort. Furthermore, this chapter will consider how theories of the legal nature of property impact on the law of trusts. In particular it will question the binary division between explanations of property rights as either attaching to a thing, or as constituting rights against other persons. It is suggested that the logic of that form of property law which was developed to deal with land has been applied uncomfortably to intangible, movable property. The treatment of issues concerning electronic money and other choses in action with those same rules has generated a large number of additional problems.

6 See Chapter 3.

7 See Chapters 4 and 5.

8 Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

31.1.2 Problems with the logic of express trusts

The rapid growth of the importance of the express trust in every context, from testamentary trusts to modern pensions funds, has meant that the logic of the rudimentary trusts has been bent out of shape. With the earliest trusts over land it was easy to see why, if Richard left England for a number of years and entrusted his lands to John for safekeeping in the interim, Richard should be recognised by equity as retaining effective title in that land until his return. Equity would recognise Richard's rights even if common law title over that land had been transferred to John to facilitate his role of keeper of Richard's lands. So far so good.

However, that logic only works for property like land which does not change its essential nature and which is difficult to mix with other property. It is a logic which does not apply so neatly to situations in which money held in an electronic bank account is transferred into another electronic bank account and mixed in a way which is impossible to untangle by restoration of the property. The rules which have been developed, for example as to the need for the segregation of property, have sought to extend principles developed in relation to land into disputes concerning other forms of property. The result is that those rules have begun to seem increasingly unsuited to the cases they are supposed to resolve.

The following logical problem arises with even the simplest express trust. Suppose that Simon leaves £10,000 to be held by Tina on trust for Brian and Betty in equal shares. There is no suggestion that that trust would be invalid if the £10,000 is identifiable, if Brian and Betty are identifiable and if Simon clearly intends to create a trust. What is more difficult is the suggestion that Brian and Betty have rights in the trust fund. We cannot know in which property each of them has their rights. As a matter of common sense we could say: 'Well, Tina would simply have to divide that property into two equal halves.' We could also say: 'It's only money after all – what could it matter who gets which notes provided that they get the correct value?' That is the key: Brian and Betty do not have rights in the trust fund; rather, they have rights against the trustee as to the treatment of that property, and they have rights against the rest of the world to prevent any third party from interfering with the fund held on trust for them. To that extent they have proprietary rights: to that extent they are able to direct the trustee to transfer title them under the rule in Saunders v Vautier. But they do not have rights in the trust moneys in the same way that we might have said that Richard, in the previous example, ought to be recognised as having rights in the land. Richard's rights attached to clearly identifiable property in the form of his land; whereas Brian and Betty have rights of a given value to a share in a fund of money. Nevertheless, the difference which I shall attempt to establish is that the logic of trusts law applies unevenly in relation to different kinds of property.

Even if the property were land held on trust by Tina such that Brian and Betty were to have rights to occupy the land, trusts law would say that Brian and Betty have equitable interests in the land even though neither of them has any right to remove any of that land or to deal with it separately from the other beneficiary. The only way in which they could deal with it separately would be to sell the land and to divide the sale proceeds between themselves.⁹ Even then, they would have no right in any specific money received for the sale until Tina had separated it and transferred it to them: up to that moment their so-called proprietary right would have been a right only to control the manner in which Tina dealt with that property. Their more useful right, in real life, is more likely to be the right to occupy the property – that is, a right to use the property. The most significant rights which Brian and Betty would have would be their rights to control Tina's treatment of the property and the right to prevent others from occupying the land. Their most significant rights are therefore rights operative against other people and not rights in the land.

⁹ As considered in Chapter 16.

31.1.3 Rights having value – not identity

The traditional English lawyer's approach to property law as enforcing rights against an identified item of property is an insufficient explanation of the broad potential range of features of those rights, for example, in relation to the proportionate rights which the beneficiary acquires against a mixed fund. English law recognises the beneficiary as having proprietary rights against that fund even though no particular property need be segregated for the use of an individual beneficiary in circumstances where property is held, for example, 'on trust equally for A and for B'. Rather, it is said that A and B have property rights in proportion to half of the fund. In truth what they have is a claim against the trustee in relation to a value equivalent to half of the value of the fund. The claim, while described as being proprietary, is effectively, if not technically, a personal claim against the trustee which will result in a transfer of property – that is, half of the property held on trust provided that constitutes half of the value of the fund.

The so-called proprietary claim is nothing more than a personal claim with proprietary consequences in this context: that is, a right to control another person's treatment of property so that the use of that property is affected. This is qualitatively different from saying that the proprietary right attaches only to the property itself.

A claim to a mixed fund is therefore also substantively different from a claim for the freehold of land which is a proprietary claim relating undoubtedly to identifiable property (the land itself). The certainty of that claim, as a claim relating only to that particular land, can be compared with the comparative vagueness of a claim to a part share of a bank account containing a mixture of different moneys. Typically, the legal analysis of money held in an electronic bank account is such that the property involved is commonly accepted as being susceptible to treatment by the rules for tangible property despite the fact that it is in truth only evidence of a debt owed by a bank to its customer. A bank account is merely a chose in action: a contractual recognition by the bank that the account-holder has deposited money with it and that the bank is required to return that money to the customer in accordance with the terms of their contract. It is not true to say that there is money in a bank account. Rather, the bank account is an acknowledgment of a claim in favour of the account-holder with a given value attached to it. Therefore, to claim an equitable proprietary right over 'money in a bank account in equal shares' with another beneficiary is to present a logical fallacy: the claim is merely a claim to an amount of value owed by the bank to the account-holder (or trustee in this example). There is no identified property available: only value.

To pursue this point a little further, even if we were to bring a claim in relation to an amount of money in cash, rather than in a bank account, that money is itself only currency.¹⁰ It is tempting to think of notes and coins as being tangible property. In fact, notes and coins

10 As defined later, currency is itself only evidence of a personal liability on the part of a central bank to meet a claim based on any banknote or coin.

are merely tangible evidence of a personal claim against the Bank of England in the form of the legendary ‘promise to pay the bearer on demand’ the face value of the banknote. The property held in a bank account is accepted as being property in legal practice because that is the only way of maintaining the logic of modern capitalist society: that is, that a promise by a bank to repay a deposit is equivalent to a property right. It is accepted as being property in theory on the basis that it constitutes a set of transferable rights and obligations.¹¹ Property theorists argue that because this account is capable of being transferred to another person or has a particular value, it should be treated as though it were property. In this chapter, those rights which are transferable encapsulations of merely personal rights are referred to as being ‘quasi-property’. The ensuing discussion of property and of the nature of money in this chapter teases apart these arguments and apparent contradictions.

31.2 THEORIES OF PROPERTY IN LAW

The core contention of the following section is that even the sophisticated distinctions in modern legal theory fail to account fully for mutual, collectivist forms of property ownership and also fail to give an account of the nature of personal claims (such as bank accounts held in electronic form) which is sufficiently coherent. This section considers the nature of property as understood by law and also the extent to which property as understood by law involves rights.

31.2.1 The ordering of property theory

In this discussion I want to do two things. First, I want to establish (at least in outline terms) that the legal conception of property law cannot be categorised either as simply rights in things or as rights between people. Rather, I shall attempt to demonstrate that there are times when rights in property are best expressed as rights in a thing and at other times as rights between people. However, I shall also seek to establish that there are two other positions which need to be recognised: contexts in which property rights are established by democratic control over property; and contexts in which quasi-proprietary rights are supported in law in relation to purely personal claims.

Therefore, I am arguing for a fourfold division in the understanding of property in law. The thread running through these four divisions is that property rights can only be understood as rights with a value attached and that the law will give a variety of remedies in different contexts to the four different forms of rights: in short, many theories of property in law confuse the nature of the remedy with the nature of the right it supports. For example, to conceive of a number of beneficiaries as each having separate proprietary rights in a fund of money held on trust for them equally is to confuse the beneficiary’s right against a proportion of the fund with the remedy of delivery up of property of a given value. Suppose the beneficiary seeks to enforce a right to be delivered her share of the total fund in a manner permitted by the terms of the trust. The beneficiary does not have any right to the particular property paid over by the trustee until it is actually paid over by the trustee: up to that time the beneficiary had merely a right to some property of that value to be paid to her by the trustee. To call the right of the beneficiary ‘proprietary’ is to elide the claim with the remedy.

¹¹ Penner, 1997, 105.

Many so-called property rights of this kind have in fact nothing to do with property and everything to do with rights which can only be exercisable between two particular people and no one else, for example in relation to transferable debts where property is owed only between debtor and creditor (whoever that happens to be from time to time, given that those rights can be transferred). Consequently, the conception of property currently accepted by English law is so vacuous as to be meaningless, because it does not differentiate systematically between property rights constituting an entitlement to an identified item of property and those constituting an entitlement to be paid an amount of money from a trust fund: both are described as being 'proprietary'. That is not to deny that English law accepts such rights as being property rights; rather, it is to question the logic behind such a position. What is argued for in this chapter is a recognition of different forms of rights in relation to property, or different forms of rights with a value attached arising in different contexts.

31.2.2 Four forms of property rights

(1) Property rights as 'rights in a thing'

The simplest property right is the right to the use of a 'thing'. The simplest form of rights in a thing arises in relation to ownership of land. In this conception of property, the homeowner has rights in her land, whether in the form of rights to prevent others from using that land, rights to deal with the land, or rights to adapt the land (within the confines of planning law). The simplest example of this phenomenon in relation to investment would be a nominee relationship under which an investment manager held property for an individual investor on bare trust. If that property were to be invested so as to generate an income stream without the capital being passed to any other person (like an ordinary bank deposit), then it could be said that the investor retained rights in the very property which was passed into the control of the investment manager. However, once the investment manager is permitted to dispose of the original capital to acquire other investments (perhaps securities), the investor's rights transfer from the original capital into the securities which are acquired by the trustee. The rights of the investor have therefore transferred from one item of property to another.

Once the trustee is entitled to take the investor's capital and mix it with other investors' capital, the rights of the investor become qualitatively different in property law terms. The investor has personal rights against the trustee as provided for in their contractual arrangements. The property rights which the investor holds will similarly be subject to the terms of that contractual arrangement. If the trustee is bound to acquire securities on behalf of those investors, to hold those securities and any income stream on trust for the investors, and then to sell the securities on a given date and divide the proceeds pro rata between the investors, the investor would be said to acquire an equitable proprietary interest in the investment fund. The value of that equitable interest would be proportionate to the fraction of the total fund which each investor contributed at the outset.

Here there is a logical leap in property law. As pointed out above, that mixed fund is said to be held on trust for all of those investors even though no single investor would be able to identify which securities within the general pool were the particular property of that investor. However, the law of trusts recognises a proportionate right in each investor provided that the entire fund is segregated from other entire funds. There is no particular problem with this in commonsensical terms. What is interesting, however, is that the law of property is prepared to elide the concepts of separate property and of value. Whereas the investor contributes property A (the investment stake), that right is said automatically to transfer to property B (the securities) and property C (the income stream from the securities). The elision occurs when the law says that the investor does not have to have its own investment held distinct from the remainder of the pool, but rather that the law will recognise that each investor has made an investment of a given proportion of the total value of the fund.

Thus, property becomes value for all practical purposes: one stands for the other. It is of no interest to the investor which securities are segregated for her, provided that she receives their cash return. This has ramifications for the legal treatment of unit trusts,¹² eurobonds,¹³ pension funds¹⁴ and shareholdings in ordinary companies.¹⁵ What is important to note is that the ‘rights in a thing’ thesis is easily diluted in the practice of property law to connect to value rather than necessarily to any single, particular thing.

(2) Property rights as ‘rights against people’

The property rights as a ‘rights against people’ thesis, identified most commonly with Hohfeld, is predicated on the following notion: property rights should not be considered as rights which attach to a thing, but rather as rights which protect the rights of the owner against the actions and rights of other persons.¹⁶ Therefore, an example of this form of right would be a freehold covenant in favour of a plot of land, Blackacre, which prevents the owner of neighbouring land, Whiteacre, from building above a certain height so that the owner of Blackacre can grow vegetables in open sunlight rather than in the shadow of Whiteacre’s buildings. The right could be said to be a right which is exercisable by the owner of Blackacre against the owner of Whiteacre to enable her personally to grow vegetables, and therefore as a right activated between persons and not necessarily which attaches to Blackacre, because a subsequent owner of the land might not want to grow vegetables. Alternatively, under the rights-in-a-thing thesis, this could be said to be a right which necessarily attaches to Blackacre and would have no sense nor any efficacy in relation to any other land. The law of freehold covenants requires that for the covenant to run with Blackacre, it must touch and concern that land.¹⁷ A right to prevent a neighbouring landowner from building above a given height would clearly be of benefit to the land, but that does not mean that the motivation for creating that right was not predicated on the covenantee having a personal need to ensure sunlight, not shadow, passing to Blackacre across Whiteacre. That the covenant must touch and concern the land is not doubted: what is asked is whether such covenants are better thought of as rights in the thing, or as rights between persons affecting their use of that land. In relation to freehold covenants, that they are attached to specific land and would make no sense if the covenantee purported to transfer them to the owner of different land means that they will generally be considered as attaching to the thing.

Nevertheless, in civil code jurisdictions, it is only the equivalent of the fee simple absolute in possession which would be considered to be a property right; all other rights would be merely personal rights. Thus, a covenant would be considered to be merely a personal right, 12 Thomas and Hudson, 2004, Chapter 51.

13 See section 22.5 above. Thomas and Hudson, 2004, Chapter 50.

14 Chapter 24.

15 See section 25.1 above.

16 Eleftheriadis, 1996.

17 Spencer’s Case (1583) 5 Co Rep 16.

and the means of its running with the land a matter of some complexity. In English law, even, there is a logical contrast between a fee simple and a mere covenant against the fee simple. A covenant or an easement clearly affects the nature of the property rights which make up the fee simple over the servient tenement because it means that the freeholder does not have a right, for example, to build above a given height within his bundle of property rights. So, in Rhone v Stephens,¹⁸ it was accepted by the House of Lords that negative covenants were property concepts because they had this subtractive effect on the quality and content of the owner's property rights.

However, the trust, constitutes a very different form of property right. When we suggest that the beneficiary has rights in the trust fund, they are not absolute rights of ownership but equitable interests. If the property held on trust is money in a bank account, the beneficiaries' names will not even appear on the cheque book and they will not be empowered to spend that money to acquire securities to be held on trust: such tasks are the preserve of the trustee. The property rights of the beneficiary are rights to demand that the trustee adhere to the terms of the trust set down by the settlor, or to refrain from permitting conflicts of interests or the preferential treatment of one beneficiary over another. It is only the principle in Saunders v Vautier which permits the beneficiaries to direct the trustees how to deal with the property. Otherwise, the position of the beneficiary is passive: reactive always to the good conscience of the trustee. The property right here is therefore not simply in the sense of dominium, or simple ownership, as understood by civil code jurisdictions. Instead, the property right is embodied in a right to control the activities of the trustee, rather than simply the right to own the property.

The evolution of more sophisticated forms of property has necessarily required more ethereal forms of rights in property than were necessary in relation to straightforward ownership of land. The example of the freehold covenant suggests a more complex form of property right than simple ownership of the fee simple. Discretionary trusts taken over bank accounts or over copyrights do not constitute such self-evident effects on the quality of the property which is the subject of the trust. It is suggested that there needs to be a further category of property right which recognises that the power of control of property is in itself a form of property right. With the increasing importance of community-based initiatives, such as co-operatives, it will be important for the law to facilitate them by developing legal structures that recognise such democratic control as being equivalent to proprietary rights in such entities. Even in company law it is suggested that the understanding of the share as simply a 'bundle of rights' constituting property is insufficient to explain the complex web of relationships which exist in a company and which constitute both effective entitlements and also assertions of rights against the assets of the company.

(3) Quasi-property rights – 'transferable personal claims'

Property law does recognise as property some phenomena which in truth constitute only personal claims: this relates to the 'quasi-property' mentioned above. Their status as property is said to rest primarily on their transferability or 'separability'.¹⁹ As set out above, in a mixed trust fund the beneficiaries are all said to have proprietary rights even though there

18 [1994] 2 AC 310.

19 The latter is the argument considered by Penner, 1997, 105.

need be no particular part of the fund segregated for their use: thus, their claim of a certain value can generate a remedy which does grant them rights in a particular thing, but where that thing can be identified only after judgment. For example, a single beneficiary within a beneficial class of 10 people who are entitled in equity to a fund of £10,000 which is held on trust for them 'in equal shares' has a right to one-tenth of the total fund, but does not own any specific £1,000 outright until that amount is paid to her by the trustee. Until the trustee effects payment, the beneficiary has, in truth, only a right of a given value against the trustee. It is tempting then to talk of such beneficiaries' rights as being in truth merely personal claims.²⁰ Nevertheless, English trusts lawyers talk of the beneficiary's one-tenth share in the total fund as being a property right, with the result that the beneficiary can sell that right to another person, or borrow money against it, or be recognised as a secured creditor in the event of the trustee's insolvency. Beyond that assertion as an example of the mutable logic of the law of property, the more general point made in this short section is that some things which are recognised as being property by English law are in fact only personal claims.

The most common example of this phenomenon is the chose in action. The chose in action is a claim which attaches to one person and is exercisable over another. The chose in action is accepted in English law as being itself an item of property capable of transfer at law and having a value of its own. It is this transferability and this possibility of distinct value which imbue such personal claims with the status of property. So it is that money held in an electronic bank account is treated as being property and the bank account itself (being a chose in action owed by the bank to its customer) is also property. What is peculiar about this form of property is that ownership of the right does not in itself give rise to any right in any identifiable property. Rather, it is a claim which entitles the holder of the right to be given some property of a given type and value – here, sterling – when she calls for it. The important factor here is not the identity of the property but rather its value: to put it crudely, it does not matter which pound coins are handed over provided that they have the same value total as the value of the claim. The transferable personal claim is therefore property with no identifiable proprietary base.

The upshot of the foregoing discussion is that there is a profound, two-step logical difficulty in English law's understanding of choses in action and similar claims as being property. First, there is something illogical in saying that a claim which is only a personal claim in itself ought to be considered to be property in the same way that, for example, rights attaching exclusive title in immovable property like land are considered to be property. Secondly, given that there is only a narrow distinction to be drawn between an ordinary personal claim and the possibility of transferring a personal claim, there is a weakness in a system of property law which supports completely different rights and remedies in relation to one form of personal claim from the other.

At the edge of the law of property there is an awkward distinction drawn between those claims which are considered to be property and those claims which are not. The following section advances the argument that there is a further category of relationship which ought to be considered to be proprietary given English law's attachment to conceiving of transferable personal claims as being property: that is, the status of democratic control over property as being a form of property right.

20 Penner, 2002.

(4) Control as a property right – property which cannot be owned

Ben Elton's play Gasping is a satire of the Thatcherite policy of privatising essential services like water and electricity: it assumes an attempt to privatise and to market air. Part of the central conceit of the play is the illogicality of suggesting that any person owns the air we breathe so that it could be privatised and sold off. The logical problem which arises with the privatisation of such services is this: how can water and air be privatised if they do not belong to anyone in the first place? Of course, part of the answer might be that it is service of providing drinkable water to millions of citizens which was being privatised. Nevertheless, the point remains: to what extent can all matter be owned?

In another book I posited the example of Essex Road in Islington and a different way of thinking about 'ownership' of that road.²¹ Essex Road is 'owned' by the Crown in some way that we know to be true as part of constitutional law but which has little practical relevance: it is not suggested that the Queen would ever choose to picnic in the middle of Essex Road. Rather, Essex Road is administered by government, through the Highways Agency and the local authority, through whose jurisdiction it passes. There are powers to close the road for maintenance, to legislate for the speed and manner in which people may use it, and so forth, but that does not capture the essence of the ownership of Essex Road, because Essex Road is just a foul-smelling, congested strip of tarmac which connects Islington Green with Newington Green. It is lined with shops, houses and residential estates. It is not really 'owned' by anyone. For some it is a route to work or school, for others it is the place where they live, for others it is simply another part of London. In this context, use is far more important than ownership. Co-operatives hold money for the common purposes of the members of the co-operative: no single person has ownership; rather, all members have ownership and rights of use. So it is with Essex Road: it is available and it is used. It is not useful to think of it as being owned.

This idea that property exists and is shared is very useful in relation to the law of trusts. As explained at the outset of this chapter, there are problems with thinking of beneficiaries under a trust as having rights in the trust property where there is more than one beneficiary; rather, those individuals have rights against the trustees and protective rights against the rest of the world to prevent interference with the trust property. As between the beneficiaries there is merely a right to use, or a right to receive, some value derived from that fund. For the member of a co-operative there is a right to receive value or benefit from the co-operative; for the member (or shareholder) of a company there is a right to receive a benefit from the company in the form of a dividend.

The common link between all of these various forms of belonging (whether as beneficiary, member or shareholder) is a benefit of a given value. The only difference is the manner in which English law recognises the nature of those rights. A beneficiary under a trust is said to have rights in the property under *Saunders v Vautier*²² in accordance with the terms of the trust; a member of a co-operative has rights based on the core constitution of the co-operative based on the law of contract; and the shareholder has rights based on company law to receive property on the winding up of the company or otherwise to be benefited in accordance with the constitution of the company. In each situation, a form of contractual thinking applies the principles contained in the constitutive documents of each entity²³ (trust, co-operative or company) as binding the rights and obligations of the members inter se. What this establishes is a form of democracy between those members, in which the shareholders can vote to take control of the company, the members of the co-operative can control their common undertaking, and the beneficiaries acting together can call for delivery of the trust property.

21 Hudson, 2000:1, 50.

22 (1841) 4 Beav 115.

The purposes of this diversion into the respective statuses of beneficiaries, members of co-operatives and shareholders are twofold. First, to explain one frequently overlooked commonality between these different legal categories: that democratic action between right-holders may have the same effect as the exercise of what is commonly accepted as being a property right. Secondly, to demonstrate that in a hyper-complex world it is not a straightforward question ‘what is the nature of property in law?’ because the rights of individuals and companies differ from context to context between rights to use property, rights to the exclusive possession of property, rights to prevent others from using property, and rights to derive a benefit from property.

31.2.3 The modern forms of property

Tangible money theory

One important aspect of property law cases in the last decade of the 20th century was the unsuitability of applying concepts formulated originally to deal with disputes over land to complex commercial disputes involving claims to money held in electronic bank accounts.²⁴ ‘Tangible money theory’ is the term used in this section to encapsulate this phenomenon.

For example, in the appeal in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC,²⁵ the principal focus of the House of Lords was on the proprietary rights attaching to a capital amount of (in total) £2.5 million which had been transferred by the bank to a local authority at the outset of a transaction which was subsequently held to have been void ab initio. The bank was said to have lost its right to trace into the bank account to which the £2.5 million was transferred because that account had gone overdrawn between the time of receipt of the payment and the commencement of the action for restitution of the £2.5 million. The consequence of the House of Lords’ unanimous finding (on that point at least) was that the money at issue was seen to have ‘disappeared’ once it passed from that bank account. What this means is that ‘money’ in this context is tangible (once the account has gone overdrawn, the money is said to have disappeared)²⁶ rather than being considered to be an amount of value which has passed into the possession of its recipient (which would not necessarily be said to have disappeared when the account ran overdrawn).²⁷

Therefore, a transaction involving the transfer of money between an account in the name of A, held with X Bank, to an account in the name of B, held with Y Bank, constitutes the 23 It is acknowledged that a trust is not technically an ‘entity’ – although see Hudson, 2000:1, 67.

24 Hudson, 1999:3.

25 [1996] AC 669.

26 Bishopsgate v Homan [1995] 1 WLR 31.

27 An approach taken by Lord Templeman, obiter, in Space Investments Ltd v Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce Trust Co (Bahamas) Ltd [1986] 1 WLR 1072, [1986] 3 All ER 75. However, this approach has been much doubted.

satisfaction of an undertaking between A and B to transfer amounts between them, and also constitutes a re-correlation of the debts between A and X Bank, and between B and Y Bank. Those transactions can be considered in two ways. First, as a transfer of property from A's account to B's account. This is the English law approach. It is an approach built on two premises: initially that physical currency would move between A and B, and latterly that the book entries used to record those transfers were themselves a recognition of a transfer of tangible property. The second analysis would be that no property has passed.²⁸ The property has not passed from A to B because A retains its rights against X Bank in the form of its bank account, only in relation to a smaller cash value. What has actually taken place is an alteration in the size of the debts which are owed between the respective banks and their customers. That is, value has passed from A's account and equivalent value has been added to B's account. No identifiable property has passed at all.²⁹

It is no accident that the word 'pecuniary' comes from the Greek 'pecus' meaning cow; and that the word 'chattel' has the same stem as 'cattle'. In both instances, once human beings had moved on from assigning rights in land between one another, they looked to their livestock as the next form of matter over which they wanted to create proprietary rights. In short, property law as 'rights in a thing' works well when dealing with 'my land' or 'my cow', but does not translate to situations in which the property is intangible. For example, the loss of the right to trace rule³⁰ is necessarily orientated around the notion of property being tangible.³¹ Thus we continue to speak of all property using language which has its roots specifically in the world of tangible property.

The lightness and the softness of modern property

It has long been the case that there are some who have much property and some who have little. Typically, this inequality in property ownership has meant that life is comparatively easy for some and hard for others. What is observable in the modern world is that our attitudes towards property have changed profoundly, even if the inequalities have remained broadly the same. It has been observed by the sociologist Richard Sennett that the most successful entrepreneurs and business leaders of our age treat their business assets not as property to be guarded and maintained but rather as simply assets which can be sold and turned to account without sentiment.³² The relationship of commercial people to their property has consequently become 'light'. Where once the industrialist owned a factory, employed labour from the local community and therefore established ties with that community, now manufacturers are less likely to own their own factories, preferring instead to exploit commercial brands and to grant franchises to third party factory owners to produce their goods for them. The principal consequence of such arrangements is that the brand

28 Hudson, 1999:2.

29 Eg, in R v Preddy [1996] AC 815, where accusations of theft were dismissed in the context where a telegraphic transfer from one bank account to another was held not to involve the transfer of 'property' for the purposes of the Theft Act 1968 but rather only an alteration in the value of those choses in action. This case led to the enactment of the Theft (Amendment) Act 1996, which created the new offence of theft of a money transfer: Re Holmes [2005] 1 All ER 490; Theft Act 1968, s 15A.

30 See section 19.8 above.

31 Cf Re Goldcorp [1995] AC 74; section 3.4 above.

32 Sennett, 1998, 61.

owner has no direct connection with the workforce. The only property involved is the trade mark imprinted on the trainers, on the coffee cup or on the sweatshirt. This has been expressed as granting the industrialist ‘lines of flight’ from the use of any given workforce or geographic location, because production can be shifted to another factory or another manufacturer without any profound consequences for the industrialist because the industrialist has no direct ties to the workforce or to the communities dependent on that industrialist’s business.³³ The involvement with this property is consequently light. The metaphor for our age is software: soft links between people and places.

It is not just the wealthy industrialists who have this sense of only soft links with their property. Our culture encourages us to be fashionable. Instead of developing ourselves through thought, reflection and study, we are encouraged to shop for our identities. We can buy clothes, music, cars, cosmetics and films to shape ourselves. When they go out of fashion, we abandon them and buy some more. We have become consumers rather than producers.³⁴ Of course, for those who are not very wealthy there are still the problems of maintaining their property by paying their mortgages, their credit card bills and so on. For them, property is less light – instead it is burdensome.³⁵

In parallel with the increasing intangibility of the property which equity is asked to deal with, our social attitudes to property are also becoming softer. The metaphor used, for example, in relation to the law of tracing, even in relation to complex financial transactions like the interest rate swap in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC,³⁶ is of ‘a stolen bag of coins’, as though we can only think of such property as though it were represented in tangible form such that its face value was the same as its intrinsic value in gold. This fails to deal adequately with the softness of this form of property as it passes through the computerised records of the bank which holds the accounts. As the world becomes ever more virtual – through e-mail, websites, telephone call centres – our property law is failing to keep pace. The complexities caused by the issues considered in this chapter are the result of adapting ancient principles to very modern forms of property.

The fragility of our understanding of property

What this tells us is that the current state of our property law is the product of its history. That the earliest forms of property law were generated over land and livestock has given rise to a code of rules which are predicated on the presence or absence of that property. Another approach to property law would be to focus on the value represented by the property rights rather than on the identification of the specific property claimed. Foucault focuses on ‘les choses dites’³⁷ as constituting the genesis of many of our social customs and laws. His point is that things are only the way they are because we say they are.³⁸ In other words, if we said that these things were to be different, then they would be different. Our property law is organised in the way that it is because we accept that it ought to be. Any student of English law or equity should understand them both as being the product of things that are said 33 Hardt and Negri, 2000.

34 Bauman, 2001.

35 Hudson, 2004:1.

36 [1996] AC 669.

37 That is, ‘things said’.

38 Foucault (1969), 1972.

(principally by lawyers and judges): our law is the product of texts and of speeches in the form of statutes and law reports. All of this law is the product of things which are said. Therefore, this law is capable of change simply by virtue of different things being said. As the ordinary lives of ordinary people are undergoing change we need to learn to talk differently about our law. One different form of discourse already considered in Chapter 17 is that of human rights. A modernised concept of equity is considered in Chapter 32. Before that however, we turn to consider the technocratic conservatism of the principle of restitution of unjust enrichment in the next section.

31.3 THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN EQUITY AND RESTITUTION OF UNJUST ENRICHMENT

This short section is intended simply to gather together in one place a discussion of the distinction between restitution of unjust enrichment and equity.³⁹ Equity, as discussed in Chapter 1, is based on the principles developed by the English courts of equity since the Earl of Oxford's Case,⁴⁰ in which Lord Ellesmere described equity as being concerned 'to correct men's consciences' and to 'mollify the extremity of the [common] law'. In turn, it is suggested that equity fits into a larger philosophical tradition concerned to deal justly with individual circumstances.⁴¹ From these roots have grown the range of equitable doctrines and remedies considered in this book. The full range of these remedies have no comparator elsewhere in English law, nor have the bulk of them been addressed by restitution specialists.

In recent years, there has grown a view among some commentators that 'equity' should be displaced, in particular to replace equity with restitution of unjust enrichment in a number of circumstances. What none of these commentators do, however, is to explain how the full range of equitable doctrines and remedies – including injunctions, express trusts, constructive trusts and so on – should be replaced by other doctrines. Instead they have focused on only a few doctrines, such as subrogation, tracing, and resulting trusts. There are three models of unjust enrichment in the English context which have been suggested by the work of Professor Birks. The first version suggested that the purpose of restitution was to identify circumstances in which the defendant has received an enrichment (such as a payment of money) unjustly (such as by means of a mistake in the payer) at the claimant's expense.⁴² It was suggested that it should have been a resulting trust which was the device to transfer the enrichment back to the claimant: an argument which was rejected by the majority of the House of Lords in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC.⁴³

Two things should be understood about this model of restitution. First, restitution is concerned not to compensate the claimant for whatever loss she has suffered, but rather it is concerned to take from the defendant whatever enrichment she has realised. Equitable

39 See the essay taken from the third edition of this book on 'restitution of unjust enrichment' at www.alastairhudson.com/trustslaw/trustslawindex.htm.

40 (1615) 1 Ch Rep 1.

41 However, it is acknowledged that the courts do not tend to base their principles explicitly on such principles. However, it is suggested that knowledge, for example, of Aristotle, would have been a part of the classical education of the early judges at least. Therefore, it is suggested that it should come as no surprise that there are similarities between the doctrines.

42 Birks, 1989.

43 [1996] AC 669.

compensation, by contrast, measures the loss suffered by the claimant and requires the defendant to make good that amount. Secondly, the notion of 'injustice' in this context is not a general notion of injustice, but rather is limited to a contested list of technical examples of injustice (such as mistake, failure of consideration and undue influence). Therefore, restitution is limited to primarily commercial situations according to a list of doctrines where those doctrines are already accounted for elsewhere in English law and where the precise contents of the list are contested.⁴⁴

The second version of restitution came after the rejection of the proprietary model of the concept in Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC.⁴⁵ This model suggested that the enrichment gained by the defendant should be considered to remain the property of the claimant throughout the transaction if that enrichment had been gained unjustly.⁴⁶ The focus of the doctrine was on reversing unjust enrichments in general terms and not on making restitution to the claimant by means of resulting trust. The third version focused on unjust enrichments which are analogous to a mistake: thus, it is suggested, limiting the doctrine even further and offering little prospect of displacing the full range of equitable doctrines.⁴⁷

The intellectual distinction between equity and restitution is as follows. The restitution lawyers prefer the idea of a positivist, clearly-defined legal system in which each area of law is set out on the basis of a neat model. So, Professor Birks's work contains talk of 'taxonomy' (a term used by scientists when they categorise different phenomena from the natural world) and diagrams in the form of grids which set out how the legal system should be divided between consent, wrongs and unjust enrichment. By contrast, equitable principles are open-textured and based on natural law principles of right and wrong. It is suggested that while the former approach may seem harder-nosed and tidier, it is, in fact, the latter which is more realistic because no rigid rules will ever cope (without more) with the natural chaos of the world, as considered in Chapter 32.

44 Compare, eg, Birks and Chambers, 1997 with Virgo, 1999 and with Goff and Jones, 2002, where each has a different number of unjust factors.

45 See Hudson, 1999:1.

46 Birks, 1996:2.

47 Birks, 2003.

Equity, chaos and social complexity

32.1	MAPPING THE SOCIAL ROLE OF EQUITY	1306
32.1.1	In defence of equity	1307
32.1.2	The nature of equity	1308
32.2	THE LEGAL NOTION OF CONSCIENCE	1309
32.2.1	The paradox within equity	1309
32.2.2	Thinking about conscience within ethical philosophy	1310
32.2.3	A future for equity in public law?	1312
32.3	SOCIAL COMPLEXITY	1313
32.3.1	Social complexity	1313
32.3.2	Borrowing from the science of complexity	1314
32.4	EQUITY AND CHAOS	1315
32.4.1	The psychology of order and chaos: common law and equity	1315
32.4.2	Reconstituting equity as a tool of social justice	1316
32.4.3	Equity out of chaos in a risk society	1316
32.5	EQUITY, CULTURE AND POLITICS	1318
32.5.1	Equity in the culture	1318
32.5.2	Equity as something quintessentially English	1319
32.6	THE GOALS OF EQUITY	1321
32.7	IN CONCLUSION	1322

32.1 MAPPING THE SOCIAL ROLE OF EQUITY

The purpose of this chapter is both to justify the continued use of equity by English law and also to give some indication of its particular relevance to the world at the beginning of the 21st century. The following are the principles on which I would rest a defence of equity: the remainder of this essay will pursue each of them in greater detail. At section 32.2 there is an attempt to explain how we might understand the notion of conscience as used in equity.

32.1.1 In defence of equity

- (1) Society has become particularly complex¹ – creating insecurity and fear for individuals.² This idea of complexity – explored most comprehensively in particle physics³ – engenders a form of social chaos in which individuals have become atomised⁴ and the paths to social solidarity obfuscated.⁵ The scientific model of complexity theory is useful in relation to social theory.⁶ It is suggested that a legal system must be able to cater for this complexity in a way that is both principled and sensitive to context.
- (2) Human beings crave order and are fearful of chaos.⁷ This tendency expressed itself in law-making by means of an instinct for formalism and certainty.⁸ In a world that is fundamentally chaotic, the classical model of equity considered in this book permits sufficiently flexible claims and remedies to address this chaos and this social complexity.
- (3) ‘Equity’ is a concept recognised across the social sciences: by leftist economists as a means of introducing fairness in opposition to efficiency;⁹ by American social theorists under cover of ‘equity theory’ to justify some inequality in society;¹⁰ by classical philosophers as a counterpoint to rigid systems of rules;¹¹ and by business theorists to describe ownership of corporations.¹² The commonalities between these conceptions of equity are that they contain a sense of a social morality put into effect in individual cases, and a sense of worth or value. A developed concept of equity enables the legal system to communicate more effectively with other social institutions and systems of thought.
- (4) Equity’s role is both cultural and political. This conception of equity permits an understanding of the legal system as being something owned by the citizens and not as something either positivist or based on an external morality: the two preeminent theories in the jurisprudential canon. Equity is cultural as an expression of ‘Englishness and Welshness’; equity is political in that it facilitates a discourse about the practice of justice. Equity is political also to the extent that it lends power to the judiciary: to this extent, the study and description of equitable doctrine are themselves political acts in that they shape and describe citizens’ rights. A conception of equity as being a dynamic agent of cultural and political discourse would be inclusive of citizens in a way that classical jurisprudence does not seek to be.
- (5) Equity is necessary to achieve a number of socially desirable goals: to protect the liberties and rights of the individual;¹³ to ensure fairness through conscionable behaviour;¹⁴ and to ensure equal access to justice.¹⁵

1 Byrne, 1998.

2 Giddens, 1991; Bauman, 2001, 83.

3 Cohen and Stewart, 1994.

4 Houellebecq, 2001.

5 Cotterrell, 1995.

6 Byrne, 1998; 1999.

7 Freud, 1930.

8 As considered in Chapter 7.

9 Le Grand, 1982.

10 Della Fave, 1980.

11 Eg, Aristotle and Hegel, as considered in section 1.1 above.

12 Brealey and Myers, 1998.

13 See section 1.1 above and the discussion of Aristotle and Hegel.

14 Rawls, 1971 and 1985: discussion of justice through fairness as a principle of ‘fair play’.

15 Hudson, 1999:2, 256 et seq.

32.1.2 The nature of equity

In the modern world, each circumstance is different from every other, and each person demands to be recognised as a unique individual¹⁶ – one set of rules will not satisfy all situations; rather, it is necessary to decide what is suitable in each context. What is a suitable standard of behaviour for a pension fund trustee may not be so for a trustee of a family home, or for a trustee in a eurobond transaction. To suggest that all of these situations can be met by the same, ever-hardening equitable and common law rules is folly. It is a spurious attempt to impose order on what is necessarily chaotic. While some writers identify order and certainty as being the first virtue of most legal systems, what is equally true is that chaos and uncertainty are the common characteristics of most disputes brought before them.¹⁷ The resolution of disputes and the generation of legal norms must be sensitive to their context and to the principle that law is of the people and not something which is simply used to control them. What is important instead is to conceive of the principles that we wish to apply to various situations. The development of human rights law is just such a process of establishing immutable, general principles,¹⁸ whereas the hardening of equitable principles into rigid tests is its antithesis.

In its English legal practice, equity has evolved a wide range of writs from its genesis as a means of petitioning the King as early as the 12th century,¹⁹ via the broad principles enunciated in Snell's Equity,²⁰ into an ever more concrete set of rules.²¹ For example, the acquisition of an interlocutory injunction has continued to be an ever more institutional remedy with the continued development of the *American Cyanamid*²² principles, whereas otherwise one might have expected this to be an area which would have demonstrated a strong judicial discretion.²³ The creation of the express trust has continued to be an increasingly formalised procedure reliant on compliance with statutes on perpetuities, certainties principles and other rules of formalities.²⁴ The suspicion of the use of equity in commercial contexts has added to this policy of applying equitable remedies and trusts only in situations in which those more concrete rules are satisfied.

At first blush, the *Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC*²⁵ litigation looked to have reclaimed the heritage of the trust as a creature responsive to the conscience of a person entitled to property at common law.²⁶ However, Lord Browne-Wilkinson, in speaking for the majority, denied the equitable remedy of compound interest on the basis of general justice which had been sought by the minority. The general principles of trust, while founded on the very mutable notion of 'good conscience', were set out with clinical precision but without any clear idea of what is meant by the term 'conscience' itself in that context. The recasting of the decision in *Chase Manhattan v Israel-British Bank*²⁷ was a

16 Hudson, 2004:2.

17 Oakley, 1997, 27.

18 See para 17.2.1 above.

19 A general jurisdiction described in Maitland, 1936, 1–11.

20 McGhee, 2005.

21 As considered in Chapters 7 and 14 in particular.

22 [1975] AC 396.

23 See para 27.3.2 above.

24 See Chapter 7 above.

25 [1996] AC 669.

26 This jurisdiction being described by Maitland, 1936, 8, as a combination of 'rules of equity and good conscience'.

27 [1981] 1 Ch 105.

good example of greater rigidity of principle at work even in the otherwise flexible area of constructive trust.²⁸ This notion of conscience is considered next.

32.2 THE LEGAL NOTION OF CONSCIENCE

32.2.1 The paradox within equity

What I hope to do in this section is to confront one of the central paradoxes which lies unspoken within equity.²⁹ Equity operates through judicial discretion against the conscience of the individual defendant and yet it is based on formally-generated, juristic principles. Thus, equity is at one and the same time a means of ensuring justice in individual cases whilst also constituting a code of abstract, technical rules which are applied by judges carefully in accordance with case law precedent. So, equity is free and yet constrained. The key to this apparent paradox, it is suggested, lies in a fuller understanding of the nature of ‘conscience’ in this context and in understanding that equity is, in truth, a mosaic of doctrines, principles and patterns of justice provision.

Equity, it is said, is a doctrine based on conscience. What appears little in the modern literature on the juristic concept of equity is any discussion of what this notion of conscience means. It is suggested that conscience has a stylised meaning particular to its use in equity. Therefore, we must consider the nature of equity, then consider what conscience connotes in its more general sense, before attempting to assess the interaction of the two terms.

The trust, used here as an example of an equitable device, is responsive to the conscience of the legal owner of property. This may manifest itself by means of express trusts through the claim for breach of trust which compels the trustee to permit no conflict of interest, no loss to the beneficiaries nor any deviation from the terms of her trusteeship, or it may manifest itself by means of trusts implied by law which seek to prevent the legal owner of property or some other person from taking a benefit unconscionably from that property. The express trust suggests a formalised equity which has been rigidified to achieve specific legal and non-legal goals: the protection of beneficiaries, certainty in relation to title over property and so forth. The trusts implied by law suggest responses to factual situations which appear to be contrary to conscience or demanded by fairness more generally. These latter manifestations of equity display a much broader use of judicial discretion to achieve goals which we might consider to be broadly moral or ethical, but which are nevertheless established in accordance with principle to a large extent and with precedent to a lesser extent. In this sense, ‘principle’ refers to that body of equitable principles such as ‘you must come to equity with clean hands’, whereas ‘precedent’ is used here to suggest a slavish application of rules in earlier cases with a lesser use of discretion in any individual case which is more clearly associated with the common law.

28 It is acknowledged that doctrinally this decision is said to create more uncertainty than it clears up (see perhaps Birks, 1996:2, 3) – the reference here is to the attempt to introduce clarity in the first place.

29 This contradiction is evident from the growing gap between books in this area which deal with ‘Equity’ (frequently in Australia) and books which deal only with ‘The Law of Trusts and Equitable Remedies’ and yet which are in truth dealing with the same subject matter. The key distinction between the two approaches is that the former type of book typically begins with Aristotle’s Ethics and its ancient conception of equity as rectifying formal rulemaking, whereas the latter begins with the formalities necessary to create express trusts to give effect to commercial transactions, marriage settlements and wills.

Still, equity is said to be based on conscience. The principle within the equitable canon which best encapsulates the notion of conscience intended is the principle that ‘equity acts in personam’. This principle means that the court’s concern is to look to the conscience of the individual defendant and to respond to that defendant’s actions and omissions. At first blush, this would suggest that the court will inquire into the individual’s own conscience. As such, it would be expected that equity would prefer subjective tests to objective tests. However, that is to misunderstand the manner in which equity operates. Historically, equity is, in theory at least, the embodiment in legal principle of the monarch’s conscience expressed through the powers delegated to the Lords Chancellor, or alternatively a development of the procedural notion of ‘consentia’ whereby judges would seek to give effect to the correct decision even if all of the facts could not be proved objectively. A more modern understanding of that concept would be to recognise equity as being an embodiment of an objective ethics to which the individual is intended to aspire and by reference to which her deeds and misdeeds will be judged by the civil courts. In that sense, there might be broad parallels between the role of equity in the civil law and the role of the criminal law more generally: a marriage which is suggested by the expression that the old Court of Star Chamber was concerned with ‘criminal equity’.

32.2.2 Thinking about conscience within ethical philosophy

Nevertheless, this troublesome term ‘conscience’ remains. If equity were said to act on the basis of ‘a public morality expressed through the courts’, then that would not lead to the uncomfortable muddle generated by the modern usage which suggests that equity is concerned with the individual defendant’s conscience rather than with the embodiment of the sovereign’s conscience through the actions of her officials and delegates. The term ‘conscience’ suggests a subjectivity at first blush. However, matters are perhaps not so easy. To suggest that conscience is something entirely within the individual and is something other than a public ethic expressed through legal principle is to suggest that the individual conscience and the consciousness to which it is both etymologically and metaphysically connected are not socially constructed at some level. This notion is beautifully expressed by the playwright Luigi Pirandello in his play Each in His Own Way, when the character Diego challenges the other characters who are talking about giving Catholic confession to a priest (itself that classical objectification of the conscience) and claiming that their self-contained consciences are clear:

But what is this conscience? It is the voice of others inside you.³⁰

What this idea suggests is that conscience is formed by our interactions with other people and is not something which we develop inside our own heads in a vacuum. This raises a range of important philosophical questions. At root, perhaps, it reflects those debates about whether or not the law should operate objectively or subjectively.

30 Pirandello, Each in His Own Way, spoken by Diego in Act 1, trans Firth, Pirandello – Collected Plays, 1992, Calder, London, Vol 3, 71. Also rendered in other versions as ‘Don’t you see that blessed conscience of yours is nothing but other people inside you!’ for example, in Williams, The Wimbledon Poisoner, London: Faber & Faber, 1990, 169.

The distinction between subject and object is, of course, problematic. To talk of the subject meaningfully, one must mean an individual and particular person. As soon as discussion turns to the similarities between subjects or of an idealised subject, then one immediately begins to objectify that subject.³¹ The conscience is most easily recognised as that still, small voice within us individually which speaks to us primarily of shame. For equity to seek to judge the conscience in accordance with decided principle is necessarily to seek to objectify that conscience. To judge the conscience even on the basis of total judicial discretion is to objectify it; it is to take it outside the subject and to use it as a lens through which to view those acts or omissions for which the defendant is on trial.

This perception of the vernacular sense of conscience is still troublesome. Is it correct to think of the conscience as a still, small voice? Or is the conscience something which moves, which grows and which develops? Further, is the conscience a still, small voice? If the individual is formed socially, at least in part, then the conscience is potentially a particularised rendering of a massive, public morality which is produced within the individual as an amalgam of socially-broadcast messages about right and wrong, of the products of interactions with other individuals (from immediate family, to work-mates to school-friends), and of more subtle phenomena like law, environment and so forth which shape expectations and attitudes more subliminally still. In Elias's view, individuals are necessarily socially constructed as we learn language from others, learn a basic sense of right and wrong from parents and teachers, and so continue throughout our lives to form our views of the world by interaction with other people.³² The internal world of the particular individual can therefore be considered to be objectively formed at some level.

At a further level, Levinas locates the essence of morality in a respect for other people. In this sense, equity might sensibly be said to operate on the externally-exhibited morality of the individual rather than on the internally-situated morality of that same person. Equity is responsive to the external manifestation and not inquisitive as to the contents of the internal morality. This is always assuming that the individual is conscious of her own internal morality until external factors challenge that individual, causing her conscience to speak for the first time 'out loud', even to herself about her own attitudes to particular ethical challenges. At this level, therefore, it is possible that the conscience remains dormant and unexplored in many of us until something in the outside world calls it unexpectedly to our conscious perception (our true feelings about strawberry yoghurt, an aversion to blue food dye, a thrill at the smell of warm road tar, a suspicion of sewing needles, a fear of accidentally chewing the tin foil wrapper on a Kit-Kat).³³ Conscience, that automatic censor, is therefore not only externally created in part, but the process of its generation in terms of our realisation of what our conscience likes and dislikes is frequently dependent on external stimuli.

All that can be said is that the conscience is privately situated. This suggests that the individual hosts her conscience. What remains at large are both the contents of that conscience and the process by which the conscience is formed. The contents of that conscience are prey to constant change and adaptation. Furthermore, the contents of that conscience at any particular time will be objective material, even if passed through ostensibly subjective filters.

31 Adorno, 1978.

32 Elias, 2001.

33 Another brand name which is automatically familiar to my spell-checker.

In conclusion, it is suggested that the conscience on which equity purports to act is necessarily a partly objective phenomenon in any event. Indeed, the most striking example of the action of public morality on the privately-situated conscience would be a judgment from a court of equity that a particular action breaches that equitable code. Law exists to measure the behaviour of individuals against the objective conscience of society as expressed through law – therefore, equity is simply expressing that general dynamic.

32.2.3 A future for equity in public law?

This very short section is simply intended to plant the seed of an idea. There is some suggestion that the law on legitimate expectations in relation to judicial review is akin to estoppel in that a public body making a decision which leads another person to believe that its decision will be x, such that that other person reasonably forms the impression that x will indeed be the state of affairs, will have a decision y judicially reviewed if her legitimate expectations have been disappointed. It is said that this is broadly akin to equitable estoppel in private law which seeks to prevent detriment or unconscionability if one person makes a representation to another in reliance on which that other relies to her detriment.

However, equity does not apply in public law. Nor does equity apply in quasi-public areas of law such as public sector housing law. Equity only applies in areas relating to bourgeois private property or commercial property law, or in relation to injunctions and commercial transactions concerned with equitable remedies in contract law. This may seem surprising given that Aristotle's conception of equity, and indeed many of the discussions of equity since then, were expressed in terms of all legislation or all law. Indeed, much of subjects like housing law and social security law, which lie somewhere between public law and private law, have simply not been subjected to the weight or type of scrutiny that has been lavished on private law or on judicial review down the centuries, let alone to the tender affections of equity. These areas have tended to be creatures of statute and of regulation instead.

My suggestion is that these areas of law could easily and usefully adopt principles of equity which are similar to the economists' notion of equity, as discussed above, which is concerned to ensure equal and fair access to public goods. An example of what I have in mind emerges from *Arun DC v First Secretary of State*³⁴ in which a woman received planning permission for an extension to her home on the condition that the extension remained part of a single dwelling. Instead, the woman began to use the extension as a separate dwelling. However, the manner in which the legislation had been drafted meant that, even though this woman deliberately flouted the terms on which planning permission had been granted to her originally, because she had committed this particular breach by changing the use of the extension four years after the permission was granted, therefore the ordinary rules as to breach of planning permission conditions did not apply. Sedley LJ in a short judgment held that:

the discovery that Mrs Brown has – not to put too fine a point on it – cheated on a conditional grant of permission, to the detriment of her neighbours and of planning control, may well be a matter of time and chance [because this particular type of breach has a different statutory limitation period from other such breaches].³⁵

34 [2007] 1 WLR 523.

35 Ibid, 532, para [36].

Now, my suggestion would be that the courts could develop a notion of equity even in relation to quasi-public law contexts like this in which a statute has, effectively, been used as an engine of fraud. In a private law context it would be possible to say that the defendant was taking unconscionable advantage of the statute and therefore that equity should be entitled to disapply the advantage which the defendant would otherwise receive, as was the case in *Rochevoucauld v Boustead*³⁶ and in relation to proprietary estoppel in Yaxley v Gotts.³⁷ After all, as Sedley LJ pointed out in this instance, the defendant had ‘cheated’ on the conditions on which she had been granted planning permission and clearly the Court of Appeal was reluctant to find that she could benefit from a mismatch in the drafting of the legislation relating to the limitation period applicable to this sort of planning grant. It would, it is suggested, be only a short step to introduce general notions of equity and of unconscionability in this sort of context.³⁸ For the future, then, it would be a larger question whether or not the discussion of ‘equity’ in the other social sciences, relating to fairness and equality of treatment, can be developed by English public law.

32.3 SOCIAL COMPLEXITY

32.3.1 Social complexity

Society has become particularly complex in the modern and postmodern era.³⁹ The old structures and certainties have broken down. The increased level of globalisation through the internet, through the power of multinational enterprises, and the shrinkage in the power of the nation state have all contributed to a changed society. For some this manifests itself in a new cosmopolitanism⁴⁰ in which an international elite crosses borders and cultural boundaries, while a new lumpen proletariat of people who have been overlooked by the new technologies is left behind.⁴¹ For others, this offers a new possibility for legal structures like trusts in applying the techniques developed in English trusts law to specific jurisdictions like the Cayman Islands,⁴² or more generally in international commercial transactions.⁴³ Similarly, the enhanced status of women as economic actors, as cultural actors and simply as human beings has complicated the nature of the family.⁴⁴ The examples of such phenomena are legion.

The old certainties are breaking down: the advent of mass unemployment has meant that there is no longer certainty about employment patterns; the increase in global income disparity (the 358 top global billionaires have the same income as the poorest 2.3 billion people in the world)⁴⁵ enhances the insecurities of those both with and without money; and 36 [1897] 1 Ch 196. See section 5.2.2 above.

37 [2000] Ch 162. See section 13.3.4.

38 It should be recalled that Sedley LJ has already made significant pronouncements on the role of equity and the treatment of injustice in relation to the formerly purely restitutionary defence of change of position in Niru Battery Manufacturing Co v Milestone Trading [2003] EWCA Civ 1446, para [152], as was discussed section 19.6.1.

39 Byrne, 1998.

40 Beck, 1992; Bauman, 1998.

41 Virilio, 2000.

42 Hayton and Cooke, 2000.

43 Eg, Hudson, 1998, 265, in relation to the use of collateral in financial derivatives transactions.

44 Gauthier, 1996.

45 Bauman, 2001, 85.

the environmental concerns evident in the deterioration of the global environment are all indicative of change. The upshot of these trends is an increase in insecurity and fear for individuals.⁴⁶ Rather than replacing one set of certainties with a new set, these changes have generated uncertainty and complexity. This complexity – mirrored in advanced physics⁴⁷ – engenders a form of social chaos in which individuals have become atomised⁴⁸ and the paths to social solidarity obfuscated.⁴⁹ The metaphor for chaos is one familiar to family lawyers:⁵⁰ it encapsulates the impossibility of creating a model to which family rules can be applied identically in all circumstances and recognises the need for principles which can be applied in a way that is sensitive to context.

Instead, the challenge for the English legal system is to recognise the changes which are occurring in society and to generate models which will deal effectively with this new complexity. Not that the norms need necessarily to change simply because society is going through observable change – although in socially sensitive areas such as labour and social security, legislative change is bound to be required by alterations in public policy. Rather, the legal system needs to recognise a different understanding of itself: not as a system of positivist rules which dictate behaviour to citizens, but rather as a system of rules, norms and structures which belong to those citizens – that is, a system of statute, common law and equity which presents means of resolving disputes between citizens and also offers them techniques which they can deploy for socially useful activities, such as the creation of co-operatives⁵¹ or other unincorporated associations,⁵² by manipulating concepts of contract and property. The goal for a legal system must be to cater for this level of social complexity in a way that is both principled and sensitive to context.

I suggest that equity offers a means of achieving this.

32.3.2 Borrowing from the science of complexity

As with the development of quantum physics, it is possible to identify simple events arising from an accumulation of unrelated episodes. Examples given are the well-known butterfly flapping its wings in Beijing and beginning a chain reaction which causes rain in New York. Other examples are the dripping tap which, despite the maintenance of a steady flow of water, lets water fall at occasionally irregular intervals as a result of random and chaotic factors outwith the control of the scientist-observer.⁵³ In short, an accumulation of simple events can lead to complex and unexpected conclusions.⁵⁴

Similarly, scientists point to the idea of complexity. In scientific terms, complexity considers the way in which simple phenomena can lead to complex results. The theory of complexity is a useful understanding of how a reactive, responsive justice system can operate

46 Giddens, 1991; Bauman, 2001, 83.

47 Cohen and Stewart, 1994.

48 Houellebecq, 2001.

49 Byrne, 1998.

50 Dewar, 1998.

51 Hudson, 2000:1, 276.

52 Chapter 4.

53 Gleick, 1988.

54 Capra uses this metaphorical trick to explain a post-Cartesian, Zen account of social relations and the need to adopt holistic approaches to everything from medicine to social relations: Capra, 1983.

in the context of a hyper-complex society. One frequent starting analogy is the simple phenomenon of wind leading a complex and unpredictable pattern of waves crashing onto land. Complexity is said to indicate the natural tendency for physical and biological systems to take this complexity and nevertheless produce regular patterns from it.⁵⁵ In short, a tendency for plants and animals to generate order out of chaos. The interaction of chaos and complexity theories illustrates the dialectic between pattern and disorder which we can observe in the social sciences as well as the natural sciences.⁵⁶

The production of just results out of a mixture of common law and equity perhaps responds to this metaphor. A complex and largely unpredictable mass of litigation comes to court and leads to a complex web of judicial decisions. However, those decisions are not entirely responsive solely to the dispute brought before the tribunal, but rather by reference to an overarching structure of decided case law. A semblance of order is thus made of the chaos: what will not happen is that the chaos and the complexity of our social relations will be removed.

32.4 EQUITY AND CHAOS

32.4.1 The psychology of order and chaos: common law and equity

The core argument is this: human beings crave order and are fearful of chaos.⁵⁷ In a world that is fundamentally chaotic, equity permits sufficiently flexible claims and remedies to address this chaos. Having suggested that the world is more complex than ever it was, we turn now to consider how a legal system should address that added complexity and the extraordinary diversity of claims over which it will be required to sit in judgment.

Freud creates one of the most famous dialectics in modern thought: that between the ego and the id in the human psyche. A well-balanced psyche will achieve its equilibrium through a synthesis of the conscious and unconscious represented by ego and id respectively. This metaphor is reminiscent of the manner in which the English legal system seeks to arrive at the ‘right answer’ in civil law cases by balancing the common law with equity.⁵⁸ Freud also posits the tendency of human beings to seek certainty as an instinct. This is said to be located in the awkward adaptation of human instincts (or human nature) to the cultural constraints of civilisation.⁵⁹ The tendency then is to focus the rational mind on the pursuit of certainty in law-making and in other activities so that chaotic and anarchic forces are repressed.⁶⁰ The balance is between order/ego and chaos/id: both are forces in the human psyche. Effective law-making would require a balance between formalism and flexibility; creating standards while accepting difference; synthesising common law and equity.

55 Lewin, 1993.

56 Cohen and Stewart, 1994, 6, who refer to this dialectic in terms of ‘simplicity and complicity’.

57 Freud, 1930.

58 Although it is true to say that not all legal problems will require that both common law and equity be put to work; but not all psychological issues necessarily require psychoanalysis either.

59 Freud, 1930, especially 288 et seq.

60 So with Weber, for example, the development of rationality is expected to remove the need for casuistic decision-making, permitting instead a bureaucratic formalism to hit upon the ‘right answer’ every time.

32.4.2 Reconstituting equity as a tool of social justice

Much has been made in this book of the uncertain world which has been created by the onward march of globalisation and a greater social complexity. What is apparent is that equity is applied (albeit carefully) in commercial cases and in cases involving homes more often than it is ever applied in cases involving social or personal welfare. The fiduciary categories of company director, agent, business partner and trustee are far more mature than are the comparable fiduciary duties in relation to the operation of public sector services. Equity has become a tool of commerce in the recent case law. Due to the inaccessible nature of the English legal system to most ordinary citizens,⁶¹ it is a head of claim deployed to prevent unconscionable behaviour between commercial people. In the discussion of express trusts in Chapter 7, it was pointed out that most of the major cases over the last 10 years have involved financial institutions. Aside from trusts of homes, few other cases involving trusts reach the High Court. The conscious express trust has all but extracted itself from mainstream equity; its terms are interpreted like a contract, as are the duties of its trustees.

The next stage for the law is to identify the way in which it can respond to the increased social complexity of the risk society. This book has argued for an understanding of law as a facilitator of communal and communicative action,⁶² in the manner suggested by Durkheim.⁶³ The models identified in this book can enable communities to act together. What is lacking is a clearly defined understanding of the fiduciary duties at issue here. The issue is that of a different context from the well-understood family trusts and the sophisticated structures of commercial investment entities. Each context is significantly different. A one-size-fits-all approach to the legal treatment of these structures will not be sufficient. Rather, our new, more complex society requires the development of legal principles which will allow the courts to be responsive to context and to the needs of the human beings involved in legal disputes.

32.4.3 Equity out of chaos in a risk society

The global economy is organised around risk: risk in terms of financial speculation; risk in terms of the broader range of decisions and choices which face most of our citizens; and risk in terms of the increased hazard posed by the activities of international corporations. Social change is visible in the changed roles of women over the latter half of the 20th century; the decline of the institution of marriage in many Western societies, and the greater appreciation of post-Cold War environmental catastrophe through ecological risk. Mass unemployment and deterioration in structures of belief in common goals and organised religion are the flip-side of income mobility, broader national and international career opportunities, and a greater tolerance of a plurality of belief. For Chomsky, these developments have occurred at great cost to the spiritual welfare of individuals, with a late-capitalist economy generating the illusion of lifechances as a mask for the multinational corporate power which has assumed a morally ambiguous control over world politics.⁶⁴ For Beck, the increase in social 61 As a result of cost and the inaccessibility of legal aid for most citizens: see Hudson, 1999:2, 19.

62 Habermas (1981), 1984.

63 Durkheim (1894), 1994.

64 Chomsky, 1999.

risk has derived from an increase in choices and has also caused a displacement of politics from its traditional arenas to more localised forums and groups.⁶⁵ Thus risk offers both opportunity and threat. For Giddens, the creation of what he terms ‘institutional reflexivity’ indicates both greater power in the hands of institutions and more profound existential problems associated with requiring individuals to make ever more complex life choices.⁶⁶ For all three there is a common link in their observation that the world has thrown greater risk on the individual citizen by means of an increasingly powerful global economy facilitating new connections, new industries and new sources of social power outwith the control of national governments.

For sociologists like Giddens, globalisation is something broader than the operation of financial markets across geographic boundaries.⁶⁷ Globalisation refers to a systematic change in social relations. The range of options produced creates problems for the individual in a way which a lack of choice never did.⁶⁸ It requires the individual to become bound up in investment activity through the structures discussed in this book in a number of ways – either through quasi-compulsory pensions arrangements,⁶⁹ or through a decision to invest personal capital, or (more fundamentally) simply by reliance on public services which are provided by quasi private sector investment structures like the PFI (private finance initiative) scheme or NHS trusts.⁷⁰ The techniques, in the best postmodern tradition, are both simple and very complex. This analysis of the variety of treatments of trusts has shown English law to be caught between very simple, intuitive ideas and subject matter too complex to analyse easily. The role of equity is to address itself to that form of social realignment: to provide justice in a more difficult and more complicated world than the one which produced trusts and other equitable doctrines originally.

This is a world of increased risk of many kinds: opportunity and choice, hazard and danger. The legal treatment of trusts must recognise that – whether involved in social investment (as with charities, co-operatives and so forth), or private welfare through investment (as with pension funds, unit trusts and so forth). Investment is a means of speculating on the hazard and volatility inherent in the global economy. Investment is a modish form of public policy which reduces the burden on central taxation and places it instead on the enthusiasm of venture capitalists for infrastructural projects underwritten by government. Investment is also, however, a means of expressing a commitment to each other and to our communal welfare by means of co-operative activity.⁷¹ It constitutes a profoundly humane understanding of the need to nurture our most precious resource: the talents and the aspirations of ordinary people.⁷²

65 Beck, 1992.

66 Beck, Giddens and Lash, 1994.

67 Giddens, 1994.

68 Giddens, 1991.

69 That is, not compulsory private pensions schemes but schemes which the citizen is ever more likely to have to acquire because of the phased reduction in the level and availability of the state pension.

70 Hudson, 2000:1, 309.

71 Maloney, Smith and Stoker, 2000, 212.

72 Sentiments associated with John Smith, 1994: ‘The scourges of poverty, unemployment and low skills are barriers, not only to opportunities for people, but to the creation of a dynamic and prosperous society. It is simply unacceptable to continue to waste our most precious resource – the extraordinary skills and talents of ordinary people.’

32.5 EQUITY, CULTURE AND POLITICS

32.5.1 Equity in the culture

Equity's role is both cultural and political. This section will consider the cultural place of equity. It is said that a definition of 'culture' is one of the most complex issues in the humanities.⁷³ The roots of property have been explained⁷⁴ as being planted in allocation of rights in land, growing in part out of human beings taking to agriculture. The roots of the term 'culture' are in 'coultur', meaning to cultivate – again, drawn from agriculture.⁷⁵ The word 'culture' itself can be juxtaposed with 'nature': human society transforms the natural into the cultural by civilising it and by ordering it. The cultural possibility of equity is contained in the series of lyrical core principles of equity set out in Chapter 1.⁷⁶ The morality evident in those core principles is primarily commercial, echoing the trade-based principles considered in Chapter 2.⁷⁷

To expose this commercial underbelly one needs only to probe some of the core equitable claims considered hitherto. For example, proprietary estoppel will be available only where the claimant has suffered some detriment broadly equivalent to consideration in contract;⁷⁸ equity will not assist a volunteer in general terms, even where that would enable a defendant to go back on an ordinary promise made to the claimant, thus underlying an amorality in the absence of some form of contract;⁷⁹ and equity will not permit unreasonable delays even where the merits of the case would otherwise have permitted a remedy.⁸⁰ The upshot is a form of equity which has developed historically to the benefit of commercial activities, thus expressing a cultural tendency in the law (alongside the requirement of consideration in the law of contract) to promote certainty in trade before any more common morality. In Chapter 3, we considered in detail the difference between obligations which would be enforced by equity as trusts and obligations which were merely moral duties not enforceable in equity.⁸¹

This conception of equity permits an understanding of the legal system as being something owned by the citizens and not something either positivist or based on an external morality. Equity is cultural as an expression of 'Englishness and Welshness'. Equity is political in that it facilitates a discourse about the practice of justice. Equity is political also to the extent that it gives power to the judiciary: to this extent, the study and description of equitable doctrine are themselves political acts in that they shape and describe citizens' rights. These cultural and political dynamics are potentially inclusive of citizens where they present a means by which citizens can shape the content of notions like 'good conscience' through litigation and dispute resolution.

73 Eagleton, 2000, 1.

74 See section 31.1 above.

75 Eagleton, 2000, 1.

76 See section 1.4 above.

77 See section 2.1 above.

78 Coombes v Smith [1986] 1 WLR 808: consideration itself demonstrating that contract law enforces only bargains but does not enforce mere promises made to volunteers.

79 See section 1.2 above.

80 See section 1.4 above.

81 See section 3.3 above.

32.5.2 Equity as something quintessentially English

Maitland remarks in his Essays on Equity that equity is quintessentially English.⁸² It seems to me that that is a very interesting attitude to equity. The point has already been made in section 31.3 that this comment of Maitland can be juxtaposed with the Roman law roots of the ideas asserted by the restitution lawyers.⁸³ But perhaps the more interesting aspect to this remark is identifying precisely what is meant by ‘Englishness’⁸⁴ on this model. What does it mean to say that equity is in some way English?⁸⁵

The notion of Englishness is a profoundly complex one, particularly at the time of writing. At the first level it is unclear what is meant by ‘English’ as opposed to ‘British’. Frequently, Englishness is identified with the world depicted by Evelyn Waugh, PG Wodehouse and EM Forster – that is, a world set in either Victorian or Edwardian England in which the confidence of Empire and economic expansion is relaxing into the promise of the early 20th century. Much of this attitude to Englishness finds its expression in historical hagiographies of the English, like Winston Churchill’s History of the English Speaking Peoples, on which Margaret Thatcher drew for a vision of the English as suffused with Viking blood and mixing doughty pragmatism with an indomitable island spirit.

When Maitland talks about the English, it should be remembered that his best-known work is in relation to legal history – a field which, it might be said, occasionally overlooks social history in favour of an approach based on ‘common law through the ages’. Maitland’s own attitude to history (and that of other ‘Whig’ historians) is criticised by Davies in his history of Britain and Britons, The Isles,⁸⁶ in the following terms:

FW Maitland (1824–97), Downing Professor of Law at Cambridge, whose History of English Law (1895) took the narrative up to the critical reign of Henry III. Despite their immense erudition, and their enormous services to the subject, all these scholars positively crowed with nationalistic self-satisfaction . . . As for Maitland, the legalist par excellence, he saw an unbreakable bond between the Common Law and ‘our land and race’; and he eulogised the judges of Henry III’s reign . . . History in the hands of lawyers will always turn lawyers into heroes.

While the historians like Maitland identify something marvellous in their history of England, for the most part they ignore the real facts about England at the time. For example, Richard the Lionheart is generally presented as the saviour of a nation in Robin Hood films. In fact England was ruled by the Plantagenets (like Richard I) who were French by birth and the language of the law and of the court was French until the time of Henry VIII. England was nothing more than an occupied territory within a larger kingdom. The king would turn his attention to England only if there were occasionally wars of subjugation to be fought. The 82 Maitland, 1936, 1.

83 Hackney, 1997.

84 Wrapped up in this phrase, ‘English’ in this context is necessarily a notion of ‘Welshness’ given that the jurisdiction is that of England and Wales. The reader will please excuse a lack of reference to Welshness given the comments which are made below about the manner in which an idea of Englishness is played out in the literature.

85 Or Welsh.

86 Davies, 1999.

attentions of these kings were generally turned outwards from France; towards the Middle East.⁸⁷ The official language of the English Royal Court was French; the kings spoke French and not English; English itself did not exist as a single, formal language at the time.⁸⁸ And yet the development of a system of common law by the Norman kings and subsequently by the Plantagenets was eulogised as being part of the creation of the indomitable English spirit.

The English were ruled from overseas. Even the term ‘Anglo-Saxon’ acknowledges that the native English were ruled by the Angles and the Saxons after the Romans had left. The only parts of the British Isles peopled solely by ‘native’ Britons were Wales and Scotland. The term ‘Briton’ itself is thought to derive from Brutus, son of Aeneas, who was believed to have settled in England after the fall of Troy and founded London.⁸⁹ Then came the Norman Conquest to replace the work of Alfred the Great in attempting to forge a coherent culture for the tribes over which he had authority. The ensuing history of England up to the Reformation, although frequently presented as a seamless narrative by historians, was in fact a history of rule by the French and internecine strife between members of a variety of French royal families (for example, the accession of Stephen to the throne in 1135).⁹⁰

It is with the Reformation, during which Henry VIII replaced the Catholic church with the Church of England as the dominant creed, that the churches were dispossessed and replaced by English customs which drew heavily on the pre-existing traditions but with the king replacing the Pope as head of the church and Defender of the Faith. Tudor England grew as a trading nation, with London, in particular, flourishing. This spirit of self-confidence continued in the reign of Elizabeth I and founded much of the modern enthusiasm among the English for their adopted Englishness. Only under Victoria was there to be a similarly enthusiastic expression of Englishness in the form of the ‘British’ character and the British Empire.

So what does this tell us about Maitland’s determination that equity is somehow English? Throughout the Tudor period, the Lords Chancellor became more powerful. Ever more writs were served by the Lord Chancellor, and more and more forms of action were generated during that period. The generation of equity therefore grew out of the increasing political power of the Chancery and the power of men like Thomas More and Thomas Cromwell – as depicted gloriously in Robert Bolt’s play A Man for All Seasons. And yet the legal principles which were adopted by the Courts of Chancery at this time developed a series of propositions (outlined in Chapter 1 above) which Snell was able to record at the turn of the 19th century in his book on Equity.⁹¹ Those principles were an expression of morality which gave way over time to rigid rules dealing with trusts, injunctions and so forth.⁹² Equity is therefore cultural in that it is part of English history – part of a nation’s attempt to forge its own identity under Henry VIII and Elizabeth I. It is the culture of a powerful, emerging bureaucracy under the Lord Chancellor, who (at the time of writing) remains a great constitutional anomaly with a presence in the executive, the judiciary and the legislature. The practice of equity emerged from the politics of the 16th century. It is part of our culture and, for good or ill, part of our island’s story.

87 Richard, Coeur de Lion, for example, spent only six months of his 10-year reign as King of England actually in England.

88 Davies, 1999.

89 Ackroyd, 2000.

90 Even the taking of the name ‘Stephen’ by the king concealed the fact that his birth-name was ‘Etienne’.

91 See section 1.4 above.

92 Gardner, 1996.

What is plain is that the nature of equity as something English has developed with time – and that equity will continue to develop. The argument was made in section 31.3 that restitution is almost an unnecessary adjunct to equity – beyond the valuable, technical work done by restitution lawyers on the frequent incoherence identifiable in the law of trusts. Some of the frequent objections made to the introduction of a code of restitution are based on restitution's place as a part of Roman law and not as a part of English law.⁹³ As such, that part of the argument is based on a preference for something English over something European on a civil code model – those continental European jurisdictions being based on Roman law.⁹⁴

However, it is not clear that modern European thinking is necessarily tied up with Roman law; rather, a different set of principles based on proportionality, freedom of movement and so forth has been developed. These freedoms seem to work at two levels: economic liberties within the European Economic Community; and principles of procedural justice such as proportionality. These ideas have already permeated public law, but private law has been much more reluctant to adopt them. There are perhaps broad comparators between concepts like equitable estoppel in private law and concepts like legitimate expectations in public law.⁹⁵ Alternatively, perhaps equity offers a means of meeting the new social complexity and of achieving a measure of social justice. This issue is considered next.

32.6 THE GOALS OF EQUITY

So why should equity be retained? Is it not simply another example of the British theme-park constitution which ought to be discarded? I think not. Equity is necessary to achieve a number of socially desirable goals: to protect the liberties and rights of the individual;⁹⁶ to ensure fairness through conscionable behaviour;⁹⁷ and to ensure equal access to justice.⁹⁸ To take each in turn. The liberties of the individual are capable of being protected only if a system of dispute resolution and justice recognises that there is a need to consider individual cases on their own merits. Individual liberties can also be protected at a political, as well as at a legal, level by means of accepting those rights as being human rights. As considered in Chapter 17, there are differences between the philosophies of human rights and equity: the former being avowedly political in nature, while the latter are primarily juristic.

The role of the Lord Chancellor was to act as Keeper of the Sovereign's Conscience – sometimes being an ecclesiastic and at other times being a secular lawyer. Thus the concept of conscience came to inhabit the remit of the Courts of Chancery. The courts therefore developed a principle of acting in personam in relation to the behaviour of the individual defendant. Protecting the liberties of the citizenry through equity meant ensuring that as a matter of private law no one person could act unconscionably in relation to any other person.

93 See section 31.3 above.

94 Given the membership of the United Kingdom in the European Union, perhaps there is an argument that equity ought to adopt more Roman principles to bring English law more in line with European thinking: Hayton, 2000.

95 As expressed in R v North and East Devon Health Authority ex p Coughlan [2000] 3 All ER 850 in the development of a principle by which an applicant can seek an order in public law for the efficacy of some representation or assurance made to them forming a legitimate expectation in their mind.

96 See section 1.1 and the discussion of Aristotle and Hegel.

97 Rawls, 1971 and 1985: discussion of justice through fairness as a principle of 'fair play'.

98 Hudson, 1999:2, 91.

The maintenance of equitable behaviour through litigation is dependent on all citizens being able to access the courts, and thus being equal before the law as a matter of practice. Such a discussion clearly takes us into issues as to the structure of the legal system, the availability of legal aid and so forth. It is this writer's view, expressed elsewhere, that the Woolf reforms⁹⁹ and the limping modernisation of the English legal system do not amount to the provision of an equally-accessible, citizen-orientated public service.¹⁰⁰ Again, the role of equity is to ensure equality: two words ('equity' and 'equality') sharing a common etymological root – to be free and to be equally free.¹⁰¹

In a world in which technology enables us to talk intimately and instantaneously with people in other parts of the world, when many of us live in cities where we hardly know our next door neighbours, we are in danger of overreaching the individual. As Virilio shows us, technology enables cars to hurtle past us, aeroplanes and faxes to pass over us, and our own selves to shrink within the power of the machines that move us, help us and watch us.¹⁰² As part of this late modernity there is a need for people to communicate one with another to shape the norms which drive our lifeworld.¹⁰³ To maintain the social legitimacy of our institutions it is important that people are connected and feel an ownership of the means of dispute resolution through the justice system.¹⁰⁴ Now is not the place to engage with such a broad debate about the good and ill of the justice system. However, one thing can be said in the context of this book. By maintaining a system of equity we give individuals a chance to speak and to have their concerns heard outwith the rigidities of the common law. Equity enables our individual voices to be heard in the tempest of technological innovation.

32.7 IN CONCLUSION

There is something remarkably humane, in this writer's opinion, in the development of equity. This final essay has sought to capture something of the passion bound up in the historical development of equity – from the early days of the burgeoning numbers of writs served by the Lords Chancellor, to equity's troubled transition from heraldic artefact to standard bearer of social justice in the 21st century.¹⁰⁵ Beyond that there is in equity a possibility of providing for justice on its own terms on a case-by-case basis. Within the positivist demands of the common law there is a need to create a space in which private law can give effect to a basic morality to do with achieving fair results in individual cases. Under the umbrella of such a jurisdiction, human beings can be recognised as individuals with their own very personal motivations, commitments and beliefs, and not simply be dealt with just as litigants against whom abstract rules are to be enforced. We have little difficulty in accepting that there is something different in each human being¹⁰⁶ but, yet, in our law-making we assume too often that all cases can be resolved by reference to the same norms.¹⁰⁷ It is

99 Hudson, 1999:2, 167.

100 Ibid, 256.

101 Rawls, 1985.

102 Virilio, 1986 and 2000.

103 Habermas (1981), 1984.

104 Habermas, 1972.

105 See section 17.5 above.

106 Hudson, 2004:2.

107 Habermas (1992), 1996, 151 et seq, 222 et seq.

suggested that those norms must always be flexible enough to permit of individual difference, to leave sufficient room for fair application.

What is needed is a structure within which justice can be generated by the establishment of rules by which each citizen is required to live. This is the external morality which is created in part by equity's notion of conscience. What is also required is a means of ensuring that the advancement of the many does not allow the casual oppression of the individual. This balancing act is achieved supremely well by the juxtaposition of common law and equity as classically understood. Consequently, any attempt to rigidify equity is to be resisted. What modern thought has achieved through the philosophy of Nietzsche, as adopted by the post-structuralists like Foucault and Derrida and the existentialists like Sartre and Camus, is an innate suspicion of any assertion to fundamental truth or any claim to legitimacy. In such terms, to claim that the uncertain world which is policed by equity can be reduced to a series of tightly prescribed rules is entirely to ignore the one true advance in human thought in the wake of the Second World War – that there can never be such unthinking confidence in our assumptions again.

As Freud has told us, there is much in the make-up of the individual psyche which, while conforming to some general patterns, will be made up of impulses as individual as dreams, personal mythologies and individual experience.¹⁰⁸ For Jung, there is much store to be placed in the spiritual interactions between the personal space and the collective unconscious.¹⁰⁹ In either case, the exchange of impulses between the one and the many is sophisticated and intricate. What Freud and Marx also did for human thought was to open up the possibility of reasoning by deductive logic and ideology, without necessarily needing every assertion to be capable of empirical proof.¹¹⁰ From such epistemological advances we can recognise in law-making a desire to achieve order through law, and in our society a concomitant desire to achieve social justice: that is, to balance a desire for simplicity in the order of our social relations with an appreciation of the complexity necessarily bound up in the lives of millions of individuals.¹¹¹ So, in delineating the respective spaces of common law and equity, it is important to ensure that a balance is maintained between the two – that the willowy suppleness of equity is not displaced by a brittle demand for common law certainty.¹¹²

It is only through equity that our machines of justice can appreciate and meet the intrinsic chaos in our social relations. That is the only way in which we can extricate the human being from the impersonal machinery of the legal system. The flexibility of equity brings equilibrium to our private law in balance with the certainties of common law. Through this synergy we can achieve harmony. We must resist the temptation to impose too much order on what will remain a fundamentally chaotic universe.

108 Freud, 1923.

109 Jung, 1927.

110 Geuss, 1981.

111 Cohen and Stewart, 1994.

112 As suggested by the model of restitution advanced, inter alia, by Beatson, 1991.

Bibliography

- Ackroyd, P, London: Biography of a City, 2000, London: Chatto & Windus
- Adams, J, (1975) 39 Conv 94
- Adams, J and Frantz, D, A Full Service Bank: How BCCI stole billions around the world, A Full Service Bank: How BCCI stole billions around the world, London: Simon & Schuster
- Adorno, T, 'Subject and object', in Arato, A and Gerbhardt, E (eds), The Essential Frankfurt School Reader, 1978, New York: Continuum
- Allen, 'Bribes and constructive trusts: A-G Hong Kong v Reid' (1995) 58 MLR 87
- American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law of Restitution, 1937, St Paul, Minn: ALI
- American Law Institute, Restatement of Trusts, 2nd edn, 1959, St Paul, Minn: ALI
- Annetta, V, 'Priority rights in insolvency – the doctrinal basis for equity's intervention' (1992) 20 ABLR 311
- Arendt, H, The Human Condition, 2nd edn, 1958, Chicago: Chicago University Press
- Aristotle, The Nicomachean Ethics, 1955, Thomson (trans), Harmondsworth: Penguin
- Arora, A, 'The bank's liability as a constructive trustee' [1990] JBL 217
- Arrowsmith, S, 'Ineffective transactions and unjust enrichment: a framework for analysis' (1989) 9 LS 121
- Atiyah, P, The Rise and Fall of Freedom of Contract, 1979, Oxford: Clarendon
- Atiyah, P, Essays on Contract, 1986, Oxford: Clarendon
- Auchmuty, R, 'The fiction of equity', in Scott-Hunt, S and Lim, H (eds), Feminist Perspectives on Equity and Trusts, ed., 2001, London: Cavendish, 1
- Austin, R, 'Constructive trusts', in Finn, P (ed), Essays in Equity, 1985, Sydney: LBC, 196
- Bainham, M, Children: The Modern Law, 1998, Bristol: Family Law
- Baker, P and Langan, P, Snell's Principles of Equity, 29th edn, 1990, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Bamforth, N, 'Unconscionability as a vitiating factor' [1995] LMCLQ 538
- Barker, K, 'Rescuing remedialism in unjust enrichment law: why remedies are right' [1998] CLJ 301
- Barlow, A, 'Rights in the family home: time for a conceptual revolution?', in Hudson, AS (ed), New Perspectives on Property Law, Human Rights and the Home, 2003, London: Cavendish Publishing, 53
- Barnsley, DG, 'Co-owners' rights to occupy trust land' [1998] CLJ 123
- Bartlett, R, 'When is a "trust" not a trust? The National Health Service Trust' [1996] Conv 186
- Battersby [1995] CFLQ 59
- Bauman, Z, Postmodernity and its Discontents, 1997, Cambridge: Polity
- Bauman, Z, Globalisation, 1998, Cambridge: Polity
- Bauman, Z, Community, 2000, Cambridge: Polity
- Bauman, Z, The Individualised Society, 2001, Cambridge: Polity
- Beatson, J, 'Restitutionary remedies for void and ineffective contracts' (1989) 105 LQR 179
- Beatson, J, Use and Abuse of Unjust Enrichment, 1991, Oxford: Clarendon
- Beatson, J, 'The relationship between regulations governing the financial services industry and fiduciary duties under the general law', in McKendrick, E, Commercial Aspects of Trusts and Fiduciary Obligations, 1992, Oxford: Clarendon, 55

- Beck, U, The Risk Society, 1992, London: Sage
- Beck, U, Giddens, A and Lash, S, Reflexive Modernization, 1994, Cambridge: Polity
- Benjamin, J, The Law of Global Custody, 1996, London: Butterworths
- Benjamin, J, Interests in Securities, 2000, Oxford: Oxford University Press
- Bevan, A, In Place of Fear (1952), 1978, London: Quartet
- Birks, P, Introduction to the Law of Restitution, 1989, Oxford: Clarendon (1989:1)
- Birks, P, 'Misdirected funds' (1989) 105 LQR 258 (1989:2)
- Birks, P, 'The English recognition of unjust enrichment' [1991] LMCLQ 473
- Birks, P, 'Mixing and tracing' (1992) 45(2) CLP 69
- Birks, P, 'Restitution and resulting trusts', in Goldstein (ed), Equity: Contemporary Legal Developments, 1992, Jerusalem, 335
- Birks, P, 'Persistent problems in misdirected money' [1993] LMCLQ 218 (1993:1)
- Birks, P, 'No consideration: restitution after void contracts' (1993) 23 UWALR 195 (1993:2)
- Birks, P, 'Establishing a proprietary base' [1995] RLR 83 (1995:1)
- Birks, P, 'Overview: tracing, claiming and defences', in Birks, P (ed), Laundering and Tracing, 1995, Oxford: Clarendon, 289 (1995:2)
- Birks, P, (1995) 9 Trusts Law International 91 (1995:3)
- Birks, P, 'Equity in the modern law: an exercise in taxonomy' (1996) 26 UWALR 1
- Birks, P, 'Inconsistency between compensation and restitution' (1996) 112 LQR 375 (1996:1)
- Birks, P, 'Trusts raised to avoid unjust enrichment: the Westdeutsche case' [1996] RLR 3 (1996:2)
- Birks, P, 'Tracing, subrogation and change of position' (1996) 8 Trusts Law International 2 (1996:3)
- Birks, P, 'On taking seriously the difference between tracing and claiming' (1997) 11 Trusts Law International 2
- Birks, P, 'Definition and division: a meditation on Institutes 313', in Birks, P (ed), The Classification of Obligations, 1997, Oxford: Clarendon, 1 (1997:2)
- Birks, P, 'The burden on the bank', in Rose, F (ed), Restitution and Banking Law, 1998, Oxford: Mansfield, 189 (1998:1)
- Birks, P, 'Misnomer', in Cornish, W, Nolan, R, O'Sullivan, J and Virgo, G (eds), Restitution, Present and Future: Essays in Honour of Gareth Jones, 1998, Oxford: Hart, 1 (1998:2)
- Birks, P, 'Rights, wrongs and remedies' (2000) OJLS 1 (2000:1)
- Birks, P, 'Epilogue', in Birks, P and Rose, F (eds), Resulting Trusts and Equitable Compensation, 2000, London: Mansfield, 261 (2000:2)
- Birks, P, (ed), Private Law, 2000, Oxford: Oxford University Press (2000:3)
- Birks, P, 'The content of fiduciary obligations' (2002) 16 Trusts Law International 34
- Birks, P, 'Receipt', in Birks, P and Pretto, A (eds), Breach of Trust, 2002, Oxford: Hart (2002:2)
- Birks, P, 'Knowing receipt', in Birks, P and Pretto, A (eds), Breach of Trust, 2002, Oxford: Hart (2002:3)
- Birks, P, Unjust Enrichment, 2003, Oxford: Oxford University Press
- Birks, P and Chambers, R, Restitution Research Resource, 1997, Oxford: Mansfield, 1–6 (1997:1)
- Birks, P and Pretto, A (eds), Breach of Trust, 2002, Oxford: Hart (2002:1)
- Black, J, Rules and Regulators, 1997, Oxford: Clarendon
- Blair, A, The Third Way: New Politics for the New Century, Fabian Pamphlet 588, 1998, London: The Fabian Society
- Blair, W, Allison, A, Morton, G, Richards-Carpenter, P, Walker, G and Walmsley, N, Banking and Financial Services Regulation, 3rd edn, London: Butterworths, 2003
- Bostock, C, Aristotle's Ethics, 2000, Oxford: Oxford University Press
- Bottomley, A, 'Our property in trust: things to make and do', in Scott-Hunt, S and Lim, H (eds), Feminist Perspectives on Equity and Trusts, 2001, London: Cavendish Publishing
- Brealey, RA and Myers, SC, Principles of Corporate Finance, 5th edn, 1996; 6th edn, 1998, Toronto: McGraw Hill
- Bridge, M, Personal Property Law, 2nd edn, 1996, London: Blackstone

- Bryan, M, 'The conscience of equity in Australia' (1990) 106 LQR 25
- Burn, E, Cheshire and Burn's The Law of Real Property, 15th edn, 1994, London: Butterworths
- Burrows, A (ed), Essays in the Law of Restitution, 1991, Oxford: Clarendon (1991:1)
- Burrows, A, 'Public authorities, ultra vires and restitution', in Burrows, A (ed), Essays in the Law of Restitution, 1991, Oxford: Clarendon (1991:2)
- Burrows, A, The Law of Restitution, 1993; 2nd edn, 2002, London: Butterworths
- Burrows, A, Remedies in Contract and Tort, 2nd edn, 1994, London: Butterworths
- Burrows, A, 'Swaps and friction between common law and equity' [1995] RLR 15
- Burrows, A, 'Understanding the law of restitution: a map through the thicket', in Understanding the Law of Obligations, 1998, Oxford: Hart, 45
- Burrows, A, 'Proprietary restitution: unmasking unjust enrichment' (2001) 117 LQR 412
- Burrows, A, 'We do this at common law but that in equity' (2002) 22 OJLS 1
- Burrows, A and McKendrick, E, The Law of Restitution, 1997, Oxford: Oxford University Press
- Buxton, R, 'The Human Rights Act and private law' (2000) 116 LQR 48
- Byrne, D, Complexity Theory and the Social Sciences, 1998, London: Routledge
- Byrne, D, Social Exclusion, 1999, Buckingham: Open University Press
- Campbell, D, 'Facism and legality' (1946) 62 LQR 141
- Capra, F, The Turning Point, 1983, London: Fontana
- Carr, A and McNulty, M, The Handbook of Clinical Adult Psychology, 2006, London: Routledge
- Chambers, R, 'Restitution, trusts and compound interest' (1996) 20 Mel UL Rev 848
- Chambers, R, Resulting Trusts, 1997, Oxford: Clarendon
- Chambers, R, 'Constructive trusts in Canada', Pt 1 (2001) 15 Trusts Law International 214; and Pt 2 (2002) 16 Trusts Law International 2
- Cheshire, GC and Burn, EH, The Law of Real Property, 16th edn, 2000, London: Butterworths
- Chesterman, M, 'Foundations of charity law in the new Welfare State' (1999) 62 MLR 333
- Chitty on Contracts*, 27th edn, 1994, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Chomsky, N, Profit Over People, 1999, New York: Seven Stories
- Chomsky, N, The New Military Humanism, 2000, London: Pluto
- Clapham, N, Human Rights in the Private Sphere, 1993, Oxford: Clarendon
- Clark, JB, Theobald on Wills, 15th edn, 1993, London: Sweet & Maxwell, 646
- Clarke, A, 'Property law' (1995) 48 CLP 117
- Cohen, J and Stewart, I, The Collapse of Chaos – Discovering Simplicity in a Chaotic World, 1994, Harmondsworth: Penguin
- Collins, L, Dacey and Morris on the Conflict of Laws, 12th edn, 1993, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Conaglen, M, 'Equitable compensation for breach of fiduciary dealing rules' (2003) 119 LQR 246
- Cooke, A and Hayton, D, 'Land law and trusts', in Hayton, D (ed), Law's Futures, 2000, Oxford: Hart, 433
- Cooke, E, 'Equitable accounting' [1995] Conv 391
- Cooke, E, The Modern Law of Estoppel, 2000, Oxford: Clarendon
- Cooke, E, 'In the wake of Stack v Dowden: the tale of TR1' [2011] Fam Law 1142
- Cotterrell, R, Sociology of Law, 1993, London: Butterworths (1993:1)
- Cotterrell, R, 'Trusting in law: legal and moral concepts of trust' (1993) 46(2) CLP 75 (1993:2)
- Cotterrell, R, Law's Community, 1995, Oxford: Clarendon
- Cotterrell, R, Emile Durkheim – Law in a Moral Domain, 1999, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press
- Cowan, D, 'Banks, swaps, restitution and equity' [1993] LMCLQ 300
- Cowan, D, Housing Law and Policy, 1999, London: Macmillan
- Crane, R, 'After the deserted wife's licence', (1965) 29 The Conveyancer, 254
- Cranston, R, Principles of Banking Law, 1997, Oxford: Oxford University Press
- Cretney, S, Family Law in the Twentieth Century: A History, 2005, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Cretney, S and Masson, J, Principles of Family Law, 1997, London: Sweet & Maxwell

- Croft, C, 'Lord Hardwicke's use of precedent in equity' (1989) Aust Bar Rev 29
- Cross (1956) 72 LQR 182
- Davern, R, 'The problem with bare trusts in contractual contexts' (1997/98) 8 KCLJ 86
- Davern, R, 'Common law tracing, profits and the doctrine of relation back' [1997] RLR 92
- Davey, N, (1988) 8 LS 92
- Davies, N, The Isles, 1999, London: Macmillan
- Deakin, S and Morris, G, Labour Law, 1998, London: Butterworths
- Della Fave, R, 'The meek shall not inherit the earth' (1980) 45 American Soc Rev 955
- Denning, The Due Process of Law, 1980, London: Butterworths
- Dewar, J, 'The development of the remedial constructive trust' (1982) 60 Can BR 265
- Dewar, J, Law and the Family, 2nd edn, 1992, London: Butterworths
- Dewar, J, 'The normal chaos of family life' (1998) 61 MLR 467
- Dixon, M, 'The never-ending story: co-ownership after Stack v Dowden' (2007) 71 Conv 456
- Douzinas, C, The End of Human Rights, 2000, Oxford: Hart
- Durkheim, E, The Division of Labour (1894), 1994, London: Macmillan
- Duxbury, N, The Nature and Authority of Precedent, 2008, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press
- Dworkin, R, Law's Empire, 1986, Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University Press
- Eagleton, T, The Idea of Culture, 2000, Oxford: Blackwell
- East, R, Social Security Law, 1999, London: Macmillan
- Eleftheriadis, P, 'The analysis of property rights' (1996) OJLS 31
- Elias, G, Explaining Constructive Trusts, 1990, Oxford: Clarendon
- Elias, N, The Society of Individuals, 2001, New York: Continuum
- Elliott, S and Mitchell, C, 'Remedies for dishonest assistance' (2004) 67 MLR 16
- Emery, C, 'The most hallowed principle – certainty of beneficiaries of trusts and powers of appointment' (1982) 98 LQR 551
- Encarta World Dictionary*, Hudson (ed), 'Law', 1999, London: Bloomsbury
- Enzensberger, HM, Mediocrity and Delusion, Collected Diversions, 1992, London: Verso
- Esping-Andersen, G, Three Worlds of Welfare Capitalism, 1990, Cambridge: Polity
- Etzioni, A, The Spirit of Community, 1993, New York: Crown Publishers
- Evans, J, 'Economic globalisation: the need for a social dimension', in Foden, D and Morris, P (eds), The Search for Equity, 1998, London: Lawrence and Wishart
- Evans, S, 'Rethinking tracing and the law of restitution' (1999) 115 LQR 469
- Ewing, K, 'Democracy or juristocracy in Britain?', in Ewing, K, Gearty, C and Hepple, B (eds), Human Rights and Labour Law, 1994, London: Mansell, 147
- Ewing, K and Gearty, C, The Struggle for Civil Liberties, 2000, Oxford: Oxford University Press
- Ferguson, P, 'Constructive trusts: a note of caution' (1993) 109 LQR 114
- Finn, P (ed), Fiduciary Obligations, 1977, Sydney: LBC
- Finn, P (ed), Essays in Equity, 1985, Sydney: LBC
- Finn, P (ed), Equity and Commercial Relationships, 1985, Sydney: LBC (1985:1)
- Finn, P (ed), Essays on Restitution, 1990, Sydney: LBC
- Finn, P, 'Fiduciary law in the modern commercial world', in McKendrick, E (ed), Commercial Aspects of Trusts and Fiduciary Obligations, 1992, Oxford: Clarendon
- Ford, H, 'Public unit trusts', in Austin, RP and Vann, R (eds), The Law of Public Company Finance, 1986, Sydney: LBC, 400
- Ford, H and Lee, W, The Law of Trusts, 3rd edn, 1996, Sydney: LBC
- Foucault, M, The Archaeology of Knowledge (1969), 1972, London: Tavistock
- Foucault, M, The History of Sexuality (1976), 1979, London: Allen Lane
- Foucault, M, Power/Knowledge: Selected Interviews and Other Writings 1972–1977, Gordon (ed), 1981, London: Routledge
- Fox, D, 'Constructive notice and knowing receipt: an economic analysis' [1998] CLJ 391
- Freedland, 'Public and private finance' [1998] PL 288

- Freud, S, Beyond The Pleasure Principle, 1923, Harmondsworth: Penguin
- Freud, S, Civilisation and its Discontents, 1930, Harmondsworth: Penguin
- Fridman, 'The reach of restitution' (1991) 11 LS 304
- Fried, C, Contract as Promise, 1981, Oxford: Clarendon
- Friedmann, D, (1991) 11 LS 304
- Friedmann, D and Cohen, N, The International Encyclopaedia of Comparative Law, 1991, Lancaster, 24n 177
- Fukuyama, F, The End of History and the Last Man, 1992, New York: Free Press
- Fukuyama, F, Trust, 1995, London: Hamish Hamilton
- Fuller, L, The Morality of Law, 1964, New Haven: Yale University Press
- Gardner, S, Introduction to the Law of Trusts, 1990, Oxford: Clarendon
- Gardner, S, 'Rethinking family property' (1993) 109 LQR 263
- Gardner, S, 'Rethinking family property' (1996) 112 LQR 56
- Gardner, S and Davidson, K, 'The future of Stack v Dowden' (2011) 127 LQR 13
- Garton, J, 'The role of the trust mechanism in the rule in Re Rose' [2003] Conv 364
- Gauthier, AH, The State and the Family, 1996, Oxford: Clarendon
- Gearty, C and Tomkins, A, 'Constitutional and human rights law', in Hayton, D (ed), Law's Futures, 2000, Oxford: Hart
- Getzler, J, Rationalizing Property, Equity and Trusts, 2003, London: LexisNexis
- Geuss, R, The Idea of a Critical Theory, 1981, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press
- Giddens, A, Modernity and Self-Identity, 1991, Cambridge: Polity
- Giddens, A, Beyond Left and Right, 1994, Cambridge: Polity
- Giddens, A, The Third Way: The Renewal of Social Democracy, 1998, Cambridge: Polity
- Gleeson, S, 'The involuntary launderer: the banker's liability for deposits of the proceeds of crime', in Birks, P (ed), Laundering and Tracing, 1995, Oxford: Clarendon, 115
- Gleick, J, Chaos: Making a New Science, 1988, London: Heinemann
- Glover, J, 'Bankruptcy and constructive trusts' (1991) 19 ABLR 98
- Goff, R and Jones, G, The Law of Restitution, 6th edn, 2002, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Goode, R, (1983) 3 LS 283
- Goode, R, 'Ownership and obligation in commercial transactions' (1987) 103 LQR 433
- Goode, R, 'Property and unjust enrichment', in Burrows, A (ed), Essays on Restitution, 1991, Oxford: Clarendon, Chapter 9
- Goode, R, 'Charges over book debts: a missed opportunity' (1994) 110 LQR 592
- Goode, R, Principles of Corporate Insolvency Law, 2nd edn, 1997, London: Sweet & Maxwell (1997:1)
- Goode, R, Commercial Law, 2nd edn, 1997, Harmondsworth: Penguin (1997:2)
- Goode, R, Commercial Law in the Next Millennium – The Hamlyn Lectures 1998, 1998, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Goodrich, P, The Language of Law, 1990, London: Weidenfeld & Nicholson
- Goulding, S, 'Equity and the money-launderers' [1992] Conv 367
- Grantham, R, 'Doctrinal bases for the recognition of proprietary rights' (1996) OJLS 561 (1996:1)
- Grantham, R, 'Restitution, property and ignorance – a reply to Mr Swadling' [1996] LMCLQ 463 (1996:2)
- Grantham, R and Rickett, C, 'Trust money as an unjust enrichment: a misconception' [1988] LMCLQ 514
- Grantham, R and Rickett, C, 'On the subsidiarity of unjust enrichment' (2001) 117 LQR 273
- Gravells, N, 'Public purpose trusts' (1977) 40 MLR 397
- Gray, K, 'Equitable property' [1994] CLP 157
- Gray, K and Gray, F, Elements of Land Law, 3rd edn, 2001, London: Butterworths
- Gray, K and Gray, F, Elements of Land Law, 6th edn, 2009, London: Butterworths
- Grbich, Y, 'Baden: awakening the conceptually moribund trust' (1974) 37 MLR 643

- Green, B, 'The dissolution of unincorporated non-profit associations' (1980) 43 MLR 626
- Green, B, 'Grey, Oughtred and Vandervell – a contextual reappraisal' (1984) 47 MLR 385
- Greer, S and White, A, Abolishing the Diplock Courts, 1986, London: Cobden Trust
- Griffiths, G, 'Missed or misguided? Formality, land contracts and the statute of frauds', in Hudson, AS (ed), New Perspectives on Property Law, Obligations and Restitution, 2003, London: Cavendish Publishing
- Grosz, S, Beatson, J, Duffy, P, Gearty, C et al, Human Rights, 2000, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Grubb, A, 'Powers, trusts and classes of objects' [1982] Conv 432
- Gummow J, 'Unjust enrichment, restitution and proprietary remedies', in Finn, PD (ed), Essays on Restitution, 1990, Sydney: LBC, Chapter 3
- Habermas, J, Theory of Communicative Action (1981), 1984, Boston: Beacon
- Habermas, J, Legitimation Crisis (1973), 1988, Cambridge: Polity
- Habermas, J, 'The rectifying revolution' (1990) 183 New Left Rev 3
- Habermas, J, Beyond Facts and Norms (1992), 1996, Cambridge: Polity
- Hackney, J, Understanding Equity and Trusts, 1987, London: Fontana
- Hackney, J, 'A trace of the old philosophy', in Birks, P (ed), The Classification of Obligations, 1997, Oxford: Clarendon
- Ham, R, 'Trustees' liability' (1995) 9 Trusts Law International 21
- Hammond (1990) 106 LQR 207
- Hanbury, HG, Essays in Equity, 1934, Oxford: Clarendon
- Hanbury, HG, Modern Equity, 1st edn, 1935, London: Stevens
- Hanbury, HG and Martin, J, Modern Equity, 13th edn, 1993, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Hardt, M and Negri, A, Empire, 2000, Cambridge: Harvard University Press
- Hardy Ivamy, ER, Underhill's Principles of the Law of Partnership, 12th edn, 1986, London: Butterworths
- Harpum, C, 'The stranger as constructive trustee' (1986) 102 LQR 114
- Harpum, C, 'Overreaching, trustee's powers, and the reform of the 1925 legislation' (1990) 49 CLJ 277
- Harpum, C, [1991] CLJ 409
- Harpum, C, 'The basis of equitable liability' in Birks, P (ed), The Frontiers of Liability, Vol 1, 1994, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 9
- Harpum, C, 'Knowing assistance and knowing receipt: the basis for equitable liability', in Birks, P (ed), The Frontiers of Liability, 1994, Oxford: Clarendon (1994:1)
- Harpum, C, 'Accessory liability for procuring or assisting a breach of trust' (1995) 111 LQR 545
- Harpum, C, Megarry and Wade's Law of Real Property, 6th edn, 2000, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Harris, J, 'Trust, power, or duty' (1971) 87 LQR 31
- Harris, J, (1975) 38 MLR 557
- Harris, J, Variation of Trusts, 1975, London: Sweet & Maxwell (1975:1)
- Harris, J, Property and Justice, 1996, Oxford: Oxford University Press
- Harris, T, The Hague Trusts Convention, 2002, Oxford: Hart
- Hayes, M and Williams, C, Family Law: Principles, Policy and Practice, 1996, London: Butterworths
- Hayton, D, 'Constructive trusts' (1985) 27 Malaya L Rev 313
- Hayton, D, 'Remedial constructive trusts of homes; an overseas view' [1988] Conv 259
- Hayton, D, 'Constructive trusts: is the remedying of unjust enrichment a satisfactory approach?', in Youdan (ed), Equity, Fiduciaries and Trusts, 1989, Zurich: Carswell
- Hayton, D, 'Equitable rights of cohabitees' [1990] Conv 370 (1990:1)
- Hayton, D, 'Investment management problems' (1990) 106 LQR 89 (1990:2)
- Hayton, D, 'Equitable rights of cohabitees', in Goldstein (ed), Equity and Contemporary Legal Developments, 1992, Jerusalem
- Hayton, D, 'Constructive trusts: a bold approach' [1993] LQR 485
- Hayton, D, 'Equity's identification rules', in Birks, P (ed), Laundering and Tracing, 1995, Oxford: Clarendon, 6–19 (1995:2)

- Hayton, D, 'The irreducible core content of trusteeship', in Oakley, A (ed), Trends in Contemporary Trust Law, 1996, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 47
- Hayton, D, 'Fiduciaries in context', in Birks, P (ed), Privacy and Loyalty, 1997, Oxford: Clarendon
- Hayton, D (ed), Modern International Developments in Trust Law, 1999, The Hague: Kluwer
- Hayton, D, 'Developing the obligation characteristic of the trust' (2001) 117 LQR 96
- Hayton, D (ed), Extending the Boundaries of Trusts and Similar Ring-fenced Funds, 2002, Hague: Kluwer Law International
- Hayton, D, Matthews, P and Mitchell, C, Underhill and Hayton's Law of Trusts and Trustees, 18th edn, 2010, London: Butterworths
- Hayton, D and Cooke, E, 'Land law and trusts', in Hayton, D (ed), Law's Futures, 2000, Oxford: Hart, 433
- Hayton, D and Marshall, Cases and Commentary on the Law of Trusts and Equitable Obligations, 11th edn, 2001, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Hayton, D, Kortmann, S and Verhagen, H (eds), Principles of European Trusts Law, 1999, The Hague: Kluwer
- Hedley, S, 'Unjust enrichment as the basis of restitution – an overworked concept' (1985) 5 LS 56
- Hedley, S, 'The taxonomy of restitution', in Hudson, AS (ed), New Perspectives on Property Law, Obligations and Restitution, 2003, London: Cavendish Publishing
- Hegel, GWF, Philosophy of Right (1821), trans Knox, 1952, Oxford: Oxford University Press
- Hicks, A, 'The Trustee Act 2000 and the modern meaning of "investment"' (2001) 15 Trusts Law International 203
- Hobsbawm, E, The Age of Capital: 1848–1875, 1975, London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson
- Hodge, D, 'Secret trusts: the fraud theory revisited' [1980] Conv 341
- Hoggett, B, Pearl, D, Cooke, E and Bates, P, The Family, Law and Society, 4th edn, 1996, London: Butterworths
- Hohfeld, WN, Fundamental Legal Conceptions as Applied in Judicial Reasoning, Cook (ed), 1919, London: Yale University Press
- Holdsworth, Sir W, A History of English Law, vol iv, 1945, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Holland (1945) 9 CLJ 17
- Honoré, A, 'Trusts: the inessentials', in Getzler, J (ed), Rationalizing Property, Equity and Trusts, 2003, London: LexisNexis
- Hopkins, J, 'Certain uncertainties of trusts and powers' [1971] CLJ 68
- Houellebecq, M, Atomised, 2001, London: Vintage; 1999, Paris: Flammarion
- Howe, HR (ed), Concepts of Property In Intellectual Property Law, 2013, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press
- Howell, J, 'Land and human rights' [1999] Conv 287
- Hudson, AH, 'Abandonment', in Palmer, N and McKendrick, E (eds), Interest in Goods, 1993, London: Lloyd's
- Hudson, AS, The Law on Homelessness, 1997, London: Sweet & Maxwell (1997:1)
- Hudson, AS, 'Proprietary rights in financial transactions' (1997) Amicus Curiae, 2 November, 27 (1997:2)
- Hudson, AS, 'Justice in a reasonable period' (1997–98) KCLJ 8, 133–36
- Hudson, AS, 'Void interest swaps: restitution not reinforcement' (1998) 19(6) Company Lawyer 181–82 (1998:2)
- Hudson, AS, Swaps, Restitution and Trusts, 1999, London: Sweet & Maxwell (1999:1)
- Hudson, AS, Towards a Just Society: Law, Labour and Legal Aid, 1999, London: Pinter (1999:2)
- Hudson, AS, 'Money as property in financial transactions' (1999) 14:06 JIBL, 170–77 (1999:3)
- Hudson, AS, 'The regulatory aspect of private law in financial transactions', in Hudson, AS (ed), Modern Financial Techniques, Derivatives and Law, 1999, London: Kluwer (1999:4)
- Hudson, AS, 'Assessing mistake of law in derivatives transactions' [1999] 14:03 JIBL 1–5 (1999:5)
- Hudson, AS, 'Seller liability in credit derivatives', in Hudson, AS (ed), Credit Derivatives, 1999, London: Sweet & Maxwell (1999:6)

- Hudson, AS, 'Termination and restitution of credit derivatives', in Hudson, AS (ed), Credit Derivatives, 1999, London: Sweet & Maxwell (1999:7)
- Hudson, AS, The Law on Investment Entities, 2000, London: Sweet & Maxwell (2000:1)
- Hudson, AS, 'Law of finance', in Birks, P (ed), Lessons from the Swaps Cases, 2000, London: Mansfield (2000:2)
- Hudson, AS, 'The unbearable lightness of property', in Hudson, AS (ed), New Perspectives on Property Law, Obligations and Restitution, 2004, London: Cavendish Publishing, 1 (2004:1)
- Hudson, AS, 'Equity, individualisation and social justice', in Hudson, AS (ed), New Perspectives on Property Law, Human Rights and the Home, 2004, London: Cavendish Publishing, 1 (2004:2)
- Hudson, AS, 'Rapporteur: between morality and formalism in property, obligations and restitution', in Hudson, AS (ed), New Perspectives on Property Law, Obligations and Restitution, 2004, London: Cavendish Publishing (2004:3)
- Hudson, AS, 'Rapporteur: differentiation in property and obligations', in Hudson, AS (ed), New Perspectives on Property Law, Human Rights and the Home, 2004, London: Cavendish Publishing (2004:4)
- Hudson, AS (ed), New Perspectives on Property Law, Obligations and Restitution, 2004, London: Cavendish Publishing (2004:5)
- Hudson, AS (ed), New Perspectives on Property Law, Human Rights and the Home, 2004, London: Cavendish Publishing (2004:6)
- Hudson, AS, 'The liability of trusts service providers in international finance law', in Glasson J and Thomas GW (eds), The International Trust, 2006, Bristol: Jordans (2006:2)
- Hudson, AS, 'The regulation of trustees', in Dixon and Griffiths (eds), Developments in Contemporary Property Law, 2007, Oxford: Oxford University Press
- Hudson, AS, with Thomas, GW, The Law of Trusts, 2nd edn, 2010, Oxford: Oxford University Press
- Hudson, AS, Understanding Company Law, 1st edn, 2011, London: Routledge
- Hudson, AS, 'Trusts and Finance Law', in Hayton D (ed), The International Trust, 3rd edn, 2012, Bristol: Jordans, Chapter 12
- Hudson, AS, 'Asset Protection Trusts', in Hayton D (ed), The International Trust, 3rd edn, 2012, Bristol: Jordans, Chapter 6
- Hudson, AS, The Law on Financial Derivatives, 5th edn, 2012, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Hudson AS, Securities Law, 2nd edn, 2013, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Hudson AS, The Law of Finance, 2nd edn, 2013, London: Sweet & Maxwell, Classics Series
- Hudson AS, The Law and Regulation of Finance, 2nd edn, 2013, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Hudson AS, 'Equity, Confidentiality and the Nature of Property', in HR Howe (ed), Concepts of Property In Intellectual Property Law, 2013, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press
- Hudson AS, 'The synthesis of public and private in finance law', in K Barker and D Jensen (eds), Private Law: Key Encounters with Public Law, 2013, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press
- Hudson, AS, Understanding Equity & Trusts, 6th edn, 2014, Oxford: Routledge
- Hughes, D and Lowe, S, Social Housing Law and Policy, 1995, London: Butterworths
- Hughes, D and Lowe, S, Public Sector Housing Law, 2000, London: Butterworths
- Hunt, A, 'A socialist interest in law' (1992) 192 New Left Rev 105
- Hunt, M, 'The "horizontal effect" of the Human Rights Act' [1998] Public Law 423
- Ibbetson, D, A Historical Introduction to the Law of Obligations, 1999, Oxford: Oxford University Press
- Jackson, J and Doran, S, Judge without Jury: Diplock Trials in the Adversary System, 1995, Oxford: Clarendon
- Jaffey, P, 'Restitutionary damages and disgorgement' [1995] RLR 30
- Jaffey, P, [1996] RLR 92
- Jaffey, P, The Nature and Scope of Restitution, 2000, Oxford: Hart
- Jameson, F, Postmodernism – or the Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism, 1991, London: Verso
- Jennings, Jarman on Wills, 8th edn, 1951, London: Sweet & Maxwell

- Jones, G, (1968) 84 LQR 474
- Jones, G, 'Unjust enrichment and the fiduciary's duty of loyalty' (1968) 84 LQR 472
- Jones, G, 'Remedies for the recovery of money paid by mistake' (1980) 39 CLJ 275
- Jones, G, Restitution in Public and Private Law, 1991, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Jones, G, [1996] CLJ 432
- Jung, C, 'Structure of the psyche' (1927), in Storr (ed), Essential Jung, 1998, London: Fontana
- Kant, I, The Metaphysics of Morals, 1996 (1758), Cambridge: Cambridge University Press
- Keeton, R, 'Conditional fault in the law of torts' (1959) 72 Harv L Rev 401
- Kennedy, I, 'The fiduciary relationship – doctors and patients', in Birks, P (ed), Wrongs and Remedies in the 21st Century, 1996, Oxford: Clarendon
- Klein, N, No Logo, 2000, London: Flamingo
- Langbein, J, 'The new American trust-investment Act' (1994) 8 Trusts Law International 123
- Langbein, J, 'The contractarian basis of the law of trusts' (1995) 105 Yale LJ 625
- Langbein, J and Posner, R, 'Social investing and the law of trusts' (1980) 79 Michigan Law Review 72
- Larkin, P, High Windows, 1974, London: Faber & Faber
- Law Commission, Fiduciary Duties and Regulatory Rules, 1992, 124
- Law Commission, Restitution: Mistakes of Law and Ultra Vires Public Authority Receipts and Payments, Law Com No 227, 1994
- Law Commission, Fiduciary Duties and Regulatory Rules, Law Com No 236, 1995
- Law Commission, Sharing Homes, Law Com No 278, 2002
- Law Commission, Cohabitation: The Financial Consequences of Relationship Breakdown, Law Com No 307, 2007
- Law Commission, Illegality Defence, Law Com Consultation Paper No 189, 2009
- Le Grand, J, A Strategy for Equality, 1982, London: George Allen & Unwin
- Le Grand, J, Equity and Choice, 1991, London: HarperCollins
- Lewin, R, Complexity, 1993, London: Phoenix
- Lewin, T, A Practical Treatise on the Law of Trusts and Trustees, 1837, London: Maxwell
- Leyden, W von, Aristotle on Equality and Justice: His Political Argument, 1985, London: Macmillan
- Lim, H, 'The waqf in trust', in Scott-Hunt, S and Lim, H (eds), Feminist Perspectives on Equity and Trusts, 2001, London: Cavendish Publishing.
- Litman, MM, 'The emergence of unjust enrichment as a cause of action and the remedy of constructive trust' (1988) 26 Alberta LR 407
- Lomnicka, E, Modern Banking Law, 2nd edn, 1994, Oxford: Oxford University Press
- Loughlan, P, 'The historical role of equitable jurisdiction', in Parkinson, P (ed), The Principles of Equity, 2nd edn, 2003, Sydney: LBC
- Lowe, N and Douglas, G, Bromley's Family Law, 8th edn, 1998, London: Butterworths
- Lowry, J and Edmunds, R, 'Excuses', in Birks, P and Pretto, A (eds), Breach of Trust, 2002, Oxford: Hart, 269
- Lupoi, M, Trusts: A Comparative Study, 2000, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press
- McCormack, G, [1989] LMCLQ 198
- McCormack, G, 'Assisting in a breach of trust: principles of accessory liability' (1995) TLI 102 (1995:1)
- McCormack, G, Reservation of Title, 2nd edn, 1995, London: Sweet & Maxwell (1995:2)
- McCormack, G, 'Mistaken payment and proprietary claims' [1996] Conv 86 (1996:1)
- McCormack, G, 'The eye of equity: identification principles and equitable tracing' [1996] JBL 225 (1996:2)
- McCormack, G, 'Fiduciary obligations in a changing commercial climate', in Rider, B and Andenas, M (eds), Developments in European Community Law, 1996, London: Kluwer, Vol 1, 33 (1996:3)
- McCormack, G, (1998) 19(2) The Company Lawyer 39
- McGhee, J, Snell's Equity, 31st edn, 2005, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- McGregor, H, 'Restitutionary damages', in Birks, P (ed), Wrongs and Remedies in the 21st Century, 1996, Oxford: Clarendon, 203

- McKendrick, E, 'Tracing misdirected funds' [1991] LMCLQ 378
- McKendrick, E, Commercial Aspects of Trusts and Fiduciary Obligations, 1992, Oxford: Clarendon
- McKendrick, E, 'Local authorities and swaps: undermining the market?', in Cranston, R (ed), Making Commercial Law: Essays in Honour of Roy Goode, 1997, Oxford: Clarendon
- Maitland, FW, Equity – A Course of Lectures, 2nd edn, 1936, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press
- Maloney, W, Smith, G and Stoker, G, 'Social capital and human capital revisited', in Baron, S, Field, J and Schuller, T (eds), Social Capital, 2000, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 212
- Mann, F, 'On interest, compound interest and damages' (1985) 101 LQR 30
- Mann, F, The Legal Aspect of Money, 5th edn, 1992, Oxford: Oxford University Press
- Martin, J, 'Tracing, fraud and ultra vires' [1993] Conv 370
- Martin, J, 'Certainty of subject matter: a defence of Hunter v Moss' [1996] Conv 223
- Martin, J, Hanbury and Martin, Modern Equity, 15th edn, 1997, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Marx, K and Engels, F, Critique of the Gotha Programme, 1959, Harmondsworth: Penguin
- Mason, A, 'Equity's role in the twentieth century' (1997/98) 8 KCLJ 1
- Matthews, P, 'The true basis of the half-secret trust?' [1979] Conv 360
- Matthews, P, 'The efficacy of trustee exemption clauses in English law' [1989] Conv 42
- Matthews, P, 'A problem in the construction of gifts to unincorporated associations' [1995] Conv 302 (1995:1)
- Matthews, P, 'The legal and moral limits of common law tracing' in Birks, P (ed) Laundering and Tracing, 1995, Oxford: Clarendon (1995:2)
- Matthews, P, 'The new trust: obligations without rights?' in Oakley, A (ed), Trends in Contemporary Trusts Law, 1996, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1
- Matthews, P, 'From obligation to property, and back again? The future of the noncharitable purpose trust', in Hayton, D (ed), Extending the Boundaries of Trusts and Similar Ring-fenced Funds, 2002, Hague: Kluwer Law International
- Maudsley, R, 'Proprietary remedies for the recovery of money' (1959) 75 LQR 234
- Maurice, 'The office of custodian trustee' (1960) 24 Conv 196
- Meagher, R and Gummow, WMC, Equity: Doctrines and Remedies, 3rd edn, 1992, Sydney: Butterworths
- Meagher, R, Heydon, D and Leeming, M, Meagher, Gummow and Lehane's Equity: Doctrines and Remedies, 4th edn, 2002, Sydney: Butterworths
- Mee, J, [1992] Conv 202
- Mee, J, The Property Rights of Cohabitees, 1999, Oxford: Hart
- Miller, D, Social Justice, 1976, Oxford: Oxford University Press
- Millett, P, 'The Quistclose trust: who can enforce it?' (1985) 101 LQR 269
- Millett, P, 'Tracing the proceeds of fraud' (1991) 107 LQR 71, 85
- Millett, P, 'Bribes and secret commissions' [1993] RLR 7
- Millett, P, (1995) 7 Trusts Law International 35
- Millett, P, 'Equity's place in the law of commerce; restitution and constructive trusts' (1998) 114 LQR 214
- Millett, P, 'Restitution: taking stock', delivering the Society of Advanced Legal Studies Lecture, Institute of Advanced Legal Studies, London, 23 July 1998 (1998:1)
- Millett, P, 'Restitution and constructive trusts' (1998) 114 LQR 399 (1998:2)
- Mitchell, C, The Law of Subrogation, 1994, Oxford: Oxford University Press
- Mitchell, C, 'Apportioning liability for trust losses', in Birks, P and Rose (eds), Restitution and Equity, Vol 1, 2000, Oxford: Mansfield, 211
- Mitchell, C, 'Assistance', in Birks, P and Pretto, A (eds), Breach of Trust, 2002, Oxford: Hart
- Moffat, Trusts Law, 3rd edn, 1999, London: Butterworths
- Monbiot, G, The Captive State: Corporate Takeover of Britain, 2000, London: Macmillan
- Moriarty, 'Tracing, mixing and laundering', in Birks, P (ed), Laundering and Tracing, 1995, Oxford: Clarendon, 73

- Morrison, W, Jurisprudence – From the Greeks to Postmodernism, 1995, London: Cavendish Publishing
- Morse, G, Partnership Law, 4th edn, 1998, London: Blackstone
- Morse, G et al, Palmer's Company Law, 26th edn, successive updates, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Mowbray, J et al, Lewin on Trusts, 32nd edn, 2010, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Mulheron, R, The Modern Cy-Près Doctrine, 2006, London: UCL Press
- Murphy, T and Roberts, S, Understanding Property Law, 3rd edn, 1998, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Lord Nicholls, 'Trustees and their broader community: where duty, morality and ethics converge' (1995) 9 Trusts Law International 71
- Lord Nicholls, 'Knowing receipt: the need for a new landmark', in Cornish, W (ed), Restitution: Past, Present and Future, 1998, Oxford: Hart
- Nolan, R, 'How knowing is knowing receipt?' [2000] CLJ 421
- Nolan, R, 'Vandervell v IRC: a case of overreaching' [2002] CLJ 169
- Nolan, R, 'Property in a fund' (2004) 120 LQR 108
- Oakley, A, 'The pre-requisites of an equitable tracing claim' (1975) 28 CLP 64
- Oakley, A, [1995] CLJ 377
- Oakley, A, Constructive Trusts, 3rd edn, 1997, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Oakley, A, Parker and Mellow, The Modern Law of Trusts, 7th edn, 1998, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- O'Donovan, K, Family Law Matters, 1993, London: Pluto
- Oliver, P, 'New model trusts' (1997/98) 8 KCLJ 147
- O'Sullivan, J, 'Undue influence and misrepresentation after O'Brien', in Rose, F (ed), Restitution and Banking Law, 1998, London: Mansfield
- Paciocco, DM, 'The remedial constructive trust: a principled basis for priorities over creditors' (1989) 68 Can BR 315
- Panesar, S, General Principles of Property Law, 2001, London: Longman
- Parkinson, P, 'Reconceptualising the express trust' [2002] CLJ 657
- Pawlowski, M, The Doctrine of Proprietary Estoppel, 1996, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Pawlowski, M, 'Equitable wrongs: common law damages or equitable compensation?' (2000) 6(9) T & T 20
- Payne, J, 'Quistclose and resulting trusts', in Birks, P and Rose, F (eds), Resulting Trusts and Equitable Compensation, 2000, Oxford, Mansfield
- Pearce, 'A tracing paper' (1976) 40 Conv 277
- Penner, J, The Idea of Property in Law, 1997, Oxford: Oxford University Press
- Penner, J, 'Exemptions', in Birks, P and Pretto, A (eds), Breach of Trust, 2002, Oxford: Hart, 241
- Penner, J, The Law of Trusts, 4th edn, 2004, London: Butterworths
- Penner, J, 'Lord Millett's analysis', in Swadling, W (ed), Quistclose Trusts, 2004, Oxford: Hart, 41
- Pennington, RR, The Law of the Investment Market, 1990, Oxford: Blackwell
- Pennington, RR, Company Law, 8th edn, 2001, London: Butterworths
- Pettit, P, Equity and Trusts, 9th edn, 2001, London: Butterworths
- Phillipson, G, 'The Human Rights Act, "horizontal effect" and the common law: a bang or a whimper?' (1999) 62 MLR 824
- Picarda, H, The Law and Practice Relating to Charities, 4th edn, 2007, London: Butterworths
- Piska, N, 'Intention, fairness and the presumption of resulting trust after Stack v Dowden' (2008) 71 MLR 120
- Pollard, D, 'Schmidt v Rosewood' (2003) 17 Trusts Law International 90
- Pollock, Sir F and Maitland, FW, History of English Law, 1895, vol ii
- Pound, R, 'The progress of law' (1920) 33 Harv L Rev 420
- Probert, R, 'Family law and property law: competing spheres in the regulation of the family home', in Hudson, AS (ed), New Perspectives on Property Law, Human Rights and the Home, 2003, London: Cavendish Publishing, 37

- Probert, R, 'Equality in the family home?' (2007) Feminist Legal Studies, 341
- Rajani, S, 'Equitable assistance in the search for security', in Rajak, H (ed), Insolvency Law: Theory and Practice, 1993, London: Butterworths, Chapter 2
- Rawls, J, Theory of Justice, 1971, Oxford: Oxford University Press
- Rawls, J, 'Justice as fairness: political not metaphysical' (1985) 14 Philosophy & Public Affairs 223
- Rayden, W and Jackson, J, Divorce and Family Matters, 1999, London: Butterworths, supplement on Human Rights Act 1998
- Raz, J, The Morality of Freedom, 1986, Oxford: Clarendon
- Riches (1997) PCB 5
- Rickett, C, (1979) 38 CLJ 260
- Rickett, C, (1991) 107 LQR 608
- Rickett, C, 'The remedial constructive trust in Canadian restitution law' [1991] Conv 125
- Rickett, C, 'Compensating for loss in equity', in Birks, P and Rose, F (eds), Restitution and Equity, Vol 1, 2000, Oxford: Mansfield, 172
- Rickett, C, 'Completely constituting an inter vivos trust: property rules?' [2001] Conv 515
- Rickett, C and Grantham, R, 'Resulting trusts – a rather limited doctrine', in Birks, P and Rose, F (eds), Restitution and Equity, Vol 1, 2000, Oxford: Mansfield, 39
- Rider, B, 'The fiduciary and the frying pan' [1978] Conv 114
- Rider, B, Abrams, N and Ashe, M, Guide to Financial Services Regulation, 3rd edn, 1997, Oxford: CCH
- Robertson, 'Land and post-apartheid South Africa', in Bright, S and Dewar, J (eds), Land Law: Themes and Perspectives, 1998, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 311
- Rose, F, 'Gratuitous transfers and illegal purposes' (1996) 112 LQR 386
- Rose, F (ed), Restitution and Banking Law, 1998, Oxford: Mansfield
- Rotherham, C, Proprietary Remedies in Context, 2002, Oxford: Hart
- Rotherham, C, 'Property and unjust enrichment: a misunderstood relationship', in Hudson, AS (ed), New Perspectives on Property Law, Obligations and Restitution, 2003, London: Cavendish Publishing
- Rutherford [1996] Conv 260
- Scott, AW and Fratcher, WF, The Law of Trusts, 3rd edn, 1967, Boston: Little, Brown
- Scott-Hunt, S and Lim, H (eds), Feminist Perspectives on Equity and Trusts, 2001, London: Cavendish
- Sennett, R, The Corrosion of Character: the Personal Consequences of Work in the New Capitalism, 1998, New York: WW Norton
- Sealy, L, 'Fiduciary relationships' [1962] CLJ 69
- Shapiro, J, Contested Will: Who Wrote Shakespeare, 2010, Faber
- Sherrin, CH, Barlow, RFD and Wallington, RA, Williams's Law Relating to Wills, 6th edn, 1987, London: Butterworths, Vol 1, 326
- Sherwin, E, 'Constructive trusts in bankruptcy' [1989] University of Illinois L Rev 297
- Shipwright, A and Keeling, E, Revenue Law, 1998, London: Blackstone
- Sin, KF, The Legal Nature of the Unit Trust, 1997, Oxford: Clarendon (1997:1)
- Sin, KF, 'Enforcing the unit trust deed among unitholders' (1997) 15 ACSR 292 (1997:2)
- Smith, J, 'Foreword' to Strategies for National Renewal, 1994, London: Vintage
- Smith, J, 'Preface' to Strategies for Renewal, 1994, London: Vintage
- Smith, L, 'Presents, principles and trusts principles' [1982] Conv 352
- Smith, L, 'Tracing into the payment of a debt' [1995] CLJ 290 (1995:1)
- Smith, L, 'Tracing in Taylor v Plumer: equity in the Court of King's Bench' [1995] LMCLQ 240 (1995:2)
- Smith, L, The Law of Tracing, 1997, Oxford: Clarendon
- Smith, L, 'Tracing and electronic funds transfer', in Rose, F (ed), Restitution and Banking Law, 1998, Oxford: Mansfield, 120
- Smith, L, 'Constructive trusts and constructive trustees' [1999] CLJ 294
- Smith, L, 'Unjust enrichment, property, and the structure of trusts' (2000) 116 LQR 412

- Smith, R, 'Oral contracts for the sale of land' [2000] 116 LQR 11
- Snaith, I, The Law on Co-operatives, 1984, London: Waterlow
- Snaith, I, 'Mutuals and co-operatives: property, obligations, business and dedicated assets', in Hudson, AS (ed), New Perspectives on Property Law, Obligations and Restitution, 2003, London: Cavendish Publishing, 345
- Snell, Equity, 1868, 1st edn
- Sparkes, P, A New Land Law, 1999, Oxford: Hart
- Spry, I, Equitable Remedies, 8th edn, 2010, Sydney: LBC
- Spry, I, The Principles of Equitable Remedies, 8th edn, 2010, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Stephenson, 'Co-trustees or several trustees?' (1942) 16 Temple ULQ 249
- Stevens, 'Election between alternative remedies' [1996] RLR 117
- Stewart, A, Rethinking Housing Law, 1996, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Story, J, Commentaries on Equity Jurisprudence, 1839, Boston: Little and Brown
- Story, J, Commentaries on Equity Jurisprudence, 13th edn, ed. Bigelow, 1886, Little and Brown
- Swadling, W, [1994] All ER Rev 259 (1994:1)
- Swadling, W, [1994] RLR 195 (1994:2)
- Swadling, W, 'A new role for resulting trusts?' (1996) 16 LS 110
- Swadling, W, 'Property and conscience' (1998) 12 Trusts Law International 228
- Swadling, W, 'A hard look at Hodgson v Marks', in Birks, P and Rose, F (eds), Resulting Trusts and Equitable Compensation, 2000, Oxford: Mansfield, 61
- Swadling, W, Quistclose Trusts, 2004, Oxford: Hart
- Swadling, W, 'The common intention constructive trust in the House of Lords: an opportunity missed' (2007) 123 LQR 511
- Synowich, C, The Concept of Socialist Law, 1990, Oxford: Clarendon
- Tee, L, 'A merry-go-round for the millennium' [2000] CLJ 23
- Tennekoon, R, The Law and Regulation of International Finance, 1991, London: Butterworths
- Tennekoon, R, Legal Aspects of International Finance, 1992, London: Butterworths
- Tettenborn, A, [1980] CLJ 272
- Tettenborn, A, The Law of Restitution in England and Ireland, 2nd edn, 1997, London: Cavendish Publishing
- Tettenborn, A, 'Misnomer: a response', in Cornish, W, Nolan, R, O'Sullivan, J and Virgo, G (eds), Restitution, Present and Future: Essays in Honour of Gareth Jones, 1998, Oxford: Hart, 31
- Teubner, G, Law as an Autopoietic System, 1994, Oxford: Blackwell
- Thomas, G, 'James I, equity and Lord Keeper John Williams' (1976) English Historical Rev 506
- Thomas, G, Taxation and Trusts, 1981, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Thomas, G, Powers, 1998, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Thomas, G, Powers, 2nd edn, 2012, Oxford University Press
- Thomas, GW and Hudson, AS, The Law of Trusts, 2nd edn, 2010, Oxford: Oxford University Press
- Thompson, EP, The Making of the English Working Class, 1963, London: Victor Gollancz; references are to the Penguin 1968 edition
- Thompson, M, 'Constructive trusts, estoppel and the family home' [2004] Conv 1
- Tiley, J, Revenue Law, 4th edn, 2001, Oxford: Hart
- Townsend, P, Poverty in the United Kingdom, 1979, Harmondsworth: Penguin
- Tudor, OD, Tudor on Charities, 9th edn, 2003, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Underhill, A, A Practical and Concise Manual of the Law Relating to Private Trusts and Trustees, 3rd edn, 1889, London: Butterworths
- Underhill, A and Hayton, D, The Law of Trusts and Trustees, 16th edn, 2002, London: Butterworths
- Van Parijs, P, Real Freedom For All, 1995, Oxford: Oxford University Press
- Venables, R, Non-Resident Trusts, 5th edn, 1999, London: Key Haven
- Venables, R, The Taxation of Trust Post Finance Act 2006, 2006, Oxford: Key Haven Publications
- Vernon, S, Social Work and the Law, 1998, London: Butterworths

- Virgo, G, 'Undue influence and misrepresentation after O'Brien', in Rose, F (ed), Restitution and Banking Law, 1998, London: Mansfield, 70
- Virgo, G, Principles of the Law of Restitution, 1999, Oxford: Oxford University Press
- Virgo, G, 'Vindicating vindication: Foskett v McKeown reviewed', in Hudson, AS (ed), New Perspectives on Property Law, Obligations and Restitution, 2003, London: Cavendish Publishing
- Virilio, P, Vitesse et politique: essai de dromologie, 1977, Paris: Galilee
- Virilio, P, Speed and politics, 1986, New York: Semiotext(e)
- Virilio, P, La bombe informatique, 1998, Paris: Galilee
- Virilio, P, Information Bomb, 2000, Verso: London
- Walsh, 'Unit trusts', in Grbich, YFR, Munn, GD and Reicher, H, Modern Trusts and Taxation, 1978, Melbourne: Butterworths Australia, 36
- Warburton, J, [1987] Conv 217
- Waters, D, The Constructive Trust, 1964, London: Athlone
- Waters, D, 'Reaching for the sky – taking trusts laws to the limit, in Hayton, D (ed), Extending the Boundaries of Trusts and Similar Ring-fenced Funds, 2002, Hague: Kluwer Law International, 59
- Watson, J, Psychology from the Standpoint of the Behaviourist, (1919), 1994, London: Routledge
- Watts, P, (1996) 112 LQR 219
- Weil, S, 'Human Personality', reproduced in Miles, S (ed), Simone Weil – An Anthology, 2005, London: Penguin, 69 (originally published by Virago Press, 1985)
- Wilken, S and Villiers, T, Waiver, Variation and Estoppel, 1999, London: John Wiley
- Wong, S, 'Constructive trusts over the family home: lessons to be learned from other Commonwealth jurisdictions' (1998) 18 LS 369
- Wong, S, 'When trust(s) is not enough: an argument for the use of unjust enrichment for home-sharers' (1999) 7(1) FLS 47
- Wong, S, 'Rethinking Rosset from a human rights perspective', in Hudson, AS (ed), New Perspectives on Property Law, Human Rights and the Home, 2003, London: Cavendish Publishing, 79
- Wood, P, Law and Practice of International Finance, 1980, 1995, London: Sweet & Maxwell
- Woodward, L, The Age of Reform: England 1815–1870, 2nd edn, 1962, Oxford: Oxford University Press
- Wooldridge [1987] JBL 329
- Worthington, S, Proprietary Interests in Commercial Transactions, 1996, Oxford: Clarendon
- Worthington, S, 'Reconsidering disgorgement for wrongs' (1999) 62 MLR 218 (1999:1)
- Worthington, S, 'Fiduciaries: when is self-denial obligatory?' [1999] 58 CLJ 500 (1999:2)
- Youdan, T, 'Formalities for trusts of land, and the doctrine in Rochefoucauld v Boustead' [1984] 43 CLJ 306
- Youdan, TG (ed), Equity, Fiduciaries and Trusts, 1989, Toronto
- Zimmerman, The Law of Obligations: Roman Foundations of the Civilian Tradition, 1996, Oxford: Oxford University Press

Index

- absolute title 52, 54–5, 72
abstract purpose trusts see purpose trusts abuser–abused relationship 692–3 accounts: duty to render 403–4; falsification and surcharging 404; liability see liability to account; senses 1272–3 accumulation trust, endowments 55 administrative unworkability 175–6 advancement: ‘advancement or benefit’ 479–80; basic powers 478–80; inherent jurisdiction of court 480; presumptions see under presumed resulting trusts after-acquired property: non-parties enforcing covenant 274; ownership 271; parties enforcing covenant 272–4; problem areas 269–70; promise under covenant 271–6; settlement not to be unmade 272; summary of principles 279–80; third party benefit 274–6; trust of promise itself 278–9; trustee enforcement 276–9 agency: mortgages 1255–6; trusts distinguished 72 agents: appointment 480–1, 481–2; asset management functions 481–2; duties 481–2; functions 481–2; obligations, unauthorised profits 626–7; unincorporated associations as 228–9 animal welfare 1152–4 anonymised injunction, definition 1212 appointment: agents 480–1; custodians 480–1; delegation 480–1; discretionary trusts 54–5; nominees 480–1; trustees see under trustees
Aristotle 11–13, 15, 42, 43, 680–1, 834, 844 armed forces of the crown 1154 arts/culture/heritage/science advancement 1149–50 ascertainability 174–5 asset protection trust 82 associations see unincorporated associations
Austen, Jane 61, 75–6, 78–9, 794
Australia, unconscionable actions 791–3 automatic resulting trusts: categorisation issues 509–10; circumstances 510–11; failure of trust 512–13; meaning 509; no declaration by mistake 511–12; presumed resulting trusts compared 507–9; surplus property 513–14; unincorporated associations 514–16 bad faith, change of position and 936–8 bailment, trusts distinguished 71
Baker, P 36–7
balance of convenience 1189–90 balance sheet approach, trusts of homes 731–40 bank accounts: and breach of regulatory obligation 133–6; electronic 919–20; express trusts 66–7, 102–3; knowing receipt and dishonest assistance distinction 1030; presumed resulting trusts 529–30 bankruptcy of beneficiary 814–16, 821–4 bare trusts: objects 163; trustee 54 beneficiaries: acting fairly between 447–8; attesting to will 313–14; capital/income 360–1; control of trustees 420–1; express trusts 52–3, 57–9, 91; failure by beneficiary to alleviate loss 883; infant see infant beneficiaries; land see trusts of land; mixed funds 906–7; personal obligations 65–6; principle rights 179–80; proprietary rights 64–6, 181–2, 185–6; with right to information provision 399–400; Saunders v Vautier principle 182–5; see also bare trusts; protective trusts beneficiary principle: arguments against 218–19; basic principle 197–9; basic requirement 179–80; case law approaches 219–20; perpetuities 200–1; property right and 209–10; strict approach 200–2; tax avoidance 84; transfer as gift 210–12; see also people trusts; perpetuities; purpose trusts bequests see charitable purpose
Bevan, Aneurin 43
Birks, P 502–3, 557, 950
bona fide purchaser for value without notice 945–8, 1023

- breach of confidence 1198–202, 1208–9
- breach of trust: allocation of liability 864–6, 887–8; apportioning liability 865–6; basic of liability 858–66; basic principles 856; committed by another trustee 882; compensation see equitable compensation; concurrence by beneficiary 886; context of liability 348–9, 856–7; defences 882–7; development of liability 859–60; dishonest assistance and 965–7; excuses 884–5; investment 430–1, 432–3, 462–7; investment issues 863–4, 882; joint/several liability 864–5; limitation period 888; loss see loss; meaning 462, 858; nature of liability 857; non-fiduciary actions 885–6; permitted actions 885–6; remedies, choice between 887; remedies, outline 867; restitution 867–9; stranger liability 955; Target Holdings v Redfern case 860–1, 879–80; termination claims 880–2
- bribery: common law debtor–creditor approach 571–2; company directors' obligations 586–7; constructive trust approach 572–8, 576, 577–8; diminution of property value 577; equity traditionalist argument 585–6; examples 577–8; fiduciaries and 569–71, 575–6; profits 569–84; secret commissions 578–80; Sinclair Investment v Versailles Trading decision 580–7
- Browne-Wilkinson, Lord 40–1, 42
- Canada, unjust enrichment 790–1
- Cayman Islands: STAR trusts 1053–4
- certainty: intention 92–116; objects 145–78; principles 91–176; subject matter 116–45; see also uncertainty
- Chancellors see Lord Chancellor; Vice-Chancellors
- Chancery Courts 18, 19
- change of position: activity 938–9; bad faith 936–8; basis of defence 935–6; before receipt of property 943; as equitable defence 940–1; future liabilities 941–3; knowing receipt 1023–4; measurement of comparative inequity or harm 938; mistaken payments 939–40; open nature 936; passing on 945; windfall payments 939–40
- chaos, equity and 1311–13
- charges 1091; floating 130–1; tracing, claims 928–30; trusts, distinguished 109–10
- charitable purpose: amateur sport advancement 1150–1; animal welfare advancement 1152–4; armed forces of crown, promotion of efficiency 1154; arts/culture/heritage/science advancement 1149–50; citizenship advancement 1149; conflict resolution/ reconciliation 1151; emergency services, promotion of efficiency 1154–5; environmental protection/improvement advancement 1151; equality/diversity promotion 1151; health advancement 1148–9; human rights advancement 1151; recreational charities 1155–7; relief of those in need 1151–2; religious/racial harmony promotion 1151; saving of lives 1148–9; statute 1147–8
- charitable status: exclusivity 1113–14; formalities 1110–11; negative finding 1112–17; political purposes 1114–16; sufficient intention 1112–14; tax advantages to charities 1111–12; tax advantages to third persons 1111–12; trust law advantages 1108–9
- charities: basic principles 1099–100; case law roots 1103–4; 'charitable purposes' 1104–8; as companies 1109–10; context 1100–1; cy-pres doctrine see cy-pres doctrine; education see education; historical roots 1102–4; poverty see poverty relief; profit role 1144; public benefit see public benefit requirement; purposes beneficial to the community 1143–8; regulation 1166; religion see religion; statutes 1101–2; as trusts 1108–9
- chattels 1170–1
- children: and property law 842–3; superinjunctions 1222; trusts of land 812–13, 820–1; see also infant beneficiaries
- Chinese walls 375–6, 404–7, 1207–8
- citizenship advancement 1149
- civil law and ownership/express trust, distinction 60
- cohabitants/cohabitants 705–6, 843–4
- Coke, Sir Edward 37
- commercial transactions: basic themes 1037–8; equity and 1039–42, 1060–1; equity as risk 1059–60; see also loan moneys; Quistclose trusts
- commercial trusts: development 1042–4; removal of trustee 349–50; trustee duties, limitation 418–19
- common intention: birth of 713–15; Gissing v Gissing case 715–17; mistake 546–7; resulting trusts 506–7, 711–17; rights not based on 763–4
- common intention constructive trusts: agreement 719–22; approaches 725–7; bright-line development 795–6; conceptual issues 793–9; conduct 722–3; court discretion 728; domestic work and property rights 727–8; excuses 729; feminist objection 794; foundations 717–19; home and 630–1; Lloyds Bank v Rosset case 719–25; mapping 718; need for detriment 723–5; phantom common intention 793; roots

- 717; strict application difficulties 729–31; substantive unfairness 729–30; supremacy of money 795; unconscionable actions 762–3
- common law: balance with equity 1311; damages equitable compensation, distinguished 875–6, 877; distinction from equity 4–5, 19; distinction's impact 19–21; as engine of fraud 34; estoppel 679; fusion with equity 21–2; origins 16–17; remedies, interim injunctions and 1190; tracing see common law tracing; see also equity
- common law tracing: basic principles 896–7; claims 896–7; electronic transfers 896; equitable tracing, distinguished 894; limitations 897; new directions 897–9
- company law: conflicts of interest 620–2; corporate opportunity doctrine 612–17; equitable remedies 1057–9; unauthorised profit remedy 622–4
- compensation see equitable compensation
- complexity science 1310–11
- compound interest 1276–7
- confidence, equitable doctrine of: basic issues 1197–8; breach of confidence 1198–202, 1208–9; central principles 1205–7; development 1202–4; history 1198–202; open-textured nature 1204–5; tort of misuse of private information compared 1210–11
- confidential information: contexts 1207–8; definition 1206–7; duties 375–6, 404–7; misuse 1017–18; obligation to disclose 401–3; see also confidence, equitable doctrine of
- conflicts of interest, avoidance 367–75, 601–3
- conscience: constructive trusts 553–5, 648–9, 949–50; equity and 8–9, 330–1; in ethical philosophy 1306–8; meaning of 9–11; obligations on trustees 62–4; paradox within equity 1305–6; sovereign's 9; teleological focus 27–8; trustee duties and 347
- consensual transfer 948
- constitution of trusts: completeness 244–5; 'doing everything necessary' 257–65; general principle 245–6; improperly constituted 253–5; land 243, 246–7; personal property 246; settlor's proprietary right 247–50
- constructive fraud 1245–6
- constructive trusts: agreement relating to property 629–37; basic principles 547–9; bribery see bribery, profits; Cobbe v Yeoman's Row decision 561–4; coherence of doctrine 646–8; common intention see common intention
- constructive trusts; conscience see conscience: constructive trusts; conveyances 631–7; de son tort 642–3; definition 50–1; 'doing everything necessary' 566–7; English language analogy 650; estoppel licenses 676–8; formal exceptions 250–1; fraud see under fraud; fraudulent misrepresentation see fraudulent misrepresentation; fiduciary obligations 552–3; fundamentals 549–51; institutional nature 552; issues 646–50; 'keeping out of the market' 564; killing see killing, profits; knowledge 553–5, 558; land 558–64; potential application 553; pre-payment protection fund 567–9; proprietary estoppel, distinguished 796–9; proprietary and personal claims, distinguished 551–2; proprietary rights 555–6; Quistclose trusts 1074–6; remedial 649–50; sale of land 632–6; sale of personalty 636–7; secret trusts as 324–5; statute as engine of fraud 565–6; sympathy 648–9; theft, profits 589–92; unconscionable actions 558–69, 762–3; undue influence 597; voluntary assumption of liability 637–42; Westdeutsche Landesbank case 556–8
- contracts: contractarian argument 1044–6; estoppel licenses 677; exclusion of liability 1047–50; investment 1046–7; risk and 1059–60; sale of land 632–4; sale of personalty 636–7; specific performance see under specific performance; trusts distinguished 70–1; uberrimae fidei 1232
- control of trustees: administration 422; basic rules 420; by beneficiaries 420–1; by courts 421–2; directions 422; judicial review 422–4; nature of power and 421; relevant/irrelevant considerations and 424
- conversion 1282
- Cooke, E 649–50
- corporate contexts, liability to account 1024–30
- corporate opportunity doctrine 612–17
- Court of Star Chamber 18
- court structure: Chancery Courts 18, 19; post-1873 21–2
- Cowper, Lord 15
- creation of trusts: constitution see constitution of trusts; declaration see declaration of trust; disposition see equitable interests, disposition; exceptions to formalities 250–3; gifts see gifts; main principles 241–2; specific formalities 242–5
- Crusades 45–6
- custodians: appointment 480–1; role 482
- customers, as expression 167
- cy-pres* doctrine: case law 1158–60; charitable intention 1157–8; exclusivity of purpose 1160–1; express private trusts, distinguished 1158; future 1165–6; impossibility after commencement of trust 1160; impossibility at commencement of trust 1158–9; small charities 1165; statutory provisions 1161–6; where objects fail 1164–5

- damages: equitable see equitable damages; equitable compensation, distinguished 875–6, 877; exemplary 879; injunction, in lieu of 1196–7; injunctions, measure 1197; specific performance, in lieu of 1178–9
- de son tort*: constructive trusts 642–3; liability to account 646; trustees 642–3
- deceit, tort of 321, 1176, 1231
- declaration of trust: on death 243; inter vivos over land 243, 246–7; inter vivos over personal property 244
- delegation: agents see agents; appointment 480–1; custodians see custodians; devolution, of trust powers 484–5; liability for acts 483; nominees see nominees; power of attorney 482; standard of care for trustees 483–4
- Denning, Lord 40, 676–7, 678
- detriment: common intention constructive trusts 723–5; estoppel 650–1; proprietary estoppel 664–6
- devolution, of trust powers 484–5
- Dicey, AV 75
- Dickens, Charles: Bleak House 19, 21, 61
- directors: duties 624–6; obligations 586–7, 1057–9
- disclaimers, trustee duties 420
- disclosure, obligation 401–3
- discretionary trusts: beneficiaries' rights 187–90; certainty of objects 155–60; obligatory nature 155; power of appointment 54–5
- dishonest assistance 645; basic principles 961–3; breach of trust and 965–7; defences 1023–4; investment advisors 1027–8; knowing receipt, distinction 1030; knowing receipt and 956–60; nature 965–8; proprietary claim 1004–6; rationale 964–5; remedy 1004–6; time/nature of assistance 966–7
- dishonesty: Abou-Rahma v Abacha decision 987–90; alternative test 1019–20; Barlow Clowes v Eurotrust case 981–3; defendant's evidence 986–7; objective test 968–74, 984–5; objectivity/subjectivity, distinction and combination 975–81; professional services and 999–1002; as risk 1002–4; state of authorities and judges' difficulties 990–9; stranger's liability 967–8; subjectivity 974–5; Twinspectra v Yardley case 981, 984–6
- diversity/equality promotion 1151
- divorce settlements 800
- doctor-patient relationship 690–1
- doctrine of notice 1243–5
- documents: delivery/cancellation 1240, 1282; transfer of undue influence 1264–5
- donatio mortis causa* 265–6
- Douzinas, C 11
- duty of care: in case law 361–2; with delegation 483–4; reasonable 415–18; statutory 362–4, 434–6, 438
- Dworkin, R 43
- education: business/charity 1129–30; charitable principles 1126; definition 1126–30; in-between cases 1132; independent schools 1133–4; infant beneficiaries 477; law students 1130; personal nexus test 1131–2; public benefit requirement 1130–5; research/teaching/ideology 1127–8; sport and 1129
- Eldon, Lord 39–40
- election 1282
- electronic bank accounts 919–20
- Elias, G 1307
- Elizabeth I 37
- Ellesmere, Lord 5, 37
- emergency services, promotion of efficiency 1154–5
- employer–employee relationship 691–2
- English language: constructive trusts and 650; equity and 328–9
- Englishness 1315–17
- environmental protection/improvement 1151
- equality/diversity promotion 1151
- equitable charges 928–30
- equitable compensation: basic terms 870–1; common law damages, distinguished 875–6, 877; compensation as part of equity 873–4; as equitable remedy 1275; liability to pay 872–3; for losses 870–4; restoration of value of fund 869–70; restorative/compensatory, distinguished 871–2; tort of negligence 876
- equitable damages: jurisdiction 1275–6; statute 1276
- equitable estoppel: express trusts and 334–6; mistake and 662–3; purpose 675–6
- equitable interests, disposition: assignment 293; basic issues 280; contractual transfer 295–6; declaration of new trust 287–9; holding on for another 293–4; implied trusts and 296–7; resulting trusts and 504–5; signed writing requirement 280–4, 289–91; sub-trusts 291–2; summary of analysis 297–9; transfer with legal interest 284–6; variation see variation of trust
- equitable remedies: accounts see accounts; liability to account; compound interest 1276–7; damages see equitable damages; documents, delivery/cancellation 1282; equitable compensation 1275; mere equities 1283–4; modification of existing rights 1282–3; mutual benefit and burden 1284; receivers 1281; specific restitution 1274–5; subrogation see subrogation

- equitable tracing: basic issues 899–900; benefits 902–3; common law tracing, distinguished 894; conscience and 949–50; innocent volunteers 901–2; limitations 903–4; mixed funds see mixed funds; prior equitable interest 900–2; restitution and 950–1; see also tracing
- equitable wrongs 1251–2
- equity: claimant must not do equity 31; clean hands 31, 1185; commercial transactions and 1039–42; conclusion 1318–19; contexts 36–43; core principles 28–36; cultural place 1314; defence of 1060–1, 1303; delay 30–1; done as ought to be done 32–3; Englishness see English language; Englishness; equal equity 30; equality is equity 31–2, 43; as ethical construct 22–3; flexibility 7, 327–8; as follower of law 29–30; foundations of 4–15; future in public law 1308–9; goals 1317–18; in Greek philosophy 11–13; human rights and 830; intent rather than form 32; intention to fulfil obligation 33; Kant’s conception 13–14; legal history 16–22, 36–43; misrepresentation in 1251; nature of 1304–5; paradox and cool jazz 24–5; theoretical basis 833–4; trade and family roots 26–7
- estoppel: basic elements 680–1; by representation 679–80, 944–5; commercial contexts 679–80; common law 679; detrimental reliance 650–1; meaning 647–8; nemo dat principle 679; promissory 651, 678–9; proprietary see proprietary estoppel; secret trusts and 326; as single doctrine 648–51; unconscionability 649–50, 651
- ethical philosophy 1306–8
- evidence: parole evidence rule 317; secret trusts and 316–18; see also sham devices
- evidential uncertainty 173–4
- experts, use of unconnected third person 168–9
- express trusts: based on circumstances 94–5; beneficiaries 52–3, 57–9, 91; certainty principles 91–176; civil law ownership distinction 60; commercial intentions 96–100; creation see creation of trusts; cy-pres doctrine and 1158; definition 49; equitable estoppel and 334–6; inference by court 93–4; intention to create 92–3, 112–14; paradox 327–9; partial/total failure 177–8; people/legal capacities distinction 59–60; property problems 1289–90; Quistclose trusts 1072–4; settlor/trustee/beneficiary relationship 51, 89–91; settlors 52, 89–90; structure 51; techniques 333–4; trustees 52–7, 90–1; trusts of homes 710–11; wealth redistribution and 332–3
- fair dealing principle 373–4, 629
- family law, and law of home: Children Act (1989) 842–3; co-habitees/cohabitants 705–6, 843–4; context 839–41; married couples 843–4; statute 841–2; see also rights in the home
- fiduciaries: abuser–abused 692–3; constructive trusts and 552–3; definition 682–3; doctor–patient 690–1; duties 55–7, 683–5; employer–employee 691–2; human rights and 694; mortgagee–mortgagor 689–90; new categories 688–93; remedies based on responsibilities 686–8; role 682; unauthorised profits see under unauthorised profits
- fiduciary mere powers: alternative approaches 153–4; beneficiaries’ rights 190; objects, certainty test 151–3; permissive nature 150–1
- financial advisors/financial institutions, liability to account 1026–30
- Financial Conduct Authority (FCA) 458–9
- Finch, Sir Heneage see Nottingham, Lord
- fixed trusts: nature of 149–50; objects 149–50; trustee 54
- floating charges, trust distinguished 130–1
- Francis’s Maxims of Equity 38
- fraud: complex commercial 1018–19; constructive 1245–6; constructive trusts and 592–7; equity and 34, 35–6; as formality exception 251–3; fraud theory 305–6, 320–2; on a power 497; profits 592–7
- fraudulent misrepresentation: no constructive trust 594–5; as proprietary constructive trust 595–7
- freedom of expression 1219–20, 1222–3
- freezing injunctions: basic principles 1191–2; core test 1192–3; nature 1191–2; substantive proceedings requirement 1193; worldwide 1194
- French, Marilyn: The Women’s Room 800
- friends: as expression 165–7; good friends 152–3
- FSA see Financial Services Authority
- fully secret trusts: communication 309–10; consequences of failure 311–12; creation 307–8; half-secret, distinction 303; intention to benefit 308; meaning 303, 307; office of trustee 310–11
- fungible property see intangible property
- Galsworthy, John 81
- Giddens, A 1313
- gifts: continuing intention requirement 267; donatio mortis causa 265–6; enforcement of promises 268–9; future specific 478; imperfect 255–6; intention 114; mere motive and 212–13; perfecting imperfect gifts 265–9;

- Strong v Bird* rule 266–8; to unincorporated associations 223–5; transfers of property as 210–12; trusts and 329–30; trusts distinguished 72–3; voluntary 524–6
- Goff, Lord 8, 41
- ‘good friends’ 152–3
- Hale, Baroness 42
- half-secret trusts: acceptance 313; beneficiary attesting to 313–14; communication 312–13; creation 312; meaning 303–4, 312; see also secret trusts
- Hatton, Sir Christopher 9
- Hayton, D 693–4
- health advancement 1148–9
- Hegel, George 6
- Henry II 16–17, 42–3
- Henry VIII 18
- Hogarth, William: Marriage a la Mode vi–vii, 60–1
- home see rights in the home; trusts of homes
- human rights: advancement 1151; applicable norms 835–6; definition issue 829–30; equity and 830; fiduciary liability 694; principles 835–9; in property 836–7; right to family life 837–8; right to freedom of expression 1219–20, 1222–3; right to possessions 839; right to privacy 1219, 1220; rights and freedoms, distinguished 834–5; superinjunctions see superinjunctions; theoretical basis 831–3; trusts of land 825
- hyper-injunctions 1227–8
- identification: purpose trusts 201–2; segregated property 144
- immediate possession 203–4
- implied trusts: duties applicable to 344; formality exceptions 250–1
- in personam*: acts 23, 33; civil law rights 60; specific performance 1168–9; trustees, rights against 181–2
- incorporation by reference 319–20
- infant beneficiaries: capital 478; court’s inherent jurisdiction 478; income during infancy 476–7; income under trust 474–6; intermediate income 478; ‘maintenance, education or benefit’ 477; maintenance powers 474–8; variation of trusts 495
- information provision: basic duties 392–3; beneficiary with right to 399–400; existence/nature of trust 393–4; obligations to give reasons 400
- information provision, trust documents 394–7; nature of documents 397–8; new analysis 397; precluded 394; scope of right 360–1; traditional approach 394–7
- injunctions: basic principles 1181–2; classification 1187–8; clean hands 1185; common law interaction 1196–7; common law remedies, distinguished 1183–5; courts’ power 1182–3; damages inadequate 1185; damages in lieu of 1196–7; damages’ measure 1197; equitable principles 1185–7; freezing see freezing injunctions; hyper-injunctions 1227–8; interim see interim injunctions; mandatory 1187; nature 1182–7; no delay 1185–6; not in vain 1186; prohibitory 1187; quia timet 1187–8; right affected 1186; search orders 1194–6; superinjunctions see superinjunctions; undue hardship to respondent 1186–7
- insider dealing 461
- insolvency: bankruptcy of beneficiary 814–16, 821–4; ‘investment firms’ holding assets 132–3; Lehman Brothers case 132–42; money in bank accounts and breach of regulatory obligation 133–6; Quistclose trusts 1086; resulting trusts 540–4; and rights of beneficiaries 194–6; securities held within investment banking groups 140–2; subject matter and law of finance 131–42
- insubstantial interests 1173–4
- intangible property 120–9; ‘achieving equity’ approach 126; after-acquired property 128; certainty of intention and 125; in commercial law 126–8; Hunter v Moss approach 124–5; non-transferable assets 128–9
- intention: certainty 92–116; commercial 96–102; creation of trust 92–3, 112–14; gifts and 114; non-commercial 100–2; share in financial transactions 103–6
- interim injunctions: balance of convenience 1189–90; basic principles 1188–9; common law remedies and 1190; strong prima facie case 1189–90
- international trusts law: and ‘beneficiary principle’ 84; offshore trust services 1051–2; protectors and enforcers 1055–6; recognition of trusts 1050–1; revocable trusts 1056–7; sham devices 1057; STAR trusts, Cayman Islands 1053–4
- interpretation: trust provisions 409–10; wills 107–9
- intestacy, secret trusts and 304, 316
- investment: advisors see investment advisors; approach to questions 430; authorised persons 455–61, 467; banking see under insolvency; basic principles 426; best return 444–6; breach of instrument terms 430–1; case law 443–53; case law principles 431–2; conduct of

- business 458–9; contracts 1046–7; controlling interest 467–8; delegates' control 468–70; development of rules 426–7; diversification 440–1; excluded categories 457–8; exclusion clauses 464; exclusion of liability 464–5; express powers 453–4; general power 433–4; insider dealing 461; in land 443; liability levels 465–6; liability measurement 463; limitation of liabilities 466–7; management 467–70; market abuse 459–60; market comparisons 452–3; meaning 434; meaning of 'trustee' 429; misfeasance 459–61; misleading statements 460; money laundering 460–1; portfolio management 449–51; private trusts and 427–8; professional advice 441–3; prudent businessperson standard 446–9; regulation 455–61; selection 467–70; standard of care see duty of care; standard criteria 438–41; standard market practice 451–3, 463; statutes 428–30, 431, 434–8; strict construction of powers 454; suitability 439–40; unauthorised 462–3
- investment advisors: context of advice 1026–7; dishonest assistance 1027–8; knowing receipt 1028–30
- Islamic law 46
- James I 17, 37
- Jessel, Sir George 38–9
- joint breach of trust 864–5
- joint tenancy/tenants in common 223, 231–2, 827
- joint trustees 348
- joint ventures: land 559–61; proprietary estoppel 673–6
- Jones, G 41
- judicial review, trustees' actions 422–4
- Kant, Immanuel 13–14
- killing, profits 587–9
- knowing receipt: basic principles 1516; bona fide purchaser for value without notice 1023; change of position 1023–4; complex commercial fraud 1018–19; context 1015–16; defences 1023–4; developments in treatment 1019–22; dishonest assistance, distinction 1030; dishonest assistance and 956–60; dishonesty see dishonesty; investment advisors 1028–30; issues with receipt 1008–9; meaning 1516–17; misuse of confidential information 1017–18; nature of knowledge 1012–14; nature of receipt 1007–9; release 1024; remedy 1023; subjectivity of knowledge 1016–17; test for knowledge 1014–19; unconscionability 1009–12, 1022–3; unjust enrichment and 1020–1
- laches 30–1
- land: constructive trusts 558–64; declaration of trust 243, 246–7; investment in 443; joint ventures 559–61; sale 632–6; specific performance and 1169–70; see also trusts of land
- Larkin, Philip 78
- Law Commission, on trustee duties 419
- legal title see title
- liability of strangers see stranger liability
- liability to account: categories 1273–4; as constructive trustee 644–6; de son tort 646; dishonest assistance 645; employees/personal 1024–6; financial advisors/financial institutions 1026–30; personal 960–1; tracing, comparison 893; unconscionable receipt 644–5
- liens 930–1
- life tenants 163, 194, 248–9, 271, 357–8, 359, 361, 447–8
- loan moneys: commercial approach 1083–4; equitable device 1086–8; loan contracts 1082–3; non-loan moneys 1088–90; third party rights 1090; transfers 1067–8; see also commercial transactions; Quistclose trusts
- Lord Chancellor: constitutional position 18, 42–3; jurisdiction 17–18, 21; medieval office 17–18; as sovereign's conscience 9, 1317
- loss: breach of trust and 862–4; causal link 882, 1032; equitable compensation for 870–4; failure by beneficiary to alleviate 883; valuation see valuation of loss
- Macclesfield, Lord 18
- maintenance: 'maintenance, education or benefit' 477; powers 474–8
- Maitland, FW 11, 1315
- Mareva injunctions see freezing injunctions
- married women, limited rights 75–7
- Master of the Rolls 17
- media see superinjunctions
- mere equities 1283–4
- mere powers see fiduciary mere powers
- Miller, D 844
- misfeasance, investment 459–61
- misleading statements 460
- misrepresentation: in equity 1251; fraudulent 1231; innocent 1231–2; mortgages 1256; rescission 1231–2; specific performance 1176
- mistake: automatic resulting trusts and 511–12; change of position 939–40; common 1233, 1238; common intention 546–7; equitable estoppel 662–3; equity and 1234; of fact/law 1235; proprietary estoppel 652–3; recovery of property 544–5; rectification 1238–9; restitution 1178; resulting trusts 544–7; scope

- of equity 1234; specific performance 1177–8; tracing 915–16; in trustee powers 391–2; unilateral 1233, 1238–9
- mixed funds: approaches compared 915; basic issues 904; beneficiary election approach 906–7; first in, first out approach 912; honest trustee approach 905–6; innocent volunteer 907–15; payments in and out 911–12; proportionate share 912–14; trustee's own money 905–7; two trust funds 907–15
- money: laundering 460–1, 896–7; tangible money theory 1297–8; transactions, specific performance 1172–3
- moral obligations, trusts distinguished 106–9, 113–14
- More, Sir Thomas 11
- mortgages 1091; included in trust property 468; mortgagee–mortgagor relationship 689–90
- mortgages, setting aside: agency 1255–6; attention of mortgagee 1257–60; Barclays Bank v O'Brien case 1253–6; basic principles 1252; burden of proof 1260–1; certificate that advice taken 1262–3; CIBC v Pitt 1256–7; context 1253; manifest disadvantage 1257–9; means of discharging duty 1261–5; misrepresentation 1256; part or whole 1267–70; Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No 2) 1259–60; solicitor advising more than one party 1266–7; solicitor's liability 1265–7; TSB v Camfield 1267–8, 1269–70; undue influence 1254–5, 1264–5; vulnerable people 1263–4
- Mulheron, R 1165
- mutual benefit and burden 1284
- mutual wills 638–42
- natural justice 5
- ne exeat regno* 1241
- negligence: dishonesty and 999–1000; and gross negligence 414–15; tort of 876
- nominees: appointment 480–1; role 482
- Norman Conquest 17
- notice, doctrine of 1243–5
- Nottingham, Lord 37–8, 39
- Oakley, A 322–3
- objects: bare trusts 163; basic issue 145–6; 'customers' as expression 167; decisions on own facts 164–5; discretionary trusts 155–60; fixed trusts 149–50; 'friends' as expression 165–7; personal powers and 160–3; 'relatives' as expression 167; structure for dealing with 176–7; trusts and powers distinguished 147–9; uncertainty in words/expressions 165–7; see also certainty; uncertainty
- obligations, trustee see trustee obligations
- occupation, trusts of land 809–11
- occupational pension schemes 1095
- office of trustee 342–53
- offshore trusts services 1051–2
- overreaching 826–7
- Parliamentary privilege, problem of 1227–8
- parole evidence rule 317
- passing on 945
- patient–doctor relationship 690–1
- payments: mistaken 939–40; mixed funds 911–12; pre-payment protection fund 567–9; windfall 939–40
- pension funds, occupational 1095
- people trusts: alternative interpretations 204; cases' comparison 206–7; literalist approach 203–4; property, direct/indirect use/enjoyment 204–6; purpose trusts, distinction 202–10; strict approach 207–8
- performance 1283
- perpetuities: beneficiary principle 200–1; common law rules 215–16; forms of perpetuity clause 216; historical/cultural changes 215; principles 214–15; statutes 216, 217–18
- personal liability to account 960–1
- personal nexus test 1131–2
- personal powers: non-fiduciary nature 160–1; in trust instruments 162–3; uncertainty of objects and 161–2
- personal property, presumed resulting trusts 524–5
- personalty, sale 636–7
- phone hacking, superinjunctions and 1214–18
- Pirandello, Luigi 1306
- Plato 42, 43
- pledge: meaning 1062–3; transfer of title and 1062–3
- political purposes 1114–16
- politics of trusts law 81–4
- possession: immediate 203–4; unity of 813–14
- possessions, rights to 839
- poverty relief: benefits for poor relatives 1125–6; cases 1117–20; charging for services 1125; charitable principles 1117; definition of poverty 1120–2; definition of relief and prevention 1122–3; examples of poverty 1120–1; limitations 1123–6; links to settlor 1125–6; public benefit requirement 1123–4; relief of those in need, charitable purpose 1151–2; social class issues 1122; statutory provision 1117
- powers: investment see investment; trustee see trustee powers; trusts distinct from 73, 147–9; types 147–9
- powers of attorney 482

- pre-payment protection fund 567–9
 Press see superinjunctions presumed resulting trusts: automatic resulting trusts compared 507–9; bank accounts 529–30; categorisation issue 509–10; father and child 521–2; husband and wife 521, 522–3; meaning 508–9; personal property 524–5; presumptions of advancement 519–20, 521–4; purchase price see purchase price resulting trusts; real property 525–6; rebuttal 528–31; statute 521; summary of principles 544; tax avoidance 530–1; voluntary gifts 524–6 presumptions of advancement 519–20, 521–4 privacy right 1219, 1220
 private information, misuse of: equitable doctrine of confidence compared 1210–11; see also superinjunctions profits: bribery see bribery, profits; from fraud 592–7; from killing 587–9; from theft 589–92; unauthorised see unauthorised profits promises: enforcement 268–9; property see after-acquired property promissory estoppel 651, 678–9
 property: after-acquired see after-acquired property; control as right 1296–7; direct/indirect use/enjoyment 204–6; estoppel licenses 677–8; fragility of understanding 1299–300; human rights 836–7; lightness and softness 1298–9; modern forms 1297–300; quasi-property rights 1294–5; receivers 1281; rights against people 1293–4; rights in a thing 1292–3; stolen 951–2; surplus 513–14; theory 1291–300; tracing see tracing; unconscionable actions 558–69; see also trust property proprietary estoppel: approaches 653–7; assurance/representation 658–64; Cobbe v Yeoman's Row decision 673–6; common intention constructive trusts 730–1; compensating detriment 655–6; constructive trusts, distinguished 796–9; court's discretion on remedies 666–70; detriment of claimant 664–5; features 651–2, 653; financial compensation 666–70; frustration of expectation 653–4; giving effect to promise 654–5; interest awarded 749–50; joint ventures 673–6; licenses 676–8; mistake and 652–3; personal detriment 665; promises enforced 268–9; remedies awarded 750–3; scope of remedies 666–72; test elements 657–65; trusts of homes 744–53; unconscionable actions 656–7, 758–9; underlying test 745–9; vitiating doctrine 671–2 proprietary rights: beneficiaries 57–9, 64–6, 181–2; multiple rights 113; settlor's 247–50 protective trusts: purpose 192; structuring methods 192–4 protectors and enforcers 1055–6 prudence: duty 347–8; investment and 446–9; reasonableness, compared 436–8 psychology of order 1311 public benefit requirement: benefit defined 1144–5; charities 1106–8; civic amenities of community 1146–7; community defined 1145–6; education 1130–5; individuals within community 1146; poverty relief 1123–4; purposes beneficial to the community 1144–7; religion 1140–3; test 1167–8 purchase price resulting trusts: contribution to purchase price 526–8; principles 503–4, 520–1 purpose trusts: anomalous trusts 213–14; identification 201–2; mere motive and 212–13; people trusts, distinction 202–10; policy 199; as Quistclose trusts 1084; see also beneficiary principle
 Queen's Bench Division 19
Quistclose trust: in abstract 1084–6; Barclays Bank v Quistclose decision 517–19; basic issues 1061–2; categorisation 518–19, 1068–90; commercial contexts 1084–90; constructive trusts 1074–6; decision 1065–7; definition 516, 1064, 1090; equitable interest 1070–1; examples 1066–7; express trusts 1072–4; insolvency 1086; key decisions 1078–82; loan moneys see loan moneys; outline 516–17, 1064–5; as purpose trust 1084; as resulting trust 1069–72; retention of title 1071–2, 1076–8; Romalpa see Romalpa clause; source 1064–5; Twinsectra model 1076–8 racial/religious harmony promotion 1151 real property, presumed resulting trusts 525–6 receivers 1281
 recreational charities 1155–7
 rectification: basic remedy 1238; common mistake 1238; delivery up/cancellation of documents 1240; nature 1095, 1238; ne exeat regno 1241; unilateral mistake 1238–9; voluntary settlements 1239–40 relatives, as expression 167 release: breach of trust 883; stranger liability 1024; trustee duties 420 religion: case law definition 1136–7; charitable principles 1135–6; definition 1136–40; issues 1142–3; public benefit requirement 1140–3; statutory definition 1137–40 religious/racial harmony promotion 1151

- remedies: breach of trust see breach of trust; fiduciaries 686–8; knowing receipt 1023; proprietary estoppel see proprietary estoppel; tracing see tracing, claims; wrongs remedied 29
- rescission: acquiescence 1237; affirmation 1236–7; basic remedy 1230; delay 1237; loss of right 1236–7; misrepresentation 1231–2; mistake 1233–5; restitutio in integrum 1236; restitution 1235; scope of equity 1230–1; undue influence/unconscionable bargains 1232–3
- restitution: breach of trust 867–9; mistake 1178; rescission 1235; specific 1274–5; tracing and 950–1; see also unjust enrichment
- resulting trusts: automatic see automatic resulting trusts; basic principles 501–2; categories 503; circumstances 502–3; common intention see common intention; common intention constructive trusts 730–1; definition 49–50; equitable interests, disposition 504–5; formality exceptions 250–1; foundation 505–6; illegality 532–9; illegality, intention 535–7; insolvency 540–4; meaning 502–3; mistake see mistake; presumed see presumed resulting trusts; purchase price see purchase price resulting trusts; Quistclose see Quistclose trusts; traditional principles 711–13; trusts of homes 739–40; unincorporated associations 238–9; vacuum abhorred and 35; Westdeutsche Landesbank case 503–6
- retention of title: meaning 1062; pledge 1062–3; Quistclose trusts 1071–2, 1076–8; right in specific property 1062; transfer of title 1062–3
- revocable trusts 1056–7
- rights in the home: relationship breakdown 847–9; social justice and 844–9; see also family law, and law of home; trusts of homes
- risk society 1312–13
- Romalpa* case: Quistclose trusts, comparison 519; right in specific property 1062
- Roman law 11, 1317
- sale of land 632–6; court powers 816–26
- satisfaction 1283
- saving of lives 1148–9
- science of complexity 1310–11
- search orders 1194–6
- secret commissions 578–80
- secret trusts: basic issues 301; categorisation 320–6; conscience and 324–6; as constructive trusts 324–5; disclaimer of trust 315; estoppel and 326; evidence problems 316–18; example 304–5; fraud theory 305–6, 320–2; fully secret see fully secret trusts; further property added 315–16; half-secret see half-secret trusts; incorporation by reference 319–20; inter vivos 322; intestacy and 304, 316; modern view 322; obligations of trustees 318–19; parole evidence rule 317; problem issues 314; role 305–6; significance 301–2; split view 322–3; statutory background 302–3; time of creation 319; traditional view 320–2; trustee dies before settlor 314–15; types 303–4; voluntary assumption of liability 637–8; Wills Act exception 323
- secrets see confidence, equitable doctrine of security 1091
- segregated property: certainty requirement 142–5; development of law 142; mistake in identification 144; orthodox approach 118–20
- self-dealing: principle 628–9; transactions 370–3
- settlors: discretionary trust 54–5; express trusts 49, 52, 89–90; poverty relief 1125–6; proprietary right 247–50; resulting trusts 52
- sham devices: definition 111; international trusts law 1057; resulting trusts and 540–2; validity 110–12
- shareholders' rights 1057–9
- Shaw, George Bernard 201, 1127–8
- Simonds, Lord 40
- social complexity 1309–11; science of complexity 1310–11
- social justice: concept 844–5; equity as tool of 1312; example 845; rights in the home and 844–9
- specific performance: absence of writing 1175–6; basic principles 1167–8; chattels 1170–1; contracts, where available 1169–71; contracts, where unavailable 1171–5; contracts not mutually binding 1175; damages in lieu 1178–9; defences 1175–9; illegal/immoral contracts 1171; in personam 1168–9; insubstantial interests 1173–4; land and 1169–70; lapse of time 1178; misrepresentation 1176; mistake 1177–8; money transactions 1172–3; nature of 1168–9; no breach requirement 1169; no consideration 1171–2; no enforceable contract 1175; personal skill 1172; supervision required 1174–5; unconscionable bargains 1176–7; undue influence 1176–7
- specific restitution 1274–5
- sport: amateur 1150–1; education and 1129
- Star Chamber 18
- STAR trusts, Cayman Islands 1053–4
- stolen property 951–2
- Story, J 37
- stranger liability: assistance claim 955–6; basic principles 954; basis of claim 955–61; breach of trust 955; causation and loss 1032; defences

- 1023–4; dishonest assistance see dishonest assistance; knowing receipt see knowing receipt; liability to account in corporate contexts 1024–30; limitation according to fault 1031–2; nature 1031–4; personal liability to account 960–1; personal remedy 1030; receipt claim 955–6; receipt-based/assistance-based claim, distinction 1033–4
- subject matter: certainty requirement 116–45; floating charges 130–1; orthodox approach 118–20; testamentary trusts 129–31; see also insolvency; segregated property
- subrogation 931; forms 1279–80; nature 1277–9; tracing and 1280–1
- superinjunctions: and anonymised injunction, definitions 1212; application to set aside 1223–4; basic issues 1211; communication between courts and Parliament 1227; core principle relating to award 1218–20; data collection 1227; legal context 1226; legal issues 1218; likelihood of success at trial 1222; ‘open justice’ principle 1225–6; and phone hacking 1214–18; potential harmful effect on children 1222; problem of Parliamentary privilege and hyper-injunctions 1227–8; procedural issues 1226–7; public debate 1212–13; Report 1225–8; terms 1224; two-step process 1220–2; types of speech 1222–3
- swollen assets theory 932–3
- tangible money theory 1297–8
- ‘tax havens’ 81; role in international crime 74, 82–3
- taxation: avoidance 68–70, 81–4, 530–1; principles 69–70
- teleological focus 27–8
- tenants: in common/joint 223, 231–2, 827; life 163, 194, 248–9, 271, 357–8, 359, 361, 447–8
- testamentary trusts 129–31
- theft, profits 589–92
- Thomas, GW 182, 188
- title: absolute 52, 54–5, 72; retention see retention of title; transfer of 1062–3
- tort: of deceit 321, 1176, 1231; misuse of private information see superinjunctions; negligence 876
- tracing: basic principles 888–9; bona fide purchaser for value without notice 945–8; change of position see change of position; claims see tracing, claims; common law see common law tracing; consensual transfer 948; defences 934–48; electronic bank accounts 919–20; estoppel by representation 944–5; issues 949–52; liability to account, comparison 893; loss of right 916–20; lowest intermediate balance 918–19; mistake 915–16; mixtures of property 892–3; nature of claim 889–95; original property 891; as process not remedy 894–5; Quistclose trust 1086–8; remedies see tracing, claims; restitution and 950–1; stolen property 951–2; subrogation and 1280–1; substitute property 891–2; see also equitable tracing
- tracing, claims 920–34; appropriate remedy 921–3, 933–4; basic principles 920; choice of remedies 934; constructive trust 923–8; constructive trust, institutional not remedial 927–8; equitable base 924–7; equitable charges 928–30; liens 930–1; subrogation 931; swollen assets theory 932–3
- transactions: commercial see commercial transactions; money 1172–3; self-dealing 370–3
- transfers of property: as gift 210–12; obligations 114–16; see also unincorporated associations
- trust laws, politics of 81–4
- trust property: commercial uses 66–8; component legal aspects 1287–8; controlling interest 467–8; distribution duty 365–7; express trust problems 1289–90; family business and 66; investment duty 365; legal ownership 66–8; mortgage included 468; and property law 68; rights having value, not identity 1290–1; safeguard of 356–7; see also property
- trustee duties: on acceptance of office 343, 354–5; accounts see accounts; acting jointly 348; assets allocation 360–1; basic principles 340–1; breach of trust liability see under breach of trust; care see duty of care; care/prudence 347–8; confidential information 375–6, 404–7, 1208; conflict of interest 367–8; delegation see delegation; discretionary power 391; effect of breach 392; expenses 364–5; fair dealing principle 373–4; fiduciary 55–7; general 353–4; good conscience requirement 347; gratuitous acts 376–7; impartiality between beneficiaries 357–61; information see information provision; office of trustee 343–4; removal 349–50; scope of 343; self-dealing transactions 370–3; to obey directions of trust 356; to safeguard trust property 356–7; trust property and 347; unauthorised profits 368–70; voluntary retirement 349
- trustee duties, limitation: Armitage v Nurse decision 409, 412–14; basic issues 407; commercial trusts and 418–19; disclaimers 420; dishonesty 410; gross negligence 414–15; intentional breach of trust/wilful default 411–12; paradox 419; reform

- proposals 419; release 420; statutory restrictions on 418; trust instrument provision 408–9; trust instrument provision, interpretation 409–10; trustee's obligations and 415–18
- trustee duties, relevant/irrelevant considerations: court's response 387–8; default 388–90; nature of 386–7; setting aside decisions 424; taking into account 377–91
- trustee obligations: conflicts of interest 367–8; on conscience 62–4; failure to act 391; meaning 55; professional advice 441–3; property rights and 64–5
- trustee powers: advancement see advancement; delegation 353; devolution 484–5; discretionary 391; excessive exercise 497; fraud on a power 497; for infants see infant beneficiaries; land see under trusts of land; limits on 497; mistake in 391–2; nature of 473; setting aside 379; to compromise 473–4; to give receipts 473
- trustees: appointment 344–7; appointment, judicial discretion 346; appointment, statutory powers of 346–7; benefit not permitted 34; breach see breach of trust; de son tort 642–3; exemption clause 883–4; express trusts 90–1; fully secret trusts 310–11; in personam, rights against 181–2; indemnity 350–3; investment duties see under investment; meaning 429; office of trustee 343–4; powers 55; refusal to act as 343–4; regulation 455–7; reimbursement 350–3; remuneration 350; unfettered discretion, to resolve uncertainty 169–70; wide powers, to resolve uncertainties 170–2
- trusts: benefits and uses 66–70; birth of 45–7; breach see breach of trust; charges, distinguished 109–10; charities as 1108–9; constructive see constructive trusts; core principles 61–2; definition 47–9; fundamentals 61–6; intention to create 109–12; meaning vi–vii, 41; mechanisms 48; origins 45–7; powers distinct from 147–9; as sham device 110–12; types 48–51; variation see variation of trust; see also bare trusts; discretionary trusts; express trusts; fixed trusts; international trusts; people trusts; protective trusts; Quistclose trusts; resulting trusts
- trusts of homes: academic discussion 793–800; balance sheet approach 731–40; basic themes 702–4, 708–10; co-habitees/cohabitants 705–6, 843–4; common intention see common intention; common intention constructive trusts; Commonwealth jurisdictions 789–93; communal undertakings 743–4; deposit/sale proceeds from previous properties 737–9; equality is equity 741–3; equitable interest 731–3; express trusts 710–11; family assets approach 740–4; Jones v Kernott case 706–8, 739–40, 764–89; law's treatment of family home 828; legal treatment of home 704; non-cash contributions 733–4; persistent problems 784–9; problems questions, approaches 799; proprietary estoppel 744–53; rights/deserts/needs 845–7; Scots law problem 767; social context 705–6; social issues 800; socio-economic phenomenon 793; Stack v Dowden case 706–8, 739–40, 764–89; time of interest creation 739; unconscionable approach see unconscionable actions; unpaid mortgage capital 735–7; value contribution 734–5
- trusts of land: bankruptcy of beneficiary 814–16, 821–4; basic issues 802; beneficiaries 807–16; case law role 825–6; children's rights 812–13, 820–1; concurrent ownership 827–8; consultation rights 808–9; definition of beneficiary 807; delegation of powers 806–7; duty of care 805; exclusion from occupation 811; exclusion/restriction of powers 805–6; finding the facts 824; functions of trustees 804–5; human rights 825; meaning 803–4; occupation rights 809–11; overreaching 826–7; people entitled to petition court 816–18; power of consent 807–8; powers of court 816–26; protection of purchaser 826–7; purchase contracted with delegate 826; secured creditor of beneficiaries 824–5; settlor's intention 819; statute law 803; unity of possession 813–14
- unauthorised profits: authorisation defence 607–8; company law remedy 622–4; conflict of interest avoidance 601–3; constructive trust formation 598–605; corporate opportunity doctrine 612–17; directors' duties 624–6; equitable accounting 627–8; equitable response 609–10; fair dealing principle 629; fiduciary making 598–629; fiduciary relationship 608–9; from fiduciary office 606; misuse of trust property 603–5; remedy of account 610–12; restricted freedom of fiduciaries 617–20; self-dealing principle 628–9; strict approach 620–2; trustee duties 368–70
- uncertainty: administrative unworkability 175–6; ascertainability 174–5; conceptual 172–3; evidential 173–4; forms of 172; powers to resolve 167–72; see also certainty
- unconscionable actions: approach 753–64; Australia 791–3; bargains see unconscionable bargains; consensual approach 755–8;

- constructive trust/common intention constructive trust model 762–3; Cox v James case 759–62; estoppel 649–50, 651, 656–7; excuses cases 763–4; fairness in all circumstances 759–62; granting rights in home 792–3; Jennings v Rice case 758–9; knowing receipt 1009–12; Oxley v Hiscock approach 755–8; property 558–69; proprietary estoppel 656–7, 758–9; rights not based on common intention 763–4; specific performance 1176–7; test 791–2; Voldemort concept 783–4
- unconscionable bargains: rescission 1232–3; specific performance 1176–7
- unconscionable receipt 644–5, 1009–12, 1022–3
- undue influence: actual 1246–7; basic principles 1242–3; categories/classes 1245, 1246–51; constructive fraud 597; as constructive fraud 1245–6; mortgages 1254–5, 1264–5; presumed 1247–50; rescission 1232–3; source of division 1250; specific performance 1176–7; wills and 1250–1
- unincorporated associations: abstract purposes 229–30; as agent of members 228–9; automatic resulting trusts 514–16; basic issues 220; charitable purposes 230–1; distributions 234–6; endowment capital 225–6; gift/assignment to 223–5; juridical nature 220–1; meaning 220–1; moribund associations 234; nature of property 231–2; non-charitable purposes 229–30; resulting trusts 238–9; rules of association and 226–8; transfers of property 222; transfers to, constructions 222–34; trust for present members 225; winding up 234–9
- unit trusts, participants' rights 190–2
- unity of possession 813–14
- unjust enrichment: Canada 790–1; distinction from equity 8, 41; knowing receipt and 1020–1; mistake 1178; restitution and equity, distinguished 1300–1; tracing and 950–1; see also restitution
- valuation of loss: exemplary damages 879; methodology 877–8; set-off 878–9
- variation of trusts: applicant's own benefit 489; automatic transfer 294–5; basic provisions 485; beneficial 491–3; Chapman v Chapman exceptions 486–7; court's jurisdiction 486, 488–9; deviation principle 486; disagreement between beneficiaries 494–5; divorce proceedings 493–4; identification 489–91; issues 486; persons covered by statute 487–8; statutes 487–9, 495–7
- Vice-Chancellors 17, 21
- voluntary gifts 524–6
- voluntary settlements 1239–40
- volunteers: gift recipient 72–3; imperfect gifts and 256–7; innocent 901–2, 907–15; not assisted rule 32
- 'vulture funds' 83–4
- Walker, Lord 41–2
- Walpole, Sir Robert 17
- 'waqf' 46
- Weil, Simone 76
- wills: beneficiary attesting to 313–14; bequests see charitable purpose; interpretation of 107–9; mutual 638–42; secret trusts 323; undue influence and 1250–1
- windfall payments 939–40
- winding up, unincorporated associations 234–9
- Wolsey, Cardinal 18
- women: changing perception of rights 79–80, 794–5; common intention constructive trusts 794–5; denial of rights and protection of 78–9; judicial attitudes to 77–8, 80–1; limited rights to property and other things 75–7; rights in the home 80, 794–5, 800; and trusts law 74–81
- writing requirements 280–4, 289–91, 1175–6
- wrongs remedied 29